A family nucleus of two or three people will come over as refugees or immigrants by other patterns. When new Canadians come to me, they say they want their brother, their sister, their aunt or their cousin to come in. It is not because for some romantic reason they want to share a roof, but it is because they want to build a business. It is the people who come from the refugee camps out of Vietnam who will form the nucleus of our business community.

When a government does not stand up, does not share belief in the House and does not articulate that belief for other Canadians, people do not realize the economic benefits to be gained through family reunification. We must take the effort to make sure we develop trade strategies, immigration policies and business support policies. If we want to begin to deal with the world, we must bring home this message to individual Canadian families who are dealing with our immigration policy. The department is not capable of dealing with these issues with optimism and openness. They receive too many messages from their political leaders, that in fact they should be very careful as to how they deal with different communities.

I say this is the opportunity to change this position. The bill as I noted at the outset of my short time of speaking here is a very complex one and I do not pretend that I can deal with more than one or two issues of the 128 being presented to the House.

I will say to the House and through the House to Canadians that this government has set us upon a course that is greatly disturbing to people who want to see responsible government. In the last month we have seen a number of initiatives, from immigration policy to the child benefit package, which has been thrust upon us out of nowhere to deal with immediately.

The government is not giving due time to consider how we want to build the country —and one can read on the front pages of the newspapers forever about the Constitution —not dealing with a fundamental openness and honesty in each step along the way, the Canadians you want here, how you want to build the businesses, how you are going to look after children, I could go on and on with the list.

Here the government is asking for the discussion of this bill in a few short hours today, to be hustled off to committee, to be buried from public view because it is answering some political instinct which to quote from one newspaper on May 6: "Tory immigration policy mirrors Reform Party".

It is not the task of Parliament to pursue narrow partisan interests. It is the task of Parliament to consider basic issues of immigration in the context of family development and economic development.

I beseech the government to reconsider its position, to be kinder to refugees, to be kinder to immigrants. If we want a kinder and gentler Canada the place to begin is the withdrawal of Bill C-86 and the rethinking of the immigration policy for the 21st century.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I want to take a few minutes this evening to speak on the bill that is before the House.

Immigration issues are never easy for Parliament to deal with. Unfortunately, it is all too easy for some to criticize immigration policies and it is all that easier when those you are criticizing do not look the same as other so-called typical Canadians.

Of course what I am indicating to you is that many times we behave in a manner that we cannot always be proud of when we are dealing with these issues. I remember that day in 1986 when Canada was allegedly invaded by 172 people from the Indian subcontinent, more particularly, from Sri Lanka, Tamil refugees that arrived on our shores.

This government recalled Parliament because 172 people had arrived in this country. On any day there are probably more refugee applicants at the Toronto airport than there were in that situation; except that the ones that come in every now and then do not happen to make news the way these 172 people did.

It left me to conclude that we were not reacting to the incident, we were not reacting to the 172 people, but we, this House, more particularly the government, were reacting to the television news of some days before. That is not a good way to govern. It is a pretty sad way to govern actually.

I also remember the original telecast when the people of the community where they landed brought sandwiches to the people who were arriving on our shores. To me, that was the Canadian way of doing things. That is what I like to remember.

When we talk about immigration policy we sometimes forget, very conveniently, what happened some years before. I recently had a conversation with a good friend of Irish extraction. Together we were reminiscing about how and what some people must have thought when the Irish came to our shores during the potato famine. You can imagine at the time the people probably looked slightly different from others, a little shorter, red hair, many of them suffering from malnutrition, getting off the boat, many of them unwell from the trip, many who had suffered tremendously before the trip began. I am sure the day those boats arrived in Montreal from Ireland people must have said: "What are we accepting in this country?"

Looking at it in retrospect, some of the finest citizens of this country came from Ireland. It is easy for me to say that because my wife is Irish. The Prime Minister will no doubt agree with my sentiments. That is where his ancestors came from and the ancestors of many members of this House, no doubt.

In 10, 20 or 30 years from now maybe one of the Tamil people or their children will be members in this House, they will remember that their ancestors were on that boat and we will once again reflect upon what happened and ask: "Was it not interesting how our ancestors came from a situation that was very hard to live with, to a better country and started a better life?" Then we will wonder what people were doing 20 years ago, just as we are asking ourselves now, what were we doing in World War II when we turned back boatloads of people, Jewish people, many of whom were going back to a probable death.

We should all remember that when we look at amending legislation for immigrants coming to this country. What is the objective we have in mind? All members tonight when we vote on this bill in 30 minutes from now should remember that.

This legislation before us has 128 clauses, 116 pages. My colleague, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce had about 48 hours to read the length and complexity of this bill before the debate on second reading started. Is that the way to deal with one of the most complicated issues facing us today? Just 48 hours before debating it after the government presented it the government says: "Oh, this is urgent". If it was not urgent enough to present the text of the bill to us earlier, why should it be urgent that we deal with it now so expeditiously? If the government is serious about it, surely weeks and weeks before a copy of that bill should have at least been given to the opposition critics and, indeed, all members of this House for review.

Then the government says: "That is okay. You will have time in committee to listen to witnesses". That may be true, but let us remember how the parliamentary process works. First reading is the printing of the bill so members can see it. Second reading is supposed to be the time when we have read the bill and express to this House and the government whether we think this is good or bad legislation. Is it reasonable that all hon. members were given 48 hours to do that? If that was not bad enough, after one day of debate a government minister stood up and said: "Oh, that is okay. Now you have had only 48 hours to look at this bill of 128 clauses and 116 pages, but I have decided you cannot even debate it any more. You cannot even listen to each other any more because we are cutting this debate off today. We want to go on holidays tomorrow".

This may be a good enough reason for some, but it is not a good enough reason for the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, my colleagues or me.

If the government really wants the support of this House, as some government members indicated earlier in this debate, then why is it acting in such a way? I can only conclude the government does not care whether this bill is adopted unanimously, on division, with dissent or with half of this Parliament against it. On an issue as important as this, the government should at least have tried to obtain the co-operation of other political parties in the House of Commons.

We have the ugliness of racism in our country. There are those of us who are concerned about this issue and do not want that ugliness in our country. The very least we can do is work together to the best of our ability and do our small part to eradicate some of these bad sentiments we have toward one another in this country. We can only do that with the good honest co-operation of everyone in the House. I am sure I speak on behalf of my colleagues when I say they will do their best to provide constructive amendments in committee, study the bill as thoroughly as possible and listen to witnesses from everywhere.

Let us remember we started debating this legislation at the 11th hour of the 11th day in a so-called emergency the government has known about since 1986. It is off to a bad start.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased and not pleased to have the opportunity to rise this evening to speak to Bill C-86, which is before the House this evening. I am pleased to have the opportunity to give a critique, but the critique is unprocessed, to follow on the words of my colleague who has just spoken. There has been very little opportunity to critique the substantive issues involved in this bill simply because, as my colleague has mentioned, there has been absolutely inadequate time with which to review the 128 clauses and 113 pages which comprise Bill C-86.

Certainly members in this House have been criticizing our immigration policies in Canada for many months. We have been requesting the federal government to bring in amendments to the present immigration law, but it is most unfair not only to all parliamentarians in this House but to the public in general across Canada. It is unfair to the people who engaged themselves on a volunteer basis to assist immigrant applications to this country, particularly the applications made by refugees, the most vulnerable of vulnerable immigrants to our country.

There is no reason to justify the curtailing of debate on this bill this evening. There is no reason that justifies bringing us to second reading and a vote this evening.

• (2130)

At second reading of any bill in this House all members of Parliament are asked to vote in principle their support or rejection of proposed legislation.

Because there has been insufficient time to analyse the content of this bill it really is not possible to adequately vote on the substantive principles of this legislation. On this side of the House we will be voting against this legislation on the principle that there simply was not enough time to review and reflect on the legislation before we could determine whether or not we would agree with the legislation in principle.

It is important to say, because the government always says when we get into this kind of debate that the opposition opposes just to oppose, that that is our role. That is not the case. When we have had the opportunity to reflect on legislation which has been presented there have certainly been occasions on which we have agreed to the principle of the legislation at second reading.

It is not only members of the opposition who reject the process of bringing this legislation before the House this evening. I would like to quote from just a few of those organizations which deal with refugee issues and also express their concern. We have received letters from various of the non-governmental organizations which address refugee issues in this country.

I wish to quote from a letter from the Anglican Church of Canada signed by Dorothy Davies Flindall. She states: "There needs to be adequate opportunity for all concerned groups to study the legislation and make substantive recommendations. This can only happen if the second reading of the bill is delayed to allow time for consideration of the bill. Our preliminary reading of the legislation indicates that some of the proposed changes have serious implications for the refugee community with whom we work. Therefore, on behalf of the Anglican Church of Canada, I urge you to delay the second reading of the bill until after there has been time for adequate consultation."

The Jesuit Centre in Toronto states, and I quote from its letter: "This bill poses some very serious problems and should not be rushed through Parliament, but subjected to close scrutiny and serious debate".

The Canadian Council of Churches states: "Refugees and non-governmental groups which work with refugees should have the right to participate in the decision-making which affects their lives and work". I am quoting Dr. Stuart E. Brown of the Canadian Council of Churches: "Churches are worried that the government may use the summer session of Parliament to speedily pass this complex legislation without allowing refugees, churches and other concerned groups adequate opportunities to reflect and to share their concerns".

As I said at the outset, we on the opposition side have many criticisms of Canada's current immigration legislation. Bringing forth this bill this evening in this period of economic difficulty in Canada is a difficult time. When Canada is suffering through difficult economic times, the level of intolerance and the lack of acceptance of immigrants and refugees into our country is very high. The times are fraught with misunderstanding and myths about immigrants and refugees to this country and their impact upon our economic, social and cultural life.

I believe it would have been much more appropriate for this government to have presented this legislation in a way that we could understand its substance and content and reflect more knowledgeably upon the same.

The government could have done a lot more to help the Canadian public to understand the realities of the benefits of immigration to our country. The government could have taken action to deal with myths and to set the record straight. The government has failed to put in place a communication strategy to inform and educate the public.

The government in dealing with immigration issues in the last few years that I have been here has looked at different types of merit and desirability for prospective immigrants.

It bases merit and desirability more and more each day on wealth. The richer a proposed immigrant and the more educated, the more desirable you are as an immigrant.

In my view, this is a blinkered approach to the necessity for immigration and the need for us to have open arms and accept refugees. Certainly we do not want the system abused, but does the abuse that exists in this country merit the new directions that policy is taking at this time?

In Canada it is very important as Canadians that we not only address the impact upon present immigration and refugee policies on the economic, social and cultural life of this country, but that we take a much broader global perspective of immigration and the growth of the numbers of refugees world-wide. I believe more and more the stories of refugees will become the stories for this decade and the next decade. We must understand the linkages of environmental degradation to increase refugee flows.

In the past, and I am afraid to some extent still, we in Canada think of refugees only in terms of politics. We must recognize that more and more we are seeing flows of what we would call economic refugees and the thing of the future will be the environmental refugees. I am reminded very strongly of a speech given by the head of state of Micronesia, a southeast Pacific nation, who was speaking about the environmental global warming impact upon his many-island nation.

Global warming has had the impact of raising the sea level around his nation by one and one-half metres. Micronesia has a population of 60 million people. As the sea levels rise around its islands, the people lose the land on which they can live and prosper and have any future. Where are 60 million people going to go if they cannot stay in Micronesia because of the effects of environmental degradation? They are going to look to other lands around the world.

The fact that we regard wealth and education and high educational achievement to be the only criteria that attract immigrants to us is really to neglect facing the realities of global and environmental degradation and the fact that we must encourage these people to develop and help their nations to grow and to promote sustainable development within their nations.

I regret that this House has not had sufficient time not only to address the substantive issues in Bill C-86 but to review Bill C-86 in the context of the larger immigration issues which face not only Canada but the world at large.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to participate in this debate, however briefly this evening. I would like to leave a couple of minutes for my colleague from Hamilton West who would like to address a couple of remarks on this important legislation.

I want to express my concern briefly on the failure of the legislation to deal with the important issue of adjustment programs for Canada's recent arrivals. In my own community of Kingston and the Islands where there is a significant and very important and very rich group of relatively recent immigrants to Canada, the situation in respect of language training in particular is very important and has caused a considerable problem. There is a need for enhanced language training. There is a need for better adjustment programs operated on a more consistent and regularly funded basis.

These are not dealt with in this legislation. This government has failed in this bill to deal with this issue in a meaningful way in this bill. It has produced a bill that obviously has taken some considerable time to put together and it has neglected a very important area for Canadian immigrants, an area that helps their adjustment to Canadian society. It helps them find jobs, it helps them find housing, it helps them with language difficulties upon arrival in this country. These are programs that are worth while from the point of view of integration into the fabric of Canadian society and all very important for the integration into Canadian society. Part of the problem that this bill apparently has sought to address is any negative reaction among other Canadians to recent immigrants. The easiest way to solve that problem it seems to me is through sensible adjustment programs. The bill fails to deal with that important issue.

Second, it gives the government considerable power to determine where people will live in Canada, a power hitherto unknown to our immigration system. I suggest it is regrettable because I think it may leave many persons living in communities where they have no relatives and no friends and where adjustment becomes an increasingly difficult problem for those people.

I am sorry that my time is so short, but I know what is going to happen. The guillotine is going to fall at a quarter to ten because of this government's approach to legislation in this House. This bill was introduced less than seven days ago, on Tuesday, June 16. By agreement there were three speakers on this bill on Friday. That was the first time it was debated. Very rarely, and let the record show this, is a bill debated at second reading so soon after its introduction in this House. It was introduced on Tuesday, so members of the public had a total of three days to digest the bill before it was called for debate in this House. It was called for debate on Friday. It has been called for debate today and the debate will end today on second reading. This bill will be shunted off to a committee which the government will then have meet to hear public input on this bill.

It has changed the rules in respect of legislative committees to reduce the impact of witnesses. Certain witnesses will not be allowed at legislative committees because of the new rules the government has adopted. It is an attempt to force this bill through Parliament without proper public input, without allowing the public its opportunity to express its views on this bill. I do not mean just the public as represented here in Parliament, but the public across the country who will want to read and study this bill, various groups that work with immigrants and immigrant groups themselves. Various ethnic bodies in this country will want to comment on this legislation. They are being denied an adequate opportunity to do so because of the indecent haste with which the government is moving to ram this bill down the throats of Canadians.

I have had reason to comment before on the government's abuse of the rules of this House and its use of time allocation and closure. I could go through the statistics, but in the interest of time, I will forgo that. This is, as the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce said in his speech on Friday, a disgusting abuse of the rules and the government should be thoroughly condemned for its approach.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my constituents in Hamilton West, I again say that I consider it a privilege to rise in this place to debate at second reading Bill C-86, amendments to the Immigration Act. I thank my colleague, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, for allowing me a couple of minutes as well to add the voice of my constituents through me to this debate.

Yes, this place, the House of Commons, is the highest court in the land, so each and every one of us on both sides of this House are lawmakers. But before we can rise in our place to lend support to or choose to reject a proposal that is being put forward by the government or any member in this place, we must be given the opportunity to reflect on what is presented. I pass this message along to the members across the way, but especially to my constituents who may be watching this very debate in their homes tonight or may read my remarks at a later time.

This is Bill C-86, the most revamped, revised, revisited immigration act of the Immigration Act since 1978. This bill is complex, 113 pages and 128 clauses. My time is short so I will not plead with the government across the way or the members across the way to be fair, to do what is right, to delay this vote. That plea I suspect will fall on deaf ears. I plead with Canadians who are watching this debate and who may read the remarks at a later time to write their member of Parliament. Write your member of Parliament and request a copy of Bill C-86. Have a look at what members of Parliament on this side of the House, in opposition, have only had less than 48 hours to look at and enter into strong debate in the House of Commons in order to revisit each one of 128 clauses to deal with a bill that is an incredible revamping and an incredible revisit.

This bill, of course, falls on its face in many areas. We are aware of that. We have heard debate this day on this bill and the greater use of regulation by the minister and the cabinet, matters that until now have been in a law, and are being transferred to regulation, reducing of course the power of Parliament.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry, but it being 9.45 p.m., pursuant to an order made earlier this day in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 78(3), it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith all questions necessary to dispose of the second reading of the bill now before the House.

The question is on the amendment standing in the name of Mr. Allmand. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment, which was negatived on the following division:

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, before you put the next vote I would ask you to seek unanimous consent. You might find there is such consent to apply the results of the previous vote in reverse with regard to the next vote.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for applying the vote in reverse?

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order please. Is there unanimous consent for applying the vote in reverse?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The next question is on the motion of Mr. Valcourt.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt this motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

Some hon. members: On division.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the motion carried on division?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Do I see five members rising?

I declare the motion carried, on division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 52(1), the House will now proceed to the consideration of a motion to adjourn the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérin: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, when you asked five members to rise, you saw there were a dozen members, including members of the Bloc, who rose to show their opposition. You decided to ignore those members and to start all over again, which is entirely against the spirit of this House. Madam Speaker, I ask you to put the question as it should be put.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With respect, the hon. member will agree there is a lot of noise in the House right now.

Mr. Plamondon: Is the noise blinding?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order please. I could not be sure the question had been heard by everyone, so I put the question again. There were yeas and nays, and the yeas had it, as far as voices went. I asked a second time whether there were five people asking for a recorded vote, but there were not. The matter is closed. We shall now proceed to the next item on the agenda.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

[English]

NORTHERN COD FISHERY

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 52(1), the House will now proceed to the consideration of the motion to adjourn the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely the situation of the northern cod fishery in Newfoundland and Labrador and other parts of Atlantic Canada.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte) moved:

That this House do now adjourn.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise in my place to begin the emergency debate that was granted by the Speaker and to speak about the crisis in the fishery in Newfoundland and Labrador, in particular, but also in Atlantic Canada.

Let me say in rising to initiate this debate that I want to thank the Speaker of the House of Commons and the people who advise the Speaker for deciding to give Parliament an opportunity to conduct this debate.

Let me also thank the more than 60 members of Parliament who over the last four or five sitting days officially petitioned the Speaker to allow such an emergency debate to take place, including many of the members who are sitting here on this side of the House tonight.

I particularly want to say that this debate is in the name of all of those who believe that the crisis in the Atlantic fishery in general and in Newfoundland and Labrador in particular, has to be addressed. This debate is brought about by the hard work and determination of the member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, the member for Burin—St. George's, both of whom will participate in this debate tonight, the member for Gander—Grand Falls and the member for Labrador are both in their respective constituencies this evening, dealing with the crisis in the fishery in their own respective areas.

If there was ever a doubt whatsoever as to the need for this debate tonight, that doubt was dispelled this afternoon when the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans for Canada, the member for St. John's West, with whom all relevant members on this side of the House want to work, are willing to work, are compelled to work because of the gravity of the situation, we had the incredible spectacle of that minister saying, in essence: "What crisis? There is no crisis".

In answer to questions put to the minister by me and the member for Burin—St. George's, the minister said, and I should quote him to be exact. I quote from the record what the minister said in response to questions on the crisis in the gulf cod stock: "There is an acknowledged crisis in the northern cod stocks but on the gulf cod stocks—"

I put a fair question seeking information. The minister said: "There is not any immediate crisis that I know of in that particular stock at the present time, with the exception that we have had to restrict mobile gear vessels because of the size of the cod that were caught and because of some other activities which had to be discouraged".

The minister said there was not any immediate crisis that he knew of in that particular stock. Let us deal with the gulf cod stock, the forgotten cod stock, the cod stock in the region known as 4R and 3PN, the cod stock that is the fishery that begins off the southwest coast of Newfoundland in the riding of my friend and colleague, the member for Burin—St. George's, and that migrates all the way up through the gulf, all the way up the great northern peninsula. That is the gulf cod stock.

The minister says that stock is not in crisis. Let us examine the record. The record is that approximately 10 days ago the minister's own department conducted a test fishery in the gulf cod stock. It went out itself to conduct a test in the fishery to find out what kind of fish if any were being caught.

What was discovered as recently as within the last two weeks? The department discovered that 80 per cent of the fish being caught in the gulf, fully 80 per cent, were pre-spawners.

Non-Newfoundlanders or non-Atlantic Canadians are asking: "What does that mean?" That means that 80 per cent of the fish being caught were not yet mature enough or old enough to reproduce, and if those fish are caught now before they are able to reproduce it means the stock is wiped out. It means it is fished to commercial extinction.

That is not my test. That is not the union's test. That is not the fishermen's test. That is not the media's test. That is the minister's own department that conducted a test within the last 10 days which showed that fully 80 per cent of the fish being caught were under 18 inches.

In the words of anybody who knows anything about the fishery, to catch a fish under 28 inches is a slaughter, a criminal slaughter of the resource. That is the size of the fish being caught and that is one of the reasons the minister moved to restrict the activities of the mobile fleet in the gulf.

The minister says there is no crisis, but I have in my hand the report of William Steele for the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, for the minister. The report is dated December 1990. What is the conclusion of the report? Let us deal with facts tonight, not with fiction, not with opinion, not with commentary, not with rhetoric. The report was done as a background paper for the working group report on groundfish commissioned by the minister. What does the report say?

An hon. member: I would not know about it.

Mr. Tobin: The minister says from across the way: "I would not know about it". I hope he does know about it.

The report states at page 11 under conclusion: "The cod fishery in western Newfoundland is in a crisis. The fixed gear fishery in western Newfoundland is at a point of no return if there is no strategy to rebuild the cod stocks in the near future."

I could quote pages and pages from this report to show the extent of the crisis that the minister says does not exist, but that is sufficient for the moment.

Let me then pick up a copy of the Marshall report, also commissioned about a year ago by this minister. It was conducted by Jack Marshall, former area manager for federal fisheries in western Newfoundland, the area manager responsible for the gulf cod stock, the stock of which I now speak. What does he say in response to the minister's claim this afternoon that there is no crisis? What does Jack Marshall say, the senior official in the region?

He states, and I am quoting directly from the executive summary of the report: "The cod fishery in western Newfoundland, southern Labrador is in a crisis mainly because the landings are the lowest on record. Employment and income levels have fallen and impacts are highly concentrated in the fixed gear sector. If present trends continue the fishery could collapse completely. Therefore new strategies are needed to rebuild and maintain stocks". We have started with the results of a test fishery done 10 days ago. The results are a disaster. We have had the report of William Steele done in December 1990, a year and a half ago. It says there is a crisis and we are headed for disaster. We have the report of the area commissioner, Jack Marshall, a report done about a year ago. It says the fisheries is in crisis and we need new direction or we are headed for the ultimate disaster.

Then we pick up the latest study. This study which I doubt the minister has yet seen—if he has not seen it I will provide him with a copy—was commissioned by the Central and Northern Community Futures Committees of the great northern peninsula. These groups are funded by the federal government to look at their current economic circumstances and to examine alternatives to the current downturn in the fisheries.

In fact the April 1992 report is called "The Assessment of the Fisheries Downturn on the Great Northern Peninsula Confidential Interim Progress Report." All of the analysis contained in this report is by Canning & Pitt Associates of St. John's. All of the data flows from the data banks of the department of fisheries, the minister's department. It is not opinion. It is not commentary. It is not hearsay. It is not rhetoric. It is raw data as recorded by the minister's department.

And what does this report say? What does it tell us? Let us review a couple of pages. It tells us that the total landings of all species by weight of fish on the great northern peninsula has dropped from 90 million pounds in 1987 to less than 50 million pounds in 1991. From 90 million to 50 million total weight of all species over a four-year period. That is a dramatic free fall in the total weight of landings of all species.

What does the same report say about the total landings of cod? It says the total landings of cod on the great northern peninsula over the same period of time—and the minister knows these figures—have dropped from in excess of 90 million pounds of cod landed on the great northern peninsula, cod from the gulf cod stock, to just over 30 million pounds. That is a 67 per cent decline in a few scant years. And the minister says there is no crisis.

Let us turn to another page of this recent report. What does this report which is aimed exclusively at the gulf cod stock at the great northern peninsula say in conclusion about the state of that stock?

> The region is currently facing—

That word comes up again.

> —a crisis in its fishing industry, and if fundamental changes are not made, the situation is bound to get much worse very quickly. At the present rate of resource decline there will be virtually no cod fishery on the great northern peninsula within a few years. Though higher prices have buoyed up the fishery during the past five years, this cannot continue.

It says:

> Within households of fishermen and plant workers, the economic effects have undermined personal security and self-worth and increased dramatically family stress—This crisis, which the study terms of reference call the "fisheries downturn," has been in the making for at least 10 years. Even though it has not been sudden, it has been profound, pervasive, and greater than in areas of the province where the drop has been more abrupt and therefore more dramatic.

The report is clearly telling us something different from what the minister of fisheries stood in the House this afternoon during Question Period and told us, that there is no crisis in the gulf cod fishery, that there is no sense of panic in the Gulf of St. Lawrence in the great northern peninsula, that there is no sense of dislocation, no sense of 500 years of collective history and culture being suddenly crushed, vapourized, at the blink of an eye it almost appears to those living in those communities.

When the minister says that, he is showing an incredible degree of insensitivity. The minister is not a stupid man. There is nothing stupid about this minister. This minister is not a minister to waste words. It is not by accident the minister stands in his place in spite of all the evidence I just put before this House and says: "There is no crisis".

That is what scares the people of the great northern peninsula. That is why there were 1,000 people out in St. Anthony last week to say we are here. We exist. We will not go away and we will not disappear. That is why on Thursday there is going to be 1,000 or 2,000 or 3,000 more out in Plum Point to say we are here, we exist, and we will not go away just because the minister says there is no crisis on the great northern peninsula.

What people fear, quite frankly, is this government has begun to gear up its advertising machinery, its propaganda machinery, and I want the minister to tell me that is not true. The government is about to wipe away all of the people, all of the fishermen, all of the plant workers, all of the communities that depend upon the gulf cod stock.

This minister has decided he is going to declare a moratorium on the northern cod stock. He is going to bring in some kind of compensation for those he claims are directly affected.

For the inshore fishermen of Bonavista—Trinity—Conception or for the inshore fishermen who reside in the riding Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte, or for the inshore fishermen who exist along the southwest coast in the riding of the member for Burin—St. George's we are not going to declare a moratorium. We are not even going to recognize a crisis. We are going to abandon those people and let the department of welfare or somebody else look after them. That is the plan of the minister of fisheries.

An hon. member: Shame.

Mr. Tobin: What is happening? The member opposite, the parliamentary secretary to the minister of fisheries, may think this is funny. Let me ask him this: does he think it is funny that in a St. Anthony, Newfoundland plant that several years ago employed 700 people there is nobody working today?

Does he think it funny that in the Port aux Choix plant that normally employs 580 people there are only 100 working today? Does he think it funny that in the Anchor Point plant that normally employs 237 there are only 50 working today? In Brig Bay that employed 137 there is none working today? That in Conche that employed 78 there is only one working today? That in Main Brook that employed 60 there is none working today. That in St. Julien's that employed 32 there is none working today. In Croque a plant that employed 34 there is none working today.

In a New Ferrolle plant there is only a handful of maintenance people where once 200 people worked. In Englee where 323 worked only one maintenance person is employed today. In Raleigh where there were 60 workers there is none today. In Bide Arm where there were 130 workers, none today. In Cow Head there were 65 workers, none today. In Roddickton there were 157, none today. In Savage Cover there were 80 workers, none today. In Green Island Cover where 150 worked there is none today. Bear Cove, none, Cook's Harbour, none, Bartlett's Harbour, two out of 35 and Flowers Cove none out of 65.

Does the parliamentary secretary think that is funny? Does the minister continue to insist there is no crisis in the fishery on the great northern peninsula?

Mr. Belsher: On a point of order. The hon. member keeps saying does the parliamentary secretary think that is funny? I do not think it is the least bit funny. I have been listening here to every word he has said and I have not been ridiculing either.

Mr. Crosbie: We do not find you funny either.

Madam Deputy Speaker: To put the record clear that is not a point of order and the hon. member knows it.

Mr. Tobin: Madam Speaker, if the parliamentary secretary tells me he does not find that funny I am reassured. It means we have made a beginning with the parliamentary secretary. Now we have got to work on the minister of fisheries, the member for St. John's West who insists in the face of the evidence, and I submit if we were in a court of law that would be sufficient evidence.

In the face of the evidence the minister has now got to admit that, indeed, we do have a dramatic crisis in the gulf fishery, the gulf cod stocks.

The minister will be the first to rise and say —and I will be the first to agree with him —that there is a crisis in the northern cod stock, that the northern cod stock has been devastated. In fact, what is frightening about that stock is what we do not know. The lack of scientific evidence that exists for us to make enlighted, intelligent, and knowledgeable decisions about how to manage that stock.

The minister will rise and tell us he is seriously considering placing a moratorium on that stock. I agree with him. You know why? Because there has been a 60 per cent decline in landings from the northern cod stock.

In fact, if you go back far enough it has been greater than that. My friend from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception reminded me before I began my speech that in 1968 there were 815,000 tonnes and by last year it was down to 127,000 tonnes. Just in the last four or five years, there has been a 60 per cent decline in landings in the northern cod stock.

I agree with the minister that is a crisis. I agree with the minister that he has to be prepared to compensate those who have been affected. If he agrees that a 60 per cent decline is a crisis, I ask him why then is a 67 per cent decline in the gulf cod stock not equally and similarly a crisis?

I want to put an interesting proposition to this minister. I want to remind him of something. At the end of the day, when it comes to the northern cod stock the area referred to as 2J–3KL, the eastern coast of Canada, the east coast of Labrador if you could picture the map of the east coast of Canada going off into the Atlantic, when it comes to that cod stock, the Government of Canada can always say: "We did our best to manage it well but offshore foreign vessels did not play the game". Foreign vessels overfished as the minister has said and foreign nations have to cease their fishing as we have. The minister pointed out that there is no point having a moratorium on Canadian fishing efforts if foreign fishing efforts continue. The minister is right.

The minister can always claim that despite his best efforts somebody can always trip him up in his management of the northern cod stock and to some extent there is truth to that.

We have a unique opportunity in the gulf. The gulf cod stock and the Gulf of St. Lawrence is surrounded completely by Canada. It is the only major coastline of the east coast of Canada and the only major cod stock that is not adjacent to the offshore and is not bounded by the 200–mile limit. It is the only stock in which we do not have foreign vessels just outside our 200–mile limit operating freely and at their own will. It is entirely enclosed and bounded by the provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, P.E.I. and western Newfoundland. It is totally in our control. Therefore we have nobody but ourselves to blame or to praise for any wrong that is done or any right that occurs.

I submit to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans that the minister ought to grab on to the gulf cod stock, to that cod stock that migrates within the Gulf of St. Lawrence. It migrates from southwest Newfoundland to the great northern peninsula. He could use that gulf stock as a pilot project to show what Canadians when they are in control can do to rebuild the fishery. That is within the power of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to undertake if he has the imagination and the courage and the support of his colleagues in cabinet to do.

I want to say that we on this side want to support the minister in any attempt to rebuild the stocks. We know that tough decisions have to be made. It would be damn easy for us to sit on this side of the House and just say to the minister: "It is your fault. You fix it up. We have nothing more to contribute". We are prepared to stand with him and make some of the tough decisions.

We are not prepared to stand silent. We are not prepared to say to our constituents as Parliament closes for the summer recess: "You will not be heard. The reality of the desperate circumstances you live in will not be talked about and we will not call upon the minister tonight to give this House a commitment that when it comes to those displaced by a reduction in the northern cod stocks and by a reduction in the gulf cod stock that this government is going to provide the kind of short– term and long-term economic assistance that the Prime Minister himself committed himself to on behalf of the government in this House last week".

I ask the minister when he comes to his feet to acknowledge that we have a crisis. I ask the minister to reach out and to accept that those on this side are willing to work with him, to share some of the burden of the tough decisions, but he has to have a plan of action. It is no plan simply to say there is no crisis and therefore there is nothing I propose to do. That we cannot and will not accept on this side of the House.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Madam Speaker, I did not hear the minister say this afternoon that there was no crisis in the Atlantic cod fishery. I was not here but I heard he is being quoted all across Newfoundland as saying this. I hope the minister is able to stand up this evening and tell us he was totally misunderstood by those who heard him in the House and all over Newfoundland this afternoon. If the minister himself does not recognize there is a crisis, then we are truly in great trouble. Certainly this species could very well become extinct.

I have told the story before of being told by the manager of the biggest fishing company in the area that within five years we could be looking for the last codfish off the Grand Banks of Newfoundland. That was told to me three years ago. We are getting perilously close to the extinction of the species if the minister himself is not aware just how serious the matter is.

I had a telephone conversation with Clyde Newhook, our candidate in the Ferryland constituency by-election, to see what he knew about whether or not there truly is a crisis in the cod fishery in that area. He told me it is a total and complete failure everywhere. Perhaps he was exaggerating, but he did talk about three boats that went out in the past three days. They went 140 miles out from the southern shore and 70 feet of net was hauled three times. Fifteen cod were all they got for their effort. He told me of the inshore cod fishery at his own Ferryland constituency. Over three weeks of fishing there was no sign of any fish. A few fishermen who did catch some found them to be very small at 10 inches long. The fishermen there are saying if there is to be a closure, impose it immediately while there is still some hope of achieving something before any more damage is done.

In the offshore fishery in the 3N-O district the few cod being caught are full of spawn. We are destroying what little is left of the spawning stock in that area.

The only answer is to quit fishing. It is drastic. I suggested that 18 months ago in this House, and of course no attention was paid to it. I did not expect it would be.

If we do quit fishing, we have to provide for the fish shore workers, the inshore fishermen and the trawlermen. I think Canada is ready to do that.

The minister or anyone else should agree there is a crisis, instead of saying there really is not one right now through lack of knowledge or whatever. They should go to the government and say that, we are liable to wipe out the codfish as a species in the North Atlantic. We need money to pay these people not to fish. There are useful things that can be done, but we have to stop today or tomorrow and no longer. The damage is being done every day those fishermen are out there trying to find fish.

It cannot be like it was when they closed down the salmon fishery. The compensation to those who got out of the industry was paid on the basis of their last three years' catch, which was the worst three years in the history of the industry. We cannot pay these fishermen on the basis of the cod they have caught in the past three years or they will be getting next to nothing.

It is not just the cod, it is the capelin, the primary fish bait or the primary fish food. So far all of the capelin that are showing up, according to Mr. Newhook, are one-half the size of mature fish. The fishermen who see these capelin do not know the reason and I suspect the minister does not either and that is part of the problem. We have to find out why. What does it mean? What does it mean to the future of the capelin?

I have talked about the seals before and I am prepared to do it again. The population seems to be exploding in all the areas where they are not looking for fish. They are in quantities never seen before. There have been arguments as to what the seals are eating and whether or not they eat cod or the cod food. They are certainly part of the food chain, and we know they are not eating corn flakes. Is it already too late to save the northern cod stock?

The flounder stock seems low. We have talked about the nose and tail and the jurisdiction. It is time to do something about that. I think if we set an example we would not have to get tough with these people. We should say to these people this is serious. We are in danger of wiping out the species, Canadians are going to quit fishing in those areas. Quit fishing for cod. We want you to join with us in a management plan for the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. Co-operate with us to make sure there is no cod fishing in those areas as well as within the 200-mile limit.

Let us challenge them to show that they too want to save that stock for future generations rather than wiping it all out in a matter of one or two years.

Mr. Newhook told me about visiting families in his constituency where unemployment insurance ran out May 15. They are afraid they will not be able to feed their families. They are trying to get social welfare, but something more has to be done for these people, something that will encourage them not to fish.

The minister and others have said before that we do not really know what is going on. When I travelled to Europe two or three years ago with the fisheries committee under external affairs and talked to these people from the European Community about the alleged overfishing, they said that we did not have sufficient scientific evidence to prove our case. We had not proven our case to them. They said that we do not really know what was going on there.

The minister himself has suggested on several occasions that perhaps it had something to do with the high incidence of ice. The waters were so cold this year and maybe the fish went somewhere else. That could be but we do not know where they are. If they are somewhere else, let us find them. Before we catch another cod, let us try to find out where the survivors are if there are survivors. If we cannot find them, then until we do find some, we have to assume that the population is getting dangerously low and take some desperate steps. The thing we can do most effectively and immediately is to cease cod fishing, compensate the people who are going to lose their livelihood immediately and reasonably and persuade all other nations fishing in those areas to join with us.

We must mount a tremendous scientific campaign to try to find out what is happening. Talk and listen to the fishermen. Some of those people have a lot of knowledge. It is their livelihood and some of them know more than others. Some of them know more than people who are here in Ottawa trying to run the industry and run departments.

Let us find out and let us prove to the world that we are doing our best to make sure we know exactly what is happening in that area of the world, what has caused the deterioration in the quantities of cod, the legendary quantities that were there a few hundred years ago. We have all heard stories about how you could walk on the cod, how you could scoop them up by the netful, no problem at all.

It is not a case of laying blame. We know this has been going on for a number of years. There have been Liberal governments and there have been Tory governments. That does not matter right now. We can worry about those thing during the election campaign. Right now we have to arrive at a common decision that it is Canada's responsibility to do everything possible to save that species.

I am convinced that means talking and listening to people. From what I have seen on site, I am convinced that it means stopping cod fishing immediately and totally, demonstrating to the world this is the way to save the species. We have to prove to the world we are going to put the scientists to work who can accomplish anything, who can show us anything, who can tell us anything and teach us anything. We are going to find out what is happening and we are going to manage that resource in the way in which it should be managed, to have it as a perpetual resource for mankind and for the cod themselves.

It is serious. It is serious or we would not be doing it at this time of night. It is serious or the Speaker would not have agreed to this emergency debate this evening. A lot rests on this minister. He can argue and he can present other points of view. He can present other reports, no doubt, and tell us it is not as bad as we are led to believe it is and make us think that perhaps it is going to be better if we are patient.

I submit to the House that he does not know. The evidence to me is so overwhelming there is a serious problem that it is his responsibility to close down the cod fishing and do whatever is necessary to rebuild that stock so the species does not become extinct. He has a responsibility and an opportunity to turn back the tide, to undo the damage that has been done by 10, 12 or more years of Liberal and Tory governments, and to preserve that species. I hope he does not fail us and the cod.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, this is an emergency debate on the fisheries situation on the east coast of Canada.

If I might just review some of the ground, it was at the beginning of June that the NAFO Scientific Council at our request met with CAFSAC, Canadian fisheries scientists, to review the findings and all the additional research we have had done in the last year or two years with reference to the state of the northern cod, the 2J-3KL cod known as the northern cod.

The northern cod is approximately 40 per cent of the value of all landings of fish in the province of Newfoundland and Labrador. It is 11 per cent to 13 per cent of the value of all landings of fish in Atlantic Canada. It is a very important stock and probably the main reason Newfoundland was settled in the first place. It is a stock of fish very close to the hearts, minds and consciousness of Newfoundlanders.

We had referred this to the NAFO Scientific Council. It spent several days reviewing all this evidence with Canadian scientists. They agreed with the findings of CAFSAC, the Canadian scientists, and they came to certain conclusions which I am sure the House would be quite familiar with. I have the report here. Anyone can ready it. At pages 31 and 32 we see the conclusions. It stated that the age three biomass between 520,000 and 640,000 tonnes and, even more disturbing, the age seven plus biomass—that is the spawning biomass—between 72,000 and 110,000 tonnes were currently at or near the lowest levels ever observed for this stock. The fishery in 1992 would be dominated by only two year classes: those of 1986 and 1987. The limited information available indicated that the 1988 year class was below average and was currently estimated to be about the level of the weak 1983 and 1984 year classes.

Then it continued on page 32 by indicating that it therefore recommended that fishing mortalities should be reduced in 1992 from the levels of recent years.

We had already reduced the total allowable catch for this stock from 266,000 tonnes in the year 1988 down to 120,000 tonnes in February 1992. We set it in December 1991 at 185,000 for this year. There have been reductions in every year since 1988 because of revised estimates, forecasts and projections by our scientists. There have been very severe reductions already up to this time.

It recommended again that fishing mortality should be further reduced. It said that at FO.1, that is the fishing mortality rate of 0.25, the total catch should not exceed 91,000 tonnes. Given the uncertainties in the assessments and the obvious requirement for caution, it would be wise to consider the FO.1 catch to be at the lower value of 50,000 tonnes. It should not be forgotten that at least 20,000 to 25,000 tonnes appeared to have already been caught in 1992.

That is its main conclusion. It says that the stock was at the lowest level it had been since it started observing the stock.

I do not have the time tonight, but I can point out that it is at the same level as it was in 1977, which was the previous lowest level for this stock in its known scientific history. Obviously there is a serious problem with the 2J-3KL northern cod stock.

After the NAFO Scientific Council report came out, I said that I would have to review again the total allowable catch for northern cod for the year 1992. Already it had been reduced by 35 per cent from 185,000 tonnes to 120,000 tonnes. However, in light of this further information from the NAFO Scientific Council in CAFSAC, I would have to review the situation again with a view to either a lower total allowable catch or perhaps even a moratorium on the hatching of the northern cod if I concluded that the stock was threatened so that it might disappear if there were not a moratorium. This was obviously an option that had to be looked at as well. That was all said in the first week of June.

I said that during the month of June and early July, certainly during the month of June, we would be observing the northern cod stock hatched in the inshore fishery. We stopped the offshore fishery for northern cod last February. There has not been an offshore Canadian fishery for the northern cod since last February. We wanted to see what happened in the inshore fishery during June and what cod fish were being caught.

The disturbing thing about the state of the northern cod is its age distribution. There are two good year classes, 1986 and 1987, followed by poor year classes preceded by poor year classes. The classes of 1986 and 1987 have not yet reached spawning age, which is the age of seven. They are only five and six years of age. We had to be careful this year not to allow these two year classes to be caught up this year and next year before they can spawn or else the future of the stock will be threatened. This is what we are watching for. This is now a problem greater than it was in 1977 because of the age distribution of these year classes of the cod.

This is based on evidence. The scientists examine the cod that are caught. They can tell you the distribution of the age classes by counting the rings in the inner ear. This is based on firm evidence that the age distribution of this cod stock is very peculiar. It is based on 1986 and 1987 year classes and the classes since have been very poor. That is why I am contemplating whether or not there should be a moratorium or a further reduction in the TAC.

A further reduction of TAC would still have serious consequences. Even last year, which was a bad year in the fishery, 127,000 tonnes of northern cod was caught by Canadians. The TAC was 190,000 and we caught 127,000 tonnes. Just in 1990 in the inshore fishery alone in Newfoundland we caught 114,000 tonnes of the northern cod. It has not been all bad years leading up to this year. We should not pretend that there has been complete decimation over the last two, three, four, five or six years in the fishery. There have been good fisheries and poor fisheries. In 1990 there was a superb inshore fishery in the northern cod. Last year the inshore only caught 75,000 to 78,000 tonnes. It is not all complete disaster in the last few years fishery. That is still the position.

The inshore fishery can come early or late in June or it can come in July. We do not know what the inshore cod fishery is going to be like yet in Newfoundland. Naturally everybody fears it is not going to be too good. We know that the capelin is late arriving. We know that the capelin that are out there are small, stunted, weenie, little creatures. They are not the size that you can sell in the Japanese market or anywhere else as yet. We know there are problems with capelin and with the northern cod.

Some time in the next week or 10 to 12 days I have to make a decision and I will as to whether we are going to have a moratorium on the northern cod fishery or not or whether we are going to reduce the TAC from 120,000 tonnes for this year to something much less. I will have to make that decision and I will not hesitate to make the decision. I have already said that I am going to make the decision based on the survival of the species. Whatever is necessary for the northern cod to survive, that will be my decision. When that decision is made, whether it is a moratorium or whether it is another severe reduction in the total allowable catch, we will be announcing a program of assistance for those affected by the state of that stock, who are affected by that decision whether it is fishermen, trawlermen or plant workers, the people involved will receive assistance.

If there is a moratorium then the assistance will be based on that. If it is a reduction to 50,000 tonnes or 70,000 tonnes that imposes hardship, it will be some kind of plan to help in that eventuality. I helped them last year. The government helped them last year. The Prime Minister helped them last year.

Last year they got ice compensation when we had a fantastic ice year with ice still coming down in August. We did not hesitate to help them. Last year we also helped the fisherpeople of Newfoundland and Atlantic Canada with a catch failure program, an emergency job creation projects and a gear-up program. The like of the assistance we have rendered to the fishermen of Atlantic Canada has never been heard of before in Canada. We do not need anyone from the opposition or from anywhere else to tell us that we have obligations we should meet. We have met them and we are going to continue to meet them.

We have worked night and day to get fish plants opened that were closed, like Galtus, Grand Bank, programs of economic development and diversification outside the fishery, programs of diversification inside the fishery. We do not need any tongue wagging or finger shaking at us because whenever called upon, we have met the situation we were called upon to deal with and that is going to continue.

We have set up a task force, an incomes and adjustment for the Atlantic fishery, headed by Richard Cashin, the president of the largest fishermen's union in the country with five other people from the trade, the unions and universities.

An hon. member: One of whom is in the gallery right now, Professor Darby.

Mr. Crosbie: Professor Darby is in the gallery. He is a member of this task force. As a matter of fact the task force is working in Ottawa this week. We cannot produce a rabbit out of a hat for our immediate situation. We will be expecting them to give us advice on the longer term aspects of this situation. A whole series of steps have been put in place.

Hon. members opposite want to have an emergency debate. I understand that. They want to be on the record that they are concerned. Sure, we know they are concerned. I can see they are concerned. If they are not concerned, why are they members of Parliament? Why do they seek to get elected? Why are they here if they are not concerned? I will agree they are concerned and we on this side of the House are concerned. The member for St. John's West is concerned. The member for St. John's East is concerned. Naturally, we are concerned. We understand why they wanted an emergency debate. It is premature because I have not made a decision yet.

It is premature because I have not announced a decision that I have not made yet. It is premature because I do not have my colleagues agreeing on this. I am working night and day on exactly what program of assistance I think should be put in place in the eventuality that I have to make this or that decision.

I am seeing the Prime Minister tomorrow morning to review this with him. I know very well I will have his support. He has already indicated in the House that he is waiting for me to bring forward a plan that he can support. Why will he support it? Because he is humane. He is humanitarian. He has a big heart. He is concerned. He is eager. He knows why this is necessary. Much maligned, but there has never in the history of Canada been a Prime Minister or a member of this House who did more for the people of Newfoundland and Labrador than Prime Minister Brian Mulroney has.

An hon. member: Absolutely right. He made a promise and he kept it.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, let me deal with this business of crisis. I do not mind clear debate and I do not mind people being factual. This is malarkey that somehow I said there was no crisis in the Newfoundland fishery. I have Hansard here. Let us look at the Hansard of today. I am very disappointed in the hon. member for this cheap attack about crisis. According to the NDP member from Nanaimo, the member from Burin—St. George's and the member from the west coast of Newfoundland have been howling all over Newfoundland all day today saying: "The minister said there was no crisis. What kind of a fool, a nitwit and an idiot is the minister? He said there was no crisis". What did the minister say? The minister said in answering questions about the cod stocks in the gulf: "There is not any immediate crisis I know of in that particular stock".

If the hon. gentleman got on the radio and quoted me exactly, fine. He did not do that. He called the radio stations and apparently said I said there was no crisis in the fish stocks in Newfoundland. I say it again, there is not any immediate crisis I know of in that particular stock in the gulf.

Let us look a couple of pages further in Hansard. I said to the hon. member: "Because the hon. member rises in this House and shouts across the House does not make the situation a crisis. We hear the hon. member bellowing ceaselessly in this House in Question Period trying to make it appear that somehow the country is falling apart because he is yelling at the top of his lungs". I also said: "The facts have been known for months that he quoted about the gulf fishery and there is no sudden crisis today in the gulf", not in the Newfoundland fishery, in the gulf.

Then the member for Burin—St. George's got up and I said: "Mr. Speaker, we all know that was a reference to the northern cod stock in the province of Newfoundland in particular. There is a serious problem in connection with the fishery. We also know other stocks are under heavy pressure. There is no sudden emergency that has just occurred with reference to other fisheries". Those are my references to the situation in Newfoundland. The hon. gentleman screeched off to the telephones to phone down to Newfoundland to misquote, tear up and give a false impression of what I said.

The hon. member says he wants to work with the government and then he goes out and tries to stab the minister in the back by misquoting and obscuring what he said.

Mr. Tobin: Madam Speaker, I would prefer to make a point of order than try to make a long point of privilege. Because it is a matter of the facts, I want to tell the Speaker this member of Parliament has spoken to no journalist and no media in Newfoundland since Question Period this afternoon about the Question Period the minister refers to. His facts are incorrect.

I would be delighted to have the minister tell me he acknowledges the crisis in the gulf. If he would do that, I would be very happy.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I must say the Speaker is still wondering which one of our Standing Orders the hon. member was referring to.

Mr. Tobin: It is the same one the parliamentary secretary gave.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am telling the hon. member exactly the same thing I told the hon. parliamentary secretary. The hon. minister has the floor.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, I am not interested in debating semantics. I am interested in discussing the situation of the fishery in Newfoundland. We should put this in context as well.

This is not the only cod fishery in the world that is in difficulty. If we look at the Icelandic cod situation, the Icelandic authorities have been told to reduce 1F and reduce catch to no more than 154,000 tonnes for 1993. Last year they caught just under 300,000 tonnes. They have a very, very bad situation in the Icelandic cod fishery.

I have charts to show the North Sea and the Baltic Sea cod are in desperate trouble there. The advice is to stop fishing in the Baltic. For the North Sea, reduce the effort to 70 per cent of the 1989 effort. There has been a tremendous decline in the catch of the Greenland cod. There is practically no cod left there to catch.

The only area that shows improvement recently is in the Barents Sea. For four, five or six years they had grave difficulty and had to just about cut out the fishery. The northern cod is not the only cod stock in grave difficulty.

The gulf cod stock is a different cod stock and it is not in the kind of danger the northern cod stock is in. I am going to act based on the advice I get from CAFSAC and fisheries managers. They are not advising me that the gulf stock is in severe danger of disappearing as a stock or that the year class distribution is in the same maladjusted pattern as it is in the northern cod. Our major problem in the cod fishery at this time is the northern cod.

I am not happy with the state of the gulf cod because the gulf cod is not in a very healthy state but it is not in the kind of situation that the northern cod is in in 4RS–3PN.

There are all kinds of crises if you want to talk about crises. There is a crisis with respect to Hibernia. There has been a crisis with respect to Hibernia now for six or seven months, since the Gulf corporation said it was no longer going to continue in the consortium.

When I think of the Hibernia crisis I think of the fact that the present premier of the province said the whole Hibernia development was not of all that great significance. It only amounted to two fish plants when it came to total employment. He may have changed his opinion since because there is a crisis with respect to Hibernia.

The hon. member from the northern peninsula said that the people in the northern peninsula are here, they exist, they will not go away. I know they are there and they exist. I do not want them to go away. That is why I helped them last year. That is why I will help them this year when the northern cod fishery and whatever action we take requires that they be helped, they will be helped. That is why I helped them last year with the ice compensation. That is why we will help them if the gulf cod stock situation gets any worse. This is a government that helps people when they need to be helped.

The hon. member from the New Democratic Party talked about Mr. Newhook who is a candidate in a by-election in Ferryland in his constituency. He has been in more constituencies than you can count in the whole House. This is about his eighth attempt to get elected in a constituency. I think it is a bit premature to say that Mr. Newhook is in his constituency. His constituency happens to be part of my constituency. I am going to be a very surprised person if Mr. Newhook is seen in that constituency again after next Thursday when the by-election is over. He will be gone off to look for another constituency after next Thursday's by-election. I do not say that in any mean spirit. Every man wants to try to find the right constituency to be in.

I am not quite sure of my time. I think Madam Speaker is indicating that my time is getting close. That is the trouble. Look, I have 14 pages, a pile of facts and remarks prepared by my staff, all good solid stuff, what we have been doing in the last year and several months since I have been minister of fisheries, what we have done internationally, what we have done domestically.

In the next week or 10 days I will be able to describe for you what we are going to do in connection with the northern cod and the fishermen and women and plant workers of Newfoundland and Labrador. It is not going to be easy.

What makes it a lot easier is that I have a leader who is supportive, who is conscious of what needs to be done, who is concerned about people and who is going to be supportive again for us to help down in Newfoundland and Labrador, despite the kind of treatment that he himself personally has received from the leadership of the government of Newfoundland and Labrador. He rises above that.

Whether it is Hibernia or the fisheries, he is there to offer a hand in support. He will be there again in a week or two weeks' time when we have made our decision and when we have to say what we are going to do to help the people affected and afflicted. He will be there and I will be there and the hon. gentleman opposite can be secure in the knowledge that the same concern we showed last year will be shown this year, only in spades.

Mr. Belsher: Madam Speaker, point of order. I think if you were to consult with the other side you would find agreement that from here on there would be 10-minute speeches at the maximum in order to accommodate as many as possible until midnight.

Mr. Tobin: Madam Speaker, there have been consultations and I would concur with the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Caccia: On the same point of order, Madam Speaker, would the hon. parliamentary secretary be agreeable to removing the limit of midnight so as to permit speakers interested in participating in the debate to make their intervention?

Mr. Belsher: Madam Speaker, I was led to believe there could be five to six speakers from the other side. If that is so then we could agree to that.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Maybe we should start first by getting unanimous consent as far as the 10-minute speeches are concerned. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It might be that we will go over midnight for a little while. Would there be unanimous consent if I were to suggest that our pages, be able to leave?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I think we should examine why we are here tonight. It is for a very simple reason. It is an emergency debate because it is based on an emergency situation in which we have a situation of crisis proportion. We are here, as the hon. member for St. John's West says, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, because we are concerned.

The way I see things is not quite the way the minister sees them. I have heard about the compensation programs, every time I ask a question on compensation. I am told about the compensation the year before and the compensation the year before that. That is not doing much good for the people who need the compensation now.

The reason I and my colleagues are here is to respond to letters like this. I am going to quote a letter I received from a constituent of mine dated June 6. I want to share with you the destitution in this letter. It is from a Mr.

Dean Williams of New Harbour. He is in charge of a group of plant workers and he has written me and I am going to quote parts of his letter. He starts off by saying:

"Dear Mr. Mifflin: We as fish plant workers are very concerned about the state of the fishery in our province. Many of us have worked in the fishery for most of our lives. As you know, our livelihood has been going down hill in recent years. Those of us who have always looked forward to spring and summer as seasons we could count on for most of our annual income are now finding it difficult to keep our families fed and clothed. Since the cutback in northern cod quotas in 1989 the winter fishery is nearly non-existent. The sad fact is that UI is now the mainstay of our income. The changes made by Bill C-21 in November of 1990 made it more difficult for us to qualify. This increases our difficulty in maintaining our standard of living. We are searching for ways to help alleviate some of the problems we now encounter. We have to come up with some ideas that will help us to maintain a standard of living with our local economy the way it is.

Many of us find it impossible to work 10 weeks in a year because the fish is not there to obtain the weeks we need to qualify for unemployment insurance.

Most of the plants in your riding have slowed down or even stopped production. We would appreciate any idea you may have and any support you would give".

I have 57 plants in my riding. The member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte rhymed off the number in his riding. We have 252 plants in Newfoundland and Labrador.

This gentleman represents one of thousands of people within the last three to four months and they are in two categories. The first is those people who have no unemployment insurance now because either they did not have it when the plants were closing down or they had it but they have run out because there is no fishery, as Mr. Williams points out. The other class of people is actually in both classes, the class I just mentioned and they are also concerned about what we are discussing here this evening, a moratorium on the cod stocks which will prevent any fishing and any compensation in the form of wages.

They are looking at the long-term package, which we are talking about here tonight and the interim package, which was the reason this debate was started at the beginning; the 1,000 people in St. Anthony who had no jobs, the 500 people in the Charleston fish plant who demonstrated in Clarenville which is unheard of in my riding.

There are the 1,200 people in the deep sea plant in Port Union who have no work, the 50 families who had no qualifications since February 21. I made 26 interventions in this House and I have had no satisfactory response. That is why we are here this evening. Let me give you in another way the scope of the problem. The facts that the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte quoted, that is a crisis.

Mr. Cashin who is working on this is quoted to have said: "The gulf stocks are in worse shape than the northern cod stocks". I did not see that myself, but I am told he said that. Well, that speaks to me.

Let me give you some indication of the deep sea and inshore fishery and the crisis we have gone through. In 1968, 815,000 tonnes and last year 127,000 tonnes in a relatively short term in the life span of 500 years of fishing in Newfoundland, an 85 per cent reduction.

Again with the deep sea offshore plants, the one I just mentioned in Port Union, 1,200 jobs were lost and over 200 trawlermen were out of work. On February 21, it closed down and 155 trawlermen were out of work and 850 people had no work. Normally, at this time of the year, that plant is operating almost full tilt. Now other than just a few maintenance workers there is nobody there.

Let me give a stark and sad commentary on the inshore fishery. About 25 years ago, it was not uncommon for a cod trap—a cod trap is like a box that goes in the water. It has a door, the cod swim in and they cannot get out. It can hold a lot of volume. About 25 years ago, you could catch 25,000 pounds of cod. That was not unusual per trap. One trap would catch 25,000 pounds. About five or six years ago, you could catch maybe 10,000, a few years ago, maybe 7,000. Last year, if you got 1,500 pounds it would be considered to be good.

In Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, my riding, the three great bays in eastern Newfoundland are always teaming with cod. This year in Trinity Bay, I spoke with a fisherman last Saturday who had 27 traps and he got 103 fish. That works out to about four fish per trap, about 25 pounds versus 25,000 pounds 25 years ago. That is a devastating reduction. It is an astounding reduction. It boggles the mind. That is the proportion and the scope of the problem.

Let me look at it in another way. What does this mean? Why are we here tonight debating? Why did it take us three or four days and 50 members to get this? I have trouble with that. Let me equate it. It is difficult to make comparisons. Sometimes it is odious. When you are in a difficult situation and the frustrating situation we are in on this side of the House, you resort to almost anything to make your point.

Let me make the point this way. In Newfoundland I mentioned 252 plants. If you count those involved in the fishing and the fish plants, in my riding I have over 10,000 people. In Newfoundland, there are 43,000 people involved in this business. That makes up 22 per cent of those people who work in my province.

Let me take the automobile industry in Canada. About 50,000 people who make cars and about 70,000 who are involved in car parts, 90 per cent are in Ontario. So if you take 90 per cent of 120,000 in Newfoundland mathematics it works out to about 100,000 people, actually 108,000 people, but that represents only 2.2 per cent of the working population of Ontario. If I were to take that 2.2 per cent and multiply it by 10 to give me 22 per cent, which is what fishing means to Newfoundland, it would mean that there are over one million workers equivalent in Ontario that would be without work or their jobs would be threatened. Now if that were not considered a crisis on a proportional basis, I do not know what would be.

There is the scope of the problem. The concern is yes for the future of the fishery. Yes, fishermen will co-operate. They understand if there has to be a moratorium.

In one of the plants the plant workers have agreed to have their salaries in Newfoundland, just today or yesterday, reduced from $10 an hour by $1.50 to $8.50 an hour. They will co-operate.

That is the long term but as for the short term there are literally thousands of people. There are 58 families today in my riding that never got any compensation because they did not have enough stamps to qualify and there were no fish since February 21, four months. They are hungry. They are losing their cars. They are losing their houses.

This is more than a crisis. I do not know what is more than a crisis. I do not know what term to put on it but it is of that proportion.

I have given the scope of the problem. I have given the two terms of compensation we need. I beg this minister of fisheries to take account and heed of what has been said here tonight, what will be said here tonight and not wait another month, not wait for another couple of days. Before this House closes down tomorrow, make some commitment to those people in the short term and then the long term, perhaps in a week or so, whenever that is planned.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to participate in this debate tonight and I would like to thank the Speaker for allowing this debate on a matter of grave concern to many people in Atlantic Canada.

It is an opportunity to discuss an issue that has been very much in the news in our region of Canada and about which there is certainly knowledge in other parts of the country, though perhaps not the same amount of understanding we have in Atlantic Canada.

There are basically three points or issues I would like to speak tonight and I will be very conscious of the clock, as I always am.

First of all, I want to make the point that the focus of this debate in this discussion is Newfoundland and Labrador but I want to make the point this is a problem that goes beyond Newfoundland and Labrador and impacts throughout Atlantic Canada.

For instance, in my own constituency of South Shore I have Mersey Seafoods Limited in Liverpool which has an offshore cod quota on the Grand Banks. National Sea Products is impacted. Sea Freez is impacted. Clearwater is impacted. There is a long line of fishermen from Cape Sable Island who fish cod off the Grand Banks.

While the greatest impact by far is in the province of Newfoundland and Labrador, this impacts as well on my own province of Nova Scotia and I expect other parts of Atlantic Canada.

Accordingly, we will be watching with hope and encouragement that when the minister does bring down the aid package I know he will bring down as part of the response to this, it will extend to other areas of Atlantic Canada that are impacted by this crisis as well, in particular the province of Nova Scotia.

Often we hear, when we are in central Canada and other parts of the country, talk about the problems of the fishermen. I think it is important to recognize that in many ways the people who are impacted as much if not more than the fishermen are the people who work in the fish plants, the plant workers. These people put in many hard hours and quite often do not get the same economic return as fishermen sometimes get. This problem is one that has a ripple effect right throughout the communities in which they are impacted.

I have listened to members on all sides of the House speak tonight and everybody is cognizant that we are dealing here with something that has a very pervasive impact on those regions of the country where it is involved. Solutions and measures must be extended to all those areas and that includes Nova Scotia as well as others.

The problem we are discussing here is twofold. It is long term and it is short term. The long term seems to be coming under control and I want to say a little bit more about that later. The focus of tonight's debate is the short term.

The minister has spoken earlier and made the point that it is a bit premature here to be discussing the response when a decision has not yet been taken and the response fully announced. It might be more appropriate to have a debate at that time but members opposite, for quite understandable reasons, were anxious before the House rose to have an opportunity to put on record their concerns. I must say I welcome that opportunity.

I think we must recognize it is inevitable in the short term that in the final analysis we are going to be faced with some kind of decision relating to the extension of the moratorium. As the minister has said, within the next week or 10 days he will be making that decision.

That moratorium, just as the moratorium that is down now, has a profound impact on the people who normally fish resources and on the people who work in the plants that depend on those resources as a source of supply to keep those plants going.

Inevitably this will require substantial financial assistance over a fairly extended period of time. This government has certainly not shied away from providing such in the past. We had the $584 million Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program two years ago in response to the first waves of this problem. Last year we responded to the destruction of the stocks with the ice program. One expects this government will come through again.

It is interesting to observe what is going on in this country. It is easy for those of us who represent fishing areas to focus on this issue, but we must remember that this is one issue among many in our country today. All Canadians are concerned with the unity issue and the efforts that are being made by people from coast to coast in this country to achieve a successful constitutional renewal so that Canadians could get on with dealing with the economic and other problems that are so important in our lives.

One would have to be blind not to have noticed that the premier of Newfoundland, on behalf of the government of that province, did not seem to be showing a great deal of flexibility in the constitutional talks. I wonder what the response will be from Canadians from other parts of the country for whom constitutional renewal is the major priority, if the response they are getting from the Government of Newfoundland is that it has its principles and its principles cannot be compromised in order to save Canada.

I guess what I am saying is that just as Canadians are going to be asked to be flexible in making their tax dollars available to assist Newfoundlanders and Labradorians with the severe difficulty they are facing right now, so also should the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador, and indeed the premier of Newfoundland and Labrador, be prepared to be flexible in responding to the priorities that other Canadians have had.

I cannot think of a better person to go to the cabinet table to defend the interests of Newfoundland and Labrador in this crisis than our hon. Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. I think they should be erecting statues of that man from one end of Newfoundland to the other. We could have a few in Nova Scotia and the other maritime provinces because he has served Atlantic Canada marvellously well over the time he has been in office. We have to get behind this minister. We have to show that Atlantic Canadians and Newfoundlanders are prepared to make the compromises necessary for Canada that they are now asking Canadians to make to respond to their particular crisis at this particular time.

The problem we are here to discuss of the dwindling fish stocks really has four sources: fishing by Canadians; fishing by foreigners —and I could say overfishing by Canadians and overfishing by foreigners; the impact of the growth in the seal population and as CAFSAC recognized, other environmental factors such as the cold ice conditions in 1991.

The easiest of those to deal with is obviously the seals. Clearly, with an increase of about two million seals in the population of Atlantic waters, it is time we recognize we have to have some kind of a seal cull. There is great nervousness about suggesting this because of the impact of the environmental movements of Europe and other places and their opposition to the notion that anybody should harvest seals or cull seals.

However it is time, in my judgment, that these European environmentalists and these people who call themselves funds for animal welfare started to show a bit of concern for animals called cod fish, flatfish and capelin. They may not be cuddly like seals but they are extremely important to the economy. An animal is an animal is an animal and all have a right to participate. Perhaps the minister will have to be considerate and will look to see what the response is with respect to seals.

Canadians obviously have taken the bite as far as having a moratorium imposed on the offshore fishery. We will wait to see what decision the minister makes with respect to the inshore fishery. If we are going to lick this problem we will need co-operation from those who fish outside our 200-mile zone. We will need co-operation from the European Community, in particular Spain and Portugal, and indeed from South Korea. Of course there are vessels under flags of convenience like Panama and Honduras.

Fortunately we have been getting some co-operation as we have never seen it before in recent years from all these sources. The minister had a very successful visit to Panama and Honduras. I think we will see a lot fewer flags of convenience.

It was very encouraging to see the response recently of the European Community, led by Spain, I might say, in pulling their cod fleet off the nose of the Grand Banks. Unfortunately, this announcement was met with a great deal of cynicism. Perhaps one can understand that in view of the overfishing that has gone on in recent years by Spanish and Portuguese vessels.

At the same time, if we wish others to understand our perspective, perhaps we have to be prepared to listen to them. As Canadians, we love to pilgrimage over to Europe and tell the Spanish that they are a bunch of pirates that are out there raping the fish stocks. I am not sure if I were Spanish how I would respond to that. Perhaps, as Canadians, we should be a little bit better at listening to the perspective of others, rather than just going over there and telling them what our views are.

We have to look at the fact that from their point of view they have participated in this fishery for over 500 years. They have always had a fleet of distant fishing vessels, as opposed to simply fishing in their own waters. They have huge fish plants. They have thousands of vessels, and of course they have a huge demand for their own local market. They do not have unemployment insurance and support programs such as we have in Canada. But they have made an effort and we have to encourage those efforts to see that we do get in the long term the diplomatic solutions that will bring proper control and regulation of transboundary fish stocks in places like the Grand Banks of Newfoundland. It is only through that that we are going to find the long-term solution.

In closing, I will simply make reference to the very significant development that occurred at the Rio conference when, through the leadership, primarily of Canada, and through the leadership primarily of this minister of fisheries, the United Nations agreed to convene a conference on overfishing and the regulation of transboundary stocks, which we hope will ultimately lead to the long-term solution of this problem.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, again we rise in this place to debate a crisis in the Atlantic fishery. It certainly is not a pleasant task. We all know that the fishery is in severe trouble. If we had ever thought over the years that it would come to the crisis we are in today probably we would have done something about it many, many years ago.

The problem is that the people affected by it, the people who will really feel the brunt of this, are the fishermen who catch the fish, the people in the plants, the packers, and of course the people who sell this great commodity.

After listening to all the speakers here tonight, what is going to have to happen in this whole situation is that a great part, if not the whole area in the cod fishery especially, is going to have to close down. This is something that I and other people of my age never thought would ever happen. For 500 years we have caught fish, we have processed fish and we have sold it. Unfortunately we never took an inventory of what was happening off Newfoundland, off the east coast of Canada, off the eastern coast of the United States, off the east coast of North America.

We heard the minister quote other areas that are having problems, such as Iceland and Denmark. We have allowed this to happen in our lifetime. It has come to a situation that we would never have believed would happen, but now we are in a situation where we probably are going to have to close down this operation and rebuild it again.

I have listened to the people involved in this business, the scientific community. We have heard the experts tell us that, yes, this fishery can be revived and different time frames have been talked about, from two to five years.

The number one thing that will have to take place in that two to five years is the people who are displaced will have to be given compensation to let them, if they are going to stay in the fishery, rebuild or go on to work at other trades. A very important part of this debate here tonight is on what is going to happen to these people. As most members in this House know, especially those who live in the areas that are greatly affected by this, there is not very much else that these people will be able to do. A whole new philosophy and a whole new area has to be brought into being. These people must in the short term and in the long term be taken care of financially.

Then of course we have to start to bring back this great resource. We have let this happen over a period of years. If we had been nurturing, cultivating and tending to this, we certainly would not be in the situation that we are in now.

We have a responsibility as Canadians and we have a responsibility as part of the international community to do our part to rebuild this great resource off our eastern coast. We also want to make sure that all of the factors that contribute to this are taken care of. I am sure that when the people who were at the conference in Rio talked about the fishery in the world and what had to be done also took into consideration the other areas that are contributing to the decline of it, one of course being pollution. We talk about the overfishing and the seals, but we also have to talk about the pollution that has moved into our oceans from around the world from waste that we have been too readily able to dump into the areas. These are the things which I know are all part of the problem we see today.

We also know of course that our fishery has been harvested, has been overfished and has been pillaged over the last 500 years. Honestly, as caretakers of this, we have not been very good caretakers. We now have to start conserving and rehabilitating. We have to take a serious look at what we did not do. We paid lip-service to it, yes, but now the crisis has hit where it hurts: in the pocketbooks and at the dinner tables of the men and women who work this resource, fish this resource and sell it.

When we shut this down, the markets are going to disappear and therefore we are into a whole rebuilding situation. I am sure it is a very sad occasion for everybody who is here tonight. I am sure that the mover of the motion, the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte, is not very happy that he had to move a motion on this because we let our resource get into the situation it is in.

Now that we have taken this look, the government and members of the opposition have to say that we are prepared to go all out to bring this resource back. We have to say that never again can the fish trawlers and the factory ships with all of the new modern equipment take and remove young fish from the area, fish that have yet to produce. This was talked about by all of the speakers here tonight. This shall never be allowed to happen again. We have to make sure that we have the co-operation of the whole international community to make sure that this does not happen again. When we rebuild this fishery, when we bring it back as we hope we can do, we want to hand it to our children and our grandchildren in much better shape than it was left to us. Once we rebuild this and get it back to a situation where we can use it again, we have to use it very carefully.

I say that we have to make a commitment to the generations that follow us that this is what we are prepared to do. If we do this and manage this fishery in the way we should have been managing it in the last number of years, we will in fact have something to pass on to our grandchildren.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, on the points that have been made so far, one has to comment with regret on the fact that the minister felt he had to say that this debate was premature. If anything, one could say that this debate is timely, necessary and of the greatest urgency. One has to put on record two reports that deal with the situation of cod and fishermen whose livelihood depends on the cod in western Newfoundland. I would like to refer to a study by William Steele, the program co-ordinator on Economics in the Gulf Region of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans published in December 1990. In that report, he relates as follows: "The cod industry in western Newfoundland is in a crisis. The fixed year fishery in western Newfoundland is at a point of no return if there is no strategy to rebuild the cod stocks in the new future". These were statements made 18 months ago. Certainly, the alarm signal was already given to the government at that time.

In addition, in a report published less than one year ago, a report known to me as the Marshall study, again by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, I find the following statement which reinforces the one just heard by William Steele. In the Marshall report we read: "The cod fishery in western Newfoundland and southern Labrador is in a crisis mainly because landings are the lowest on record. If present trends continue, the fishery could collapse completely. Therefore, new strategies are needed to rebuild and maintain stocks. It is also felt that the fishermen and the union feel that a moratorium is required with compensation".

The minister claimed that this debate is premature because he has to make a decision. One begins to wonder why a decision still has to be made in view of the fact that his own officials have been bringing this crisis in the gulf to his attention. The first occasion was 18 months ago and the second occasion during the last 12 months. One wonders why the minister and the government have yet to make up their minds in order to meet this particular crisis.

It is a situation which is of great concern to the entire nation. We do not want to repeat the experience we saw with haddock in the 1960s and herring in the 1970s whereby entire communities in certain parts of Europe lost their livelihood. We do not want to see a situation in Canada of environmental migrants who would see the necessity of moving to central Canada in order to find a new livelihood.

Obviously a culture and lifestyle has developed over several centuries and a solution has to be found for these communities to continue to make a livelihood and to continue to plan for the future by making a living from the ocean.

One lesson is quite clear. Whenever we put the economy first instead of natural resources, in this case the fish stock, we sooner or later will regret that type of decision. This is what happened with the herring fishery in the North Sea and now is happening with the cod stock in the gulf.

We are learning the bitter lessons of sustainability. We must begin to apply the concept of sustainability to fisheries as we do with forestry, agriculture and other natural resources. Obviously we want to avoid further hardships and stresses. We have to build the necessary precautions that will enable this community to continue to have economic well-being where they are located at the present time.

Only the federal government has the means to provide the resources to bridge these communities over during this time of crisis, namely the responsibility of providing the economic aid that is necessary until the stock is rebuilt.

This is done when it comes to a crisis with the prairie farmers, when it comes to the dairy producers in Quebec and Ontario, and it has to be done with the fisheries as well.

It is interesting that Dr. Harris in his report in 1990 stressed the importance of sustainability in terms of conservation: "We must convince the domestic and foreign fishermen that conservation is a matter of the utmost importance and that violations of appropriate regulations will not be tolerated".

At this point one must raise as support of any policy the matter of the Law of the Sea because it has a bearing and a relevance to the capacity of Canada to maintain sustainability in the fisheries.

Canada promoted the Law of the Sea quite actively in the 1970s and in the early 1980s as well. It was among the first nations to sign this law. The next step, that of ratifying, which represents the final step in international laws, has not yet been carried out.

So far 53 nations have ratified the Law of the Sea but Canada is not among them. This law becomes operative only when 60 nations ratify it and here is Canada dragging its feet, losing credibility, waiting perhaps for a hint from Washington, who knows. In so doing we allow the international community to conclude that we really do not mean what we say.

I submit that Canada has to ratify the Law of the Sea because it contains important sections that would help our fisheries. It is the first major step toward an international ecosystem approach for the management of ocean resources for their sustained use. When it comes to the high seas beyond the national jurisdiction, international action is becoming increasingly essential. Advancing the Law of the Sea and making it operative is of the utmost importance in this regard.

Let me quote from page 274 of the Brundtland report, Our Common Future: "Indeed, the most significant initial action that nations can take in the interest of the oceans' threatened life-support system, is to ratify the Law of the Sea Convention".

We are painfully beginning to realize that sustainable development, be it in fisheries or in other national resources, can be secured only through international agreements which would include surveillance, management, development; all carried out in the common interest.

To reach such a plateau of international action we have first to get it right in our mind, namely a clear understanding of the relationship between the economy and the environment. This is essential.

It is not a matter of choice between the two or a question of balancing the two. Instead it is a question of integrating economics with environmental considerations. We will reach a sustainable path only when our policies and actions flow from the clear understanding that the economy is built on the environment. It would be folly to continue to believe the reverse.

In conclusion, we have here an opportunity in that particular part of the gulf known as the 4RS-3PN section, which is fully within Canadian control, to develop this into a model area for sustainable fisheries. All it needs at this stage is a statement by the minister declaring this an area for sustainable fishery development so we can prove to the international community that within our waters, within our boundaries, we can also practise what we preach.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): It is a pleasure for me to be able to speak in this debate. It is not a particularly pleasurable debate. It is a very difficult situation that affects my constituents, the people of Newfoundland and Labrador, and frankly it is a national situation we must come to recognize.

In thinking about this situation I wonder quite often how we got here, what it is we are really dealing with, and what in the short and the medium term has been discussed here tonight by my colleagues on both sides of the House. What must we do about it?

Perhaps because I am a bit of a sentimentalist I often think of the great Newfoundlander, the Hon. Bill Keough, who for years was the member for St. George's constituency, one of Mr. Smallwood's original ministers, a neighbour of my family and a great friend. He talked often about the last forgotten fishermen off the bill of Cape St. George. It became a catch-phrase for him and many others. It was really a reminder to us there are many people in the fishery who toil on and are often forgotten. They carry on year after year prosecuting the fishery, making their own living and their own way.

Sadly, this challenge or crisis we face hits people in the fishery for the first time, both those who prosecute the fishery and fish plant workers, particularly in my constituency where there are only about 300 fishermen. In fact that is a census figure and I suspect there are considerably less. There are fish plant workers in a number of communities, but many of them have never had to deal with emergency response programs or qualify for unemployment insurance. They have never needed support. For the first time they are faced with one or perhaps two options: in the first there is no fish, and in the second they are confronted with a moratorium on the fishery and will not be able to fish. They will be forced to pursue or participate in programs this government will set up.

My colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, the member of Parliament for St. John's West, talked a little bit about those programs. He said the government, under the leadership of the Prime Minister, has consistently responded to ice conditions, low catches or problems of that nature, and that protection will be there.

I want to come back to that, but I would like to just briefly touch on some of the problems we face and how we got here. I have been impressed all along that while from time to time we go off on particular tangents, it is recognized the problem is the result of a number of factors. The problem of reduced numbers that have necessitated lowering the total allowable catch and taking some pretty serious steps is the result of a series of problems.

In 1977 when we extended the 200-mile limit and the economic zone, the basis for calculating the number of fish was wrong. We recognize that. It was something officials at the time had over-estimated. Fishery science at the time was very new. The capacity to predict the number of fish and to know what was happening was something that has evolved very quickly over time. In 1977 we did not have the capability we needed.

Quite clearly, there has been a tremendous increase in the number of seals. Not only do we try to catch up with exactly how many seals there are, but we try through repeated studies supported by the department of fisheries or the Centre for Fisheries Innovations, the Marine Institute in St. John's and a number of private studies to assess how seals perform, what their behaviour is, what they consume, how they consume it. The argument is that they do not eat that much cod, but I am sure all members recognize that one bite out of the belly of a codfish may only amount to a few ounces of fish but it also means that the fish is dead and is of no value.

In 1990 we had a great catch. The inshore catch was as high as it has been in a number of years. Fishermen in my constituency did quite well. It should be recognized that even in 1990 we did not see the cod fishery start in Torbay, Flat Rock and Pouch Cove where it tends to strike first until well into the first week and the beginning of the second week of July. We have a bit of time yet on that.

In 1991 we saw some of the worst ice we have seen in a long time.

As the minister has said, in January it was recognized there were some serious problems with the numbers. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans undertook a major survey that has been referred to by a number of members to assess exactly what the problem was. In my discussions with the scientists they quite clearly have looked at all options. They have gone quite far east to see if the fish have in fact migrated into the middle of the Atlantic. They have tried to catch fish right through the water column. They have tried to follow the northern cod in through the Straits of Belle Isle and into the gulf.

They have concluded that with the water colder than it has been, with the water saltier than it has been, water that we call slubby, which is dirty and full of ice and mush, that something environmental has happened.

There is no question the increase in the European catches has had an impact. That is something we all recognize. I do not think there is any question that some of the practices we have followed, be it in the offshore or otherwise, have contributed to this problem. There is not one single thing we can point to.

Clearly, we have a problem. The northern cod stock is considerably less than was expected. Obviously, the catches for 1992 and subsequent years are considerably less than we would have expected in the past.

We have had a discussion and we have had debates in the media. We have had debates in this House through Question Period and otherwise.

There has been much speculation about a moratorium. I have talked to fishermen. I have talked to fish plant owners. Both groups have talked to me about a moratorium. What will a moratorium accomplish for us? First of all, a moratorium would allow us to have the stock of fish catch up, the number of fish that are available come back to levels that are necessary to ensure the ongoing availability of fish. This is not simply fish to be caught.

It is particularly important that we recognize where in my view the most staggering numbers have come is not in the biomass available as much as in the breeding stock. That is estimated I think between 75,000 and 110,000 tonnes. That large number of fish, even at 110,000 tonnes is less than the inshore allowance we anticipate we would catch.

It is important that we look at both. The minister has talked about the impact of the year classes of how 1986 and 1987 are fairly strong, but obviously with cold water and the inability for fish to survive and fish to breathe, the later year classes logically would not be strong. It is too early to tell, but they would not be strong.

What is it that we do when we respond? The minister has talked about what he is doing to address this problem. He will have meetings with the scientists. He will have meetings with the industry. He will have meetings with his provincial counterparts, part of an ongoing process, a process that he and his predecessors have undertaken as a necessary tool in managing the fishery.

What is it that is important when we design a program if a moratorium is in place or for that matter even if we have to respond to those not able to catch the fish that they have been prepared to catch over time?

It is essential that we take into account the future, the long-term future of the fishery. That means that we have a stock that would ensure that those people who go after the fish have a good and solid income. It is essential that we recognize that communities and families and individuals depend on that fish but that fish cannot necessarily be there for everybody. It is important that we recognize that the program we put in place is not to take care of everybody's needs but to take care of the needs of those who have historically depended upon the fishery, for those whose life-blood has been the fishery for the last 400 years in many cases.

If I may say one thing in conclusion, and I recognize that my time is quickly passing, I have said this before in this House, sometimes to some ridicule, we deal unfortunately in politics of personality but the force of personality can have a tremendous effect on policy and our ability to deal with our problems.

In 1974 the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador was faced with a crisis in the fishery, not only the fishery itself but some of the programs which were in place. The member of Parliament for St. John's West, the current minister of fisheries, at the time was Minister of Finance, Minister of Economic Development, deputy House leader, the whole bit in Newfoundland. The premier of the day appointed him minister of fisheries to solve a problem. He went into that problem and he solved that problem. He worked with his federal counterparts, he worked with the industry, he worked with all aspects of the community to try and put the Newfoundland fishery back on an even footing. He was credited for doing that and he came to Ottawa in 1976.

The current minister of fisheries has about 1,200 fishermen in his riding; I do not know how many plant workers. I know that he has faced in his own constituency some of the biggest crises that we have seen in Newfoundland and Labrador in the fishery but nobody has more of a sense of the fishery, has more of a sense of the community, has more of a sense of public policy to try and put all of those things together, to rectify this situation for Newfoundland and Labrador and for Canada.

If I may say, it is a difficult task that you can never do anything right in. If I can say anything to Newfoundlanders and Labradorians, right now that minister of fisheries needs a little bit of support to take the difficult decisions that are in the interest of Canadians, in the interest of the fishery, because nobody is more able to ensure that a government and a country understand the crisis and the challenge. Nobody is more capable of coming up with the solutions that will not solve all our problems but will do as well as they can and we will do as well as we can as a country to help all of those who depend on the fishery.

I ask for that understanding and I ask for that support, and together, with our friends in the opposition, with our friends in the industry, we can come to a solution.

S. O. 52

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): You spoke well. I just wanted a minute to get my breath back after that. He must have been necking with the Blarney stone all night to get that much blarney in the last two minutes.

He was doing pretty well there for a while. My good friend from St. John's East was not doing too badly but at the end he did a couple things that if I were his adviser I would have advised him against.

First of all, he made reference to the time when our good friend from St. John's West was minister of fisheries. I have news for my friend from St. John's East. If his colleague from St. John's West did such a marvellous job of saving the fishery then, how come it needs saving one more time?

Mr. Reid: Because you were in power in Ottawa.

Mr. Simmons: The member should stick to his subject. The subject was the administration of the department under the tutelage of his good friend from St. John's West. The thing I remember most about that was the gear scandal, as a matter of fact; all the money they blew on the gear down there.

• (0010)

An hon. member: That is right.

Mr. Simmons: That is what I remember about that.

Mr. Reid: And he was brought in to solve it.

Mr. Simmons: I never said he started it.

An hon. member: That is right.

Mr. Simmons: Now let us talk about our friend, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, the gentleman from St. John's West. Do you remember, Mr. Speaker, when he was appointed to that cabinet post in March of 1991? I was absolutely delighted and I said so publicly. The fishermen were happy, the plant workers were happy and the fish companies were happy.

We all saw an opportunity in that appointment to have our case heard at the cabinet table. That is why we were so happy. We are not partisans with that minister, but we know a good thing when we see it or we thought we did. We said at the time: "Who better to put our case than that feisty, fearless, ferocious fox from St. John's West? He will finally get to the bottom of this failure in the fisheries. He will get his head around the problem in gig time. He would not be bamboozled by the bureaucrats or cowed by his colleagues in cabinet". How wrong we were.

The very fellow that we had looked to for a solution, it seems from listening to him in Question Period today, is far from being part of the solution and is becoming part of the problem. I would not say what he has become because I want to caution him to back off a bit, but he is fast becoming part of the problem with that kind of rhetoric he was into today.

I do not know who is advising him or if he has got something on his mind that puts him in an unusually sour mood these days. I do not know if his cabinet colleagues are giving him an extra rough time on this issue, but for some reason he is not himself. He is saying wild things. He is saying there is no immediate crisis.

Tell that to the people who live in Codroy, Port aux Basques, Fox Roost or Margaree. Tell it to the people in Burnt Islands and Isle aux Morts and the people in Rose Blanche and Harbour le Cou and Petites and Grand Breton, la Poile and Burgeo, Ramea, Grey River, François, McCallum or Gaultois and Hermitage and Seal Cove and Harbour Breton. Tell it to those people.

Tell it to the fishermen in Coomb's Cove and Wreck Cove and Boxey and Mose Ambrose and English Harbour West, St. Jacques and Belleoram. Or go down to the coast farther to Long and St. Lawrence, the people I met on the weekend who have no source of income through no fault of their own. Tell it to those people that there is no crisis in those stocks. They will not believe you. Those 147 fishermen in Rose Blanche who caught four million pounds in three months in January, February and March of 1987, last year they caught fewer than 100,000 pounds. I say to the minister tell it to those people that there is no crisis.

The minister is listening to the wrong people. We should listen to scientists sometimes, I suppose, but he should stop listening to them if they are saying something that does not gibe with the reality out there because the best scientist is that fellow in that 20-foot open boat who goes out every day and does his research with a net. If it comes up less full some days than it used to maybe we should make a few deductions from his findings. Maybe we should call what he is doing research for the sake of arriving at some sensible conclusions.

Yes, the man that we look to to be part of the solution is coming awfully close to being part of the problem. The vehicle has become the road-block.

Listen to what the minister said tonight. He said: "When we, this government, are asked we have responded". That is not true. Sometimes the government has responded, but I will tell you it has been asked for a long time by the people in Catalina, whom my colleague has the honour to represent. It has been asked for a long time by the people on the southwest coast who had four winter fishery failures in a row. They are depending on this stock that we have been talking about in 3PN, the one that the minister says is not in a crisis. The government has been asked a few times by those fishermen and plant workers and this minister has not responded. As a matter of fact it was only a month or so ago that the minister met with representatives of people from the southwest coast in St. John's. A startling revelation came out of that particular meeting after I had been here beating my gums all winter on this one, asking the minister question after question after question, as had my colleague from Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte, my colleague from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, my colleague from Gander—Grand Falls and my colleague from Labrador. All five of us were up on this issue and related issues, but this issue in particular. What was his summation after his meeting in St. John's with those people? He told them he had not heard about the problem. He was unaware of the problem, unaware.

He says tonight that the emergency debate is premature because the decisions have not been made. That is why it is just in time, I say to him. We had hoped to get to him, to beat a little sense in his head before he made some more wrong-headed decisions.

One of the decisions I hope he is not about to make is to cut off those people down there at the knees as he did last year on the emergency response program. I hope this time he will find it in his heart to go to his cabinet colleagues and tell them that he was wrong last year, that he did not help them last year but he is going to help them this time.

Then we had that moment of truth, that moment of unwitting truth when the minister said unwittingly, I am sure: "I have not got my colleagues to agree yet". I guess that is more at the root of the problem than he would care to admit.

That is the real issue. The voice we had looked to, the man we had looked to to carry our case to cabinet, is having an awful job holding on to his place at the cabinet table in terms of influence. He is not making the case for us. He cannot be making the case. Let us hope that tomorrow morning when he meets the Prime Minister he will have benefited somewhat from what has been said here this evening and be able to make the case a little more forcefully.

He keeps saying—and cannot get away from it—the gulf stock is not in crisis. How does he explain those landings? How does he explain the fact that the landings in 4R and 3PN are down, as my colleague from Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte said earlier, by 67 per cent?

We understand that the northern cod is down too. Nobody is knocking that issue because that is a serious one too. It is down 60 per cent and the gulf cod by 67 per cent. His friend, the chairman of his latest task force, Rick Cashin, said two years ago this stock ought to have been put under a moratorium. That was two years ago and things have gone downhill of course since then.

Every study this minister has received—and my colleague from Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte rhymed off the numbers of studies that have been given to him—all say the same thing. Only the minister has a different view. Why? What is the reason that he persists in saying something that is just blatantly untrue? Is he trying to minimize the problem? Is he trying to pretend those people do not exist? Is he trying to wear them down? Is he trying to demoralize them completely?

Mr. Tobin: That is exactly it.

Mr. Simmons: Is that the issue? I appeal to him. I appeal to his good sense, his common sense, his humanity. These people are hurting out there. They are hurting in all those communities. Why does he not have the decency and the compassion to stop wearing them down and demoralizing them and instead send out a signal tonight or tomorrow that he is prepared to go to bat for them because they need him and they are depending on him? I hope he is equal to the challenge.

[Translation]

Mr. Darryl Gray (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Madam Speaker, I would first of all like to say that I will not get into a political debate tonight. I come from the riding of Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine, where fishing is our most important activity. I will not get back to that tonight by saying that everything which happened in the past or all the policy decisions are our fault. All I will say is that in June 1990, processing plants were closed under Department of Labour programs. There were six of them in our riding.

I am not here to get into politics, unlike my colleagues who just spoke. I was elected because I wanted to work for my constituents and that is what I am doing. Some people want to engage in petty politics, others do not.

First of all, I would really like the hon. member for Burin—St. George's to stay a while to listen to me. I want to talk about the minister's visit to Rio last weekend and the conference held there. As we often say, "God bless the minister of fisheries and Newfoundland". We do all we can, but some people still have problems, like the people in our riding and in the Gaspé, in Newfoundland, as was mentioned earlier, in the Magdalen Islands and on the lower north shore.

[English]

When we talk about Atlantic fisheries, when we hurt, we all hurt together.

Far be it from me to get into discussion this morning in which I should say anything about the Constitution. I will talk about fisheries. The opposition has made small cheap shots from Newfoundland and it can make them.

If I can be on the record, it is making small cheap shots at the same time as at the Constitution. I will shut myself up there on that. We will talk about fisheries. We have suffered on the Gaspé; we have suffered on the Magdalen Islands; we have suffered in New Brunswick and we have suffered everywhere. What we are doing tonight in our emergency debate is trying to say Atlantic fisheries are above Conservatives, above Liberals, above NDP's and above everyone else. The fishermen want someone to look after them and sure as heck do not want to have a politician.

I have perhaps a couple of solutions and I will always go back to Newfoundland.

My constituents live partly in the gulf. If we wanted to get really angry we could fight with St. Pierre and Miquelon. We do not do that. We have all kinds of fishermen in our area. We talk about it but we do not mix politics. We do not have to do that.

What we have to do is sit down together. Any politician who would stand up in this House —Conservative, Liberal, or NDP —and say our minister of fisheries is not looking after us would I am sure not do right for the fishermen and for the people they represent.

We have gone through a couple of things. I at the same time have had the opportunity to leave myself open to debate. I would say for my fishermen —and we in Quebec — —until further notice, are still part of the Atlantic region. The fishermen in our area share the same problems as New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. When things go badly in those provinces, we are in the same boat.

[English]

With regard to fisheries, I do not know what will happen at the convention next year as a result of what happened in Rio. I know the situation off the nose and tail of the banks, which I have had the opportunity to look at, is not easy. It is easy for opposition members to criticize and say it is the fault of the Conservatives and vice versa.

At the same time I would say what we have done in government.

[Translation]

With everything that is done for us, for the Atlantic, for eastern Quebec, the Maritime provinces, the message we want to convey to our Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is that he and our government should understand and realize that this situation hurts us too, just as it hurts Newfoundland and the whole Atlantic region. This situation hurts the whole Gaspé Peninsula and the Magdalen Islands.

[English]

Mr. Tobin: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. With Madam Speaker's indulgence I want to thank all members who participated in this debate. I want to thank the Speaker for making the decision to allow the debate and I want to thank Madam Speaker for staying until the wee hours to hear members speak.

Again, I thank all those for the spirit of constructiveness that was evident here tonight.

Mr. Belsher: Madam Speaker, I would just like to add to those words and thank all members opposite for the debate that has taken place here this evening and to assure the people in the Atlantic area that we on this side of the House do care extremely for the plight that we find many of them in at this time and we will be looking for solutions to their plight.

Madam Deputy Speaker: After these kind words, pursuant to Standing Order 52(12), I am satisfied that the debate has now been concluded.

Pursuant to Standing Order 32(5) this document is deemed permanently referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Could I ask my friend, the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader, whether he is aware that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans plans to make a statement today on the request of the Shuswap Nation to meet with him to address the impact of the aboriginal fisheries strategy on their aboriginal rights, particularly including the reductions in funding for their stock production and enhancement activities. Does the minister plan to make a statement on that later today?

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I do not have any knowledge of that statement. I will make the appropriate inquiries and get back to my friend.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS AND GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS

SEVENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the seventh report of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations, in both official languages.

The committee focused its study on the credit card market and ways of increasing competition and improving disclosure. It also re-examined the question of cap on credit cards.

The first appendix to this report is a draft bill that will at last provide consumers with the means to choose the credit card that best fits their needs. The bill calls for uniform disclosure by card issuers of the important terms on credit cards, interest rates, fees, grace periods, et cetera, on all advertisements, solicitations, flyers, circulars and any other printed material. Experience in the United States shows that this information can make credit cards work more efficiently.

Mr. Speaker, I request a response in accordance with Standing Order 109.

RECALL FOR ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I think you will find there is unanimous consent for the following motion:

> That, notwithstanding Standing Order 28(2), at any time during the adjournment of the House between June 24 and July 31 and September 1 to September 21, 1992, the Speaker may, after consultation with the government, cause the House to sit for the sole purpose of giving Royal Assent to a bill or bills, and, following each Royal Assent, the Speaker shall, each time, further adjourn the House forthwith, until September 21, 1992; and
> That the provisions of Standing Order 28(3) respecting the recall of the House for urgent and pressing matters not be superseded by the provisions of this Order.

Mr. Riis: Yes, there is unanimous consent, certainly on this side.

I have two questions to my hon. friend, the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader. The bill on environmental assessment was recently held up in the other place. Has that been passed now? Could he bring me up to date on that? Also, the rape shield legislation that was passed through this House, could he give us some idea of the status of that legislation or is it still being held up in the other place?

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to give full answers to the questions my friend was asking. I can give him a report on the bills we can expect to receive Royal Assent on today, and others that we anticipate will be receiving Royal Assent in the future, if the House is agreed to receive that information.

Specifically, the first bill he inquired about, Bill C–13, the environmental assessment act, has passed committee in the Senate and there is hope that it will receive a favourable disposition later today.

These bills that I am about to enumerate will be receiving Royal Assent today:

Bill C–22, bankruptcy; Bill C–48, CDIC; Bill C–74, customs and excise; Bill C–75, fuel tax; Bill C–81, referendum; Bill C–87, the supply bill; Bill S–9, the Northwest Evangelical Church; Bill S–10, Green Shield Canada; Bill S–11, airport transfer; and Bill S–12, the merger of the Montreal Board of Trade and la Chambre du Commerce.

We also hope the following will be receiving Royal Assent:

Bill C–7, status of the artist; Bill C–13, environmental assessment; Bill C–33, coasting trade; Bill C–41, energy efficiency; Bill C–45, dangerous goods; Bill C–49, sexual assault; Bills C–51 and C–52, the Northwest Territories and Yukon Water Acts; Bill C–58, oil and gas; Bill C–70, jury; and Bill C–82, CMHC.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, along the same lines. I might have missed it but I am glad the parliamentary secretary gave the numbers and/or the subject of the bill. I may have missed it but has Royal Assent been given on the bill concerning veterans benefits for the merchant marine?

Could you please tell the House the status of this bill? Has it already received Royal Assent? I would hope that it would.

• (1020)

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I have not had the opportunity to consult the Journals of the House, but I believe that if my hon. friend will check, he will find that it has been documented as having received Royal Assent.

With a small qualification, I think we should consult the records. I believe on doing so we will discover that it has.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, this morning I have 35 petitions from Canadians in nearly every province, from British Columbia to Newfoundland.

These petitioners urge the government and especially the Parliament of Canada to restore the Court Challenges Program which gives all Canadians equal access to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, regardless of their financial resources.

These people deplore the government's decision to end this important program which, as we know, helped Canadians assert their language rights and equality rights and have them interpreted by the courts.

These many Canadian petitioners ask this House to make a positive decision in this regard and reinstate the program.

OLD AGE SECURITY PENSIONS

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition signed by Canadians who support the following statement: In the hope that all Canadians will give their elders the necessary support to live as independently as possible, the federal government has the primary responsibility to ensure that old age pensions are adequate.

Therefore, the petitioners ask the House of Commons to urge the government to make sure that Canada's old age pensions are high enough to meet the essential needs of Canadian seniors.

RURAL CANADA

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and duty to present petitions from my constituents in Whitehorse and Pelly Crossing, Yukon, who are very concerned about this government's actions which have very much undermined rural life in Canada.

They state in this petition that whereas recent actions of the government have been a direct attack on the rural way of life including cuts to VIA Rail service, abandoning rail lines and neglecting fisheries, forestry and agriculture and the erosion of rural postal services, particularly by the closure of small rural post offices, whereas post offices are the backbone of many of our rural communities, these petitioners pray and call upon the Parliament of Canada to support Canada's rural way of life, to support the maintenance of rural post offices and postal services and to reject the agenda of closures and cutbacks and make sure that rural Canadians can be truly Canadians from coast to coast to coast.

YOUNG OFFENDERS

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present four petitions today on behalf of Calgarians who care about the Young Offenders Act. Their specific petition is to request that Parliament revise the laws of Canada to replace the Young Offenders Act with an updated juvenile delinquents act with a lowered maximum age of 13 years.

PROUD TO BE CANADIAN

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of presenting a petition signed by hundreds of Canadians from across the upper Ottawa Valley dealing with the promotion of pride in being a Canadian.

It is appropriate to encourage all Canadians to take pride in a united, strong and independent Canada. Canadians are normally a reserved people, often concealing their patriotic feelings.

Whereas Kinsmen and Kinette Clubs of Canada have created an opportunity for all Canadians to participate in the Proud to be Canadian project during the celebration of the 125th anniversary of Confederation in 1992, the petitioners hereby support the Proud to be Canadian project as an opportunity to nurture a positive lifelong relationship with our heritage and our flag, to encourage stronger ties among all Canadians for the further advancement of Canada as a leader in world circles and to promote our tremendous pride in being Canadians.

The petition is signed by people from many communities across the upper Ottawa Valley: Petawawa, Cobden, Westmeath, Pembroke and many other communities.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I have a second petition in which people are asking the Parliament of Canada to enact legislation providing for a referendum of the people binding upon Parliament to accept or reject constitutional amendments proposed by the government and the acceptance or rejection of the proposed amendments to be determined by a majority vote of the total votes cast in the whole of Canada together with a majority vote in a majority of provinces, with the territories being given the status of one province.

The petition is signed by many people from across eastern Ontario.

HERITAGE CULTURES AND LANGUAGE PROGRAM

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present two petitions with several thousand signatures of residents from the riding of Saint-Léonard and the general Montreal area.

Your petitioners ask the federal government to continue to support and encourage the preservation and promotion of heritage languages. Therefore, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon the Parliament of Canada to reinstate full financial funding for the Heritage Cultures and Language Program of the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship, which was cut by the government in the February 1990 budget.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions this morning from 100 residents of the riding of Jonquière and the Saguenay—Lac-Saint-Jean area.

Your petitioners call upon the government to remove the goods and services tax from certain items that are essential to women.

BILL C-21

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): I have another petition, Mr. Speaker, signed by 100 people who humbly call upon Parliament to review the provisions of Bill C-21 concerning parental leave for adoption, so that all parents, whether biological or adopting, will receive the same 25 weeks paid leave in order to spend this time with their new child.

YOUNG OFFENDERS

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to present to the House three petitions. The petitioners request that Parliament revise the laws of Canada to replace the Young Offenders Act with an updated juvenile delinquents act with a lower maximum age of 13.

POVERTY

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to present a petition signed by 585 Canadians.

This petition points out that hundreds of thousands of Canadian senior citizens live below the poverty line and over 80 per cent of single women over the age of 65 live in poverty. It is desirable for all Canadians to provide senior citizens with the necessary support to live their lives as independently as possible.

These petitioners call upon the government to ensure that Canadian Old Age Security pensions are sufficient to meet the basic needs of Canadian senior citizens.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to present this petition, certified correct pursuant to Standing Order 36, signed by many residents of my constituency, The Battlefords—Meadow Lake. These are signatures collected by Fisher's Drug Store in North Battleford, Saskatchewan.

The petitioners recognize that the Government of Canada has put forward proposals for amending the Constitution of Canada and call upon Parliament to enact and carry out legislation providing for a referendum in Canada, binding upon Parliament to accept or reject the constitutional amendments, and that the acceptance or rejection of the proposed amendments should be determined by a majority of the total votes cast in Canada as well as a majority vote in the majority of provinces and territories in Canada, the so-called double majority that was dealt with by the House.

YOUNG OFFENDERS

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present petitions from people from Calgary Southwest who ask Parliament to revise the laws of Canada to replace the Young Offenders Act.

RWANDA

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I too have the duty to rise in this House, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present the House with a petition certified correct by the Clerk of Petitions.

These are Canadians who have joined the hundreds of other petitioners urging the Canadian government to apply pressure on the Rwandan regime immediately to stop killing innocent Rwandans and they urge the Canadian government to support the EEC resolution on Rwanda issued on February 20, 1992, in Santa Domingo.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, it is my great privilege under Standing Order 36 to present a petition from a couple of hundred fishermen and plant workers on the southwest coast of Newfoundland in the communities of Rose Blanche and Fox Roost, Burnt Islands, Margaree, Port aux Basques, Petites and Isle aux Morts.

These people have two elements to the prayer in their petition: first, that the government ought to take immediate steps to rebuild the fish stocks and the petition specifically advocates the closing of 4RS–3PN fishery for the purpose of rebuilding the fish stocks. It also calls on Parliament to take such action as it deems advisable to assist the affected fishermen and plant workers in the LaPoile to Codroy area.

I am pleased to support the petition and present it on behalf of those 200 people who are going through some very difficult times and who need Parliament and government to address their concerns at this point.

YOUNG OFFENDERS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Edmonton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition to present signed by residents of Bragg Creek, Calgary, and Edmonton, Alberta, requesting that Parliament revise the laws of Canada to replace the Young Offenders Act with an updated juvenile delinquents act with a lowered maximum age of 13 years.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of Chase and Kamloops, British Columbia. As a matter of fact there are quite a number of communities. It totals now into the thousands of people who are opposed to the diverting of water from the North Thompson River at Valemount into the California area as part of the plan that is presently being considered.

The petitioners are asking simply that we state as parliamentarians that Canadian rivers are not for sale to the United States.

OLD AGE SECURITY

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour of presenting petitions from hundreds of people from Cannings Cove, Newfoundland, Burnaby, British Columbia, Baie Comeau, Quebec who are upset with the 37-cent increase in old age pensions; that 80 per cent of single women over the age of 65 live in poverty; that the federal government has a primary responsibility to ensure the adequacy of seniors' pensions.

Therefore, the petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the government to ensure that the Canadian old age pensions are sufficient to meet the basic needs of Canadian senior citizens.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I too have a duty and an obligation under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present a petition today signed by residents from the province of Quebec who are calling upon the Government of Canada to make certain that Old Age Security and in particular old age pensions reflect the economic concerns that many old age citizens have in this country.

These residents are alarmed at the 37-cent increase which has been given to them. In fact, over 80 per cent of the women over 65 years of age are living below the poverty line. They call upon the Government of Canada to examine very seriously the provisions of the Old Age Security and to make certain that the necessities of life are able to be provided under this particular piece of legislation, thereby granting suitable increases as they deem necessary.

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by a large number of Canadians who are very concerned about the goods and services tax and its impact on the tourist industry.

They are aware that the preliminary tourist industry figures for this year are way down over last year. Of primary concern is the goods and services tax.

They point out that a $50 expenditure means $5 provincial tax and $3.50 goods and services tax and creates an enormous burden on the ability of small businesses throughout Atlantic Canada— Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Newfoundland—to earn an income.

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by a number of voters from Nova Scotia, Ontario and Quebec.

Your petitioners are concerned about the abolition of the Court Challenges Program which has helped many individuals and minority groups to have their constitutional rights clarified before the courts. They declare that the abolition of this program represents an incalculable loss to social justice and equality in this country.

Wherefore your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to consider the option of reinstating the Court Challenges Program which gives all Canadians equal access to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

IMMIGRATION ACT

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present three separate petitions this morning.

The first one is from residents of Scarborough and area. It calls upon the government to amend the Immigration Act and the regulations to facilitate the visitor visa application process by bona fide family members visiting family members in Canada.

CRIMES OF VIOLENCE

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is from residents of West Hill, Mississauga and other parts of Scarborough, Ontario, evolving out of the recent criminal tragedies involving death.

They call upon Parliament to recognize that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent. They also call upon the government to amend the Criminal Code, the Parole Act, and the Penitentiary Act.

ROUGE RIVER VALLEY

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, the third petition comes from residents of Scarborough and Durham region.

It calls upon Parliament to reaffirm its commitment to preserving and protecting the Rouge River Valley in Ontario and to participate with the Ontario provincial government in developing a Rouge River park and a heritage park at that location.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

Question No. 295—Mrs. Stewart:

With respect to the Human Rights, Women's Equality and Social Affairs Division of the Department of External Affairs, is its first mission to promote the integration of human rights and women's equality into all aspects of Canadian foreign policy and, if so, (a) how is this promoted through other ministries whose policies and programs are part of Canadian foreign policy such as trade, immigration (refugee determination) and aid (b) what specific functions are undertaken by staff to ensure the inclusion of human rights and women's equality into foreign policy (c) how is information gathered and who or what groups are consulted to gather information (d) how does it support or influence other federal departments to implement international human rights instruments?

Hon. Barbara Jean McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): A prime focus of the Human Rights Women's Equality and Social Affairs Division, IMH, is to promote the progressive integration of human rights and women's equality into Canada's foreign policy.

The Department of External Affairs, both IMH and other divisions, works in close consultation with other ministries whose policies and programs impact on Canadian foreign policy. This is particularly true with regard to CIDA on any matter involving official development assistance and multiculturalism, citizenship and justice on implementation of international protocols. It should be noted that trade issues are handled within the department itself. The division works with CIDA to offer a joint course in human rights and democratic development for officers in both departments. The course addressed, inter alia, trade and immigration issues. The division also takes the lead on interdepartmental meetings dealing with multilateral human rights issues involving the Departments of Multiculturalism and Citizenship, Indian and Northern Affairs, CIDA, Justice, Status of Women Canada, Labour and the Canadian Human Rights Commission.

Specific functions undertaken by IMH staff to ensure the inclusion of human rights into foreign policy include:

Working closely with other divisions responsible for specific regions to ensure that Canadian concerns about human rights and women's equality concerns are, as appropriate, raised with foreign governments. The division is consulted on all military export permits to sensitive areas, relevant policy memoranda to portfolio ministers, ministerial briefing material, statements and news releases.

Requesting and co-ordinating the preparation of annual reports on human rights in various countries, monitoring these and ongoing reports from embassies, NGOs, media and other sources.

Working with Canada's multilateral missions and other external affairs divisions to ensure that human rights and women's equality are managed appropriately at the UN, the OAS, the Commonwealth, la Francophonie, and the CSCE.

Preparing briefs and instructions for the Canadian delegation to the UN Commission on Human Rights, the Third Committee of the UN General Assembly, and the Social Committee of the UN Economic and Social Council. Staff may also serve on these delegations as advisors.

Organizing consultations with non-governmental organizations in the human rights field. These consultations are also attended by representatives of geographic divisions. Individual meetings with Canadian and foreign NGOs are organized on request during the year.

Information on human rights in various countries is gathered from a variety of sources, the main ones being Canadian posts abroad, the United Nations, and non-governmental organizations. In addition to preparing annual reports Canadian posts abroad keep the department up to date on any developments affecting the human rights situation.

IMH is in regular contact with Canadian and international non-governmental organizations in the field of human rights, and receives numerous United Nations documents and NGO publications, including all of Amnesty International's country and thematic reports. The division ensures that these are given appropriate distribution to concerned decision-makers. The division also has access to media monitoring services available in EAITC.

The division consults on an ongoing basis with other departments regarding the implementation of international human rights instruments, primarily Multiculturalism and Citizenship Canada, which has a lead role in that area, the Department of Justice, the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs, Status of Women Canada, et cetera. The division reviews drafts of Canada's reports under the international instruments for coherence and consistency. Over-all responsibility for the preparation of these reports lies with the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship and other sectoral departments assume responsibilities for the preparation of the relevant federal sections. The division is also responsible for ensuring that the reports are prepared and sent to the UN or OAS on time and as required, may assist in their presentation and defence before the relevant treaty bodies.

The division also ensures that UN and NGO documents, telegrams from posts and other relevant material is circulated to the appropriate officials in the domestic departments to keep them informed of international developments in the human rights field.

The division participates in the meetings of the federal-provincial-territorial continuing committee of officials on human rights to keep the provinces informed.

The division is kept informed about and is consulted by the appropriate legal authorities on Canadian responses to complaints received by the UN Centre for Human Rights under the Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.

Question No. 296—Mrs. Stewart:

With respect to the Human Rights, Women's Equality and Social Affairs Division of the Department of External Affairs, how does it convey Canadians in promoting Canadian values of human rights and social justice?

Hon. Barbara Jean McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): A key objective of the Human Rights, Women's Equality and Social Affairs Division, as cited in the division's mission statement, is "to convey to Canadians the department's deep and abiding interest in promoting Canadian values of human rights and social justice." In conjunction with other divisions, such as those directly concerned with public communications, IMH works to ensure that the Canadian public is aware of Canada's efforts to promote human rights at the international level. The division's specific activities in this regard include:

Informing non-governmental organizations in the field of human rights of Canadian initiatives and actions. This is done both through regular consultations between the department and NGOs, and through the mailing of reports, speeches and other relevant information to a list of some 150 non-governmental organizations.

Responding to correspondence and telephone inquiries from the public on what Canada is doing to promote human rights internationally.

Drafting and presenting speeches to Canadian audiences, including NGOs, universities, et cetera. and preparing or contributing to public statements on international human rights issues by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister for External Relations and other ministers.

Providing up-to-date information and briefings to the EAITC media relations office and ministerial spokespersons.

Ensuring that Canadian media representatives covering international fora receive copies of Canadian statements and are aware of Canadian initiatives.

With respect to the Human Rights, Women's Equality and Social Affairs Division of the Department of External Affairs, what procedures are in place which aim to improve public transparency with regard to policies?

Hon. Barbara Jean McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): A key point in the division mission statement of the Human Rights, Women's Equality and Social Affairs Division is "to encourage co-operative relations between the Department of External Affairs and non-governmental organizations, and to convey to Canadians the department's deep and abiding interest in promoting Canadian values of human rights and social justice." This is particularly relevant at a time when there is growing public interest in the issues dealt with by the division.

The public is kept informed of the department's policies and actions in the area of human rights in the following ways:

Ongoing consultation with non-governmental organizations in the field of human rights and organizations representing aboriginal peoples.

A three-day consultation prior to the annual session of the UN Commission on Human Rights.

Ongoing contact between IMH officers and NGO representatives. These can range from regular telephone conversations to meetings with specific NGOs. IMH has also facilitated bilateral meetings between major human rights NGOs and the Secretary of State for External Affairs and other authorities.

Reporting on Canadian and UN actions through the circulation of statements, reports and documents, for example, the division prepares a detailed report following the annual session of the Commission on Human Rights outlining the outcome of the commission and Canada's role. This report is sent to approximately 150 non-governmental organizations in the field of human rights. This year, the division also mailed out reports of the January consultations with NGOs and aboriginal organizations, as well as a report on the recent Second Preparatory Committee for the World Conference on Human Rights.

Preparing or contributing to ministerial correspondence, statements and briefing material for meetings with parliamentarians or Canadian organizations. IMH regularly prepares responses to public inquiries on the department's policies and activities in the areas of international human rights, women's equality and social affairs, and responds to requests for information and/or documents.

Drafting and presenting speeches to Canadian audiences, including NGOs, universities, diplomatic or foreign affairs associations, et cetera. IMH also welcomes and responds to invitations for the Secretary of State for External Affairs or other senior officials to speak or to participate in seminars or conferences dealing with human rights.

Providing up-to-date information and briefings to EAITC media relations office, ministerial spokespersons and posts for responses to media inquiries or to allow embassies abroad to communicate effectively.

Working closely with other departments and institutions, for example, Multiculturalism and Citizenship, Status of Women Canada, Indian & Northern Affairs, Health and Welfare, CIDA, Canadian Human Rights Commission, to keep them, their clienteles, and provincial authorities informed about the department's policies and activities and about international developments.

With respect to the Human Rights, Women's Equality and Social Affairs Division of the Department of External Affairs, how many are employed exclusively to fulfil the functions of the division and what background and qualifications are required to fill the(se) position(s)?

Hon. Barbara Jean McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): There are currently nine person-years on the establishment of the Human Rights, Women's Equality and Social Affairs Division. These include:

One director;

Three deputy directors—Human Rights, Women's Equality and Social Affairs;

One officer as international aboriginal affairs co-ordinator;

One officer for international women's equality;

One officer for human rights;

One officer for international social affairs;

One secretary.

At various times the division's establishment may be complemented by short-term contracts with consultants, secondments, COOP and COSEP students, and support staff. As of May 11, 1992, the division also had the benefit of one desk officer on secondment through Labour Canada, one consultant and one secretary.

As with most divisions of external affairs, the majority of staff members are career foreign service employees with varied experience at headquarters and overseas. Foreign service officers are recruited through a nationally-advertised competitive examination and assessment process in which the Public Service Commission participates. All candidates must have a university degree. Selection is based on merit and positive measures are taken to ensure that successful candidates include employment equity target group representatives: women, aboriginal people, visible minorities and persons with disabilities. Assignment to the division is based on the profile of the candidates, for example, experience in multilateral affairs, previous postings in countries or work on geographic desks where Canada promotes human rights, relevant academic background or private sector experience, and required capability in Canada's official languages, and the career interests and aspirations of the candidates.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if Question No. 251 could be made an Order for Return, the return would be tabled immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 251 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return?

Question No. 251—Mr. Duhamel:

Since November 21, 1988, which organizations, boards or commissions have had appointments made to them and, in each case, (a) what was their location (b) what was the length of such appointments (c) what was the remuneration for such appointments?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Edwards: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PUBLIC SERVICE REFORM ACT

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER REPORT AND THIRD READING STAGES OF BILL C-26

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry) moved:

That, in relation to Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada, not more than four further hours and one further sitting day be allotted for the consideration of report stage of the said bill and one sitting day for the consideration of the third reading of the said bill; and

That, fifteen minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business on the final day allotted to the report stage consideration and on the day allotted to the third reading consideration of the said bill, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order and, in turn every question necessary in order to dispose of the stage of the bill then under consideration shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, once again we see the government resorting to tactics which can only be akin to bullying Parliament and bullying substantive public policy issues which the country believes to be very important.

I find it rather strange in the ninth inning while Parliament is to close today that the government would come in with this closure motion to terminate debate both on the report stage as well as the third reading stage of Bill C-26, which is of fundamental importance to Canadians and to members of this House. I find it to be totally—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I remind the House that the motion is not debatable. The opposition House leader.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the parliamentary secretary. Can he indicate to the House whether or not private members' hour will be proceeded with today and whether or not second reading of Bill C-88 will commence today after he has choked us off with the four-hour debate on report stage of Bill C-26? It is an intolerable position by the Government of Canada.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, in response to my friend's mock outrage, I can just say that part of what is contained in the motion, just for the benefit of the public, is the signal we got from the opposition that it would be nice to be able to adjourn earlier than 10 o'clock tonight.

In response to my friend's question, private members' hour will of course be in place today. If there is consent later in the day for second reading of Bill C-88, it is the intention that it would proceed.

There have been consultations with the Official Opposition and we are waiting to hear back from the New Democratic Party on that issue.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I think the record should show very clearly that there were very little if any consultations under the provisions of Standing Orders 78(1) and 78(2). In fact the parliamentary secretary dropped off a copy of this particular order and I indicated to him quite clearly that we were opposed to it.

To suggest to the House and to the Chair that we would wish to adjourn the House in order to get out early, we are prepared to stay to 9.45 or 10 tonight if necessary and have a vote this evening, if the government is prepared to do the same. We are prepared to stay here tonight to vote on report stage.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am certainly quite offended by the reference to the mock outrage of the opposition in this House, as well as to the opposition wishing to leave this House early at the expense of public sector workers.

The committee on this bill met for weeks and weeks and watched while the government had not one word to say about this, only the bureaucrats.

We want to talk about this bill and we want the government to talk about it in this House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. That is not a point of order and this motion is not debatable.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried.

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Wednesday, June 17, consideration of Bill C–26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the public service of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee; and the motions of Mrs. Catterall (p. 12268).

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. There is so much noise in the Chamber at the moment that it is extremely difficult to hear the Speaker through the ear–pieces. I wonder if the Speaker could clarify exactly where we are at and exactly what we are doing and perhaps ask members to have their conversations outside so that those of us who have duties to perform here today can perform them.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I remind hon. members that we are considering Bill C–26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, at report stage. Further to the Chair's decision, we are considering Motions Nos. 1 and 3. The debate had begun at the last sitting. Several members had spoken. It remains to be seen whether other members wish to speak on Motions Nos. 1 and 3.

[English]

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 1. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8) the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

The next vote is on Motion No. 3, standing in the name of Mrs. Catterall.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

• (1130)

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the motion rejected on division?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

We now proceed to consideration of Motions Nos. 5 and 7.

[English]

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West) moved:

That Bill C–26 be amended in Clause 5 by striking out line 17 at page 3 and substituting the following therefor:

"lished by the Treasury Board or by the Commission for purposes of section 5.2, to improve".

That Bill C–26 be amended in Clause 5 by adding immediately after line 25 at page 3 the following:

"5.2(1) In exercising or performing any of its powers, functions or duties under this Act, the Commission shall act in such manner as is likely to advance the implementation of employment equity in the public service and may, for this purpose, establish policies and programs to improve employment and career opportunities for designated groups in the Public Service, including women, aboriginal peoples, persons with disabilities and persons who are, because of their race or colour, in a visible minority in Canada, and to correct the conditions of disadvantage experienced by such groups in their employment.

(2) For purposes of subsection (1), the Commission shall, in consultation with the Treasury Board and the bargaining agents representing persons employed in the Public Service, advance the implementation of employment equity by:

(a) identifying and eliminating each of the employment practices of the Commission not otherwise authorized by law, that results in employment barriers against persons in designated groups; and

(b) instituting such positive policies and practices and making such reasonable accommodation as will enable the employer to ensure that persons in designated groups achieve a degree of representation in the various positions of employment within the Public Service that is at least proportionate to their representation

(i) in the work force, or

(ii) in those segments of the work force that are identifiable by qualification, eligibility or geography and from which the Public Service may reasonably be expected to draw or promote employees.

(3) The Commission shall, in respect of each fiscal year, prepare a plan setting out

(a) the goals that it intends to achieve in advancing the implementation of employment equity in the year or years to which the plan relates; and

(b) the timetable for the implementation of those goals.

(4) The Commission shall include in its annual report laid before Parliament the number of applicants for employment in the Public Service, the number of persons recruited, referred, and appointed by the Commission or within its jurisdiction and the number of such persons falling within designated groups."

She said: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to present these two motions which are intended to complete the issue of employment equity in the Public Service and to comment at this time favourably on the words of Senator Pat Carney who in a previous incarnation asked: "Where are the women?".

Of course, the basic principle in the Public Service with hiring, promotions, recruiting and the merit principle is that someone can have a job and advance according to his or her ability.

This has worked well for the past 70 years, if you are a white man. If you are a woman or disabled or native or have a different skin colour, the merit principle has not worked. Of course, half the employees in the Public Service are women, but less than 15 per cent of the other public servants are women. The same principles apply if you are not white or are disabled or a native.

The legislative committee made progress on this question. The committee agreed to ensure that Treasury Board, as the employer of public servants, must respect employment equity and have programs for ensuring equal opportunity in promotions and hiring, even for women, native people, coloured people and the disabled. The Public Service is a different kind of employer from the private sector. We have an organization called the Public Service Commission which has a very specific and special role to play in ensuring employment and advancement based on ability within the public service.

[English]

This principle of merit that the best qualified person gets the job has worked reasonably well for 70 years if you are a man and if you are white. The figures are absolutely clear that if you do not fit those two qualifications you have not been judged on merit.

We only need to look at the figures for this year for the Public Service Commission. Even in this year, with the voluntary policy of employment equity, although half of the employees in the Public Service are women, less than 15 per cent of the managers are women. Even this year over 75 per cent of the appointments, promotions and moves within the management category were men. If one happens to have skin that is not white it is even worse; representation in the management category is abysmal. Aboriginal Canadians or persons with a disability simply do not count and the glass ceiling is there throughout the Public Service.

It is unacceptable that more than two years after the task force on barriers to women in the Public Service reported to this House there has not been more progress, and that even these steps to achieve progress are not being taken.

The merit principle is one of the fundamental issues at stake in this bill. It is based on your ability to do the job, not who your friends are or how well your boss likes you. The merit principle should be the basis on which people are either hired or promoted or, for that matter, demoted or fired in the Public Service.

We were successful in committee and I thank the members of the committee and the managers who assisted in drafting a change. We have had an Employment Equity Act in this country that applies to the private sector for over five years. It has never applied to the public sector. In committee we were able to move an amendment and work with members of the committee and senior managers to finally have the same requirements that apply to private sector employers apply to the public sector.

However, the job is only half done because those requirements apply to the Treasury Board as employer but they do not apply to the Public Service Commission. The Public Service Commission is the defender of the merit principle. Its whole function is to ensure that only merit applies and that the shape of your body or the colour of your skin does not determine whether you get hired or promoted in the Public Service.

The purpose of Motions Nos. 5 and 7 is to quite simply complete the work we did in committee to ensure that the Public Service Commission, as the employment agency of the Government of Canada, is bound by the same requirements to respect employment equity which the government has now accepted will apply to the employer.

The commission, for reasons totally mysterious to me, is resisting this. It says: "Well, we already do it". Yes, it does but it does it quite imperfectly. For instance 12 per cent of applicants last year in the Public Service were people of colour but only 5 per cent of hirings were people of colour. Why? What is being done to address that?

The Public Service Commission is the agent of Parliament that ensures that only ability to do the job counts in hirings, promotions, training or opportunities to progress in the Public Service.

If the Treasury Board has a legal obligation, which it will have under this bill, to be an equal opportunity employer then the commission, as its hiring agent and as the instrument of this Parliament to ensure fairness and transparency in the hiring process in the Public Service, must have that same obligation.

We will come to other amendments where the commission has resisted changes to how it carries out its work. I do not believe on this important issue that the commission can have the discretion to decide whether it wants to act in a manner consistent with employment equity or not.

It is up to us as Parliament, the commission is our agent, to provide a very clear legal direction that this Public Service is going to be fair and equal for everybody and to make it accountable to this Parliament and not leave it to the discretion of three appointed commissioners to decide whether they do or do not think that people of colour, women, aboriginals, and disabled persons should have equal opportunities in the Public Service.

I look forward to hearing the government respond to these amendments and explain why it does not think they are acceptable, if it does not.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to thank our colleague from Ottawa West and all members of the committee that examined this bill and who are proposing this particular amendment.

I want to thank them because since 1985 we have worked very hard to look at employment equity as a basic and fundamental principle in law. We have worked to ensure that section 15, which is the non-discrimination section of our Canadian charter, be not only written on paper but be applied in actual fact in the course of the life of this country, for the citizens in the working world and in general.

When my colleague came and told me that they had moved this amendment which would have an implication for Treasury Board and would apply the whole principle of employment equity to Treasury Board I was absolutely delighted. I congratulate her once again in public because that has been the most difficult group to move.

We wrote a landmark report on the application of employment equity and on the application of section 15 of the charter but when the government introduced the Employment Equity Act it managed to leave itself outside of the act and apply it to the private sector. Instead of being the role model that it should have been it left itself untouched by the application of non-discrimination in the work force.

The answer at that time was: "Well, we do it". If we do it then it must be applied in law and perceived to be just.

It must be just and in the laws of the land. I am delighted that this will come to be within the purview of this law.

I would really like to know how the government can step aside from one's responsibility when it accepts the principle that it has a responsibility for the employment of visible minorities, women, aboriginal people, handicapped people, and those who have been perceived to be the weak and the underemployed in our society.

The government is now going to accept its responsibility that it should have in the first place, through the Treasury Board, but it is not going to apply to the hiring agent that is going to do the job for the government, the Public Service Commission. That makes absolutely no sense.

It is like putting together a lovely picture but forgetting to put a proper base to hold the stand, or building a statue with no stand to hold it so it will not fall down.

This is a very key amendment, as are the other amendments that are being discussed. If we want to respect this country that we want to keep unified and in which we want people to feel they are being fairly treated, then fairness, equity and equality must be not only perceived but must be a reality in law. The government must accept the principle that these particular amendments will be accepted.

I found it surprising that the whole issue of the merit principle in hiring and promotion would not be perceived as an obligation worthy of promotion by the Public Service sector and by the Treasury Board. The opportunity through review of the employment equity legislation was there and now through this piece of legislation it is again here.

I hope the government will grab this opportunity. As my colleague points out half the employees in the public sector are women but only 15 per cent of managers are women, and that 75 per cent of those who have received promotions have been men and while only half of the employees are men.

The visible minorities and the handicapped are not being promoted in any measurable number. I would say that fair-minded people, men and women, would see that there is justice in this request.

I would like to support my colleague. I would like to ask my colleagues across the floor to be reasonable in looking at Motions Nos. 5 and 7 and to please support them whole-heartedly to provide the full measure of equality, equity, and justice in our society.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I too want to support my colleague from Ottawa West in these two amendments, Motions Nos. 5 and 7.

[Translation]

Before I make a brief statement, I would like to pay tribute to the men and women who render important services to Canadians.

[English]

I want to reaffirm my support of the civil service and those many able men and women who render on a daily basis valuable service to Canadians. They are among the finest people with whom I have ever worked. I want to recognize that too often they are the scapegoats of timid, weak, and cowardly politicians.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Duhamel: Oui, c'est vrai. Very often they are the scapegoats. You use them and kick them around because you have failed and then they become the target. If you want to debate that I would be delighted to debate it with you. However I suggest that you should not stand up and debate it because you would lose badly.

[Translation]

We talk about pay equity. I think it is an element of basic justice in our Canadian society. We must respect it. We must make every effort to ensure that we have a policy and regulations so that we can act more fairly towards those who are under-represented. When I talk about men and women who are under-represented, I mean native people, visible minorities, and disabled Canadians, whose handicap is often visible. And of course I am talking about women.

[English]

If one looks at employment in the Public Service it can be seen that there are a number of under-represented groups. We know that employment is a resource, particularly so today as employment becomes increasingly difficult for a number of Canadians.

If we want to continue to build a fair society and a compassionate country then we need to have policies such as those we are discussing today. We need to be sensitive to those who are under-represented.

Therefore, whole-heartedly, without hesitation I support these particular amendments and I would hope that my colleagues would do so as well. They reinforce the merit principle that must be the fundamental building block of our civil service.

Let us not fool ourselves. Many of these people, and I speak about aboriginal people, visible minorities, handicapped Canadians and women, are not getting the jobs that they deserve, not because they do not merit them but because of the deep-seated biases that are within the system. Clearly these amendments would go a long way toward setting those aside.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemarre (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to speak on Motions Nos. 5 and 7. As we all know, there are almost a quarter of a million civil servants. These people have studied, some of them at the university level, in order to better serve their fellow citizens, their community, the best community of all: Canada. The Public Service Commission of Canada is the model for civil servants who work for various agencies, companies and firms from coast to coast. That is where the employer should set an example, where it should be a pleasure to serve other Canadians, where we enforce the Canadian legislation. The commission is responsible for the inspection of food and other products so that the community and consumers are protected.

It is vital that the civil servants feel they contribute in no insignificant way to the well-being of this country. They must feel they have their employer's support as well as that of the legislators. They must be happy and feel at home in the Public Service. They should never feel they are being mistreated.

I sincerely hope not one of them will ever be unfortunate enough to work in a group where there is sexual or racial discrimination. I hope that all civil servants, present and future, will always feel equal among their peers and will always know they have equal opportunities in the Public Service so that they may continue to work and advance in their carreers. It must be a question of equity and justice and not a question of networking among friends.

At the legislative committee, the Liberal Party tabled an amendment to section 5 dealing with employment equity. The original section prepared by government was still seen as a discretionary policy, ill-defined and vague, offering no solution whatsoever for the discrimination problem. The amendment adopted by the committee submits the Treasury Board as an employer to the same obligations as those all Canadian employers must abide by since 1986.

The amendments extend to the Public Service Commission the actual obligations and responsibilities of the Treasury Board in the area of employment equity. They are necessary amendments since the Public Service Commission, and not the Treasury Board, is in charge of recruitment.

That is why, we must allow the Commission to implement employment equity programs.

[English]

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate my colleague from the Liberal Party from Ottawa West for her success in getting tremendous movement in this bill in the area of employment equity. I also want to say a few words in support of this amendment and talk about the process that we went through in committee.

First of all, this amendment elaborates on the manner in which Treasury Board and the Public Service Commission would establish employment equity programs.

There has been great reluctance in the past to having employment equity, as applied in the Employment Equity Act, apply to the workers in the public sector. It is one of those laws that applied to others but the government was able to escape its own legislation. Now, with the inclusion of employment equity in this legislation, we feel quite heartened that finally the government is going to take its responsibilities in the area of employment equity seriously.

These two amendments enable the commission to establish affirmative action programs. Affirmative action is one of the fundamental bases for allowing women to take their equal role in the community, to take an equal role in every part of the process of their lives or of Canadian life, including the ability to take full and equal responsibility.

Without affirmative action and without employment equity we have had very real barriers to women's participation. When even one person in this country is faced with barriers, either because of physical disability, because of their sex, because of their sexual orientation, because of any of those reasons, then they are made less a Canadian than someone else who is not faced with artificial barriers.

These amendments are another step toward removing those artificial barriers for Canadian workers. They are another step toward showing respect for all workers in the public sector, whether they are men, women, people of colour, people with a physical or mental disability, or whether it is sexual orientation.

We think it is very important that the government acknowledge and respect these areas in the broadest sense, not in the narrowest sense that it can get away with but, in fact, in the broadest sense.

We had an opportunity during the discussion in committee to make additional amendments. We tried very hard to make amendments that would be all-encompassing as opposed limiting, and I have to say that my colleague from Ottawa West was able to make great gains. But the amendments that she is proposing give us the tools to see that those amendments clearly go into action.

We had witnesses for a number of weeks before the committee. It was from a broad range of presenters from the labour movement, from the unions that represent workers in the public sector, from the National Advisory Council on the Status of Women, from the Canadian Ethnocultural Council, and a number of others. They noted very clearly, particularly NAC and the Canadian Ethnocultural Council, the under-representation of women and minorities in our government service. They strongly supported inclusion of strong employment equity provisions in this bill.

This amendment would bring the Public Service Employment Act into line with the federal Employment Equity Act. The Employment Equity Act does not currently include those who work for the federal government, for the people of Canada. In fact, the recommendations tabled recently in the Employment Equity Act included a recommendation that federal government workers be included under that act. But currently they are not included.

The amendment includes a reporting mechanism for a timetable to be established to achieve employment equity goals. Without some kind of mechanism to measure progress how can we possibly hope to achieve the kinds of things that members on this side of the House are calling for? We need some way to measure the effectiveness of the amendments that are already achieved in the legislation.

I respect the efforts of my colleague from Ottawa West and other members on the opposition side in this committee. But I do want to say that I would very much like to hear from the government side its position other than when we vote some time in the future. I would like to hear articulated by this government what the problem is with this amendment.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that of all the dissertations made so far on this side of the House in this highest court of the land, we have not heard one come from the government benches yet. That makes one wonder. Maybe it makes those at home wonder. Maybe many of the members of the government, of the Conservative Party, are not knowledgeable on this subject.

Ms. Langan: That is probably it.

Mr. Keyes: That is probably the point. How many backbenchers can we turn to today, if the only time a backbencher has an opportunity to speak in the House of Commons is just on a Standing Order 31 or in Question Period when we have the media sitting around here and then outside for later comment. Bill C-26 is so flawed that the member for Ottawa West—and I congratulate her for all the work she has done—went through the entire committee process, with the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester and the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam clause by clause by clause in this incredible bill. Mr. Speaker, do you know what they came up with? They came up, just at this stage of the bill, with 82 amendments. That is how flawed this bill is.

• (1200)

Because there are certain rules about what you can apply at this particular reading, and that it does not have anything to do with the bill or changes or alters the bill in some way, the Speaker ruled that a group of amendments just did not cut it, so he dropped them.

Do you know, Mr. Speaker, what that left us to debate? It left us with 30 amendments to debate in this House. How much time do we have to do that? If you were in the House a little earlier you would have learned that the government said: "All you get is four hours today and another day when we come back in September", if we come back. Maybe we will have an election and we will not have to come back in September. We could take this bill and throw it back in the garbage and just get rid of it.

An hon. member: In the recycling box.

Mr. Keyes: Mr. Speaker, what are we stuck with? We are stuck with a bill that is, as I said, so flawed it has now, and the Chair has accepted, 30 amendments grouped into 19 different piles because some of the amendments are very similar to others.

It is a shame that we have not heard from the government benches opposite. There is much explanation that has to come, a lot of explanation. I am sure that some of the members opposite have experienced in their offices back in their constituencies the same outrage by those employed in the federal civil service that I have had in my office. Representations have come to me in Hamilton West to the office. Civil service unions and their representatives are protesting Bill C–26, a bill for the information of some that amends several pieces of legislation covering the federal government's employment practices.

They have told me, and I am sure they have told the members opposite—even the member from Burlington, I am sure they have even been in his office—that this bill will severely damage the merit principle on which the notion of a professional, non–partisan civil service is based. They have appealed to us. They have said: "It is just not fair. It is not set up to create the programs that we need. It is not fair when we compare our workforce to the private sector workforce. Let us put it all into line here". We have the opportunity to do that but the government does not take that opportunity.

What happens? There is a gentleman by the name John Edwards. He is the official responsible for pushing this PS 2000 through the works. He claims the fears of the representatives of the unions that have come to our offices are exaggerated and unfounded. If the government members opposite and the minister have the nerve to stand in this House and respond to some of our inquisitions, they would say that all this disenchantment and this concern for the bill is all nonsense and exaggerated as John Edwards has said.

Guess what Mr. Edwards said when he went behind closed doors, when he briefed a meeting of departmental personnel directors on the impact of Bill C–26? This is what he said, according to the minutes and according to the record of that meeting, held back on May 25. He was asked how employment equity and the merit principle would be observed. His response was: "Bill C–26 gives managers authority to appoint and by–pass the system". Is that not great? Now, instead of being advanced on your merits, instead of being advanced because you have the skills, because you have been there and you have chewed it and know what it looks like, and because you can do a better job than anyone else in that particular department and you have the opportunity to be promoted, the manager is the one who will make that decision. Is that not terrific?

Talk about the formation of the old boy's club. Do you not think that is going to complicate the situation a little bit in an office environment? Now the manager has the decision. Maybe members opposite are not getting up on their haunches today to speak to this bill because they sure know what the old boy's network is about, do they not?

How about Paul Tellier? Guess what he is going to become. He is going to be the president of CN. Do you know what? He admits that he does not know anything about railways but they are going to make him president of CN. He is a good friend of the Prime Minister, a good buddy.

How about Glen Shortliffe? The hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants, who was a member of the Conservative Party and is now an Independent, was a most competent chairman of the transport committee on which I have had the privilege to sit since the inception of this Parliament. He did a heck of a job. He was direct and he was honest. He will remember how many times Mr. Shortliffe appeared before us. Guess what? There is the old boy's network at work again. Now Mr. Shortliffe is the Clerk of the Privy Council. He will wear the top hat now and he will make the decisions on the Public Service.

In conclusion, we are dealing with a bill that government members are not about to get up and make statements to because it concerns fairness and this government certainly is not known for its fairness. This government certainly knows about the old boy's network and the old boy's club. It certainly knows about putting control into the hands of one individual who can make a decision and tell an employee who may otherwise have gained a promotion that: "Too bad. How sad. I do not like the colour of your skin or I do not like your height and I do not like the clothes you wear". For whatever reason they are not going to get the job. The manager is going to decide: "Well, I like Jimmy because he is a nice guy. We go golfing on weekends and all the rest of it". That is a very familiar scenario to members of the government opposite.

I will be more than happy to bounce up time and again on the different motions that have been presented by the member for Ottawa West resulting from the hard work the member for Ottawa West and the member for Carleton—Gloucester have done through the many months of sitting on the committee and preparing these important, crucial amendments that will adjust and make Bill C-26 more fair.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I was brought up to believe that when an invitation is extended one responds to it in one way or another.

I am afraid that the hon. member for Hamilton West has brought some names into this debate that perhaps ought not to have been brought into the debate. The name of Mr. John Edwards, who by the way is no relative of mine but who is a distinguished Canadian public servant, has been brought into this debate. I do not know whether political motives are being attributed. I guess it is old boy network motives that are being attributed. He is a distinguished Canadian who rendered the country a remarkable service as Deputy Minister of Employment and Immigration. Later, in his capacity as chairman of the Museums Corporation he oversaw the devolution of the four national museums, which my friends opposite supported so strongly.

It was interesting to hear reference to Mr. Tellier receiving an appointment. I think it is entirely appropriate because he is a distinguished public servant. Would my hon. friend rather have people of the ilk of Bette Hewes appointed president of CN?

Mr. Keyes: I rise on a point of order. Mr. Speaker, I think you will find my point of order valid on two issues. First, if the hon. parliamentary secretary is, through his comments, attempting to imply that I have ulterior motives in mentioning the gentlemen's names that I have previously mentioned then I must assume that the hon. member opposite is entirely incorrect because I made no passing judgment on these individuals. Mine were comments made by individuals in one place and then another.

If, as the minister himself or the parliamentary secretary himself has implied, the hon. parliamentary secretary would stand and speak to the bill I would be more than happy to hear his comments on it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am not sure that was a point of order.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member for Hamilton West made reference to people in passing as they reflected the government's attitude toward the amendments on this bill. If we look at what the hon. member has been saying from across the floor, what he is saying has no relevance to this bill and therefore I would think that his intervention is not relevant.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I must say I am very glad that the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader intervened and challenged some of the remarks of the hon. member for Hamilton West. I appreciate the point of order that we keep on the bill.

I have been sitting here. I should have spoken earlier when we were on a more general clause because I am very glad that the parliamentary secretary did start to respond, before the member for Hamilton West took umbrage, with not the personalities or the integrity or the character of some individuals involved, and I am leaving Mr. Edwards out of this. However, certainly if I can catch your eye sometime, Mr. Speaker, and make it somewhat relevant and using an old boy's club as a base to make it relevant—as a former chairman, and I did not realize my friend was going to intervene and say what he said.

I certainly tried to get the Speaker's eye yesterday on statements and today on the whole question of the old boy's club and not the integrity of any of the individuals. As a former chairman of a standing committee I am very disappointed and depressed that a top public servant, be it perhaps the Clerk of the Privy Council, as he is, has been appointed out of the blue to be president of the—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. That is not a question of order—

To lighthen up the debate a bit, I would like to remind the hon. members of something Madam Sauvé said regarding the rule of relevancy. In December 1982 she remarked that it was a rule extremely difficult to invoke because there is always the risk that a member will tell the Chair that he will stick to the issue and that in two minutes the Chair will realize the relevancy of his remarks even though what he is saying right now does not seem to have anything to do with the issue.

It is always rather awkward for the Speaker to invoke the rule of relevancy because the member who has the floor may say that he was getting to it or that you are soon to find it. In such instances you put me in a very difficult position. But now that messages have been exchanged on both parts, I would very much appreciate if the parliamentary secretary could finish his remarks within his allotted time.

[English]

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your injunction and I will endeavour to honour it. At some other place and some other time I will defend the integrity of Glen Shortliffe, the first Albertan to be named Clerk of the Privy Council. I do not regard him as a member of an old boy's network because he was two years behind me in school.

Mr. Speaker, I think you will find that what I am about to say is totally pertinent to the bill at hand. I move:

> That the House continue to sit through the lunch hour for the purpose of continuing consideration of report stage of Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Hamilton West had not raised the issue of how the government plans to circumvent the legislation then I certainly would have. If the government takes such umbrage at the naming of names that are certainly publicly known then I will refrain from doing so.

When the person responsible for the administration of this legislation says publicly that every effort will be made by the government to make sure that equity and fairness prevail within the Public Service there is no particular reason why one should doubt the man's words until we get evidence to the contrary, and we have.

It has come to the public attention that he has said that as far as Bill C-26 is concerned the manager will have the authority to appoint and by-pass the system. This more or less addresses itself to the question raised by my colleague from Mission—Coquitlam. She asked: "I wonder what the government members would say. It would be nice if they would get up and say something nice about the bill".

The whole philosophy of PS 2000, as it is commonly called, is to make it simpler for those in a managerial position within the Public Service to not alleviate the problems that people have, particularly concerns about sexism, colour and the whole thrust of the equity programs.

There are also other aspects that do not have anything to do with the colour of one's skin or gender. Many of my constituents have come to me about problems with the administration of jobs within the government service and it has nothing to do with either of those reasons.

What this government wants to do and what this legislation does, in spite of everything the government says to the contrary, is to really short circuit the very things that it has so vociferously proclaimed that it intended to do. I must repeat that the manager has the authority to by-pass the system and make appointments.

That is precisely the philosophy that the government has come to in its whole thrust in changing this legislation. I do not care whether it is called the old boy's network or the the old girl's network, the final result is the same.

The bottom line is to get your buddies, regardless of whether they are men or women, into positions of authority, as evidenced by the appointment of the most recent chairperson of CN. He is somebody who does not know anything about railroads, and perhaps did not know a heck of a lot about running government departments either as far as that is concerned. That is from the perspective of being a benefit to the nation and a benefit to the country, but it probably worked well for the network, whether it is an old boy's network or whatever.

• (1220)

The fact of the matter is and the examples are numerous that the government's intentions are no different than they have been all along. This is simply something to make it easier.

We had the example yesterday. Cases of sexual harassment within the Armed Forces were shown to be of epidemic proportions. We also have the instance where the particular circumstances surrounding a case have become public knowledge and not made public by the person directly involved, the person directly involved is court-martialled.

An hon. member: Possibly facing.

Mr. Fisher: All right, I stand corrected. That person is possibly facing court-martial on the basis that the circumstances surrounding the case became public.

We have to take a look at what is actually happening, not listen to what the government is saying. Actions speak much louder than words.

There is nothing in this legislation as proposed by the government which will alleviate the kinds of problems persons in the Armed Forces are having. There is nothing to alleviate the problems which people in my constituency are having vis-à-vis the unfairness of the way the government conducts its business in relation to its employees.

Certainly, the member is to be commended for having brought forward this amendment. It is probably best described as self-serving and cowardly on the part of the government not to accept this very fine amendment to the legislation.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, if I rise to speak about Bill C-26, an act to amend the Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act, which concerns the management of civil servants, it is because Public Service 2000 is perhaps the most important project this House has dealt with in many years. It is very important for us to carry an in-depth review of the government proposals and I must congratulate the member for Carleton—Gloucester and the member for Ottawa West and at least the entire Liberal caucus for their hard work, a major contribution to the bill, which I think greatly improved this legislation.

The section under review, Motion No 5, which was presented by the member for Ottawa West, is just aiming at transferring responsibilities to the Public Service Commission. We know that thanks to her interventions, the member for Ottawa West managed to do what we had hoped for, what we had been anticipating since 1985, that is to say she forced the federal government as an employer through the Treasury Board which acts as the employer of all civil servants, she forced this employer to abide by the principle of employment equity.

These are amendments that the hon. member for Ottawa West our Liberal Party critic, successfully proposed. A number of amendments that were adopted give Treasury Board in its capacity as an employer the same obligations as any other employer subjected to the legislation, namely to eliminate discriminatory practices regarding employment, and to table each year a report on the progress made, as well as to implement proactive policies and programs to improve job and promotion opportunities for those groups designated in the Employment Equity Act.

One must realize that these provisions did not exist in the original bill. It is an amendment proposed by the Liberal Party that forced the government to assume its responsibilities.

So, this is included in the bill that came back from the committee and that is presently being reviewed at the report stage. What the hon. member for Ottawa West now wants to do is to force the Public Service Commission to implement also an employment equity program that would be equivalent, if you will, to the employer's obligation.

One must understand that there is a distinction to be made between Treasury Board and the Public Service Commission. The latter is a parliamentary organization, an agent of this Parliament which is independent from the government and whose role is to recruit civil servants, to select the best candidate to do the job described by the employer.

As for Treasury Board, it identifies the positions that are to be filled, their classification, that is, where those positions fit in the civil service world, as well as the classification standards and the salaries.

The role of the commission is to search for the best candidate to fill a position that has been identified by the employer. As we know, this is done, or at least was done until now, based on the merits of each application.

Since appointments are the responsibility of the Public Service Commission, it seems perfectly normal and fair that the same commission be subjected to strict standards and guidelines regarding recruitment, precisely to avoid any discrimination and to make sure that the provisions of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which all Canadians value, be complied with and that no candidates are rejected because of the colour of their skin or a physical handicap.

Section 15 of our Charter of Rights and Freedoms says, "any program or activity that has as its object the amelioration of conditions of disadvantaged individuals or groups including those that are disadvantaged because of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability." That is in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

What we want to do with Motions Nos. 5 and 7 before us is to give the Public Service Commission, which selects the best candidate, clear and specific directions in establishing policies and implementing employment equity programs for the designated groups I just mentioned.

I do not think that is so difficult. I think it is very easy and completely logical. The Public Service Commission is responsible for hiring, for selecting the most deserving candidate for a position. We know that the commission has delegated 95 per cent of appointments to departmental managers. Therefore 95 per cent are made by the departments under delegated authority.

The purpose of Public Service 2000 is to give managers more power. I fully agree that they should have more power but their powers should be clear and specific and the House of Commons must give managers directions on our intention to respect employment equity programs.

It is not complicated. That is what Motion No. 5, like Motion No. 7, proposes. They require the Public Service Commission, in selecting the most deserving candidate, to comply with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and section 15 of our Constitution, which forbids discrimination on the basis of race, skin colour and other factors like those I mentioned earlier. I think it is a reasonable amendment; it is not so complicated.

I would just like to close by saying that I am pleased with the improvements that the Liberal Party made to Bill C–26. We will have other equally important amendments to debate. This amendment is clear and precise and I hope that hon. members have understood that it would not take much to accept it.

It would only require the Public Service Commission to implement employment equity programs in all it does—appointments, transfers, training or development—so that the candidates who have access to these programs are chosen without discrimination.

[English]

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to support Motions Nos. 5 and 7 which have been introduced by my colleague for Ottawa West and deal basically with the issue of employment equity in the Public Service.

These motions would expand on the way in which Treasury Board and the Public Service Commission could establish an employment equity program. It would also enable the commission to establish an affirmative action program.

All of us who have been dealing with the issues of both pay equity and employment equity understand there is a fundamental difference between pay equity and employment equity.

Pay equity means people should be paid the same wages for work of equal value while employment equity means that one must look at ways to promote people of different ethnic backgrounds and different racial backgrounds within our Public Service to ensure our Public Service more accurately reflects the diversity of Canada.

Therefore, an employment equity program would be targeted toward disabled people, aboriginal peoples, women, visible minorities, and so on. These motions then would give this provision to the bill we are debating today.

We know about the under-representation of women in the Public Service in terms of positions of responsibility. We know well about the under-representation of visible minority women, immigrant peoples and disabled people within the Public Service. There has been study after study done to document the under-representation of all of Canada's people.

There was a report commissioned by one of the previous Treasury Board presidents, Pat Carney. I think it has been mentioned already today. That report is called Beneath the Veneer. It pointed out very graphically and very clearly the troubles and problems that women, visible minorities and other disadvantaged groups have within the Public Service.

There has been a great deal of support for this kind of program in Canadian society as a whole. There is growing support for affirmative action programs. Most people who look at the situation for visible minority people and aboriginal people in particular in our society see that their numbers within the Public Service simply do not reflect the reality of their percentage of our population.

This amendment would bring the Public Service Employment Act into line with the federal Employment Equity Act. Unfortunately, the federal Employment Equity Act does not seem to make much sense to a lot of people. The federal Employment Equity Act does not even apply to our own federal government.

The amendment would also include a reporting mechanism so that goals could be set and a timetable set to achieve those goals and a mechanism for ensuring that in fact these provisions would be adhered to and goals that are set would be reported on. We would see how well we were achieving those goals in terms of the targeted groups in our society.

I am pleased to support the motion. I have done a lot of work over the years on the whole issue of pay equity and employment equity. I recognize very strongly how necessary it is to have teeth in the mechanism to ensure employment equity in the federal Public Service. It is a very much needed provision in this bill, one that I am sorry the government side has not seen fit so far to support. Without this kind of a provision, we will not make the kinds of gains in terms of all peoples in our society that we must make in order to ensure that we have a fair and equitable society, a society that treats all of Canada's people in the same fair manner, and gives all people an opportunity.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): I want to participate in the brief time allotted under the rules, the 10 minutes at report stage on these amendments on pay equity in particular. I compliment the member for Ottawa West who has done a mammoth amount of work on this very complicated bill.

I want to talk generally about the stage we are in on something the index of Hansard calls the Public Service Reform Act, which is Bill C-26, with the 82 amendments that were proposed, and I guess the 32 that were finally allowed by the Chair.

This is the blueprint for public servants from coast to coast in the Public Service of Canada. It is very interesting. In this last week or 10 days we had Bill C-55 which dealt with pensions of public servants, RCMP, the military and all federal public servants; and here we get Bill C-26 which is in effect the structure of the Public Service, and reforms and amendments to that structure.

It is rather incredible to me, but I certainly was stimulated to participate in this debate by listening to the hon. member for Ottawa West and other members, that this bill just came out of the committee and in effect on to the floor of the House last Wednesday, June 17. We all know Wednesday is usually a short day, but under our speed-up procedures in order to try and wind up for the summer, we sat that night. As I understand it, this bill really only hit the floor somewhere between eight or nine o'clock on Wednesday, June 17. There were four or five speakers under the 10-minute rule as well as the ruling of the Speaker on amendments. There was less than one hour's debate on Wednesday, June 17, and lo and behold, we get back here today and the government introduces closure to choke it all off, allowing a four-hour limit and then one more day some time in the fall when we come back.

In terms of parliamentary procedure, I find that a rather tight schedule, to say the least. In fact, dealing with something so fundamentally important as Public Service reform legislation and all its facets, it is almost impossible to have an adequate debate at this stage.

I may surprise some members, but I believe government perhaps should use time allocation and closure many times. This government certainly has been doing it as we try to get rid of a lot of parliamentary business before our summer recess. However, there is a big difference when using time allocation after you have had a second reading debate in a prolonged way and you know the bill is complex and very complicated and has got to be given serious study in committee. I think this government quite properly has done so in many cases. For example, we dealt with the immigration bill just the other day. It was very complicated and controversial. It affects people from coast to coast. Yet you could only debate that so long. I frankly think the second reading debate should have been longer, but you get it in the committee and that is where the real work is done.

The real work is done in committee. When that real work is over, it comes back to the floor where it is expected there will be meaningful time for debate on all the matters that were discussed in committee. As we know, most members are not members of that legislative committee that goes into the detail of the bill. This time we have allocation of time or closure to get a bill into committee. In this case the committee members, and I give them and the government credit, I understand wrestled with this bill for approximately three months in committee and did a lot of the detail work.

It is a perversion of the rules and in effect the reform spirit, so-called, of Parliament to have a committee wrestle with complicated Public Service structures affecting every public servant in Canada in the confines of the committee, where all the necessary detail work has been done and where conscientious members produced their amendments. This is one vital amendment. They are all very important. Some are more technical than the others, but this deals with pay equity. I must say as a man in this House I have been rather surprised and depressed at some of the reports showing that women at the top branch are not in those positions of responsibility, let alone visible minorities. However, I am more interested in the women, without being chauvinistic here, than some of the other groups.

However, in all the groups, the reports show that at the top level these women and visible minorities are very much in the minority. Therefore, this is a very serious amendment.

Yet we have the parliamentary secretary to the House leader on the second day it hits the floor, after only an hour or so of debate, choke it all off, so that four hours down the road some time today, that ends it as far as the report stage when members really can contribute to all these amendments and the bill.

Then we know at third reading, and I guess the allocation order gives one more day somewhere in the future, some time I guess this fall, it gets to be even a tighter schedule for members to participate in the debate.

I am glad I have the opportunity under this amendment to stand here to register my objection to the procedures of the government to in effect pervert a lot of the good work the committee has done by choking off meaningful debate at report stage. We are supposed to investigate, check and assess in committee. We ventilate in committee and then debate on the floor of the House at report stage. This type of motion absolutely makes a mockery of that procedure.

In terms of the motion of the hon. member for Ottawa West, I totally agree with it. Some of her other motions I agreed with, earlier ones that we have passed here on deployment and lateral transfers.

Just in the closing minute or so I have, I want to say I agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Hamilton West because there are difficult areas to bring out in the open. I think the fact that it has not been done and there has not been more public disclosure and public debate on it is again a reflection on how inadequate we as parliamentarians are on public issue matters. I have no hesitation in saying it, with no reflection on the personal integrity of anyone involved.

I frankly think it is a pretty poor way to run a railway to take the Clerk of the Privy Council, who may be a top public servant, trying to run PS 2000 with the help of Mr. Edwards, trying evidently to settle the Constitution, flying around the country and bringing some focus and consensus to that very complicated issue, and pretend that because he may be an expert in those areas that he can run the Canadian National Railway where we already have a chairman. He happens to be a personal friend of mine, but he has no railway experience whatsoever.

In trying to keep this within the rules so that I do not create any problem, it certainly may be an old boy's club, but it is certainly not very much of a railway buff club. Here you have the chairman of CN and now intending its CEO and active president to be the head of a railway that is fundamental to Canada at a time when railway problems have never been more critical. I say this is a disgrace to the railway workers who depend on top management to do the job. Two neophytes are going to run this railway at a critical time of competition with American railways, let alone Canadian Pacific and the trucking problem in this country.

I suggest that there is no better illustration of the potential in PS 2000. I think in certain cases with checks there should be an Order in Council to make sure they are lateral transfers and/or in this questionable area, whether they are lateral transfers or promotions.

Talk about a choo-choo train running riot over procedures. We have the greatest illustration of a choo-choo train by having the Clerk of the Privy Council choo-chooing right into the presidency of CN when he himself admits he does not know a thing about a railway. I do not know if he even had a model railway as a kid growing up. Some of us may have had one away back when.

Then there is the chairman, who is a complete neophyte in the railway. This is a disservice to Canada, a disservice to Canadian railway workers and it is a disservice to Canadian taxpayers because CN costs the taxpayers a lot of money. In this day and age when you can have this nepotism of someone who has done well, work well and may nor may not be a friend of the Prime Minister, but a personal appointment to such an important position with no scrutiny at all—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order please.

[Translation]

I would ask the hon. member to be a little more discriminating in his choice of words, in referring to a particular person. I heard the word "nepotism" and I am not sure that is a very parliamentary term.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I respect the Chair. I certainly withdraw it. It is unparliamentary. I will cut it out now. My time is just about up at this stage. All I am saying is that I will remove certain words. You are absolutely right, that is incorrect. I did not know it was. Frankly, I could think of a lot of other words that I think would be even more graphic but correct. However, I will not get into words. I do not care about the appellations. It is the procedure that concerns me. That is why members legitimately raised problems in the committee, as I understand it, reflected in amendments here as to the abuse that may be made of flexibility, of having transfers and promotions in the Public Service. When you have it at the top, then beware of what is going to happen all down the structure to the public servant who does not have a forum in which to protest and has to take his lumps without too much redress. You do not get much redress when you choke off debate in the House of Commons on something so fundamental as Public Service reform.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak on this bill today because it has far-reaching implications for the Public Service of Canada. I say that without any partisan view. The merit system in the Public Service has always been the very basis of good administration in this country.

Where the manager in this legislation has been granted excessive authority, he or she can exercise their bias at will. That not only discourages employees on the scene at the time, but it also discourages well qualified personnel going into the Public Service of Canada. That is the serious part of this whole legislation.

We have had great public servants over the years. They have been loyal in their advice and in their attitude to administrations of the day over the years of Canadian history. Their role was to advise ministers, advise the government. When asked to provide bills on certain matters, given the parameters that the government wanted to included in that legislation, in those bills, their job was to provide that information in the various departments concerned.

We have had some outstanding specialists in the Public Service of Canada over the years. That is not going to continue under a system where the managerial ego within individual departments is going to be the order of the day. Who is going to be favourite of the boss? What are you going to say to your boss? Are you going to tell him that you think that his ideas are bad and that only yours are good? Is there going to be a free flow of information? Is there going to be a free flow of comment, of advice on serious issues where that information must be of a specialist nature because it will be going up the ladder to the front benches, to the ministers and the Parliament of Canada.

We have had some great public servants in this country over the years and we have them today, but why are we so gung-ho about passing a bill on Public Service 2000 through this Parliament under closure? This is going to build into that legislation the type of law that is going to give excessive power to the few and discourage great students, talented people, from coming into the Public Service of this nation. It is going to prevent them from coming into the Public Service when Canada needs some of the greatest advice, the greatest base of accurate assessment of information we have ever needed in years.

The merit system is indeed the raison d'être, the reason for being, the reason for outstanding people coming into the Public Service of Canada.

The merit system promotes greater depth in the advice, in the accuracy and in the informed knowledge that will be passed on to this government and future governments in Canada.

If I am ever again on the government side of this House, I can say without any reservation or equivocation whatsoever that I will do my utmost to the nth degree and will not rest until the merit system is put back into the Public Service of Canada. There must be no favouritism. We want well-qualified people in the Public Service and we want people in this House who respect the employees of the Government of Canada.

A strong and well-qualified Public Service will be well managed by the minister. It will be well managed down the line into the Public Service, providing that minister is strong enough, is capable enough, of leading and if he is humble enough to accept accurate and well-based advice when he feels that his own is wrong.

That is the way the system must work. It must work on logic and firm foundations and well-informed decisions will come out of it.

A qualified Public Service not only shines across the country but it helps the country to shine in the eyes of the world. That is why this bill and the government's haste to get it through Parliament is so alarming. I have known a lot of those fantastic public servants over the years and governments in this House of Commons have benefited from their knowledge. Their knowledge does not just come from their own minds. Their knowledge would seep up through the Public Service from other levels and would end up in the best possible advice that could be given to ministers of the Crown.

In this bill, when it becomes law, the loyalties to the manager in the system can become very petty in nature. The loyalties will be more to the manager in the system than it will be to the Government of Canada politically. That is what is wrong. It can create jealousies, personality conflicts within the workplace and be a detriment to harmony in the Public Service.

Great statesmen over the years of Canadian history have made this country great. They have helped to make well-qualified elected public servants look very great too and have brought out the best in everyone.

If it was not for a great relationship between the Public Service of Canada and governments in Canada in the past, we would not have managed great issues like the building of the CPR railway across Canada; World War I, which required a lot of serious decisions; World War II, which was well managed throughout; the forming of the United Nations, which came about because of people like Lester B. Pearson, Mackenzie King and Louis St. Laurent in this country.

NATO was put in place to offset the Warsaw Pact and the power behind the iron curtain of the day and it worked. It is a success. That is why we have peace, relatively, in the world today. Our ambassadorial system has worked well around the world. Our peacekeepers have worked well because we have had civilian ambassadors and we have had military ambassadors built into the same system.

These are public servants of Canada. Never should this House of Commons ever vote for legislation that is going to take the merit system out of the Public Service of Canada and damage the information that is going to the front benches of any government in Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 5. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

[Translation]

We shall now proceed to the consideration of Motions Nos. 9, 11 and 13, all standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa West.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West) moved:

That Bill C-26 be amended in Clause 8 by striking out lines 20 to 22 at page 4 and substituting the following therefor:

"7.1 (1) The Commission may conduct investigations and audits on any matter within its jurisdiction.

(2) The Commission shall investigate complaints filed by employees alleging sexual or personal harassment or abuse of authority and shall report its findings and the corrective action taken under section 7.5, if any, to the employee who filed the complaint."

That Bill C-26 be amended in Clause 8 by striking out line 33 at page 4 and substituting the following therefor:

"or person employed with the Commission."

That Bill C-26 be amended in Clause 8 by striking out line 11 at page 5 and substituting the following therefor:

"sion shall, on the basis of any investigation,".

She said: Mr. Speaker, since the government has clearly indicated its intention to reject Motions Nos. 5 and 7 on employment equity, Motion No. 9 becomes even more important, because it is an amendment that ensures the Public Service Commission has the authority and the responsibility for investigating complaints of sexual or personal harassment or abuse of authority filed by public servants.

• (1300)

It is even more important, since the government is not prepared to give the Public Service Commission, on behalf of Parliament, any responsibility in the matter of employment equity that these three motions which touch directly on the accountability of managers and an impartial method of ensuring that they do not abuse the new authority that this bill gives them, to have these safeguards in this bill.

The question of accountability was one thread throughout our debate in committee and is a thread throughout this bill. It is worth quoting from the minutes of a couple of meetings because throughout appearances by the minister and by senior officials I repeatedly asked them to show me where in this bill is the increased accountability that the minister and Mr. Edwards, responsible for PS 2000, have told Parliament, have told Public Service employees and have told the public is there. Tell those who rely on this Public Service for fair and impartial treatment on the front lines, in unemployment insurance offices, in getting their welfare cheques or their old age security cheques. Tell us where in this bill is the increased accountability.

Not once in three months of hearings was one senior manager or the minister or the parliamentary secretary able to point to one clause in this bill that clearly increases accountability.

We support the need for reform in the Public Service. We understand that people have to be given the responsibility and the freedom to be creative, to make decisions, to take risks, to manage well, but we also understand that increased freedom, whether for a citizen, for a child or for a manager means increased accountability for actions. It means checks and balances to ensure that increased power is not abused at the expense of others who are less able to defend themselves.

I would like to refer to several issues of the proceedings of the legislative committee where we had these discussions and where I asked a number of questions. Take the report of the task force on barriers to women in the Public Service, for instance. In its report Beneath the Veneer, the task force said that attitudes were the main obstacle to the advancement and equal treatment of women in the Public Service.

In other words, the merit principle has never been applied fairly to women. I put a question to the President of the Treasury Board, and I said that they talked about increased accountability but I found no trace of it in this bill. I asked about this increased accountability of managers to Parliament, to the government, that would ensure the Government of Canada was not governed by favouritism and nepotism. I received no specific reply on the clause of the bill that deals directly with increased accountability.

[English]

At the end of the minister's answer I had to say that I asked specifically: "Where in this bill is increased accountability contained?" and made the point that I had not heard that answer from the minister.

I put the same question to Mr. Edwards, and I said that since we were giving managers more freedom and greater latitude and possibilities for filing an appeal or reviewing management decisions were being reduced, had they considered provisions that would enhance accountability, as a counterweight to this greater freedom? Mr. Edwards answered that in their opinion it was clear that the provisions of the bill contained certain legal requirements.

[English]

Mr. Edwards, as well as the minister and Mr. Robert Lafleur, deputy secretary, Human Resources Development Branch, Treasury Board Secretariat, were not able to point out one sentence in this bill that increases accountability.

I attended hearings conducted by the Public Service Alliance and I attended meetings with Public Service employees during the development of PS 2000. I heard again and again from women and visible minorities that they do not get paid the same, they do not get treated the same, and they do not get the same opportunities for promotion. They never get beyond that glass ceiling. They are desperately afraid that with new powers it is going to become even more important whether their manager likes them and whether they are the kind of person he or she thinks deserves to progress in the Public Service.

Women particularly, but also those who are disabled and aboriginal Canadians, have expressed fears about both sexual and personal harassment and about attitudes that have nothing to do with their ability to do their work affecting their ability to progress.

This motion is an attempt to ensure that the commission, which is accountable to Parliament, not to the government but to Parliament, has fair employment practices. It asks that the commission has the responsibility and the power to investigate complaints of harassment and abuse of authority.

We as parliamentarians need that safeguard. I do not expect that every manager, most managers, or even a large number of managers are suddenly going to become raving power maniacs wielding whips over people in the Public Service. However we write laws for those whose own moral principles do not guide proper behaviour. We already have very good documentation that attitudes do not allow people to be considered only on their merits.

Taken together these amendments are very clear. Their purpose is to ensure that there is redress, there is accountability, and there are checks and balances against the new powers that managers are given by this bill.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I too want to lend my support to these particular motions. We have dealt with Motions Nos. 5 and 7 and they will be voted on in the future.

Now we deal with Motions Nos. 9, 11 and 13. They are being grouped for debate. As we have heard so eloquently said by the member for Ottawa West, we are dealing with these particular motions on sexual harassment, personal harassment, or abuse of authority.

If anyone out there believes that we do not need to tighten the bill because the reality of today is that there is a change in society, men are more understanding of women and men accept the fact that women are equals, we cannot believe that. We cannot believe that is what is being felt by all men. That is just not the case.

I am part of a generation, one of the later baby boomers I suppose, that says: "We accept this as a reality. I am not challenged or feel challenged by a woman of equal or more powerful stature or responsibility than I".

There are men who are threatened. We do not have to go too far to bump into these individuals. We do not have to go too far out of this place to hear what goes on in private conversations between men when they cloister and have a few laughs. It is a shameful display but it is a reality.

That is why we want something in this particular bill that recognizes that fact. That is why on Motion No. 9 my colleague from Ottawa West explained that the commission does at present conduct investigations on complaints of harassment or abuse of authority. We recognize that it goes on. However, there is no clear mandate in the legislation for it to do so.

What is the point then? We are missing something. There is a piece of that puzzle, of that picture that is missing. The picture is not complete. That is what this motion attempts to do.

Since we all admit here today that harassment can be and is a clear interference with the merit principle this subclause clearly spells out the right of the commission to investigate such complaints.

As well, the increased authority of managers creates the concern that some managers may misuse their new control over employees and their career opportunities within the Public Service to the particular disadvantage of women and visible minorities. To believe otherwise is living in a fool's paradise. That is quite clear.

My hon. colleague for Ottawa West speaks of a glass ceiling. I am not so sure it is glass. I think it is a concrete ceiling. Maybe it is a rubber ceiling because when women and minorities hit it they bounce right down. They bounce right down because the opportunity that is afforded to them to advance is there but we all know that in many cases it just does not happen for them.

In this package we are also dealing with Motion No. 11, which deals with the delegation of authority to deputy heads when we are talking about audits and investigations. As the member for Ottawa West has already mentioned the common thread that is running through the entire debate, which went on not only at the three months of committee meetings that she and the member for Carleton—Gloucester attended, is the whole issue of attitude by individuals.

I had representation in my constituency office from those who are part of the Public Service unions. They were concerned that the commission could delegate to or allow investigations and audits to be conducted by deputy heads. Motion No. 11 will ensure that these investigations or audits are conducted impartially by someone under the direct control of the commission and independent of the departments.

It is especially important, given the extended authority of deputy heads, that investigations or audits be carried out at arm's length.

Also in this group of amendments, which we will seek the government to respond to in some way or say: "Yes, maybe we ought to have another look at that and maybe yes, we will accept that particular amendment", is Motion No. 13.

The purpose of this motion is to ensure that where an investigation audit or report indicates that corrective measures are necessary the commission shall take corrective action. In Bill C–26 it says "may take corrective action". We say "shall take corrective action". The clause still leaves it to the discretion of the commission to determine what corrective action is appropriate.

We are dealing with three motions at this particular time, Nos. 9, 11 and 13. These amendments to the bill have become very crucial by all indications. For the last hour and 15 minutes or so that we discussed Motions Nos. 5 and 7 not a single member got up in the House to debate those particular motions and answer our concerns directly. That is a shameful attitude on behalf of the government.

Couple that with the fact that we now have this jackboot tactic of closure and we are only allowed to speak for four hours on all 30 amendments put forward by the member for Ottawa West. Just four hours of debate. What kind of time limit is that?

It takes me back to last night and the debate on the immigration bill. We had one day. We were talking about reform, the largest of any kind on immigration ever done since 1978. Today we are dealing with the Public Service and we are allowed four hours. This is an abuse of Parliament.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak to these particular amendments, Motions Nos. 9, 10 and 11. It is a good idea to read what is actually in these motions, particularly Motion No. 9. In clause 7.1 it says that the commission "may" conduct investigations and audits. The key part of the amendment that has been put forward by this side is:

> (2) The commission shall investigate complaints filed by employees alleging sexual or personal harassment or abuse of authority and shall report its findings and the corrective action taken under section 7.5, if any, to the employee who filed the complaint.

The motion gets to the heart of the issue of protecting employees and giving them the confidence of feeling that they are part of a system that will support them rather than be against them and that they have the method of redress essential to this type of system.

We have to be mindful that the system is there to protect. The motion adds the additional protection of not having to work through the system but through the commission that reports to Parliament and tells us what is going on.

The concern I have, and I am sure others have as well, is that there is a trend away from Parliament. We saw a trend with the immigration bill last night to have things handled by regulation rather than by legislation in Parliament. We saw the use of closure in Parliament both on this bill and on the immigration bill. We only had one day to deal with the immigration bill. Now we have only four hours to deal with these very complicated and complex amendments, which were designed and offered in goodwill to improve legislation that has some flaws and problems.

We on this side of the House understand that reform is necessary and that reform dealing with the Public Service is an essential element. We want to work with the government to see that it is achieved.

However, you tend to lose your compassion and your desire to work with this government when you see the tactics that are being utilized to force this through.

It is the same thing, quite frankly, on a different topic. It ties in with Bill C–55 in dealing with pensions. The government adopted that legislation in an arbitrary way. It changed rates of contribution and established interest rates which were retroactive to the previous year. They may take away indexation and make changes to the plans that are in place and at their beck and call without Parliament or the people being fully consulted. We are again running into this type of situation with Bill C–26.

I think we all have to realize and understand that if we are going to have a civil service or a Public Service that functions properly then there has to be mutual respect and a system that will give these employees an opportunity to flourish and to achieve their goals and objectives as individuals.

Charlotte Gray in a recent Saturday Night article states: "Without the federal government to lubricate the wheels of Confederation, run airports, impose national standards, collect taxes and regulate phones, trade, and television stations, Canada might be even closer to disintegration".

We have to be mindful of what is involved with the Public Service. I think that when we do have these massive walk outs and wildcat strikes we do see some of the ramifications and we feel them for a short period of time. However, we do tend to forget all of the things that are done by our civil service which help hold this country together and provide the nuts, bolts, and glue to make the system work.

I will quote another portion of that same article by Charlotte Gray. It really drives home the point of the frustration and the concern and why we need Motions Nos. 9, 10 and 11. It is to put into the system those protections. I quote: "One layer below, morale among managers spirals downward because of the contraction of the Public Service". It now constitutes 1.7 per cent of the Canadian labour force compared with 2.4 per cent in 1974. "Promotion prospects have dried up. 'We are treated like light bulbs,' moans one 45 year–old who works a 60–hour week and whose career is going nowhere. The guys at the top assume there are always new ones to replace those of us who burn out'."

I think that typifies the feeling that a lot of public servants have to what is happening to them. They of course feel that there is no mechanism for them to redress those concerns. There is no mechanism that will respond to their concerns.

We on this side feel that by strengthening clause 8, and in particular with Motions Nos. 9, 11 and 13, that mechanism will be strengthened to such an extent that people will not feel they are light bulbs who are just there to burn out and be discarded. Instead, they will feel that they are an integral part of a system that appreciates what they do, encourages them in what they do, and encourages them to seek the highest possible attainment of on-the-job satisfaction and the pride in doing a job and doing it well.

We have seen the politicization of the Public Service over the last number of years and I think that is a cause of great concern and another area in which the Public Service feels they have been put into the background and are not a contributor to the process.

I think they have been made to feel as scapegoats in the political agenda of this government. We need the strengthening of these sections and improvements in the bill over all. As we are dealing with these motions, we need some improvements in them to improve the power of the commission to protect the Public Service.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak on the issues before us today that deal with a number of principles involving employment in the public sector. The first interesting observation was of course the previous member speaking about the horrors of closure and phrases such as the application by the Conservative government of jackboot measures and other rather sedate and calm language. I remember in the House of Commons when the hon. member's party was in government we pretty well had a closure bill amended here during that period of time. To hear the Liberal Party stand up and justify the necessity of using jackboot measures and closure surprises me. It is kind of ironic to see the jackboots on the other feet for the time being.

I am sure that as the next election plays out we will likely see closure being applied the other way. Maybe we should just find a better way of doing it rather than going through this hypocrisy.

The interesting thing about the principles of the bill—and I do support the amendments that have been brought forward—is the question of equity in the work place and the protection of employees from arbitrary and illegal use of the power of position. On those two bases, I think there is an extremely important point to be made.

One of them is on pay equity. I had an interesting opportunity with the leader of the Liberal Party of British Columbia. I admit that the individual is somewhat of a novice, but it would be interesting to see the federal Liberal Party and the provincial Liberal parties singing from the same song sheet. The song sheet that the provincial leader of the Liberal Party of British Columbia was singing from basically said that we are in a recession. The economy will not permit a government to pursue pay equity for women.

Rephrasing that, the Liberal Party of British Columbia is saying the same thing that the Conservative Party is saying. Speaking on pay equity, society, and the Conservatives and the Liberals as parties, say that in order to retain the privileged position of men, women have to stay in the job ghettos. They have got to take the pay ghetto, as it were, in order that men can maintain that privileged position. It is an unfortunate thing for the leader of a political party to make such a statement. It was done on television and it was absolutely untenable.

What should happen is that federal colleagues who are advocating the position of pay equity against a government that seems not inclined to recognize how important this issue is should be looking clearly at giving a signal to their provincial colleagues that maybe they should be singing from the same song sheet if they want British Columbians and Canadians to believe what they are saying.

It is almost the same position as they are in with the closure issue. Let us come up with a new approach so as not to look so hypocritical to someone who is watching the Liberals in government and then watching them, or the Conservatives for that matter, in opposition.

The next question is whether pay equity is a right for human beings. That means equal pay for work of equal value. It must be recognized and dealt with.

The next important issue again deals with the whole question of harassment. It could be harassment of any type against men or women in the work place where one individual with power over another exercises that power in an inappropriate or illegal manner. Again women have borne the brunt of the harassment in the work place. The amendments before us today ask that that the government consider putting in place effective measures to reduce and eliminate harassment in the workplace.

I think the key point here is that the Government of Canada should set an example. The Government of Canada should not be the worst employer in Canada. It should be looking to be a model to signal other employers that this is what our expectation is. It could be changing the attitudes of employers by moral suasion and example rather than legislation. The government really has not seemed to be inclined to do that.

If we look at the Canada Post Corporation, it is probably one of the worst employers in Canada. There are Neanderthal practices within that corporation absolutely beyond a doubt.

• (1330)

Maybe one could say that in a perverse manner it is setting an example for employers in Canada of what not to do as an employer. The practices within that corporation are absolutely disgusting.

As the owner the Government of Canada should be looking at ways of making that corporation a model in terms of employer–employee practices.

Here is another example that is absolutely critical. If one is going to signal other employers in Canada, then one should be making the agencies of the Government of Canada a model. The Government of Canada, with the Conservative Party in power, should be making its agencies examples of what other employers should be doing and not examples of what they should not be doing.

It would be an incredibly good opportunity to bring employment practices into the 20th century or on into the 21st century in the Armed Forces. If you look at the Armed Forces as an employer it is an incredible organization. Here is an example. When I represented an area in which the Armed Forces were involved an incredible issue would result where an individual would run into grief. They would go after tremendous frustration to their member of Parliament because they were suppressed by the officers. They were warned: "You do not go outside this system or we will get you no matter what happens".

Eventually they would go outside the system and go to a member of Parliament. The issue would then be adjudicated to some degree in the public eye, the individual would be transferred and, after a few years, he would indeed be driven out or he would be penalized to an enormous degree. If one breaks the chain of command then one is in serious difficulty.

It is time the Armed Forces in Canada had an effective union. In Europe there are countries with unionized armed forces. This country, in terms of its employment practices within the Government of Canada, is absolutely in the Dark Ages. We watched examples of arbitrary practices in there. Somebody is overweight. They decide to throw them out of the Armed Forces but the officer who makes that decision is overweight. Out they go. They put in a grievance. It takes two years for the grievance to be processed. The individual has been in total chaos and the grievance process in there is terribly ineffective.

In one case it eventually wound up where the cabinet had to consider the most dishonest practice that would ever have been considered in any public sector or any private sector of employment. The laws of Canada would have prohibited what went on inside the Armed Forces.

An hon. member: Shame.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): The individual was eventually reinstated by a decision of cabinet. They would not tolerate inside the Armed Forces any remediation of a terribly abusive order. That started on the ground floor. It is amazing. The officer who inflicted the order in that case was promoted and now sits in Ottawa today in a promoted position which took two years of enormous conflict within the Armed Forces.

In there goes sexual harassment and harassment of employees where a tremendous abuse of power occurs and there is no effective remediation. We are going into the 21st century. It is time that this Government of Canada dealt with its Public Service, an honourable, dedicated, committed organization, in a fair and equitable way. It should use the employer–employee relationship to set a prime, key example for other employers in Canada. It should not set an example of what you should not do or an example of employment practices of the last century.

I view the amendments put forward by my colleague as constructive and worthy of support, making the Public Service of Canada and the Government of Canada an example of good, solid future–looking employer–employee relations.

Mr. Jean–Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, this is a very important bill. That is why the hon. member for Mississauga should get up and give us a very inspiring speech as he knows how to do.

I am willing to give my time to the member for Mississauga if he would get up and give us his views on this very important matter. I know how he feels. He is a fair individual and a fair person. He is a man of great, great principle. He is a man who understands. All we are trying to do here, with these three amendments, Motions Nos. 9, 11 and 13, is to give a clear mandate to the commission in the legislation for it to do these investigations on complaints of harassment and abuse of authority.

One does not have to be a genius nor a legislator of great experience to understand this is a fundamental right of individuals, to know what is going on and to know that they will be informed of investigations and will have a right to comment on them.

As we know, the commission at this time does these investigations. We are trying, with these amendments, to make it clear that harassment per se could be an interference with the merit principle. We would like the commission to be empowered by legislation to do these inquiries and to do them in an open manner and to do them with the follow–up that is required of these investigations.

All we are asking is that the commission do the investigations, not somebody from the department where the individual works, not somebody from outside government, but somebody within the powers of the commission to appoint within that commission so that we make sure that is protected in the law.

The first amendment says that the commission must do those investigations and audits on any matter within its jurisdiction and investigate complaints filed by employees alleging sexual and personal harassment.

I had a case this morning of harassment of a public servant by a superior. This individual works in national defence and his wife is very sick. He missed a few days because of his wife's illness. When he came back to work and told his supervisor that he was absent for the last seven or eight days because of his wife's illness, the supervisor refused to accept the medical certificate. He refused to accept the word of the individual and his medical doctor attesting to the fact that he was justifiably absent from work.

This is the second time this has happened. The last time this member of the Public Service was off work, every day at 7 a.m., at 10 a.m., at noon, in the afternoon and in the evening the supervisor would call to make sure that the individual was home looking after his wife. Getting seven or eight phone calls a day from your boss trying to verify that you are looking after your sick wife becomes quite tiresome.

An hon. member: Harassment.

Mr. Gauthier: That is what we call harassment. That is exactly what we are trying to do here. An employee who is harassed that way should have a right, if there is a complaint lodged by the employee as to a supervisor harassing him or her, to say to the commission: "Investigate this problem. Find out why this person is harassing me and for God's sake, let us stop that nonsense". That is all this does. It gives the commission the authority to do not as it so feels about it, not as clause 8 says: "The commission may—". We want the word "shall", not "may". We are trying to replace the word "may" within the legislation before us with the word "shall". The commission shall investigate, not may investigate.

The other point we are trying to make with Motion No. 11 is that the unions have expressed concerns to us that to delegate this authority to investigate or audit to deputy heads of the department could be a conflict of interest within the department.

That point is very easy to understand. We are telling managers that by Public Service 2000 we will give them more powers to manage. That was not anything new. It was said in many royal commissions before: Give the managers power to manage and pay them accordingly. That is why managers are paid more than the average worker. It is because they manage a department. They have responsibilities and judgment calls to make.

In Public Service 2000 we have a different tack now. Not only are managers going to be paid to manage, but we are also going to give them a carrot. We are going to give them something else and that is more authority. Well, that authority must be controlled.

With these amendments, all we are saying is that people in the departments have a right to and should be entitled to equal rights. All we are asking is that the House adopt the three amendments that would make investigations and audits of the commission an in-house Public Service Commission obligation. A follow-up must be done and as much as possible it must be done by somebody not within the department, not within that section of the government where the person works.

These amendments are not very difficult and I recommend them to the attention of the House.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): On these amendments dealing with auditing within the department concerned or where the complaint comes from, that procedure would be a very simple one because we have a situation here where unions express concern that the commission could delegate to or allow investigations and audits to be conducted by deputy heads.

I have just gone through some of my public accounts papers when I chaired the Standing Committee on Public Accounts for three years. Oddly enough, I found in there that we are supporting the Auditor General of Canada in having a greater control over the internal operations of departments and that is the role that any public accounts committee in this House should be playing. My colleague from Ottawa—Vanier is now chairing that committee and I am sure he would agree with me very strongly that is precisely what should take place.

Instead of bringing in a bill that is going to delegate these duties, instead of tightening up the system, where are we going to get the strong financial control in the Government of Canada? It is not only in big contracts or big deals that money sometimes is lost, but it is also all the dribbling away here and there down through the system. That is where the tax dollars are lost.

I support the Auditor General in his desire to have absolute tight control within departments. I support the suggestion of my colleague from Ottawa West who brought in Motion No. 11 which specifically mentions the term "investigations and audits" which the commission might wish to delegate to other department heads.

So let us not throw the baby out with the bath water. We have had some good systems in place before which have served the country well. In passing any legislation in this House we must support the Auditor General of Canada because he is the one the public of this country looks to, to make sure that he is bringing out the wrongdoings in government, the leakages and wasted tax dollars in government, and to try to tighten up the system and give the Canadian people some value for their dollars.

In relation to Motions Nos. 9, 11 and 13, they deal with some very serious matters. Harassment is mentioned here. My hon. friend from Ottawa—Vanier mentioned one case this morning. You are going to run into some very good managers in the Public Service of Canada, but you are also going to run into some managers who cannot handle a little bit of authority. Calling somebody's home six, seven, or eight times a day I would say is a pretty good case of paranoia. These people should not be in positions of authority.

How can anybody say that by passing this legislation today we are going to increase the efficiency of the Public Service of Canada? Is that manager or his delegate getting paid on a salary or at hourly rate to pick up the phone every once in awhile to phone somebody's home like a little Gestapo agency? Why do we pay people to do those things? Is there no trust left in the system at all? If a boss cannot trust his employees, why should the employees trust the boss? That is where management comes into this system.

I want to read something relating to procedures outlined in these three amendments in a very general way. It is a report I tabled in this House on November 8, 1990, when I was chairing the public accounts committee.

Part A says: "Your committee recommends that the government give consideration to tabling a discussion paper prior to proceeding with the introduction of legislative amendments and/or administrative changes and that this discussion paper set out the principal conclusions and recommendations arising from Public Service 2000". That covers the type of details we are talking about here.

Part B reads: "Referring the aforementioned discussion paper to a special committee of the House on reform of the Public Service and that the special committee conduct a consultation process involving employees, the Public Service unions and other interested parties and report back to the House within a reasonable period".

At first, the President of Treasury Board wrote me a letter. He thought it was a tremendous idea and he was willing to adopt it. Then he went ahead and did the very opposite. He brought the legislation into the House and what do we see today? Not only did he not have full consultation with the Public Service of Canada as he promised me as chairman of the public accounts committee that he would do, but he also brought legislation into the House and skipped the process altogether. That is why we have this legislation before us today.

The government has compounded the difficulty of dealing with Public Service reform today because not only did it just bring the bill forward for discussion on report stage today but it has also put a time limit on this bill when it must be passed by the House.

We might as well face the facts. The government had its mind made up right from the start, right from the beginning on what it wanted to do. It was going to do that regardless of who said what or what process took place in the Parliament of Canada or in the public accounts committee or any other committee dealing with this issue. That is the ramrodding business this government goes through.

One of the people we had the most trouble with during the discussion of Public Service 2000 was none other than Mr. Tellier who has just now been promoted to head up the CNR. I hope he can run a railroad better than he ran the government business at that time.

He was always very agitated when he had to come before the public accounts committee. He even sometimes suggested when his officials should appear and when they should not. We ran into many problems with Mr. Tellier. I must say with regret that I was very disappointed in the type of co-operation we had from him and his little department.

Now I come back to the same thing, right to the beginning. If we are going to have good conduct in the Public Service of Canada, if we are going to have value for the tax dollars of the taxpayers of Canada, and if we are going to have proper auditing then I would very strongly suggest that the Auditor General of Canada must work very closely with the Public Service Commission when these audits are done in departments. We do not want someone else fixing things up before the Auditor General has a chance to report them to the Canadian public at large. That is his job.

The Auditor General has specialists in his department. He has about 670 or 690 employees over there and he brings people in on contracts to do special types of projects. He can bring somebody in on contract to do a particular investigation or audit in a department if he sees that there is a serious problem there.

Let us make sure, as we go on with this legislation, that the Auditor General is going to play the responsible role on behalf of all Canadians in departments of government and it is not going to be delegated to someone who is going to fix up the problem and as a result the public are not going to know what dollars were lost.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to rise to speak on these amendments. It is important in any large organization that complaints of personal, sexual or other types of harassment be treated with a great deal of dispatch in an independent investigation and that there be some method of reporting back to the people involved.

Over the last period of time we have become much more sensitive to harassment in the work place. Certainly the issue of sexual harassment has become a major focus of attention, not only in government work places but also in industrial work places and places like the Armed Forces.

Sexual harassment has been pervasive within our work force for many years and has resulted in the inability of women to contribute to the maximum and to their potential in support of themselves and to the betterment of the total community. However, there are other kinds of personal harassment that this legislation would also assist.

Racial harassment in the work place, including racial harassment in government work places, is something we must all be concerned about. There have been allegations made about the National Research Council concerning the fact that people of visible minorities have been openly harassed at work and have also been harassed by not being given fair opportunity to apply for and receive promotions.

As a country we cannot afford this. We must use the talents of everybody to their maximum. Harassment in the work place takes this away and people who have a lot of skills, a lot of knowledge and a lot of expertise are not then contributing.

Racial harassment can take many forms, from open confrontation and open racial slurs to casual derogatory remarks that to the visible minorities are very hurtful but to the rest of us may seem to be rather humorous, or which we think are humorous when they are not.

It is important that these amendments go through because they do a number of things. They ensure that there shall be a commission that is independent and has the ability to report its findings and take corrective measures and that these findings will be reported back to the worker involved.

That is one of the significant things that must happen. In large bureaucracies when there has been an allegation and there has been an investigation the person involved often is told: "That is a personnel matter. That is a matter on which we cannot get back to you and tell you what is taking place". That is simply not acceptable.

It is particularly important when we take a look at some of the new powers that have been given to managers in this scheme. The more discretionary powers we give the more the people who have been harassed become frightened of making a complaint. Therefore, it is more important to build in some type of an independent commission that has these kinds of powers.

Another area we are not very sensitive to is the harassment of disabled people within the work place. People who have disabilities frequently are subject to belittlement, to crude comments or to designs of the work place that are a physical harassment because they do not allow them to function to their maximum ability within the working community.

We already heard another member talk about harassment of people who are ill. I only wish that this legislation directly applied to Canada Post. It has a horrendous record of harassment of people, particularly people who are ill. I have had a number of complaints in my riding from people who have illnesses, particularly mental health problems, and who have been systematically harassed both at work and at home about their mental illness and have been questioned about it, even with a doctor's certificate. All sorts of snide comments have been made that it is not a real illness but simply malingering, that it is a method of trying to get out of job assignments, and all sorts of things. That constitutes harassment.

Unfortunately, this legislation may not directly apply to Canada Post but it is going to be the model legislation for public corporations, particularly corporations in the federal domain. I would think it would be the model for Crown corporations in the public field, in which Canada Post is certainly a significant and major player.

I support these proposals. We all have to become much more sensitive. We have to build in mechanisms that allow for the independent review of sexual harassment and personal harassment, whether based on racial characteristics, disabilities or other things. There is personal harassment of people because of their clothing styles. It is still quite incomprehensible that in this day and age there are employees being harassed because they choose to dress slightly different than the norm of society.

An hon. member: We cannot even come in here without a tie.

Mr. Karpoff: That is true. People still report to me that they are harassed about the length of their hair. I wish I were in the position to be harassed about the length of my hair but unfortunately I am not. Young people, particularly, tell me that they still receive comments and harassment in the work place from superiors because they wear a hair-style more in keeping with the younger people in this country than with the middle-aged managers in their departments. We have to be much more sensitive about this.

These are good proposals. They include an independent commission and the responsibility to report findings and corrective measures back to the worker involved. Make sure the investigation is done by an employee of the commission, not some other nebulous person. It would be a tremendous step forward to ensuring that harassment in a workplace ceases.

Mr. Speaker: It being two o'clock p.m. the House will now proceed to Statements by Members, pursuant to Standing Order 31.

MULTICULTURALISM

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec–Est): Mr. Speaker, the Royal Bank of Canada recently published a special newsletter issue on Canada's 125th anniversary. It says that Canada has become what is called the first international nation in the world and that this remarkable cultural diversity should be viewed as a source of strength and national pride.

I am in complete agreement with that and urge the members of this House to keep working at making this cultural mosaic even better by making full use of the varied resources at our disposal. Canada is a country where every one has the right and the duty to make their difference known.

PESTICIDE CONTAINER RECYCLING

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, Canadian farmers in co-operation with agri-chemical companies, the Crop Protection Institute, federal and provincial governments and rural municipalities are speaking with action to promote environmental stewardship of the land.

One excellent example is a program where farmers bring their used pesticide containers to collection sites where they are recycled into products such as fence posts and reinforcing bars.

The University of Guelph Centre for Toxicology has tested these products and found them to be totally safe to humans and the environment.

Just a few years ago, up to 5 million chemical containers were used on farms annually. Today, in some parts of the country, up to 80 per cent of these are being returned by farmers to the sites for recycling.

This week collection sites are being set up in the maritimes and Quebec. Through the efforts of farmers and the Crop Protection Institute, what was once a disposal problem has been turned into an environmentally and economically viable solution.

CANADIAN OLYMPIC COINS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, in 1976 the Government of Canada to finance the Montreal Olympics issued $5 and $10 coins. These coins were guaranteed to be worth everything one paid for them, were always to be a good investment and were certified to be worth their face value.

The profit on the coins was retained by the government and the surplus earned on the sale of the coins was turned over to finance the games.

Again in 1988 in Calgary, the government did the same thing. The government issued $10 and $20 silver coins. The promise was the same. The coins would always be worth their face value.

These coins cannot be cashed. No one will cash them. Coin dealers will give 50 cents on the $1 for these coins. I suggest that something be done to honour Canada's reputation before our coinage becomes worthless.

CANADA 125 CELEBRATIONS

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, it is exciting to see that so many Canadians are in the mood to celebrate Canada's 125th birthday next week.

In my riding of Hamilton Mountain, a Canada 125 party I recently hosted was attended by more than 500 people.

This is a great country and we have much to celebrate.

One thing has puzzled and disturbed me and many of my constituents who have heard the song Listen to the Land, which has been chosen as the Canada 125 song. The song is very pretty but the lyrics do not contain the word "Canada". In fact, there is nothing in the lyrics to signify the song is about Canada. It could be about any country in the world or if it were still national, a great VIA Rail commercial.

It was the Minister of Communications who organized the contest to choose this song and provided the $10,000 award. I wonder if the minister would agree to have the word "Canada" inserted in the lyrics before July 1, Canada's birthday.

I want to take this opportunity to wish you, Mr. Speaker, and everyone in the House, and indeed all Canadians a very happy Canada Day.

OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY WEEK

Mr. Ricardo Lopez (Châteauguay): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. colleague from Sarnia—Lambton did yesterday, I want to stress the importance of this seventh annual Occupational Health and Safety Week, which continues until this coming Saturday, June 27.

We must not seek a competitive edge and increased productivity at the expense of the health and safety of our workers. They are our most precious resource. We must be as inventive and vigilant in protecting our employees as in preserving other vital interests. Health and safety also influence the level of prosperity and quality of life achieved by Canadians.

Labour Canada has the mandate to develop progressive policies to ensure that workers and managers carry out their occupational health and safety obligations toward each other. The Minister of Labour met with his provincial and territorial counterparts two months ago to look at the possibility of further harmonizing Canadian legislation in this area. All agreed action was urgently needed and will be paying closer attention to this national issue.

As members of Parliament, we too should exercise our influence to support any initiative aimed at improving regulations dealing for instance with building safety, dangerous substances or the handling and storage of materials. On the occasion of the Occupational Health and Safety Week—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time is up.

SAINT-JEAN-BAPTISTE DAY

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, a very popular French singer, Yves Duteil, was saying in his song La langue de chez nous, that French is "a melodious language, with wonderful words which flow through history".

On the eve of Saint-Jean-Baptiste Day, French-speaking people have good reasons to be proud. French Canadians are no longer alone in celebrating their national day. They are now joined by a growing number of francophiles like me whose mother tongue is not French. We had the good fortune of learning it and sharing it with our families.

We celebrate with pride this Canadian heritage. This is why I wish to all my friends and constituents, and all Quebecers, a merry and festive Saint-Jean-Baptiste Day.

ATLANTIC SALMON

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): While there appears to be broad and instinctive support in Canada for the concept of native self-government, there are a great many Canadians who are concerned about what that concept will ultimately mean in terms of practical applications.

Nowhere do these concerns exist more currently than among those who are committed to the conservation, indeed the preservation, of the Atlantic salmon. This magnificent resource has been declining under serious pressure by all users for many years. Despite conservation measures on all sides which have been introduced recently, the continued use of gill-nets by many native people constitutes a serious ongoing threat to the salmon's future.

Surely, the fundamental principle of self-government is one of responsibility and self-control. It is in that context that I call upon native fishermen to consider their own interests and obligations with respect to the Atlantic salmon and to voluntarily abandon gill-netting as some bands have already done in favour of a less destructive method of exercising their fishing rights.

The salmon is a symbol of our environmental integrity. Let it also become a symbol of responsible self-government by all Canadians.

TRADING CARDS

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): The Minister of National Revenue said he would stop the importation of mass murderer trading cards which outline the grisly actions of over 100 serial killers. He has failed.

These cards are currently being sold to children and adults in stores across Canada. They tell children, for example, how one man raped and killed four women, removed portions of their corpses as trophies, dressed their bodies in underclothes from his collection and photographed them.

Our obscenity laws are out of date. I call on the Minister of Justice to amend the Criminal Code along the lines of the Supreme Court Butler decision to deal with the presence in Canada of violent and sexually violent materials, not just their importation.

Consensual sex itself is not obscene, but violence, murder, degradation and dehumanization is, with or without sex.

What will the government do about the violent images that have become an ordinary part of our children's lives?

CANADIAN SIKH COMMUNITY

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): I have a letter from the World Sikh Organization of Canada referring to the National Alliance of Canadian Sikhs. I would like to quote from that letter: "The interference from the minister of multiculturalism in our community is truly appalling. Such an act is common in the Third World, but in a civilized country like Canada it should not happen. It undermines our credibility as a nation."

• (1410)

"The World Sikh Organization has represented Sikhs since 1984 without any grants or subsidies, either provincial or federal. This in itself is proof that we are truly representative of our community. Sikhs believe in the World Sikh Organization enough that they are willing to pay from their pockets to keep us running".

"After spending $130,000 of taxpayers' money, Mr. Weiner calls the alliance the principal organization of Sikhs. This is an insult to our community. We are being approached by Sikhs in all walks of life to seek your support to advise the minister of multiculturalism to stop his unwarranted interference". It is signed by Ram Chahal.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, on this eve of Quebec day and, shortly, Canada Day, I wish all my constituents in Abitibi merry celebrations.

May these celebrations be evidence of fraternity and unity, allowing us to share our pride of being Quebecers and Canadians. Filled with pride for our identity, let us look toward the future with confidence and optimism.

BREAST CANCER

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, every two hours in Canada a woman dies from breast cancer. More than 14,000 Canadian women will be diagnosed with breast cancer this year and more than 5,000 will lose their lives to this disease.

Despite these grim statistics, many questions remain about the disease such as, what causes it, how best to detect it and how best to treat it.

I therefore welcome last week's breast cancer report by status of women sub-committee which calls on governments, the medical community and the general public to answer these questions. Finding these answers must become a national goal and a national challenge because breast cancer affects not only women, but also their families, communities and indeed the whole country.

I urge the government to adopt the principles of the sub-committee report on breast cancer and to support my private member's motion which calls on the government to take effective action against breast cancer.

SHOP CANADA DAY

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, thanks to the initiative of the Thunder Bay Chamber of Commerce, its president, Dick Dolphin, its executive director, Rebecca Johnson, and all of their out-shopping committee and thanks to the members of this House for their gracious consent, Saturday, July 4, 1992 has been proclaimed Shop Canada Day.

This is a great opportunity for all retailers, large and small, in Canada through advertising to invite their customers to shop at home on July 4. Let me suggest to all retailers in this country that they run a trailer in all their advertisements reminding Canadians to shop on July 4 in Canada.

Today, I will be asking Eaton's and Simpsons, the largest retailers in Canada, to incorporate that in their advertisements.

This is a great opportunity for all Canadians to work together to make Shop Canada Day a success and make all Canadians think about shopping at home.

Let us protect Canadian industries. Let us protect our retailers in Canada. Above all, let us protect those jobs that those retail industries will bring to our country.

MILTON POST OFFICE

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, there was a time when members of Parliament had a lot to say about the affairs of the post office.

In most rural areas the post office was the one direct and visual link between the people and the Government of Canada. Naturally MPs took strong notice of constituents' concerns regarding postal issues. Most rural MPs still do. Certainly I do.

Canada Post has been a Crown corporation since 1981, operating increasingly at arm's length from government. Canada Post officials say they have removed politics from the post office.

Nevertheless, the people in rural and small-town Canada still expect their MPs to be able to do something and influence decisions regarding the post office. That is why 650 residents of Milton have written to me during the past week with a plea that I save their post office.

I took that plea to officials of Canada Post who listened but who will not budge from their unpopular conversion policy. In the case of Milton, a centrally located and convenient post office will be replaced by an inconveniently located RPO on the edge of town.

People in Milton are mad and dissatisfied and I urge Canada Post to reconsider this bad decision.

DRUGS AND PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, when Bill C-22, the amendment to the Patent Act, was passed in 1987, the government and the multinational drug companies pledged to create jobs and to hold down drug prices.

They have done neither. They no longer talk about the promised 3,000 research jobs which have not materialized. In fact 700 jobs have been lost in drug manufacturing. The cost of drugs has risen faster than any other component of health care costs.

Where do the Liberals stand on Bill C-91 tabled in this House today that will kill the uniquely Canadian generic drug industry? Their consumer spokesperson stated this morning that he supported the prices review board which approved all these inflationary drug prices and increases for multinational drug companies.

Who is the chief spokesperson and lobbyist for the multinational drug companies? None other than Judy Erola, former Liberal Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. That is like making the shepherd the spokesperson for the wolves.

PROFESSIONAL WOMEN

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, while women professionals have made great strides in establishing their abilities in a number of professions, they have been less successful in achieving substantial progress in the engineering field.

The proposal to build institutions for women offenders across Canada provides a unique opportunity to address this problem and encourage women engineers and architects.

My proposal is that women engineers and architects be given special consideration when selecting professional services for the design and construction of these institutions for women.

I urge the Solicitor General to take careful note of this request and act upon it. Otherwise women engineers and architects will not achieve the advances they deserve.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, Parliament rises today and will remain in recess until such time as Your Honour calls us back for matters relating to the Constitution, whether it be a referendum or other business dealing with proposals.

I say to every member in this House and to every Canadian that this is a time of reality and a time of coming to grips with yet another challenge in Canadian history. It should be looked at as another challenge because we have had many in the past.

From now until such time as we return, let us consider the examples set by great statesmen like Baldwin and Lafontaine in the years leading up to Confederation, George-Etienne Cartier and Macdonald, the Fathers of Confederation in 1867, and all responsible MPs who have sat in this House over the years.

Let us also remember, as we come down to the constitutional discussions this summer and fall, that common sense, decency, fairness, flexibility, the love of nationhood, and loyalty and dedication to Canada must stand foremost and out front.

That should be the objective of each and every one of us in this Parliament of Canada as we work together to try to blend a good constitutional arrangement for the future of Canada.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, the people of Sarnia—Lambton have always exhibited three basic qualities: optimism, confidence and pride.

In our community, the discussions on the Constitution have been no different. First and foremost, my constituents are proud to be Canadians. The deliberations under the Sarnia—Lambton constituent assembly are a good example.

My constituents are also optimistic that a constitutional deal can be reached. They are confident that in the end, we will pull together as a people and as a country.

Today, on behalf of my constituents, I rise to express thanks to all parties involved, especially to the Prime Minister and the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs. I thank them for their unrelenting resolve and leadership in reaching a negotiated settlement.

To the provinces, aboriginal groups and other participants, I also thank them for their commitment and determination for bringing about meaningful and lasting constitutional change.

TRIBUTE TO HOUSE OF COMMONS PAGES

Mr. Speaker: I would like to make a statement about our pages.

All members will agree that these young people have diligently fulfilled their duty over the year. Their dedication and hard work reflect well on the rest of our Canadian youth. Parliamentary pages are the ambassadors of youth on the Hill and they served it well.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

Since this is the last day of the session and there is still a great deal of uncertainty about the constitutional future of this country, could the Prime Minister give the House the assurance that any agreement his government will try to conclude will contain two very important components that were supported by this House? I am referring to a strong economic union in Canada and the preservation and promotion of the linguistic duality of our country, two aspects that were emphasized by Parliament and which we absolutely want to see in the constitutional agreement we hope to obtain very shortly.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs happens to be working on obtaining these two provisions, among other things. I am referring to the two clauses relating to economic union and linguistic duality, which would in any event be major clauses in any constitutional agreement.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister on the subject of a strong economic union in Canada. Constitutional negotiation cannot be a one-way street going in the direction of devolution. If we want to face a strong future for all Canada, we need to make sure that the movement of people, goods, capital and services will be protected and enhanced in the new Constitution.

Could the Prime Minister give a clear assurance to the House of Commons that the notion of a strong economic union to strengthen the federation will be part of the negotiations and the results of the negotiations in the days to come?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the Leader of the Opposition knows, we have been seeking to obtain this kind of a clause precisely because of the difficulties my hon. friend has indicated that he encountered himself 10 years ago when we failed to incorporate this kind of clause in the Constitution in 1981–82.

I say that recognizing that my hon. friend tried to have it achieved. Unfortunately it was rejected at that time. We have made some improvements and we are going to try to make certain that the concept of an economic union will be accepted.

Obviously there is something bizarre when there are fewer trade barriers existing in Europe among 12 sovereign countries than there are among 10 Canadian provinces and two territories.

Canadians seem to be all in favour of liberalization of trade outside but not within our own boundaries. It does not make a great deal of sense that a company from Toronto would, for example, have to dig up bricks that were put in a street in the Outaouais, in Hull, because they did not meet certain provincial requirements. This is destructive of productivity. It is destructive of enhancing our competitiveness.

The provinces have to understand themselves. They talk about one Canada. One way they can strengthen one Canada is by lowering trade barriers within Canada.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I agree entirely with the Prime Minister. It is what we have always said. It would have been more logical to have an economic union within Canada before having one with the United States and Mexico.

In order to achieve this goal that we all share in the House of Commons, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question. Does he agree with the opposition that if the people of Canada were to be consulted in a national referendum they would tell the premiers and those who oppose a real economic union in Canada that they are wrong, that we need one in Canada and that the best way is to consult the Canadian people in a national referendum?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons why the government brought in legislation in respect of a referendum was precisely to keep open for Parliament that option in the event that the premiers or the first ministers failed to agree on methods of strengthening Canada and strengthening our Constitution including the economic union.

As my hon. friend knows, I have not set aside at all any of the possibilities. I will be meeting with the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs, with Mr. Tellier and with others over the next couple of days. I will be consulting with the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the NDP. We will take whatever actions are appropriate to do what most of us in this House—not all, there are a few exceptions—want to do and what most Canadians want to do.

They want to keep Canada and they want the economy modernized. As well they want the Constitution modernized, brought up to date for 1992.

Mr. Chrétien: They want to be consulted.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says that they want to be consulted. Indeed I think he would acknowledge there has been historic consultation in the process so far. No doubt we could do more, but most of all the objective is to strengthen Canada, to maintain Canada, and to promote and strengthen the unity of Canada.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, this side of the House shares with the Prime Minister the desire to see a true economic union in Canada. It has been an essential element in our position on the Constitution from the very beginning.

So it has been for many governments in the past. There have been governments after governments, not just 10 years ago but for most of Canada's 125 years, that have asked for or sought a true economic union in our country.

Could the Prime Minister state whether that is a basic position of his government on completing the constitutional talks? Is he committing his government to that requirement? If so, could he tell the House which of the provinces have now agreed to a true economic union in our country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think I have indicated that many people including the Leader of the Opposition have regretted the fact that among the weaknesses of the 1981–82 arrangement was the absence of this kind of economic union clause.

When we brought forward our proposals, I think on September 23 or September 28 last, they contained recommendations in regard to an economic union. They then found their way into the Beaudoin–Dobbie report. We have been building on this, trying to persuade the provinces of not only the value but the indispensable nature of lowering barriers to trade among Canadians.

That has been our objective. The Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs and Mr. Tellier are out today doing precisely that.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, I do not recall that in the Meech Lake proposals there was any such commitment on the part of the government.

Let me ask the Prime Minister this. He himself has drawn attention to the rapidity with which Europe is moving toward a single market. Here in North America this government has committed itself to a North American free trade agreement with enforceable provisions.

Is it his commitment to the Canadian people that in seeking a true economic union in Canada there will be provision for its enforcement through an internal trade tribunal or some other device to ensure compliance with a true economic union in our country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can tell my hon. friend that I certainly would not be opposed in any way to that kind of concept.

I find it very strange indeed that provincial premiers would be asking, for example, for some jurisdiction in international trade. They want to play a larger role in international trade. I can understand their request, but they turn around the next day and are disinclined even to lower barriers from one province to another.

It is a kind of advanced thinking in respect of international trade but very parochial thinking in some cases in regard to trade among provinces in Canada.

My hon. friend says that the Meech Lake proposals did not contain an economic union clause. He is quite right. As he will remember, the premiers met in August 1986 in Edmonton. The premiers requested the Quebec round designed specifically to bring Quebec back into the signing of the Constitution.

This was a course of action that was encouraged by the Leader of the Opposition in December 1984 when he strongly advised me to begin negotiating with Quebec with a view to bringing Quebec back into the Constitution. That is exactly what we sought to do. It was for that reason there was no economic union clause at that time. Obviously this is something we should continue to fight for and it is part and parcel of our constitutional objectives.

HEALTH CARE

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I believe every Canadian is aware of the great crisis our health care system is in, both as we see funding cut back and increased demand.

I want to ask the Prime Minister, given that just before the Canada–U.S. trade deal this government introduced Bill C-22 limiting generic drug availability in this country, why now, just before the NAFTA talks may be concluded, this government insists on increasing the limitations on competition for generic drug companies. Why is this government introducing legislation that would undermine further the ability of provinces and territories to finance their drug plans and subsequently their universal health care system?

I want to ask the government why it has chosen once again to favour multinational corporations over the health care of citizens of this country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I announced on January 14 of this year our intention to comply with the proposal in the Dunkel paper on the GATT talks which provided for the elimination of compulsory licences for all member states.

Canada has been out of step with the rest of the world as the only industrialized country which did have a compulsory licensing system. It was the proposal of Mr. Dunkel to see this eliminated as part of the freedom of trade in products based on patents.

We have seen a delay in the GATT negotiations but we believe it is important, since we are in a very competitive world, to attract this type of high quality, high R and D, high value-added investment to Canada and in that way create jobs and economic growth and welfare in Canada. That is important to our country.

It is on that basis that we decided to proceed to eliminate any lack of understanding or lack of confidence that could be perceived and in that way ensure that the $320 million worth of investments that have been committed for Canada would indeed come to Canada.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

This country has seen cutbacks by the federal government to health care that have resulted in a loss of jobs in the health care professions across this country and in health care services.

On January 15 the minister said that if the price of drugs increased faster than the rate of inflation this would kill the health insurance system.

Well, that is exactly what happened. According to a report by Green Shield in Ontario, the price of drugs manufactured by multinationals has increased 11.4 per cent since 1987. My question for the minister is this: What will the minister of health do to prevent his predictions from coming true?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think the report to which the leader of the New Democratic Party referred, the Green Shield report, includes the salaries of pharmacists in the price of drugs. I think we should put this report in perspective like all the other reports that have been mentioned.

As for the price of drugs, the Department of Industry, Science and Technology believes that the bill tabled today represents an increase of practically zero per cent for this year and up to 2 per cent by the year 2000. I think the bill tabled today is a commitment.

Furthermore, last week I gave the health ministers the assurance that everything would be done to guarantee a reasonable price, and that is what we did after Bill C–22, a bill the hon. member severely criticized, but in the final instance the hon. member must admit today that the government was right. Canadians know we will apply the same procedures.

As the minister of health, I do not expect prices to increase beyond what is reasonable.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister.

I am surprised that the minister is not concerned that under the current rules the generic drug industry has saved the Canadian health care system $1 billion a year, $1 billion which is so badly needed by the health care system in this country. The provinces of Ontario, Saskatchewan, Nova Scotia and British Columbia have already commented that this legislation will cost them hundreds of millions of dollars a year.

The government says it does not have choices in health care. The government does have choices in health care. It is true that the generic drug industry has helped keep prices to the consumer down.

Why does the government insist on supporting multinationals instead of those most vulnerable in our society, the sick and the elderly who need to have reasonable drug prices?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada supports research and development. It is a little different from what she said. Second, I will give her real figures.

Listen to me. The difference between the drug industry, the pharmaceuticals, the innovative drugs and the generic drugs is about $300 million a year; $225 million is for off-patent drugs which will continue tomorrow as today. It means that we have $75 million and half of that $75 million is covered by the health care system. It means about a $30 million increase for all the provinces in Canada.

Do you not believe, Mr. Speaker, that we need to encourage research and development of drugs in Canada for that $30 million? I believe it is a very good deal for Canadians.

TRADE

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade. Ten days ago, the President of Mexico announced in Rio that he would seek to conclude not only a free trade agreement but also a common market with Brazil.

What would the effect of such initiatives be for Canada in its agreement with the United States and Mexico?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, our first objective is to complete negotiations with Mexico and the United States to complete a North American free trade agreement.

If following that there is interest from other countries, whether it is Brazil or Chile, which are two countries that have indicated some interest in this, then that is a step we could contemplate at that time. Our first objective is to complete the negotiations with the United States and Mexico.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, the minister is not responding to my question. On the other hand, he is being consistent.

Two weeks ago the Prime Minister was unable to comment on how new country accession would occur within the North American free trade agreement. Three weeks ago the Minister for Science was not aware of the significance of Chile's initiatives with the United States and Mexico. Latin American governments are on the move and it is very clear that this government has lost control of the agenda.

So that Canadians might better judge the Mexican agreement, will the government undertake to provide them, prior to signing NAFTA, with a paper setting out its trade agenda for all of Latin America, if indeed, it has one?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am quite happy to respond to my hon. friend's questions when he has a question to which I can respond. When he asks hypothetical questions, it is difficult to come up with a response that will meet his requirements.

He asks a question that indicates he is supportive of the North American free trade agreement being completed and being extended to countries like Brazil and Chile. As we have indicated before in this House, there is a good possibility that we might in future negotiations increase the free trade zone to other countries. At this stage it is important for us to simply contemplate the terms of the one negotiation before going further.

Clearly a free trade zone that encompassed these other countries that are going through a reform similar to what Mexico has done do deserve the support of countries like Canada.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Earlier today the government tabled legislation which effectively puts an end to compulsory drug licensing in Canada, a system which has saved Canadian consumers up to $1 billion annually on the cost of prescription medications.

At the very time that this government has been lecturing provincial governments about spiralling health care costs, how could it possibly justify introducing legislation which certainly will lead to higher health care costs in the provinces?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, the report of the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board, PMPRB, was tabled in Parliament earlier today. It reports that last year, as in the previous five years, the price increase for patented medicines was under 3 per cent, 1.5 per cent less than the Consumer Price Index. This shows that the system in place has kept patented medicine prices for which we are responsible from increasing.

Furthermore, the new government policy announced today is that beyond the $1.1 billion in investment obtained since 1987, the increase last year alone of nearly 24 per cent more investment in Canada means $2 billion in investment for Canadian drug companies over the next five years. That means jobs and better medication for people in hospitals. It is a plus for Canada and Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

It is very clear that this government has the support of the multinational drug industry in eliminating compulsory licences in Canada. What is less sure, however, is whether or not this government has the support of the provincial health care ministers in doing the same thing.

I want to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if he has the support of the provinces of Ontario, Manitoba and Nova Scotia in eliminating compulsory licences, thereby increasing provincial health care costs.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I informed the ministers of health in Canada about the policy and of course the ministers had questions. I said that during the summer, particularly on the 25th and 26th at the deputy ministers' level, we will have meetings to determine exactly the conditions that the provinces would like to see put in the legislation to be sure that we will have control of the legislation.

The provinces will support it when they are sure that the recommendations they made will be considered. But by and large, we do not make recommendations before the legislation is tabled in this country.

BREAST IMPLANTS

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, we had questions last week about information the Ministry of National Health and Welfare had in 1989 calling for action on breast implants and this government's failure to act.

I have in my hand a document which shows clear alarm in the department of medical devices in 1987, five years ago, five years of pain and suffering for women with defective implants.

Will the minister admit the failure of his ministry to act for Canadian women facing the need for implants or for those more particularly who already have had implants?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I could provide as many documents as the member does, but I will not because all the documents we have on breast implants have already been tabled.

We know the way the department works. I will answer at the same time the fallacies raised by the member for Hamilton East last week about that. I would like to correct what she said.

The Department of National Health and Welfare makes decisions at the bureaucratic level on whether or not to accept certain kinds of implants. The decision is not made by the minister. At no time were documents presented to the then minister to make a decision. It was made by the officials of the department, on scientific evidence, as it always is done.

All documents are provided to the people who make the decision at the departmental level. So do not say that the documents go to the minister for a decision. It never happened.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I never said that the document went to the minister. I said his department had failed. I asked him to admit that his department had failed.

Last Friday, the Minister of State for Employment and Immigration said that this government did not want to deal with the past but wanted to deal with the present and the future. Yet we have women in provinces in this country today who are unable to get the help they need to deal with failed implants. We have had not one, not two, but three Ministers of National Health and Welfare, successive ministers, who have failed to act while these women suffered. Will the minister tell us that he will ensure a woman's ability to get implants removed without having to depend on her own pocket-book and not depending on whether or not her implant was cosmetic?

Second, will the minister tell us what arrangements were made at last week's provincial health ministers meeting to ensure that Canadian women will get the care they so badly need?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the member knows very well that the silicone gel breast implant was removed from the market last January and the ban was imposed and maintained since last April.

Ms. Langan: But not on our bodies.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): I want to deal with that issue in the best way I can. If the member wants to listen to me, that is exactly what we are trying to do. We have put forward different studies since April. She knows that the report I received from Dr. Baines' committee asked for many recommendations which we are trying to follow in order to give women in Canada the best guarantee on any kind of breast implant. As long as we do not have the assurance, we will not permit its use again.

In the meantime, women who have already had breast implants will be asked to report to their physician. We are looking to the physicians and doctors offices as the best way to answer any questions women have. This is what we want to do and I know it is what the member wants done. If the member wants to work with me and the department, we will certainly give her the answer. Once again, it is not in the way the member works that we will find the answer.

TRADE

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade and concerns the negotiations with the United States and Mexico.

On May 12, in answer to a question from my colleague from Saint-Léonard, the minister told the House that he was trying to improve the Canadian position in the textile and clothing sectors.

He said: "The basis on which we are negotiating —is to have a special access to the United States market which would be greater than the access provided under the free trade agreement".

Has the minister been able to obtain better access for the textile and clothing sectors?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend is aware of the status of the negotiations. We are not satisfied nor is the clothing sector satisfied with the current state of the negotiations. That is why we continue to press for greater access than has been offered at this point.

We will continue to do that, working closely in consultation with both the clothing and the textile sectors in order to ensure that there is balance also between these two segments of industry which are so closely interrelated.

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, the minister says he is not satisfied with the current state of negotiations. He knows that the mistakes that he made in the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement are coming back to haunt him today.

I would ask the minister to state categorically that he will not sign a North American free trade agreement which would mean a further restriction of Canada's ability to export clothing to the United States.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend refers to the FTA. I think that there are some segments in the clothing sector that have made considerable strides in developing the improved access that they have from the FTA into increased business. There are a number of companies in his region that would qualify for that description.

We will continue to improve as best we can the access that is there, as I said working closely with the industry as well as with the textile sector, which is also an important industry in his province and in that way try to get the best possible deal that we can for those two industries.

NCC GREENBELT

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Public Works. The greenbelt lands here in the nation's capital were created in the 1960s by the federal government to protect environmentally sensitive lands, to limit urban sprawl, and to enhance the nation's capital. Recent actions by the National Capital Commission have Nepean and other area municipalities concerned that there is movement away from the original objectives for these lands.

Does this government plan on maintaining the status quo on all greenbelt lands or are these lands in fact up for sale piece by piece?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to inform the member for Nepean, whose interest I greatly appreciate in these matters, that the NCC as she probably knows is conducting a major review on the greenbelt to re-examine and redefine the use of the lands, and to ensure these lands continue to enhance the quality of life of the national capital into the next century.

Any changes that will be made on a case by case basis will be looked at closely and all levels of government and affected residents will be consulted. I can assure her there is no drastic change contemplated. We continue to exercise the most careful stewardship over these lands.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, to the same minister. I have here a letter which clearly reflects the wishes of the majority of the people in this region and it states: "We do not want the greenbelt lands severed and sold for residential and commercial development". Can the minister give a clear undertaking to this House here today that this will not happen in the national capital region?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I can certainly identify with those sentiments. I want to assure my colleague again that any such steps affecting these lands will be taken after close examination on a case by case basis, after close consultation with all levels of government, and with adjacent owners.

I see no likelihood of any of these lands being severed and sold for residential purposes except in perhaps very exceptional circumstances. I certainly do not endorse such a policy.

OLYMPIC COINS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization. The government has known for a long time the banks will not accept the Olympic coins issued at the time of the 1976 Olympics or the 1988 Olympics for their face value or in any way at all.

These coins were issued, as the minister knows, on the undertaking by the government that the coins were true coins of the realm, they would always be worth their face value. They were issued at a premium but they would always be worth their face value as a good investment. Is the government prepared to redeem these coins at face value?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, as the member knows because he has been kept right up to date, this matter is actively being pursued by the Department of Finance. I can assure him however that the stability of the Canadian currency is not based on the value of Olympic coins.

FISHERIES

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and relates to the fact that the deputy minister negotiated with aboriginal nations in British Columbia a number of co-management agreements in the fishing industry. The deputy then reneged on those agreements and has refused to meet with the aboriginal nations concerned.

Would the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans order the deputy minister to go to British Columbia to meet with those aboriginal nations, to complete those fisheries co-management agreements, and then honour them?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the assumptions or suggestions of fact contained in that question.

The Deputy Minister of Fisheries and the Assistant Deputy Minister of Fisheries were both in British Columbia last week. They have done a first-class job of conciliating and dealing with the various conflicting interests in the fishery in British Columbia, including the aboriginal peoples.

They will meet with aboriginal leaders from time to time as that is required. I certainly have no intention of issuing such instructions on such unspecifics. The member's question lacks all specificity and all decency and all truth.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, perhaps to offer some specifics, the minister will be well aware that the Shuswap Nation in the interior of British Columbia has operated for the past 10 years in good faith with the co-operative management programs of the department.

They just learned from the deputy minister that their fisheries program which is funding for fish stock production and enhancement activities will be cut by in excess of $1 million this fiscal year. This will put their entire fisheries program in jeopardy and make it impossible for their hatchery, which was a training hatchery, to be able to continue.

On those two specifics would the minister indicate a willingness at least to meet with representatives of the Shuswap Nation to discuss these cuts and the implications this would have in terms of their future co-management production?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately or fortunately, we have disciplines imposed upon us with respect to the amount of money that is available for various purposes so we cannot always spend all of the money on good causes that we would like to spend.

However, we do not spend our time straddling every issue. It is a miracle to see how the NDP are such expert straddlers. On the one hand they are supporters of the aboriginal interests and on the other hand whenever there is any complaint from any other conflicting interest or the fishery, they write to me and support the other conflicting interest too. Get your act together.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

HOUSING

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

It has been encouraging to note that housing industry activity in Canada has been increasing in recent months. For example, at the end of the last period, May 31, for the first five months this year housing starts were just over 52,000, whereas a year ago at this time they were under 40,000. We have a long way to go to recover the pre-recession levels of housing activity in this country, but we have a good start.

I would like to ask the minister if the measures which were introduced to stimulate housing earlier this year have had an impact and, if so, which of the two, the 95 per cent mortgage or the RRSP funding, has been most effective.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to inform my colleague that there is some good news from the housing sector these days. There is more to be done of course but some of these measures have had a noticeable effect.

I guess the most encouraging one would be the 5 per cent down payment provision, the first-home buyer's loan provision, which since February has resulted in about 30,000 such purchases, about 1,000 in Nova Scotia and about 800 in the province of New Brunswick. The encouraging thing is that a survey done by Canada Mortgage and Housing shows that about 75 per cent of these transactions would not have occurred without this program.

Another thing that is encouraging is the budgetary measure involving the RRSPs which also has been positive but which is not as easy to quantify.

Of course the most beneficial policy of all, as the House knows, has been the unprecedented low rate of inflation and interest rates which have contributed greatly to housing in this country and have made homes much more affordable.

FISHERIES

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

On May 4 at the Standing Committee of Fisheries and Oceans the minister stated a number of times that the safety and effectiveness of wharfs was his top priority. Since that time little has been done in my riding of Egmont or, indeed, in Prince Edward Island.

Given the serious state of disrepair of wharfs like Tignish Run and Miminigash and the need for dredging at wharfs like Howards Cove and Milligan's Shore, can the minister assure the fishermen at these ports that emergency work will be carried out immediately?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman's question sounded like a line from an Irish Rover song. Luckily I happen to have on hand a report on the Howards Cove, Miminigash, Milligan's Shore, and Tignish wharfs. I must be psychic.

We have 90 projects at over 50 harbours in P.E.I. and we will spend in excess of $2.6 million. I do not have much time. At Howards Cove the harbour basin dredging has begun. At Miminigash the breakwater reconstruction project is in the engineering stage. A public tender should be called in August.

Your colleagues are shouting me down so I have to stop.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I probably should insist on this going on the Order Paper but the hon. member has a very short supplemental.

• (1500)

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the very generous leprechaun, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

I am sure he is aware that a few years ago a number of fishermen lost their lives at Alberton because of the lack of dredging and the lack of response to requests to have dredging done. I am sure like myself the minister would not like to see that action recur.

Can the minister say today before the House rises—he can give me the date after Question Period—when this work will be done?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, with reference to Milligan's Shore, we are hoping to fund the dredging required there within the budget of the region. We will have a survey of the required dredging available by the end of June.

A reconstruction project at the Tignish co-op wharf would cost in excess of $2 million and there is little probability I can fund it in the near future, unless somebody provides me with more money than it looks at the moment they are going to provide me.

SENIORS INDEPENDENCE PROGRAMS

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In February 1988 the government made a commitment to spend $120 million over five years on seniors independence programs. After five years we see the government has spent just over half of what it had promised.

Why has the government cut back on these independence programs? I ask the minister if the programs will be continued and if the funding will be continued.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, our government respects its commitments. This independence program for seniors has been supported for nearly five years. So that groups could present projects that could be spread over two or three years, I asked Treasury Board to carry forward $3.5 million until 1993-94. There have been no cuts in program funding. We have wonderful programs and projects and we will always continue to support the energy, assertiveness and will to act of Canada's seniors.

CREDIT CARDS

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

The bank rate now stands at 5.91 per cent.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rodriguez: The average credit card interest rate is 17.5 per cent, more than three times the bank rate.

Some hon. members: Shame, shame.

Mr. Rodriguez: Is the minister prepared to call in the heads of Canada's largest financial institutions and instruct them to lower the interest rates on credit cards, or is he prepared to let them enjoy the music of: "Oh, what a friend we have in Pierre"?

Mr. Shields: Don't borrow on your credit card.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, although the hon. member did not mention it, I think that the committee on consumer and corporate affairs will table its report on credit cards today. I received a preliminary copy of this document.

I find it too bad that my colleague from Nickel Belt again wanted to be the black sheep by not signing the report, which could have been unanimous. I will have to study both reports, the one from the committee and the one from the hon. member for Nickel Belt. I will soon have the time to examine the recommendations made to the government. I think that the committee did an excellent job and we will be back shortly to respond to its recommendations.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to the attention of members the presence in the gallery of the Hon. John Burdett, member of the Legislative Council of the Parliament of South Australia.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

POINT OF ORDER

TABLING OF DOCUMENT

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order to ask leave of the House. During Question Period the minister said that he had tabled all documentation regarding breast implants.

I believe the document that I referred to has not been tabled and I would ask for leave or unanimous consent to table it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for that?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): I do not have any problem with that.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There seems to be consent for the document to be tabled.

COPYRIGHT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Frank Oberle (for the Minister of Communications) moved that Bill C-88, an Act to amend the Copyright Act, be now read the second time and referred to a legislative committee of the Departmental envelope.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to speak this afternoon on this bill to amend the Copyright Act. You know that my colleague, the Minister of Communications and myself share different responsibilities regarding intellectual property and I follow very closely this whole issue of copyright and this legislation at second reading today.

However, before discussing this bill in detail I would like to say a word about the context of this bill. Four years ago the members of this House passed a reform of the Copyright Act which had not been amended in any significant way since 1921. In so doing we confirmed the judicial recognition of the exclusive right of the author to authorize the use of his work and to profit from it, as is fitting, since the very object of the legislation is to protect creative activities.

Evidently the copyright concept has changed considerably in the last 20 years. Originally it only included printed works but technology largely contributed to expand this concept. However, technical progress has not only changed the concept and the scope of copyright but also the relation between the creator and the user. It is with this reality in mind that our government undertook to revise the Copyright Act. So while having the fundamental objective of protecting creators the legislation also tries to create a fair balance between the parties.

The bill that will be read for the second time today reflects the efforts made by this government to ensure that the importance of copyright and intellectual property in general be adequately recognized. Among other things this bill changes the definition of musical work.

Under this technical change, any work of music or musical composition, with or without words, is musical work.

[English]

As previously defined a musical work consisted of any combination of melody and harmony, or either of them, printed, reduced to writing or otherwise graphically produced or reproduced.

This definition has a very limited scope as it could effectively reduce a musical work to a simple piece of paper. This purely technical amendment is necessary to clarify a situation that has proven to be unfair to authors and composers of musical works.

[Translation]

In this sense the amendments tabled by the government this morning complement the ones that were made following the signature of the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States on February 13, 1989.

• (1510)

Indeed, I remind the hon. members that under article 2006 both countries had to amend their Copyright Act regarding cable systems. This provision, as you will recall, provided for a right of remuneration for any retransmission of distant radio or television signals. This right came into effect in Canada in January 1990.

At the same time, Canada made other amendments to the Copyright Act which include substituting the right to broadcast for the right to communicate with the public through telecommunication. Indeed, it had become urgent and essential to redefine musical work. Thanks to this new definition, SOCAN will be better able to collect on behalf of authors and composers royalties for performance and communication of their musical work.

[English]

The tabling of this technical amendment demonstrates the commitment of the Government of Canada to ensure, with the least possible delay, fair and equitable compensation to song writers and composers for the use of their musical works.

Consequently, cable system companies will have to pay SOCAN retransmission rights for specialized and payable services such as Much Music, First Choice, Family Channel and others.

[English]

As for other kinds of uses, it is the Copyright Board that will decide the amount of money to be paid after full and open hearings in which the users, as well as creators, have the chance to explain their points of view.

Moreover, this bill reflects through various provisions the distinction made in the act between the right for the performance in public of works as well as the communication to the public by telecommunication of works. These new provisions will only take effect once the bill receives royal proclamation.

[English]

In conclusion, this amendment is designed to bring immediate benefit to Canadian authors and composers. I would also point out that proceeding with this amendment now will in no way delay this government's commitment to bringing forward the proposed phase 2 amendments to the Copyright Act.

Phase 2 drafting is proceeding as planned and the consultative committee that I announced with the Minister of Communications on March 27, 1991 will start working as soon as possible.

This is a technical bill which will enable us to regulate a situation which is often referred to as a hole in the legislation. It will enable authors and composers to get a fair treatment before we get to all the details contained in the amendments to the Copyright Act.

I therefore ask my colleagues from both sides of this House to pass this legislation quickly which I think is only fair and reasonable. It will not deprive anybody of any right, but will rather regulate a situation that was deplorable.

[English]

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I want to say to the minister opposite who has just deposited the bill, along with his colleague the Minister of Communications, that he gave a very clear and succinct perspective to a drafting error that was committed.

There are not many people out there who are interested in copyright. In any event, the assistant House leader knows all about copyright, but I can tell him that there are not a great number of people out there who are totally interested in intellectual property in this refined small sector although it is a vital and important sector. As a matter of fact I think it brings in about $8 million at this moment. It is of importance to a small and select and very important sector of our society.

I am really very pleased to speak to this bill and support the amendment that is being proposed after we have had hearings. I was most pleased to hear the minister say, right up front and very straightforwardly, that this technical error that was committed will be addressed in committee with a full hearing of interested and involved parties. This will include restaurants and cable people and I believe a whole series of bars, et cetera, which are concerned with the economic impact of this bill. As well, there is the effect that it might have on some legal proceedings that we have been told are a paragon of neutrality in terms of the way this bill has been written. That comes from the department staff and I would believe that they would not mislead us with respect to the concerns of the television people about their proceedings before the court.

It is a very short bill. It is not going to answer the huge second phase that so many people have been waiting for since 1987. This is not part of the exemption section that we need for many other aspects of copyright or intellectual property.

As I said, the bill is to correct a drafting error or an omission that was made when amendments to the implementation of retransmission rights were before the House as part of changes made after the 1988 free trade agreement. This technical drafting error has to do with the redefinition of a musical work. It changes the 1924 definition that did not include the transmission right itself, only what you printed on paper, in essence.

So unfortunately we have been penalizing copyright owners and creators. They have not been able to earn royalties on some of their songs that are carried by cable systems because they are linked to satellites or to other delivery systems into our homes, as different from off-air or non-broadcast things.

To give an example, composer Hagood Hardy's work, The Homecoming or Luc Plamondon's songs which are carried on CTV or Quatre Saisons and are very popular, receive a performance royalty. Bryan Adams, who is a popular English-speaking song writer, if you look at what happens to his works with Rogers Cable or Videotron, on the one hand, versus PBS and NBC on the other, he earns a royalty on a cable retransmitted distant signal, and for those in copyright land they know that as a retransmission right. So that seems to be okay.

However, Roch Voisine, who is, by the way, at the top of the charts in France, an incredible earner for Canada and a very productive song writer as well as performer, if you look at his Héléne and Pourtant and Avant de partir which are carried on Videotron by Musiqueplus or on CF-Cable by Much Music, earns no royalties. I think anyone who listens to music and appreciates the intellectual vigour and the competence that is displayed in this intellectual property, would understand that this is not fair. They would expect this artist to earn a decent living out of the creative works that are appreciated by so many people.

The reason he is not collecting royalties is because of the unclear wording that is in the Copyright Act, and so this is why this small minor amendment has been brought in.

There are cable companies that are arguing that they are following the Copyright Act which defines musical works as "those printed, reduced to printing or otherwise graphically produced or reproduced". It is sound on the telecommunications aspect. Well, you and I know that telecommunications today is the most pervasive force in our society and that is how it is transmitted, and it's only fair that we should make that correction.

I support what we are doing here and hope that this omission that will be addressed here in this Bill C-88 is favourably received and will move forward so that non-broadcasting services or satellite-to-cable services, which are being carried presently by Much Music, Musiqueplus, First Choice, Premier Choix YTV, Le Canal Famille, Super Channel and Super Écran will now have to pay copyright royalties to the rightful copyright owner, be it the composer, the author or the music publisher.

The position of our party is that we give serious and positive consideration to this bill and that it be referred to committee; that we hear from all of those who are impacted upon by this bill. We believe that because of past drafting errors that this committee study is key. It would be our hope that there will not have any further errors of this nature.

There are retail stores, restaurants, bars and the CCTA so I would suggest that when we are looking at the use of radio and big screen TV videos we will hear from them and know what the issues are so that we can come back and perhaps make any types of changes that will be required and then pass this bill.

In the interests of immediate benefits to those artists, we are told that if this bill goes through on time they would start at the beginning of September to place their requests before the Copyright Board and that payments could start as early as January 1993.

With that, I hope we will have these hearings soon so that we can be finished with this error that was committed and has caused undue hardship.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Madam Speaker, I rise to indicate to the House our support of Bill C–88 in the second reading stage and to urge speedy passage by the House so that this bill can go to committee and be properly examined.

I would indicate that the bill before us is to some measure a compliment to the parliamentary co-operation that has occurred on all sides of the House.

A few months ago when the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture were meeting we had representations from SOCAN, the organization representing composers. The technical fault in the copyright legislation of 1987–88 was pointed out to us. At that stage I said: "Well why do we not try for a quick little amendment? I am sure we can get all–party approval". All of us at the committee thought at that time that it was obviously a mistake or an oversight by those who had drafted the copyright legislation in 1987 and that with the full agreement and co–operation of all parties in the House we could quickly change it.

We have all worked together on this to ensure that the bill before us is brought to the House so that we could correct this mistake in the copyright legislation. However, things are not always that simple and the amendments that we saw seemed to suggest that it has opened the field to other areas that we did not anticipate when we originally looked at this and heard testimony earlier this year.

Concern has been expressed to us and I am sure to many members of the House regardless of what side they sit on, about the attempt by the composers association at one stage to collect fees from little town fairs. We have had letters from little restaurateurs expressing their concern that they would have to pay copyright fees because they happened to have a radio on and the restaurant is open to the public.

We all agreed that while this flaw in the copyright legislation had to be corrected, we also should listen to the various parties affected by this amendment. Instead of giving it the speedy passage in the House in all stages, all parties agreed that we should have some committee hearings on this and try to straighten out some of the conceptions and perhaps some misconceptions there might be about this bill. For example, we are all happy to note that the organization involved with the country fairs and exhibitions have reached an agreement with SOCAN and that is no longer an issue.

It is important that we attempt to straighten this out in committee and that the report of the committee comes to the House as soon as possible, hopefully for final passage, so that this basic flaw in our copyright legislation can be corrected.

I think this House is in agreement that artists should be remunerated for their intellectual and artistic work.

The copyright legislation had a serious flaw that the cable companies took advantage of. We might add that most broadcasters, in terms of the regular television and radio services, did not take advantage of this loophole and have been paying the royalties.

It was the cable companies that decided to stick to the legal meaning of the law rather than the intent. Therefore, they have escaped paying royalties.

They are making money on other people's work and artistic talents. Those artists, the creators of the compositions, should be remunerated.

What we are doing is correcting this situation to ensure that the artists do have a proper return on their work.

I urge the House to pass Bill C–88 so it will come to committee very quickly so that we can give it serious and in–depth consideration. Then it would come back to the House for third reading. Hopefully, the bill, after committee, will be such that all members of this House can agree to it and therefore give it speedy passage.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, I think you would find that there would be unanimous consent to admit some travel motions at this time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

AUTHORIZATION TO TRAVEL

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) moved:

That five members and one staff of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts be authorized to travel to Fredericton, New Brunswick, from July 5 to July 8, 1992 to attend the 14th annual meeting of the Canadian Council of Public Accounts Committees;

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) moved:

That three members and two staff of the Standing Committee on Forestry and Fisheries be authorized to travel to Gaspé, Iles-de-la-Madeleine, Moncton and Prince Edward Island during the adjournment of the House between July 15 and August 28, 1992, in order to conduct an evaluation of programs and activities funded under the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program and the Federal Program for Quebec Fisheries Development.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) moved:

Further, that five MPs and three staff of the subcommittee on the St. Lawrence Seaway be authorized to travel to Thunder Bay, St. Catharines and Montreal, to hold meetings concerning the competitiveness of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Seaway system for a period not exceeding six days while the House is not sitting between June 23 and September 30, 1992.

That notwithstanding any Standing Order of this House, the Chief Whip of any recognized party may effect substitutions for that travel from any envelopes, by filing notice thereof with the Clerk of the Committee, and such substitutions shall be effective for the entire period of travel and should be effective immediately when they are received by the Clerk of the Committee.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) moved:

Finally, that three members and three staff of the subcommittee on the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General on the recodification of the general part of the Criminal Code be authorized to travel to Canberra, Australia and to Auckland and Wellington, New Zealand from September 8 to September 20, 1992, in order to participate at the 4th International Congress on Criminal Law to be held on recodification of general parts of the Criminal Code as well as to participate in working sessions with the Australian and New Zealand parliamentarians and senior officials.

• (1530)

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I have some concern with reference to what the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader just introduced. I certainly have no difficulty with the travel for examination of the St. Lawrence Seaway as well as the travel to Fredericton, New Brunswick.

I must say that the matter of travelling to Australia and New Zealand to the tune of $54,000 is news to me. This was just handed to me. That seems to be an awful lot of money for a trip that I have no background information on.

With all generosity to my hon. friend, I want to say that I have no difficulty with the three trips in Canada at all. However, before I can give my support to spending $54,492 to go to Australia and New Zealand, I need some information. I do not know what kind of a trip this is. There has been no consultation and for that reason I support the three trips but not the fourth one to Australia.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Maybe I can help the House. Maybe there could be more consultations on the fourth one and the hon. parliamentary secretary could come back to the House.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I concur with the first three motions that have been put to the House. I want to indicate our willingness to co-operate in expediting these motions to see that they are passed immediately this afternoon.

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada, as reported (with amendments) by a legislative committee; and on Motions Nos. 9, 11 and 13.

Madam Deputy Speaker: When the House started statements by members, there were two minutes left for the hon. member for Surrey North. Does he intend to use them?

Mr. Karpoff: No.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to continue debate on Bill C-26 which is a bill to supposedly improve the Public Service Commission of Canada. It is to be an example to the world and to be an example to other provinces to make sure that the rules of the game are applied properly within the Public Service.

I have great pride in telling you that in my particular riding of Carleton—Gloucester, which is in the national capital region, I would estimate that at least 80 to 90 per cent of the people who work there work either directly or indirectly for the federal government or its agencies. If they do not, they then work for other institutions such as school boards, the provincial government and municipal governments. Therefore, it is a Public Service town. It is rather important that the rules of employment be applied in a proper and correct fashion.

I had the honour to represent the Liberal Party along with my colleague from Ottawa West on the legislative committee that studied the proposed bill of the government. I do commend the government for, after a quarter of a century, addressing the question of Public Service 2000 and looking at a renewal or a rebirth of the Public Service bill. However, I did observe that during the deliberations of the legislative committee there was a rather great amount of impatience on the part of government members to have this bill passed as quickly as possible. This impatience certainly tickled my curiosity, but in a negative fashion. I wondered, since we were all employers, whether we are really thinking of our employees. We have after all a quarter of a million employees spread out across Canada.

We create and make laws here in Parliament but it is up to the employees to make sure these laws are implemented across the country. Some of these laws are policing laws for example. Some of these laws are to gather income tax.

Some of these laws are to inspect food for example. They are made to inspect flights and airplanes to make sure that the Canadian community feels secure in what it eats and consumes and when flying or travelling either on the railway or in vehicles.

The application of these rules falls on the Public Service. These public servants staff our immigration offices and customs offices to make sure that we have an orderly country. We also provide services in the health field, the multiculturalism field or a variety of other fields.

This large group of employees that is providing services to the community or helping us in making sure that this is a safe and secure country, obviously wants to make a profession of being a public employee. Many of them take adult education programs and pursue courses to get better and better in the work they do. Some work their way right up to the Ph.D. level. Many of them, certainly in the science field, we rely a great deal on for research.

In order to pursue education for your profession you must have a future. There must be something for all the time you are going to be putting in for the government that would help you and stimulate you to always want to do better and to improve what you do in your environment.

This is why it is rather important that we do the correct and proper thing. This is the reason why I believe that we should listen to our employees. I am sad to say that my observation of the legislative committee was that it was ramming through a new law with great impatience.

We are going away from modern management to the old management philosophy of "the boss runs the shop and if you do not like it as an employee then you leave the shop". The boss runs the shop and there is the employee who is treated practically like a slave and is always threatened to be let go.

This particular bill is this in essence. It says the manager will manage because the manager is impatient. Yes, we do need to have changes in our Public Service Act. Yes, in the past and right up to now, a great number of the decisions regarding employment, staffing, transfers and even the motions, were rather a long, arduous and difficult task.

Now we have swung the pendulum completely. We are about to give the authority to the manager to manage in his or her way with his or her attitude which could be tyrannical.

• (1540)

The Liberal Party, along with the NDP, has proposed quite a variety of amendments. I would say that 90 to 95 per cent of the amendments came from the Liberal Party. I was amazed at the reaction, the chuckling and the giggling on the government side. I was amazed at the impatience, the deaf ears, the lack of attention, the lack of compassion and the failure to really understand what a large work force should be and could be in 2000 and beyond.

We have proposed amendments and I have the pleasure to comment further on these amendments. Since PS 2000 gives a substantial amount of power to the manager, it is only normal that several unions and organizations be concerned this will create an environment where such authority over the employees' careers, especially women and minorities, could be abused.

While the Public Service Commission is currently investigating complaints of abuse of authority, nothing in this bill requires the commission to conduct such investigations. Employees' representatives have expressed concern about what could happen if the commission as a third party, were not officially recognized the power to investigate complaints. The worst case scenario would be that the head of the department that you complained about would be designated to investigate. Can you imagine that, Madam Speaker? This is certainly an unacceptable scenario. This amendment is only making official what the Public Service Commission has been doing for ages. It ensures a fair and just investigation.

Another advantage of these amendments is to ensure that the Public Service Commission not only may, but shall, take action against abuse of authority. There is also a possibility that certain instances of harassment could be tied directly to the merit principle. As the so-called keeper of this merit principle, it stands to reason that the commission be officially recognized as having the power to investigate complaints in that area.

Another proposed amendment to clause 10 of Bill C-26 is designed to make it clear that the merit principle will generally be based on competence, so that the best qualified—I repeat, best qualified—candidate will be selected for the job. We want to make sure that this idea of competence will prevail in the definition of merit and that the notion of "competence measured by such standard as the commission may establish" be the exception to the rule.

When government developed this new definition of merit in clause 10 it did not stop to think that this could be setting a dangerous precedent. It will make it difficult for the court to interpret the traditional definition of merit which ensured that the best qualified person—I repeat, best qualified—gets the job. The norm could well become "selection based on competence, as measured by such standard of competence as the commission may establish".

The other element of these amendments backs up the preceding amendments on employment equity. The idea is to ensure that the Public Service Commission will take into consideration minority groups in our society before establishing standards for competitions and personnel selection.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I would like to correct some drivel that I heard in an earlier speech in this debate. It was from this side of the House but it was from down there, from the New Democrats.

The hon. member for North Island—Powell River made a speech earlier today that was absolute drivel. I know that the hon. member who is paying such close attention will agree with me when she hears the facts and figures that I have to relate.

An hon. member: I can hardly wait.

Mr. Milliken: She can hardly wait. I am glad to hear it because she is going to get it.

The hon. member for North Island—Powell River tried to suggest that somehow this government in adopting time allocation techniques and applying them to this debate today was acting in the same way that Liberal governments have in the past. I want to correct that record. I have some figures here to help me. Perhaps the member for North Island—Powell River will recant such heresy.

The facts are that in the period from 1913 to 1981, which was the last time closure was used before this government took office, closure was used a total of 22 times.

Since this government took office closure has been used over 16 times. In fact, closure has been used almost as much in the eight years that this disastrous government has occupied the Treasury benches as it had been in something like 48 years before that. It gives some indication of the depravity of the current government in its constant abuse of the rules and procedures of this House.

I could go on. I could cite the figures for use of time allocation, under which we are labouring today, not closure, and the government has used it more often than it has closure.

To suggest that somehow this pattern reflects previous government patterns is false. The hon. member for North Island—Powell River should check his facts before he spouts such drivel and nonsense in the House.

I want to urge him to take some care because we all know what is going on in the Ontario legislature these days.

Ms. Langan: Look at them, not us.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam says: "Look at them, not us". Her colleagues in the Ontario legislature have introduced a whole bunch of new rules that will gag the Ontario legislature and silence the opposition, the very effective opposition being offered there by my colleagues in the Liberal Party.

In fact there was a picture the other day on the front page of The Ottawa Citizen of her leader in this House holding up the hand of the premier of Ontario supporting—

Ms. Langan: She is proud to do it.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam says: "She is proud to do it". She and her colleagues in this House condemned this government for using closure and gagging the House when her colleague, the premier of Ontario, is doing exactly the same thing in the Ontario legislature.

I really find it quite shameful and disgraceful. There is a lot of hypocrisy in this action.

Mr. Angus: What are they doing?

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, who is joining his soul mates on the Tory benches for the time being, is yelling at me to tell them what they are doing. I am telling them what they are doing. They are introducing a series of rule changes that will gag the opposition. They are threatening to use closure and they are telling the members of the opposition they are going to have to sit all summer to pass very unpalatable and unpopular legislation.

Had the hon. member tried the same thing here in the course of the GST debate we would still be here. The New Democratic Party pandered to the wishes of the Conservative majority, urged the government to use closure by using stalling techniques in the House, minimizing debate on the bill and preventing us in the Liberal opposition from presenting the arguments and concerns of Canadians against that bill in this House.

That is the way the New Democratic Party and the Tories get into bed together. That is the way they get into bed together, and that is what they are doing in the Ontario legislature. They are trying to gag the Official Opposition, and that is exactly what is going on here today.

The New Democrats pretend outrage at the use of closure then they say it is the Liberals and Conservatives that are doing it, when all the time it is the New Democrats that jump at the chance to silence intelligent capable opposition offered by the Liberal Party when they get into office.

Ms. Langan: Just like you are doing right now.

Mr. Milliken: Exactly. As the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam says, much like I am putting forward right now.

I am glad she is enjoying my speech.

I want to turn to the bill before us and discuss the amendments. The hon. member seems relieved that I have got off the subject of her party's duplicity with the Conservative Party. I can understand that. It must be very embarrassing.

• (1550)

The bill before us has some amendments moved to it by the hon. member for Ottawa West that I wanted to talk about. The amendments she has moved deal with complaints alleging sexual or personal harassment or abuse of authority.

What the member from Ottawa West is trying to do through these amendments is stiffen the government's resolve to deal with these issues when complaints are made in the work place.

This bill is deficient in that it fails to provide for corrective action in the case of these complaints. The hon. member for Ottawa West has urged very reasonable and sensible amendments. There is nothing wild-eyed, there is nothing that smacks of the NDP government in Ontario in these amendments.

These are sensible amendments. These are reasonable amendments. These are competent amendments and they are straightforward amendments. They are amendments, that must commend themselves to all members of the House, including any right-thinking member on the government side. I urge the members of the government to look at these amendments and to not blindly vote them down, as it seems to be doing with every other amendment we have considered so far. Look to the protection of people who suffer from these kinds of complaints and offer them some protection in the law so that instead of allowing the Public Service Commission possibly to make recommendations and possibly issue directives it will require the Public Service Commission to issue directives and take steps to deal with the complaint when it comes before us.

That is all the amendments are asking for. That is all the amendments propose. It is not too much to ask in this day and age. I urge the government to look again before it votes these amendments down and accept them.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Madam Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to speak on Bill C-26, sometimes referred to as Bill PS 2000, and probably more appropriately referred to as BS 2000.

It is amazing how we go through these management fads, but it dismays me to see what the government has done in relation to the changes it wishes to impose upon its employees.

One of my colleagues from the Liberal Party previously spoke in as eloquent terms as I have ever heard anyone speak with respect to the civil servants, most of whom are within his constituency and he therefore represents them. I am not surprised that he speaks so eloquently on their behalf and as knowledgeably about them as he does.

We all have many of these civil servants in our constituencies however, and I certainly would like to put on the public record that the amount of support they have given to my office, and I know to the offices of other members of Parliament as well, is valued beyond measure. Some of the things proposed in Bill C-26 really work against that and mitigate against the excellent work that these people do.

With reference to the previous Motions Nos. 5 and 7, they would bring the Public Service Employment Act in line with the federal Employment Equity Act.

I am not so sure that is necessarily an exemplary recommendation. As a matter of fact it has certainly come to my attention that the federal Employee Equity Act is tremendously deficient.

I have had the misfortune of having people in the federal civil service come to me having exhausted the process in so far as standing up for their rights within the federal Employment Equity Act and having gone to the Human Rights Commission, which is a body put in place to protect federal employees even beyond what the equity act does. I must say that I have found both to be deficient. Tragedy has befallen people who have stood up for their rights. The particular motions refer to sexual harassment. Some of the people who have come to me have suffered under that category as well. I can only say that in all categories, whether it is the Human Rights Act or the federal Employment Equity Act, the government, the prime employer in this nation, has come up far short.

The amount of tragedy that has befallen these people is beyond description. I have to repeat something that has already been referred to by me today. I think it is worth while referring to it again. It was also referred to by one of my colleagues on this side of the House. Imminently a female of the Armed Forces is about to be court-martialled because circumstances surrounding her appeal before the military tribunal, circumstances surrounding the charge of sexual harassment within the Armed Forces, became public.

It was not even she who made those details public, yet this person is suffering the indignity of a court-martial. In the initial phase of this whole thing it is not even she who is to blame. As with so many of these cases, whether it is sexual harassment or discrimination on the basis of race, colour or religion, the victim is the one who suffers and the perpetrators get away scot-free and often are found to have been promoted or transferred to more favourable jobs, or perhaps more favourable geographic locations within the federal Public Service.

I commend the member for having brought forward this excellent amendment to Bill C-26. I cannot for the life of me understand why on earth the government would not take cognizance of the excellent recommendation within this amendment, other than to conclude that it does not really have the interests of its employees as the prime motive for making these changes.

I guess we really must come back to a reference that was made earlier today as well and conclude that it is a desire to preserve the old boy's network. I guess that is the best description of it, because sure as heck they would not want any uppity women or any uppity people of another race or colour or religion to gain some kind of an advantage within the elite of our wonderful Public Service.

Thank you, Madam Speaker, for the opportunity to speak on this matter. I trust the government will take this recommendation to heart and adopt it as its own.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will recognize the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam in a second.

I just wanted to let the House know that in keeping with tradition, as of four o'clock the Speaker will be delighted to receive members in Room 216, as is the habit of the Speaker every year on the last day before we all go home for the summer.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, while some may be visiting the Speaker's offices, others of us will be here labouring in the House, including you.

I rise in support of the amendments put forward, Motions Nos. 9, 11 and 13. When we talk about these motions I think it is important to put them in the context of the concept put forward by PS 2000, the bumph that referred to PS 2000 as being very, very progressive and forward thinking and even the title, Public Service 2000, taking us into the next century.

• (1600)

Having sat along with other members of this House for weeks on end listening to the Public Service justify Bill C-26, I am sad to report to the House that we are talking about dragging the Public Service, kicking and screaming, into the last century.

This bill is not a progressive piece of legislation. It is drafted by people who 30 years ago in their early days in the Public Service might have had a vision, but that vision has not moved forward in the last 30 years. Now their 30-year old vision is being presented before this House, wrapped up and packaged as something to take us into the next century.

The best the opposition can do with this legislation at this time—we can hope that maybe there will be an election call in the fall and it will not in fact pass in the House—is support amendments that would at the very least bring this legislation a little closer to 1992.

Motion No. 9 adds a provision that the commission shall investigate complaints of personal or sexual harassment, report its findings and corrective action taken to the worker involved. It is important we think about the fact that without this amendment we were in a situation where the commission may investigate complaints but in fact could have abrogated its responsibility and given the responsibility to department heads.

Let us think about this. We looked at the bill. We looked at the reality of the work place. We had the Public Service Commission telling us that employers in the public sector are good people and would never ever harass someone and would never ever certainly be involved in sexual harassment. It essentially said: "Trust us". There is a long list of complaints filed by unions on this issue but there certainly have been complaints on these issues that have been spoken about publicly.

The vast majority of managers and employers in the public sector are good, decent, hard-working people. But there is an old saying, and I will probably get it wrong, that absolute power corrupts absolutely. It is important we have checks and balances in the legislation to ensure that the power is not absolute, to ensure that there is a process by which redress can be sought by workers in the public sector, to ensure that these people can not only be protected but that there is a bit of distance between the person who is the complainant and the person who makes the decision about the propriety of the complaint. To have the very people whom the complaint was against make any kind of a determination about whether it is a valid complaint is hardly appropriate.

Therefore we very strongly feel that anything that can be done to improve the wording of the legislation by these kinds of amendments, or indeed by other amendments that were unfortunately found to be inappropriate to fit the parameters of the legislation, should in fact go into it.

Another problem is that in the whole context of the merit principle harassment can clearly be an interference in the process and the confines of the merit principle as the Public Service Commission has outlined.

We are also concerned that the employer now has the right to deploy people hither and yon. It is particularly important, given these new powers, that these amendments be in place.

We also have to be cognizant that without these kinds of checks and balances these amendments would bring we could very well find workers in the public sector victimized by the very Public Service Commission that purports to be the protector of these workers.

It is absolutely critical. I would plead with hon. members on the government side of the House to give us good, solid reasons why these amendments would not be appropriate and could not be accepted by the government. We have not heard one word on these particular amendments from the government, either in the committee or here in the House.

I think it is time. My goodness, I am sure hon. members on the government side of the House have the independent thought and ability to put words together and give us rational explanations for why the government cannot accept these kinds of amendments.

I would urge that the parliamentary secretary who is responsible in the House and his colleagues get up and tell us why we are wrong and why these amendments should not be supported.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 9. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

The next question is on Motion No. 11. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

The next question is on Motion No. 13. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Mr. Fisher: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of information, actually. I am wondering if when one votes in a situation such as this it is imperative to be in one's seat.

Madam Deputy Speaker: This is not like when each member is called by his or her name. It is as long as there are five members in the House. I think the hon. member would understand this.

It is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 38 to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception—

Ms. Langan: On a point of order, Madam Speaker—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I was otherwise occupied informing the House. The hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam, I am sorry.

Ms. Langan: Madam Speaker, it would seem to me with all due respect that having to prompt the government side on how to stand on these motions, we have always been under instruction that to speak in the House or to undertake activity in the House we must in fact be in our places. Could Your Honour give us a clear ruling on that, please?

Madam Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member will allow me I will verify the Standing Orders. Certainly to be recognized to speak the member must be in his or her place in the House. It is the first time I have had to face that. I will certainly look again in the Standing Orders and I will come back to the hon. member.

It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception—Employment; the hon. member for London—Middlesex—Pearson International Airport; the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie—Trade; the hon. member for Ottawa Centre—Children.

The first motion is Motion No. 15 which stands in the name of Mr. Riis who is not in the House. Is there unanimous consent for somebody else to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Ms. Langan: Madam Speaker, there was discussion with all three parties that the motions put in the name of Mr. Riis would be put in my name tonight. There was agreement on that because I had been a member on the committee.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I had not been advised. I asked the question and consent was given. You understand I could not put the motion to the House without asking consent. I thank the hon. member.

Ms. Joy Langan (for Mr. Riis) moved:

Motion No. 15.

That Bill C-26 be amended by deleting Clause 10.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West) moved:

That Bill C-26 be amended in Clause 10 by striking out lines 22 to 30 at page 5 and substituting the following therefor:

"(2) For the purposes of subsection (1), selection according to merit shall, except in particular prescribed circumstances, be based on the competence of each person being considered in a competition for appointment as measured against the competence of the other person or persons also being considered in the competition, except that the Commission may prescribe by regulation circumstances in which selection according to merit would be inappropriate in view of the nature of the responsibilities of the position to which the person is to be appointed and in which selection may be based on the competence of a person being considered for appointment as measured by such standard of competence as the Commission may establish without being measured against the competence of other persons."

That Bill C-26 be amended in Clause 10 by striking out lines 23 and 24 at page 5 and substituting the following therefor:

"selection according to merit may, in such instances as apprenticeship or occupational training programs, reclassification actions, or promotion within certain occupational groups as designated by the Commission, and with respect to the regulations of".

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West) moved:

That Bill C-26 be amended in Clause 11 by striking out lines 5 to 9 at page 6 and substituting the following therefor:

(b) prescribe or apply any standard that represents an employment barrier to women, aboriginal persons, persons with disabilities or persons who, because of their race or colour, are in a visible minority in Canada."

That Bill C-26 be amended in Clause 12 by striking out lines 40 to 43 at page 6 and substituting the following therefor:

"(2) In establishing criteria under subsection (1), the Commission shall not establish criteria that present an employment barrier to women, aboriginal".

That Bill C-26 be amended in Clause 12 by striking out line 41 at page 6 and substituting the following therefor:

"tion (1) the Commission shall not establish criteria that present an employment barrier to groups of persons that are disadvantaged, including women, aboriginal peoples, persons with disabilities and persons who are because of their race or colour in a visible minority in Canada.

She said: Madam Speaker, on the group of motions you have just read, I will not be moving Motion No. 21. The content is duplicated in fact by Motion No. 23 which has a better wording and accomplishes more clearly what I wish to accomplish in the motion.

At this time, I would also like to request unanimous consent of the House to substitute a different wording for Motion No. 16 and I will briefly explain why.

Motion No. 16 as it is in the Order Paper was prepared by legal counsel at my request and submitted. In subsequent discussions with legal counsel we provided an alternative wording and asked to have it translated and put on the Order Paper in lieu of Motion No. 16.

That was not done and I take full responsibility for not having verified that it had been done. If I could read the alternate wording its intention is to accomplish the same thing but in a manner that is more correct and more appropriate to the legislation than Motion No. 16 as now worded. If I could just read the alternate wording, it is in the hands of the Table officers in both official languages and has been provided to the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board as well as to the NDP critic on this issue.

"That clause 10 be amended by striking out lines 22 to 30 on page 5 and substituting the following:

For the purposes of subsection (1), selection according to merit shall, except in particular prescribed circumstances, be based on the competence of each person being considered for appointment as measured against the competence of other persons; except that the Commission may prescribe by regulation, circumstances in which selection according to merit would be inappropriate and which selection may be based on the competence of a person being considered for appointment as measured by such standard as competence as the Commission may establish rather than is measured against the competence of other persons."

Madam Speaker, I do not expect the government will agree with this amendment. I simply want the opportunity to present the motion as I drafted it and have a more correct wording before the House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: We will start by Motion No. 21 being withdrawn as it is actually in Motion No. 23.

Motion No. 21 withdrawn.

Madam Deputy Speaker: As far as Motion No. 16 is concerned, is there unanimous consent for the wording to be changed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Consent is not given. On a point of order, the hon. member from Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I ask the hon. member who said no to reconsider. The hon. member for Ottawa West has put forward a very reasonable explanation as to why the wording of her motion is incorrect. She has asked to put another motion before the House. Apparently it is in order. Notice has been given. It is an unusual request but there has been a reasonable explanation offered. I would have thought that the hon. member might reconsider and allow this to proceed.

An hon. member: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Consent is not given.

Ms. Langan: Madam Speaker, I guess I am quite concerned because it was through no fault of the hon. member that the incorrect wording appeared before the House in the first place.

It would seem to me to be a little bit mean-spirited in view of the fact that the hon. member had made every effort to have the correct wording before this House and is now seeking leave to ensure that it is correct.

I would urge as well that the hon. member from the government side of the House reconsider and allow this wording to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Am I to understand that there is a change of heart?

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Keyes: Madam Speaker, I wonder if we could get an explanation from the hon. member for Burlington why he will not agree to this particular motion.

Madam Deputy Speaker: When unanimous consent is sought members who do not give consent do not have to give reasons. Sometimes they do and sometimes they do not.

I am in a situation now where the motion that will be debated by the House is as written on the Order Paper.

I would like to answer an earlier question by the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam. Upon a division, the yeas and the nays shall not be entered upon the minutes unless demanded by five members. It is Standing Order 45. Nowhere does it say that five members must be sitting in their places when they are asking for a vote to be taken.

• (1620)

Ms. Langan: Madam Speaker, I would like to have clarification at this point with what has just taken place. Are we now debating Motions Nos. 15 and 18?

Madam Deputy Speaker: We are debating Motions Nos. 15, 16, 18, 19, and 23.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): I would like to rise particularly on Motions Nos. 15 and 18 which I have presented. These motions are central to the bill as we have it before us.

This bill and the vision of Public Service reform put forward by the Public Service 2000 report is very complex. It modifies the existing definition of the use of the merit principle. It modifies it in the appointment or promotion of workers in the Public Service.

Representatives of the vast majority of the workers who appeared before the committee—and we had a long list of people who presented, including the Public Service Alliance of Canada; the Professional Institute of the Public Service; and the Economists, Sociologists and Statisticians Association. Those three major unions, among others, all condemned this edition, the edition that is found in this section of the bill, as an attack on the merit principle.

The clause we are talking about modifies the traditional definition of merit and that is the best qualified as compared to all others. It modifies it by allowing the Public Service Commission to appoint persons based on the competence of a person as measured by such standards of competence as the commission may establish.

We believe that in fact the measure of competence, the best qualified person as compared to all others, is a principle that should remain entrenched in this legislation.

We would ask that the government support our Motions Nos. 15 and 18. In fact we would bring out this legislation with these amendments intact.

Hugh Winsor said in The Globe and Mail of May 23 that: "This clause opens a loophole that will give civil service managers a major new opportunity to play favourites and dispense their own form of patronage".

We are painfully aware of patronage run amok in some departments of the Public Service. It would be tremendously unfortunate to enshrine in a brand new piece of legislation, albeit flawed in many parts, the kinds of clauses that would open a loophole giving Public Service managers a major new opportunity to play favourites and dispense their own form of patronage.

Canadian people have told us very clearly, have told this House, have told this government, have told opposition members, their opinion of blatant patronage. I would suggest their opinion of blatant patronage does not diminish if it is being dispensed either by mandarins or Public Service Commission corporate managers. It is no less distasteful than if it is being put forward by the government itself.

We then have a situation where the department can make appointments, can deploy, can put people into positions without consideration under this new broadened description of competence of a person. What we find is the ability for a manger to end-run the process of merit and appoint by favouritism, by special favours from whomever is seeking the appointment. Possibly the debate on that point was more relevant in the last clause we discussed, sexual harassment. However, we have a situation where managers have wide discretion on who should get appointed to a new position. Again, the Public Service Commission, in presenting to us in committee, very clearly said two things.

First it said, trust us, and second it said that the calibre of manager in the Public Service is tremendously high and they would not see this right misused. I would not suggest that any manger in the Public Service is not of high calibre or is not a fair-minded, good-hearted man or woman. I would suggest that when one is faced with opportunities to show favouritism to someone they like over someone who is qualified for the job, sometimes that opportunity is tough to ignore and overcome.

When one is faced with an opportunity to let a little bit of racial discrimination sneak into the decision or not wanting to be bothered with someone who may have a disability because it means a little extra work on the part of the manager, it is very possible we could find ourselves with a manager who would not deliberately make mistakes because of the broadened parameters of this definition of the merit principle.

If the House does not like the reference to Mr. Winsor and his suggestion that this opens a loophole that will give civil service managers a major new opportunity to play favourites, then maybe we could make reference to the head of the PS 2000 exercise, Mr. John Edwards, who said: "Bill C-26 gives managers the authority to appoint and by-pass the system". This was reported in The Globe and Mail on June 20, just a couple of days ago. When bureaucrats were briefed by the Public Service Commission in response to a question he said: "This section gives managers the authority to appoint and by-pass the merit system".

It is passing strange that we got one story at the committee about how committed the government service is to the merit principle and that this clause makes no difference and that managers in the Public Service would never dream of doing something like that and then we have reported in the minutes of a meeting with bureaucrats, with the very same person who gave us those assurances, that managers could now by-pass the system.

We think it is absolutely critical that these amendments be included in the legislation. Even the Public Service Commission has admitted in its most recent annual report that there has been too much abuse of the merit system by senior managers who have been appointing their friends and redeploying those they do not like.

Now we have legislation that allows those managers to redeploy people they do not like, redeploy people who do not share their views or redeploy people whose hair cut they do not like, or whatever. We also have in this legislation a provision that would allow, not only redeployment but by-passing of the merit system which we were all told by the head of the Public Service Commission, was very much sacred. We are very concerned about this section of the bill.

The addition of this clause to the Public Service Employment Act will allow the government and managers to circumvent the merit principle I have talked about. The result will be a less competent Public Service, more and more dependent on political favouritism. Surely as we move toward the year 2000 we do not want to find a Public Service that is more dependent on political favouritism.

In committee, the government and the Public Service Commission argued that it needed this clause to deal with special circumstances, circumstances that were defined in regulations. But regulations do not receive the kind of scrutiny that a bill does in this Parliament, and so we asked why cannot the government make specific those circumstances where the principle of relative merit would not apply? Why can that not be in this bill? Why give such far-ranging powers to an agency that has demonstrated it is incapable of protecting the merit principle and safeguarding the Public Service from patronage, nepotism and political whim?

Motion No. 15 seeks to eliminate the addition of this concept to the application of the merit principle. The reason to eliminate it is very simple: the government and witnesses before the legislative committee could not come up with anything other than "trust us, we need this flexibility", but only hinted to us how this provision would actually be applied.

In light of such vagueness, this House should not be prepared to grant the government or the Public Service Commission carte blanche to erode the merit principle.

I would ask that Motion No. 15 be supported as well as Motion No. 18, which seeks to clarify the circumstances in which the commission may ignore the principle of relative merit. If there is a need to use the principle of standard of competence, then this need should be spelled out in the legislation if abuse of the system is to be avoided.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I support most of the amendments introduced by my colleague from Ottawa West because they are fair amendments. We make no bones about it as the majority of public servants live in the national capital region and we know them because we work with them. I think every member of Parliament also deals on a daily basis with members of the Public Service and they know the high calibre of the service they receive. I would say without hesitation that we have one of the finest Public Services anywhere in the world.

These motions call on the government not to abandon the merit principle. It means that we are urging the government not to open the door to patronage. We call on the government to not proceed with the deployment of public servants without any kind of safeguard because we know that would not be in the best interests of the public servant, nor in the best interests of the government itself.

When we speak out against contracting out without adequate accountability, it is because we want to make sure that the government as well as the country gets a good return on its investment. We do not want to end up contracting out a job which in the end will have to be done over once the contract has been completed. So we need some sort of cost analysis.

When we talk about the excessive use of regulation, simply put it is because we want to see a streamlined Public Service without too much complication, without too much regulation. We want to see more flexibility in the hands of management as well as in the hands of the public servants themselves.

When we talk about accountability, it is simply that we believe accountability would increase flexibility within the public service.

When we talk about collective bargaining we are talking about a partnership between the public servant and their employers.

I do not see that any of the amendments which my colleague from Ottawa West has introduced in the House are done in bad faith; in fact, they were done in order to improve the Public Service, in order to streamline many of the complications that exist within the Public Service.

One segment in one of the amendments deals with the question of casuals. As the House probably knows, the government has gone on a rampage hiring casuals. Many of my constituents are thankful to have jobs, even though many of these are short-term positions. I want the government to know that by its actions it is creating nightmares for families in my constituency.

About a week and a half ago, one of my constituents told me that he would have to sell his truck because he could not pay his rent. He said that he needed a job even if it paid $3 because the day care centre would not keep his child any more if he was not working. When I asked him why, he told me that he was a casual with the federal government and as part of his agreement after six months he has to be out of work for a week or two and then he can apply all over again.

While we are helping these individuals in a way during those six-month periods, we are creating a chaotic situation for many of the families that we represent. The government has to put some sanity into the system. It either needs those workers on a full-time basis or it does not.

I know why the government is using casuals. Somehow casuals do not show up in the person-years. The government, in its wisdom, has decided on downsizing, thinking that by simply letting all employees go, the problem will go, not knowing that there is a tremendous amount of work out there that needs to be done and that management in the departments all across the land would have to look for manpower in order to do these jobs.

I do not understand why the government is proceeding with contracting out in a massive way without proper accountability, without proper analysis, hiring casuals left and right. I am not complaining about the fact that we should be hiring people, but never yet has the government taken the time to do a proper analysis to find out whether in fact we do have a surplus of public servants or whether we have a shortage.

Do we have a surplus or do we have a shortage? My view is that we have a shortage. If we did not have a shortage of public servants then we would not be hiring casuals and we would not be contracting out.

I am not against contracting out nor am I opposed to hiring casuals. But we need a proper assessment to see whether in fact what we are doing is the right thing, whether we are getting the return on the investment we are putting, yes or no. The challenge for the government is to do that particular assessment and that particular analysis.

Many of the amendments that my colleague from Ottawa West has introduced puts some sanity into the system. We have called on the government to create and establish a partnership with its workers. What we have seen is a walk out by the Public Service that the country, in its history, never saw before.

We call on the government to make a proper assessment so it would deal with question of promotion in the Public Service. There is no opportunity for public servants to get promotions. Look at the morale in the Public Service, look at the uncertainty in the Public Service. Look at all of those issues, and you come to one conclusion every time, we have a problem and it is that public servants have lost faith in their employer, the Treasury Board, the government as a whole.

To put sanity back into the system, an element of trust has to be created. We have to re-establish that partnership and go back to those who are building the infrastructure of this country, those who are providing service to the people, and seek their views and their opinions. They are telling us: "No, we are not happy with Bill C-26. It does not meet the purpose". The Minister of National Health and Welfare agrees with me because his department is one of those departments that needs every bit of help, as well as the immigration department.

We need sanity and this government does not seem to care. I know we are at the stage of no return because the government is stubborn. It is proceeding on it with or without the concurrence and approval of the public servants. The last call is to get out and speak with those who are affected, look at their concerns and address many of those amendments, which are all fair amendments and, if anything, will improve the system. None of these amendments was done in bad faith and none of them will create any kind of problem for the public servant, for the government itself, or for the people of Canada. Why do we not proceed with them?

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I too am very pleased to stand here in the House and speak on Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada.

I wish to speak to one section of the amendments before us today, and that is the merit principle. I have risen before in this House to speak to this bill and I am rising again mainly to express in the strongest terms my opposition to the proposed changes to the merit principle of the Public Service act.

As a member for Parliament for a constituency that has a large number of public servants I obviously have received many telephone calls and many letters expressing concerns to me. There is a deep sense of despair among public servants in Canada. There are so many problems with Bill C–26 that it strikes at the very fundamental principles of our Public Service. The merit principle probably is foremost in the minds of those who oppose the bill.

Bill C–26 erodes the merit principle. It would do away with the principle that was established to stop rampant political administrative patronage and assure Canadians of a non–partisan Public Service in which employment and opportunities were open to all, based on competence, not favouritism. The merit principle also ensured that only the best qualified and most competent persons would get appointed to positions within the Public Service.

This has been the cornerstone of the Public Service for many years. Scholars have talked of the benefits credited to the merit principle. It is a principle that has been awarded with high praise. It has become a sacred institution within Canada, admired both at home and abroad. Yet this bill would change this principle from a sacred cow to a sacrificial lamb.

What is at stake here is the quality and efficiency of our Public Service. No longer will the Public Service settle for the best qualified person to fill a position, instead a minimum set of standards or qualifications can be set, and all a person needs to do is meet those minimum qualifications.

What sort of standards are we setting to do this? What sort of people are we going to attract to the Public Service? With this new bill we will cease to have the very best representing us and caring for our country here in Canada. Our Public Service is still recovering from its first strike in Canadian history. Morale is low within the Public Service right now. Imagine how low it will be once its employees have to work with or under people who are only second or third best for that position.

In fact, Bill C–26 will act as a deterrent to the best qualified people, the cream of the crop. It certainly was the cream of the crop that we have been able to get for this good many years. Why would the best want to work in an organization in which mediocrity was promoted.

Bill C–26 opens up the opportunity for political patronage. I can see no other reason for it. Why else would the federal government want to do away with the merit principle? Does the federal government place such little faith and importance in the Public Service? Does it really want to put all its friends and cronies into the Public Service for the little favours they have done? Does the present government plan to be around long enough to implement the patronage plans? I certainly hope not.

Bill C–26 leaves all but the original hiring and limited promotions to the discretion of managers who set those minimum standards. Hiring and promotions therefore are open to the whims, likes, dislikes, favouritism and personal biases of the manager. This creates a dangerous potential barrier for women in the Public Service in particular. It is human nature for the person doing the hiring to look for similar characteristics in the potential employee.

This fact, along with the fact that most managers are men, allows for the likelihood that women will find it even tougher to find promotion within the Public Service.

Beneath the Veneer, the report on the task force on barriers to women in the Public Service, documented that attitudes are the main barrier to equality of opportunity. These attitudes often unconsciously keep women, as well as visible minorities, persons with disabilities and aboriginal Canadians, at the lower echelons of the Public Service. Is the federal government prepared to add to this problem? It sure looks that way to me.

Further to the merit issue is the issue of deployment. Clause 22 of this bill gives deputy heads the exclusive right to permanently transfer staff without competition. This transfer or deployment cannot be appealed. The only recourse is to complain to the same deputy head, and ask for an investigation, making that person both the judge and the jury.

On January 30, 1992 the Federal Court of Canada struck down an Order in Council giving deputy ministers the freedom to transfer any employee because "it departs substantially from the merit principle".

The judge said: "I would be defeating the whole purpose of the Public Service Employment Act, which is to ensure that appointments to the Public Service are made on the basis of merit".

The government is deviating substantially from the merit principle once again.

Members of the Public Service entered it to carry out a career in a position in which they could contribute to their country. This legislation leaves them little choice in terms of the direction in which they can move as they follow their career. For many it prohibits career development.

Before closing I want to state that I, and I think the members on this side of the House, continue to support the clauses within the bill that continue to contribute to the strengthening of the Public Service and its ability to serve the public, and improve labour relations.

We on this side of the House continue to oppose clauses of the bill that undermine the merit principle without adequate safeguards, that destabilize the Public Service, that discourage the hiring and retention of highly qualified individuals, and that reduce accountability.

We on this side of the House also propose further substantive amendments to this bill at the report stage, which is what my colleague from Ottawa West has certainly done.

In closing, the merit principle has always guaranteed that the best can move up the ladder. This legislation literally puts an end to that. I cannot support a bill that embraces mediocrity. Obviously this government can.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Madam Speaker, again it gives me a great deal of pleasure to speak on Bill C-26, the amendments to the relationships which the government is going to have, for the most part unfortunately, with its employees.

The merit principle has been the cornerstone of what has undoubtedly been a magnificent civil service in this country and one that has certainly been exemplary in relation to other civil services around the world.

This morning my colleague from Mission—Coquitlam asked what the government could possibly say in relation to the changes it was proposing in another context. To put it in the context of this and the whole bill itself I can just imagine the government standing up and saying: "We have the best civil service in the world. We are going to have the best civil service in the world". They have already said this is going to bring Canada's civil service in line with the 21st century.

As has been pointed out, that is certainly not the case. This is another management fad. Many management fads in the past have usually proven after a short period of time to be fallacious, to be ineffective, inefficient, and certainly unable to accomplish what the perpetrators of it wanted it to accomplish. I guess "perpetrators" is the best word. Then it is only to be supplanted by some other form of management fad. One shudders to think what the next round of changes to this particular aspect of our Canadian society may bring forth.

It was pointed out previously in relation to the whole concept of Bill C-26 that John Edwards, who heads the PS 2000 exercise, when asked in private what effect it would have, replied essentially that it would not have any effect at all because it does give the managers the authority to appoint and to bypass the system, whether it refers to sexual harassment or to the merit principle, a fair system of promotion within the civil service.

I refer to that incident again because it epitomizes, it underscores, it highlights the government's philosophy and the government's purpose in what it is doing in bringing forth these changes, a management fad which will disappear and prove to be ineffective. It will also show itself to be disastrous as far as the people are concerned within the civil service because it will show itself to be a betrayal of them by their employer.

This is not the only incident that makes reference to these changes. Hugh Winsor in The Globe and Mail on May 23 said that this clause opens a loophole that will give civil service managers a major new opportunity to play favourites and dispense their own form of political patronage.

Whether we are dealing with standards of promotion or standards of hiring based on the merit principle or the standards principle the fact of the matter is that the people who are going to be administering this act are prepared to circumvent it in any way that suits them.

I would suspect that if at a point in time it was decided that they would not go by the merit principle but by the standards principle, which this portion of the legislation allows, it would be no time at all before a hiring situation would open up in which they would ignore their own principle of doing it on the basis of standards and revert to the merit principle on the basis that the person who was being hired was a friend of the manager, or maybe a relative of the manager. Certainly, the potential for nepotism is ripe within these changes and on political whim, which is something that is to be abhorred in the extreme.

To reiterate, the merit principle has demonstrated itself to be the very best method of determining the qualifications of someone when it comes time for hiring or promotion. We cannot help but think that if the government was to adopt the amendment as put forth here many of the abuses that are anticipated and predicted to occur within this legislation would be averted.

To my sorrow, I am sure the government will not be taking into account amendments put forth by both the opposition parties in this debate. That is much to the disgrace of the government and to the loss of the civil service and the government.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, I want to comment briefly on the amendments to clauses 15, 16, 22 and 23.

The amendment restores the definition of "eligibility list" as it appears in the current legislation.

If we approved the government proposal which allows the Public Service Commission to make regulations on how the eligibility list is established it would be possible to change this list at any time. The obvious effect would be to make it extremely difficult for employees or potential candidates to know what their rights are. Moreover, abuse would again be possible with regard to the merit principle.

As for the restrictions put on the right of appeal in Clause 16 and subcontracting vis-à-vis term employees, this amendment is designed to change subsection 21(4), in clause 16, which would impose serious restrictions to employees who would want to exercise their right to appeal if they felt that an appointment has been made without due consideration to the merit principle.

This clause seems to be further emphasizing the problems we have uncovered with the new wording of clause 10 which deals with the merit principle. We have great difficulty with clause 16 as it stands, because it enables the commission to interpret the merit principle as they please. Without the proposed amendment the clause could give the commission the power to decide whether the appeal board is required or not in a particular case provided it is of the opinion that the merit principle was respected.

The amendment to clause 19 gives certain rights to term employees under the workforce adjustment policy.

As regards transfers in clause 22 the bill as it is presently worded is not subject to the provisions of the Public Service Employment Act dealing with eligibility criteria, qualifications, bilingualism and merit as they apply to transfer. None of the principles that ensure fair treatment at the time of hiring apply to transfers. The results are obvious.

Motion No. 43 strived to at least have merit and bilingualism included as eligibility criteria for transfers.

Finally, as regards appeal regulations in Clause 23 this amendment forces the Public Service Commission to make regulations ensuring that appeals are duly carried out.

The essence of this amendment was the subject of three reports from the Standing Joint Committee on the Scrutiny of Regulations. The Public Service Commission constantly refused to make such regulations.

[English]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I wish to address some remarks to the government's abandonment of the merit principle contained in this bill. This is really one of the most shocking amendments that the government has put forward in the whole legislation.

Now we are to have a civil service based not on merit—promotions and so on—but on competence and the standards of competence are now to be set by some other person. The Public Service Commission apparently is to set standards of competence which are to be measured, according to the government's definition, not against the confidence of other persons, but on the basis of standards set by the commission. I will read the section:

> For the purpose of subsection 1, selection according to merit may in the circumstances prescribed by the regulations of the commission be based on the competence of a person being considered for appointment as measured by such standard of competence as the commission may establish, rather than as measured against the competence of other persons.

The hon. member for Ottawa West has proposed a very reasonable amendment. In fact, the amendment that the member for Kamloops has proposed is also reasonable. It gets rid of this offending clause.

I have some material I think I should draw to the House's attention concerning this amendment that may be of interest to the hon. member for Burlington who has been following this debate so closely.

There is apparently some official called John Edwards. He is a sycophant of the government who has been pushing Public Service 2000 down the throats of unwilling workers in the Public Service. It is not clear whether or not this man is a liar. He has given contradictory statements to the press. I would like to refer to those statements as quoted in The Globe and Mail in an article by that very distinguished journalist, Mr. Hugh Winsor.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, unfortunately, I will have to interrupt the hon. member.

I wish to inform the House that, under the terms of the motion passed this morning, the four hours provided for the consideration of Bill C–26 have expired.

It being five o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

INTERNATIONAL LAW OF THE SEA

RATIFICATION OF CONVENTION

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should, for the benefit of Canadian fisheries, urgently take the necessary steps to ratify the International Law of the Sea, and urge other nations to do so in order to reach the 60 signatures required for the Law of the Sea to come into force.

He said: Madam Speaker, it has been seven years since this government was elected to power by the Canadian people. In connection with this issue related to the Law of the Sea, it has been seven years of dilly–dallying and lost opportunities in providing leadership while this nation, as you well know, is surrounded by three oceans.

It has also been, unfortunately, seven years of piggy-backing on the Law of the Sea and using the best features of that convention without taking the responsibility for it in the international community.

It has been seven years of yielding to pressure by international and national corporate interests at the expense of the common good, namely the fisheries and the communities that derive their living from the oceans.

In a way it has been a way of allowing Wall Street and Bay Street to determine government policy on the management of the oceans. In a way, it has brought about an unfortunate development, which is the compromising of Canada's international credibility.

It has also been five years of prime ministerial high rhetoric, both at home and abroad, on sustainable development. This has created the impression that Canada is, as it should be, committed to the implementation of the principles of sustainable development.

In the light of this quick sketch that I just gave you, the question arises as to why Canada is afraid to ratify the Law of the Sea.

One may recall, that it was given a signature by 119 countries, including Canada, in Jamaica, roughly at the end of 1982. However, the signatures are not enough for an international document to become operative. It requires ratification. It is a two–step process. The signature is first and the ratification is the second.

Canada has taken the first step. Not only that, but Canada was extremely active in promoting the text of this convention. It had a full-time ambassador involved in it and received a lot of political support in the years that led to its conception and finalization. Today, as we speak in this House, 53 nations have ratified the Law of the Sea treaty. Canada, unfortunately, is not among them. With the exception of Iceland, all the countries that have ratified it are from the developing world. They include Mexico, Brazil and India.

In order to become effective, the Law of the Sea Convention requires 60 nations for ratification. That means that we are short seven nations to make this convention operative and to trigger it into effect. Once the 60 nations have ratified it, then the provisions of the convention come into force.

The reluctance of industrialized nations to ratify the accord revolves apparently around concerns on section 11 which deals with the mining of the sea bed. Yet, it is increasingly evident that the commercial prospects for viable sea bed mining are way down the road, maybe 20 years or more, if it is viable at all.

What is happening is this. Canada has benefited directly and indirectly in many ways from the provision of this Law of the Sea without however carrying its burden and doing its share. For instance, Canada has now in place a 12-mile territorial zone around our coast. That, is a big plus.

Second, the 200-mile limit, called the exclusive economic zone, gives Canada the right to declare sovereignty over 1.3 million square nautical miles off of Canada's coast. This also gives Canada control over fishing and oil and mineral exploration in such areas.

Third, Canada has the right, as a result of this convention, to regulate fisheries in the exclusive economic zone by determining the total catch allowed and its optimal use.

Fourth, there is article 66 of the Law of the Sea Convention which has the effect of protecting Canada's salmon stocks. This article gives those states which ratify the convention the primary responsibility on river fishing stocks which originate in the signatory and ratifying country.

Fifth, in the Law of the Sea Convention there are articles 63 and 64 which are very important because they address the issue of management and conservation of straddling stocks and migratory species. All of us in this House have heard a lot in recent months about straddling stocks in connection with the northern cod. We heard about their importance and the importance of protecting it. That matter is recognized and is embedded in the Law of the Sea Convention.

Sixth, the convention gives Canada enhanced jurisdiction for the prevention of marine pollution and also special provisions for Arctic waters.

Seventh, the Law of the Sea Convention maintains Canada's right to complete sovereignty over the Northwest Passage, a matter of enormous importance to the pride of Canadians, a matter that has been debated in this House, particularly in the 1970s at the time of the Manhattan. I am sure you will agree, Madam Speaker, that matter is very close to the heart of our nation.

Finally the convention represents a precedent-setting international convention which seeks to protect our environment and which promotes sustainable development of fisheries, of fishery stocks, and of other marine resources.

What more could we ask from a convention? It seems to have been written by a Canadian for Canadians of this generation and generations to come.

By ratifying the Law of the Sea, Canada would strengthen the sustainable development of the high seas and straddling stock fisheries, as is clearly pointed out in the Brundtland report, Our Common Future. In that connection I just want to quote briefly what Our Common Future says at page 273:

> The United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea is the most ambitious attempt ever to provide an internationally agreed regime for the management of the oceans. The resulting convention represents a major step toward an integrated management regime for the oceans. It has already encouraged national and international action to manage the oceans.
> The convention reconciled widely divergent interests of states and establishes the basis for a new equity in the use of the oceans and their resources.

And so on and so forth. Time precludes me from quoting any further but we can see the thrust of how the Brundtland commission, the global commission on environment and development, assesses the importance of the Law of the Sea, and this was five years ago.

The ratification would obviously help Canada. It would be good for Canada in a number of ways.

First, it would ensure that high sea fisheries would pursue ecologically sound practices, including deploring the use of drift net catching practices and others.

Second, it would enhance the maintenance of ecological marine systems in the oceans.

Third, it would complete the protection of fish stocks within the 200-mile exclusive economic zone.

Fourth, the Law of the Sea provides the signatories with the appropriate mechanism, so to say, to implement these principles at the earliest possible opportunity. This is why it is so important to reach the magic number of 60 nations. As I mentioned earlier, we only have 53 nations ratifying it.

Finally it would also provide momentum to the implementation of the recommendations of the Harris report which include, and I quote from it, "the management of all fish stocks indigenous to the Canadian continental shelf that extends beyond the 200-mile limit and the right of Canada to deny authorization for foreign fishing fleets to fish within its exclusive economic zone".

What more do we need? What more do we want? These are clear benefits that are lost to Canada, that are lost to our fishermen. Therefore the question that one inevitably must ask is: Why has Canada not ratified the Law of the Sea? Why does it seem to be afraid to do so?

The government has admitted that provisions in the Law of the Sea Convention would be able to aid Canada in its attempt to protect cod stocks off the coast of Newfoundland.

There was a statement made in Cancun on May 6 of this year by the minister of fisheries himself. It is on the record. There was a statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, whose parliamentary secretary I suppose will reply, in Hansard of February 25 of this year. Yet the government is dragging its feet and refusing somehow to sign the pact. It seems to be waiting for other nations to come forward before we will ratify it.

At the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, at the preparatory committee meeting in New York last March, Canada submitted, along with 40 other nations all of which except one, New Zealand I believe, ratified the Law of the Sea, resolution 16 for the protection of the oceans and all kinds of seas. It included enclosed and semi-enclosed seas, the gulf we were debating last night, coastal areas, and the protection, rational use and development of living resources. It called for, and I quote, "the establishment of principles and measures for an effective regime based on the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea".

Canada supported this measure. It is a good measure. It is a very good document because it is intended to strengthen the provisions in the Law of the Sea. We did this last March or May. I am not sure of the date exactly, but it is a very recent initiative and a good initiative for that matter, particularly with reference to the articles 63 and 64 I mentioned a moment ago regarding the management and the protection of straddling stocks beyond the 200-mile limit.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs also stated that the government was working on a number of other international initiatives intended to establish regimes for our oceans and its resources. This is what she said on February 25, 1992 in the House of Commons, yet the step of ratifying the Law of the Sea Convention is not being taken.

In Cancun the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans said: "This resolution outlines principles and measures that will give proper effect to the provision of the Law of the Sea Convention". This was the measure supported there. Therefore, how can the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans talk about clarifying and strengthening provisions in the Law of the Sea Convention, supporting the convention itself, giving it momentum and giving it his endorsement when the government has yet to ratify it? This is the basic question.

Without being a signatory to the Law of the Sea, Canada's efforts to get nations on side, to understand our position of straddling stocks, for instance, are weakened. Our credibility is affected. It is as basic as that. To take advantage of the convention without ratifying it shows that Canada tries to be self-serving with little regard for its international responsibility. It is a policy that is self-defeating. It would be very difficult to get other nations to agree to establishing principles of sustainable development in the fisheries and for the high seas when we act in such a short-sighted manner.

In conclusion I must say that although the government does not admit it, at least officially, it has been under pressure by some international and Canadian mining corporate interests not to agree to article XI of the treaty. I am told that Inco and Noranda are each involved in separate mining consortia headed by American firms. American lawyers representing this consortia have made representations to the Government of Canada pressing for revisions to the sea bed mining provisions and for Canada not to ratify the convention until those revisions are in place.

There is a public interest at stake that is much broader, much deeper and much more consequential in the long term than that of the mining industry and of the private sector. There is a public interest at stake.

One has to ask why the Government of Canada in the seven years since it has come to power has shown itself to be more sensitive to remote concerns than to present-day concerns of our fishermen and the long-term concerns of the communities that are affected.

There is no manner in which one can deny that the Law of the Sea Convention is helpful to the fisheries industry. The government has admitted this on more than one occasion.

The crisis of vanishing fish stocks off the Canadian coasts needs coherent action which includes the ratification of the Law of the Sea, a convention which I tried to demonstrate this afternoon only strengthens the sustainable development of marine resources along the coasts of our three oceans and globally in the interest of the global community.

I rest my case.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity to rise in my place to participate in this debate.

I congratulate the hon. member for Davenport on bringing forth this very important topic, though I must confess I do not entirely agree with the proposal he has put forward. I would like to respond to a number of the points he made.

Like myself he had the privilege of being part of the Canadian delegation at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development. Like me he was there when Canada really had a day of crowning glory. The proposal of the Santiago group, the 40 countries, relating to convening on an urgent basis an international conference on high seas fishing, the problem of overfishing and management of transboundary stocks, was really Canada's initiative. It was really a very great day for Canada and indeed for all Canadians.

When that proposal was incorporated into agenda 21 it became perhaps one of the most significant outcomes of the Rio conference. I believe a great deal of credit is due. I would take this opportunity to give credit not only to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the Minister of the Environment who played such key roles at that conference and in achieving that very important development. I would also like to recognize the officials of the Departments of Fisheries and Oceans and External Affairs, Bob Applebaum and Serge Avril, who did such an outstanding job of putting forth the Canadian point of view.

With respect to the ratification issue, like so many things it seems to be not quite as simple an issue as is presented by my hon. friend opposite. As he indicated in his remarks, the main reason Canada and all other industrialized countries with the exception of Iceland have not as yet ratified the convention has nothing to do with the provisions relating to the extension of the 200-mile limit and the control of fisheries resources and so on. Rather it had to do with sea bed mining and the issue of undersea resources and minerals. All industrialized countries in the western world except for Iceland have concerns with respect to that. That is why they have not ratified it.

Notwithstanding that fact, the Law of the Sea has become customary international law so that Canadians already do benefit from the provisions of great significance such as the 200-mile economic zone.

I might say this is not really a partisan issue but I would remind my hon. friend that the government of which he was Minister of the Environment could very well have ratified the document if it had thought it an appropriate thing to do at the time.

In any event, it stands as it does and Canada stands with the other G-7 countries and most of the OECD countries in the position that it has taken. The significant point is the benefit is there because of the principle of customary international law so there is no loss.

Incidentally, my hon. friend indicated 53 countries had ratified it. It is the Government of Canada's understanding that only 51 of the 159 signatories have ratified at this time. Nevertheless, they are seven or eight countries short and even if Canada ratified it still would not constitute the 60. The issue in a sense is a moot one and I suspect when the issues relating to sea bed mining get sorted out then perhaps we will see a further development in that regard.

Regardless of that, with respect to the problem of foreign overfishing and overfishing in particular on the east coast, the nose and tail of the Grand Banks, the real problem we are faced with from an international point of view is something that happens outside 200 miles where we would not have control with or without the international Law of the Sea.

Our control extends only 200 miles and our control up to that 200 miles is fully recognized by foreign nations. No foreign nation has a quota to harvest within our 200 miles without our consent.

Under the Law of the Sea the agreement the nations adhere to is that the adjacent country has the right to control those resources, is expected to make surplus resources available, but only surplus resources. Licences are only issued with respect to stocks that Canadians do not have an interest in harvesting. Normally that is because they do not have a commercial viability. That has been the practice.

In the final analysis with respect to dealing with the problem of foreign overfishing off our coasts, it is an external problem that can only be solved through international co-operation.

That really has been the basis of the approach the Government of Canada has taken for the last several years to try to bring the countries which have been overfishing, such as Spain, Portugal, South Korea and some others to a more limited extent, to try to achieve through co-operation what in fact there is no basis in international law for us to oppose.

Much as it might be nice to say: "Let us just unilaterally extend the limit," there is no legal basis for doing so. Much as we might like to say: "Well, let us go out and blast them out of the water," that is hardly acceptable. I know all members of this House would be absolutely outraged if some other country took it upon itself in international waters to arrest or otherwise interfere with a Canadian vessel.

Really, the only approach we can take is the diplomatic one frustrating though it may be. It is important to note significant progress is being made, in no small measure I might say, as a result of the efforts not only by the Prime Minister of Canada, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, but also by industry representatives, members of Parliament, and many others who participated in a very extensive campaign of putting this issue on the public agenda in Europe and in other parts of the world.

The problem of overfishing on the high seas is increasingly being recognized by the international community as an important environmental issue. It was on the basis of the fact it was an environmental issue that we were able to get the whole issue brought into the Rio summit. Some would suggest we bootlegged the issue in late in the game, but the bottom line is that it was recognized there as an environmental problem which in the final analysis is what it is.

Increasingly over the past few years there has been international recognition of the gravity of this problem. For example in 1987 the report of the World Commission on Environment and Development warned of the threat to living marine resources posed by over-exploitation, pollution and land-based development.

In 1991, more recently the G-7 heads of government issued a declaration urging compliance with the regimes established by regional fisheries organizations through effective monitoring and enforcement measures.

A report released in 1991 by the Secretary-General of the United Nations underlined in eloquent terms the dimension of the problem of overfishing by distant water fishing fleets.

The United Nations General Assembly took up this issue for the first time in 1989 when in response to the problem of overfishing in the northwest Atlantic outside Canada's 200-mile zone it expressed concern regarding the use of fishing methods and practices on the high seas that can have an adverse impact on the conservation and management of the living resources of the marine environment. The concerns were elaborated on by the General Assembly in a resolution it adopted in 1990.

Canada and other like-minded countries built on these resolutions at the last session of the General Assembly. As a result of those efforts the General Assembly adopted a very significant resolution.

It is against this background of developing international concern with respect to the problem caused by overfishing Canada launched its legal initiative to resolve the problem of overfishing on the high seas.

The Canadian initiative sought to develop specific principles and measures consistent with the Law of the Sea Convention with a view to giving full implementation to the provisions of the Law of the Sea Convention, strengthening regional organizations and ensuring the recognition of special interest of coastal states with respect to straddling stocks. This would provide for an effective legal regime governing activities of the high seas.

The first steps in the elaboration of the principles and measures were taken at a conference held in St. John's, Newfoundland in September 1990.

The conference recognized the need for such measures and agreed on a set of conclusions reflecting an increasingly shared view of how the rules of international law should be interpreted and applied. This document was further developed at a meeting of Latin American states, New Zealand and Canada in May in Santiago, Chile. Hence, it is referred to as the Santiago paper or the Santiago document which was put forward earlier this year in a series of conferences.

The first was the International Conference on Responsible Fishing held in Cancun, Mexico in May. Of course, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans led the Canadian delegation at that conference at which 66 participants at the conference declared:

First, that states should co-operate on bilateral, regional and multinational levels to establish, reinforce and implement effective means and mechanisms to ensure responsible fishing on the high seas in accordance with relevant provisions of the Law of the Sea;

Second, that the freedom of states to fish on the high seas must be balanced with the obligation to co-operate with other states to ensure conservation and rational management of the living resources in accordance with relevant provisions of the Law of the Sea; and

Third, that states should take effective action consistent with international law to deter reflagging of vessels as a means of avoiding compliance with applicable conservation and management rules for fishing activities on the high seas.

It is interesting to note following that, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans visited Panama and got the agreement of that government to discourage reflagging and the same proposal has now been made to Honduras, another country where there has been some progress.

I see I am getting the eye, Madam Speaker. I thought I had a couple of more minutes.

I will conclude by saying that all this led to the tremendously significant development at Rio. Early this fall Canada will be calling a conference of interested nations to come forward to St. John's, Newfoundland, to look ahead for that UN conference we hope will come early in 1993. We hope that will lead to the resolution of the problem and the establishment of a proper regime for the management of transboundary stocks on the basis of sustainable development.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received as follows:

Government House
Ottawa

June 23, 1992

Mr. Speaker,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Gérard La Forest, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 23rd day of June, 1992, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

Yours sincerely,

Judith A. LaRocque
Secretary to the Governor General

Mr. Milliken: Point of order, Madam Speaker. The list of bills you read is very impressive and I know there is a tremendous list already waiting for Royal Assent in the other place which of course have been passed in this House in the last few days.

I see the parliamentary secretary to the Government House leader is here. I wonder if he could explain why it is that time allocation is being used on government bills when such progress is being made.

RATIFICATION OF CONVENTION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Caccia (p. 12693).

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, I want to have an opportunity to make a few remarks before we adjourn to deal with the products of the Senate but I would like to share it with my colleague from Newfoundland if the time is short.

The motion before us today put forward by the hon. member for Davenport certainly is a very supportable and commendable proposal and I recommend it to the House.

I would also point out there are some serious problems in our attention paid to critical issues in the marine or oceanic environment. I would like to point out a couple of those. These are long historic problems that neither government, the previous Liberal government nor the government of the day, the Conservative government, has dealt with.

The first one is the Dixon Entrance problem, the boundary dispute with the United States in Dixon Entrance in which people who fish on the coast of British Columbia are constantly harassed by the Americans who had moved the AB line into the centre of the Dixon Entrance.

We see constant harassment by American coast guards, arrests, seizure of catches, seizure of vessels, and a completely intolerable response from the Government of Canada which turns around and allows this to happen.

Canadian maps show Canadian fishing territory. Canadian sovereignty should be exerted there and the Canadian law enforcement, the Canadian government, everyone allows them simply to be arrested in areas that we show on our maps as Canadian area. They are in that area harassed by the Americans, arrested, hauled to Ketchikan, their catch is seized, taken to court, fined, and it is an absolutely intolerable situation that we as Canadians have to join together and say this is intolerable. It cannot continue.

The Americans simply move the AB line out of the treaty of 1903 or 1904 and say that they are going to allow petroleum drilling in an area that is shown on Canadian maps as Canadian territory. Absolutely unacceptable.

The Americans run nuclear submarines through there, and this government concedes to it. The previous government conceded to it. The government of British Columbia and most of the communities in the area have designated themselves as nuclear-free zones for the purpose of communicating more to the Canadian agencies than the Americans, that this is the desire of Canadians, to remove nuclear vessels and their threat from the area.

The Law of the Sea Conference was an area in which the Canadian government and the delegates acquitted themselves very well. The intent was to give sovereign states jurisdiction over the surrounding coasts and oceans. But we have seen the Canadian government renege on drift-net fishing and from 1980 till today, we have seen Liberal governments and Conservative governments ignore the issues of drift-net fishing.

One of the worst examples of our neglect of our marine environment, and the intent I think of the Law of the Sea Conference, was the efforts that Canada exerted to try and get national control of an anadromous species, the salmon of the west coast. We are now almost in a war with the United States over that species.

We began a long process under the Liberal government in the late seventies, early eighties, of negotiating an interception treaty on the west coast, the Salmon Interception Treaty. We felt that we were completely sold out by the Conservative government that needed some kind of throwaway for the first visit of Ronald Reagan to his corporate vice-president here in Canada and we wound up with a situation at Quebec City where that fishery was literally thrown away.

Today we are faced with a new fish war arising in the United States where the Americans are saying that the Fraser River stocks, which are part of the old Hell's Gate problem where the Canadians allowed the Americans to come in and build the fish ladders and claim half the stocks out of the Fraser River. That is absolutely intolerable.

Canadians who live on the west coast wonder where is their federal government. They are under the impression that the Pacific fisheries are a complete throwaway, that if there is a problem with an auto treaty or an auto agreement in central Canada, then elements of the Pacific coast fisheries can be thrown away.

In this House of Commons we need to see the government spend more attention and serious attention to those fisheries. They are worth a billion dollars a year. They are not throwaway items, they are absolutely critical to native people, to the people who live on the coast of British Columbia, and they need to be stood up for.

The Pacific coast fishery should be turned over to the province of British Columbia with the full cost from this federal government, probably in tax points, to cover the cost of the operation. British Columbians care about that resource, they care about the people who depend on the resource, their enhancement, survival and protection. The government in Ottawa over the years has demonstrated that it does not care for it.

I am just absolutely appalled about the Dixon Entrance issue, about the Pacific coast salmon interception. When we talk about the Law of the Sea we have to look at the total perspective.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, I hope the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod will get lost in the halls of Parliament on his way here so that I may have at least a minute or two to make a few comments.

Let me say that the motion that is before us today calls on the Government of Canada to take the necessary steps to ratify the international Law of the Sea.

It should be noted that what Parliament is being asked to do, what the government is being asked to do, is to take the necessary steps to ratify an international convention that I think most Canadians thought had been ratified. The fact of the matter is that it has been nearly a decade, 10 years, since 119 nations, including Canada, signed the Law of the Sea.

I think most Canadians are unaware that even though it has been 10 years since the Law of the Sea was signed, with a great deal of fanfare, it has not been ratified. It has been ratified by 53 nations. It requires 60. Only one of the western industrialized nations has ratified it.

We must ask ourselves why have so many nations signed a document and then failed to ratify it?

I will tell you why, Madam Speaker, in very simple language: greed. It is the very same eyes wide open greed that led—and this is why it is criminal—to the wanton destruction of cod stocks, both northern cod and gulf cod, and the Pacific fishery stocks. It is the very same greed and lack of conviction and backbone on the part of regulators which is destroying a renewable resource and is now at work preventing the ratification of the Law of the Sea.

It is in Canada's interest. This House in an emergency debate last night and during the last week heard about the state of fish stocks, heard about a 500-year old industry that has supported a culture, a rural way of life, a value system that has been destroyed in the name of greed. We have not been able to restrain ourselves from squeezing every last convenient quick buck out of a renewable resource and treating Mother Nature like a convenient piece on a monopoly board instead of showing the ocean and the cod stock the respect we ought to have done.

Canadians are now ready to see our government move to ratify the Law of the Sea as another means of rebuilding the cod stocks.

We saw at the last Federation of Canadian Municipalities meeting a resolution supporting all the measures required to restore the cod stocks. That is a conference of every major municipality right across Canada.

Chuck Furey, the Minister of Development for Newfoundland, proposed before the Northern Ministers' Conference in Sudbury just last week a resolution calling on the five provinces attending to support the end of overfishing and the necessary measures to rebuild Canada's cod stocks. Those five ministers unanimously endorsed that position. It is another indication that Canadians are ready to take the tough decisions, the necessary measures to protect this nation's vital resources.

Canada has benefited immeasurably as a result of the Law of the Sea Convention. We have signed it. As a consequence of it, we have been able to declare sovereign rights over 1,290,000 square nautical miles of continental shelf. We have been able to claim the right to manage what is now, with the break-up of the Soviet Union, the largest marine nation in the world, bar none.

This country has the largest marine coastline on the planet earth. There is not even a close second any more with the break-up of the Soviet Union. Surely Canada should lead the charge to see that ratification of the Law of the Sea takes place. We cannot allow the interests of private concerns that want to ensure they continue to be unregulated in their desire to mine the sea bed to prevent this nation from being forward looking, confident and committed to protecting the sea resource.

This motion today is not a motion asking our government to blindly ratify the convention. It is not a motion that calls upon the Government of Canada to rush forward without any consultation with our partners in the G-7 or in the western industrialized world. It does not say that.

It says that in the opinion of this House the government should, for the benefit of Canadian fisheries, urgently take the necessary steps to ratify the international Law of the Sea, and urge other nations to do so in order to reach the 60 signatures required for the Law of the Sea to come into force.

That is what it says. It says Canada should show leadership. Canada, among western nations, should take a leading role and not leave it just to the Third World to ratify the Law of the Sea. It says Canada, which has benefited so immeasurably from this convention, ought now to give something back to the rest of the planet by urging that this convention be ratified.

It is a motion that does not condemn the Government of Canada. It does not call into question the commitment of the Government of Canada. It does not call into question the interests of the Government of Canada. It does not seek to convey one shred of partisan advantage by the proposer, the member for Davenport. It is a motion that is consistent with the integrity of this member who in all his years in this place and his many hours of debate and as many questions put on the floor of the House of Commons has always stood on the side of sustainable development.

It is a motion by a member who has said a thousand times if we ever must err in this place in so far as the environment is concerned, let us err on the side of the environment, not on the side of the speculators who want to mine the bottom of the ocean as if it were an open pit mine.

Have we not done enough damage? Have we not destroyed enough of this planet with our eyes wide open? Have we not understood by going to the real conference. The real conference is the one that I and some of my colleagues held a week ago with 1,000 fishermen and plant workers on the great northern peninsula who have seen 500 years of history wiped out because of the wanton destruction of gulf cod stocks. That is the real conference.

That is the reality we must face. Those are the people whose eyes we must meet. It is to them, the builders of Canada, those who come from the primary resource sector in Canada, those fishermen together with farmers, together with the people in the mining section, the forestry section, it is to those people we owe a vote of confidence.

I conclude with this. Remember the words of the Haida Indians from the province of British Columbia. They said that we do not inherit the land from our ancestors; we borrow it from our children. The same is true of the sea. Let us leave it better than we found it.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

> Madam Speaker, the Honourable Deputy to the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the Chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Madam Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

[English]

And being returned:

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate chamber the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following bills:

Bill C-48, an act to amend the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof—Chapter No. 26.

Bill C-22, an act to amend the Bankruptcy Act and to amend the Income Tax Act in consequence thereof—Chapter No. 27.

Bill C-74, an act to amend the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff and the Excise Tax Act—Chapter No. 28.

Bill C-75, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act—Chapter No. 29.

Bill C-81, an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada—Chapter No. 30.

Bill C-33, an act respecting the use of foreign ships and non-duty paid ships in the coasting trade—Chapter No. 31.

Bill C-82, an act to amend the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act and the National Housing Act and to amend another acts in consequence thereof—Chapter No. 32.

Bill C-7, an act respecting the status of the artist and professional relations between artists and producers in Canada—Chapter No. 33.

Bill C-45, an act to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods—Chapter No. 34.

Bill C-58, an act to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act and other acts in consequence thereof—Chapter No. 35.

Bill C-41, an act respecting the energy efficiency of energy-using products and the use of alternative energy sources—Chapter No. 36.

Bill C-13, an act to establish a federal environmental assessment process—Chapter No. 37.

Bill C-49, an act to amend the Criminal Code (sexual assault)—Chapter No. 38.

Bill C-51, an act respecting water resources in the Northwest Territories—Chapter No. 39.

Bill C-52, an act respecting water resources in the Yukon Territory—Chapter No. 40.

Bill C-70, an act to amend the Criminal Code (jury)—Chapter No. 41.

Bill S-11, an act to amend the Airport Transfer (Miscellaneous Matters) Act—Chapter No. 42.

Bill S-9, an act to amend an act to incorporate the Northwest Canada Conference Evangelical Church.

Bill S-10, an act to incorporate Green Shield Canada.

Bill S-12, an act to amalgamate the Montreal Board of Trade and the Chamber of Commerce of Metropolitan Montreal.

Bill C-87, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Public Service of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March 1993—Chapter No. 43.

The hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 93, the order is dropped to the bottom of the precedence list on the Order Paper.

[English]

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, I hope it is an appropriate time to intervene on a point of order and to suggest that we call it 10 o'clock.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Would there be unanimous consent to call it 10 o'clock?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think I had a smile thinking that the hon. member was calling it 10.30.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I appreciate your sentiment and oh, that I could have agreed. However, under the circumstances I think you will appreciate that I would want to be heard on the adjournment debate. I will be as brief as I can.

I am speaking in amplification to a question I asked the Minister of Employment and Immigration last Friday. There was a lot of concern for my riding shown by the response that the minister gave. I know that the minister really did not intend to be flippant. I understand. I have never been a minister but I do know they have fantastic responsibilities and to come to the House and answer questions for one hour a day is another part of their responsibilities and I know that tempers get short.

The minister did indicate that it took a demonstration to get this side of the House to ask questions on the desperate situation of those people who are without compensation in my riding and the six ridings in Newfoundland.

I want to keep this on as positive a note as I can. I know I have made 27 interventions on that specific subject in this House and I think the Speaker and the government have been pretty good about allowing us to air this issue.

We had an emergency debate on February 19, an opposition day on March 12, and last night from 10 p.m. until almost 1 a.m. this morning. We had an emergency debate on the plight of fishermen and plant workers in Newfoundland and Labrador because of the dreadful condition of the northern cod and gulf cod stocks.

A number of points were made. The reduction in the cod catches and stocks both offshore and inshore is mind-boggling. It has resulted in two concerns. One is the concern for the likelihood of a moratorium which will affect the offshore and the inshore in the long term. However, the purpose of the debate last night and the focus of the debate was—and if it wandered off it should have been—on the short-term requirements for those people who have in a general sense been without compensation since May 15.

In my specific case I am on my feet this evening for 60 families that do not have compensation because they had not worked long enough in Port Union at a plant with 1,200 people, at the time employing 850, and 155 trawlermen.

I am pleased to report that today I received a letter from the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and he did say he was taking a personal interest in the 60 people. I hope he is still considering some kind of compensation. However nothing has happened and it is a little bit wearisome to hear about, as much as we do appreciate it, the previous $584 million in 1990 and the $57 million the year before.

These are not normal times. These are times when people are required to take notice. Some things have happened that have never happened before. In 500 years there has never been a consideration, even a discussion, of a moratorium on any kind of fish stock.

There has never been a sea demonstration like there was on March 30 when 11 trawlers and 125 fishermen and other crew members sailed to demonstrate against foreign overfishing. We have had, in a relatively short time, two emergency debates and one opposition day on a subject that relates to this whole problem.

There is a message. We are as vocal as we can be on this side of the House, the NDP as well as the Liberals, on this subject and I know there are members on the government side who are concerned as well.

In the closing hours of the House somehow it has become a tradition. I have always managed to do this. It is not by intent. It is by accident. I want to stress to the government that as we close this House there are still people who do not have compensation in the short term, and in the long term those who will not have compensation if the fisheries are given a moratorium and who will expect some announcement from the government in the very near future.

I will certainly look forward to that, and hope that in the response there will be some indication given as to what is going to happen this summer.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I do want to answer on behalf of the government. I want to say that I am sure that all members of the House share the concerns raised by my hon. friend and none are more concerned about this problem than the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and the Prime Minister of Canada himself. All three have made it very clear that they will respond, as this government has indeed responded in the past, to this very serious problem. The minister spoke eloquently and passionately last evening on this subject. I spoke, as did my hon. friend for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception.

I want to make it perfectly clear that this government will respond. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has to make a decision with respect to whether that moratorium on the northern cod fishery should be extended. I am sure that he will want to announce the compensation package at that time.

I know my hon. friend would acknowledge that the references that have been made to the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program and to last year's Catch Failure Program are simply there as testimony to the fact that this government is aware of the problem, is prepared to respond and will respond.

The minister has said he will be making his decision on northern cod in the near future and that accompanying that decision will be a program of assistance to help those affected. The government will assist these people, as we have done in the past, when it is needed and we will do it again.

The Prime Minister has stated his concern and commitment. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the Minister of Employment and Immigration have stated their concerns.

I want to assure my hon. friend that the government's objectives are clear. The first is to ensure the conservation of the resource so that we do have a future in that very important fishery off the Grand Banks. The second objective is to assist fishermen, plant workers and families in communities.

The minister of fisheries was forced to lower the total allowable catch of northern cod from 185,000 tonnes to 120,000 tonnes this year. That was not an easy decision to make, but it was made. Earlier this month we learned that it appears the northern cod stock that once supported a total allowable catch of more than 250,000 tonnes is more depleted than what we know from last February. The definitive advice and the decision flowing from it will soon be in the public domain.

The government's record is exemplary and unprecedented. I want to assure my hon. friend that the support that is needed will be here. The Government of Canada, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, the Prime Minister of Canada hear the cries of the people of Atlantic Canada and they will respond with compassion, with generosity as appropriately as they have done in the past.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to have this opportunity to expand on my question to the Minister of Transport with regard to the development of Terminals 1 and 2 at Toronto's Pearson airport.

I was assured that the project is on stream. I was told that the runways would be developed, but I then learned there has been an extension on it until July 13 with regard to the Terminals 1 and 2 project. I want to give the key reasons why this is important. The federal government can create up to 20,000 job-years of employment in construction, service and related industries over the life of the project. The federal government can create up to 3,000 jobs this year when construction unemployment in Toronto is about 50 per cent. The redevelopment of Terminals 1 and 2 will be with private investment and absolutely no expenditure of public funds.

I think these are really important reasons and all of us who have gone through Pearson airport know that we do not want to wait until 1998 to do this project when there will be 28 million passengers per year and therefore completely overloaded. The idea is to do this project now when it is not at full capacity so that the airport can still work while this is going on.

There are tremendous benefits to Pearson airport. One per cent of all people employed in Ontario work at that airport. It is of big, big importance to all of us in Ontario. I must say, though, that the overwhelming reason why, at this point in time, the government should act is clearly this one. This is an opportunity for not just short-term economic impact, but really long-term prosperity. The development of Terminals 1 and 2 will give Canada—and a truly Canadian firm—the opportunity to reach out past the successful completion of Terminals 1 and 2 into the international marketplace. Canadian expertise used at Terminals 1 and 2 will able to be show-cased to the world. It will show that we are real leaders in this kind of technology of people and cargo moving and successfully running an airport. Canada has the capability. With Canadians working and making a show-case example of Terminals 1 and 2 we are going to have something for the world, which is our long-term prosperity. I think that is the key reason why we have to get on.

We had a big setback yesterday in Ontario when we were refused the 1998 world's fair. Big-scale economic projects come along very rarely. We cannot afford to let this one slip by. We need this and we need it now. We do not want to see any more delays after July 13.

Twenty months ago the federal government announced it was going to do something at Terminals 1 and 2. Southern Ontario is hurting economically along with everyone else. The government has an opportunity to create thousands of jobs at no cost to the taxpayer. This will be good news for Bob Rae because you do not have to, by creating all these jobs, drive up your deficit.

This is a new way of doing it. It is completely financed by the private sector. It is a good message not just for Ontario and Ontarians but indeed for all of Canada to do it this way. I think that with 3,000 jobs and up to half a million dollars of investment per day we cannot afford to be dragging our heels. We have to get this government acting as quickly as it can after July 13. It must ensure that the project, once it starts, is accelerated.

The development of Terminals 1 and 2 at Toronto's Pearson airport is important for everyone.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to respond on behalf of the government and compliment the hon. member for London—Middlesex for bringing forth this very important matter. I assure him that the Minister of Transport and the Government of Canada share his concerns with respect to this very important project.

On behalf of the minister, I would like to reaffirm the government's clear and firm commitment to the future of Lester B. Pearson International Airport. The Minister of Transport has initiated an impressive program for the restoration and modernization of Terminals 1 and 2 at Pearson airport.

In March 1992 a request for proposals was issued inviting the private sector to submit competitive proposals to undertake the project. We are now awaiting those proposals with considerable anticipation.

I am sure the House can appreciate the very fact that this is a very short time frame for such a complex project reinforces the minister's commitment to this valuable initiative. We believe it demonstrates the government's commitment to accelerating the front-end phases of the project so that the work could begin at the earliest possible date.

With regard to air-side development, in 1989, the Minister of Transport outlined the first phase of a development plan for southern Ontario. The detailed analysis of the capacity problems at Pearson revealed that two new east-west runways would provide an increase in hourly capacity from 96 to approximately 126 movements. A proposed third runway in the north-south direction would increase hourly capacity from 50 movements to approximately 70.

The government believes that the runways would yield positive net benefits for the Canadian economy. The proposed development is of course subject to a full environmental review.

In early May 1991 a detailed environment impact statement describing the environmental and social consequences of the proposal was filed with the federal environmental review office panel. Recommendations by the panel are expected, and indeed eagerly waited, in the not too distant future. Rest assured that the report will be given every priority by the Minister of Transport.

Madam Speaker, before I sit down, may I wish you and your colleagues of the Chair who have served this House so well a very pleasant and happy summer. We hope it will be a long summer.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Thank you. The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie.

TRADE

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to elaborate on a question I posed to the Prime Minister on June 4 of this year.

It was with regard to pending trade actions by American steel producers against a whole host of countries. I believe it was 36 countries and Canada was included. This was just subsequent to a visit by our Prime Minister to the United States. He came back and said he was confident that frivolous and vexatious American trade actions would cease. We indeed hope that that is true.

Although we were wary, we felt that the Americans would lodge these actions on June 15. I am now told that they are expected on June 30.

We do not believe that the visit of the Prime Minister has changed anything in the United States with regard to protectionist sentiments toward Canadian steel producers. The Prime Minister in his response said that we were caught in a side-swipe from Korea. I suggest that we were not only side-swiped, but front-ended and back-ended and everything else.

We have been exempt from voluntary restraint agreements as other countries have received therefore supposedly striking up a special relationship with the United States.

That has not happened. Our market share of the United States has been consistent at 3 per cent to 3.5 per cent since 1988, whereas the American share of our market has risen from just over 7 per cent to about 16 per cent at this particular time.

There is no agreement on the definition of subsidies. The Americans say we are subsidized. We know that they are subsidized to the tune of several billions of dollars.

Certainly we have had some warning that this would happen when the visit of the Canadian steel producers to the United States was cancelled 24 hours prior to arriving there. The suggestion was that it was the Pennsylvania primaries that postponed the visit. I suggest they knew about this months in advance. Also we have been unable to schedule another session. We expect on June 30 that the shoe will drop.

Canadian steel producers and the United Steel Workers of America went to Washington. They told me: "Play this low key. We feel the Americans are very sensitive to the problems of Canadian steel. We will not involve you in any trade actions".

Those sensitivities have proven to be incorrect. I think they are going to be as sensitive as a sledge-hammer come June 30. I would hope the government would respond by indicating just exactly what it is doing to preclude us from being caught up in this unnecessary, unjust trade action against Canadian steel producers.

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to answer today the question the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie asked the Prime Minister of Canada on June 4 regarding the looming crisis in Canada-U.S. steel trade.

As the hon. member knows, it is anticipated that the U.S. steel industry will include Canada in its expected filing of unfair trade petitions against steel imports from a number of countries.

As he may also know, both the government and the Canadian industry have been expressing to the U.S. administration and the U.S. industry our strong view that including imports from Canada in these petitions is unnecessary and potentially destructive to the mutually beneficial trade in steel between our two countries and would likely precipitate a major bilateral trade dispute between Canada and the United States.

We have emphasized to the U.S. administration, most recently during the June 9 meeting between the hon. minister for International Trade and U.S. trade representative Hills, that while U.S. steel imports from Canada have remained stable, Canadian steel imports from the United States have tripled in recent years.

In 1991 imports from the United States accounted for over 16 percent of our market as compared to the 3.3 percent of the U.S. market accounted for by Canada.

The government has also emphasized that if included in the U.S. petitions, the Canadian steel industry would have no choice but to include imports from the United States in unfair trade cases that they are preparing against imports into Canada.

On the latter point, the Canadian steel industry is committed to taking action against imports of steel from the United States should their exports be targeted by the U.S. industry. The government stands ready to initiate investigations based on complaints filed by the Canadian industry.

We are extremely disappointed in the response of the U.S. administration to our message and would deeply regret it if the U.S. industry chose to include Canada in its petitions.

Madam Speaker, in conclusion I would like to join my hon. colleague from South Shore in wishing a happy holiday to you and to the staff who assist you in carrying out your duties, and to all the Canadians who are listening to us.

CHILDREN

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, on June 12, I asked the minister of state a question concerning the full indexation of the child tax credit so that it would be tied to inflation. She answered by referring to the deficit as a reason why we have child poverty. I am not sure the minister knew at the time about the magnitude of the problem in my region of Ottawa—Carleton.

I want to elaborate on my question in order to make the point that child poverty is a major national issue that needs the attention of everyone. In our region the number of children who are poor is really alarmingly high. Fourteen per cent of all children under 18 years of age are poor. That is approximately 19,000 children who are living in poverty.

Poor children normally live in poor families. Children are poor because their families are poor. Their parent or parents do not earn enough income to provide for the basic physical and social necessities of life. For example, in excess of 12,000 families with children are living in poverty in my region of Ottawa—Carleton. Also the number of poor two-parent families is almost equal to the number of single-parent families living in poverty.

Young families are extremely poor. Fifty-five per cent of families living in this region with children where the household maintainer is under the age of 25 are living in poverty. The situation improves somewhat for a family with children where the household maintainer is between the ages of 25 and 34, but one out of five of these families is also poor.

Also, Madam Speaker, you will be very sad to learn that 93 per cent of all single parent families living in poverty in our region are headed by women. The poverty rate for single mothers is 33 per cent and 12 per cent for single fathers. That translates into 5,725 single mothers who are living in poverty and 455 single fathers are poor in my region.

The poverty rate for single mothers increases with the number of children. For example, 29 per cent of single mothers with one child are poor and 56 per cent of single mothers with four or more children are poor.

This has a tremendous impact on the education of children. Approximately one out of three students in Ontario, as a whole, drops out before completing grade 12, and it is no different for this region. Nearly one out of four families with children where the household maintainer has not completed high school is living in poverty.

Finally, almost half of all poor families in this region has a household maintainer who has not completed high school.

That is why I wanted to bring this issue to the attention of the government so that we can implement some action plan by the year 2000 to eliminate child poverty.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Ottawa Centre has suggested that the proposed child tax benefit will make families on welfare worse off. This is not true.

In addition to thousands of dollars per child in social assistance benefits, families on welfare will continue to receive at least the same level of federal child benefits under the child tax benefit as they are now receiving under the current system.

Some families on social assistance will receive higher benefits if they have three or more children, or more than $3,750 in annual earnings.

Families on welfare will also gain from having their full child benefits paid monthly. For example, in January 1993 their monthly child benefit payments will more than double from the current $35 per child to at least $85 per child. Since the child tax benefit will be paid in a timely matter, welfare mothers will no longer need to sacrifice benefits to tax discounters.

The hon. member has also suggested that the government does not care about child poverty because the child tax benefit is indexed to changes in prices in excess of 3 per cent.

The child tax benefit is being automatically indexed in the same way as the rest of the tax system. I would like to point out that this new benefit will automatically increase total federal assistance to children by $2.1 billion over the next five years. In addition to this automatic increase of $2.1 billion in child assistance, the government is committed to reviewing child benefits over time and further increasing payments as fiscal conditions permit.

The hon. member conveniently ignores the fact that since 1985 the government has demonstrated its commitment to helping children by enriching the refundable child tax credit five times. These enrichments have ensured that the average level of federal child benefits paid to low-income families has more than kept pace with inflation.

Madam Speaker, in conclusion I would like to associate myself with the salutations to yourself, to the Table Officers, and to the pages who have served us so well this season.

Mr. Harb: Madam Speaker, having listened to my colleague with his eloquent French I would like to take such an——opportunity to congratulate him for his very good French. This is extraordinary.

On behalf of my colleagues, I wish you a good holiday. I congratulate you, as well as all the people who have helped you.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 38(5), the motion that this House do now adjourn is deemed adopted.

However, I would also like to thank all those who are with us here, and particularly the young people who may be spending their last day in the House of Commons.

[English]

Despite all the work you had to do while studying and having exams and so on I do hope that you enjoyed your stay in the House of Commons as much as I and each and everyone of my colleagues appreciated your work at each and every moment.

Have a nice summer and good luck in your careers, whatever you choose to be. Hopefully, one or two of you may come back to the House. I hope you did not find it that bad after all.

Since this is June 23, I want to take this opportunity to wish all Quebecers a happy Saint-Jean-Baptiste Day, and Canadians from the Atlantic to the Pacific to the Arctic, a happy Canada Day.

It being 6.37 p.m., the House stands adjourned until Monday, September 21, 1992, at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Orders 24(1) and 28(2). I wish a good summer to everyone.

The House adjourned at 6.37 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

RECALL OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Speaker: I wish to inform the House that, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 28(3), I gave notice that the House should meet today. On Friday, September 4, 1992, I sent electronic mail to each member explaining the reasons for the recall of the House.

[English]

I also wish to inform the House that in accordance with the representation made by the government under the provisions of Standing Order 55(1) I have caused to be published a special Order Paper giving notice of a government motion. I now lay upon the table the relevant documents.

I am also tabling today documentation relating to the request by the government to recall the House for July 15, 1992 as well as documentation which resulted in my decision to rescind the recall of the House scheduled for that day.

On June 26, 1992, after consultation with the government under the provisions of Standing Order 28(3) and being satisfied that the public interest required that the House be recalled in order to consider the constitutional situation, I gave notice that the House meet on July 15, 1992.

[Translation]

On July 10 I received a request, signed by representatives of the three recognized parties in the House, to rescind the recall because they felt it was no longer necessary, in the public interest, to recall the House for July 15, 1992.

[English]

This request to rescind the recall was unprecedented and the Standing Orders do not offer the Speaker any direction as to the action to be taken in such a case. As the recall of the House is ultimately the prerogative of the Speaker, on July 11, 1992, after careful consideration, I directed that the recall of July 15, 1992 be rescinded. I came to this decision as the request to rescind the recall was made by all three recognized parties that agreed it was no longer necessary in the public interest for the House to meet at that time.

I wish to thank the House for allowing the Speaker to explain the reasons for his decision.

VACANCY

SHEFFORD

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the following vacancy has occurred in the representation, namely, the Hon. Jean C. Lapierre, P.C., member for the electoral district of Shefford, by resignation, on Sunday, August 23, 1992.

In accordance with paragraph 25(1)(b) of the Parliament of Canada Act, on Monday, August 24, 1992, I addressed my warrant to the Chief Electoral Officer for the issue of a writ of election for the said electoral district.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

INTERNATIONAL LITERACY DAY

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, today is International Literacy Day. This occasion gives Canadians an opportunity to look at the seriousness of illiteracy in our country.

A number of studies indicated that there are 25 per cent to 40 per cent of Canadians who have different degrees of difficulty with literacy and numeracy. It is estimated that it costs Canada $10 billion a year to respond to this particular problem.

What we need is a change of policies. We need to stop cutting funds to the provinces for education. We need to remove the goods and services tax on books, and we need to provide jobs for young Canadians so that they can go back to college and university.

I urge all Canadians who want to improve their literacy and numeracy skills to enrol in literacy and numeracy programs today in organizations that promote those programs: schools, colleges, and universities.

[Translation]

These programs exist in French, English and other languages.

I wish all Canadians who are now back in their class-rooms a very successful school year.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, on October 26 Canadians will have the opportunity to reaffirm their belief in this country in the first national referendum in 50 years.

The wording will neither be complex nor lengthy and could read as follows: Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached August 28, 1992?

The question is simple but the constitutional package is complex. It is my belief Canadians will speak in support of a renewed Canada provided they understand the proposals.

I urge all members of Parliament to work together to heighten the debate and take it to a level never before seen in Canadian politics. If this is achieved Canadians will unmistakably reaffirm their belief in this country on October 26.

DR. CHANDER GROVER

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, two weeks ago a human rights tribunal issued a devastating indictment of the National Research Council for its discriminatory treatment of world-renowned optics scientist, Dr. Chander Grover.

In the words of the tribunal, calling the treatment of Dr. Grover harsh and unfair falls far short of the humiliating, demeaning, and destructive treatment he suffered at the hands of the National Research Council.

This treatment continued even while his case was being heard and decided upon by the tribunal. Even worse, Dr. Perron, president of NRC, and the minister of state for science and technology were repeatedly made aware of ongoing retaliation against Dr. Grover.

I ask both the minister of state for science and technology and the Minister of Justice to investigate and ensure those responsible for this blot on our national reputation are properly disciplined. Until we blot out discrimination we will waste the talent of fine scientists like Dr. Grover.

MINING INDUSTRY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, for several months I have been speaking in Ottawa on behalf of parties involved in mining exploration and development, the economic development of our resource region Abitibi-Témiscamingue.

For several months the federal government has been conducting negotiations with Quebec concerning the Canada-Quebec Subsidiary Agreement on Mineral Development. As the federal Minister, of Energy, Mines and Resources said in his letter dated August 14, 1992, negotiations were progressing and an agreement might be concluded by the end of this summer.

The mining industry needs a boost, and the people of Abitibi-Témiscamingue are getting impatient. They would like to see this agreement signed as soon as possible.

LABOUR

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we celebrated Labour Day, a time when women and men pause to join with their families to celebrate their contribution to nation building.

As we speak this week in the Chamber about how the constitutional deal will save Canada, let us not forget what we have to lose as Canadians.

While opinion leaders and politicians have spent their time worrying over a constitutional agreement, the second phase of the Tory agenda, the economic Constitution, was slipped on the public agenda.

The North American free trade agreement will mean even more job loss and dislocation for thousands of Canadian workers. The Tory response to the disaster of the free trade agreement with the U.S. was to extend the misery to those their first agreement missed.

I ask this House to join me in saying thank you to the women and men who through their labour have made this a wonderful country worth saving and in saying no thank you to NAFTA.

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, in the days and weeks ahead elected representatives at all levels of government will be called upon to help lead in the historic debate and referendum now coming before us, a process which I believe will result in a renewed and lasting spirit of Canadian unity.

• (1410)

There is no level of government that will play a more important role in this campaign than will the cities, towns and villages of Canada, the virtual multitude of Canadian municipalities where government and politics are closer to the people than most federal or provincial representatives ever really get.

It is therefore a critical part of the current referendum challenge to ensure that local leaders are fully involved in it. The mayors and councillors of Canada's municipalities have tremendous responsibilities and opportunities to influence the direction which Canadians will choose for the future destiny of our country.

I must say I am very pleased and proud that last Friday the leaders of the four municipalities in my riding, the city of Fredericton, the town of Oromocto and the villages of New Maryland and Stanley, publicly proclaimed their unanimous alliance in support of Canadian unity and their commitment to say yes to the constitutional question that will be placed before the nation on October 26.

ILLEGAL DRUGS

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, on August 23 two young men were found dead in a rooming house in Parkdale—High Park from heroin overdose. Within a three-day time frame six heroin deaths occurred in metro Toronto, possible victims of a drug marketing war.

A TV special on drug abuse and trafficking problems in Vancouver showed police and politicians losing control of communities to criminals. Related to this is the visible prostitution trade. Parents worry that their children playing in parks and school yards are exposed to syringes and condoms.

I congratulate the Parkdale residents who are regaining control of their community. Now Parkdale community legal services are threatening to take action to force residents off the streets in protection of prostitutes.

Enough is enough. Under the present justice system taxpayers' money will be used to protect non-taxpaying hookers. The drug prostitution harassment has reached a national crisis. I call on this government to strengthen legislation to bring back safety and security to our streets and communities.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend all those who contributed to the attainment of the Charlottetown accord which I believe is a fair deal for Canadians and for Canada.

Like most Canadians I look forward to voting yes in the referendum and putting the constitutional dialogue behind us. Nova Scotian participation in the first ministers' process did not receive a great deal of publicity, but as a Nova Scotian I am proud of the leadership role played by Premier Cameron and his two opposition colleagues in bringing about a commendable resolution of these difficult challenges.

But the constitutional challenges are not foremost in the minds of Nova Scotians, nor I suspect of any other Canadians. We are concerned about the still sluggish economy with its lagging consumer confidence. While clearly we are on the road to recovery, there is still much uncertainty and consumers are still reluctant to resume their normal spending patterns.

As we work to put the great constitutional uncertainty behind us, I urge all political leaders to address as well the economic issues that are foremost in the minds of Atlantic Canadians.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, the federal government must take immediate steps to alleviate the problems facing the prairie agricultural economy. In addition to continuing low prices and a tax on the market place, the prairies have been hit by drought, cool weather, frost, and in some areas snow.

The federal government has the responsibility to initiate support programs for disaster areas. Many rural municipalities throughout Saskatchewan and Alberta have asked to be designated disaster areas.

I remember clearly an old campaign promise: Farmers have to fight the weather; they should not have to fight the government. This year truer words were never spoken.

I call on the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Finance and the government to announce immediately the extension of the interest-free cash advance program and a new disaster relief program to accommodate the desperate needs outlined so well by the rural municipalities and the farmers of western Canada.

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, most of us return to this House today with mixed feelings. Although we had important events and people to see in our ridings, we are pleased that the constitutional discussions have progressed to the point of agreement.

In spite of the weather, it has been a good summer for Canadians. The Canada 125 celebration and the Voyageurs program for youth have helped to fan the flames of patriotism.

Canadians have had enough of the constitutional discussions and are now prepared to respond to the agreement reached by the first ministers. There are those who oppose the agreement because they want no agreement. Others will stand firm because it is not exactly the way they would write it.

It is not exactly what I want either. There are changes I would prefer, but we cannot have individual constitutions. This agreement is the result of extensive consultation. All Canadians have had the opportunity to express themselves. It is time to accept that this is the best compromise we are going to reach. It is time to put the question to Canadians and to turn the page.

METRO TORONTO

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, the economic plight of metro Toronto has truly reached chronic proportions. While the government continues to take a hands-off approach, Canadians in Toronto are paying a particularly high price for this cavalier attitude.

The unemployment rate in Toronto has reached its highest level since the Great Depression: 11.7 per cent. Two hundred and forty-four thousand people are without jobs, more than double the number of only two years ago.

When you also add the number of people who have given up looking for work and the replacement of full-time jobs by part-time work, you regrettably have a Toronto which has been brought to its economic knees.

Metro Toronto's leadership role in the country's economy has been grossly mismanaged and allowed to deteriorate to an all-time low.

I urge this government to immediately put the brakes to this stagnation by exercising the levers to effectively stimulate the Toronto economy and thereby create the jobs and consumer confidence that is badly needed.

For this Conservative government to watch this unravel and do absolutely nothing is the height of political irresponsibility.

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am happy that we are all back in the House of Commons today. I want to welcome members back from a summer that gave us the chance to travel throughout the country. I have had the pleasure of going from Victoria, B.C. to St. John's, Newfoundland.

I would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. Will he agree that this House of Commons will resume, as scheduled, normal sitting on September 21, so that we can deal with the economic problems of this nation? Or is the government planning to postpone the economic affairs of this nation for another two months?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are back to deal with the Constitution. When that matter is resolved, and I think my hon. friend will agree with me that it is rather important, the attention of the House will no doubt turn to other matters.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, during my travels this past summer, I met with workers, businessmen and fishermen and everyone spoke about economic problems. Only when I was through talking with those people would the reporters ask me questions about the Canadian Constitution.

What I want to ask the Prime Minister is this: Why could we not sit as usual on September 21 and debate the economic problems during the referendum campaign? We were able to do both in 1980.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it will depend on the will of the House. I know that a large number of members from all political parties have expressed the wish to take part in the referendum debate in their own ridings.

I believe that the hon. member for Papineau said the other day that he would prefer the House to adjourn to October 27. I could be wrong as I do not have the text before me; I shall have to look at it more closely.

In any case, we are entring a major referendum debate which will involve all members of Parliament. They will probably want to take part in the debate in their own ridings. However, it is up to the Leader of the Opposition to suggest other alternatives.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people want us to deal with the other problems of the nation while we are debating the Constitution.

In fact, if we create the impression that the government or the Prime Minister want to avoid taking responsibility for the economy for another two months, Canadians might be very disappointed and refuse to be as nice as they should be on the constitutional matter.

The unemployed of this country want this government to change its economic policies right now so that they can have jobs and respect. When will the government do something about the economy? That is what they want to know.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, Canadians generally recognize that variables cannot be isolated. You cannot put the Constitution over here and the economy over here. They are very closely co-mingled. Economic recovery in Canada depends in very substantial measure on a successful resolution of our constitutional problems.

There are people who will be opposing this deal; not because it has imperfections, because it does and that is fair ball, but others will be opposing the deal because they want to dismantle Canada. It is important that we all be out there, not only defending the deal to the extent humanly possible, but defending Canada as well.

I do not think that Canadians will hold it against us if we deal first and foremost for the next four weeks with resolving the constitutional issue once and for all and then turning our full attention as a united nation toward the question of the economy.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has said that the Constitution and the economy are co-mingled.

If that is correct, I ask the Prime Minister this. Why does he treat them as mutually exclusive, as an either/or question? Why does he not agree that while we are working on the referendum, we can also be meeting in this House to hear the new economic plans of the government to get the economy going. Is this government saying that it cannot even walk and chew gum at the same time when it comes to the economy of this country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member would be the first to agree that resolving the constitutional problems and bringing about a mood of consensus and national unity will have a very direct bearing upon the economic fortunes of this country. There is no question about that and I think the hon. member would agree with me.

He knows that the constitutional issue which has been in the forefront of the political agenda for the last number of months affects investment plans. Foreign investors will be watching this debate very closely and very keenly.

I am sure that he, other members of this House and all Canadians will welcome the fact that we have an opportunity now to resolve the constitutional crisis in a very positive vein and that he would be the first one out there joining us in ensuring that it happens.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, Philip Cross, Statistics Canada's director of current analysis said about the economy, after eight years of this government: "There have never been four straight quarters where the economy has done as little as this. It's moving sideways, which is quite extraordinary for a recovery".

In the face of these facts, why does the government want to wait and do nothing for two months while the economy is drifting and 1.6 million Canadians are out of work? This is no way to build confidence in the economy of this country or its future.

If the government is serious about the country's future, why will it not present new plans to this House to get the economy going while we are working on the referendum?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, just this morning the Royal Bank of Canada predicted that the recovery will continue to gather steam for this year and move on to firmer ground in 1993.

We have had employment growth in the economy in three of the last four months. Forty-three thousand jobs have been created over that period of time and there has been consecutive real growth in the GDP in the last five quarters. The GDP is up. Consumer confidence is improving. Business confidence is improving.

I remind the hon. member that recovery is slow because the world economy is slow. The G-7 countries are projecting growth in the area of 2 per cent or less. Canada, as part of the world economy and an important trading nation within those economies, is directly affected. The signals are there. It is a slow but durable and sustainable recovery. I remind the hon. member that mortgage rates have dropped to a 35-year low in this country.

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday, Labour Day, Canada celebrated the work of the millions of workers in Canada who built this country, who work for this country. Sadly a large number of those are now out of work. In the two months that this House was in recess, July and August, 137,000 more full-time jobs were lost in Canada.

The Minister of Finance says that the fundamentals are in place. For those 137,000 people who have just lost a full-time job, added to the 1.6 million, I say this to the Prime Minister. The government talks about the prosperity agenda. Unemployed workers are asking: "Is this it, unemployment?".

When is the government going to bring in a plan to get Canadians back to work and to address the serious unemployment in this country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I acknowledge that unemployment is higher than we would like to see it. However, the hon. member's assertion is absolutely incorrect.

The fact of the matter is that 43,000 new jobs have been created over the last four months. There have been increases in three of the last four months.

I remind the hon. member that while there have been increases in employment there have also been corresponding increases in the labour force. The labour force grew by 12,000 in the month of August and employment grew by 11,000. It is certainly not dramatic but at least it is pointing in the right direction.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I remind the Minister of Finance that people across this country are hurting and are in pain because they do not know if they are going to have a job tomorrow if they have one today and if they do not have a job they do not know how they are going to get one because this government's policies have created unemployment in this country.

The government has choices about what it does. Whether or not the House is sitting, it is the government's responsibility to get a job creation program under way in this country.

Today the government sent millions of pamphlets to Canadians that were paid for by the taxpayer, on the trade deal. It is also spending another $1.8 million in radio ads alone to promote the trade deal, NAFTA. Despite the loss of over 360,000 manufacturing jobs since the Canada–U.S. trade deal came into effect, the government in this publication has the gall to say: "Free trade is helping to create the kinds of jobs Canadians need to compete in today's global marketplace." That is disgusting.

Canadians do not need to see ads for a bad trade deal. They need to see ads for jobs. When are Canadians going to see those ads?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party is wrong again. She suggests that something in the order of 300,000 manufacturing jobs have been lost in the manufacturing sector since the free trade agreement has been signed. That is false.

Statistics Canada, as the hon. member will note, has reported that some 186,000 jobs in the manufacturing sector were lost between September 1984 and September 1992. To offset that, there have been 1.3 million new jobs created for a net gain well in excess of one million new jobs.

TRADE

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the Minister of Finance talk to Statistics Canada and ask why the unemployment rate remains at 1.6 million. It is unchanged.

On the other hand, the NAFTA, the agreement between the United States, Mexico and Canada, a text of 900 pages, will be made public today. The American Congress will be holding public hearings on the agreement, but there will be nothing in Canada.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Will he undertake to have a parliamentary committee hold public hearings in all regions of Canada so that all Canadians can express their views on this agreement?

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was told before the summer break exactly what the government will be doing on this. It will be consulting Parliament similar to the way it consulted Parliament during the free trade agreement.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, in the United States, President Bush has recently announced a multibillion dollar program to help workers in industrial sectors adversely affected by the North American free trade agreement while the Clinton Democrats are calling for even more extensive adjustment assistance.

Why has the Canadian government not introduced additional adjustment assistance to help Canadian business and Canadian workers adapt to freer trade?

• (1430)

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): It is, indeed, a good question. The hon. member is referring to an announcement by President Bush whereby he outlined spending $2 billion, $1.8 billion in real money for a work force of about 175 million people. In Canada, we spend $3.55 billion for 14 million workers. It does not compare.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister will know full well in his review of adjustment assistance in Canada that the deGrandpre report stated: "The removal of interprovincial barriers to economic activity is the most important step government should take".

Canadians cannot understand how the government can negotiate free trade with the United States and Mexico but cannot negotiate free trade within Canada. As the de Grandpre report emphasized, a true economic union in Canada is essential if Canadians are to be competitive in the 21st century.

What concrete measures is the government taking to create a true common market within our own country?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there was some considerable progress made on that issue during the constitutional discussions. There was not as much progress as we would have liked and I think not as much progress as the opposition would have liked, although a little more than was made in an earlier round of constitutional discussions.

What is most important is that there is a firm commitment now by all of the first ministers to the principles of free trade within the country. There is a process set forth that will allow first finance ministers and then first ministers to gradually move us toward a situation in which in addition to the guarantee of free trade in goods under section 121 we will make significant progress on free trade also in services, in capital and in persons.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

When the Prime Minister signed the first disastrous trade deal he said that we would have an economic boom in Canada and he said that we would have the best adjustment programs in the world. Instead, what we have is a devastating recession. The situation in metro Toronto alone is worse than it has ever been in the entire lifetime of Brian Mulroney.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to refer to ministers or other members appropriately.

Ms. Copps: How can the Prime Minister agree to a second deal when the first deal is sending thousands of Canadians to the unemployment lines?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member refers to the adjustment issue. If she would care to look at what Statistics Canada has just published recently, she will see the number of jobs that have been created on account of free trade with the United States and that the recovery in this country is led by exports to the United States. Maybe she cannot see that, but Canadian workers do.

When she talks about the adjustment program, the Americans are looking at what we do in Canada in terms of income support, in terms of training, in terms of counselling workers and helping them adjust to this new economy. We are doing what the Americans hope to have under their program but do not.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that maybe the hon. minister should talk to some Canadian workers. While this deal might be good for Dallas and good for Acapulco, it certainly is not good for the workers in Hamilton, Toronto or Sydney.

Using the steel industry as a simple example, under the current deal the steel industry has been hammered and hammered and hammered by unfair trade practices from the United States.

How can the government agree to a second deal that has no binding dispute settlement mechanism, no anti-dumping code and no serious definition of subsidies and leaves us in the same mess as the current free trade agreement?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is quite wrong. The deal, indeed, has a binding dispute settlement mechanism. This statement is fundamentally and completely inaccurate.

Ms. Copps: Wrong.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says that they are wrong. When the deal is tabled on the floor of the House of Commons, she will see that she is wrong. I know she will then want to stand up and acknowledge that fact to the Canadian people.

For the benefit of my hon. friend when she is reviewing her facts with regard to trade arrangements, the free trade agreement has already attracted $15.1 billion in new foreign direct investment in Canada. Last year, Canada exported $5.7 billion more in goods and services to the United States than in 1988, the year before the free trade agreement came into effect.

I know that there is a fundamental difference of opinion with regard to trading arrangements between some opposition parties and the government. We favour broad, liberalized trading arrangements because we believe that Canada can compete with any other nation in the world.

The only way to build new prosperity is to trade one's way to new prosperity. That is precisely what we have done and it is what we are going to continue to do irrespective of the opposition that would like to take us back 40 or 50 years. Canadians will not do that.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Throughout this summer people in this country have seen continued unemployment, unemployment that is both frightening and unacceptable. The only thing worse in fact has been the inaction of this government in the face of that problem.

We see three months of unemployment stuck at 11.6 per cent. We see growth rates only a quarter of what the government has predicted. We see that business investment has declined.

I ask the government this question. The Minister of Finance says that he admits things are slower. Surely that is a reason for this government to come back with a different answer, a new response, some new energy and urgency to deal with unemployment.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I remind the hon. member that employment has increased by 43,000 in three of the last four months. The labour force is growing.

We have had five consecutive quarters of positive GDP, very modest. We are seeing some turnaround in consumer demand. As my colleague the Minister of Employment and Immigration pointed out, the demand for exports is improving. In the first quarter, exports improved by 14.4 per cent. In the second quarter, there has been a further improvement of 4.6 per cent. Housing starts are improving. There has been steady improvement in the composite index, the index of fifteen components in the Canadian economy.

While the hon. member takes some pleasure in signalling some of the negative indicators, there are a number of positive indicators on the horizon. I think a close analysis will reveal that there are probably more positive indicators right at this particular time than there are negative ones.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, faced with the same situations which we face here, 10 days ago the Japanese government changed its policies.

It launched a $102 billion package of tax cuts, of spending and of government guarantees. Why is it fine for Japan to change its position to deal with an unemployment problem that is not as bad as ours and it is not right for us to make such changes? Why does getting people back to work make sense in Japan but not in Canada?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, quite frankly, we do not have the luxury that the Government of Japan has.

We cannot stimulate in a fiscal manner because of our difficult debt and deficit situation. That is an issue we have to deal with. I know the hon. member would suggest that the government should print more money and spend it. That comes from his party's employment and immigration critic.

• (1440)

We do not share that view. We believe it is important to get the fundamentals right. In getting the fundamentals right, you get a situation where mortgage rates decline to a 35–year low, you get price stability and that is important for investment. If we can resolve the constitutional issue that will create further confidence.

He talks about taxes. This government in the last budget reduced taxes. What happened? The NDP socialist governments in Saskatchewan, Ontario and British Columbia took up that slack and increased taxes beyond that which we provided in relief.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Last month the figures showed that Canada lost a further 27,000 manufacturing jobs.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance: Did he foresee his government's economic policies were going to be so devastating to our manufacturing sector? If so, could he tell us specifically where the latest victims of Tory economic mismanagement are supposed to apply for a new job?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows very well that the restructuring going on here in Canada is also going on in other countries, particularly the G–7 countries. That is what all the G–7 countries are faced with. There has been a three million increase in the number of unemployed in the G–7 countries in the last two years.

I think the hon. member would also share the view that as productivity increases the number of jobs declines, relatively speaking. There has been a pick up in the telecommunications and service sectors and that is how there has been 1.3 million new jobs created over the last four to five years.

Indeed, the new economy, the economy of the future will be perhaps less reliant upon manufacturing, albeit it will be a very important component. Relatively speaking, the service sector, the high–technology sector, the electronics sector, the information technology as we refer to it from time to time, is part and parcel of the replacement for some of those manufacturing jobs.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, the minister has just told this House that according to him the decline in our manufacturing employment, which has been 17 per cent since free trade, is just the result of global trends. Why then has Canada lost manufacturing jobs at twice the rate of the Americans?

I want to ask this minister, does he really believe we can have a strong Canadian economy if we do not have a strong manufacturing sector? Manufacturing sectors are the backbone of every one of our leading competitors in the world.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, of course we need a strong manufacturing sector and that is why we disbanded the manufacturers' sales tax which was a hidden silent killer of jobs. That is why we brought in the GST which has improved the competitive position of the manufacturing sector by $3.5 billion. That is why we negotiated liberalized trading arrangements with Mexico and the United States to ensure we would have access to those markets.

I am pleased the hon. member has recognized that we have provided in the budget incentives for the manufacturing sector in terms of a reduction in taxes and improvements in the capital cost allowance which further improves the competitiveness of the manufacturing sector. It clearly demonstrates we do take the manufacturing—

Mr. Speaker: I think we must move on.

YOUTH

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, young Canadians are facing a national crisis. As the Prime Minister celebrates his eighth year in office, over 450,000 young people are unemployed. Every year 100,000 young people drop out of high school and thousands more are denied access to post–secondary education and training.

Why does the Prime Minister not realize his programs have been those of anguish and despair? Why does he refuse to address the concerns of young Canadians?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member refers to help for young Canadians, he should look at——the panoply of programs that have been put in place to help these young Canadians stay in school.

[English]

One is the stay–in–school initiative. I think there are over 450 START programs all across Canada led by youth trying to keep them in school. The training effort has more than tripled in the last three years by this government.

The Liberals stand in this House asking for more for youth. They opposed for a year and a half spending hundreds more millions of dollars on training Canadians. That is what we have done. They resisted that. Today the hon. member stands up and complains, but I think that Canadians can see their game.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, I travel throughout Canada listening to young people. I can tell you that this generation is extremely disappointed in the actions of this government. Eight years after the promise of jobs, jobs, jobs, young people in Canada are still waiting for job opportunities, educational opportunities and training opportunities.

My question to the minister is the following: When will this government become a vehicle of opportunity for young Canadians? When will this government stop turning its back on young Canadians?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, like my hon. colleague and I am sure a number of other colleagues who have travelled the country, we do meet young Canadians who have confidence in the future, particularly when they are looking at a unified Canada.

What the young people of this country want to make sure of is to have the fundamentals in place so that they have a chance to face the future, and that is exactly what we are doing.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Over the summer the government, with the support of the Liberals, went on an outrageous spending spree on military equipment, including spending $4.5 billion on cold war helicopters. Last Friday it spent an additional over $20 million on new armouries of all things. Yet the government is cutting back on job training programs.

How does the government explain this unconscionable spending binge to young Canadians like Mike McBride in my riding and other young Canadians all across Canada who are rejected for job training opportunities because the government says it does not have any money?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should listen. The government is not saying that it does not have any money. The government has increased spending on training Canadians, again a measure which that party opposed in this House and helped the Liberals for a year and a half to prevent Canadians from being trained. We have done it notwithstanding that. We have done it. We are spending $3.5 billion in adjustment and training programs for Canadians. The 800,000 Canadians who benefit from these programs know what we are talking about.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, unemployed Canadians know who is telling the truth on this issue.

My supplementary is for the Minister of National Defence. Recent history shows that these defence contracts which the government announced this summer are a lucrative source of jobs for at least some Canadians. Former officials of DND get snapped up by the private defence industry on projects which they have pushed within DND.

Will the minister take steps now to break up this cosy relationship that completely compromises the integrity of the advice which DND gives to the government on the helicopter and other issues?

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would first of all tell the hon. member that the $4 billion for the helicopters is spread out over the 13 years of the contract.

Second, the department has had very strict conflict of interest regulations since 1987 and they are being applied most rigorously.

MINING INDUSTRY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Last week, Canada signed a multimillion-dollar mineral development agreement with Nova Scotia. To date, eight Canadian provinces have renewed mineral development agreements, but Quebec has not.

• (1450)

After many months, have the negotiations with the Government of Quebec been concluded? If so, when will this agreement be signed in order to help the mining industry in Abitibi-Témiscamingue and in Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is correct in citing the fact that we have now signed MDAs with virtually every province. We are also very interested in completing the MDA with the province of Quebec.

The federal and provincial governments are fairly close in terms of the dollar figures. As to the other outstanding issues, those negotiations continue. The federal government and my Quebec colleagues would like to see the MDA concluded rapidly. Therefore, the work that has been successful in the mining areas of Quebec, and in particular the member's area, could go forward as quickly as possible as well.

NATURAL RESOURCES

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

For a long time now, and I have raised this before, Atomic Energy Canada has been negotiating with at least two provinces in Canada for the Candu III prototype nuclear power plant development. This project would renew Canada's leadership in nuclear design and management throughout the world. I think it is essential to the supply of power and electricity for the world's emerging energy demands in the next century.

Is it not true that if we are to have the Candu III operational as a prototype by the year 2000, decisions and commitments must begin now? If so, what is the state of the Candu III negotiations in Canada at this time?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as you would know and many members in the House would agree with, the Candu program is one of Canada's technological success stories. At the present time we are negotiating with Korea, for example, on further technology. If it is not first-class technology, you do not sell it in the world today and that has been the Candu story.

In terms of Candu III, we have spent a lot of money for the new generation, especially passive technology. There is no question that we are negotiating. There were two provinces that we were looking at in terms of putting a Candu III reactor into a Canadian setting. Those negotiations are obviously not complete.

I take the hon. member's words as words of support, but I cannot report anything further today as to when any conclusions might be reached. However, from this minister's point of view, I would like to see a Candu III placed in Canada at an early date.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, in February the Minister of Transport stated in the House: "It is in the best interest of consumers and the travelling public in this country to have two airline companies".

My question is simply this: Has the government's two-airline policy changed? If so, how does the government propose to ensure that competition continues in the industry? If not, is the government prepared to say that it will not accept a common ownership of the two airline companies in Canada?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I have the time to answer the three questions that have been put.

I will repeat what we have always said: We want a safe, effective and competitive airline industry in Canada and we are taking every measure to make sure that it happens.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, perhaps if I ask the minister a very specific question he will give me a clear answer.

What is the government prepared to do to preserve genuine and healthy competition in the airline industry in Canada? Is the government willing to introduce measures to prevent the dumping of excess airline capacity on the market at non-compensatory prices?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the competition bureau will look into the issue of competition when the government is presented with an official transaction. In the meantime, any attempt to solve a non-existent problem is pure speculation.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

Last week, President Bush announced a $1 billion increase in wheat subsidies that will drive down world wheat prices and further hurt western farmers. By the way, it is also a violation of the free trade agreement.

Now the minister for grains says the Bush move is, and I quote: "tantamount to a declaration of war on Canadian farmers". The minister has failed to say how he is going to fight back.

Maybe that is because he does not want to upset the Prime Minister's good friend, George Bush, thereby distracting Bush in the current presidential campaign.

What has the minister done, if anything, in the face of this latest trade provocation?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure my colleague, the minister of grains and oilseeds, will be disappointed that he cannot reply as requested.

The hon. member states the obvious. The declaration of an enhancement of the export policy by the United States is harmful not just to Canadian grain producers but to the Australians, the Argentinians and to all of those countries which live by export.

The hon. member asks what Canada has done. I draw to his attention that in the letter that my colleague and I sent to the U.S. Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Edward Madigan, we have requested consultations given U.S. obligations under section 701.4 of the free trade agreement. We intend as we have in the past to draw to the attention of the Americans that they are not gaining markets. They are spending their taxpayers' dollars in areas where it is not beneficial and they are harming the friends and allies.

If they wish to attack the Europeans and their trade-distorting subsidies that started this silliness, they can join with Canada. My colleague, the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds, is in the process of arranging at a meeting with the Argentinians and the Australians so that we can tackle this problem together.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, according to the minister of grains, the Americans declare a war and what does this government do? It consults.

Perhaps one way of defending Canadian farmers is to take this issue to GATT. Australia has already said it is going to take this issue before GATT and has invited this government to join it.

It is apparent that the Australians will not take this issue lying down, but it is all too clear that this government will not under any circumstances upset or take on George Bush.

Is the minister going to do anything at all or is he just going to let down the Canadian farmers once again?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have seen the response of that member and his party when it comes to war and so has the Canadian public.

The hon. member asks what the Government of Canada has done. In 1991–92, the Government of Canada and the provinces, all governments, put together a package that cost the taxpayers $1.2 billion, federally and provincially, to support safety nets. In 1991–92, almost $1 billion was put forward to support producers and revenue shortfall. In NISA in 1991–92, over $316 million was put together to support producers.

We are taking the steps that we can to support producers. If the hon. member had heard my answer to his first question, he would find that Canada, Australia and Argentina are meeting to consider taking action under GATT which we are allowed under GATT law. We are also considering the option of taking steps under the free trade agreement, a free trade agreement that only Canada has the opportunity to take action under, not Australia and not Argentina.

I also draw to his attention that when the Americans announced the countries that were eligible, Mexico had been not included this year although Mexico had been included in the past. The reason that Mexico is not included is the North American free trade agreement.

Oral Questions

HOUSING

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

In the Charlottetown constitutional accord, exclusive jurisdiction for housing is given to the provincial and territorial governments. Is it the intention of the government that the present federal mortgage insurance fund, the fund which now provides 5 per cent down payments for first time home buyers, be privatized or disbanded? Alternatively, is it the intention that each one of the provinces and territories set up its own mortgage insurance fund, thereby duplicating 12 times over what the federal government does at the present time with one fund?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the intent is certainly not to duplicate. In fact, the intent and the result of this agreement will be to reduce duplication that already exists in a number of fields.

As the hon. member would know from reading the accord and following the debate as closely as he has, some areas in some of the six fields will be retained by the federal government. For example, our responsibility for housing for aboriginal peoples will be maintained. There will also be some other aspects with regard to CMHC that will be retained by the Government of Canada. Many of these matters are subject to some negotiation with the provinces involved.

AIRLINES

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Thousands of airline workers and their families are wondering if they are going to have a job tomorrow, literally as we speak. The reason they are wondering about their own future is that four years ago this government turned over all economic decision-making to the marketplace by deregulating the airline industry.

Will the government accept its responsibility for the financial mess of Air Canada and Canadian and its responsibility for the workers, and act now to reimpose its will on the industry? Or is this government prepared to let the industry crash and take its workers with it?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that the airline industry in Canada is going through the same globalization and revolution as other countries. It is well known that there is a 20 per cent surplus of employees in the airline industry. No matter what happens in the next few months there will be a readjustment in the number of workers employed by one or the other of the airlines.

This government has in place, as has been said many times by my colleague in the Department of Employment and Immigration, an adjustment program to take care of these people.

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to the members' attention the presence in the gallery of His Excellency Michal Kovac, Chairman of the Federal Assembly of the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic.

PRIVILEGE

STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, on June 24 I gave you notice of a question of privilege on questions and statements of members. In view of the agenda of the House today and being one of the last members to upset the Prime Minister and delay anything that he might want to do—we had discussions this morning trying to be very practical about this and using a little common sense—and so that I do not lose my privilege, I would ask that this matter be deferred. We could have some further discussion and hopefully pick an appropriate time to have it debated.

Mr. Speaker: I want to thank the hon. member. We have had a private discussion and I can assure the hon. member that he has not lost his position and that there will be further discussions.

RIGHT TO SPEAK OF BLOC QUEBECOIS MEMBERS

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege concerns the right to speak in this House.

According to British parliamentary tradition, there is particular emphasis on the right of opposition members to speak in a debate as important as the one we shall engage in this week. Since Friday, we have been contacting the leaders of the other parties in order to establish our right to speak, to take the floor as members of the Bloc Quebecois in this particular debate. After obtaining five agreements in principle, we are now told they no longer exist and that we will not be able to speak today.

Mr. Speaker, through you, I would like to hear from the three Whips why we cannot be allowed 20 minutes speaking time in this debate today and tomorrow, so as to protect the democratic traditions of this House. I would like to know why they cannot give us the right to speak.

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member and the House that on this most important issue, perhaps the most important issue this Parliament could consider, it is certainly the intent of the government to provide every opportunity for every member who desires an opportunity to speak.

In order to do that within a reasonable time frame we are going to have to work out some arrangements of the types that we have worked out frequently in the past.

I am more than ready to co-operate with any and all members in the House to accomplish that.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Richelieu has raised a question of privilege concerning the right of opposition members to participate in the debate today and tomorrow, and perhaps beyond that time.

Unfortunately, this is not a situation where the Chair can intervene. The hon. member mentioned—and this seems rather interesting—that there had been a number of discussions about the possibility of having Bloc members take part in the debate, and the government House leader has clearly indicated he intends to co-operate. However, government members, opposition members and the hon. member for Richelieu will probably have to discuss the matter this afternoon, and I hope they will be able to find a solution.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENT OF CONSENSUS REPORT

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister) moved:

That this House acknowledges receipt of the document entitled: "Consensus Report on the Constitution, Charlottetown, August 28, 1992" and notes its appreciation to all those who worked so hard toward its completion.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to put before the House, in both official languages, the document entitled Consensus Report on the Constitution, Charlottetown, August 28, 1992.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: The Charlottetown agreement, which I have just tabled, has been approved by the Prime Minister of Canada, the 10 provincial premiers, the leaders of our two territorial governments and the representatives of four aboriginal associations.

It reflects not only a collective expression of common will and purpose but a uniquely Canadian process of pragmatic compromise and compelling vision. These are in themselves powerful recommendations for its acceptance by the Canadian people and its subsequent ratification by the legislative assemblies of the provinces and this Parliament of Canada.

This agreement is the result of the most far-ranging and thorough process of consultation and discussion ever held by a Canadian government, and perhaps by any government, in a modern industrialized state.

Providing leadership in the area of constitutional reform is probably the toughest job in town. The results are achieved painstakingly and only after enormous difficulties. Respite is infrequent and rewards are few.

Much of this challenging process has been admirably led to success by the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs, whose perseverance and dedication have earned the respect and the admiration of all Canadians everywhere.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1510)

Mr. Mulroney: On behalf of the Canadian people, I salute the impressive and durable contribution he has made to our country.

[Translation]

Allow me, also, Mr. Speaker, to pay tribute to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the hon. member for Roberval, who has throughout this lengthy process always shown his ability to reconcile his profound loyalty to his Quebec roots with his love for Canada. He has brilliantly demonstrated that there is a natural link that exists between Quebec nationalism and Canadian patriotism.

[English]

Tribute must be paid as well to the provincial premiers, the territorial leaders and the aboriginal leadership. It is my view that they, all of them, set aside regional and special interests to serve first and foremost the national interest, thereby making possible the Charlottetown agreement.

Nor would this achievement have been possible without the substantial and vigorous contributions to the national unity debate by the leaders of the two recognized opposition parties in the House of Commons. They and their supporters can take pride in the Charlottetown agreement because they contributed tangibly to its development.

Finally, I wish to acknowledge the devotion and skill of all the public servants who participated in this process, from the provinces and territories as well as from the aboriginal peoples and the Canadian government. Normally, public servants work in the background, but I believe that the contributions of Paul Tellier, Jocelyne Bourgon, Suzanne Hurtubise, Scott Serson, John Tait, Mary Dawson and Jim Judd are particularly worthy of special mention and exemplify the excellence and dedication of the Public Service of Canada.

[English]

This agreement, if endorsed by the Canadian people and enshrined in our Constitution, will mark an accomplishment that has eluded many generations of Canadians and their elected representatives. It marks the unanimous acceptance by all elected heads of government in Canada of a series of fundamental reforms designed to strengthen our nationhood and enhance our citizenship.

To achieve such unanimity is no small feat in itself. It is all the more so because of the infrequency with which it has come to pass in constitutional deliberations here and in democratic societies elsewhere in the world.

[Translation]

For example, attempts to reach agreement on constitutional change in Canada began in 1927 and were made on nine subsequent attempts from 1931 to 1990. Ultimately, agreement among Canadians on this matter proved elusive, and all these efforts at reform ended in some measure of failure or a lack of complete success. The act of 1982 was incomplete because of the absence of Quebec from the agreement. The Meech Lake accord, which sought to redress this unacceptable situation and which was, on two occasions, unanimously endorsed by all first ministers, was in the end, not ratified by two provinces.

I believe, that this agreement completes the unfinished business of 1982 and fulfils the promise of 1987. Above all, it builds upon the foundation of 1867.

[English]

When Sir John A. Macdonald shaped a compact that gave rise to this great country, it reflected who we were then, as four British colonies on the northern half of our continent.

He was right. He turned out to be very right when he predicted a brilliant future for Canada and ensuing generations were able to achieve the greatness that he foresaw for all of us and that he had worked so hard to achieve.

In 1865 Sir John described the agreement reached then in terms which I believe are equally applicable today. He said: "The whole scheme bears upon its face the marks of compromise". Of necessity there was a great deal of mutual concession.

In the same year George Brown who had previously been a determined opponent of Sir John contrasted the Canadian resolution with the Civil War then going on in the United States of America. "We are endeavouring" said Brown "to adjust harmoniously greater difficulties than have plunged others into all of the horrors of civil war". He said: "Have we not then cause of thankfulness that we have found a better way for the solution of our troubles?"

Confederation itself was a creative innovation to cope with the major constitutional and economic problems of the day. For instance, the new system combined responsible parliamentary government and federalism in a completely original way unlike the already existing American or Swiss models which were not essentially parliamentary in nature. The Canadian model was subsequently used in Australia and several other federations.

Thus Confederation set an example for other countries in the reconciliation of internal differences just as the Charlottetown agreement seeks to do today. History provides Canadians with a shining example to follow.

From 1864 to 1867 when the Fathers of Confederation were faced with what appeared to to be an almost hopeless situation due to internal political deadlocks, radically changing external economic conditions with the end of American reciprocity in trade, and with security threats from outside exemplified by the Fenian raids, they rose to the challenge by devising a creative solution based on compromise and reconciliation. That creative solution was the establishment of a new federation and that solution brought the various components of Canada together to work on common objectives while safeguarding the diversity of those different units.

In some ways we face a similar challenge today, a challenge to respond to radically changing external and internal conditions. We too can respond by creating a renewed and revitalized federation that can unite all Canadians in the attainment of common goals while ensuring room for genuine diversity as has always been the case for 125 years. I believe that was precisely what was achieved at Charlottetown and which I recommend to the House of Commons today.

Even with his clear vision and exceptional talents, even with the support of his party and of his fellow citizens from Upper Canada, and even with the incredible resources and unlimited potential he had already envisioned, Sir John A. Macdonald could have been but a politician among many had he not been guided, above all, by the wonderful combination of realism and generosity. For Canada to exist in the first place and for Canada to have the opportunity to become all that it is today, Macdonald had to reach out his hand to francophones, the descendents of the explorers and founders of New France. George-Étienne Cartier, a true Quebec patriot, reached out his hand to Macdonald, a son of Scotland who, like him, would become one of the Fathers of Canada. Together, they worked to build a country that today is respected and admired around the world because it is founded upon diversity and an efficient economic and political union. It is a country that, with a modest population, has developed the seventh largest economy in the world and has created for all its citizens a standard of living that is the envy of millions of people on every continent.

• (1520)

As Cartier said of the Constitution of 1867: "We sealed our federal pact without bloodshed and without the exploitation of the weak by the strong. All it took was fairness, justice, and some compromises on both sides." He added: "I hope that if it must be amended it will not be to narrow the principles of fairness on which it is founded, but rather to expand them even more". I believe, that the agreement we are submitting for consideration today respects that wish expressed by Cartier on the eve of Confederation.

[English]

I stand here today in support of the agreement I have had the honour to table because preserving the historic spirit of partnership, the spirit of Macdonald and Cartier, renewed and redefined for the 21st century, strengthened in the Charlottetown agreement, endorsed by the Canadian people in a referendum and enshrined in our Constitution, will ensure the unity of Canada, I believe, in a future golden with the promise for all Canadians.

What were the fundamental objectives being pursued in this attempt at national reconciliation? Others may have different views and perhaps in the course of the debate we will hear them, but on February 12, 1991, in an address to the Canadian and Empire Clubs of Toronto, I as Prime Minister of Canada set out my own views with regard to the objectives we ought to pursue.

We must deal with the sense of powerlessness in the west and disparity in the Atlantic. We must listen to the concerns of the north and the voices of our aboriginal peoples. We must seek to understand the growing feeling of frustration of many Ontarians whose contribution to Canada is rarely recognized. We must find a way to ensure that Quebecers whose special character so enriches the distinctiveness of our national life become willing and enthusiastic partners in Canada.

I believe those sentiments now find voice in the document I have tabled here today.

As Prime Minister of Canada, it was my responsibility to preside over the nine full days of deliberations of first ministers and territorial and aboriginal leaders in August 1992, which concluded in Charlottetown on August 28. The provincial, territorial and aboriginal leaders came together then in a spirit of shared responsibility for the future well-being of this country and of its people. There was a common determination to rise above political philosophies, regional interests, or partisan considerations. We all felt that the peoples who make up Canada are stronger together than any of them could possibly be apart. Each of the partners in Confederation strengthens the whole, and each of those partners is stronger and greater by being part of a stronger and greater union. This concept has stood the test of time. It has made possible the Canada we know and cherish today: a nation that enshrined duality and diversity in 1867 and that embraced multiculturalism many generations later, making it a way of life; a federation committed to regional development as well as to national development, to equalization of opportunity as well as to economic prosperity for all its citizens.

[English]

Let us consider briefly what is contained in the agreement that is now before us and that will be shortly submitted to the Canadian people. For the aboriginal peoples there is simple justice, long overdue, through the recognition in the Constitution of Canada of their inherent right to self-government. It proposes a new partnership in a federation that was created in 1867 without their participation.

This generation of Canadians and as a result their political leaders are now called upon in this Parliament of Canada to redeem the promises of equality first made to the aboriginal peoples several hundred years ago by the representatives of French and English kings and never fulfilled. We propose to fulfil those obligations to the aboriginal peoples in the year 1992.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: By reforming our Senate to make it equal, elected and effective we are I think responding to a strongly held and legitimate view in western Canada generally and Alberta in particular, as well as in smaller provinces, that our second Chamber must not be the rubber stamp of the majority in the House and must be able to express the sense of legislative independence and true partnership that gave rise to the Canadian federation itself.

This is a provision that deals with the nature of Parliament itself. It is an idea that was advanced for a good number of years in difficult times by the premier of Alberta, the Hon. Don Getty, and he was then supported by others as time went on: the premier of Manitoba, the premier of Newfoundland and others.

It has resulted in a fundamental change and I think a beneficial change to the Parliament of Canada. I think it is appropriate on an occasion like today that I ask all members to join with me in paying tribute to the individual whose devotion to this concept made it possible, the Hon. Don Getty.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: The Canada clause will enshrine the fundamental characteristics of our political and economic union, our attachment to a parliamentary and federal system, the rule of law, the rights of our native peoples, the recognition of Quebec as a distinct society, the vitality and development of minority language rights, racial and ethnic equality, respect of individual and collective rights, and equality between persons of both sexes.

The agreement provides for a more efficient and more equitable division of powers between the federal and the provincial governments, a rebalancing of roles and responsibilities to focus the federal government on matters of Canada-wide and international importance and to clarify and protect provincial jurisdiction.

This would express itself, for example, by a better discipline on the use of the federal government's spending power and the protection of intergovernmental agreements. Exclusive provincial jurisdiction would be recognized in the areas of forestry, mining, tourism, housing, recreation, municipal and urban affairs, training, labour market development and cultural matters within the province.

The Constitution would contain a statement of key social and economic policy objectives shared by all of the governments of the federation. The social policy objectives would include comprehensive, universal health care, adequate social services and benefits, high quality primary and secondary education, collective bargaining rights, and a commitment to protecting, preserving and sustaining the integrity of the environment.

The economic policy objectives to be entrenched would include strengthening the Canadian economic union, the free movement of persons, goods, services and capital, ensuring a reasonable standard of living, full employment, and ensuring sustainable and equitable development.

On economic union, I regret that we did not agree to dismantle all internal trade barriers in Canada. This is particularly anomalous inasmuch as we have already achieved a much more comprehensive elimination of barriers between Canada and those foreign nations with which we already enjoy substantial trading arrangements.

By retaining section 121 and agreeing to a political accord that will at the first first ministers' conference on the economy to follow ratification form the basis for modernizing this clause I believe that we will achieve a beneficial result, one that has been actively sought by the Leader of the Opposition and other members of this House, a view to which I subscribe entirely.

This agreement has a very special historical significance to francophones in Quebec and elsewhere across Canada. It is part of a process unique in history: the entrenchment of French language and culture in American soil. This great human adventure, embarked upon over 400 years ago by a handful of French explorers on the Gaspé shores is still unfolding today in Quebec and in hundreds of communities across the country where nearly a million francophones continue to make the French language radiate across North America and throughout the francophone community world-wide. As a Quebecer, I feel great pride in knowing that the guarantees for the protection and development of Quebec society and francophone minorities contained in the Charlottetown agreement will help ensure that French is spoken in Canada until the end of time.

As a matter of fact, I have no difficulty in imagining that a Prime Minister of Canada will one day in this House commend the contribution made to our country by a Quebec society in which its overwhelming majority of francophones, 15 or 20 million people, live side by side an English-speaking majority that has retained all its strength and dynamism. On that day, it will be said that the Charlottetown agreement, approved in 1992 by the Canadian people in a referendum and ratified by all the provinces and the federal government, gave a powerful impetus to the cultural, political and economic development of today's Quebec.

It would be wrong to see the provisions of the agreement that apply to Quebecers and to francophones as disparate fragments of powers haphazardly stripped from Ottawa during constitutional negotiations. These provisions make up a whole and, taken in their entirety, constitute one of the most formidable instruments for cultural and economic protection and development that Quebecers have ever, in their history, had at their disposal.

First of all, the historical reality of the distinct character of Quebec society will forever be enshrined in our Constitution, as will Canada's linguistic duality. This recognition of the very nature of Quebec society will become, once the agreement has been ratified, the cornerstone of the expression of Quebecers' future aspirations. To preserve and enhance its French character, Quebec also wants to control immigration within its territory. The agreement that I am tabling in the House today gives it the means. The agreement reached with Quebec in this respect will be protected by the Constitution.

Quebec already has exclusive power over education. The agreement grants it sole jurisdiction over job training and manpower development, which are natural extensions of that responsibility granted in 1867.

The agreement also calls for the establishment of an agreement on telecommunications, and stipulates that Quebec will have, within its territory, jurisdiction over culture.

With responsibility over education, training, immigration and culture, the Quebec government will have in its hands all the power it needs for its linguistic and cultural affirmation within Canada, one of the world's leading economic forces. Therefore, any objective analysis of the consequences of this agreement must conclude that it grants Quebec society what is clearly a greater degree of cultural security. It cannot be denied that it answers, and answers admirably, Quebec's historical demands.

In giving so many cultural guarantees and new powers to the Government of Quebec, as well as to the other provinces, can it be that we are unwittingly diminishing its attachment to the Canadian federation? Without the slightest hesitation, I say that it is quite the contrary. In all the constitutional negotiations we have gone through in Canada and there have been quite a few the representatives of Quebec have almost always wanted to maintain Quebec's participation in national institutions. Such was again the case in the round that ended on August 28 in Charlottetown. The agreement we now have in our hands will enable Quebecers to assume their full historical role in our federation.

The guarantee of three Quebec judges on the Supreme Court, a reality which arises from a legal system that is different from the other provinces, a minimum of 25 per cent of the seats in this House, a double majority in the Senate for matters affecting the French language and culture and the veto which it shares with other provinces, over any changes to our national institutions are examples of major advances for the protection of the interests of Quebec and of francophones within the Canadian federation. These gains correspond to and in some cases surpass the demands expressed by Premier Bourassa's government in 1986 and contained in the Meech Lake accord.

They also correspond in large part to the list of claims put forth by Premier René Lévesque who in 1985 was prepared to take the risk of a united but substantially reformed Canada. In fact, this is how the last paragraph of the proposed constitutional agreement presented by Mr. Lévesque as premier of Quebec read: "The will expressed by the Prime Minister of Canada to correct the errors of the past has inspired, there as well as here, hope for a better future. The people of Quebec and their government, in response to the openness that has been shown, reach out their hands to their neighbours. In a spirit of mutual respect and good faith, and following such honest negotiations, we firmly believe in the possibility of creating better conditions for out future."

I believe that the Charlottetown agreement fulfils this wish of Mr. Lévesque, while at the same time meeting the expectations of the current Government of Quebec. Yet these provisions also ensure the ability of Quebec to participate, with full confidence, in Canadian political life because—we do not see it too often in the newspapers— we must never ever forget that the great majority of Quebecers have a deep love for Canada. This agreement finally allows all Quebecers to assert the pride they feel in the country that they created, that they built and that they have loved for so long.

As a distinct society within Canada, Quebecers have put their faith, their courage and their special genius into this country. They have put into it their very soul. In 1608, French was already being spoken in Quebec City. In 1642, 350 years ago, French was being spoken in Montreal, today the second largest French-speaking city in the world. In 1763, when Canada was ceded to England, the 90,000 French people living here openly feared for their future. However, today, more than five million French-speaking Quebecers, the inventors and the guardians of French culture in America, are affirming through their pride in a heroic past their sure belief in a brilliant future. Long, long before Confederation, the ancestors of this country called themselves Canadian, a name that generation after generation of pioneers bore with pride. Today, as the world's second largest francophone community, Canada stands alongside France as one of the chief pillars of the international Francophonie. It is by determining together the kind of country that we want that we will be able to achieve the great destiny our ancestors began preparing centuries ago. This agreement, enables a new generation of Quebecers to say yes to Canada with pride and confidence.

• (1540)

Many times in the course of public consultations during the past two years Canadians have complained that our country is over-governed, that government is too far removed from people and that people are too far removed from the decision-making process.

I believe there is a good deal of truth in this assertion, along with ongoing questions about Quebec's role as Canada's only French-speaking majority province, problems in the Atlantic, and problems of western alienation. These are problems that speak to the future of a renewed federation and they have become, obviously all of them—the aboriginal question—fundamental to our national debate.

Prime Minister Pearson stated the approach and the philosophy that has motivated most Canadian Prime Ministers from Macdonald to the present occupant of the office. In his memoirs, Mr. Pearson described his view of co-operative federalism which he believed was the only nature of federalism that could apply. It was the only approach that in the longer haul could work. He reviewed, as well, how common sense should always prevail in a federation over sterile ideologies.

I quote Prime Minister Pearson: "My viewpoint was one of sympathy to the provinces in their desire for more control and for more resources. By co-operative action one could encourage the devolution of power, with the provision that a province could, if it wished, restore authority to Ottawa. Although the federal government had to retain intact certain essential powers, there were many other functions of government exercised by Ottawa which could properly and beneficially be left to the provinces. By forcing a centralism perhaps acceptable to some provinces but not to Quebec, and by insisting that Quebec must be like the others, we could destroy Canada".

Mr. Pearson said: "This became my doctrine of federalism. I wanted to decentralize up to a certain point as the way to strengthen, indeed to establish and maintain unity. I remember being severely rebuked for suggesting that some of the centralists were the greatest separatists". Mr. Pearson concluded: "In fact, I believe that our administration helped to unite the country by broadening the capacities of the provinces to discharge their constitutional powers in our federal system". I think the history of the last 25 years has already proved that Mr. Pearson was completely right.

I do not claim that the Charlottetown agreement is the last word in the needed effort to modernize the Canadian federation. I do say that this agreement will make possible the evolution of a more flexible federation in which there is a better distribution of responsibilities between the two levels of government.

In the wake of this agreement the question will arise as it does following any change at all in the status quo: Who will speak for Canada? The answer is clear. The federal authority is in power to discharge all of the responsibilities of a strong, national government. Pursuant to this negotiation, tomorrow as today, the Parliament and the Government of Canada will speak strongly and effectively for Canada and for all Canadians.

The federal government must be able to devote itself to the national interest unencumbered by a host of responsibilities that can perhaps be more effectively and properly discharged by the provinces. The provinces must be able to serve their citizens and establish priorities in their areas of responsibility without undue interference from Ottawa.

The proposed limitation on the use of the federal spending power for shared-cost programs in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction is not an unreasonable proposal at all. It reflects this fundamental approach.

As noted earlier, in the Charlottetown agreement we have also acknowledged the exclusive provincial jurisdiction in a number of fields and agree that the federal government should withdraw from activity in those fields on terms to be established in intergovernmental agreements.

The reforms agreed upon at Charlottetown will help give Canada and all parts of Canada, particularly regions far removed from Ottawa, the flexibility they need to respond to changing opportunities in the world economy as it impacts on their own regions. They will also allow more sensitivity on the part of the governments to local needs and circumstances and to the different priorities and potentials to be found from one province to another in this large and extremely diverse country.

None of this is a break with the past. All of it represents a renewal of our federation and offers the real prospect of future progress and harmony. All of it represents the core values of decency and fairness that the world has long come to identify with the word "Canadian".

By any international standard the comprehensive constitutional renewal embodied in the Charlottetown agreement represents an especially significant achievement. Comprehensive constitutional change has often occurred in the aftermath of a dramatic break from the past, such as revolution or civil war or a similar major disruption. Its emergence as part of the orderly evolution of an existing federal constitutional system has in fact been relatively rare.

In the United States, for example, the new constitution devised after four months at Philadelphia in 1787 was indeed a major historic accomplishment, but it occurred during a post-revolutionary period only a decade after the War of Independence.

Much more recently in Spain, comprehensive constitutional change there resulted in a genuine democracy which was achieved in 1978, but this occurred as a result of the death of General Franco in 1975 and the end of a very long autocratic regime.

German reunification in 1990 represents an example of major constitutional amendment, but it occurred in the historic aftermath of disruptions that occurred throughout eastern Europe.

The Swiss constitution provides for two kinds of amendments: total revision and partial revision and both include ratification by referendum. While there have been over 90 partial revisions since 1848, only once in 1874 was a total revision brought to fruition.

The Australian constitution, largely inspired by Canada's initiatives in 1865 to 1867, contains a provision for constitutional amendments and these require referendums. However of 38 constitutional amendments submitted since 1901, only eight have received the necessary double majorities.

From this, two lessons can be drawn. First, achieving unanimous agreement on a comprehensive constitutional renewal reconciling the variety of interests within Canada represents indeed for the Parliament of Canada a signal achievement and an example to the world of what can be brought about through negotiations marked by genuine goodwill and a spirit of thoughtful compromise. Second, public support in the referendum process is crucial to bringing such an agreement to full fruition.

We are faced today with the imperative duty of closing the circle of this constitutional round and getting on with the important work of readying Canadians to meet the sweeping demands of global competition and profound societal change that we find everywhere, not only in Canada but also in every country around the world. Our history begs us to proceed and the world around us reminds us that we must.

While we were discussing constitutional change lately, for example, Germany put an end to 50 years of division. In a few weeks the Berlin wall, which split Europe into two hostile blocks, crumbled and was swept away by the irresistible tide of freedom. Communism, which had sought to enslave the world since 1917, came crashing down from its pedestal withn a year. All of Europe is now moving toward political and economic integration and is emerging as a giant among the trading groups of the world.

This year, we have marked historic and painful anniversaries that put our constitutional differences in a humbling perspective, with the 75th anniversary of the capture of Vimy Ridge and the 50th anniversary of the raid on Dieppe. The young Canadians who died to defend freedom there and on many other battlefields were among the finest sons Canada has ever had. Their heroism helped father the magnificent and independent Canada that future generations were to inherit. A generation apart, these young Canadians left their fields, their towns, their cities, their families to defend freedom that was under attack in Europe. The insignia that united them in the admiration of their compatriots and their companions-in-arms forever is the word "Canada", which they displayed proudly on their shoulders. Just weeks ago, more than 800 courageous Canadian soldiers under the command of Major General Lewis MacKenzie wore the maple-leaf on their shoulders when, on behalf of the United Nations, they risked their lives to try to bring peace and hope, along with food and medical supplies, to the people of Sarajevo.

We are all the beneficiaries of the heroism and courage of generations and generations of Canadians who wanted only to leave a better, more humane and more prosperous country to their children.

The world has come to know that peace, understanding, conciliation, decency, are words that in many ways speak of Canada. We are not free from imperfections, but as citizens of Canada we have built an impressive heritage. That is what we must protect and nurture. If we are true to this heritage and faithful to our fundamental values, we too can build an even better Canada by ensuring its durability on a foundation that is true to the principles we share.

[English]

What Canada's leaders have produced is a series of constitutional reforms that strengthen the bonds which brought us together in 1867. These reforms renew the concepts that are at the core of Confederation. They provide a strong framework, a solid foundation to let us move confidently into the future together.

At one point in the 1960s, historian Frank Underhill reviewed the state of the nation and lamented that Canada seemed to have lost "that conviction of positive national purpose which inspired our forefathers in 1867. We are fumbling for that lost sense of impending greatness which once buoyed us up," he said.

Well, we now have as a generation a unique chance to capture and to recapture that sense of impending greatness in moving beyond the risk of division to the promise of cohesion and all of the opportunity that flows from such a vital decision.

On February 6, 1865, John A. Macdonald, then the young Attorney General of Canada West, urged members to put aside sectional and regional loyalties and vote in the best interests of the new nation about to be born. "I would again implore the House not to let this opportunity pass. It may never recur. If we do not take advantage of the time, if we show ourselves unequal to the occasion, we shall hereafter bitterly and unavailingly regret having failed to embrace the opportunity of founding a great nation." In some important ways these words, too, find an echo in this Chamber today. They are as real and gripping as when they were first uttered.

Resolving our outstanding constitutional issues will send a message to the world about the determination of Canadians to work together to achieve this country's full economic and social potential.

Just a few days ago, a keen observer of Canada, Martin Woollacott, wrote in the Manchester Guardian: "In a world in which the boundaries between self-determination and self-indulgence seem to be disappearing, one country at least is swimming against the tide. If the agreement reached last month by the federal Government of Canada and all of the provinces is ratified, that ought to be cause for celebration inside and outside North America. This is not a parochial matter," he said. "Giving adequate representation to people in diverse and geographically widespread societies, reconciling minorities and dividing up powers between various levels and centres of government in a workable way has a fair claim to be the single, most important political problem of our time."

I think he is right and I think the work that the premiers, the territorial leaders, the aboriginal leaders and members of this House have done has responded to the great call for reform in 1992.

Therefore, in the great sweep of world affairs, what happens here matters. How we vote in the coming referendum will matter as well.

One of our greatest authors, Bruce Hutchison, once wrote prophetically: "Our time has come and if not grasped, it will be lost forever". Indeed our time has come. Canada's time has come. The question that will be tabled tomorrow will be a proxy for a series of profound questions about who we are, what we care about, and how we choose fully to live together.

[Translation]

The agreement goes a long way toward making possible a new kind of Canada. It is not perfect, but it resolves most of the pressing concerns that have dominated the national debate for many years. There may be improvements brought to it as the decades unfold, given the constant desire of Canadians to make this country a finer place in which to live. This agreement provides the direction necessary—I would say absolutely necessary, —to create that new Canada, adapted to conditions in the years ahead.

[English]

This constitutional package provides a framework within which we are able to move ahead as a united nation, diverse and different it is true, yet one nation. Now the referendum ensures that every person of voting age in Canada will have an opportunity to express his or her preference.

The referendum is not intended as a contest between those who believe in dividing Canada and those who believe in a united Canada, although there are political parties whose ultimate success can only be achieved through the dismantling of this country. This we shall resist by all democratic means, and I have no doubt, no doubt whatsoever that the cause of a united Canada will prevail.

• (1600)

Mr. Mulroney: The question is deeper, more profound and more important than that. Basically, the referendum relates to an appreciation of what it means to be a Canadian, to the magnificent privilege that attaches to our citizenship, and the responsibilities that flow from our common values. These marvellous attributes so admired around the world cannot and should not be force-fed to anyone. You are either proud to be a Canadian or you are not. You either love Canada or you do not. No one can be obliged to do either.

Our country, Canada, has no apologies to make to anyone anywhere in the world for offering her citizens a quality of life that the United Nations has determined to be number one in the entire world.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: The quite remarkable record of success by a relatively small group of people called Canadians in bringing under control the riches and resources of half a continent, attaining one of the world's highest standards of living, with enviable social programs, a high degree of technical and academic proficiency, a pervasive dimension of tolerance throughout a vast pluralistic society, and a full roster of individual freedoms, in itself makes it very clear that Canadians form one of the blessed nations on the face of this earth.

Politically, socially, and economically Canadians take a back seat to no one anywhere. Our democracy is as genuine and impressive as any anywhere. Our defence of liberty has been strong and consistent from our very beginnings. Our freedoms are as true and unfettered as men and women whose most noble traditions were predicated on a belief in God and an acceptance the rule of law can devise.

In recent years Canada fought the scourge of apartheid in South Africa and the blight of famine elsewhere on that continent. With the United Nations we fought against aggression in the gulf and for the cause of peace around the world. Most recently, Canada's peacekeeping troops at Sarajevo won the admiration of the entire world and our peacekeeping traditions have become deep-seated values in a very proud heritage.

Canadians have a reputation for being able to get the job done. That is the reputation we want to hold on to. It is that reputation which will be at stake on October 26 as we move to get the job done in our own country for the benefit of all Canadians and all of those who will come after us.

It is now time for all of us to find it in our hearts and in our souls to say without hesitation or doubt that a yes to Canada, a yes to this agreement, a yes to the common cause and the common values it represents is a yes, a strong, a compelling, and a powerful yes to liberating future generations of Canadians, young Canadians for decades and decades and decades to come, to liberate future generations of Canadians to achieve, to grow, to prosper, to share, and to care in a manner the world has come to know as the Canadian way.

On October 26 I invite all Canadians to answer history's call by saying yes to a renewed Canada whose benefits, God willing, will flow to our children and grandchildren and theirs for generations and generations to come.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise in the House today to respond to the Prime Minister.

Like the Prime Minister, I am delighted that in this country we were able to obtain an agreement which, though not perfect, reflects a broad consensus among the ten first ministers of the provinces, the Government of Canada, the three main parties in this House, the people and leaders of the territories and also our aboriginal leaders.

As a Liberal, I am also very happy and proud that today we rise in the House to speak on the eve of a national referendum, because ever since the beginning of this debate, our party has insisted that the time has come for Canadians to have their say on the Canadian Constitution.

[English]

It will be the first time in the history of Canada when all Canadians on the same day will have a chance to express their views about the future of this country.

Of course, some people predicted that this would perhaps create some problems, but I knew that there was to be a referendum in some parts of Canada. We wanted to give the same privilege to all Canadians. We never budged from that. We stood by that and today I am very proud that we are giving the Canadian Constitution back to the people of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: As we said, any achievement is not who wins or who loses. It is not that. The federal government is not to win or to lose. Neither are the provincial governments to win or to lose. It is not the federal bureaucrats or provincial bureaucrats who will win or lose.

The objective was to make sure that the people of Canada were to win. They will tell us that on October 26.

It is a tremendous responsibility for all Canadians, because it will be the first time they will be able to say yes to Canada. It will be the first time that all Canadians will be able to express their views on the same day.

I am convinced that on that day Quebecers will say yes to Canada and that the rest of Canada will say yes to Quebecers.

[English]

We cannot fail and we will not fail. This country is too great to let it go down. I am confident that everybody in this nation will realize how important it is. On October 26 we will close that page. I would like today to thank some members of this House who have worked particularly hard on this file.

[Translation]

I would like to say a special word of thanks to my colleague, the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel, who did an outstanding job. I remember when he was on the Bélanger–Campeau commission and spent long hours in circumstances which, at times, were somewhat uncomfortable. Nevertheless, he defended the principles of federalism and Canadian values firmly and with honour. He was the one to sit down and draft a minority report, because the majority report contained things that were entirely unacceptable to people like us who believe in a strong and united Canada. He deserves our congratulations and respect.

• (1610)

On this side of the House, we also have the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville.

He has worked very hard in many committees. As one of our friends from Saskatchewan, he has always tried to ensure that he understood the people of Quebec and all the other people who speak French in this nation. He has applied his goodwill and good personality to make sure that we can find a solution. I would like to congratulate him too.

I would also like to congratulate the minister for constitutional affairs. He has worked very hard in the last 16 months. He has a lot of political scars. I also have a lot of them. Some we inflicted on each other. But I wish to congratulate him too. I will always remember the day in 1980 when he was with me in Shawinigan sharing the same platform. One week later, he came with me to share the platform in Rimouski where we were again talking about Canada. I would be pleased to share the platform with him again for the same cause. When it is over, we will fight again.

But there will be one thing that I am sure he will not want to talk about and I will not want to talk about, and that is the Constitution. It was in 1980 that we started debate on the Constitution and now it is 1992, going to 1993. On October 26, I will close the book. Those who wish to talk constitution after that better not vote for me because it will not be one of my priorities.

The Constitution is not everything. That is why I hope that by October 26 we will get back on the real problem of this nation. Canadians want us to deal with the problem of the made in Canada recession that is still with us and will not disappear the way things are going.

There is the problem of record unemployment, challenges like environmental protection and social justice, challenges like returning real prosperity to Canada and repairing the shattered hopes and dreams of those who stand in line for welfare and for UIC payments. It is very sad for those who have to stand in line for their daily bread.

I want us to get back to this problem right away. When I was travelling throughout the nation this summer going from Victoria to St. John's, people were talking about their problems. It was sad to see people 50 years of age, not sure they will have a job tomorrow. These people no longer have a dream for their children. Fishermen in Atlantic Canada are completely desperate because of the situation. They want us to talk about these problems. They want us to stop talking about the Constitution. I can tell them that after October 26 we will just talk about the economy and try to give them hope again.

The Liberal Party has worked very hard on this constitutional program. We tried to be very consistent as we spoke. When the party asked me to make a presentation to the Belanger–Campeau commission, we were the only federal party there to present an official position. After the discussions that led to this presentation in Montreal in April 1991, we had a nine point program where we gave the process to this government and the substance to solve the problem. I say to the government that we have appreciated that it has taken most of the process we have suggested and even more. In the process, the most important was the referendum that will once and for all Canadians give a voice in the Constitution. That was reflected in the Beaudoin–Dobbie report and was approved by the party at the national convention we held in Hull in February. All along we have pleaded for a strong, united Canada from sea to sea to sea.

We have said that any constitutional accord must not make Canada more difficult to govern. It must make it easier to adapt to new economic realities and challenges. It must not paralyse our national government and it must reflect our fundamental values. In my view, and in the view of my party, the new constitutional accord meets these four tests.

I will not talk about all the points but I will make some observations on the substance of the deal, such as the Canada clause for example. We were asking for a Canada clause because it was very important for us to have a clause where there was a commitment by all Canadians to the future of this nation, and the Canada clause is there. Of course, there will be some lawyers who will disagree with the meaning of one word or another but the spirit is there.

For example, the linguistic duality was extremely important to us.

Because to us, it is the very essence of Canada. It is what makes Canada a country that, as the Prime Minister said earlier, is an example to the world when we consider what is happening in the world today. In Europe, for instance, they are trying to build a federation and there will have to be a division of powers between the European Community, independent countries and even regions within those countries. However, the issue of linguistic diversity will always be a problem.

Here in Canada, we believe it is possible to be a francophone and feel at home anywhere in this country. Personally, I had the wonderful experience, thanks to a by-election, of being returned to Parliament as a member for the maritimes. Today I represent Acadians in this House. For two years I have been going to the riding of Beauséjour, to live and talk with Acadians, and I see how proud they are to be French.

You go to mass in Cap-Pelé, and it is as French as any village or town we have in Quebec. People there are very proud. They even talk baseball in French because of Réal Cormier. This is something that happens in other places in Canada as well. It is something I have always experienced, because my family on my mother's side comes from Alberta. It is part of reality.

[English]

However, the other side of the coin is also true. Every anglophone has to feel at home in Quebec. Many of them have been there for more than three, four and five generations. They are Quebecers as much as I am a Quebecer. They have to feel at home there, otherwise they will not feel part of Canada any more.

I hope this agreement will encourage specific action to help French-speaking minorities maintain and develop the vitality of their communities. Provincial governments will have to act on their commitments, and the Parliament of Canada will have to ensure that provincial governments act on the commitments they made in Charlottetown to the Francophone minority.

[English]

We also wanted to make sure the charter of rights is protected. It has been the goal of all Canadians. It started a long time ago when the member for Prince Albert, John Diefenbaker, wanted to enshrine it in the Constitution. Now that we have achieved this, it has to remain there, to be protected and not destroyed. I am satisfied that it is there and it is still protected.

We have always stood firm on aboriginal self-government. It was part of our program at the beginning and we have never moved from it. It is a logical conclusion to what we did in 1982, when we enshrined in the Constitution, for the first time, the concept of aboriginal rights. This flowed from the royal proclamation of 1763, and it was a logical move. It has to be rooted in reality and self-government is a consequence of that. In the next few years we will have to make it work to make sure that self-government is within the confines of Canada, that it respects the reality of the provinces in Canada, and that the aboriginal peoples can themselves make the decisions for their own future.

As I say so often in my speeches, we have made enough mistakes for the aboriginal peoples that we might let them make a few mistakes themselves. When they gain confidence and when they gain their rightful place in Canada, I know that their goal will be to be good Canadian citizens. They want to be different and they will remain different. It is one of the qualities of Canada that we can be different and be equal at the same time. The aboriginal peoples care about their culture, their languages. They want to be very comfortable with themselves and, after that, they will share with us both the advantages and the responsibilities of Canadian citizenship.

Another preoccupation—

—for us was always to ensure, in the documents we—presented, that Quebec's demands would be satisfied in this agreement. However, some deficiencies had to be corrected. We now have a definition of the "distinct society" with which we are much more comfortable.

We know that immigration, which was managed acceptably for many years after the Cullen-Couture agreement under an intergovernmental agreement, will now be in the Constitution, thus giving Quebecers greater security.

The Constitution also had to recognize the reality of Quebec's Civil Code, the Napoleonic code, which is completely different from the English common law. It had to be recognized in the composition of the Supreme Court. It had already been recognized in the Supreme Court Act for generations, but it has been put in the Constitution, as well as a mechanism to solve problems in case of conflict between the provinces and the federal government which had concerned many Canadians. Now we have such a mechanism.

Of course, the question of veto over institutions was settled. Perhaps requiring the 10 provinces and the federal government to agree is somewhat rigid. I would have preferred a rather more flexible formula, but one cannot have everything and we are prepared to go along with that veto.

[English]

I would like to talk about some of the problems we have with this agreement. It is my duty to talk about them because I am not happy with everything. I know there are a lot of Canadians that are not happy with everything in this agreement, but perfection is not something that is easy to achieve. Liberals had to make a decision about what to do. There are two elements that we are not very comfortable with. On reflection, I think that over time these problems can be fixed. They can be repaired and adjusted.

For us, economic union is crucial. We are very disappointed that we did not get more than we did. We cannot live in a modern age having protectionism like we see in Canada among the provinces where workers and manufacturers cannot move or sell to other jurisdictions. How can we compete in the world if we do not have flexibility? I have some examples. In my riding of Beauséjour, an industrialist told me that he cannot sell to the Government of Nova Scotia because his factory is within two miles of New Brunswick's border.

If we cannot compete within Canada, how can we compete in the world? This has to be dealt with. This problem can be fixed with the amending formula. It can be fixed with seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the population. I think it can be fixed and I can guarantee Canadians that we will work to fix it. Otherwise we will be out of international competition.

We are not happy with the provision relating to the Senate. Liberals were the ones who, very clearly, were not afraid to talk about effectiveness. Liberals always said that equality will necessarily be at the expense of effectiveness. There is no doubt in my mind that is exactly what happened. When I reflected on the problem, I realized that we, in the House of Commons, will be able to prepare legislation that will guide the operation of the future Senate.

Already within my caucus we have established a committee to look at ways and means of ensuring that the rules of Parliament will give an adequate set of powers to the Senate so that it will become effective. The regions will feel that they are more represented at the centre than before. This is something that can be achieved through rule changes.

It will be achieved because it will be a representation based on a different basis. In politics, justice is important, but the appearance of justice is very important too. If we have a Senate that is effective, it in turn will give the people a sense that they have been heard.

There will be a debate in the House of Commons. After that, there will be a debate in the Senate. If we give the Senate some real power, the people will feel that they have been heard. One of the frustrations we are having in the House of Commons is that members can be very eloquent on some problems. However, when the vote comes, they know that they might cause an election if they vote a certain way.

Very often views are expressed in caucuses. There is a sense by some constituents that the members of Parliament have not spoken loudly or clearly enough. The Senators will have a chance to express themselves a second time openly and without the danger of defeating the government. There is frustration because arbitrating disputes is always difficult in any federation.

Justice is needed and the appearance of justice has to be there too. The new Senate will help to achieve it.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: Another problem is the referendum question. I would have liked the question to be worded a little differently. In the referendum, I would have liked Canadians to be able to say yes very clearly and unequivocally to Quebecers, so that there is no ambiguity. At the same time, I would have liked Quebecers to be able to say yes in an unambiguous, clear and unequivocal way to Canada, to say that we Quebecers want to stay in Canada.

The question as worded deals only with the proposal for constitutional renewal. It therefore leaves dissatisfied all those who were anxious to vote on the complete separation of Quebec. I have no illusions about Mr. Parizeau's real intentions. It is a bit funny to hear him say now that they do not want to talk about separation any more. They do not speak of separation, because they are afraid of that word; they use the word "sovereignty". Why not call a spade a spade? A dictionary definition of sovereigntist would be someone who wants the separation of Quebec. Why not call things by their name? For them, a no vote will not be a vote for the status quo, nor will it be a vote for a new round of negotiations to renew the Canadian federation. I hope that my fellow citizens in Quebec will not be caught in their game and will see very well that their only goal is to make sure that Canada does not work.

I wish to say to my fellow citizens from Quebec that the option advocated by the Parti Quebecois and, I suppose, by most of the Bloc Quebecois is not the right one.

By turning down this challenge, they will abandon one million francophones outside Quebec, and that would be unthinkable, because as I see it, one million Francophones outside Quebec are as it were our insurance that the French language and culture will endure in Quebec and the rest of Canada. Although they might not be in the best of shape and not too sure of what the future holds, although they may feel left out of the mainstream, they are probably the most precious ally the French fact has in this country. Look at what they have produced in the literary field, our performers and writers Mrs. Roy who came from Winnipeg and Mrs. Maillet from Bouctouche. There are also all the people we have seen so many times on television in Canada. I am thinking of Mr. Bergeron, who was one of the greatest promoters of French on Canadian television and who also comes from Manitoba.

All these people have made a tremendous contribution to the French fact in Canada, and I am sure Quebecers do not want to abandon them. People who talk about separation or sovereignty are in fact ignoring the greater challenge of feeling at home in a bigger country, and that country is Canada. It is a country where, as I said earlier, we can be both francophone and Canadian no matter where we live.

[English]

Despite the problems I have mentioned, when I balanced the whole package I came to the conclusion that we have to vote yes. We have to tell Canadians that we are turning the page and preparing the country for the 21st century. We have to ask all Canadians to join in the mission of preparing this country for the fantastic challenges which it will face in the 21st century. We also have to stop talking about the Constitution to concentrate our efforts on the other real problems of international competitiveness and the position of trade within the world: how to survive in those situations if we keep talking about constitutions.

The people of Canada will have the opportunity to agree with the value of what it is to be a Canadian. This is a great country. There is greatness in this country but there is also a lot of fragility. What can unite us? It is very simple. It is all the virtues that we have developed over the years: tolerance, generosity, respect for others and sharing. When people from outside look at our country they see that it is a country that was, as the Prime Minister said earlier, a small colony of four colonies being united by the Parliament of England in 1867 and becoming one of the great powers of the world.

However, within the confines of this country we have come a long way in understanding, tolerance and acceptance. Some years ago we were having problems between Catholics and Protestants in this country. That does not exist any more because we are all Chrétiens.

This reality is very important. What will happen on October 26? The people of Canada from coast to coast and the people of Quebec will say that they want to preserve Canada. This country has to survive. This country has to come back and again be the greatest country in the world. This country has a mission to show to the world that it is possible to be bigger than our parts, to be united in our diversity, and to be strong because of the generosity of spirit that has made this country the best in the world.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Malpeque—Small Business; the hon. member for Moncton—National Defence; the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Job Training; the hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River—Aboriginal Healing Lodge.

[Translation]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, it is a great privilege for me to speak in this debate on the constitutional accord achieved by the first ministers, the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs, the leaders of the territories and aboriginal leaders. I would also like to thank all members, especially the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville and other members in my party who have been involved in the constitutional debate for a long time. I also see here today the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, who is a vigorous supporter of the unity of our country.

It is a privilege to take part in this debate because today, we are talking about the future and the unity of our country. Unity, a prosperous economy, strong social programs and a healthy environment are the foundations of the kind of Canada we want to leave our children and grandchildren.

[English]

In thinking about this debate today I thought if I look back in five years or in ten years on this constitutional debate, when I sit down with my grandchildren and we discuss what happened on October 26, 1992, I want to be able to say that I was a positive participant in this debate, that my party showed wisdom in its deliberations, that all members of this House showed wisdom in our deliberations, and that we did what we considered was best for the nation, that we took the possibility of Canada's future and made that possibility a remarkable reality.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Canada deserves nothing less from those of us in this House. That we are here at all discussing agreements is a testament to those men and women around the constitutional table who persevered through very difficult times and a testament to the Canadian people who, with many other concerns, such as jobs and making ends meet, have never allowed the prevalent constitutional fatigue to represent a loss in the interest of our country, the future of our country, the possibility of our country and the dream of Canada. Today we are here to say that we are taking one further step in realizing that dream of Canada.

What has been achieved in this constitutional accord is a step toward the future. Constitutions are road maps. They are living documents. I know most Canadians would like to put the Constitution to sleep for a while, but constitutions are living documents. Constitutions will change as our society changes, as our culture changes as our country changes, and that is as it should be.

I am proud to say that the New Democratic Party and this caucus endorse the Charlottetown accord because we feel this is a step to move us toward the 21st century in a positive way, to unite our country in a way that is in the interests of all regions and all peoples of this country.

Let me begin the discussion with two fundamental questions that my party and I asked: First, why do we have a Constitution and what should it accomplish?

In my view a Constitution must recognize historical truths. It must comprehend current realities and anticipate future possibilities. It should reflect both the diversity of a nation and the common values which unite it. Through this accord Canada would be taking a major step toward such a Constitution.

• (1640)

In this accord, as has been discussed by the other leaders, the distinctiveness of Quebec is recognized and embraced. The alienation of the less populous, less powerful regions is recognized.

The exclusion of the north, Yukon and the Northwest Territories, and the restrictions on its self-determination are responded to. The inclusion of the leaders in Yukon and the Northwest Territories will be a very important part of future constitutional discussions.

The profound historical grievances of aboriginal peoples are met with the recognition of the inherent right of self-government and a real place in Constitution making and nation building.

In addition, we have put in place a social covenant which articulates the fundamental social rights of Canadian citizenship and the values that we share. This should not be overlooked as a minor achievement. It is a very important part of this constitutional accord.

Does the accord fall short of perfection? Of course it does. Each one of us in this House, I am sure, has reservations about one aspect or another. There are things we would like to see stronger in some cases or perhaps weaker in other cases, and I will address some of those issues in a moment.

When one looks at the package as a whole, respecting that this is a negotiation, not a negotiation of one person looking in a mirror and talking to himself or herself but a negotiation of many peoples and diverse peoples—and I believe it must be viewed as a whole—one sees that we have achieved a remarkable compromise. Different, often competing interests within our nation, indeed different visions of our nation, have been somehow brought together, acknowledged and balanced.

Nothing is as Canadian as compromise. It is truly what makes us that kinder, gentler nation. Let us not underestimate its value and let us not overlook some of the other means of conflict resolution in the world around us.

We are talking about the difference in international terms between co-operation and confrontation, handshakes and hand grenades, ballots and bullets. One hundred and twenty-five years of compromise and peace look pretty good to this Canadian.

There are many things that my party and I would have liked to have seen different in this constitutional process. We advocated a constituent assembly, but I would have to say that this process is a major improvement over former constitutional processes.

Aboriginal people were included. The territories were included. I believe it is fair to say that this new dynamic created by the inclusion of territorial leaders, by new premiers, by aboriginal people, was instrumental in the attainment of this agreement. It proves there is a place for every Canadian and every Canadian has a contribution to make to this very serious issue of the future of our country.

I would like to speak briefly about some of the achievements we see in this accord. Let me begin with Quebec and the progress realized in the relationship between Quebec and the rest of Canada.

In this accord, the distinct identity of Quebec society is at last given formal recognition. That in itself is a great victory, but in addition to this recognition, Quebec is also being given the instruments it needs to maintain and reinforce that distinct identity. This is crucial for the future of the people of Quebec.

A guaranteed 25 per cent of the seats in the House of Commons demonstrates the role played by Quebec in Canada. It demonstrates Quebec's role as a founding nation and full-fledged partner.

I have no doubt there will still be some tensions between Quebec and the rest of Canada, the other regions of this country. Any relationship, any friendship that is worth having experiences this kind of tension. There will always be people outside Quebec who will say that Quebec is treated differently. There will always be people in Quebec who say they will want no part of Canada.

Too often, there is a tendency to notice only this type of attitude. For instance, we tend to ignore the deep attachment that unites people from Quebec and from the rest of Canada. We witnessed it in the "My Canada includes Quebec", campaign launched by real people, and I mean ordinary citizens. This campaign spread throughout the country and saw thousands of volunteers make those who wanted to say yes to Quebec sign petitions.

[English]

In Quebec there was a recent poll in the magazine l'Actualité which received little attention in the rest of Canada but should perhaps be brought to the attention of those who did not see it. The poll revealed, in the words of the magazine, "a profound attachment of Quebecers to Canada". Seventy-one per cent of Quebecers affirmed that being Canadian was a part of their identity. A majority said that they would be willing to make a personal sacrifice that brought nothing to Quebec but which rendered an important service to Canada. There was a strong attachment to Canadian symbols and geography.

That poll confirms something I believe and that is that there is a growing feeling you can be a Quebecois and Canadian at the same time, you can be part of both Quebec and Canada, belong in both Quebec and Canada, care about both Quebec and Canada.

To those politicians who say that Quebecers have to choose between Quebec and Canada, I say as an English Canadian: You are wrong. I say as the leader of a federal party: You are wrong. You can be a welcome part of Canada, a valued part of Canada, a part of Canada that helps make Canada the country we love and respect.

The other major contribution of this accord is that there are other relationships in Canada which are recognized as fundamental to our national character and national unity. I have often said that the circle of Confederation will not be complete until the rights of aboriginal people have been addressed. The recognition of the inherent right of aboriginal self-government in this agreement is an historical step forward in this country.

I have the great privilege of representing the Yukon Territory where First Nations people make up a large percentage of the population. In the over a decade I have worked with aboriginal people I have come to understand something of the richness of their history and culture, of the despair and devastation caused by systematic attempts to rewrite that history and suppress that culture. I feel enormous pride that we are moving forward together in this country to address the injustices confronting aboriginal Canadians and at long last recognizing their historical rights.

This is something that all of us can take pride in. I remember about two years ago speaking to the World Indigenous Peoples Conference. I was then in Norway. I spoke about indigenous peoples issues. I was surprised by the number of people who came up to me from Peru, from Guatemala. In Guatemala 80 per cent of that population are Indian people. They approached me to say how extraordinary it was in their view, from their political culture, to see a political leader addressing the issues of indigenous people. They had never seen that before.

How proud we can be in Canada that we have set an international standard which says that the recognition of the rights of Canada's first peoples by this country are also valued and respected.

I must add that while we in Canada have facilitated that process, especially since 1982 and now in this accord, and that leaders of different political parties have supported this and have begun to listen to aboriginal people, let me say that it is directly due to aboriginal people themselves, to their strength, who persevered to be heard, to be listened to. I believe that Canadians at this place in our history cannot afford to say no to the First Nations of this country but rather, to say yes to an historic achievement.

There is no doubt we have made many mistakes in the first 500 years of contact between whites—immigrants to this country—and the First Nations of North America. Let us look at this agreement as the first step in the second 500 years to greater equality, greater justice and greater harmony.

As I said earlier, the regional realities of Canada have also been recognized in the constitutional agreement. The imbalance in Confederation in population, power and economic strength has been acknowledged and addressed in a number of forms and in the strengthening of the regional development clause. An attempt has been made to do that in the Senate as well.

The agreement on Senate reform represents another example of Canadian compromise. The result is not my first choice. It is not the first choice of this party, but it does demonstrate a willingness on the part of Canadians to try to find new solutions to old grievances and to take that risk to ensure all the concerns of the various regions of the country can be addressed.

The recognition of Quebec's distinct character, the aboriginal government, the reform of institutions, the social charter, a more comprehensive Canada clause, those are the reasons the New Democratic Party supports this agreement.

Our Constitution will allow a greater number of people to feel accepted and to feel concerned. It will enable them to know they have a place in our collective future. However, this does not mean that everybody will feel included. It does not mean that this agreement will solve everything. There will always be people who will feel that they are not included. There are people who have reservations and who are worried. We must listen to what they have to say. We must listen to those Canadians.

As a woman, I am concerned by the lack of progress made in certain fields. May I remind you that the United Nations puts Canada in first place among the countries of the world. We can be proud of this but do you know that based on the analysis on gender equality, Canada only comes in eighth place. This is unacceptable.

[English]

The issue of gender equality in the Senate is one which has caused a great deal of controversy in some quarters. The idea has been attacked as anti-democratic. While I do not believe that, I do believe we have the opportunity to make changes in our institutions which recognize not just regional equality but to expand that definition of equality to gender equality. I want to say I am pleased that four of the premiers have made a commitment to that principle.

I hope we will begin to look at this country in terms of wanting to make sure that our institutions reflect the reality of Canada, the reality of 52 per cent of this population, the women in this country. I will continue to push for gender equality in the Senate. As I have said, I am pleased that some of the provinces have committed to that goal.

I would also like to repeat that our party's first proposal for greater equity and representation for women and minorities in a new Senate is a system of proportional representation. We will continue to consider that a viable and important alternative.

The New Democratic Party will also continue to support the concerns of the ethnocultural community. Many within that community feel their rights have not been adequately addressed in this agreement. They perceive a weakness in the Canada clause and they are concerned about the notwithstanding clause. Our party, as we expressed in the Dobbie–Beaudoin report, shares that concern. These are outstanding issues that cannot be put to rest but must be dealt with.

The same is true for the disabled who for some reason have been totally excluded from the Canada clause. They must receive the same protection, the same equal treatment as others in our society.

These issues must become a part of the debate that is to be held. The Constitution is a living document. Discussions will continue. There is certainly nothing in this agreement that prohibits us from continuing and updating the Constitution and that is something we must continue to do.

Finally, let me acknowledge there are some Canadians who are concerned that this constitutional accord restricts the ability of the national government to maintain and introduce social programs. In my view this is not the case. For example, if there is a government committed to a national child care program, as I understand this accord, that government could put one in place, but what is required is the political will.

This accord is not perfect. It is a real step forward for Canada. I look forward to the referendum campaign when we will have the opportunity and indeed the responsibility to explain the accord to Canadians.

It is time to put aside partisanship and rigid ideologies and consider how best to serve Canada's future. I want to emphasize that throughout this campaign we must listen to Canadians who have concerns about this agreement. We must not minimize those concerns.

The atmosphere must be one of understanding. There is no room for bitterness, hostility or alienation. As politicians we should be encouraging and developing forums where Canadians can express their views, forums of real public debate which include those with divergent views.

Whatever the result is come October 26, we will have to work together as a nation to address the other issues confronting Canadians in their daily lives: jobs, their families and their economic future.

Let us remember in all of this that despite its flaws, Canada is a great success and a very fortunate nation. About a year and a half ago, I met the President of Mozambique who spoke of the economic devastation in his country, the famine, the war. Then he said to me with great kindness: "I understand you are having your problems here too". I have to admit I was a bit embarrassed and it certainly helped to put our problems in context.

At the same time as we deal with our difficulties, and they are real and we must deal with them, let us celebrate what we have been given and what we have achieved.

Canada is truly a remarkable nation. We have the opportunity to be a true model to others, a model of diverse peoples and cultures coming together, living together and building something worth while together.

The author, Roch Carrier, recently expressed a view that I believe a vast majority of Canadians in all parts of Canada share. He wrote: "I am more comfortable in a grand dream like Canada than in a narrow park where everybody speaks like me, has a pale face like mine and feels threatened by anybody not like me". Let us embrace that grand dream. Let us embrace Canada. Let us say yes to a renewed Canada on October 26.

Mr. Speaker: Shall I call it five o'clock?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(6) the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business, as listed on today's Order Paper.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East) moved that Bill C–340, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act (disqualifications of electors), be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C–340 is an act to amend the Canada Elections Act dealing with the issue of prisoner voting.

The intention and the purpose of the bill would provide that any person who is convicted of an indictable offence and sentenced to a term of imprisonment in a penitentiary is not qualified to vote at a federal election unless the person is granted full parole or a statutory release or is no longer in prison on account of a remission.

This is, quite frankly, the traditional position of the British common law. This is the position that has been enshrined in the British common law for years and years and years, in fact dating back centuries. It is a position which has been adopted into Canada as a result of the adoption here of the British common law. In fact, the first reference to prisoner voting, apart from the common law in this country, is one which goes back to the Constitution Act of 1791. That is an act in which the British Parliament dealing with Canada provided that all those who had been convicted of treason or felony would be deprived of a vote and disenfranchised. In addition to that, the common law position itself deprived anyone who was a prisoner in prison of their vote.

Subsequently, in 1898, the Canadian election legislation expressly provided that anyone who was a prisoner would be deprived of their vote. That was something that was understood at that time. It was not controversial. There was not a great debate about it. It was the common understanding of the people of this country at that time that that was the way things were as far as prisoner voting was concerned. So that particular piece of legislation was put in place and has been in place up to the present time in this country.

It is not something that is unique to Canada. It is not something that is unique to Great Britain or the United Kingdom. It is widespread, right around the world, that prisoners are deprived of their vote. In fact, if we look at other countries we see that that is the case in such countries as Greece, India, Jamaica, Norway, New Zealand, the United Kingdom, all but eight of the United States and in Australia as well, except for some of the states.

Recently, however, the courts in this country have addressed the issue and a number of prisoners have taken cases to the courts on whether or not prisoners have the right to vote in the light of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. There are a number of cases which have been decided by the courts and a number of cases have been appealed or are under appeal right now.

There are three leading cases on this issue. There is the Sauvé case which is a decision in the Ontario courts of a prisoner who was imprisoned in Collins Bay penitentiary in Ontario. In that case the judge, Madam Justice Van Camp said:

> It seems to me that Parliament was justified in limiting the right to vote with the objective that a liberal democratic regime requires a decent and responsible citizenry. Such a regime requires that the citizen obey voluntarily the practical efficacy of laws relied on and willing acquiescence of those subject to them.
> The state has a role in preserving itself by the symbolic exclusion of criminals from the right to vote for the lawmakers. So also, the exclusion of the criminal from the right to vote reinforces the concept of a decent responsible citizenry essential for a liberal democracy.

Those were the words of Madam Justice Van Camp in the Sauvé case in Ontario, a position which has been questioned by some other courts in other cases.

There is the Badger case in the province of Manitoba and the Belczowski case in the province of Alberta. The Belczowski case in effect found that as a result of section 1 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms that the Canada Elections Act excluding prisoners from voting was too broad and that there was a right for prisoners to vote.

In both the Sauvé case and the Belczowski case the decisions have been appealed through the various appeal courts and are now at a stage where leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada has been asked for to finally make a determination of whether or not there is a right of this Parliament to restrict the voting rights of prisoners notwithstanding the fact that section 1 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms provides that all Canadian citizens have a right to vote.

The issue seems to be a very simple and clear one. Some people have interpreted the court's decision as saying that there is no way as a result of the Charter of Rights that we can place a restriction on prisoners voting. However, quite clearly, if we look at the decisions of the courts in those cases, they are saying, at least to me and I believe to all Canadians, that you can make the restriction on voting rights for prisoners, it is just a question of the kind of a restriction that you put in place. You cannot say for instance that somebody who is out on parole cannot vote. You cannot say that somebody who has been released on remission and is no longer in prison cannot vote. There are restrictions that you can put on voting as a Parliament and that we the courts in fact would like some guidance from you as to what kind of restriction that should be. We want to see what Parliament has to say on this subject.

It is with that in mind that I have brought this bill before the House to make it quite clear to the courts what Parliament has in mind as far as restricting the right to vote for prisoners.

This bill, as I have indicated, does not say that a prisoner who is on parole is going to be deprived of his right to vote or a prisoner on statutory release or who is no longer in prison because of a remission of their sentence. It does say however that any person convicted of an indictable offence and sentenced to a term of imprisonment in a penitentiary is not qualified to vote at a federal election.

Traditionally in this country and traditionally in many other countries around the world, as I have indicated, people of the country have taken a position that one of the penalties that goes with a conviction for a criminal offence of a serious nature is to be deprived of your vote. Those who have been convicted of a crime of a serious nature certainly do not have the right to vote in a federal election to choose the members of this House until they are released again into society.

I had a chance to reflect on this a little more over this past week as I read some of the reports in the newspapers of people being convicted and sentenced in my own city of Toronto.

On September 1 I picked up one of the Toronto newspapers and read of two particular cases that I think we should bear in mind when dealing with this issue. The first has the headline "Man jailed 17 years in failed $3 million hold-up". This is a case of a man who made off with $3 million in a downtown Toronto bank robbery but was caught when he came back to the area to retrieve his keys. He was jailed for 17 years. In imposing sentence on this man, one of the longest serving and most astute judges of the Ontario bench in dealing with criminal matters, Mr. Justice Hugh Locke, said of this particular person: "He was motivated by greed. He employed electronic devices and threatened the lives of many human beings. He threatened to blow up a building with thousands of human beings inside". As a result of that, Mr. Justice Locke sentenced that man to 17 years in prison.

Now surely, Madam Speaker, neither you nor I nor the Canadian people nor the courts in this country believe that somebody who Mr. Justice Locke would have used those comments about, somebody whom he sentenced to 17 years in prison, should have a right to vote while in prison. Surely that should be one of the additional penalties along with the 17 years.

In the same paper I picked up there was another headline that came to my attention. This was of a man who was sentenced to 13 and a half years in prison for three Brampton sex attacks. In this particular instance, the man came before a judge who used to be a member of this House when you and I were first elected, Madam Speaker. He was then the hon. member for Cambridge, Mr. Chris Speyer. Mr. Justice Speyer, in handing down judgment on this particular person, called this person a predator "as dangerous an individual to women as one can imagine". The facts of the case on which he based that opinion were the facts that he was sentenced for three sex attacks on Brampton women in their homes, including a knife-point assault on a frail 71-year old widowed grandmother. Surely, Madam Speaker, neither you nor I, the Canadian people nor the courts in this country believe that that particular person should have a a right to vote while he is in prison.

I would hope that the members of this House, the members of Parliament, would endorse the principle which has been longstanding in our system of justice, that depriving a prisoner of his or her right to vote is part of the criminal sentence, that this is a reasonable thing, that it is something that we need to carry on, that if we do not carry it on we have to beg the question then who is running the country? Is it those who have been convicted of serious criminal offences and are imprisoned as a result of that, or is it those who have been good law-abiding citizens, citizens of whom Madam Justice Van Camp spoke when she said: "The state has a role in preserving itself by the symbolic exclusion of criminals from the right to vote for the lawmakers. So also the exclusion of the criminal from the right to vote reinforces the concept of a decent responsible citizenry essential for a liberal democracy".

I applaud and I echo those comments of Madam Justice Van Camp.

I would like to move that, notwithstanding any Standing Orders or the usual practices of the House, Bill C-340, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act (disqualifications of electors), be referred after second reading to the justice committee. I would hope to have a seconder for that motion. I believe the hon. member for Medicine Hat will second that motion.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am curious whether or not it is in order for the member to move a motion on his own bill.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member for Churchill. I was about to rise and ask if there was unanimous consent for the change to this bill which the hon. member is suggesting, that it be referred to the justice committee instead of to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

Would there be unanimous consent?

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, there is not unanimous consent. A committee of the House is already looking at this very matter. It is the Special Committee on Electoral Reform chaired by the chief government Whip.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Consequently the motion remains as read earlier.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to participate in the debate on this very interesting and I suggest controversial bill the hon. member has introduced in the House today.

I am a member of the committee to which the hon. member for Churchill just referred. I confirm his view that this whole issue is being studied by that committee at the present time.

The committee will in due course be submitting a report to the House on the issue, as I am sure the hon. member is aware. It certainly will consider the views expressed by the hon. member in his speech and in the bill he has tabled before the House.

However, I want to make a few observations about the bill. I am rather surprised he brought it forward because surely in the course of his work and preparation of the bill he must have studied the decisions of the courts in this country that have pronounced on the validity of the existing provisions on the Canada Elections Act which currently deny to inmates in federal prisons the right to vote. I refer him to section 51 of the Canada Elections Act which reads:

> The following persons are not qualified to vote at an election and shall not vote at an election:
> (e) every person undergoing punishment as an inmate in a penal institution for the commission of any offence.

In considering the validity of this particular provision the courts have made judgments on the issue. He has said that the Supreme Court of Canada has not yet pronounced on it. I understand that is the case, but the fact is that we have two judgments from very senior courts in Canada which have pronounced on the issue. One is the judgment of the Federal Court of Canada in the Queen v. Belczowski, which was heard in Edmonton in January of this year and the decision handed down in February. In that case the Federal Court of Appeal unanimously found that the section violated the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

There was a similar decision in the Ontario Court of Appeal in the case of Sauvé v. the Attorney General of Canada, the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada and the Solicitor General of Canada. Again in that case the validity of section 51(e) of the Canada Elections Act was impugned and indeed it was held to be contrary to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The charter has changed the position of the common law to which my hon. friend referred. He said the common law of England denied to prisoners the right to vote and that had been the position for many years. I understand it may still be the position in the United Kingdon.

The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms adopted in the later part of this century has changed the common law. It gave to all Canadian citizens the right to vote. It was established as a fundamental right of citizenship in Canada. That right to vote is a very important one.

The fact is that the charter changed the law. We have to interpret old laws in relation to the charter and recognize that the situation has changed. I suggest that Bill C-340 introduced by the hon. member does not reflect much of a change that the charter has brought about.

The bill says that every person convicted of an indictable offence and sentenced to a term of imprisonment in a penitentiary will be denied the right to vote, in effect. Clearly, if the inmate is out of prison at the time, voting rights will return. However, if the prisoner is in penitentiary, which is exactly what is the case under section 51(e), then the right to vote is denied to that person.

I am sure that the hon. member is going to argue that only those convicted of indictable offences will face the loss of their voting rights. That may be true but of course there will be various indictable offences for which terms of imprisonment for less than a prison term may be granted where the person is not in a penitentiary but is in a provincial jail.

Under this new bill I assume that person will have voting rights because the term of the bill is that the person be in a penitentiary. Of course a penitentiary is a federal prison. Provincial prisons are not penitentiaries. Therefore, someone who has been convicted of the indictable offence of impaired driving, for example, will find himself or herself able to vote as long as the sentence is one of more than two years.

Persons who are convicted of indictable offences quite serious in their nature but receive a sentence of less than two years will be entitled to vote. In other words, the degree of severity of the sentence will be the sole determinant in whether or not voting rights accrue.

I am not sure that is a fair basis on which to place the distinction between who should have the right to vote and who should not among the class of person referred to, persons sentenced to prison terms.

The Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing cost us $17 million or $18 million. It submitted an extensive report to the committee on which the hon. member for Churchill and I are privileged to sit that is spending its time studying the report. We have a four-volume report to work on. I have two of them here.

The commission has made certain recommendations with respect to the rights of persons in prison. One recommendation of the royal commission was that persons convicted of an offence punishable by a maximum of life imprisonment and sentenced for 10 years or more be disqualified from voting during the time they are imprisoned.

The committee is looking at that recommendation. I am not sure that it finds full favour with the members of the committee because it also bases the ban on voting on the question of the severity of the sentence rather than on the crime for which the person was convicted.

There is some interest in the committee in looking at crimes as the basis for depriving persons of voting rights rather than the severity of the sentence. Indeed some of the arguments put forward in the royal commission's report indicate that perhaps that kind of disqualification would be fairer.

In the course of its report at page 44 of volume 1 the commission said: "The scope of the current disqualification is clearly too broad. It fails to distinguish between types of offences and thus disqualifies persons who have committed offences that cannot in any way be considered significant violations of the essential norms of responsible conduct in a liberal, democratic state. In terms of Canadian jurisprudence this blanket disqualification cannot meet the proportionality test laid down in the Queen

v. Oakes, 1986, because the disqualification is not proportional to any intended objective".

I could quote also in support of my opposition to this bill a page from the decision of the Federal Court of Appeal in the Queen v. Belczowski at page 15. I quote from the decision of Mr. Justice Hugessen who said:

> Depriving prisoners of the vote is not a ringing and unambiguous public declaration of principle. On the contrary it is an almost invisible infringement of the rights of a group of persons who, as long as they remain inside the walls are, to our national disgrace, almost universally unseen and unthought of.
> If, as I think, therefore, the alleged symbolic objective is one whose symbolism is lost on the great majority of citizens, it is impossible to characterize that objective as pressing or substantial.

He continued on page 17 of the judgment:

> Alternatively, and far less commendably, it would appear to me that the true objective of paragraph 51(e) of the Canada Elections Act may be to satisfy a widely held stereotype of the prisoner as a no-good, almost sub-human form of life to which all rights should be indiscriminately denied. That, it need hardly be said, is not an objective which would satisfy section 1 of the charter.

He goes on:

> The fact of being in prison is not, by any means, a sure or rational indication that the prisoner is not a decent and responsible citizen.

The prisoner may have made a mistake. The penalty that the law may have imposed or may impose on a person who has committed an offence may result in a prison term for one, a fine for another, probation for another.

The fact is that the proposal put forward in the hon. member's bill and the proposal in the current law violate our charter by these decisions because they propose that the test not be the offence, the degree of culpability, the character or anything about the accused person, but that it be whether or not that person is in prison at the time the election is held.

An hon. member: An indictable offence.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member says: "An indictable offence". The hon. member must know that no one will be in penitentiary unless that person has been convicted of an indictable offence. I say to the hon. member one cannot get to a penitentiary unless one commits an indictable offence. Summary conviction offences do not get sentences of longer than two years so one cannot get to a penitentiary on anything but an indictable offence.

The hon. member has drawn a distinction without a difference. I suggest this distinction is insufficient in law to justify a change from the decisions of the senior courts that we are faced with.

We have to try to get a law in Canada that will work in terms of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. That is what the committee is struggling with and will continue to struggle with. This bill fails to meet that test, I suggest to the hon. member, that with regret I must decline to support it.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I would also like to echo some of the thoughts and concerns of the last speaker.

It is certainly not our intent or my intent as a representative of the New Democratic Party to say that there is no occasion when someone should be denied the vote. In other words, there are probably occasions when people should be denied the vote but they should be explicitly explained in law.

One of the problems that we have had in the royal commission report and one of the problems that I have with the private member's Bill C-340 in front of us at the present time is that the depriving of the right to vote is only for those people who are imprisoned, while they are imprisoned. It is not related to the offence itself. In other words, if a judge lets somebody off or if the judge decides to levy a fine or if the judge decides to send someone to a provincial jail as opposed to a federal penitentiary, that person does not lose the right to vote.

Mr. Redway: Do you think they should be deprived of that right?

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, I am being heckled by the member who presented the bill and whom I did not heckle during his speech.

In terms of fairness there is a problem with this bill. We have had a royal commission, as was pointed out earlier, which spent in excess of $16 million looking at the charter, looking at the whole electoral system in this country, and it made a recommendation.

We have had for almost the last six months a committee of this House looking at who should have the right to vote and the regulations pertaining to that. As part of that process members from all three parties have been grappling with when someone convicted of an offence should lose the right to vote and when that should not occur.

I have heard members say that the Clifford Olsons of this world should not have the right to vote. That is a justifiable argument, but how is it going to be phrased in law in such a way that the courts will not throw it out in the future? That is a concern. They may also have to take a look at who is actually in prison at the present time.

• (1730)

One of the ironies we all know exists in our system is that the very fact you are convicted of an offence does not mean you are going to be treated equally by the courts. Some will go to jail. Some will go to jail for short terms and some will go to jail for long terms. Others, as I mentioned earlier, will get off with a fine. Often this relates more to the legal and financial powers of someone who is convicted rather than to the individual aspects and merits of the case.

We know that in our country there are many, many more native Canadians who end up in a penitentiary than others who commit similar offences. It is not one of the bright lights of our judicial system but it is a fact in this nation.

If the mover of this motion had taken the approach of listing certain offences, perhaps those offences which carry a maximum penalty of life imprisonment or those offences which carry a maximum period of five or 10 years imprisonment, everyone who is convicted of those crimes would lose the right to vote. That would be a fairer system because if you are convicted of a crime, you lose the right to vote and it is not on the basis of what the judge determines should be your punishment. Therefore, if you commit murder you lose the right to vote. It is not whether you are put in jail for one or two years. That is the whole point.

If the member had taken that approach, I think he would have found that his bill would have been charter-proof. That is one approach. It is not the only approach, but it is one that has been considered by the Special Committee on Electoral Reform which, as I said earlier, has representation from the three political parties in the House of Commons. We recognize what has happened with the court cases. With respect, I do not believe that this member's bill will get around future court challenges.

I understand the concerns many Canadians have and I am sure the member has with the fact that there are people who have committed horrendous crimes and still have the right to vote. However, I do not believe that the bill before us resolves it in a way that is fair to all Canadians and at the same time recognizes what has happened in the courts of this land.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Since no more members wish to speak, the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

[English]

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

Would there be unanimous consent to call it six o'clock?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I would be prepared to wait for a few minutes to make sure that members are here and we can proceed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

SMALL BUSINESS

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, last spring I expressed concern in Question Period about the difficulties small businesses are experiencing in obtaining financing.

It is estimated that in this country, eight out of every 10 new positions are created by small business. Certainly, Canadians need jobs. Unfortunately, due to this recession, many small businesses lack the confidence to invest any further and also consumers lack the confidence to spend. Both consumers and businesses have lost confidence that this government will bring in an economic plan to get us out of the recession and put Canadians back to work.

Over the summer I talked to several business people in my district of Malpeque, Prince Edward Island. Many of them expressed concerns to me about their fear of not being able to continue and how much longer they could really weather this recession.

In August I heard from a tourist operator who has been experiencing some tough times over the past two years. This is a tourist operator who has been in business for a decade. As I say, she has had two rough years, last year and this year.

She wanted to renegotiate her mortgage payments over a longer time to take off some of the pressure. She had hoped to do this under the small business financing program. After consulting with four financial institutions on Prince Edward Island, two of them never even bothered to look at her application and the other two simply said that her revenues were down.

You can imagine the frustration of this constituent. It is understandable that she is frustrated because of course revenues are down in nearly all businesses across this country. If her revenues were up, she would not have been in there trying to renegotiate her loan.

To demonstrate the anguish that small business people are feeling across this country, I want to quote from her letter. She said: "I thought these programs were to help small businesses in financial difficulties due to the recession. However, it seems your business has to be making money in a given year just to be eligible." She adds at the end of the letter: "Maybe the government would rather see me on welfare, getting paid to do nothing, rather than helping me stay on my feet".

Those two paragraphs are from a letter of a business person in my constituency who has been a successful tourist operator for the past decade. I am not saying that these small business loans are of no use. Certainly, they help some businesses. However what I am saying is that I believe they can be improved. They can be simplified and they can be better tailored to meet the needs of small businesses.

I challenge the government to look at these programs, to make the necessary changes so that the programs are better able to meet the needs of the small business people.

Finally, pressure must be placed upon lending authorities to ensure that they are sensitive to the problems of small businesses and that financing remains available for these small businesses through the tough times, like the example I referred to of the tourist operator in my district.

This recession has dragged on too long. The least the government can do is to ensure small businesses have access to the financing they need to grow, expand and create the much needed jobs which this government's policies have failed to do.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I listened with care to the comments of my hon. friend opposite who, as usual, has addressed this issue with careful preparation, thought and as a constructive debater.

As a reflection of the seriousness with which the government views the issue of the availability of financing for small business, the minister of state met with financial institutions on several occasions to express concern over the tightening of credit, real or perceived.

While there is still room for improvement, we have seen some progress with the freezing and in some cases, reduction of the level of service charges by several of the banks.

At the same time, it is important to recognize that the government has already taken action and is also in the process of expanding a number of measures that address this problem.

With inflation under control and interest rates down to levels we have not seen for 20 years, Canada now enjoys one of the most stable and favourable investment climates of any industrialized country. This by itself should remove much of the uncertainty that has unnerved financial decision–makers over the past several years.

Improvements to the Small Businesses Loans Act program, including a doubling of the amount that could be guaranteed, will be introduced later this year. It is interesting to note that loans registered under the SBLA program in the first quarter of this fiscal year were up by 9 per cent over the previous year. Activity since the end of June indicates that this trend is continuing. This would appear to be an indication that this government guarantee program is achieving its goal of making credit accessible to firms which might otherwise be denied it.

You will recall, that we introduced the small business financing program in the last budget as a quick means of being able to lower the cost of refinancing businesses that were in financial difficulty.

The additional competition anticipated from the recent overhaul of our financial services regulatory environment should improve the access of small businesses to financing. Businesses unable to obtain conventional financing can approach the Federal Business Development Bank for term loans, equity financing and venture loans, as well as innovative approaches to assisting them in managing their affairs.

Labour-sponsored venture capital funds are also developing into an important source of equity financing in those provinces that have passed compatible legislation.

Finally, we will continue to monitor the issue of small business access to financing to ensure that this critical sector of the economy has the resources it needs to realize its full potential as we move on the road to recovery.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Recently, the government chose to close a supply depot and base in the city of Moncton. The result is that 250 civilian people will be put out of work. This base was promised to the community. It was promised to have a new facility. The hundred million dollar commitment was, in fact, made by three ministers of national defence.

This government has now reneged on that promise. What is interesting is that it reneged on this promise a month before a task force was to report on just exactly how the military's facilities should be rationalized and how we are going to deal with base closures. I asked myself why the minister would choose a month before this independent report was coming down to make this announcement to close the base.

There are a couple of reasons. The obvious one, if you read the report, is that there was no mention of the Moncton base closure in that report. Obviously, the independent study did not even know the government intended to close the base. I can only conclude from that that this was a purely political decision taken at the very last minute by a very politicized department and a very political minister.

Second, if you look at the recommendations in the task force report, one can only conclude one thing. This minister did not want to be held accountable to those recommendations and have to deal with those recommendations and do what is necessary under those recommendations.

The report recommends a couple of things that are of interest. Number one, it suggests an independent agency, and I quote from the report: "In order to translate ministerial proposals into government decisions we see a need for a process that will enable members of Parliament, affected communities and the public to ask questions and to assess DND's case; and also provide time for federal and provincial agencies in affected communities to work out mitigation measures; and thirdly, to limit partisan political considerations in closing the base". Obviously, it is that last item that this minister does not want to deal with.

As well, the recommendations create a responsibility for the federal government. Again I quote from the report: "We see federal responsibility for mitigating the effects of base closures as a natural extension of this responsibility, and Employment and Immigration Canada is the obvious department to take the lead in developing a federal policy". God help us in Moncton if that department should be responsible for initiating that process because the minister has already said that he would do nothing for Moncton because Moncton is doing fine. He has no concern for the 250 people who are going to lose their jobs, their families, their dignity, all of those things associated with being gainfully employed. The fundamental flaw in everything that is done is that this minister and this department have turned the Department of National Defence into a political pork-barrel. I asked the minister to explain why he would go back on his promise and the promise of the previous two ministers, close that base and put those people out of work and then spend the same amount of money in another community and as well go against what is obviously proper military advice from everything that we can determine in analysing the reports and information to the effect that the Moncton base should stay open as it is an integral supply base to the whole military system in Atlantic Canada. This minister has chosen to close that base, disregard military advice and to play pure partisan politics. What has been done is fundamentally wrong and this government should be called to account.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, it is certainly understandable why the member for Moncton would raise on behalf of his constituents and the 250 who lost their jobs this issue here in the House of Commons. However, it is quite indefensible that in doing so he would accuse the Department of National Defence and the minister of political pork-barrelling, that the department has been made a purely political department over something like this and that the military advice with respect to the closing of the depot in Moncton was ignored.

I have four brief points in rebuttal to what the member has said. First, the number of depots in the country has been on a decline over the long period of our Canadian history: from 34 to 21 to 15, down to five, now down to two. It is because methods of transportation have improved, communication has improved and the need for many depots structured throughout the land is not the same now as it was in many earlier periods of Canadian history.

Second, the size of the Canadian Armed Forces, as the member well knows, is being reduced. In concert with that it is part of the process to reduce the infrastructure necessary to support our Canadian Armed Forces.

Third, and a very important advance in terms of our military preparedness, is the forward staging of matériel in the Canadian Armed Forces bases themselves. A lot of what formerly had been kept back in depots is now found, for example in the case of the Moncton base, at bases in Halifax and so on. This is to say that there is actually more distribution of matériel throughout the country at the Canadian Armed Forces bases proper rather than held back in depots.

The fourth and final point is that just as we have seen in industry, which has modernized its whole practice of warehousing with something called "just in time delivery", the very modern Canadian Armed Forces of the 1990s is also understanding that it is no longer necessary to have great warehouses filled with many thousands of mattresses or countless paper forms or so on, that we too can be part of the modern age and therefore reduce the overhead of supplies that are kept in the depots.

For all these reasons it is intelligent policy to concentrate now on the two depots in Montreal that can admirably serve central, eastern and Atlantic Canada and the Edmonton depot to serve western and northern Canada.

I think the hon. member for Moncton should applaud intelligent policy making and support it rather than denigrating it here in the House of Commons.

JOB TRAINING

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, there is no doubt that the most important issue for Canadians today is the economy. Canadians are concerned about their jobs, their businesses and the future of their children.

We have record levels of unemployment, record levels of bankruptcies and the government refuses to change its policies or its direction.

According to the statistics released last Friday by Statistics Canada, in August there were 1.6 million Canadians unemployed for a percentage of 11.6 per cent. That is 1.6 million Canadians who are looking for work.

• (1750)

Those figures do not include Canadians who are no longer looking for work, who have dropped out of the labour market. Worse still, the number of full time jobs fell by 8,000 in the month of August and part-time employment increased by 19,000. While the total employment was going down, the mix of full time versus part-time was increasing in favour of part-time jobs.

What does that mean? It means that those who are working part time for the most part are working on minimum wage, non-union jobs with no benefits, no unemployment insurance, no pensions, no health plan and no paid holidays. That is the direction we are going in.

Just to look at some of the statistics or some of the clippings on this from a recent poll that was made public by Angus Reid through the freedom of information: "The government conducted a poll with Canadians and the results were that Canadians viewed the GST and free trade as the major villains driving the recession into its third year, federal polling results obtained under the access to information reveal".

Because of all these things, on June 4, approximately three months ago just before the House adjourned for the summer, I asked the Minister for Employment and Immigration why with that situation it was the same situation then as it is now. At that time there were 11.6 per cent of Canadians unemployed. I asked him why he was cutting back on training funds for the unemployed and why he was cutting back on job creation programs for the unemployed.

Of course, the minister replied as he always does that in fact he was increasing the moneys. Of course, he increased the moneys in 1991–92 from what they were in 1989–90. If you compare the moneys that were available back in 1984, 1986 and 1987, they are much less as a per capita expenditure for Canadians. He is picking a starting point which allows him to say he is increasing the funds, but in fact he is not increasing the funds.

The funds have been cut back as compared with a few years ago and all summer we all received as members complaints from Canadians that they had been enrolled in training programs. These are unemployed Canadians who were enrolled for retraining. All of a sudden, they were advised by the local Canada Employment Centre that their retraining or training program could not go ahead because the funds had been cut back.

I do not know what happened to the government members over the summer but I hope they were subject to the same barrage of complaints that we were. I hope that the parliamentary secretary who is here today to answer will give us a better answer. I ask the government to please have some compassion for the Canadian unemployed and increase—not fool around with numbers—the funding for training and job creation considering the horrible situation that is faced by Canadians.

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I have the pleasure to inform the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce that our government has recognized the importance of training programs in this country and has allocated the funds required to help the unemployed.

For instance, let me mention the funds allocated to Quebec within the last two years under the independent trainees program. The hon. member is well aware that last year the government ensured that $27.6 million would be allocated to the independent trainees programs offered under the unemployment insurance program.

Because of this, in Quebec some 7,000 unemployed were able to receive training. This year, we are still having some economic difficulties and the government must provide even more assistance to the Quebec unemployed who want to obtain some type of retraining. The government therefore allocated $87.5 million to this program at the beginning of the year. In June, the government realized that this amount would not meet the demand and added another $32.9 million, increasing it by $6 million in August 1992. In a single year, the government has therefore increased by $100 million the funds allocated to the independent trainees program. This a significant example of the commitment made by this government to help the unemployed during these difficult times.

This government currently allocates $1.95 billion to training under the unemployment insurance program. It spends another $1.6 billion on training and employment assistance programs aimed at those who do not receive unemployment insurance benefits.

This year, 900,000 unemployed Canadians will take advantage of training programs established by this government. This year, we will spend a total of $3.55 billion on programs to give Canadians the training they need to re-enter the work force. This represents a net increase of $450 million from last year's budget of $3.1 billion.

This government is here to help Canadians go through a difficult period. It is also committed to manage public expenditures in a responsible manner so that Canadians do not find themselves more in debt at the end of the recession, as the previous government did during the last recession.

ABORIGINAL HEALING LODGE

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to be able to raise again the question I raised on June 1 concerning the selection of Maple Creek as the site for the aboriginal women's healing lodge.

Since that time there has been a lot of good work done on this issue by people like the students from the Gabrial Dumont Institute in Prince Albert, Alice Carrol from the Prince Albert Tribal Council, and Elizabeth Bear from the Crisis Centre in the city.

If I might review what happened here, the original decision to close the Kingston prison for women was welcomed by many of us, especially aboriginal people from northern Saskatchewan, because there are three aboriginal women from my own constituency who died in that institution.

The fundamental finding was that in order to be effective these women had to be closer to their families and to their support networks. That was the fundamental flaw with the Kingston location.

My contention is the selection of Maple Creek fundamentally ignores those two basic criteria. One half of 1 per cent of the aboriginal people in Saskatchewan live within 200 kilometres of the Maple Creek location.

There is no vacant housing on that Indian reserve in the region. As well, there are only two low income houses in the town of Maple Creek and both of them are occupied. There are very few aboriginal people who live in that city so that is not a welcoming environment for those families to move to while the women of those families are incarcerated.

The same holds true with aboriginal support networks. There are not aboriginal institutions in the city of Maple Creek. It is a very small band and there are not the kind of institutions like there are, for example, in Prince Albert where you have the Gabrial Dumont Institute, the Prince Albert Tribal Council, and a number of other aboriginal institutions that could provide the expertise for this facility.

I call on the minister to review this case because I do not think there was an objective evaluation of the proposals that were made. I have a number of instances I would like to cite, one of which has not been made public but which I have become aware of. A member of the selection committee phoned a national aboriginal leader who had supported the Prince Albert bid to ask him to withdraw his support of the Prince Albert proposal before the decision was even made, before the group ever met. A member of that committee phoned a leader and asked him to withdraw his support. That says to me there was a predisposition to choose a location other than Prince Albert.

Since that time I have used the access to information legislation and obtained further information on what happened here. I find things like some of the criteria that were included, things like the question of water. When it comes to water, the report from the selection committee makes a big deal of what great access to water there is at the Maple Creek site. However when you read the Maple Creek proposal, it makes only a vague reference to creeks and streams in the region. It does not say anything specific about water at all.

When it comes to Prince Albert, they say the North Saskatchewan River is polluted. They did not even read the proposal. Neither of the two Prince Albert locations are even on the North Saskatchewan River. They are on the Little Red River and on the Shell River, neither of which is polluted. An issue that seemed to be very important to the committee, but which it appears it did not even consider, is the Prince Albert proposal.

As well they said Prince Albert was an inappropriate place because there are already corrections there and it is a prison town. The fact those institutions exist means there are aboriginal women there and aboriginal people who have experience in dealing with corrections who could provide the professional expertise and support that is required here.

I would like to again ask the government to review this because I do not think an objective decision was made here. I would like to plead with the government to take another look at this so we do not make another mistake.

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the Solicitor General, I am pleased to speak today on the point raised in the House on June 1, 1992 and mentioned here previously by the hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River on the selection of Maple Creek–Nekaneet in Saskatchewan as the site for the new healing lodge for aboriginal female offenders.

Correctional Services Canada established a planning committee for the healing lodge. It has nine members, five from the CSC and four aboriginal women representing native women's organizations. In addition, three elders advise this committee on aboriginal spirituality and traditions. The planning committee was responsible for carrying out the location assessment process for this facility and recommending a site to the Solicitor General.

Twenty–three communities in Saskatchewan that expressed interest in having a healing lodge were evaluated by the committee. The location selection criteria and the assessment process were specifically designed to reflect aboriginal culture. Correctional Services received many high–quality submissions, but the first–place proposal from the town of Maple Creek and the Nekaneet Band was exceptional in that it met or exceeded all the requirements, including the support of a council of elders, the provision of health services respectful of native culture, the need for appropriate land, the availability of spring water and the support of an aboriginal community that is proud of its traditions and open to other native groups.

Maple Creek is almost equidistant from Calgary, Regina and Saskatoon. At present, 47 aboriginal women are under federal sentence and 23 of them are from Saskatchewan and Alberta. The selection of the site for the healing lodge was well received by the aboriginal women at the prison for women.

As in the other new facilities for federally sentenced women, program delivery will be premised on individualized plans, a holistic approach, an interactive relationship with the community and a focus on preparation for release.

As the Solicitor General stated on June 1, 1992, politics did not play a part in the site selection process and all parties concerned sought only the welfare of the aboriginal women.

With regard to the request for a complete review of the selection process, I am satisfied that the decision made by the Solicitor General of Canada was made with integrity and in good faith. I emphasize that the decision to locate the healing lodge for aboriginal female offenders in the community of Maple Creek–Nekaneet is in conformity with the recommendations and advice of the planning committee. The Solicitor General took into consideration the best interests of aboriginal female offenders.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The motion that the House do now adjourn is deemed to be adopted. The House therefore stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

GROUNDFISH INDUSTRY

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, while the referendum will end much of the constitutional uncertainty in our country, coastal Atlantic Canadians are still burdened by the uncertainty about the future of the Atlantic groundfish industry.

The government and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans in particular are to be commended for the extensive support program put in place to alleviate the impact of the closure of the northern cod fishery.

The hard times are not yet over as we look ahead to severe quota cod cuts in the gulf and in the 4VN and 4VS stocks.

The transfer of National Sea's head office to Lunenburg is welcome news for Lunenburg county but the fact is 65 people will lose their jobs in the process, and 26 of these will be in the town of Lunenburg.

I urge the government to start planning now a support program for the impact of the 1993 quota cuts on the Nova Scotian economy.

In addition to support for individuals directly affected, consideration should be given to injecting new capital into the AFAP diversification fund. The Atlantic fishing industry must maximize its use of the ocean's resources. Government must continue to play an activist role in this process.

WATER EXPORTS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, now that we have had an opportunity to pursue the North America Free Trade Agreement our worst fears have been verified.

Canada's rivers and lakes were not made explicitly exempt in the deal. In the Canada–U.S. deal beer was exempt and in the North America Free Trade Agreement culture was exempt. Why not water?

Does this government plan to eventually allow the sell off of some of our rivers and lakes to the United States and Mexico? Is that why this government has consistently failed to pass independent legislation in this House which would prohibit major water sales to the United States and Mexico?

Canadians do not want to sell fresh water from our rivers and lakes to the United States and Mexico. Water should not be considered simply another commodity to be sold to the highest bidder.

There are many reasons for us to scrap NAFTA at this stage as American political leaders are suggesting today. One of the main reasons is the fact that this deal is a tacit agreement for this government to sell water to the United States and Mexico in the future.

WOOD ISLANDS FERRY

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, a new terminal design is being proposed for the Wood Islands ferry in my riding. Transport Canada and Public Works are preparing to demolish existing buildings at the terminal site by September 30, 1992. The present federal government plan is to build a generic terminal which will eliminate the existing atmosphere that is pleasing to tourists and all commuters.

The Wood Islands ferry terminal should be a welcome mat for tourists and a nice place to relax before leaving the Island by ferry. Instead, the federal government is going to build a big wire fence and a speedway off the ferry.

The Wood Islands ferry terminal has been completely redesigned and the concerns of the people in the community are being ignored. The federal government should listen to the people and make the ferry terminal a more pleasing place for both tourists and the people of eastern Prince Edward Island.

CASH FLOW ENHANCEMENT PROGRAM

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the Cash Flow Enhancement Program enabled farmers to secure interest-free cash advances during the past two crop years, 1990–91 and 1991–92. Under the program each producer was able to secure up to $50,000 interest free on the security of his undelivered grain.

Regrettably there remains on the prairies a serious cash flow problem resulting from low world prices, the export subsidies of competing export nations, poor harvest conditions and in Saskatchewan, the unilateral gutting of the GRIP program by the provincial government.

The Cash Flow Enhancement Program enables farmers to get some immediate cash on grain they have produced but cannot sell. I urge the government to renew this program for the current 1992–93 crop year which commenced August 1.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, Canada was one of the key players in the founding of the United Nations. This country's experience in two world wars, Korea and many other modern-day United Nations operations are invaluable on the international scene.

It is very important while we discuss constitutional and economic issues, et cetera, in this House of Commons of Canada that we never forget the responsible and the effective manner in which our Canadian Armed Forces continue to carry on Canada's major roles in the international community and continue to build goodwill for Canada wherever they go.

Some 750 members of the airborne regiment including support staff and a hospital unit from CFB Petawawa are headed for Somalia to assist in the distribution of humanitarian aid. Approximately 100 will soon leave for Cambodia as part of the UN advance mission. Another 45 will go to Kuwait on a very important mission. Others are all around the world, including Cyprus.

The appreciation and support of this Parliament of Canada goes with them and our hearts and encouragement go out to their loved ones back home in Canada. Our Canadian Forces exemplify the real spirit of Canada in the world.

CYPRUS

Mr. Gus Mitges (Bruce—Grey): Mr. Speaker, there is no question the world community now believes that conditions have matured for the restoration of justice in Cyprus, respect for the human rights of all its population, and for the implementation of the resolutions of the United Nations whose efforts and particularly those of the Secretary General and the Security Council, must be sincerely supported at this crucial point of the Cyprus problem.

The occupation of northern Cyprus by Turkish troops since 1974 has developed into a heavy burden for Turkey which will not end unless a just, viable and workable settlement is attained for the reunification of Cyprus.

The international community expects the Turkish government to promote a real sense of responsibility and a down-to-earth approach toward the peace talks between Greece and Turkish Cypriots which will resume at the United Nations on October 26.

Let us hope that on October 26 we will see a greater degree of political will by the parties involved for a lasting agreement.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, the proposed North American Free Trade Agreement has completely inadequate environmental safeguards. The environmental assessment of the deal has not been made public as promised. Why should Canadians believe that the results, whenever we see them, have not been scrambled together to support this neo-conservative deal?

Canadians have repeatedly heard this government's breezy assurances that Mexican environmental standards will rise to Canadian levels. This promise is scandalous considering we have yet to live up to our own standards.

When money is involved environmental commitments fall by the wayside. The pressure to lower environmental standards is real. It has happened here and despite Mexican legislation, multinationals have made a toxic mess of the Maquiladora.

It is naive to assume that conditions will magically right themselves with the signing of this trade deal. The Prime Minister has made national and international commitments on environmental protection, yet there are no enforceable regulations which would safeguard these promises in the proposed deal. With one stroke of a pen, the health of workers and the lives of future generations have been put at risk.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the three leaders of the national parties spoke in favour in this House of the Charlottetown accord.

This historic moment brings to mind comments from the first Premier of Alberta, Alexander Rutherford, in 1906. He said:

> We live—in one of the grandest provinces in this Canadian Confederation. We believe there is a great future before our province, and that it will still be a grander province in the very near future. We hope that our fond expectations will be realized. We are a hopeful people. We have no pessimists in Alberta—a pessimist could not succeed. We are optimistic and always look on the brighter side of affairs.

I invite all Albertans to look on the brighter side as did the first premier of our province and join the yes side in this referendum campaign. Let us seize our responsibility as citizens of this country and of the province of Alberta and make our full contribution to this country.

BREAST CANCER

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, according to Statistics Canada 5,200 women will die of breast cancer this year as breast cancer continues to be the most common form of cancer to women in 1992. A full 20 per cent of cancer deaths among women will be from breast cancer.

I call on the federal government to adopt the recommendations of the report of the Sub–Committee on the Status of Women. In particular, I urge the federal government to design an extensive public awareness plan aimed at educating women about preventive measures and early detection methods. I urge the federal government to take measures to improve research into the causes, the detection and treatment procedures of breast cancer.

This disease has cost many women their lives and has caused much hardship to families across the country. It is time for the federal government to take action on this issue.

CHARLOTTETOWN ACCORD

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that every Canadian can find something in the Charlottetown constitutional accord that they do not like. I certainly can.

Obviously, Canada's housing ministers can as well because as recently as June 29, federal, provincial and territorial ministers of housing meeting in Toronto agreed that there continues to be a need for a strong federal role and national standards to respond to the housing needs of Canadians. I share their sentiments.

The August 28 Charlottetown constitutional accord gives exclusive jurisdiction over housing to the provinces and the territories. Despite this however, I am sure that the federal, provincial and territorial housing ministers will join me in voting yes on October 26 because we want a strong and united Canada, one which will continue to be the very best country to live in anywhere in the world.

DAVID SPENCER AND CHRISTINE LAMONT

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I am rising to urgently request the Prime Minister to make a formal request to the President of Brazil for the expulsion of David Spencer and Christine Lamont.

The parents of Christine Lamont have just returned from Brazil where they have had the opportunity to meet with the Brazilian minister of justice and other high-ranking officials.

The Brazilian minister of justice told them that under the exchange of offenders treaty, all possible appeals must be exhausted before they would be able to make an application under the treaty.

The exchange of offenders treaty has not yet been ratified. Estimates from Brazil are that two appeals launched by Spencer and Lamont could take two to four years. Christine and David cannot wait that long.

The Brazilian justice system is flawed. President Collor is involved in heightening political crises and faces possible impeachment. It is the president's power to respond to the expulsion request.

The window of opportunity to get these two Canadians home is quickly closing. I urge the Prime Minister to request their expulsion today and not to wait for the treaty.

TRADING CARDS

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, I was shocked and dismayed to hear about the latest fad in trading cards.

Canadian youngsters are trading mass murderer cards from the U.S. that picture murderers and describe the details of their indecent acts of violence and sexual abuse, especially against women and children.

I understand both the Minister of National Revenue and the Minister of Justice are working to see that these cards will be banned from entering Canada.

I strongly support the efforts of the ministers concerned to put an end to this horrific playground fad. The Criminal Code provision dealing with obscenity must be amended so that customs officials will be able to stop these unacceptable and obscene cards from entering Canada.

SHIP INDUSTRY

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, the signing of the Canada–U.S.–Mexico Free Trade Agreement has brought to mind the dreadful loss of jobs in this country after the advent of the Canada–U.S. FTA. One of the hardest hit areas has been secondary and tertiary manufacturing in this country.

In the FTA the Jones Act was protected to allow American industry and shipbuilding to be protected from Canadian competition. The same may happen with NAFTA.

I am making an appeal to this government, through you Mr. Speaker, to ensure that the refit of the HMCS Protecteur is done on the west coast, preferably in Victoria and by the Yarrows Shipyards.

An agreement to this request will be most appreciated by the people of British Columbia.

INTERNATIONAL LITERACY DAY

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome—Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, September 8, we celebrated International Literacy Day, which gives us an opportunity every year to reaffirm our commitment to this cause.

The reason we attach so much importance to literacy in Canada is that it has a major impact on the quality of life of all citizens of this country and on our future as a nation.

People whose ability to read and write is limited cannot take part in the decisions affecting their neighbourhood or their community. It is harder for them to obtain the information they need to make wise choices as consumers, as workers or as parents.

The commitment we made a few years ago is still current. We made literacy one of our national priorities in order to give equal opportunity to all Canadians.

In closing I would call on all members of this House to continue their efforts beyond International Literacy Day, so that even more Canadians are made aware of the importance of knowing how to read and write.

THE LATE ÉMILE BENOIT

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, last Friday two fiddlers were playing in a cemetery, saying their goodbyes to Émile Benoit. I was there, along with a hundred of his friends, not only to bid him goodbye but also to salute his life.

Émile Benoit was widely known for his folk music, his "joie de vivre", his sense of humor and his generosity.

Whether in Quebec City for the summer festival, in St. John's to be awarded an honorary doctorate or in France to entertain the crowds, he always managed to spread his zest for living. Émile, we will miss you.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister, but before I start I want to say that we have just learned that Alberta Premier Don Getty has resigned to campaign full time for the yes side in the national referendum.

I hope the Prime Minister does not get any ideas from this because we want him around for the next election.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: On a more serious note, Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

We learned this morning that an OECD report deplores the fact that Canada is losing any competitive position it ever had internationally and that no progress has been made in the last ten years. This decline is attributed to the fact that we are not spending wisely for education, that we do not spend enough on research and development and, as I said in the House yesterday, that tariff barriers between the provinces destroy any chances of progress.

• (1420)

Does the government intend to take action immediately to solve these very serious problems?

[English]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend referred to Premier Getty. He has indeed announced his intention to resign. He has played a very constructive role in the national unity debates over the last five or six years. On behalf of all members I would like to extend to him and to his wife Margaret and family the very best wishes of the House of Commons.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend is wondering whether I am getting any ideas. He says he wants me around for the next election. I would not want to break the hon. gentleman's heart.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: I will look forward to seeing him in the next election. I should remind him that the last person who said he wanted me around for the last election would not be saying that today. I just put a little word of caution to him.

[Translation]

Concerning the point raised by my hon. friend, the report indeed mentions certain serious problems in Canada, for instance productivity. On the other hand, the report emphasizes the fact that Canada has the most generous taxation system of the industrialized world for research and development. As for education, the report notes that, per capita, Canada invests more than any other G-7 country. On the other hand, the results remain clearly unacceptable as far as productivity is concerned.

However, there is something important which should be noted. While we accept that there is a serious problem, the latest figures show a change in the trend in Canada. Here is what they tell us.

[English]

Productivity growth averaged nearly 3.5 per cent in the first half of 1992, roughly three times its average performance in the 1980s. Unit labour cost growth is way down. It averaged over 1.5 per cent in the first half of 1992 compared to 4 per cent in the first half of 1991.

While there is a serious problem, there has emerged in the last six, seven, eight months some important indications that the recovery will be led by productivity growth and by exports. Those are two encouraging signs, but we will continue to work very hard with all parties in the House to correct those areas of weakness in the Canadian economy.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the OECD report talked very strongly about the problem I mentioned in the House yesterday concerning our not having enough free trade within the country and about the barriers that exist between the provinces in Canada being tougher to overcome than the barriers that exist between the countries in Europe.

I understand the Prime Minister did not have unanimity on the constitutional discussions he had with the premiers. He was seeking unanimity. Is he planning to move very quickly to have seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the population agree to break down the barriers within Canada immediately?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that seems to be at variance with what my hon. friend said yesterday.

I have indicated that we have the framework agreement which will allow the first first ministers' conference on the economy to deal effectively with an expanded and modernized section 121 immediately following ratification. This, for example, was actively supported by Premier Wells from Newfoundland all the way to British Columbia with a few exceptions. My hon. friend is aware of that.

Having been there in 1982, having asked for an expanded and modernized section 121 in 1981 and 1982, and having received a flat no for his efforts, he is certainly aware of the difficulties in moving recalcitrant provinces along in this regard. We have made very substantial progress. At last count we had eight of ten representing substantially in excess of 50 per cent of the population.

We have every reason to believe that the spirit of mutual accommodation and conciliation that prevailed at Charlottetown will prevail with respect to section 121 and that Canada will get the kind of common market clause it needs and deserves.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I like the very eloquent words of the Prime Minister. I wish his party would have been of that view 10 years ago when we tried to do that, but wisdom came later. We knew we had to do that 12 years ago.

Is it possible that this meeting will be held before the end of the year?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if we can secure ratification of the constitutional proposals before the end of the year, we would look forward to holding a first ministers' conference on the economy. Clearly this is the priority item on the agenda.

I think the minister for constitutional affairs and the minister of health would confirm that there seemed to be an acceptance of the fact that we have an extraordinary anomaly where there are greater barriers between provinces than among countries with which we trade around the world.

This does not make a great deal of sense, and I think most provincial premiers acknowledge that. We now have a framework agreement which will allow us to correct this and I think correct it quite soon. I thank my hon. friend for his offer of assistance.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I too have a question for the Prime Minister arising out of the OECD report.

According to this report, "Canada's actual level of labour productivity was 45 per cent behind that of the United States in 1990", compared to 24 per cent in 1980.

This was the situation in this country after six years of Conservative government.

Why is the Prime Minister not doing something concrete to close this productivity gap instead of simply driving this country into recession and keeping it there? If the Prime Minister is so concerned about breaking hearts, why does he not realize he has broken the hearts of 1.5 million Canadians and their families who have seen nothing from him but the bread lines and the unemployment lines? Why does he not recognize this and do something to help them get back to work?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think all members of the House would acknowledge that unemployment levels are too high, that they represent a very serious problem.

My hon. friend chuckles over there. At 11.6 per cent they are still too high even though they are lower, a little bit lower than when the Liberal government left office in 1984. They were at 11.7 per cent. They were too high then and they are too high today, even though we managed to get them down to 7.3 per cent at the end of 1988. We have embarked on a program which will hopefully reduce that unacceptably high level of unemployment.

I point out to my hon. friend, as I did to the Leader of the Opposition, that the numbers he has just used are out of date.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, they can be tabled on the floor of the House of Commons and examined. I have just told him that his numbers are inaccurate and out of date. Canadian productivity was up 1.9 per cent in the second quarter of this year from a year ago, and competitiveness of Canadian exports has increased by 6 per cent in the first half of this year alone.

We still have a problem of productivity. We have a problem of investment in research and development even though we have the best fiscal regime that exists in the OECD. We have a problem with regard to the results of education. Even though we spend more per capita on education than any of the G-7 countries, we do not produce the results.

One of the reasons for the constitutional rearrangements is the harmonization and the elimination of overlap and duplication that will allow us to expend the taxpayers' money more beneficially, to improve productivity even further.

I acknowledge that there is a problem. We are working on it and we are making progress.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I do have to acknowledge being incorrect in one of my figures. I said that the Prime Minister broke the hearts of 1.5 million out of work Canadians. It was actually more than 1.6 million so I stand corrected.

My supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. It has been reported that the government has ordered that the report of its productivity task force, which was supposed to be made public early this month, be put off being made public until after the October 26 referendum date. Even if this task force has been largely a dog and pony show, the public has a right to see what is in the report to see if there is anything worth while in it.

Will the Prime Minister rescind that order and get the report before the public right now? Will he take some concrete action to deal with the gap which he has questioned but which is in the report of the Organization of Economic Co-operation and Development? Will he rescind that order and get that report tabled this week?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend hates the word competitiveness. He denigrates the notion of any examination of the prosperity initiative, but in fact this government is pursuing in every sector an examination of our competitiveness through the prosperity initiative. In no way is its tabling in this House going to be delayed. It will be on time.

I can tell the hon. member that one of the findings he is going to discover when he reads the prosperity initiative is that we have increased our share of the American market. He is against free trade and NAFTA. We have increased our share of the American market in 19 of 23 sectors since the free trade agreement.

TRADE

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

It is quite clear after the release of the draft NAFTA yesterday that this government has initialled yet another bad trade deal for Canada. This trade deal fails to stop U.S. trade harassment on things from softwood lumber to automobiles. It fails to protect workers in all regions. It fails to protect jobs and it fails to protect the environment. Any way you slice it, the NAFTA deal is a failure.

Will the Prime Minister take the advice of others who have said to withdraw from this deal right now, to withdraw this deal, take it off the table and make sure that he stands up for Canadian workers and the Canadian people? The U.S. House majority leader has recommended that to the U.S. Congress. I would suggest to the Prime Minister that he do the same thing. Will the Prime Minister remove the trade deal now?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, is the leader of the NDP seriously suggesting that the Canadian government take the advice of the majority House leader of the United States Congress on something this important? You want us to follow the advice of those nasty Americans?

Ms. McLaughlin: No, take our advice.

Mr. Mulroney: Oh, of your House leader. That is different.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we should go on to the next question.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, it would be useful for Canadians on this very serious matter because many Canadians have lost jobs. We have lost over 360,000 manufacturing jobs since the Canada–U.S. trade deal and the government is now intent on making this bad deal worse by signing the NAFTA deal.

I want to use one specific instance. When the agreement was announced the Minister for International Trade and the chief NAFTA negotiator said that this trade deal would reduce American trade harassment of Honda and other companies in Canada. Yesterday Carla Hills, the chief U.S. negotiator, told the U.S. Senate finance committee that "the passage of the North American free trade agreement would not absolve Honda" from the current U.S. harassment. Over 5,000 Canadian jobs are on the line.

My question to the Prime Minister is: Why has his government initialled a deal that is going to lose Canadian jobs? Why is he not here to protect Canadian jobs?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, why is it, after having denigrated the Americans and their negotiators for years that my hon. friend now cites Carla Hills as an authority on the interpretation of what is going to happen to a Canadian product being exported to the United States? The Minister for International Trade has already indicated that it is not the case, that there is a very clear protection for the auto pact and its advantages are expanded for Canada.

Surely my hon. friend should know that for every $1 billion of exports, 15,000 new jobs are created in Canada. Of all of the major trading countries in the world, the percentage of GDP in Canada related to foreign trade is higher than any, with the exception of Germany, almost 30 per cent. Our lifeline to new jobs is trade.

Here is an opportunity to trade into a brand new market, although 80 per cent of Mexican products enter Canada free from duties now. What we are doing is getting a level playing field for Canada in Mexico with new opportunities for financial services, new opportunities for automotive products, new opportunities that will create new jobs in telecommunications and pharmaceuticals. These are new opportunities for Canadian jobs.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Canadians recognize that the one thing which has been traded away is Canadian jobs.

U.S. trade representative Carla Hills said yesterday that "even if Canadian cultural industries are excluded from NAFTA, the United States reserves the right to take retaliatory action against Canada". I am quoting Ms. Hills. How can the Prime Minister claim our cultural industries are protected when the United States is already starting to threaten us?

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend cites exactly the wrong example. The fact is that what was achieved by the Canadian negotiators was a complete and total exemption, protection for culture under the NAFTA agreement.

Prior to the free trade agreement the Americans had the ability to retaliate any time we took any measures to protect Canadian culture. The free trade agreement limited their ability to retaliate and that is enshrined in NAFTA as well. It is a major success for Canadians.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

[Editor's Note: Disturbance in Gallery.]

Ms. Copps: I think we on this side of the House want a government where everybody feels they are on the inside. That is why we hope there is an election soon.

Four years ago when the Prime Minister rammed the trade deal through the House, he promised the finest adjustment programs in the world. Four years later 600,000 more Canadians are out of work than there were when he made that promise. What happened to his fine words of four years ago when today we still have no new adjustment programs?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member refers to the free trade agreement and our undertaking to have adjustment programs, she should read the de Grandpré report.

• (1440)

A task force by the private sector in this country made recommendations to the government to deal with the adjustment challenge that any industry faces in the world, free trade or not.

The number of adjustment programs in this country have been increased tremendously in the last three years. They compare us to the Americans per capita. Canada spends 35 times more per capita on adjustment programs for Canadians than does the United States.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I hope we will not have a Canada that will be the same as the United States in every respect. We in the Liberal Party want no part of that.

The Prime Minister himself gave his word four years ago, when he said there would be adjustment programs. Mr. de Grandpré made some concrete proposals which were subsequently ignored. I therefore want to ask the Prime Minister why he has reneged on his commitment to adjustment programs for the millions of unemployed workers who want jobs in this country.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member referred to the Grandpré report, and she says we failed to implement the report's recommendations. I would ask her to name a single one that was not implemented. One of Mr. Grandpré's main recommendations was to activate the passive funds available under the Unemployment Insurance Program.

We tabled Bill C-21, and the Liberal Party, with its friends in the other place, spent a year and a half fighting the adoption of Bill C-21, a measure that today benefits 500,000 Canadians who are receiving training thanks to this legislation.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle-Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. Last week, the minister confirmed a promise made repeatedly by his government that the North American Free Trade Agreement would provide for a tripartite commission on the environment. Here is my question: Does the minister still maintain that commitment?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for LaSalle-Émard mentioned a promise made repeatedly by the government. I am not sure what he is referring to, but I can inform him that on September 17, exactly a week from now, I will be meeting my American counterpart, Mr. Reilly. I will also be meeting my Mexican counterpart, Mr. Colosio. We will discuss a trilateral co-operation agreement involving our three countries. This is a first, and comes as a result of the trade agreement signed by our three countries. In fact, as far as I know, this is the first time a trade agreement is used as a lever to achieve something in the environmental sector. Next week I expect to have more information for the hon. member as a result of these meetings.

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, the minister in a speech in Toronto last week confirmed the promise. It is clear from his statement now the ink is barely dry on the North American free trade agreement and already this government is being pushed around.

The trilateral commission on the environment was to be the umbrella. It was to be the overseer for all environmental concerns arising from NAFTA.

When the minister meets next week in Washington, he might ask Carla Hills what she meant yesterday when testifying before the United States Senate when she said there would be a bilateral commission only. In other words, Canada was going to be left out.

Will the minister admit this amounts to a fundamental breach of the spirit of the North American free trade agreement, and will he tell us what he is going to do about it?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, let me be short, brief, and concise. I was not in Toronto last week. I know where I am today and I am not sure the member knows where he is today.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

After the North American free trade agreement was initialled by Canada, U.S. and Mexico, the Prime Minister announced he would be happy to sell this deal across Canada.

After that announcement by the Prime Minister, a $3 million propaganda campaign, paid for by the taxpayers of Canada, was initiated by this government to sell the NAFTA deal without any comment from the opposition members of this House.

If the Prime Minister is prepared to put to a national referendum the political future of Canada, is he prepared to put on a referendum parallel to that the economic future of Canada and let Canadians vote yes or no on whether they want a North American free trade agreement?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I understand my hon. friend, he is suggesting that Canada's future is at stake because of trade with Mexico, which represents approximately 1 per cent of our trade. The nation is in peril because of the 1 per cent of trade, which is essentially beneficial to Canada. It is demonstrably silly and fatuous for the hon. gentleman to try to make that point.

What I do not understand with the NDP is this: The NDP rises in this House time and time again to make the case that the Government of Canada and the Parliament of Canada should be more generous than we already are with respect to assisting developing nations to achieve a greater degree of prosperity. Their philosophy seems to be more and more hand-outs to countries that seek to elevate the degree of prosperity and wealth of their individual citizens.

What Mexico is saying, as a developing country, is: "We are looking for an opportunity, not for handouts, but an opportunity for fair trade with developed countries". What Canada and the United States are saying is that the best way that we can create that prosperity collectively while assisting ourselves is to allow a developing country the opportunity to trade its way to prosperity. They do not want hand-outs. They want equality of opportunity which is the basis of the GATT and all other important industrialized trading arrangements. So the NDP should be in favour of this and not against it.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Prime Minister for making a speech about everything except my question. My question was: If this is petty, if this is small potatoes, why are you spending $3 million to sell a small-potatoes deal to Canadians? You say you can sell this deal. You will have a hard job after this is signed selling Margaritas on a Tijuana beach.

Mr. Speaker: I know the hon. member would want to address the Prime Minister or any other minister through the Chair.

Mr. Barrett: Through you, Mr. Speaker, my question for the Prime Minister is this. If he is prepared to spend $3 million of tax dollars promoting this deal, why is he not prepared to put it on a referendum and let the Canadian people have a say themselves without the propaganda?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend says that I indicated that this was small potatoes. I never said any such thing. I never said any such thing.

Mr. Barrett: But you're spending $3 million.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Prime Minister has the floor and I am sure hon. members would want to have extended to him the courtesy so that he can make an answer.

Mr. Mulroney: This is an important trading arrangement. We have conventions under the British parliamentary system and here in Canada whereby these matters are dealt with. There will be an opportunity for a full and extensive debate with regard to the provisions of the North American free trade agreement. My hon. friend will be able to register his disapproval and perhaps indicate to the Canadian people the alternatives that he proposes to this kind of important trading initiative.

He refers as well to the beach of Tijuana. I can tell him that if I were to have a Margarita on the beach of Tijuana, it would be with someone other than him.

• (1450)

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that neither eventuality is likely to happen.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): I think, Mr. Speaker, the real question is whether either of them is going to find a way to get to Tiajuana, given the state of the airline industry. That is why I would like to ask the Minister of Transport this:

The Minister of Transport yesterday would not confirm whether the Government of Canada still has a two airline policy. I think it is vital to all Canadians to know where the government stands on this important issue. Therefore, I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether or not the Government of Canada continues to believe, as the Minister of Transport previously stated, that there should be two Canadian airline companies in this country. Yes or no?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have repeated this time and again. Maybe the hon. member for Ottawa Centre was flying too high to understand the answers I gave him. If he would come back down to earth and listen to what I say, he may remember forever that we want a safe, efficient and competitive airline industry to survive in Canada.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, if the minister ever gets his feet on the ground, I wonder whether there will be one foot or two feet. Perhaps then he could tell us.

Yesterday as well he said that the problems confronting the industry were non-existent problems, and I quote: "What we have had in this country in the face of a transportation policy that was supposed to increase competition and improve air service is a result that sees both airline companies losing together over $2 million a day. Last week the chairman of Air Canada said that up to 39,000 jobs may be lost in the airline industry and related businesses in this country". This is a serious problem and the real problem is a non-existent air transportation policy.

What does the minister have to say to the Canadians who are concerned today about losing their jobs?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I notice that the transport critic from the other side is no better at telling jokes than he is at asking questions.

The truth of the matter is that PWA has indicated this morning that it will be making an announcement as to what offer it is going to accept this afternoon, either the Air Canada offer or an alliance with American Airlines. We repeat again that it is a private transaction between two private companies and the policies of this government have been very beneficial to the travelling public and the consumers of this country.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, despite the importance of the issue, the Minister of Transport continues to be evasive. Yesterday he said in the House that his government is taking every measure to ensure a competitive airline industry. He said it again today.

Given the evasiveness of the Minister of Transport, maybe the Prime Minister can tell us what these measures are. Canadians have a right to know. Is it competition between two Canadian carriers, greater foreign competition, or no competition at all?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there are two airlines in existence at the present time. There are offers that have been made between these two companies and another offer from American Airlines to Canadian Airlines. An announcement will be made this afternoon. After this announcement is made there are agencies of the government that will examine the projected transaction and then we will be able to answer to that.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the Minister of Transport is going to sit on his haunches and wait for a decision to come from the private sector before Canadian consumers can be guaranteed what they need.

Will the minister give his unequivocal assurance to this House that whatever the result of those merger proposals this afternoon, he will protect the travelling public from price gouging and guarantee that Canadians will have access to competitive regional air carriers?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I repeat again that there are two transactions that are being contemplated at the present time.

Once an announcement is made by one or both airlines, we will deal with all of these questions in the proper manner with the help of the agencies that are set up precisely to look after that.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

Comfortably ensconced in this House, the Prime Minister has been extolling the so-called virtues of the Charlottetown Accord, rallying to his cause such allies as the Leader of the Official Opposition, his new friend, and dead sovereignists. However, democracy demands genuine public debate, and I would like to give the Prime Minister an opportunity to confront a real live sovereignist. I ask him to accept the challenge of meeting me in public debate in Quebec, anywhere and at any time during the referendum campaign.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am a real live Canadian, and I brought one into this world.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: For months, the leader of the Bloc Quebecois has been insisting on public consultation. They want to know the views of Quebecers. There is going to be a referendum in Quebec, and on October 26, you will know the outcome and what Quebecers really think.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I think who brought who into the world is beside the point.

I thought we asked for a debate on sovereignty, but the federal government and Mr. Bourassa's government have decided there will be no debate on sovereignty. There will be a debate on the accord, the draft produced in Charlottetown. Now I want the Prime Minister to say whether he will accept my challenge, yes or no.

An hon. member: He is scared.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): The last challenge I accepted was in 1988, when I went twice to the riding of Lac-Saint-Jean, with my wife, to get my friend elected as the member for Lac-Saint-Jean.

There will be not one but many debates in Canada and Quebec, because when the Bloc Quebecois and the Parti Quebecois were asking for a referendum, they said it had to be a referendum on sovereignty.

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): So let's have one.

Mr. Mulroney: And now we have a referendum, and the Bloc Quebecois and the Parti Quebecois are saying: It is not on sovereignty, it is just a question, so we can say no without any consequences.

I think I hear the Bloc murmuring in the background. I can assure you there will be a watertight question, a debate according to the rules and a decisive outcome. Considering the honourable commitment made by the leader of the Bloc, I assume that if the vote is not in his favour, he will do as he said and resign the next day.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of Agriculture concerns the cash flow enhancement program which enables farmers to secure up to $50,000 interest free on the strength of their farm stored grain.

Because of the cash flow problems occasioned by foreign export subsidies and in Saskatchewan by the unilateral gutting of GRIP by the provincial government, will the minister consider renewing the cash flow enhancement program for hard-pressed farmers for the current 1992–93 crop year?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we all recognize the importance of the interest free portion of the cash advance, as it is referred to.

We are consulting within government. Even with interest rates below 5 per cent, it is an expensive program. We must resource it and be able to find those resources. That is what my colleagues and I are attempting to do at this time because we recognize the value of the program.

Mr. Speaker: There will be a single question from the hon. member for Mackenzie and a single question from the hon. member for Dartmouth.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Prime Minister or whoever is speaking for the government is on trade policy.

Yesterday the Minister of Agriculture intimated that the U.S. export enhancement program would not apply to Canadians or Mexicans due to the CUSTA and NAFTA. He seems to have conveniently forgotten that Ontario corn producers succeeded in getting a countervail of $1.10 a bushel against United States corn in 1986, using the existing GATT rules against dumping.

Is it not true that the present GATT rules clearly prevent such export subsidies, but that importing countries are simply reluctant to say no to U.S. cash and the cheap grain that results from that?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, my colleague referred to an answer that I gave yesterday where I pointed out that in the politically driven announcement by the President of the United States to expand the export enhancement program, they have not only expanded it to countries which we find difficult to accept, they have removed some countries from eligibility that had been there in the past. I used the example of Mexico.

If my colleague reads the NAFTA agreement, he will see that Mexico, United States and Canada have come to a negotiated agreement as to how export subsidies may be used within our three borders.

PORT OF HALIFAX

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

In the last year alone the port of Halifax has lost hundreds of jobs and millions of dollars in port traffic as a direct result of this government's regressive tax and rail transportation policies. Now a task force, appointed by the Premier of Nova Scotia, has laid much of the blame for the decline of the port of Halifax squarely within the federal government's jurisdiction.

My question is this. Does the minister finally accept the responsibility, accept the findings of the Premier's task force? Specifically, what action has he already initiated to implement all of the 10 recommendations of that report?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have received this report together with other reports from Canada Ports Corporation. We are examining the conclusions of this report. We expect to answer the questions raised in this report very shortly.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EXTENSION OF SITTING HOURS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I think you will find that there is unanimous consent for the following motion.

That, after the first three speakers on Government Motion Number 11, all subsequent speakers shall speak no longer than 15 minutes each.

That, on Wednesday, September 9, 1992 the House shall sit beyond the daily hour of adjournment until such time as the three Whips agree or no other member rises to speak, but in any event, not later than 9:59 a.m. on Thursday, September 10, 1992, whereupon the Speaker shall adjourn the House until the next sitting day, provided that no dilatory motions or quorum calls shall be deemed receivable during extended hours.

That, on Thursday, September 10, 1992 the House shall continue to sit between 6:00 p.m. and 8:00 p.m. to consider Government Orders.

That, if the debate on Government Motion No. 11 is concluded before 8:00 p.m. on Thursday, September 10, 1992, the question on the motion shall be put at 8:00 p.m.

That, at 8:00 p.m. on Thursday, September 10, the Speaker shall put all questions necessary to dispose of Government Motion No. 11 and immediately thereafter the House shall stand adjourned until Monday, September 14, 1992 at 11:00 a.m.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, there have been some extensive consultations with the opposition parties. In view of what the parliamentary secretary has read I can give the consent of the Liberal Party.

Mr. Riis: Ditto, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, we want to thank all three parties for having had the decency to consult with us. We support this motion and will co-operate with all three parties in the House to make it a democratic debate.

We thank you for intervening yesterday to instigate these negotiations, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent in the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE LATE HON. GEORGE MCILRAITH

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, we were saddened last month to hear of the passing of the Hon. George McIlraith. George was 84 years old and had spent half of his life in Parliament. He served as a member of the House of Commons for Ottawa West and Ottawa Centre for 10 consecutive Parliaments, from 1940 to 1972, when he was summoned to the Senate where he served until 1983.

During the Mackenzie King and the St. Laurent administrations he was parliamentary assistant to C. D. Howe. He served in the Pearson and Trudeau cabinets as Minister of Transport, President of the Privy Council, Minister of Public Works and Solicitor General.

During the tumultuous years from 1964 to 1967 he was leader of the government in the House of Commons. He was an asset to the Prime Minister of the day. George had a gift for making problems go away. Those of us who knew him well knew that sometimes George had a way of expressing himself that made problems just disappear.

After leaving cabinet he returned to his private practice of law in which he was active until the day he died.

For many years he was minister responsible for the National Capital Commission. It is no coincidence that it was during those years that the NCC played so constructive a part in the development of the national capital region, both as a symbol of national beauty and pride and as an eminently liveable community.

He never claimed for himself the credit which was due. He was too preoccupied looking after the needs of ordinary constituents, the little people as he called them, of every ethnic background, of every possible income group. George was available and there when he was needed.

George McIlraith was a soft-spoken man whose almost understated exterior masked a canny understanding of people and government and a deep devotion to his country and community. When others sought advice, his usual admonition was: "Just keep your head down and do your job". He followed his own advice; while the flamboyance of others garnered the headlines, George McIlraith got the job done.

On behalf of all Liberal members, as well as his friends and colleagues, I join all Canadians in mourning the death of a beloved fellow countryman.

To his children Janet, Ann Margaret, Cathy and George, and other members of his family I offer my deepest condolences.

[English]

Mr. William Scott (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I feel privileged to rise today to pay tribute to a fine gentleman who served this Parliament and this country well for over 40 years.

The Hon. George McIlraith was first elected to the House of Commons in 1940 and had already established an illustrious reputation as government House leader when I came here in 1965.

He had begun his career as parliamentary secretary to the Hon. C. D. Howe during the difficult times of the Second World War.

George McIlraith served many prime ministers. Over the 32 years he was in the House of Commons, he was sworn to the Privy Council by the Right Hon. Lester Pearson in 1963 and held several portfolios before he was summoned to the Senate in 1972. His retirement from the Senate in 1983 marked the end of 43 years of active service to the country he loved so dearly.

I served in the House of Commons with the hon. gentleman for seven years and we sat in different chambers for another eleven years after that. My memories of George McIlraith will be of a true gentleman who always acted in a very straightforward manner. He was an excellent worker for his constituents and a credit to the Parliament that he so loved.

To his family and friends I express my condolences. To Parliament I extend hope that his memory will be an inspiration to us all in our efforts to make this a more productive and civil place to carry on the business of our nation.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of our party to pay tribute to George McIlraith.

When I was first elected in 1968 he was the Solicitor General and later on the Minister of Public Works. He was one of the highly respected gentlemen of the House. He was of a calibre similar to that of Mr. Stanley Knowles, John Diefenbaker, and two or three others.

He had been here for many years. He was a member of Parliament from 1940 to 1972, later appointed to the Senate, and stayed there until 1983. If I recall correctly he served under four different prime ministers, a cabinet minister under two of those prime ministers. One of his former colleagues, the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, who is here in the House today, knew Mr. McIlraith very well.

He was a very soft-spoken man, a very generous and sincere man. When I first came to the Hill I realized very quickly he had a lot of friends on the Hill among the staff who worked for Parliament. He was seen as a person around here who the staff could go to and talk to. He would listen to them and try to solve some of their problems.

He was sort of Mr. Parliament Hill. He was Mr. Ottawa, not just for the Liberal Party but for many citizens of this city of Ottawa.

On behalf of our party I want to express to his four children, to his family and to his friends, our most sincere condolences on the passing of Mr. McIlraith.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, when I was first elected in Ottawa—Carleton the senior member of the party in Ottawa was the Hon. George McIlraith.

He had deep roots in the Valley. He was a very intimate friend of three generations of leaders of our country. He was a superb parliamentarian. He was leader of the House at one time. I remember one evening when he asked me to fill in for him. I was Parliamentary Secretary to the then Minister of Northern Affairs, Arthur Laing, and he asked me to be the acting House leader. The late Gordon Churchill was then the House leader for the Loyal Opposition.

After we conducted the business of the House, Mr. Churchill got up and complimented me on the very clear way that the House business had been conducted and would I arrange with the Prime Minister to replace the Hon. George McIlraith.

I said it might be that the hon. House leader of the opposition would prefer me but he may not know, to use the parlance of football, where the play is going. That is Mr. McIlraith's technique. I want to assure him and through you, Mr. Speaker, the entire House, that we do not often know where the ball is going either.

Mr. McIlraith was once faced by the then very popular mayor of Ottawa, the late Dr. Charlotte Whitton, the first female mayor of a major city in this country, a remarkable woman, a remarkable person, and one of the leading social workers in the country.

She was mayor of Ottawa and she challenged George McIlraith in the then riding of Ottawa Centre, now Ottawa West. Despite the great Diefenbaker landslide in 1958, she was unable to unseat the Hon. George McIlraith, so deep were his roots on Preston Street and parts of Ottawa that only Jean-Robert and I would be able to describe and guide you through.

Despite the fact that Dr. Whitton as mayor of Ottawa was defeated by the Hon. George McIlraith, she retained him continually as her personal solicitor. He was one of the two executors of her will who administered her estate when she died. If that does not take talent, if that does not take skill, if that does not take human qualities, I do not know what does.

The Hon. George McIlraith served our country and served Parliament for over 43 years in both Houses. He is one of the few senators I know, had he been here, who could have been elected in an elected Senate. He was a wonderful parliamentarian, a very fair man and a great credit to public life in this country.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues in making a few comments about a man we admired so much.

I did not have the honour to serve with George. Because he was a former member for Ottawa Centre I went to visit George in order to seek his advice on whether or not I should run for federal politics. At the time I recall George looked at me and said: "Who are you?" I told George I was an engineer and a municipal politician. The first thing he did was he leaned over and pulled a book from behind his desk. The book was about Mackenzie King. He said: "Here is this book. Read about Liberals".

I was extremely inspired not only by the advice of George who gave me a tremendous amount of strength and insight into what it takes to be a true grassroots politician, but also I still look at him as a tremendous example as a true politician who truly represents the community.

Hon. George McIlraith was a man dedicated to serving the people because he was a man of the people. He believed in Canada and in the Liberal principles. He believed in his family, his friends and his constituents.

George was a great leader who served a great country. He is missed by all of us. He is missed by his family and his friends. To Janet, Mary Margaret, Cathy, George, and all of the grandchildren, we offer our deep sympathy.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of sincerity and indeed dedication that I rise today and join others in a tribute to the Hon. George McIlraith.

If there is anything we have to say about George McIlraith at this moment that is really important it is that he was one of those quiet, decent, gentleman-like politicians who never stood on the street corner shouting at everybody going by or trying to draw attention. He just simply got the job done in his own quiet perfectionist manner.

He loved this Parliament. He loved his country. He was absolutely dedicated to the public life of this country.

I would dock my boat at Petawawa Point and cross over the Ottawa River to Fort William, Quebec. I would pull the boat up on shore, go into George's cottage and have a chat with him. Long after he retired he wanted to be briefed on what was going on in caucus and in Parliament. It was not always easy to explain that to him, as one can well imagine.

When young members came into this House, George McIlraith took them aside, had a reception for them, told them what happened around here and gave them some ideas on how Parliament was run. In those days that was never done much, certainly not when I first came here. I went to George McIlraith many times, as members of the opposition did in those days. There would be no great fanfare. You may never have received a letter. You may never have received a telephone call, but in a couple of weeks' time things would have been done.

The man we are describing today is one of the last generation, quiet, extremely effective politicians who did his job with a great deal of dignity.

I join the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra and relate one of my more interesting and humourous memories of those days when the Hon. George McIlraith and the Hon. Paul Martin Sr. sat together on the government benches. The Hon. George McIlraith was Solicitor General at the time. Someone got up and asked him a very sensitive question. By the time George sat down opposition members were looking across wondering what he had actually said. The member from the opposition asked the question a second time and by the time George sat down again they were none the wiser. Someone shouted across: "You have just won the contest against the Hon. Paul Martin. You have now succeeded him as the man in the House who can give an answer and when you sit down you are not in trouble". That was George.

To his children I want to say they can be very proud of their father who sat in this House with such distinction for so long. One of the eulogies given at his funeral was very apropos. One Christmas Eve in the McIlraith home while everyone was preparing for a good dinner, a young man who was courting one of the McIlraith girls was approached by George after he had come away from the telephone. On the telephone George had said: "Yes, yes, okay. Now, what was that address again?" He took a shopping bag, went to the fridge, dropped in a ham and a loaf of bread. He filled the bag with groceries and asked the young man who was courting his daughter: "Will you please deliver this to Mrs. So-and-So at such and such an address". That is the depth of the human side of the man whom we are remembering today.

He could sit in an office on Parliament Hill with C.D. Howe, sit around the cabinet table with prime ministers, come into this House and answer questions, but he still had time for the average individual. I believe that today's politician who does not forget where his or her roots really are will learn a good lesson and take a good page out of George McIlraith's book on how to be respected at this time, and throughout his or her life and what the Parliament of Canada is all about to the average person across this country.

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, the words of the hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke and the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra are hard acts to follow.

I came to Parliament Hill in 1958 and I first met George McIlraith then. As a reporter, I interviewed him over the next 20 years. He was a very gentlemanly minister, member of Parliament and representative of the people.

I want to keep this brief by saying that all of us on this side will greatly miss George McIlraith. We extend our full sympathies to his family.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to prolong these tributes unduly but I wish to add that I had the privilege of working for the Hon. George McIlraith when I was a student at Queen's University at Christmastime in 1966 for a few weeks and then in the summer of 1967 and in 1968. He was a great employer.

We became quite good friends and shared a very common affection for the Ottawa Valley where both of us had roots or what one would call roots today, to use an overworked word, perhaps.

In his 43 years of service to Parliament, which by any record is an outstanding number of years, he displayed a respect and affection for this institution which he imparted by his generosity of spirit to many others.

He will be sorely missed. To his family we extend our deepest sympathy on the loss.

CO-OPERATIVE ENERGY CORPORATION, LOWER CHURCHILL DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION, COLUMBIA RIVER TREATY PERMANENT ENGINEERING BOARD

TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORTS

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32(2) I am pleased to table, in both official languages, the 1991 annual reports of the Co-Operative Energy Corporation, as well as the Lower Churchill Development Corporation, and the annual report of the Columbia River Treaty Permanent Engineering Board to the Governments of the United States and Canada for the period of October 1, 1990 to September 30, 1991.

PETITIONS

YOUNG OFFENDERS

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour today to present to this House 90 petitions which have been signed by more than 3,000 people in memory of a young girl, Rosalynn Dupuis, who died as a result of a stabbing. A young offender has been charged with her murder.

The people who have signed these petitions, which are a few of many more to come, ask that the laws governing young offenders and the crimes they commit, especially the violent crimes, be changed in order that judges have the ability to impose sentences fitting the crimes which have been committed.

CABLENET NETWORK

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table a petition on behalf of 100 per cent of the residents of Wildan Estates in Freelton in Hamilton—Wentworth. One hundred per cent of everyone canvassed in the survey is not bad.

After 18, going on 19 years of successfully running their own non-profit cable system, these people are being victimized by the Burlington based Cablenet network which claims Wildan Estates is on its turf. It is trying to seize Wildan Estates. I will not stand for that. I am going to bat for these people right to the chairman of the CRTC but I am tabling this petition first in the House.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to present to this House a petition certified correct by the clerk of petitions.

It contains the signatures of over 10,000 Canadians who support private member's Bill C-330. They want Canadians to have a greater say in the disposition of offenders in the judicial process. They call upon Parliament to support victims' rights and the protection of the public from violent offenders.

There will be tens of thousands of signatures to follow.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to present a petition signed by about a hundred residents from my riding.

The undersigned residents of Canada send this petition in memory of Ryan Garrioch and they want to draw attention to the following: that the majority of Canadians supports equal treatment of criminal offenders but with legislated aid shelters it shelters the criminal from the law for young adolescents. They also ask that chapter 15 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees equality of rights.

Therefore these petitioners want Parliament to revise the laws of Canada and replace the Young Offenders Act with an updated juvenile delinquents act that has a lower maximum age of 13.

REFUGEES

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour of tabling many petitions from the Toronto, metropolitan Toronto and Mississauga region regarding the ongoing conflict in the regions of Bosnia-Hercegovina and Croatia. The conflict is showing no signs of abatement and it is painfully apparent that the Canadian contingent of the United Nations peacekeeping force is unable to resolve the situation.

Whereas the conflict has caused 2.5 million persons to be physically displaced from their homes thereby becoming refugees in their own nations, and whereas Canadian citizens of these ethnic backgrounds are willing and prepared to sponsor these refugees and their families, the petitioners call upon Parliament to implement legislation an/or procedures to help alleviate the plight of these 2.5 million refugees by all measures possible, including financial aid, essential supplies and permission to enter Canada as refugees on a temporary basis, until the conflict has ceased, or perhaps on a permanent basis.

CANADA POST

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): I have a second petition, Mr. Speaker, signed by over 300 residents in my riding of Parkdale—High Park regarding the closing of two postal stations, Postal Station B on Ritchie Street and Postal Station M on Bloor Street West.

The closing of these two postal stations means that Parkdale—High Park no longer has a full service post office.

These petitioners call upon the minister responsible for Canada Post to review the decision to close Postal Station M and Postal Station B, renew their leases and ensure that the service remains at these two stations for the residents in Parkdale—High Park.

RWANDA

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, the third petition, also from Canadians living in the metropolitan Toronto area, is regarding the plight of people living in Rwanda. I will read just the prayer, which calls upon Parliament to, first, urge the Canadian government to apply pressure on the Rwandan regime to immediately stop killing innocent Rwandans; second, urge the Canadian government to stop economic aid and other forms of assistance to the current Rwandan regime; and, third, urge the Canadian government to support the EEC resolution on Rwanda issued on February 20, 1992 in Santo Domingo.

COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, the final petition is signed by petitioners from right across Ontario, calling upon the government to ask Canada Post to honour Marie Sklodowska Curie by issuing a commemorative stamp on the occasion of her 125th anniversary which will occur on November 7 of this year.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from a number of people from all across Canada which notes that the current government under Bill C-91 has sought to prevent the production of no name generic drugs in Canada by allowing brand name drug manufacturers to produce drugs without competition for up to 20 years, and that this has already driven up the price of prescription drugs in Canada.

The petitioners therefore call on the government not to proceed with Bill C-91 and to repeal Bill C-22 passed in 1987 so that Canadians will have the full benefit of lower priced generic drugs and so that provincial and private drug plans can serve Canadians without being forced to charge higher fees and/or provide less coverage.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the pleasure to present a petition signed by several hundred people from across British Columbia, mainly seniors. They point out that the price of new and existing drugs has already increased substantially to both individuals and provincial and private drug plans since Bill C-22 was passed in 1987.

The petitioners are therefore asking this government not to proceed with Bill C-91 and to repeal Bill C-22 in order that our provincial pharmacare programs may survive.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege and the honour to present three petitions on three different issues. First I have one relating to the crisis in the fishery on the south coast of Newfoundland and in the gulf, 3Ps, 3Pn, 4R. It is from several hundreds of fishermen from a number of communities: from Baine Harbour, Brookside, Boat Harbour West, South East Bight, Petit Forte, Parker's Cove and Rushoon in my riding, as well as from the community of Southern Harbour in the minister of fisheries' riding.

These hundreds of people have written asking that the government do for their coast what it has already done for the northeast coast. The petition points out—and I will not read it all, but I will mention the one or two explicit points—that the government has already moved to implement a cod moratorium on the northeast coast and provided a compensation package.

The prayer of this petition which I support whole-heartedly is that the government do likewise for the people in the southwest coast in Newfoundland and the gulf, that it provide a fair and reasonable compensation package for those who are adversely affected by the severe downturn in the fishery.

I support the petition whole-heartedly.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Second, Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from people in the Port aux Basques-Isle aux Morts area of my riding on the issue we are now addressing in Parliament.

They are calling on the government to enact legislation providing for a referendum, but I did want to get that one on the record for the sake of the people who have taken the time to circulate it.

HOUSING

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Third and finally, Mr. Speaker, I have a petition which is from a number of people in my riding in Stephenville, Port au Port, Point au Mal, Kippens, Barachois Brook and Stephenville Crossing areas.

The petition reads that whereas the federal government promised to maintain the federal co-operative housing program with a budget of $6.1 million during 1992, whereas the minister responsible for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation informed the co-operative sector of this promise as late as six days prior to the February 25, 1992 budget, whereas that budget not only eliminated the budget for co-operative housing but also terminated the federal co-operative housing program including the indexed linked mortgage, whereas this will mean that 2,000 new homes will not be constructed with a job loss of 4,400 people during 1992, and whereas even housing co-operatives which require no government assistance are unable to secure a mortgage—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The time for presenting petitions is limited to 15 minutes and other members want to present petitions.

Mr. Simmons: I fully realize that, Mr. Speaker. I was merely reading the petition which I think was within my right. Wherefore the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reinstate the federal co-operative housing program and its budget of $6.1 million for 1992 and as in duty bound your petitioners will ever pray.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, rapidement, my first petition deals with Canadians who wish to axe the tax on reading and other learning materials. They feel it is contrary to our objectives of increasing literacy and educational levels in our country.

• (1540)

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my second petition comes from Canadians who deplore the cuts in transfer payments to the provinces for education. These people believe that these cuts run counter to the government's policies on productivity and competitiveness.

[English]

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my last petition deals with petitioners who wish Parliament to be very vigilant with the CRTC as it looks to control the use of foul language on radio and television.

They point out that we do not need foul language to entertain or to inform in English, in French or in any other language.

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from a small group of people who were part of a very large group working across my riding this year in consequence of the celebration of our 125th anniversary as a country. They are the Kinsmen and Kinette Clubs of Canada. More petitions are being processed.

These people had a project they called the Proud to be Canadian project. They present their signatures to show their pride in our heritage and in our flag. They encourage stronger ties among all Canadians for the further advancement of Canada as a leader in world circles and to promote our tremendous pride in being Canadians.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents across Canada who are concerned about Bill C-91 and the effect it will have on no name drugs as well as on the price of drugs to seniors in particular.

The petitioners are asking Parliament not to proceed with Bill C-91 and to repeal Bill C-22 so that Canadians will have the full benefit from lower priced generic drugs and so that provincial and private drug plans can serve Canadians without being forced to charge higher fees and/or provide less coverage.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of Kamloops.

They are calling for the goods and services tax to be removed from feminine sanitary products such as tampons and pads. They point out the fact that these products are a necessity for women between puberty and menopause and therefore the government should not apply the tax to these necessities.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition concerning the ongoing saga over water diversion.

The petitioners are pointing out that a company presently plans to transfer water from the North Thompson River down toward San Diego, California and are hoping that the government would introduce legislation soon that would prohibit this type of project.

JASPER NATIONAL PARK

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from pilots in Kamloops who point out that they fly into the airstrip at Jasper National Park. They have found out that the government plans to close this airstrip. They are simply asking Parliament to revoke the proposed regulations issued by the Department of the Environment and ensure that this airstrip remains open.

JUSTICE

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my pleasure to introduce a petition calling upon the government to request the Government of Brazil to expel Christine Lamont and David Spencer and return them to Canada.

HOUSING

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I have a further petition under Standing Order 36 calling upon the government to reinstate immediately the federal co-operative housing program and commit the $6.1 million to that program.

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Third, Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I want to introduce a petition from the Kinsmen and Kinette Clubs of Canada to support pride in our flag and in our country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The time for presenting petitions has now expired.

Question No. 323—Mr. Edmonston:

Does the government intend to introduce legislation concerning the RCMP and its internal and external complaints committees and, if so (a) what changes would occur in the complaint lodging mechanism (b) what types of complaints would be acceptable under the new regulations?

Mr. Leonard Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Consistent with the measures outlined in the February budget, the government intends to amalgamate the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) Public Complaints Commission and the RCMP External Review Committee. No substantive changes are anticipated to the existing process of lodging complaints. Further details of the amalgamation will be included in legislation which the government plans to introduce in Parliament shortly.

Question No. 331—Mrs. Gaffney:

Since January 1, 1991 what is the total amount of funding granted by the Medical Research Council (a) for pure medical research (b) for clinical medical research?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The Medical Research Council of Canada does not apportion its funding on the basis of pure medical research and clinical medical research. However, one means of classifying its research expenditures is attached.

NUMBER OF OPERATING GRANTS FUNDED IN 1991–92 BY RESEARCH AREA

Question No. 332—Mrs. Gaffney:

In 1991 with respect to medically and clinically related projects (a) How many (i) women (ii) men applied for funding (b) How many (i) women (ii) men received funding (c) What was the total dollar value of research funding granted to (i) women (ii) men?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

MEDICALLY AND CLINICALLY RELATED PROJECTS 1991–1992

	a) Applications		b) Approvals
	(i) Women	(ii) Men	(i) Women	(ii) Men
GRANTS	294	1,394	108	541
AWARDS	1,185	1,610	315	477

NOTE:

Grants includes operating grants, clinical trials, AIDS grants, university/industry programs.

Awards includes studentships, fellowships, centennial fellowships, clinician scientists, scholarships, MRC scientists, dental clinician scientists and dental fellowships.

(c) (i) and (ii) The distribution of funding among the successful applicants was approximately $28.4 million for women and $31.6 million for men.

Question No. 333—Ms. Langan:

With respect to the construction and erection of a container crane at Centerm in Vancouver (a) Was there a contract signed by Ports Canada (b) Is it to be built in the Peoples Republic of China and, if so, (i) will there be a 51% Canadian content requirement (ii) how would the Canadian content be guaranteed (iii) what will be the Canadian content in this contract (c) How many estimated Canadian jobs will there be in this project (d) What is the total monetary value of the contract?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): The Canada Ports Corporation advises as follows:

(a) Yes, a contract was signed between the Vancouver Port Corporation and the Shanghai Port machinery plant.

(b) Yes.

(b-i) Yes.

(b-ii) Canadian content is being closely monitored. Shanghai Port Machinery has been advised that the crane will not land in Canada if Canadian content is not 51%.

(b-iii) Canadian content will be 51% or better.

(c) It is difficult to estimate the number of Canadian jobs related to the project. However, the following is a list of Canadian firms providing material and services:

Kanlift Industries—engineering consulting

Algoma Steel Co.—steel material for the crane

General Electric Canada—controls and electrics

Softac Canada—high voltage system

Hillmar Industries—cable reel and crane brakes

Fire System—fire-fighting equipment

Earl's Industries—hydraulic system

International Paints (Canada) Ltd.—paint

Sonic Barrier Sound Products Ltd.—miscellaneous

Gough Electric—electrical

Basic Hydraulics and Equipment Ltd.—hydraulics

Alimak Canada—elevator

K.W.H. Constructors—steel erection and installation

Dock Express—transportation

(d) $6,298,691.59.

Question No. 334—Mrs. Mitchell:

With respect to the recent advertising campaign "Canada–125 years to celebrate" (a) what was the total cost of this campaign (b) What companies or individuals were paid to create the ads (c) What was the cost of placement of the ads (d) What was the cost of production of the ads (e) How many times did each ad run and over what period (f) What part of the Secretary of State budget funded these ads?

Hon. Robert R. de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): In so far as the Department of the Secretary of State is concerned the answer is as follows:

a) The total projected cost of the advertising campaign is $12.3 million.

b) The companies PNMD/Publitel, Palmer Jarvis Advertising and Publicité Martin were contracted to create the ads.

c) The cost of placement of the ads is estimated to be $10.1 million.

d) The cost of production of the ads is estimated to be $2.2 million.

e) The ads ran between April 27, 1992 and August 9, 1992. It is not possible to determine the exact frequency of the ads because all placements have not yet been determined.

f) The communications branch of the Department of the Secretary of State funded these ads.

Question No. 336—Mr. Edmonston:

Was Mrs. Lorraine Lagacé ever the subject of electronic surveillance by the RCMP and, if so, (a) who authorized it and for what reason (b) when did the surveillance end?

Hon. Douglas Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): In keeping with the practice of this government and former government, I will not comment upon any police or security investigation except as provided for in section 196 of the Criminal Code of Canada.

I can tell you however, that the activities of the RCMP were closely examined by the McDonald Commission of Inquiry. The enquiry was thorough and painstaking. The commission made its report in August 1981 to the government of the day and that government took the action it deemed appropriate. I consider the matter closed.

Question No. 339—Mr. Milliken:

With respect to the Small Businesses Loans Act how many small businesses loans were made by month during 1991 and from January 1, 1992 to April 30, 1992?

Hon. Thomas Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Loans made under the SBLA program since January 1991 are as follows:

	Number
January 1991	672
February 1991	755
March 1991	838
April 1991	944
May 1991	1120
July 1991	896
August 1991	807
September 1991	813
October 1991	918
November 1991	933
December 1991	789
March 1992	919
April 1992*	1021

* May not include all loans made, due to the 90-day leeway provided to lenders to report making of loans.

Question No. 340—Mr. Boudria:

Since January 1, 1988 has the Canada Council provided any grants, loans or contributions to Mr. John Hofsess and/or the Right to Die Society and, if so, what amount has been paid and/or remains to be paid?

Hon. Henry Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Since January 1, 1988 the Canada Council has provided one grant to Mr. John Hofsess as follows:

Year	Amount	Purpose
1991	$18,000	Regular non-fiction grant awarded by jury for the purpose of a book length study entitled: "Requiem: Death and Dying in Canada".

The full amount of this grant has been paid. The council has not provided any loans or contributions to Mr. Hofsess and it has not provided any grants, loans or contributions to the Right to Die Society.

Question No. 341—Mr. Karygiannis:

With respect to Sean Morriss of Vancouver (a) has he received any moneys from Revenue Canada or from the Consolidated Revenue Fund and, if so, (i) in what amount (ii) for what services and during what period of time (iii) were any moneys received before or during the commission of the criminal acts for which he was convicted in 1991 (b) Did any Revenue Canada personnel intervene on his behalf with respect to the withdrawal of criminal charges against him in 1986?

Hon. Otto John Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue):

(a) Mr. Sean Morriss was paid $3,500 by cheque by Revenue Canada, Taxation, under a contract of service. His services were requested by the department between March 24, 1986 and April 13, 1986 in order to identify equipment used in scientific research projects which were being investigated by Revenue Canada, Taxation. Except for the above, there was no money ever given to Mr. Morriss by the department. The criminal acts for which Mr. Morriss was convicted in 1991 occurred in 1989 or later.

(b) No Revenue Canada personnel ever intervened on his behalf with respect to the withdrawal of criminal charges against him. Furthermore, we do not know of any criminal charges ever being raised against Mr. Sean Morriss in 1986.

Question No. 342—Mr. Wappel:

How much federal funding has the National Action Committee on the Status of Women received within the past five fiscal years?

Hon. Robert R. de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): In so far as the Department of the Secretary of State is concerned the answer is as follows:

The National Action Committee on the Status of Women received $2,454,575 within the past five fiscal years.

1988-89—$621,897

Question No. 343—Mr. Mifflin:

Does the government intend to introduce legislation which would make realistic the "Total Force Concept" for Canada's Reserve Force and, if so, when?

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Any amendments to legislation required to support the "Total Force Concept" will be considered as part of the over-all review of the National Defence Act mentioned by the Associate Minister of National Defence in the House on May 6, 1992. Due to the complexity of the review, no firm time can be given for introduction of legislative changes.

Question No. 345—Mr. Wood:

Since January 1, 1985 how much has the government spent in legal fees on submissions including those to GATT, the U.S. International Trade Commission and the U.S. Department of Commerce to represent Canada's case on the softwood lumber dispute with the United States?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): During the period January 1, 1985 to March 31, 1992 the government has incurred legal fees of U.S. $2,835,022.02 related to the softwood lumber dispute with the United States.

Question No. 347—Ms. Copps:

With respect to the RCMP investigation of the Hon. John Munro, David Fredrick Ahenakew, Peter Kenneth Manywounds, Solomon G. Sanderson, Douglas L. Cuthand, James Patrick Woods, Lawrence O. Russell, Noel Starblanket, Lyle Wayne Ahenakew, the Assembly of First Nations, SINCO, and the Native Indian Business Association between January 1, 1986 and November 30, 1991, what was the total cost incurred including (a) all salaries (b) all materials (c) all travel and accommodation (d) all computer time (e) all phone and fax charges?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): The Munro et al investigation was carried out over a six-year period involving RCMP members across Canada. A review of the available source documents has been made to determine the best available estimate of the investigative cost. The total calculated amounts are:

Salary expenses	$517,924.83
Clerical expenses	$140,111.00
Travel expenses	$24,801.22
Meals, accommodation expenses	$6,446.21
Purchase of computer imager	$58,483.68
Other (photocopying, fax, et cetera)	$19,752.07
Total estimated costs:	$767,519.01

Question No. 349—Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth):

With respect to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (a) what is the government's policy with respect to the provision of services to different regions of Canada (b) How does the government intend to fulfil this policy?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): The CBC's mandate is spelled out in paragraph 3.(1)(m) of the Broadcasting Act which was proclaimed on June 4, 1991. The mandate was arrived at and up dated after extensive study by the Caplan-Sauvageau task force on broadcasting policy and review by the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture.

Among other things the Broadcasting Act states that the programming provided by the CBC should "reflect Canada and its regions to national and regional audiences while serving special needs of those regions" (subparagraph 3.(1)(m)(ii)). The Act also states that the CBC's programming should "be made available throughout Canada by the most appropriate and efficient means and as resources become available for the purpose" (sub paragraph 3.(1)(m)(vii)).

The government provided the CBC with an additional $46 million for 1992/93, bringing its total parliamentary appropriation for 1992/93 to $1.1 billion.

Although the CBC is funded by government the corporation operates at arm's length from the government. As such it is the responsibility of the CBC's management and board of directors to determine how best to allocate the funds made available to it by the government to fulfil its mandate, including the administration of its regional operations and activities.

The government believes that the CBC has an important role to play in the Canadian broadcasting system in reflecting our national identity, and the provision of regional programming about and for the various regions of Canada is one aspect of this role.

Question No. 357—Mr. Rodriguez:

Does the government know of plans to send two directors of Canada 125 Corporation to the North Pole to meet the Canada–U.S.–Russian polar expedition and, if so, what is the estimated cost, including transport, food, clothing and other related items?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): In so far as the Department of the Secretary of State is concerned, the answer is as follows:

No director or staff of Canada 125 Corporation went to the North Pole to meet the Canada–U.S.–Russian polar expedition.

Question No. 358—Mr. Corbett:

Which government department produced a bookmark with the logo "With the future in mind" and how many were produced and at what cost?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): In so far as the Public Service Commission is concerned the answer is as follows:

In 1991 the Public Service Commission produced 7,500 bookmarks with the logo "With your future in mind", à la mesure de vos aspirations, at a cost of $3,275.

Question No. 359—Mr. Angus:

With respect to the series of television ads entitled either "Experience Canada" and/or "The Partnership in Travel" sponsored by the Canada 125 Corporation (a) what was the total cost (b) what were the costs of production (specifically talent costs by individual) and placement (c) what persons or companies received contracts for these ads (d) what were the dates and amounts of these contracts?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): In so far as the Department of the Secretary of State is concerned the answer is as follows:

Canada 125 Corporation was one of many sponsors of Experience Canada. The private organization Experience Canada is responsible for the production, distribution and all other costs incurred for the series of television ads.

Question No. 360—Mr. Angus:

With respect to the legal fees incurred by the Canada 125 Corporation (a) What has been the total cost of legal services from January 1, 1989 to date (b) What firms and lawyers billed for this work (c) What was the nature of the services provided (d) Were these bills ever submitted to assessment or taxation?

Hon. Robert R. de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): In so far as the Department of the Secretary of State is concerned the answer is as follows:

a) The total cost of legal services to June 15, 1992 is $148,193.77.

b) The Canada 125 Corporation legal counsel is Blake, Cassels & Graydon Warren Tettensor.

c) The services provided range from legal work associated with the structuring of the corporation (e.g. letters patent) to the development and execution of contracts with suppliers, partners and/or proponents of projects with ESSO, Experience Canada, Participaction, et cetera). They also include general advice on legal matters, such as the registration of the official Canada 125 logo.

d) Not applicable.

Question No. 364—Mr. Pickard:

With respect to the transfer of functions of processing postal imports from Revenue Canada to the Canada Post Corporation,

(a) How many jobs will be affected at Revenue Canada Customs

(b) How much compensation is being provided by Revenue Canada Customs to Canada Post Corporation?

Hon. Otto John Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue):

(a) There are 137 employees affected in Revenue Canada. The majority of these employees are expected to be placed within customs and all will be made a reasonable job offer within the federal Public Service pursuant to the national joint council's work force adjustment directive.

(b) Revenue Canada will be paying Canada Post $3. per parcel. This amount represents a portion of the costs that will be incurred by the Canada Post Corporation for assuming the responsibility to perform the data entry and material handling functions.

Question No. 372—Mr. Shields:

With respect to union members who crossed the picket lines during the fall 1991 Public Service strike (a) has any evidence, data or reports been gathered by Departments concerning union local or PSAC interference with them (b) Have any reported that the union has taken a disciplinary action against them and, if so, (i) how many and what type of action was taken (ii) How many union memberships were suspended and for how long?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): A survey of large departments has indicated that there is no systematic or organized collection of evidence, data, or reports concerning PSAC interference with union members who may have crossed picket lines during the 1991 Public Service strike.

These departments have indicated a general awareness through informal discussions with employees and supervisors as well as through various media reports that PSAC locals have been attempting to take union disciplinary action against employees who crossed the picket line. For the most part, such action would appear to be limited to the temporary suspension of membership in the union and the expulsion of employees from union activities.

The disciplining of employees by PSAC is strictly an internal union matter. Unfortunately, Treasury Board as employer can do little, if anything, to protect employees against what could be seen as harsh treatment by the union. However, any systematic or organized gathering of information by departments could be seen by the Public Service Staff Relations Board (PSSRB) as employer interference with the administration of an employee organization and contrary to the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

In a decision by the PSSRB dated March 16, 1991 responding to a complaint by a group of employees against the action by PSAC, the board stated that the rights of members are matters between those members and the employee organization. They are governed by the by-laws and constitution of that organization.

Question No. 373—Mrs. Gaffney:

With respect to companies in China which manufacture and export textiles, steel pipes, diesel engines and leather jackets (a) What are their names and addresses (b) What is the total value of these imports (i) between 1984 and June 1989 and (ii) since June 1989?

Hon. Otto John Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): The statistics on imports of these commodities from China are attached herewith.

The following should be taken into consideration:

(a) As the name and addresses of manufacturers in China are not captured by the Customs Commercial System nor by Statistics Canada, this information is unavailable. However, names of the vendors from 1988 to 1992 may be made available. It should be noted, however, that in most cases vendors are not necessarily manufacturers.

(b) The 1984 to 1987 statistics on imports from China were obtained using the Canadian International Trade Classification commodity codes, whereas the 1988 to April 1992 statistics were obtained using the harmonized system classification codes. As this may influence the import figures, readers should interpret the commodity data cautiously.

Question No. 376—Mr. Wood:

. Does the government intend to move the Canadian Forces 414 Squadron from North Bay, Ont. to Shearwater, N.S. and Comox, B.C., and, if so (a) What is the total projected cost for the transfer of equipment, personnel and families including relocation programs, legal fees and real estate commissions (b) What costs have been incurred in Shearwater and Comox to accommodate the move, including new housing and facilities (c) What is the cost to reconsolidate and reconstruct Canadian Forces Base North Bay after the departure of the 414th Squadron?

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): The subject move has been effected with the squadron at CFB Comox retaining the 414 Squadron designation and the formation of 434/420 Composite Squadrons at CFB Shearwater. The stand-up date of these squadrons was July 5, 1992 with operations commencing at that time. DND airfield support operations at CFB North Bay will cease on July 31, 1992.

The costs associated with the out-of-cycle transfer of personnel and dependants including relocation programs, real estate commissions and legal fees are projected at $1.9 million. The cost associated with the transfer of equipment is unavailable at this time.

Construction is required at both CFB Comox and CFB Shearwater to accommodate the relocation of 414 Squadron assets. This cost is anticipated to be approximately $12.2 million. Construction cost at CFB North Bay to consolidate residual activity once 414 Squadron has relocated are projected at $4.4 million.

The projected savings to the Department are $34.3 million over five years.

Question No. 377—Mr. Riis:

With regard to the program entitled Voyageurs Canada 92 (a) Will Air Canada be eligible to receive deductions or other reductions (eg. gift to Canadian Crown, business deduction, or other) of tax for the seats provided to this program and, if so, what is the total estimated cost of these tax write-offs (b) Are the seats being allocated for the program to be charged at the full fare economy rate or if not, what will the rate of fare be for these seats for the purposes of tax reductions by Air Canada?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): In so far as the Department of the Secretary of State is concerned the answer is as follows:

(a) Air Canada will not be eligible to receive any tax reductions from its participation in Voyageurs Canada 92

Question No. 378—Mr. Fisher:

With regard to the visit of the President of Russia to Canada in June 1992 (a) what was the cost of printing documents in relation to this visit (b) What were the titles or descriptions of the materials printed (c) What quantities were printed of each document (d) Who received the contracts for such printing?

Hon. Barbara MacDougall (Minister of State for External Affairs): In so far as External Affairs and International Trade Canada is concerned the reply is as follows:

The cost of printing documents in relation to the visit of the President of Russia in June, 1992 was $384. The descriptions and quantities of materials printed were: 50 copies of four backgrounders and 100 copies of five Canada-Russian treaties. Canada communications Group received the contracts for this printing.

Question No. 379—Mr. Blackburn (Brant):

With regard to the visit of the President of Russia in June 1992 (a) What was the value of contracts for public or media relations for this visit (b) What firms or individuals received such contracts and on what date (c) What was the value of each contract?

Hon. Barbara MacDougall (Minister of State for External Affairs): In so far as External Affairs and International Trade Canada is concerned the reply is as follows:

There were no contracts for public of media relations undertaken for the visit of the President of Russia in June 1992. All work was handled by staff members of the department.

Question No. 380—Mr. Blackburn (Brant):

With regard to the targeting and recruitment committee (TARC) of CSIS and the Solicitor General, between January 1986 and January 1990 (a) How many times did this committee meet and on what dates, (b) Did anyone who was not either a public servant or a member of CSIS attend such meetings and, if so, who were they and what was their title and with which office were they employed?

Hon. Douglas Grinslade Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): The correct name of the committee in question is the Targeting Approval and Review cOmmittee (TARC). The purpose of this committee is to determine the appropriateness and scope of investigations conducted by the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS). It is a committee internal to CSIS, chaired by the director, and it meets as required. In addition to CSIS employees one senior official from the Ministry of the Solicitor General and one senior official from the Department of Justice regularly attend TARC meetings.

In keeping with the policy of the government, I will not provide details of CSIS operational policies for reasons of national security. However, I can tell you that the make-up and responsibilities of the TARC were clearly explained in On Course, a public document which outlines the government's response to the five-year review of the CSIS Act.

Question No. 382—Mr. Angus:

With respect to the Westray Mine public inquiry, (a) What documents or memorandum (titles and dates of those documents) has the federal government provided to the inquiry (b) Were any of the documents provided to the inquiry not tabled in the House and if so which documents identified by title and date were not tabled (c) When were those documents released to the inquiry (d) Were any documents provided to the Government of Nova Scotia and if so which documents and on what dates were they provided?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): (a) On June 4, 1992 the federal government tabled certain documents concerning the Westray coal mine project. Included with these documents was a list of additional supporting material available in an ISTC reading room. A complete set of all documents (tabled and available in the reading room) were sent on the same day to the inquiry.

(b) The supporting material listed in the tabled documents was sent to the inquiry.

(c) These documents were released to the inquiry on June 4, 1992, the same day that all documents were tabled in the House.

(d) On June 4, 1992 the Government of Nova Scotia received the same documents that were tabled in the House and the supporting material.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if Questions Nos. 289, 329, 330 and 368 could be made Orders for Return, these returns would be tabled immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House that Questions Nos. 289, 329, 330 and 368 be deemed to have been made Orders for Returns?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

STARRED QUESTIONS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Starred Questions Nos. 291 and 327.

Due to the length of the answers to those questions I would ask that they be printed in Hansard as if read.

[Text]

*Question No. 291—Mr. Saint-Julien:

Did CBC invite tenders from garment manufacturers (coats, parkas and pants) for the purchase of sportswear to be worn by its organizers, journalists, analysts and officials during the 1992 Olympic Games in Albertville and, if so, (a) Were there any Canadian bidders and who were they (b) If a contract was awarded (i) to whom (ii) what quantity of clothing was involved (iii) what was the dollar value of the contract?

Hon. Henry Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications):

Canadian Broadcasting Corporation:

The CBC issued no formal invitation to tender to garment manufacturers for the special clothing it required for its employees covering the 1992 Winter Olympic Games in Albertville. (Uniforms are mandatory on Olympic sites.)

As required for Olympics' coverage, CBC consulted the Olympic Trust of Canada to ascertain which supplier it had selected to provide uniforms for Olympic athletes. The trust advised the CBC that a Canadian company, SKIAN, had been chosen.

The CBC then contacted SKIAN for costs and samples of the product available. CBC compared those costs and samples with others from a Canadian distributor, Robert Christie Sports and Fashions Inc., a company with which it had formerly done business.

During the period when the Corporation was assessing the two product lines, SKIAN went out of business. Because there was at that point insufficient time to approach another supplier for quotations, CBC awarded the contract to Robert Christie Sports and Fashions Inc.

*Question No. 327—Mrs. Marleau:

With respect to the government's announcement of the new look to the unemployment cheques, what was the total cost to print the announcements?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): The new cheque announcements sent to UI claimants with their cheques costs $24,000.

[English]

Mr. Edwards: Sir, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that all Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers be allowed to stand.

[English]

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There are some Orders for Return on the Order Paper, notably one I put down on May 6 of last year. Twice I raised this issue with the parliamentary secretary in June before we adjourned. Both times he assured me he would look into it to see if something could be done to expedite the matter.

It is now September and it appears nothing has been done to expedite this matter. This information must be readily available and I wonder if the parliamentary secretary would undertake to present the House with this information next week.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quite correct in that he has asked about this matter before. I would just plead that events have intervened between June and the present, notably summer.

I can assure him, in all seriousness, that I will look into the matter immediately and report back to him at the earliest opportunity.

THE CONSTITUTION

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs) moved:

That, pursuant to the act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada, this House approves the following text of a referendum question:

"Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992?

_____ _____"

That a message be sent to the Senate accordingly and request that the Senate concur in the same.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think I might be forgiven for expressing my appreciation of the unusual generosity which has been extended to me by members of the House not only today but also over the last several weeks.

As my friend and colleague the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra will know, that is a treatment reserved for former prime ministers. It is not very durable, I am sure, but I will not spend it quickly.

• (1550)

I have to say that no minister could have carried out the challenge I was asked to carry out without the advice, the support and the loyalty of my colleagues in this House, in my caucus and in my cabinet. Of course, no one has given me more support in carrying out these responsibilities than the right hon. member for Charlevoix, the Prime Minister.

His intense commitment to this whole country and, I have to say as someone who was there, his unparalleled negotiating skill in this last critical month served this country and all those who care about its future in a selfless and determined way. Yesterday he quoted Sir John A. Macdonald. By his nature and on his record no one has a better right to quote Sir John A. Macdonald.

To a degree never known before in Canada, these constitutional discussions have been open to the public. Literally hundreds of thousands of Canadians have been involved directly in town hall meetings in Valleyfield, Whitecourt and Markham, in communities large and small all across Canada, in public hearings by two national parliamentary committees and several in the provinces, by the Spicer commission, by the extensive process of aboriginal consultations in six national policy conferences, in the media, across kitchen tables and on open-line programs. That public process profoundly shaped the decisions made at Charlottetown.

It led to the rejection, for example, of the government's original proposal for a council of the federation. It led to a rejection of our first proposal for an economic union. It added a social charter. It added the inherent right to self-government. It added a Senate that was equal and not just equitable, and it brought more Canadians directly into debate about their country. So did the spontaneous gestures of affection for Quebec, the newspaper advertisements, the hockey tournaments, the exchanges, the gift from Toronto to Montreal, the citizen driven billboard campaign proclaiming: "My Canada includes Quebec". Nothing like this has ever happened in Canada before.

Three major steps remain. The first is to invite the judgment of the Canadian people in a national referendum on October 26. If Canadians vote yes, Parliament and legislatures would then act immediately to debate and, I expect, adopt the specific resolutions. Then we would seek the unanimous agreement of the provinces to shorten the period of final ratification, in a way that could have these major constitutional changes approved and ratified and effective in law within a matter of months.

In Charlottetown we agreed to renew the Canadian federation. As this House agreed when it passed the referendum legislation, the question was circulated last week to the leaders of the other parties in Parliament and then to the provincial premiers and territorial and aboriginal leaders. This question will be asked of every Canadian in every province and territory in October. The question is precise, direct and fair. It allows Canadians a personal voice in the future of this country and it invites all Canadians to read the constitutional package, to judge it, to consider whether any alternatives are practical and then to express their view.

[English]

For months, for years, this House and this country have been discussing the Constitution of Canada. We have sought agreement before and failed too often. We have sought unanimity before and have seen it slip away. We have pursued reform in slices and in so doing required some Canadians to stand in line for reform.

At Charlottetown two weeks ago that pattern was broken and a new pattern was set.

For the first time in our history, and at the most inclusive Canadian table ever, 17 Canadian leaders came together to support each other, their country and our future. For the first time in our history those leaders were able to agree unanimously on a comprehensive package of change that addresses every major constitutional issue of this past decade.

It is appropriate that we should quickly bring this package to Parliament and then to the people because in a very direct way this agreement is a product of this Parliament and this country. It would not have happened without the leadership, understanding and willingness to trust and take risks demonstrated by members of this House.

Individual members of Parliament put their careers on the line to make this happen: the member for Yorkton—Melville, the member for Winnipeg South, the member for Papineau—Saint-Michel, the member for Jonquière, the member for St. John's East, the member for Macleod, the Prime Minister and other party leaders, and many more here and in the other place. This was the Canadian political process at its best.

It revealed a country that most of us do not know nearly well enough. Many of our current conflicts exist because we do not know well enough the history of our country, the defining impact of its geography and size, its diversity, or its success when compared by almost any standard to any other nation.

Canada is the community that most of the world wants to become, yet we take our advantages for granted and so we risk losing them. This is not because our differences are so deep but because what we share in common is not valued enough. Most of us profoundly hope to put this constitutional issue behind us but we cannot put aside the need to know our country better.

If I have learned two lessons in the last 17 months one is how destructive prejudice and misunderstanding can be and the other is how much we Canadians can do together when we reach beyond those barriers of anger and fear.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): We are all aware that there is a danger that a referendum will excite that anger and that fear, that it will cause Canadians to dig in behind old lines. However, it can also be the means by which individual Canadians come to the understanding that we have come to in this House and that the leaders came to in Charlottetown, which is that if we want to keep this country we have to see it whole.

Yesterday the Prime Minister quoted Sir John A., who described the first Charlottetown agreement as bearing upon its face the marks of compromise. Canadians who find some fault in the Charlottetown agreement that was signed three weeks ago should look again at what was cobbled together to create this country. Beyond the compromises then and now were decisions that were bold, sensible and, in many cases, overdue.

We have agreed on a new partnership between aboriginal and non-aboriginal Canadians that would close the circle of Confederation and put the energies of aboriginal peoples to work for themselves and for Canada.

We have adopted the concept of Quebec as a distinct society and given that province the instruments it requires to be confident and secure in Canada forever.

We have agreed to improve our Canadian democracy to reform this House so that it would reflect the will of the people more fairly and to create a new Senate that brings the voice of the regions into the centre of national decisions, a Senate that would be elected, equal and very effective. We have agreed that both Houses of Parliament should respect what Clyde Wells has called the third equality, that between English and French speaking cultures.

We have agreed on a new federal partnership, on a more sensible, more realistic division of powers that recognizes that Ottawa does not always know best. We have found ways to end the corrosive abuse of the federal spending power. We have agreed to strengthen our common commitment to those programs that define the very essence of Canada—like equalization and regional development.

• (1600)

Finally, we have agreed on a common and inclusive statement of Canadian characteristics, Canadian values of democracy, the rule of law, Quebec as a distinct society, the rights of native peoples, linguistic duality and the equality of races, of individuals, of gender and of the provinces.

[English]

We have never before been able to agree together on reform like that. These are not small changes, they are fundamental.

During these long discussions we sometimes fell into the habit of comparing Beaudoin–Dobbie with July 7, with August 28. That is not the comparison. The comparison is with any constitutional proposal that was ever agreed before.

In 1990 aboriginals and others felt left out. In 1982 Quebec was left out. In previous constitutional proposals the division of powers was left out. This agreement keeps the promises that were made before: promises to aboriginals, to Atlantic Canada, to the west, to the north, the promises at the Paul Sauvé arena. It does so as Canadians together with unanimity in the Canada round.

Of course, there were differences around the table as there are around the country. That should not surprise anyone. This, after all, is after Russia the largest country in the world, crossing a continent, facing three oceans, formed from every culture and tradition on earth. Differences define this country. So too does how we deal with difference. We do not erase it. We do not outlaw it. We embrace it and we accept it.

The Charlottetown agreement does that. It reflects the equality of individuals and of provinces, the unique place of our French and English cultures, the obligation we have to our aboriginal citizens, our Canadian commitment to seeing equality, not as sameness, but as respect for different needs, different realities.

The Canadian achievement, the achievement of Charlottetown, is to take those different views and reconcile them fairly, freely and justly. The results of that agreement are now before the Canadian people for their decision.

The details of this agreement are important, but equally important is the underlying vision.

The Constitution we have today comes, by and large, from another time, more than a century ago, almost another country, a country that was mainly European and white, a country concentrated on the eastern seaboard, a country that treated its aboriginal citizens as savages or as children.

As we responded to the Depression and to World War and to growth and to the temptation of the federal spending power, we became a country increasingly run from the centre, a federation where the provinces were not trusted.

But that is not the country we are today. Canada has changed and our Constitution must change too. The Charlottetown Agreement allows the Constitution to catch up with the country.

It ends a view that federalism only works if it is controlled closely by Ottawa. It ends a view that strong regions mean a weak nation. It puts in place a new partnership between the provinces, the national government and the aboriginal people; a new partnership among all Canadians. It says that strong parts can make for a strong whole.

[English]

It is very important that Canadians judge this agreement by what it actually says, not by what others say it says. This is not written in Morse code. Canadians owe it to themselves to read it so that they can judge it themselves. It will be available to Canadians across the country.

Canadians should also judge this agreement on its own terms. Threats or fear or false choices have no place in this Canadian debate. This is not a loyalty test. This agreement should stand or fall on its own accord. I believe the central question is does this agreement move the whole country forward? Many members of this House and many Canadians might have written this agreement differently. I might have done that if I had been in a room alone, but I was not alone. No one was and no Canadian is today.

The goal here was agreement. The purpose was to come together. That required give and take. It required that everyone give a little ground to move to common ground, higher ground. The strength of this agreement is that it is not the product of one set of hands or one way of thinking. It was the result of different needs, different visions, different priorities coming together in one community. There is nothing new about that. If the Fathers of Confederation a century ago had insisted on either perfection or some preordained plan, there would have been no agreement then, no Canada.

That is not what happened at Confederation, not what has kept us since, not what distinguishes us still. More often than not, more often than most, we have succeeded in Canada in balancing views, balancing interests and in moving this country steadily forward, not to Utopia but to improvement. A new Senate would bring democracy and diversity and the influence of the more distant provinces into the centre of national decision making. It would have real power. The power to reject the appointment of the Governor of the Bank of Canada is real power. The power to force the House of Commons into joint sittings, the power to initiate bills on controversial matters is improvement.

The agreement on aboriginal self-government can begin to repair the ravages of the past and put aboriginal Canadians on the road to dignity and development in the country they share. That is improvement.

Respecting the nature of Quebec, welcoming the distinct society, and respecting its difference can take us beyond the corrosive doubts about whether Quebec wants Canada, whether Canada wants Quebec. That is improvement.

Approval of this agreement can put the Constitution on the back burner out of the headlines where it belongs. That is improvement.

We have been at this far too long. We have to break the back of this problem before it breaks us. I believe this agreement can do that and do it fairly. There are serious and sensible Canadians who have substantial reservations and misgivings about the package. They have the democratic right to vote this down if they think that would be best for Canada. Before they do that they should look carefully at what it means and at what the consequences might be. This, after all, is probably the most important decision Canadians will ever make about our country and our future together. There are serious questions to ask and to answer.

If this is turned down, would there be another agreement, a better agreement around the corner, some kind of plan B for Canada? I have learned not to say that anything is impossible. Remember, 17 of Canada's leaders met for hundreds of hours over dozens of days after two years of conversation and consultation and deliberation. We looked at literally hundreds of other options, other models, other measures and none worked as well as this. I suspect the real choice is not this agreement versus another, but this agreement versus no agreement at all. Canadians should consider the implications of that, of continuing with the status quo, the impact of more uncertainty on the economy, the sense of betrayal that would arise among aboriginals, the neglect that would continue to mean for other issues that matter and the perpetuation of debate, of disorder, of disunity.

There are other questions to ponder as well. If this is accepted in Quebec but turned down outside, what conclusions would reasonable Quebecers draw? Having been promised reform in 1980, having been left out of reform in 1982, having seen reform fail in 1990, how would they react in 1992? What if this agreement is supported in the rest of Canada but turned down in Quebec? Canadians should think about all of that, about how we would react the morning after.

We have been at this now for over 25 years, bickering while other countries have been building, focusing on the past and its wrongs rather than on the future and its promise, looking inward rather than outward and glaring at one another rather than taking on the world.

It is time to bring this issue to a close. It is time for Canadians to choose. It is time for this country to come together at last. We need each other here more than ever and on more than the Constitution. We need each other tomorrow too, on everything else.

If we are unable to agree on Canada, would we ever be able to agree on anything else? If we are unable to agree on Canada, would anything else matter after that? However if we can agree, if we do agree, what does that say for the future?

As the Prime Minister will attest I did not exactly volunteer for this assignment. However, none of us chose to have our country look in upon itself for so long with such anger and such misunderstanding. Yet through this process each of us has come to learn more about this extraordinary country and to appreciate it more.

[Translation]

Very few people were surprised when the United Nations judged Canada as the best place in the world to live. That is not a reason for complacency. There are problems here, prejudices, injustice, inequality. We are not a perfect country, but we are very successful.

Much of our success comes from our ability to work together. Our economy is generally stronger because our country is very large. We have influence in world trade because Canada is large, strong and very stable. Our social and medical programs are the result of a social conscience you do not find in the United States, a result of a respect for one another that you do not find everywhere.

In the end, this is not a national decision but a personal decision each of us must make about our country. I am only one Canadian. I am proud of my own roots and happy to have had the opportunity to know my country better. I am not a Quebecer and no one will be surprised to learn that French is not my first language. Yet I have come to know Quebec, as much as an Albertan can, and there is no doubt in my mind that sharing a great country with Quebec makes Alberta better, just as sharing a country with Alberta makes Quebec stronger and better.

We are brothers and sister here, not identical twins, but part of a family that is becoming more generous, more confident. I want our children to grow up in that large family. We will all be better off for it, but that decision is for each individual Canadian to make.

[English]

I have heard a lot of wise things said about our country in the last several months as I travelled across the nation. Let me conclude by referring to two of them.

On Canada's east coast, in Nova Scotia, lives a young girl, a new Canadian, who came to Canada four years ago from Holland. Andrea Eelman is a high school student from Tatamagouche.

She won a public speaking contest there earlier this year, in which she said the following:

> Even before I came here, Canadians to me meant the people who liberated my country of origin from the Nazis. Not the British, not the Russians, not the Americans, but the Canadians. Canadians. Canada meant a country that brought forth heroes, willing to fight, not just for their own, but for someone else's country. If Canadians are recognized as heroes in other countries, isn't it time that we recognize them as heroes here? And shouldn't we, like those who fought for my homeland so long ago, now fight for our country in its hour of need?

The other observation comes from my own foothills, from the Indian Elder Peter O'Chiese. His prayer opened my first meeting with the Assembly of First Nations. He referred to all of the differences in Canada, all the reasons we could find to disagree.

"Those differences", he said, "can divide us and make us weak, or unite us and make us strong". His prayer was that we would find the will to lift each other up. That prayer has been heeded by the aboriginal people. It has been heeded by this House of Commons. It has been heeded by the leaders in Charlottetown.

I hope it will guide the judgment of the millions of Canadians who will decide on October 26 whether we Canadians will let each other down or lift each other up.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, when I spoke on the referendum bill last June, I told the government: if you can reach a unanimous agreement, fine, but if not, do not hesitate to submit a constitutional revision proposal to the Canadian people by means of a pan-Canadian referendum.

Today, on behalf of my party, I would like to congratulate the Minister as well as all those who worked for so many months to get a unanimous agreement. It is obviously the result of much work, compromise and sacrifice in certain circles and certain regions of the country.

Politics is the art of the possible, and this agreement reflects what is possible today. Those who will oppose it will have to prove that, under the circumstances, they could come up with a better agreement, an agreement which would also be unanimous and which would truly be in the interests of Canada as a whole. It is important to note that, in a federation such as ours, we must always think about national interests first, sometimes at the expense of special, local or regional interests.

Once more, this agreement is probably the best possible under the circumstances. I wish to assure the Minister that, in the interests of this country, we Liberals agree to participate fully and actively on the yes side in the referendum campaign during coming days and weeks.

• (1620)

From the very beginning, the position of the Leader of the Opposition has been that a referendum should be held to allow the public to approve any major constitutional change. There is no need for me to remind the House about the uneasiness of the government at this suggestion. One of the government backbenchers even introduced a private member's bill on the referendum, but the government finally understood that, if there was to be a referendum in one or more province in Canada, it would be quite normal for all Canadians in all the provinces to be asked to vote on an agreement dealing with constitutional renewal. This is therefore very satisfying for us, Liberals, and for our leader, it means that a very important objective has been reached, because we are convinced that, from now on, our Constitution can no longer be amended without the entire population being asked to ratify any proposed constitutional change.

It will certainly be wonderful when all Canadian citizens are asked to vote democratically to determine their political and constitutional future.

I urge Canadians who will be asked to vote on October 26: Set aside your individual and personal interests; think about the interests of the nation and generously say yes to constitutional renewal.

I forget who said that a society will be judged by the way it treats its minorities.

I believe that the proposed constitutional agreement vividly illustrates the extraordinary spirit of compassion, understanding and tolerance of Canadian society, because it must be admitted that the major winners, the major beneficiaries of this most recent round of constitutional negotiations are our minorities. Let us deal first of all with the First Nations.

The agreement proposes to amend the Constitution to recognize that the aboriginal peoples of Canada have the inherent right to self-government in Canada. What is greatly to the credit of those who negotiated the agreement is that the recognition of the inherent right to self-government shall be interpreted as meaning that the aboriginal governments constitute one of the three orders of government in Canada. This did not come about without apprehension or reluctance in various quarters.

[English]

I take great pride in saying that we Liberals never hesitated. We stood firm on this issue and at the very beginning called for the recognition of the inherent right to aboriginal self government. This achievement is a major step forward. In the eyes of the world, in the eyes of history, this measure will distinguish Canada as a nation of tolerance and respect. It is a new beginning that will help to end the cycle of poverty and dependency for these people.

For this and this alone I will venture to say that this accord should be accepted. If it is worth doing the referendum and winning it in order to secure such an historic breakthrough, let us do it.

I want to extend congratulations on behalf of the Liberal Party of Canada to Ovide Mercredi, to Rosemarie Kuptana, to Yvon Dumont and to Ron George for their skilful work on behalf of their respective peoples.

[Translation]

It is not by chance that our party is so receptive and so open to the legitimate aspirations of the aboriginal peoples. I would like to pay homage today to Senators Len Marchand and Charlie Watt who have long defended the interests of the First Nations. I also wish to emphasize the exceptional contribution of the hon. members for Western Arctic and Nunatsiaq to these constitutional debates. These hard working members of our party were able to inspire and influence us so that we would support what I would describe as a visionary policy for our future relations with the First Nations.

I must say that I was especially impressed by the untiring and even colossal work of the hon. member for Western Arctic, who did so much for her people. I sat with her on the Charest committee and on the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee. I shall never forget her fierce determination to put forward the aboriginal point of view. Her influence within our party was such that that I have no hesitation in saying that, today, of all political parties, ours is the best prepared to deal with the First Nations as between equals to implement the negotiating process resulting from this agreement.

I can tell the First Nations that a future Liberal government, under Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, and with the assistance of the hon. member for Western Arctic will complete the work already begun for aboriginal peoples.

[English]

We Liberals are also very happy to see that a new Canada clause will recognize that Canadians are committed to racial and ethnic equality in a society that includes citizens from many lands who have contributed and continue to contribute to the building of a strong Canada that reflects its cultural and racial diversity.

[Translation]

Throughout the years there have been profound changes in Canada. Our nation comprises much more today than the descendants of French and British settlers. The contribution of new Canadians from all corners of the earth has enriched our society. It is appropriate to recognize this in our Constitution and it is also a clear way to tell new Canadians that this country also belongs to them while assuring them that they will enjoy respect and equality in this country. My colleague for Mississauga East, who sat with us on the Beaudoin–Dobbie parliamentary committee, was determined to have this clause included and I am sure that she is very happy that it has been.

I would now like to say a few words about the guarantees provided for official language minority communities under this agreement. For us Liberals, no constitutional reform would have been acceptable if the way these minorities had been overlooked in the Meech Lake Accord had not been corrected in the current constitutional round.

We are therefore pleased that the Canada clause will also state that the Constitution shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the fact that Canadians and their governments—and I emphasize the word governments because it is very important—are committed to the vitality and development of French and English speaking minority communities throughout Canada.

I think congratulations are in order for the representatives of associations of francophones outside Quebec who were determined to present their point of view and who, as the minister well knows, insisted on being invited to these constitutional talks although certain parties would have liked to ignore them.

They had a number of natural allies within our own party, including my colleagues from Ottawa—Vanier, St. Boniface and Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, who played a major role in convincing the Government of Canada and a number of provincial governments of the need for this clause.

I say bravo, mission accomplished. We now have a legal text. We can only hope that governments will now no longer hesitate to protect and also promote official language minorities.

On behalf of the Liberal Party of Canada, I would like to take this opportunity to thank the six legal and political advisers who guided and helped us during the whole process of the past weeks and months, throughout the lengthy proceedings that culminated in the constitutional agreement we have today. I would like to mention Michel Bastarache, Eddie Goldenberg, Eric Maldoff, Guy Pratte, Bryan Williams and Sheila Purdey.

During the remainder of my speech I would like to focus on Quebec's place in Canada. I see, Quebec as part of a modern and renewed Canadian federation. I agree that as French speaking Quebecers on a continent with 300 million anglophones, we have entirely legitimate reasons to be concerned about our cultural security.

The question is whether our language, culture and traditions will be better protected in an independent Quebec than if we remain full members of the Canadian federation. To those who want Quebec's independence, I say that 125 years of Canadian history have certainly not emasculated our language, culture and traditions. Members of the Société Saint-Jean-Baptiste may not agree, but our cultural institutions in Quebec are stronger and more dynamic than ever, and new Quebecers are better integrated with the francophone majority in Quebec than they ever were in the past.

A linguistics professor at the University of Quebec in Chicoutimi would have Quebecers believe that French is on the way out in Montreal. This is a crass misrepresentation of the facts and an insult to all those Italians, Greeks and Haitians who feel thoroughly Quebecois and to others living in the Montreal area who have become part of the francophone majority and are sick and tired of this futile bickering about language which is undermining Quebec's economy and prosperity.

Aware of the fact that they form a distinct community, Quebecers have always in some way expressed the need to be masters of their own destiny. In the past, Quebec's premiers have relied on a series of slogans to express that awareness, that profound awareness we as Quebecers have of being different. For Duplessis it was provincial autonomy, for Jean Lesage it was "maître chez nous", for Daniel Johnson it was equality or independence, but Quebecers have always wanted to ensure they would be able to control their own destiny.

Not surprisingly, in Quebec the Government of Quebec enjoys a status we do not find in the other Canadian provinces. To the Quebecer, the government in Quebec City is more important than the government in Ottawa, while in the rest of Canada it is generally the other way round. However, this does not mean we should get rid of the federal government, although unfortunately, that is what some people would like to do. Because of this preference, some Quebecers would like to see the federal government disappear altogether. I say it would be a serious mistake, because although it is very important for the National Assembly to have all the powers it needs to defend and promote Quebec as a distinct society, it is every bit as important for Quebecers to be able to rely on the Parliament of Canada to defend and promote their interests.

It is obvious this new accord cannot be acceptable to those who no longer believe in Canada. However, for anyone who thinks Quebecers should continue to be fully associated with Canada, this new constitutional accord has great merit and, I insist, constitutes an adequate response to the recommendations of the Bélanger–Campeau commission.

I had the honour of sitting on the Commission on the Political and Constitutional Future of Quebec from November 1990 to March 1991, at the invitation of Premier Bourassa. After conducting public hearings throughout Quebec, this special commission published a report that started the constitutional review process in which we are involved today. We must therefore ask ourselves whether what we are proposing now reflects the commission's recommendations. My answer is yes. Since some of our friends in Quebec City may want to put a different interpretation on all this, I will be more specific. On page 52 of the report it says:

> To break the stalemate and redefine its political and constitutional status, Quebec has only two choices. Under the first, Quebec would seek acceptance of the redefinition of its status within the constitutional framework of the Canadian federation. Such a course of action presupposes that its integration in the Canadian political system be maintained, but significantly modified. The second solution would entail Quebec's withdrawing from the constitutional framework of the Canadian federation, with or without the consent of the rest of Canada, with a view to acceding to full political sovereignty and becoming a state independent of the Canadian state, open to the establishment of economic ties with the latter.

I may remind Mr. Parizeau, Ms. Larose and their friends that they signed this report, assuming there would be no agreement.

• (1640)

There is an agreement to renew Canadian federalism and that is one of the two options mentioned in the Bélanger–Campeau report.

First, Gérald's gang accused the Bourassa government and the federalist members of the Commission of not respecting the conclusions of the Bélanger–Campeau report and of betraying their signature. Ghislain Dufour, president of the Conseil du patronat du Quebec, issued a press release on this subject, which I quote:

> Such an accusation is unworthy of our colleagues. Besides the fact that the Commission's report leaves open the two constitutional options being debated in Quebec, namely renewed federalism and sovereignty, they know very well that the four business people on the Commission—in addition to Mr. Dufour, they were Marcel Beaudry, Charles–Albert Poissant and Cheryl Campbell Steer—and others always rejected the sovereigntist demand that any referendum deal only with sovereignty. On the contrary, they always said that they would only sign the Bélanger–Campeau commission's report if any referendum to be held could also deal with the federal offers, or sovereignty in the absence of such offers.

I invite those who may have any doubts to check the newspapers of March 21 and March 22, 1992 which reported these positions at length.

I conclude the quotation from Mr. Dufour with this:

> One must be in bad faith or suffer from collective amnesia to say as certain sovereigntist former commissioners do that we have gone back on our signatures. Such an attitude augurs badly for the kind of debate we can expect in the coming weeks. Instead of concentrating on the substance of the issue, namely the constitutional offer and what it is worth, they are resorting to unfounded and deceitful diversionary tactics. Such an approach can only taint the very credibility of those who put forward such lies.

If it was desirable, as the Bélanger–Campeau commission said, for the people of Quebec to express themselves on their political and constitutional future in a formal democratic consultation, this is as valid for the first option as for the second. Of course I know that the advocates of independence for Quebec would have wanted a referendum on total and complete sovereignty for Quebec. Then they would have been better not to sign the Bélanger–Campeau commission report, which says in its conclusion on page 73: "Two courses are open to Quebec with respect to the redefinition of its status, i.e. a new, ultimate attempt to redefine its status within the federal regime, and the attainment of sovereignty. Some people feel that the first course must be adopted and, should it fail, that Quebec should achieve sovereignty. Other people prefer to adopt the second course of action immediately. Should a final attempt to renew federalism fail, sovereignty would be the only course remaining".

Even if our separatist friends do not like it, the attempt to renew federalism was successful and sovereignty as far as I am concerned could be put off indefinitely because the constitutional agreement essentially respects the required constitutional changes set forth on page 48 of the Bélanger–Campeau commission's report.

I need not remind you that those who sat on the Bélanger–Campeau commission were deeply influenced by the circumstances at that time. Quebec felt rejected by the collapse of the Meech Lake accord and the passions stirred among the people led the Parti Quebecois to say outright that there was nothing more to do with Canada, that the English and the others in the rest of Canada would never understand them, and the Liberal Party of Quebec, not wanting to find itself in an impossible situation, decided through its policy committee to ask a lot from constitutional renewal. In that context the members of the Bélanger–Campeau commission drew up what they thought could be the basis of a renewed constitution. I tell you again that this document was signed by our friends in the Parti Quebecois and by those who want sovereignty for Quebec. When I read you some paragraphs from this report, you will understand that the demands were quite considerable, given the context in which they were made.

This is what it says on page 48. These changes vary in nature but have in common, among other things:

> The necessity of creating a new relationship between Quebec and the rest of Canada, based on the recognition of and respect for the identity of Quebecers and their right to be different;

That is the first demand. It recognizes Quebec's distinctness and the first article of this new Constitution contains the distinct society clause and the role of the legislature and government of Quebec to protect and promote the distinct society. That is the first demand met in this agreement, quite rightly, I think.

The second point is:

> A division of powers and responsibilities which assures Quebec of exclusive authority over those matters and domains which already fall under its exclusive jurisdiction, which means among other things eliminating in these domains federal spending power and overlapping interventions;

Item 25 of the new agreement covers this aspect. The federal spending power in fields of exclusive provincial jurisdiction is now limited, circumscribed and contained. It is not abolished as they would have wanted it here. It is impossible to abolish the Canadian government's spending power. You can have pipe dreams, but no government on earth will give up its spending power. If it has the power to tax, it must also have the power to spend. Nevertheless, I think that this agreement admirably meets the desired objective of ensuring that in fields of exclusive provincial jurisdiction, the Government of Canada will no longer be able to spend without having discussed, reached an understanding and decided to follow provincial priorities.

When I say that this document now limits, circumscribes and contains, I add that as item 25 indicates this should help reduce overlapping and duplication and respect provincial priorities.

• (1650)

The third demand was to give Quebec exclusive jurisdiction and responsibility over its social, economic and cultural development and in the area of language. Items 27, 28, 29, 36 and 37 of the new agreement meet these demands. Of course, some will claim it is not sufficient. Some will say this agreement does not meet all the demands listed in the report of the Bélanger–Campeau commission. Personally, after having reviewed this document, I think it offers substantial gains to the Quebec premier. And I trust Mr. Bourassa more than I trust Léon Dion.

Another point is the transfer of tax and financial resources associated with responsibilities assumed by Quebec. Items 25, 26 and 28 in particular guarantee the transfer of funds as planned or reasonable compensation.

Another demand is the preservation of Quebec's representation within common institutions to fully reflect its particular status in Canada. Item 21 guarantees that Quebec will be assigned no fewer than 25 per cent of the seats in the House of Commons. This is in fact an extraordinary gain showing the remarkable generosity of our Canadian partners who thus recognize Quebec's distinctivess.

That is not all. Item 18 specifies that the Supreme Court is to be composed of nine members, of whom three must have been admitted to the bar of Quebec. This constitutional guarantee could not be amended without Quebec's consent, which Quebec would of course never give.

Third, item 14 of the new agreement gives francophone senators an absolute veto over any bill affecting French language or French culture. This is another exceptional gain for the French fact which is in my opinion, one of the great Canadian realities. Some Péquistes do not like the fact that there could be francophone senators from other provinces. Get real. This is a country where we are fighting to keep our language, our culture and our traditions, and they want to deny the fact that some residents of other provinces share our French heritage. How narrow-minded can they get?

Another point is the guarantee that Quebec's consent is required for any constitutional amendment. Some have proposed that, whenever appropriate, Quebec should have the right to opt out of a transfer of jurisdiction to the federal government with reasonable compensation. Such a right to opt out with compensation would then replace the right of veto.

Items 57, 58 and 59 of the new agreement largely meet these two demands since unanimity is required to amend the Constitution. We could say that Quebec wanted an absolute veto on any constitutional change. Was it so important? I think Mr. Lévesque even said back then: "The important thing is a veto on institutions, especially one that would allow us to receive some financial compensation in case certain provinces, but not Quebec, would be willing to relinquish their power to Ottawa".

The proposals of the Bélanger–Campeau commission, perhaps the least favourable to a renewal of Canadian federalism, would then become a reality. I say that the report as presented meets expectations Quebecers had set at a very high level never dreaming the rest of Canada would accept them.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ouellet: Obviously those hoping Quebec would be given the exclusive power to legislate, collect taxes and establish international relations cannot accept this agreement. It is clear they will never accept any agreement renewing Canadian federalism. Their opinion on the value of this agreement can never be objective. On the day the constitutional agreement was reached, when some of the first ministers had not yet left the conference room and before we even knew any of the details, Gérald Larose was saying on a Montreal TV station that the agreement did not take into account Quebec's aspirations.

An hon. member: He had not seen it.

Mr. Ouellet: He had not even seen it. He did not know what he was talking about, but he was sure it was bad for Quebec.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ouellet: To my Liberal friends in Quebec who think the Allaire report may be acceptable, I say that Quebec's interests will best be served through a close co-operation with the rest of Canada.

To be the most economically profitable for Quebec, this association should also be political. It is logical that, if Quebec wants to make decisions within this political association, its representatives must be able to exercise real powers. If too many areas of jurisdiction are transferred to Quebec, as some would like, Quebec members would lose their credibility, their influence and their ability to defend Quebec's interests at the national level.

Let us look at this agreement for what it is. It does not give many more powers to Quebec but it accomplishes something very important. It strengthens Quebec's representation at the federal level. It also strengthens the role of the Quebec government and National Assembly in areas crucial to the preservation of Quebec's distinctiveness. It is an undeniable reality, and I invite all sensible Quebec citizens to say yes to this agreement next October 26.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ouellet: In closing, I would like to caution against two things. I am very pleased that our new partners, the Prime Minister and the minister responsible, are here to listen to what I have to say, because I must tell them that we are facing two risks. The first one has to do with the legal documents. We Liberals support this deal based on the Consensus Report on the Constitution dated August 28, 1992, described here as the final text. It is very important that the legal documents be in accordance with this final text to make sure that, at no time, any one could get the feeling of having been deceived or betrayed.

I appreciate how difficult it is to ask the public to fully comprehend and digest legal documents. In fact, the Government of Canada has not completed its task. It has yet to provide us with the legal documents. That is quite a deficiency. It is no insurmountable obstacle, but a major deficiency nonetheless. Basically what the government is asking for is an act of faith on the part of a great many people. It is taking a chance and will have to be careful not to allow the supporters of this deal to read into it what they want, each their own way. In the absence of any legal text besides this one, some time down the road yes supporters could have a different interpretation, depending on where they live, in Quebec as opposed to other parts of the country or in western Canada as opposed to Ontario.

That is one danger we are exposed to. Just think of how many problems the various interpretations put on the Meech Lake accord have caused as the months and years went by. Our party and its leader back then, the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, had supported this government move, and so had the New Democratic Party. After a while, it became extremely difficult to know what we were talking about because the documents were interpreted one way in Quebec and another way elsewhere in the country. You will argue that any legal text can lend to interpretation, but I simply wanted to give this warning so that we are all perfectly aware of the importance of a coherent message, the tightest message based on the very wording of this constitutional deal, as it appears in the final text from August 28, 1992.

My second warning deals with the non-partisan approach to making this deal. This course of action must be maintained throughout the referendum process. The future of this country must come before the future of a party, a minister or even a prime minister in politics. This government could not have put this deal together on its own and it has said so. It has enrolled, as was graciously mentioned over and over, the outstanding co-operation from the two major parties in the House of Commons: the Liberal Party of Canada as well as the New Democratic Party. This deal would not have been possible without the considerable input of the Liberal, NDP and Conservative provincial premiers.

This deal is therefore born out of concern for objectivity and non-partisanship as well as for the higher interest of our country, irrespective of political affiliations.

I am telling you all this because I know the Prime Minister well. He is a former classmate and a long-standing friend. I know about his partisan instinct. I know he can get carried away sometimes in the heat of debate. In the interest of this country, throughout the referendum process, we should all strive to win this referendum in every single province with the three major political parties working together. The government party cannot win it on its own, but with the full and sincere support of the Liberals and NDPers, it can and that is what we must do in the interest of Canada. Let us embark upon this campaign with determination, in a non-partisan spirit, a spirit of thrust and harmony and we will manage to change in a major and remarkable way the Constitutional Act of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think you will find there is unanimous consent to suspend Private Members' Business on Wednesday, September 9, 1992 and on Thursday, September 10, 1992 to continue with Government Orders, and that both items retain their order of precedence in the list of Private Members' Business.

[Translation]

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to say that we do give consent. We agree to defer, both today and tomorrow, the hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business in order to pursue the debate on the referendum question.

Mr. Plamondon: We appreciate having been consulted by both government and the opposition. We agree to defer the hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, for the last couple of years we have been dealing with constitutional issues. It is one of those rare times in Parliament when we set aside our partisan differences and try to work for the benefit of this country.

At the outset I would like to say very clearly to all members of the House how much I appreciate the work of the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs for his leadership on this issue over the last 17 or 18 months.

I also want to extend congratulations to my colleague from Papineau—Saint-Michel for the work he has done on behalf of his party. I would like to mention to the Prime Minister and others the work of the member for St. John's East on the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee the Beaudoin-Edwards committee and the Charest committee a couple of years ago.

This is a rather historic week in Canadian history. It is only the third time in the history of our country that we are going to have a national referendum. The first was in 1898, the second in 1942, and now the third will be on October 26, 1992.

It is also the first time in Canadian history that the people of this country will be consulted about their Constitution. I want to associate our party with the national referendum. It is the proper way to consult people about the Constitution. The Constitution belongs to the people, not the politicians, and they should have an input and a say on the package we are about to approve.

I also want to associate our party with the approval of the question that is before the people of this country.

• (1710)

It is a short question, it is concise, it is fair and it is balanced. We will be there campaigning on the yes side of the referendum along with the premiers, the aboriginal territorial leaders and members of the other two parties in this House.

The package is a good package, although it is not perfection. I suppose the only way you could achieve perfection is to stand by yourself in front of a mirror and negotiate with yourself. I do not think that there is anybody in this country or in this House who would not make some changes to the document. At this time, that is the best document that we can come up with. It modernizes our Constitution in a new vision of federalism that I will argue reflects what the Canadian people have said to us they want in their Constitution.

This is a Constitution built on the basis of public hearings by a national parliamentary committee, six national conferences that were televised across the country, an aboriginal process and by committees in almost every province and territory.

What we have here is a good reflection of what this country is all about. What this package is about is the story of nation builders. It is people coming together, negotiating, making trade-offs and climbing to that common ground that unites us as a great nation. It is the best effort, it is the best accommodation. I hope when the time comes on October 26, all members of this House, with a few exceptions, will be on the right side of history in terms of pulling this country into the future.

Does it mean that people do not have the right to disagree or to ask questions about what is in this document? It is important that the people of this country have a chance to study the document, to discuss it, to see what is in it, to try to understand some of the trade-offs and some of the compromises that were made for the sake of the country as a whole.

I want to spend a few minutes this afternoon mentioning seven or eight of the key points of this document that are so important. The most exciting new thing in the document is the right of inherent self-government for the aboriginal people of this country. If this Constitution is amended in accordance with the accord in Charlottetown, we will have the most progressive constitution in the world bar none for aboriginal or indigenous peoples. We can be proud of that as Canadians.

We have to congratulate the aboriginal people, the leadership and the ordinary aboriginal people across this country for they are now the true mothers and fathers of Confederation. They have been involved in the process. They are inside the loop. Justice will be done to them and we can all be proud of that. There will be self-government. There will be recognition of aboriginal languages and cultures and the recognition that aboriginal people can look after their affairs within Canada.

[Translation]

Second, we have here with this package a promise of reconciliation with the province of Quebec. I remember clearly that night in the Paul-Sauvé arena 12 years ago, in May 1980, at the time of the Quebec referendum when the then Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Hon. Pierre Trudeau, made a political commitment to the people of Quebec. He said that a no to sovereignty-association was a yes to renewed federalism in Canada. Now, 12 years later, we have a very positive deal to offer the province of Quebec. It incorporates the five conditions set in the Meech Lake accord regarding: first, the distinct society, which is important for the province of Quebec; second, the Supreme Court of Canada, with the nomination of three civil law judges from the province of Quebec now entrenched in the Constitution, such an important feature; third, the agreement on immigration; fourth, the limitation of the federal spending power, a major point as well as yet another of the conditions in the Meech Lake accord; and fifth, the power of veto on federal institutions for Quebec and every other province in the Canadian federation. However there is more than the essence of the Meech Lake Accord and the five Quebec demands in here. There is the guarantee of a minimum of 25 per cent of the membership in the House of Commons coming from the province of Quebec from now on. That is an important factor for a minority in our country and in North America.

Third and last, there is something on the division of powers. It may not seem like much to some Quebecers, but it is a step in the right direction. We have obtained changes in nine jurisdictions. More flexibility is now afforded to Quebec and Quebec as well as the rest of the Canadian provinces will now have more powers.

[English]

We have also, for the first time in our country, the proposal to enshrine in our Constitution a social and economic union that will say the goal of this country is to have medical care. It is to have the five principles of medical care enshrined in our Constitution.

The mention of the environment in the Constitution and in the social charter is very important. There is the goal of providing every Canadian citizen with not only primary but secondary and post-secondary education. We have the goal of collective bargaining and the right to organize for workers as parts of the social covenant or economic and social union in the Charlottetown accord.

We also have other social, economic and community values that are part of the socio-economic union such as the goal of full employment and other goals that are important in terms of building this country.

We have the Canada clause which, for the first time, will be a description in our Constitution of what we are all about as Canadians. It mentions the valuable contribution of our minorities. I know there are some of us who wish we had stronger language in terms of protecting minority rights, particularly for visible minorities, something we mentioned in Beaudoin-Dobbie as an NDP amendment.

There is mention in the Canada clause as well of the aboriginal people, the distinct society, the diversity of our country, the equality of the provinces and the linguistic duality. These are the things that define us as a nation and will help the courts interpret the Constitution of Canada.

We have, as I said a few minutes ago in French, some progress on the division of powers. I am very pleased about what has happened in the division of powers. I think now we have more flexibility in our country to allow the provincial governments to do more things that are relevant in their domains and at the same time keep in Ottawa a strong, central government for national goals, national programs and national aspirations.

The division of powers allows more flexibility. The division of powers allows us to recognize what we are, a country that is very diverse. We have different needs and different interests in different parts of Canada.

It is not always possible, relevant or even wise to design a lot of programs in Ottawa that are precisely the same in Kamsack, Saskatchewan or Chicoutimi, Quebec as they may be in Toronto or Montreal. We have those differences in this country.

I think the movement now in terms of the division of powers allows for more flexibility and diversity to recognize the country as it is. I think that is a positive step.

Number six of the seven points I want to mention is the reform of Parliament, the House of Commons and the Senate. We have here a different arrangement than some of us would have preferred that was recommended in Beaudoin–Dobbie, but I think the arrangement we have is one that is going to work and one that is good for this country.

I can support an equal Senate with the powers that are now being prescribed for that particular Senate. I can support the guarantee that Quebec should have at least 25 per cent of the members of the House of Commons. That reflects the democratic weight of the province of Quebec.

I say to people like the member for Beaver River that it is not only Quebec that gets the guarantee of members in the House of Commons, but Prince Edward Island gets a guarantee of at least four seats in the House of Commons despite the fact that by representation by population it would get only about one seat in the House of Commons.

The same thing is true of New Brunswick which is guaranteed 10 seats in the House and the province of Nova Scotia which is guaranteed 10 seats in the House. New Brunswick now would not have 10 seats if we had pure representation by population. The territories would not have seats. Yukon only has about 28,000 people and the Northwest Territories has about 40,000 or 45,000 people. They are given guarantees of representation in the House of Commons. They are part of the tradeoffs that are good for Canada and make a national deal or national compromise possible.

At the same time we have a commitment that we will have a formula for distribution of seats that will be a greater reflection of representation by population. That will help British Columbia in the future, as well as the province of Alberta, which keeps growing, and the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. At the same time the small provinces are protected.

For example, Saskatchewan, my home province, has 3.8 per cent of the population of this country. In a joint vote of the House of Commons and the Senate, with six senators and fourteen members of Parliament, Saskatchewan will have 5 per cent of the members with 3.8 per cent of the population. That is not a bad deal for a small province.

[Translation]

Finally, I would like to touch on section 36 of our Constitution on equalization and regional development. The Charlottetown agreement will strengthen section 36, which will give more powers to the small provinces, provinces with economic problems. I am referring to the four Atlantic provinces, Manitoba and Saskatchewan. Thanks to the support of Messrs. Romanow and Filmon and the Premiers of the four Atlantic provinces, there is now a proposal to increase the powers conferred by section 36 of the Constitution regarding equalization and regional development. It is a way of distributing the wealth within this great country of ours, Canada.

[English]

Therefore, the accord reached by the first ministers and aboriginal and territorial leaders, and supported by the three national parties, is not a perfect deal. It is not possible to achieve perfection but it is the best deal we can get at this particular time.

I hope that when the Canadian people read the accord and understand the amendments to the Constitution they will support it in a national referendum.

We have to put this issue behind us and start dealing with the important social and economic issues facing this country today, such as free trade, NAFTA, the economy, jobs, the farm crisis and taxation.

If we get a nod of approval from the Canadian people on October 26 maybe we can then put this issue to bed and turn the collective energies, wisdoms and riches of this country toward solving the social and economic problems haunting this nation today.

If that does not happen, what is the alternative? More years of study on the Constitution? More consultation? The division of this country? Chaos? I ask the people of this country: What is the alternative?

In the province of Quebec there is a movement—the Parti Quebecois and the Bloc Quebecois—that wants to separate and divide this country. We say: "No, this country must remain one". We have a document here that can bring this country together.

I say also to the Reform Party of this country that I hope that Mr. Manning, after a couple of weeks of reflection, will put aside some of the rigid ideology he believes in, which is his right, and be on the right side of history and stand up with the rest of us in asking the people of this country to look very positively and favourably on the accord negotiated at Charlottetown.

As the minister said, it is a time to put aside intolerance and prejudice. It is a time to set aside suspicions in this country. It is a time to set aside divisions in this country.

It is the time to ask not what is in it for Saskatchewan, Newfoundland or Quebec, not what is in it for me or my family or my community, but what is in it for Canada. What is in it for Canada is the important question.

The time has come to hold out a hand to heal the divisions in this country and to build a nation.

[Translation]

The time has come to act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I should remind the House that, under the order passed earlier by this House, we are now beginning the period when all subsequent speakers will have a maximum of 15 minutes each and there will be no questions and comments afterwards.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I want to be very clear. By this I mean that the debate will deal with the Charlottetown agreement. We must therefore immediately get to the heart of the matter. The question is whether or not this agreement is acceptable. To know the answer, we must first clear the way and get rid of the smoke-screens behind which the government and its allies are trying to hide their agreement. They do not want the discussion to deal with the agreement. They want to have a debate on the apocalyptic vision of a choice Canadians would have between chaos, as we have just heard, and the agreement, or else on being on the side of responsible Canadians, as the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel was saying, or on the side of the others. We refuse to be confined to such alternatives.

In fact, the debate will not deal with sovereignty. Sovereignty will not be put on trial. We would have liked the debate to deal with sovereignty. As we are well aware, as long as the question of Quebec sovereignty has not been settled, no decision will have been made about this country. We have to deal with it. Until we have done so, it will always remain in the background and at the centre of our thoughts.

We have always wanted this debate. We have been demanding it for two years. We were able to get legislation passed in Quebec stating that the debate would address necessarily and legally the matter of sovereignty. However, since the federalists, namely this government and its allies including Mr. Bourassa, have decided that the referendum would not deal with sovereignty, the question asked will be on the agreement. Fine, let us reply to the question about the agreement.

There is another thing which should be cleared up. Canadians and Quebecers will not be motivated by fatigue or weariness in this referendum. They will be motivated by the need to decide whether or not the agreement is good for the future of their children.

It is quite strange, that Quebecers and Canadians should be asked to sign with their eyes closed. On this point, I must say that the government and its allies are right. You could only sign such an agreement with your eyes closed.

Recently, Canadians and Quebecers have been told: "You are tired; you are fed up with discussions. Why not sign now? The agreement is not very good and is not what you wanted, but why not sign and then everything will be settled." However such is not the case. Nothing will be settled. The situation will be more unsettled than ever before because the agreement establishes, not a constitutional system, but a system for negotiations. Canada and Quebec as well as all federal departments and provincial governments will be condemned to negotiate forever.

Hon. members may know that Jean Allaire, who is still a member of the Quebec Liberal Party, the architect of the Allaire report, the man who engineered the democratic adoption of this report by his own party, the Quebec Liberal Party, is now saying to the newspapers that he has found at least 60 contradictions, instances of weakness or matters for dispute in the agreement. In other words, there is some unfinished business. We are being given a package with all kinds of loose ends. There is still some unfinished business.

This is why the question is worded in such a way. This is why the question speaks about a basis for renewal, that is a basis for further negotiations. That is going to be the basis for further negotiations, for an attempt to deal with the many loose ends that remain. The worst part of all this, is that we are being asked to sign a blank cheque. We are being asked to continue to negotiate a number of essential and fundamental aspects which have not been finalized. They are saying: "Later we will negotiate whatever we please and then we will not have to ask you for permission to sign the agreement we want to sign." People will never agree to a blank cheque where their future is at stake.

What does the question really mean? It means: "Citizens of Canada and Quebec, do you trust Mr. Bourassa and Mr. Mulroney to decide what the future of your children will be?" We are being asked to trust them to negotiate, without knowing what the consequences will be. I referred to a draft, and it is a draft because we do not even have the legal text. When Canadians and Quebecers buy a fridge or a car or sign a lease, and when they are asked to sign a document involving sums of $1,000 or $500, for a period of one or two years for minor items, they always want to see the small print first.

Today we are talking about a contract that will be forever, firmly secured by all kinds of nuts and bolts. Today, we have a contract that will be decisive for our own future and that of our children and grandchildren. Today, Quebec's heritage based on nearly 400 years of sacrifice, effort and hard work is about to go down the drain, and they tell us: "You will not see the contract before it is signed. It is not ready. We are in a hurry. We cannot afford to wait. Sign right there, on the dotted line, and we will draft the contract later on. Trust us." That is the kind of question we have here.

It is immoral, undemocratic and totally irresponsible to even consider asking people to go through a democratic referendum process to adopt a constitution that has not even been drafted. There is not a single nation in the world that would agree to such a proposal, and certainly not the people of Canada and the people of Quebec.

Let them draft the Constitution and bring us the agreement so we can read it and know exactly what it contains. We do not want any of those press releases drafted by press secretaries after three days of talks in a smoke filled room. No, we want to see the small print. Where is the text of the contract? They say it is not ready. They say it will be ready after it has been signed. On October 26, the only thing that will be ready will be Quebec's signature and the signatures of those who want to sign, if the answer is yes. Then they will start writing the Constitution in reverse, starting at the bottom, just above the signature, like they do in Arabic. People will not buy that. Let these people do their homework, and otherwise we should appoint people who can do a better job.

The agreement is the main thing. The agreement is unacceptable. In Quebec, as the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel said earlier, everyone agreed there were two options: sovereignty or a thorough renewal of federalism. What we have to ask ourselves here is whether this agreement does, in fact, thoroughly renew federalism. In Quebec, the agreement must pass two tests. The first test is this: Do we find all the conditions in Meech in this agreement? The second question is: Are all the additional powers Quebec has been demanding for over 30 years reflected in the agreement? The answer is no in both cases. Any sovereignist or any federalist in Quebec who does not go along with the agreement will tell you, from what they have read of at the text, such as it is, that we must consider the intent of Meech Lake.

The Meech Lake accord was only a first step. It was about bringing Quebec back to the constitutional table, so that Quebec would have the right, after signing the Constitution, to get down to more pressing business. However, before embarking on this process Quebec set five conditions, saying: "I am not signing and I am not coming back to the negotiating table to discuss the important issues unless five conditions are met." You can look for those five conditions, but you won't find them. There are a few, but most of them are not there. Take Quebec's distinct identity. Nobody but nobody will convince me or anyone else who reads the draft agreement that the wording of the recognition of Quebec's distinct identity is the same one as Meech.

For example, read the legal opinion. I will spare you the details; we will pursue it when we have the time. My time is limited, but I could show it clearly if I had five minutes. Just read the legal opinion published last week in the Quebec press and signed by Quebec's eight greatest experts in constitutional law.

I hear insults from the other side. I hear insults. I would like those people to repeat those insults if they have the courage to do so.

These eight recognized experts from Quebec, people who have published textbooks, who teach in universities, who have taken part in all the legal debates in Quebec in the past ten years, signed a legal opinion saying that this distinct society clause is meaningless; it is even a setback from the status quo.

The same goes for immigration. The proposed constitution does not contain the immigration clause found in the Meech Lake accord or the veto right on the process to appoint judges. It is now 7/50 instead of unanimity. Neither is there a veto any more over the admission of new provinces. We could go on. Very clearly, Meech is not there. Therefore the first condition—never mind all the rest—has not been met. It is not just the first condition, but also the division of powers now, because they claim today to do in a single step the two steps that were planned when Meech was begun. Now they claim to settle Quebec's powers until the end of time.

We know the demands that have been made regarding Quebec's powers. It started with Jean Lesage. He has inspired all of Quebec for 30 years. Jean Lesage was a federalist, not a sovereigntist. He was not a wicked separatist or heretical. For 30 years Jean Lesage has inspired Quebec on the basis of being masters in our own house. The hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel, who is politically aware, recalled that himself. For 30 years, we in Quebec have been going on the slogan "masters in our own house". That means more economic powers and complete jurisdiction over culture, language and other fields. We do not find that here. Not a single one of them is here. On the contrary, every apparent gain for Quebec is always subject to administrative negotiations and is never guaranteed in the Constitution and in many cases we find the federal government invading fields where it does not belong.

Take manpower, for example. The federal government is granting itself two new constitutional powers that it did not have before. First is the power to spend on job creation programs, which it did not have before. It will be clearly and finally entrenched in the Constitution. There will be no more negotiations about it. Secondly, there is the power to set national objectives without even spending anything or having cost-shared programs. Those are two additional powers that the federal government is getting in a field where we in Quebec should have made a breakthrough, as everyone involved in the field agrees, especially in the employment forum, including Ghislain Dufour whom the member for Papineau—Saint-Michel quoted.

It is the same for culture. For the first time, the federal government grants itself power over Canadian culture in the Constitution. It never had that before. It will get it now.

Then they talk about the six powers, the six related jurisdictions, that the federal government is giving up. The federal government promises to sin no more, not to invade the areas of jurisdiction we already had: recreation, housing, the family, tourism, forestry and mining. We already had those powers in 1867. Georges-Étienne Cartier had negotiated and obtained them and the federal government has been sneaking into them for years. Now it tells us that it will not do that any more. What a gain, because in the same breath it tells us that for new programs it will invade these same fields and any others that exist by using the sacrosanct spending power. I think of the crocodile tears shed today by the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs, saying that the federal government abused the spending power. Come on. That is how the federal government has invaded every jurisdiction. That is how it has plunged Canada into bankruptcy: the total debt will soon be $500 billion.

I will speed up because you are indicating to me that my time is running out. If Quebec were to say yes, we will continue to negotiate, although Quebec will be sorry if it says yes. If Quebec says yes, it will send premiers to Ottawa to negotiate on their knees, with no clout, after having Quebec sign away its hopes and its strength. They will find themselves at the mercy of federal negotiators and federal mandarins. Is that what we want for Quebec's future? I say no.

Topping it all is the Senate where Quebec will count for as much as Prince Edward Island. My region is as big as two Prince Edward Islands. Proportionally to Prince Edward Island, my region would need 12 senators. In other words, 20 per cent of Senate seats would have to go to the Saguenay—Lac-Saint-Jean region. However they are those bad separatists. It would be awful, yet this is what is being proposed.

Then there are the Senate appointments. There will be 9 per cent of us in the Senate to approve the appointments. Do you think that there will be many French-speaking governors of the Bank of Canada, many deputy ministers, many important ambassadors, many CRTC or Canada Council appointees if the decisions are to be made by a Senate with 90 percent anglophones? I shall conclude quickly.

Then there is René Lévesque. People always talk about René Lévesque. I thought it was a mistake, because his name is always being brought up by federalists. René Lévesque wanted the Quebec charter to have precedence over the federal charter. He wanted Quebec to have exclusive power over linguistic matters. He wanted the existence of the Quebec people to be recognized. He wanted all powers over manpower and employment insurance. He wanted exclusive jurisdiction over marriage and divorce. He wanted the role of Quebec to be recognized internationally in its own areas of jurisdiction. René Lévesque wanted many things. Not one of them can be found in this agreement.

I shall conclude. The people of Quebec will not want to sell their approval cheaply. They do not want to give it away for mere crumbs. The people of Quebec will want to make certain that the vote is not held out of boredom, out of a wish to give up, out of weariness. Quebecers will not want such feelings to be the basis for the future of their country. Quebecers will never again sign any document if they cannot do so with enthusiasm and honour.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, next October 26 Canadians throughout Canada will be asked to vote on the agreement signed on August 28 by replying to a clear and specific question. They will thus have an opportunity to say whether or not they agree with the vision of the country proposed to them and whether or not they are willing to renew the compromise of 1867 in the context of a modern Canada.

For my part, I not only support this agreement, but I also mean to defend it, both in Quebec and in the rest of Canada. I shall therefore reply yes to the question.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): The vision of Canada proposed in this agreement remains realistic and open to a recognition of the interests and needs of all those party to it. In a way it is an effort to reconcile the interests and aspirations of Quebecers, aboriginal peoples and Canadians in the rest of Canada.

I am a member from Quebec representing a riding, that of Roberval, which thoroughly reflects, I believe, the realities of Quebec. If I may, I shall therefore speak first of all to my fellow Quebecers to explain why I feel that this agreement is good for Quebec and why they should support it on October 26.

All of us members from Quebec know how profoundly the failure of Meech hurt Quebecers, how deeply, whether or not we admit it, this was viewed as a rejection of Quebec by the rest of Canada. Since June 1990 Quebecers have been waiting for offers, for proposals reflecting a clear vision of a renewed federalism.

I would like to note in passing the courage of the Canadian Prime Minister who decided to begin again the process of renewal in spite of major difficulties, at a time when so many people were talking about a moratorium. I believe he knew that such a moratorium would only have made Quebecers more impatient and opened the door to the only other possible option, namely independence.

No prime minister would preside over the destruction of his own country. This is why, with the constant support of the members of his party, especially those from Quebec, who deserve a lot of credit because they have lived through difficult times, and the stead fast assistance of the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. The Prime Minister looked for a compromise, a compromise which we have now found and which proposes a choice based on a federation renewed in those areas it can live up to today, but without precluding the possibility that others might decide to go further tomorrow. Its components are brittle, but they meet the priorities of the various parties.

Reactivating the constitutional debate and broadening its scope to include a Canada Round necessarily implied in Quebec's case that the original conditions set by the Quebec government for entering into the 1982 constitutional accord. Distinct society, veto right, control over immigration, control over spending powers and the guarantee of three Quebec judges on the Supreme Court would have to be met.

The Charlottetown Accord, and I want to make this quite clear gives Quebec the five elements of Meech Lake in their entirety.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, we can put all kinds of interpretations on this. People can have all kinds of reservations, but the fact remains that in the present negotiations, Quebec has recovered every single one of those elements. For me, for many of my colleagues, and I imagine for many Quebecers, this has always been central to any new agreement. In fact the Government of Quebec decided to go even further, and that too was fundamental. The Charlottetown accord gives Quebecers a greater role in our central institutions by adding 18 members and a 25 per cent guarantee, meaning that in the future, Quebec will never have less than 25 per cent of the seats in the House of Commons. This guarantee provides Quebec with a long-term safeguard that should not be underestimated. As far as spending powers are concerned, Quebec has made major advances in 11 different sectors: manpower, culture, immigration, forestry, mining, tourism, housing, recreation, municipal and urban affairs, regional development and telecommunications. However, it seems that for some people that is not enough.

Quebec's society is among the most dynamic and most extraordinary we know. It is a society whose economic, social and cultural policies have made an exceptional contribution to its own development as well as to that of the federation in general. Thanks to the actions of responsible governments and the administrative agreements some people find so appalling, the past 30 years have witnessed outstanding achievements like the Caisse de dépôt and the Quebec Pension Plan.

Furthermore, by guaranteeing control over manpower training, immigration and education, the Charlottetown Accord gives the Quebec government control over the tools it needs to develop a comprehensive human resources policy that is indispensable to Quebec as a distinct society. As a result, Quebec would be even better equipped to protect its distinct identity than it was in the past. The province would also have new essential powers to develop existing resources.

Of course, this will never convince people who want to see this accord as a step backward for Quebec, as a surrender by the Premier of Quebec. To them, any excuse is a good excuse for perpetuating the myth that the Canadian federation is a strait-jacket that has always prevented Quebec from developing its potential and that the Charlottetown accord will merely consolidate that situation.

Every day, Quebecers can see what their quality of life is like within the Canadian federation. I am not interested and they are not interested in the option of leaving Canada without knowing where or why and, above all, without being promised any more than they have already.

I am deeply convinced that Quebecers will prefer our proposals because they offer a vision of a country with a future.

The agreement is far from perfect. As we said before, it is only the result of a compromise and it rests on a basic principle: the existence of a country called Canada. We can either admit this reality of a country called Canada or we can deny it.

We must recognize that this country where we are living today is the result of a wonderful compromise that, for 125 years, despite numerous hardships, frustrations and disagreements, has given us one of the best societies in the world.

[English]

Since entering politics I have been amazed by the tremendous potential of this country and its people. I have discovered the realities of Canada outside Quebec. I have discovered Canadians who love their country. I have discovered Canadians who are proud to be Canadian, but not denying their regional roots.

Canada is first and foremost a land of diversity. We cannot exist in this country without a compromise. We should celebrate the fact because Canada was born of compromise. On October 26 Canadians will have to make a decision if they are still prepared to recognize the diversity and if they are prepared to renew our founding compromise.

Quebecers have faced this choice and they have been disappointed twice in recent memory. In 1980 Quebecers gave Canada a vote of confidence but they did so on the basis of promises which for us have never been fulfilled. Again in 1987 the Quebec National Assembly was the first legislature to ratify the Meech Lake accord, expressing the desire of Quebecers to rejoin the Canadian Constitution. We all know what happened to Meech Lake.

It is the third time for Quebecers and more than ever we need to know that the rest of Canada can share this vision upon which a renewed federation can be built. Canada is a remarkable country that will only fulfil its promise to the extent that it can achieve a generous and open understanding between the francophone and anglophone and native components. The future of this country will be built on this understanding culturally, socially and economically.

We are at the frontier of great challenges which will show the world the stuff that we are made of, whether we are a people to succeed in taming a hostile environment and building a modern country or a people who have failed to reconcile their differences and ended in disintegration. We are entering a phase of globalization in which it is vital that we take our place. To get there we have to stop being entangled in endless debates about our future. The time has come to make a decision. It is time to get on with our future. That is the most pressing message Canadians are sending us.

On October 26 Canadians will be voting on much more than a dry legal text. They will have to affirm a renewed vision of this country, a vision that includes among other things a fundamental expression of the distinct nature of the French fact in Quebec and the right to self-government for the aboriginal people of Canada, our original founding people. We will have to say yes to the aspirations and contributions of people and regions which were not part of the original compromise, the north part of Canada and the west. All these people, particularly those from western Canada, who play such an important role in maintaining our prosperity and our future must find their aspirations reflected in this agreement and choose to vote for a renewed Canada.

[Translation]

My last words, will be for my fellow Quebecers. For 125 years the people of Quebec have emphasized their distinct identity within the Canadian federation as one of their most basic values.

They have been willing to face the risks, the constant frustrations, the often daunting challenges. They have exhausted themselves trying to explain what is so easy to understand: Quebec is a distinct society, proud of what is it and conscious of its particular role within the federation.

Quebecers have fought against isolation, against constant denunciation; they have made progress at the provincial and federal levels and have marked this country to the point where Canada would not be Canada without Quebec.

Are we going to give up this heritage just because Quebec did not get all it wanted? No.

I think a clear, unequivocal yes would allow us to get on with the future, conscious of our role and our importance. The experience gained will help us build a better Quebec within a renewed Canada.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I am very proud to be here with the hon. member for Roberval. Like him I am a Canadian. The question is now before us. The referendum of October 26 will ask all Canadians not only to exercise their democratic right, but also to reflect seriously on the future of our country. The text of the referendum question is simple: "Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992?" In my opinion this question contains nothing which could be controversial. For myself I would have preferred one word to be added, the word "political": "Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the political agreement reached on August 28, 1992?"

Let me explain. This political agreement is something new; it opens up new avenues for our country, new avenues which will lead to a Canadian agreement through public consultation. It represents a series of compromises, as pointed out by the hon. member for Roberval, of national compromises between the various parties involved, including national, regional, cultural, English speaking, French speaking and aboriginal communities, between the propronents of centralisation and those of decentralisation. They all participated actively in the development of this agreement. The governments will therefore have to respect their commitments and not spare any efforts to improve the social, cultural and economic conditions of Canadians.

[English]

Following the demise of the Meech Lake accord on June 25, 1990, an accord which I supported, it was widely believed that public resistance to the accord was, for the most part, a result of the perceived absence of public influence and input toward the conclusion of this Meech Lake accord. The executive federalism approach, in other words discussion reserved to federal and provincial ministers, was rejected as the only process to amend our Constitution. In order to avoid future failures, increased public participation had to be achieved. Co-operative federalism, if I may use that word, may be becoming the order of the day.

• (1800)

As the member of Parliament for Ottawa—Vanier, concerned with the views of my electors, I rejoice in this development.

The national referendum on October 26 will be our first test of formally involving all Canadians in the process of amending our Constitution. To paraphrase my leader, we are giving the Constitution back to the people.

I want to join with the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition, the Leader of the New Democratic Party and my fellow parliamentarians in congratulating all those who contributed to the consensus report on the Constitution. I do not forget my good friend the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs. I say to my friend: "Thank you very much. It is much appreciated".

I acknowledge the important contributions made by several provincial committees on constitutional matters and federal committees that sat many days and months here in the House. Native people, territorial authorities and many organizations representing varied interests also reported to their respective authorities after due consultation with their members. In other words, public dialogue and wide participation in the process was encouraged. This increased public involvement in the constitutional process will culminate, I hope, in our first national referendum on amending our Constitution. I hope and pray that it will be in the affirmative.

[Translation]

In a federation such as ours, we have to respect both levels of government. We should also perhaps tell political and aboriginal leaders from all government orders that they have made a political commitment to respect these constitutional rights.

Thanks to the public consultation process I mentioned earlier, we shall be able to acknowledge and to put before the public the difficulties faced by certain groups in achieving self-fulfilment in our federation. I am thinking, for instance, of the aboriginal peoples, who have long been neglected and who will now become partners in the renewal of our federation. I am also including the official language minority communities, the cultural communities, women and so on. They have all had an opportunity to express their views and to voice their concerns. I congratulate all of them for their participation which will do much to create a better life for all Canadians.

I had no hesitation when the agreement was signed, or at least made public, in writing immediately to all Premiers congratulating them on the consensus reached, on their good understanding of the issues involved and on their excellent contribution to the collective search for solutions acceptable to all Canadians. Sometimes, we have to recognize the work of politicians. Admittedly, this is a political agreement which is not worded in legal terms yet, but which still provides a solid basis for legal wording to reflect the agreements reached.

This long and difficult process will be ratified through a referendum on October 26. Since Confederation there have been only two consultative referendums in Canada. The first in 1898 was on the consumption of alcohol, or what was called prohibition, and the second in 1942 on conscription. This most recent experience, that of 1942, left a bitter taste in the mouths of Canadians. We must avoid such a negative effect this time.

This agreement will allow Quebec to take part in the renewal of our Constitution. The serious problems caused by the failure of Meech showed the need for Canada to vote on the 1992 proposals, including the special status of Quebec and the Canadian linguistic duality.

It is also important to provide popular support for the constitutional amendments, which popular support the governments, both provincial and federal, will have to see as a political will, a clear expression of the desire to recognize certain constitutional rights.

The lack of political will shown by provincial governments in implementing the legal and educational rights recognized in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms is unacceptable.

It is unbelievable that, ten years after adopting section 23 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms in this country in 1982 and considering court decisions, the latest of which is the Supreme Court decision in the Mahé case, the right to manage school business in the language of the minority has not yet been granted in some provinces, namely Alberta, Newfoundland, Labrador, Northwest Territories, British Columbia, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Ontario.

It is unbelievable that 10 years after adopting a constitutional right, the political will to allow linguistic minorities, to let them manage their own educational institutions is still not there. It is unbelievable that following the adoption of section 11 of the Official Languages Act, 1969, section 19 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, 1982, and section 15 of the Official Languages Act, 1988, French speaking defendants still have a hard time getting to be heard by a judge who speaks their language in several provinces, namely Newfoundland, Alberta and British Columbia. We have this in 1992, ten years after the adoption of the Constitution.

This needs to be said. In my view, from now on, the people will dictate their governments a political commitment, a clear and precise direction, which in turn may give them the political will to put in place the systems and services our minorities are entitled to.

I recognize that major progress has been accomplished, but much more remains to be done to facilitate access to criminal courts in French: identification of French-speaking juries, information provided to French-speaking defendants regarding their right to services in their own language, language training for judges and court staff. This right does exist. It is set out right there in our Constitution. However, the political will, in terms of means of access, is horribly lacking.

In the devolution of powers to the provinces—we are familiar with them; there is no need for me to list them all again. There are at least six of them: mining, tourism, et cetera. It should be remembered that in some areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction there is an important factor in favour of national unity, and that is the need to respect institutional bilingualism. In other words it is the obligation of every level of government to provide the people of Canada public services in both official languages of this country. The level of services shall not go down after intergovernmental agreements provided for in the Charlottetown agreement are entered into. The provinces must be committed to providing services in both official languages of the country. It sounds reasonable to me to expect, in the case of provinces interested in taking over training and manpower development, that the agreements foster respect for institutional bilingualism throughout the country. Regional development, tourism, forestry and mining are all areas where continued respect for both official languages must be fostered. Institutional bilingualism should not be abandoned because of political pressures exerted at the time of transferring certain federal powers to the provinces.

Other linguistic issues will also call for careful consideration. For instance, how to identify a French speaking senator for the purpose of the double majority? It might be a good idea to give it some thought. Will a seat be set aside for the francophone representatives when senators are elected or appointed? Will provinces with a predominantly English speaking population be so gracious as to nominate a francophone? In the final version of the legal text of the Canada clause shall commitment be translated by attachement? Are we going to start squabbling over translations? We did not in 1982. I do not see that we should in 1992.

As far as I am concerned, all we have to do is to read over again section 23 of the Charter. In French it says "établissement d'enseignement", while in English it reads "educational facilities". We did not squabble on that. We just took the text as such, because section 57 of the Charter states that: "The English and French versions of this act are equally authoritative".

The ultimate goal of constitutional reform is to allow Canadians to share a dream in a land inhabited by citizens who are proud to be Canadians.

[English]

The current constitutional process will not end with a referendum. It is important that we take steps to ensure the process ends successfully.

It is all very well to ask Canadians to support the consensus report and it is all very well to have a popular expression of support or non-support, but politicians will be bound, morally at least, by the results of this referendum. I must tell them that we must recognize once the people of this country have spoken on this subject matter, they must follow the direction set by the popular vote. They must follow what people have said must be done. There must be a political will to act which we must respect. This country must be built on generosity, must be built on understanding and must be built on the things that we stand for. They are justice and equality.

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first allow me to state that I deem it a distinct pleasure to take part in this very historic debate in this place.

As Canada's Minister of Veterans Affairs I have the privilege of dealing each and every day with the veterans of Canada and their families. No one knows better than our veterans the value of a free, prosperous and united Canada. Veterans know all too well the price of preserving our nation and the awful consequences of allowing our unity to be broken.

Each day that I meet with them they remind me that they fought so hard and sacrificed so much for our Canada. As they answered the call with unfailing loyalty and determination, so now they set the same high standard for this generation to preserve the nation and to keep united that which was forged with the bonds of blood and sweat in times of conflict.

The Royal Canadian Legion was one of the first national organizations to form and finance its own national unity campaign, much to its credit.

[Translation]

Veterans risked all they had for Canada. Now, they are asking us to take a risk. It is a heavy responsibility that I take seriously.

[English]

Canada is so vast geographically and so diverse in its peoples it is impossible to impose upon her one narrowly defined vision about how we define ourselves as a country. We are composed of many visions, visions that incorporate social justice, economic vibrancy, individual freedom and collective responsibility.

The compromise that was reached in Charlottetown enables all of these visions to flourish. This is the Canadian way, to compromise and to find solutions amidst an array of seemingly insurmountable obstacles.

I believe all Canadians are united in the hope that we can resolve this issue and move on. Our nation pays a heavy price when the threat of separation hangs constantly over our heads. It erodes investor confidence, draws our attention from other problems and saps our goodwill.

Now is the time to stop the bickering and get on with the building. It is time to turn from the disappointments of the past to the exciting promise of the future. With this in mind, I would like to convey my congratulations to all of the participants in the Canada round for a job well done. No one doubts the enormity of the task they faced. The remarkable consensus they have achieved is a testament to the sincerity and goodwill of all of those who took part in that long and arduous discussion.

The result of a process so gruelling and extensive is never perfect, but it is truly remarkable how many advances have been made in the true Canadian spirit of common sense and honourable compromise.

As a representative of Atlantic Canada in the federal cabinet I would like to highlight some of the aspects of this agreement which might be of special interest to citizens back home in Atlantic Canada. However, before I do so I want to emphasize our love for and our commitment to this nation.

Atlantic Canadians are Canadians first and last, and we rejoice in any agreement that strengthens our Canada. We do not expect or request special treatment and hopefully we will not be dissecting this agreement to look for major winners and major losers. An agreement to preserve this great nation makes winners out of all of us. I suspect that most Atlantic Canadians will say without hesitation that what is good for Canada is good for Atlantic Canada.

Were this country to separate into something smaller no one would feel the isolation and the loss more keenly than the Atlantic region. I know that in this hour of decision Canada can count on us to stand by her.

That said, there is much in this agreement that will be very encouraging to Atlantic Canadians.

First, we have the preservation of the federal government's ability to act decisively in the national interest, to introduce new programs where needed, and to maintain our national standards. There are strengthened provisions for national cost shared programs, allowing more stability and predictability in areas of shared jurisdiction.

Thus Atlantic Canadians are assured of a continued strong federal presence to ensure that we receive a fair share of Confederation's benefits and largess.

However, at the same time, this agreement allows for a new degree of flexibility with more room for made-in-Atlantic Canada solutions. The success of ACOA, the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, has shown Canada has little to fear and much to gain from improved regional responsiveness and greater sensitivity of government initiatives to the areas they seek to serve. Giving our regions room to stand on their own where needed will benefit all of Canada.

Second, the Charlottetown agreement emphasizes again and again our commitment to equality: the equality of women and men, of races, of ethnic groups and the equality of provincial communities. Our diversity is acknowledged and celebrated for what it is, and that is one of Canada's great strengths.

This commitment to equality is more than mere rhetoric. Through concrete entrenchment of the government's commitment to equalization and to the provision of regional development assistance Atlantic Canada is seeing equality of opportunity fully entrenched in our Constitution for the first time.

It is quite unprecedented and is a very major step forward in strengthening the ties of our region to the nation.

[Translation]

As for the Acadians who fought bravely and proudly to gain recognition as equal partners in New Brunswick, they should be doubly happy. First, they know better than anyone how tragic it would be to split this beautiful country of ours and, second, the recognition now afforded to the equality of their rights is stronger than ever before.

[English]

Third, Atlantic Canadians can celebrate because this commitment to equality has found new expression in a strong voice for our region in Canada's national affairs. The Charlottetown accord acknowledges the principle of provincial equality as a fundamental characteristic of Canada.

Atlantic Canada will hold nearly 40 per cent of the seats in the new Senate. This provides opportunities to ensure that our needs, our concerns and our aspirations are understood and addressed in Parliament.

Finally, all Canadians will benefit from the strengthened economic union, and some lowered interprovincial trade barriers, which will allow our country to move ahead to face the challenge of global competition through quality education, improved competitiveness and strengthened partnerships among all Canadians.

This agreement does justice to many submissions that Atlantic Canadians, many of them, made throughout the extensive public consultative process. This indeed has been the Canada round and the result is an agreement that typifies all that is so great about Canada.

• (1820)

This has been a very busy and moving year for me as Minister of Veterans Affairs. We have just observed the 50th anniversary of the Dieppe raid and before that the 75th anniversary of our astounding victory at Vimy.

The men and women who gave up so much and did so much for Canada did not feel their sacrifice in vain for so great a cause.

[Translation]

The French people we have encountered during our visits had no doubt about the role of Canada, neither in the past nor in the future.

[English]

I will only say I wish all hon. members and all Canadians could have joined us on this year's pilgrimages. To stand at the Vimy monument beside 93 year old veterans, some in wheelchairs, many bearing the physical scars of that battle, to gaze at the beaches of Dieppe and remember how many young Canadians gave everything in the cause in freedom caused one to acquire an overwhelming sense of perspective.

It is tremendously humbling to look at row upon row of headstones and be reminded of the heavy prices paid for so many of the things we all tend to take for granted.

At the same time there is an exhilaration in the knowledge that to be Canadian is to be part of something greater than ourselves, something historic, something noble and courageous, something very special, something worth fighting for, something worth even dying for.

Thankfully our history is not one of civil war or bloodshed or brother fighting brother. Events around the world remind us of how fortunate we are in this case, how we have built this history through openness of mind, through generosity of spirit, through broadness of vision and above all by trying to understand and accommodate the views of others which may differ from our own.

We must resist the efforts of those who would make our vision, our nation and thus ourselves something narrower, something smaller, something less.

In the next few weeks all Canadians will be asked to keep faith of those who went before. Thankfully the sacrifice of those who went before means the test of this generation will come at the ballot boxes and not on foreign battle fields. That happy fact does not make this test any less important, however, nor does it diminish the tragedy if it were to fail.

I am reminded of the charge of Sir John A. Macdonald who stated: "Whatever you do, adhere to the union. We are a great country and shall become one of the greatest in the universe if we preserve it. We shall sink into insignificance and adversity if we suffer it to be broken".

The torch is now passed to us. I urge all Canadians to give sincere consideration to this agreement and pray they will stand by me in giving a resounding yes to Canada's bright future. God bless Canada.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to consider the consequences of the historic choice Canadians will be asked to make on October 26. In fact, in public life, the greatest responsibility one has is making decisions that will affect the future of the country at a decisive stage in its history.

The constitutional talks which have kept Canadians busy for the past two years go to the very heart of certain problems that are starting to become critical in the rest of the world: how to reconcile different language groups, how to reconcile five strong regions whose geography, attributes and ambitions differ widely, and how to make people who come from all corners of the globe live together in harmony.

These are some of the major problems confronting the rest of the world—in Europe today, in America tomorrow. Here in Canada we have a chance to finish these discussions well before anyone else. We can do that because we have a federal system, we know how it works and we know how to make it work. In the world today there is a rapidly developing trend towards federalism. Sovereignists must realize Canada represents the future. Why in heaven's name should we regress?

The referendum question before the House today deals with the most profound constitutional change undertaken the birth of Confederation. This renewal of our federation is in line with a tradition of great historical compromises that made it possible for Canada to become a nation, to develop and to be respected and envied by all the peoples of this earth.

All in all, the proposal reinforces Canada. For aboriginal people, it means the recognition of their inherent right to self-government, by which Canada recognizes its true history. For Quebec, it means recognition of its distinct society and its ability to protect and promote that society. Quebec's distinct identity is a fundamental characteristic of Canada's personality. For western Canada it means a stronger voice within our central institutions in order to better promote its vital interests. For the Atlantic provinces this accord guarantees a central power that can sustain the fundamental social and economic programs that will help them reach their full potential.

Furthermore, this agreement creates a framework for a more cohesive relationship between the regions and the centre. In the world today, where ultimate decision making is increasingly shifting to the international level, greater internal cohesiveness will strengthen Canada's position internationally.

A number of people have expressed disagreement, concern or disappointment with parts of this agreement. That is not unusual because of its scope and consequences, the accord is not a perfect one. Personally, I am disappointed no significant agreement was reached on establishing a genuine economic union within our borders. At a time when we are seeing the globalization of markets and economic borders are coming down throughout the world, it does not make sense to maintain domestic economic barriers. However, despite these flaws, generally speaking this historic accord leaves us with only two options: Live with the benefits of an honourable compromise or take a gamble on an uncertain future. We have to accept the fact that the new Constitution will not be the answer to all our problems. There will always be the kind of political bickering and differences that cannot be regulated away. However, these are problems that have to be solved through discussion, mutual understanding and a willingness to compromise. We cannot afford to get into a constitutional strait-jacket that would keep us in a state of perpetual crisis and rob us of the flexibility we need in a changing world. A constitution is merely a framework for the future development of the country. It should only provide certain sign posts along the road to unity, prosperity and the ideals we all cherish.

Each and every one of us must realize that we must put an end to this national paralysis and we must do it now.

• (1830)

We must complete this necessary political revolution before we can tackle the urgently needed economic and social revolution whose success is the key to real national unity.

Let us face it: if we reject this new constitutional agreement we will be forced to undertake a political and economic revolution at the same time. We would then fail at the latter because it is impossible to conduct two revolutions at the same time.

No Canadian will find in the agreement everything he or she would have liked to see in a new Constitution but Canada will certainly find the framework and the model it needs to face the challenges of the next millennium.

I myself share this vision and it is for this reason that I will support this new constitutional agreement.

[English]

In the next month and a half Canadians will be asked to decide whether we remain united or whether we begin the debilitating march to fracture. Achieving consensus in a country with so much geography and so few inhabitants with different conceptions of its beginnings, parts of its economy pulled toward the Asia-Pacific, another part to the new Europe, part of the nation philosophically committed to individual rights, another part to the rights of the collectivity, achieving consensus in a nation such as this is not easy.

To reject the Charlottetown accord is to affirm with certainty that one can achieve better, and at this time I do not believe that to be the case. I will for these reasons support the proposal.

However, that being said, let no one think that the mere rearranging of our legal structure will in itself heal the wounds in the nation. The deep sense of alienation, of historic injustice in many parts of the country, the destruction of the nation's industrial and agricultural base, the poverty among our aboriginal peoples mean that once the Constitution is resolved, the real task of nation building begins.

Our future does not only hinge on resolving the age-old obsession of how the two senior levels of government in this country, federal and provincial, relate to each other. Increasingly it hinges on answering an even more basic question of how any level of government in this country relates to the people it is supposed to serve.

For instance, how do we ensure equality of education that is internationally competitive? How do we reduce the crushing burden of taxation inflicted upon Canadians? How do we stem the rising tide of racism, of violence against women which is afflicting the nation? These are the questions we ought to be asking in the current national debate. These are the questions that concern Canadians.

It is because this House is not answering them satisfactorily that some of our fellow citizens are prepared to put their country into play. The crisis in national unity and the failure to face up to the problems of the nation are not unrelated.

We must debate the Constitution, but if that is all we do, then we will be negotiating a legal reform which mirrors a country in decay. We risk becoming a nation in which hearts and minds have fled to other places. We risk becoming a nation in which illiteracy becomes our legacy and in which apathy becomes our patrimony.

The problem of national unity is not going to be solved by debating the nation we were. It is going to be solved by determining the nation we must become. Why? It is because at the end of the day a country lives in the hearts and minds of its people, not in the paper and parchment of its Constitution.

I believe with all my heart that Canadians must look outward to a world beyond our borders. When our fellow countrymen and women are presented with a vision of what this land can be, when they can see a nation facing up to the fundamental challenges before it, then and only then will the long night of our national soul-searching be over.

For instance, while our federal and provincial governments argue over political sovereignty as between themselves, the world's major trading nations are undergoing a fundamental transition in which the notion of economic sovereignty will be redefined forever. The principle that countries can interfere directly into the economic lives of others has gone far beyond the traditional bounds of trade disputes. The United States and Germany lecture each other on monetary policy. The United States seeks to change the internal distribution system of Japan. Japan revolutionizes American manufacturing methods.

The consequences of world-wide interdependence have attained a level few would have thought possible a short time ago. This revolution will have a far greater impact on whether or not our children prosper than will any debate over the commas in the Constitution.

What does this mean? First it means those who seek the independence of Quebec are living in a world that no longer exists. It also means those of us who would build a country rather than ripping it asunder, the actions we take or that we fail to take in the next few months will determine whether we begin the great advance toward progress or whether we begin a long period of decline.

Make no mistake, Canadians are equal to any challenge a government chooses to set before them. There is nothing as a nation we cannot do if we put our minds to it. Our history is one of great achievement against great odds but we have only accomplished these things when our objectives were manifest and our sights high.

Thus I would say in conclusion that today and for the month and a half to come our task is very clear. We must answer those who say that our greatest days are behind us, that all of our history has been written. We must demonstrate as a people that we have not run out of steam, run out of ideas or run out of conviction.

I support the Charlottetown accord, but we in this House owe the Canadian people much more than that. We owe them a vision of a country prepared to triumph culturally, socially, economically, environmentally and in every field of human endeavour. Why? Therein lies the only lasting solution to the crisis of national unity.

[Translation]

National unity is not an end in itself. It is the natural consequence of a country that knows where it is going and how to get there, not by accident but because it wants to. We must stop fighting among ourselves and become once again a country united behind a great goal: to become the best of the best.

The time has come to unite all Canadians from coast to coast, to regain control of this country and make it move forward. After this referendum I hope Canadians, including the people of La Salle and Montreal I am so proud to represent, will be able to tell themselves they would not live anywhere but in Canada because only in this country can such big dreams come true. This is the vision we must promote. This is the motivation that should guide us, the proposed society we should all support.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, allow me to first make a digression and congratulate the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard for the content of his speech to which I listened in my office as well as here in the House. I also want to tell him that his personal contribution to the debate on national unity was appreciated. I want to say this to the hon. member because today, during Oral Question Period I was harsh with him. Occasionally, we think about things we said and we wonder if we could have said them in a different way. This is one of those days. In any case I will stop here because I do not want to impose on your patience. What is important today for me is to rise in this House to participate in the debate on the future of Quebec and Canada.

Today I want to express myself as a citizen, as the member representing the riding of Sherbrooke, Lennoxville and Fleurimont, and as minister of the environment. Indeed the fact that I was elected by my constituents gives me the privilege to also be a minister in the federal government.

First, I would like to make a comment on the tone of the debate. I must tell you frankly that at times I am concerned. I believe we must be honest and tell those around us that nobody has a monopoly on truth in a debate such as the one that is being launched today. Also I must admit with some regret that there are days when our discussions are at a low level. I dare make this comment because I sensed in the last few days that people primarily want us to talk to them in an intelligent and honest manner; and they also want us to treat them with respect.

I must admit to sometimes making remarks that are not as objective as they should be, but I think we should all make an effort in the coming weeks to preserve these three elements, namely intelligence, honesty and respect for our fellow citizens.

We must remember that after October 26 comes October 27, followed by October 28 and so on, and that whatever the outcome of the current debate we will have to continue living together. It is in this spirit that I am entering today's debate.

A few seconds ago I said I was very happy to rise today as the member representing the people of Sherbrooke—Lennoxville—Fleurimont who have put their trust in me. Today's context is very different from that of 1980. I think it is a fact worth mentioning. We must remind our fellow citizens that the debate on our future is not the same today as it was 12 years ago.

Let us go quickly over the new developments without going into detail: in the last few years the communist system has collapsed in much of the world; tremendous progress has been made on the political and social front; Europe 92 is taking shape; various economic, social and political alliances are being forged all over the globe. Today's world is very different from that of 1980.

Our personal lives on a daily basis have also changed a great deal. When I got elected in 1984 we did not have cellular phones, fax machines or computers like we have today. In a few short years our personal and work lives have changed dramatically. We must remember this because as the circumstances of the debate have changed so have our options and the way they are presented.

What I have learned in the meantime is that Canada is a privileged country and I do not think anybody can deny it. You can say what you want; everybody knows that we live in the country with the highest standard of living in the world. We have this standard of living for several reasons. Our country is rich in natural resources and very rich in geography but relatively poor in population, however. The reason we have such a high standard of living is that our forebears, our ancestors, the pioneers of this country, worked very hard to build it.

I am thinking of seniors, for example. In my riding, I am always amazed every time I meet them and ask them how many children they have. They tell me eight, nine or ten. I have three children at home and that is a big family. When I meet people of my generation who ask me how many children I have and I tell them three, they say that is a large family.

Some people have made absolutely tremendous sacrifices. There were two great world wars in the century that is now ending. We forget because our memory does not extend that far back, but the First World War decimated a whole generation of young Canadians at that time. They are people who paid dearly to build our country, and that must be recognized.

Furthermore, we enjoy a privileged position internationally. We are a bicultural, bilingual country.

We are a North American country that has signed a free trade agreement with the United States and is now proposing one that will include Mexico. In addition, our country plays a leading role in the Commonwealth and the Francophonie and we are a member of the Organization of American States. One does not have to travel much outside of Canada to realize how appreciated Canada and Canadians are. Those who have trouble believing that need only take a trip. They do not have to go far. They can go just a little outside their country to realize how much Canada and Canadians are appreciated throughout the world. There is a reason for that. This is because we have a society based and built on democracy and freedom and because Canadians have created a country founded on tolerance which also provides one of the highest standards of living in the world. We have been well served by our federal system.

It is a very sensible political system even more so today than in the past. Why? The answer can be found in one word, the word global. This word seems to come up whenever people try to define a situation or a problem. It seems to me that we always hear words such as global, globally or globality in such cases. We now hear about the global economy, global communications, the global environment. This is because the 1992 reality, unlike, or perhaps even more so than the reality of 1980, is that we depend a lot on other people. The situation is quite different from what it was in 1980. More than ever, our future is defined and determined globally. A federal system has the advantage of coinciding with this trend.

It is important to remember, in deciding what our future and that of our children will be, that relationships between states, governments and individuals will be just as important and determining for our future as the decisions made individually by the various states, governments and individuals. This is even more true today than ever before. We must therefore establish, develop and maintain close relations with those around us, which is why the word global is now heard so often in all our major debates. Such is the reality in 1992. This unavoidable reality will definitely influence the future of Quebec and Canada.

What about Canada? This country, which has been so successful, has institutions which are already 125 years old. This year we are celebrating the 125th anniversary of what we call Confederation. To show the state of our institutions I would like to use a simple analogy. It is somewhat like a solid 125-year old house in need of some repairs. Certain rooms are too big, others are too small, the roof might be leaking in certain spots or certain things might need to be changed. My colleague is anticipating my words. He can guess what I am going to say. Some people, faced with a solid 125-year old house, will say: "pull it down; it is not good enough." Others will want to move elsewhere. Others still will want to renovate. Others, and this is a new idea that seems to be surfacing today, will say: "Why not wait a while? There is no need to do anything yet. Let us wait a few months or years and then we will see."

I must say that faced with this magnificent old house which has been so successful and has served its purpose so well, my own choice is quite clear. I prefer to renovate, to make a few rooms bigger or smaller, to change the heating system. My colleague for La-Salle—Émard would be the first to make this house as environmentally efficient as possible. This is what the agreement before us proposes. In all honesty we have to recognize this. There has been a lot of talk about the agreement. I have heard many statements, and I must say that I have found some of them surprising.

What this agreement contains, without the shadow of a doubt, is what was proposed in the Meech Lake accord. Some people will say that the words are not the same, that this sentence, this phrase, this comma should be changed, that it is not good enough. It must honestly be said that this agreement contains all proposals made in the Meech Lake accord. What would that be? It is Quebec's recognition as a distinct society, a definition which is not restrictive. It is more powers in the field of immigration. It is the veto, the nomination of three judges from Quebec at the Supreme Court, which is constitutionalized and which gives Quebec a 33 per cent representation in a context where the courts will become more and more important in taking fundamental decisions because the charter is there. Therefore, we can say that as there is a change in the powers of our institutions, Quebec is guaranteed a presence equivalent to more than one-third in a federal institution. The federal spending power was also provided for in the Meech Lake accord, and it is part of this agreement. More so, some will say that this is status quo, that there is nothing new, and even that it is a setback.

Let me say you briefly, because it is important, that the agreement contains new powers for Quebec. There is a guaranteed minimum of 25 per cent of the seats in the House of commons. Nobody can say this is a minus, a loss. It is a permanent guarantee when we know perfectly well that the growth rate of the Quebec population is low compared to other parts of the country and the world. This is a very important point, but there is more. There are substantial gains in the area of manpower. Unemployment insurance was mentioned today. The hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean said that Mr. Lévesque requested unemployment insurance. I am not sure of that. As a member I witnessed my first conference of first ministers in 1985 when Mr. Lévesque was in attendance. Do you know what was the main success of this federal-provincial conference of 1985? The creation of the jobs strategy program by the present federal government. That was the great success in which Mr. Lévesque, premier of Quebec, participated.

There are additional powers in the area of culture, manpower development and training, which I already mentioned. The power of disallowance has been eliminated; the declaratory power has been restricted. Then there are the telecommunications which could not be envisaged when our Constitution was drafted 125 years ago. Who could guess then what was going to happen? This is the kind of change we anticipate in this agreement. In the area of regional development, Quebec gets additional powers. The federal spending power is restricted. All that is on top of what I was mentioning at the beginning of my remarks. We do not live in isolation, that era is over.

This is more or less the trap in which independence supporters in Quebec are caught today. They are living in the wrong century. We are no longer living in a world where sovereignty was defined only by a territory, a king, a queen and their army. That era belong to the past. We have to keep up with the times, and federalism is today's system.

It must be noted that there are other issues in this round that were not a factor in the Meech Lake accord, and it is important to recognize them. I am thinking, among other things, of the demands made by western Canada and by aboriginal peoples. When you live in a world where people are so dependent on each other, you cannot forget about the others. You have to consider their needs. For a long time, the constitutional debate in Canada was based on the relationships between French and English Canadians, from the Laurendeau-Dunton report to the Meech Lake accord. We must also recognize that the problems of the aboriginal peoples were just as serious 30 or 40 years ago as they are today. The difference is that they were not taken into consideration in the debate. They were avoided. Our relationships were defined differently.

To be honest, today we have to recognize that they have serious problems, that they too have the right to have a place in our country. I regret that some people would lead Canadians to believe that by inviting aboriginal peoples to participate we are taking away somebody else's place. Just as if somebody else was losing their place because we are making room at the table for people who were excluded for a very long time. That is not true. I for one do not want to live in a society where people are excluded in that fashion. Let me be honest with you. I think people are right to say that it will be a difficult debate for the next 10 to 15 years. Why? Aboriginal peoples will want to take their place, to assert themselves. Obviously they are going through a period of self-assertion that other groups have gone through, but they have to do it in order to take charge of their future and to define their place in the world. They too have the right to do so, and it is not an easy debate.

Yes, I sympathize with Quebecers who had a pretty hard time a few years ago. I know, because people are still talking about it. In spite of that experience no one wants to deny aboriginal people the right to take their rightful place in this world. Why should this suddenly stand in the way of a constitutional agreement? Why should the present agreement be rejected because they also want to live their lives in a way that is satisfactory to them?

Similarly western Canada has always felt alienated and far removed from the central government. Basically we are proposing changes that would increase their involvement.

I would like to say a few words about certain myths around this accord. The first one concerns language. Attempts are being made in certain circles to arouse people's concerns that the agreement would jeopardize the Quebec government's authority over language.

The notwithstanding clause, served its purpose in 1988, whatever people may think. I am not going to make any kind of value judgment because this is strictly the business of the Quebec government, but the question is whether the powers of the government and the National Assembly of Quebec with respect to language are protected. The answer is yes.

An hon. member: Yes.

Mr. Charest: Yes, in no uncertain terms. We can discuss the finer points later on. In Quebec the debate will continue on individual and collective rights but the answer is yes.

Does a yes for the accord mean no further discussion is possible? Does it mean that from now on, this is it? Of course not. It is pretty obvious that voting for the agreement will not eliminate all our problems. I will get back to that in my conclusions.

I see that my time is running out, but with your leave and with the unanimous consent of the House, I would like to take a few more minutes to finish my comments.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Charest: Thank you. I will go quickly; I do not want to cheat on the time.

When we say yes to what we are offering Quebec, we are not closing the door to change forever. Obviously in this world of continual change we will want to make adjustments at some point. Besides, that is the advantage of the federal system of government.

On the other hand let me put it another way. Can anyone guarantee that a yes vote will mean the end of all debate?

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Charest: I cannot give that assurance. No one can. However, if you vote no I can guarantee you one thing: the debate will go on for a long time and with greater intensity. Just project into the future. If Quebec independence were proposed, imagine how long and intense the debate about that would be.

I am rather puzzled by those who argue that we must not vote yes because we will go on discussing for a long time and have endless debates, when these same people know very well that a no vote ensures interminable debate, not just for months but for years when the people have had enough of it. They know very well that we have been through it and that they have been offered an honest political agreement today.

Incidentally, we must not be naive in this debate. We must know that those who will vote no, who try to defend their option while at the same time pretending they do not share the same views will have a hard time making us believe that it is indeed the case.

There can be no Immaculate Conception in this political debate and they cannot create a no without sleeping together.

An hon. member: There will be marriages.

Mr. Charest: There will be marriages at that level and I think we must take an honest look at this. Similarly the independentists must also be honest.

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. How much more time do you intend to give to the minister, because there are other very interesting members who would like to participate in this debate? I wonder how much more time you will give to the minister.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. member heard the minister ask permission, and he got that permission, to carry on for what will surely be a very limited time. I am sure that the minister is about to conclude.

I ask the hon. member to bear with me for a few more minutes. The hon. minister has the floor.

• (1900)

Mr. Charest: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It is a coincidence that the hon. member for Longueuil is with us. I was just talking about the contradictions of those who are proposing independence, and that concerns him directly. We have to be honest.

No agreement on a renewed federalism will ever satisfy Jacques Parizeau, Jacques Brassard, Gérald Larose—

An hon. member: Lucien Bouchard.

Mr. Charest: Or Lucien Bouchard. No agreement will satisfy them. If there is, they should stand up and tell us. The hon. member for Longueuil will have a chance to speak. Maybe the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie will rise to tell us what form of renewed federalism his party prefers. I would really like to hear that from him. I say this just to show you that their option is not sound. All we know about their proposal is that, for them, Quebec's independence means that they would have the same rule, the same citizenship, the same army, a common market—

An hon. member: The same passport.

Mr. Charest: The free trade agreement would also apply, and they would have the same money. Talk about a golden opportunity, the same money. Imagine how the federal government would be ridiculed if it made a proposal for us to have the same money as the United States. That is what separatists are proposing to us. The funniest thing is the constant complaining we hear about duplication in the present system, when Jacques Parizeau comes here, in the area, and promises that the 100,000 federal civil servants will all keep their jobs. Is there duplication or is there not?

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. minister asked to be allowed to carry on but he is starting a new debate.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. minister will want to conclude.

Mr. Charest: Indeed I will conclude, Madam Speaker. If I were in the situation of the member for Longueuil, I might also try to end the speech because it must not please him to hear what I have to say, but it is the truth.

I would like to end by saying that it is not the present Constitution that created the problems that we are experiencing. We have serious problems such as unemployment, a huge debt and all kinds of other difficulties. At the same time it is not the settling of the constitutional issue that will solve those problems. Those who think so are mistaken. Similarly those who that independence is the solution to all their problems are seriously mistaken. The population senses that. It knows very well. It also knows that we have an opportunity to make a step forward, and that is what this agreement is all about. For the people that I represent here in the House of Commons, and for my children and their grandchildren, I will vote yes on October 26.

[English]

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, you will have noticed that I voiced no objection when the minister exceeded his time so significantly. However, I was really rather curious to see the outcome of strange bedfellows producing an immaculate conception. I hope he will be as generous with me, as I might inadvertently exceed my time but I would hope not.

I want to take note also of the fact that the minister took some pains to apologize to the member for La-Salle—Émard for a remark he made to him during Question Period. One of the aspects of that to which attention should be called is that it was part of an atmosphere of harmony and conciliation in this House during this debate, which must please most Canadians.

In fact, one of the outcomes of the resolution of the constitutional issue for Canadians will be the realization that politicians can, after all, come up with solutions, even though those solutions are not ideal, to the problems that vex our country even when those problems seem to have taken so long to resolve, the constitutional issue having been with us almost constantly for 30 years and constantly for the last ten years.

One of the advantages of bringing this all to an end is that it will help to provide some credibility to politicians because they have resolved a problem. It also should help to demonstrate that when politicians of various stripes from various parts of the country with various ideologies and various concerns come together to attempt to agree on anything there can be a considerable spirit of compromise. Therefore we must all understand the Charlottetown accord, in respect to which we are debating today a referendum for its approval, is not a perfect accord.

Even in its imperfection the Canadian people will be happy to say: "Get on with it". They want to ensure national unity. They understand the destruction of a country is not going to be a contribution to their greatest concern, and that is the economic status of this nation expressed in their terms as jobs and a greater sense of security that there will be jobs for them in the future.

They will know that when we have finished this debate we will still not have settled the question of Canadian survival, of taking back this country in accord with the principles that Canadians want to see pursued as their vision of Canada.

After this is all over we will have to debate, as has been called attention to earlier, where Canada will be in the new global economy and how we will reconcile our vision of this country with a vastly changed economic reality in the rest of the world.

It would be in error to suggest there has not be substantive and significant progress made by virtue of this constitutional accord. Certainly all of us who have been participants in the process, which was a process far more acceptable I think to Canadians because it did involve vastly more consultation with the people through the special joint committee, the six conferences that were held, the various committees in the provinces, the committees that heard the people in Quebec, this referendum itself, will convince Canadians there has been as much consultation as could be reasonably expected in reaching this accord, and that I think is to signify the substantial difference between this and Meech Lake.

We have achieved a great deal and I do not think there can be any denying that. As someone else has said, probably the most admired step that was taken in this accord will have been the recognition of the inherent right of aboriginal peoples to self-government. It is a groundbreaking step forward in the position of aboriginal peoples throughout the world. Canada has once more tread new ground that others I am sure will be forced to follow by the merit of what we have achieved.

All Canadians will be most pleased that we have managed a reconciliation with Quebec. In accomplishing this, concessions will have been made by English Canada, the premiers that represented that part of Canada, that will be criticized by certain elements in English Canada. It will also be recognized that Premier Bourassa will have entered into an agreement on his part that already has been the object of considerable criticism.

I am especially pleased by the contribution of the premier of Ontario to both of those elements of this constitutional accord. I am also proud of the part my party at the federal level played, as well as the premier of Ontario, in making a contribution to the economic union and its partner, the social covenant, expressed in the deal as a social and economic union that provides a basis on which the social programs and the harmonization of social programs throughout the country can be to some degree assured.

It is not quite what we would have liked but it is more than we had before. To have found the economic union refers to full employment as a goal must surely be something that we as social democrats can take pride in, in having convinced others those are worthy goals on all sides of this House. Full employment and social programs which are harmonized throughout the country have now become the positions of both the Conservative Party and the Liberal Party. We can be pleased with that. There is much else in the deal with which we can be pleased or about which we can be proud. I think most Canadians will be inclined to say that this is good enough.

• (1910)

I could not be true to myself, nor could I be true to those in my own riding who are members of neither of the two founding peoples nor of the aboriginal peoples, the Ukrainians, the Italians, the Filipinos, the Germans, the Italians, the Afro-Canadians and the South Americans who are newly come to our shores to become citizens, if I did not note the utter failure of this accord to enhance the equality of the Canadian people as has been suggested that it has by the Minister of Veterans Affairs, that the member for LaSalle—Émard referred to as the crisis of racism in our country that is going to plague us in the future and for which we should have a resolution.

It is clear if we are concerned about equality and if we are concerned about the plague of racism in our country, then surely it would have been fundamental to have included some form of recognition in this accord that in fact all Canadians are equal before the law.

Quite frankly I do not anticipate, given the circumstances of the constitutional deal making, that those who are going to be affected by this failure are likely to vote no because of it, because they have been denied the basic information that would allow them to make the judgment of whether or not this accord is their accord or not.

In debating whether or not there should be a national referendum I took note of the fact that there is no form in which the question could be posed that would allow the electorate to understand completely what they were voting for or against. All will have available to them adequate descriptions of what is being provided to the aboriginal peoples. They will understand what a distinct Quebec is within the constitutional framework that is being proposed here. They will understand the social and economic union. They will understand a reformed Senate. They will understand all of those things that the typical politician and the typical media have made their focus of concern.

The fact is however that not in this House and not in the media has there been attention to this single failure, a failure to take into account what I myself regard as one of the fundamental ideals of all Canadians. That is that all Canadians are equal and all Canadians should be recognized as equal before the law.

There is a danger in this referendum, as there is a danger in all referendums. Yes, I am talking about those who will nit-pick about certain parts of the deal, whether it be distinct society, the recognition of minority language groups and all of that. There will be those who will perhaps mount opposition to the constitutional accord during the referendum vote in those isolated situations. However, it would be fundamentally dangerous, or let me say it is a fundamental danger that at some point vast numbers of those who constitute a significant portion of the Canadian population will recognize they have been left out.

What then would I do? I feel strongly about this country. I have supported a constitutional accord that would do all of those things which it has accomplished at least in some measure but not perfectly. I agree this is the greatest country in the world. I love this country more than anybody else, I suppose, in many ways.

But how could I be true to myself if I were confronted with a serious rise in opposition to this deal on the basis that nobody, apart from the party I represent, nobody, except the New Democratic Party, Ovide Mercredi, the NCC and yes, indeed the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs and Bob Rae would support a constitutional non-contingent provision guaranteeing ethnic and racial equality.

I could be faced with a serious choice at some point as to whether I should be true to myself, my status here and the status of so many Canadians as opposed to the issue of whether this deal is the right deal for Canada. I want this country to stay together. I want to get this over with. I do not want to see us burdened any longer with this constitutional debate.

I am faced with a dilemma. I hope that I am not confronted with it. However, one way of getting around this problem would be for those who have been responsible for negotiating this deal to give a clear and unambiguous undertaking, that they have so far failed to give, that they will address this question immediately.

I think one of the saddest things in this whole process is that he who originated in the 1982 Constitution Act section 15(1), which did at least recognize the necessity for equality and non-discrimination and who was subsequently forced to append to it the notwithstanding clause, should have his dream offended by his own party and the leader of that party in the utter rejection of a non-contingent equality clause.

There is a danger out there. Most Canadians I am sure are going to say: "Let us get this over with. This is a deal that can be lived with. This is a deal that demonstrates that Canadians, when they get together to consider certain issues even when they have differences of opinion, can come to an agreement that tries to respect all of their interests".

There is only one problem here. Thirty-five per cent of the population had their interests utterly ignored. Therefore, we are in the middle of a referendum process that could be jeopardized by the refusal to do just one simple thing. That is to say, clearly and unambiguously, it is the job of governments as well as Canadians to promote racial and ethnic equality so that there will no longer be a question in the future under any circumstances that I am as much a Canadian as anyone else.

That is my dream for my country, and I am so sorry, I regret so much that those who negotiate this deal did not share that dream. That is a dream, however, that I will continue to fight for.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I really look forward to participating in this debate tonight.

Right here in this place and, indeed, in the Senate next week and across Canada for the next four or five weeks the biggest issue in 125 years is going to be facing all of us. It is about yes to Canada. It is about yes to 10 provinces. It is yes to two territories, to the aboriginal peoples and, most important, to tomorrow's generation.

The Charlottetown agreement which was unanimous—it was a unanimous consensus—reached on August 28 was the result of months and months and months of public consultation all across this country. The proposals that came out of that meeting in Charlottetown are intended to serve as a reasonable—I really underline reasonable—compromise.

They are going to be the basis for a renewed federalism that will and indeed can secure our future together in one of the most successful countries in the world, the one that the United Nations rates as being the best place in the world to live.

Albeit, as most members have acknowledged today, it is not perfection. We know that and we understand that, but I also say that perfection is unattainable. It is a good package, it is a compromise. It was give and it was take for all those involved. Yes, people gave a little, but Canada won in the end.

• (1920)

I really want to emphasize that over the past few months and during the past 17 months there has been extremely extensive consultation: the Beaudoin-Edwards committee, the Spicer commission, the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee and six national conferences: one in Halifax, one in Calgary, one in Montreal, one in Toronto, one in Vancouver and a special one here in Ottawa on aboriginal peoples.

The provinces all had committees. Hundreds of thousands of Canadians have spoken their views or had the means to speak their views outlining their concerns. In Calgary Southwest, my riding, I held six town hall meetings and I want to thank each and every individual who came out and participated.

These six national conferences across Canada were really well publicized. At each conference there were men, women, disabled, the minorities were represented, the aboriginals were represented, their voices were heard, their opinions were given, and I know many thoughts were made known.

All of us who followed those conferences learned that this country is huge, it is vast geographically. It is diverse in its views and its demands. It has a history that most people either did not know, did not study, or tend to forget. It has successes that we rarely celebrate. We also learned that we are a group of people from all parts of the world who live together in tolerance, we live together in understanding and we live together with a great deal of patience.

Once we all take just a bit of time to learn a little more about each other, understand each others' differences, consensus can be obtained. All of us have to reach out, all of us have to listen, all of us have to communicate. Canada, you have so much to offer to all your citizens, we must work together to keep you whole.

All we have to do is look elsewhere, in what was Yugoslavia, in the Baltic provinces, in Kuwait, in Iraq, in the Middle East or in China. Nobody has what this country has to offer and yet we fight among ourselves. I think the time has come for all of us to put a little more time and a little more energy into understanding what is on the table today, because it is our future.

One thing some people really tend to forget is that in 1982 the Constitution was patriated and set down the criteria for an amending formula. In simple terms that amending formula said if there were difficulties, the first ministers would sit down, resolve the issue, and if they came up with a package it had to be ratified in both Houses of Parliament and in all the legislatures right across Canada.

Last September this government tabled in this House 28 proposals for change. After all the months of consultation that I reviewed, the premiers, the territorial leaders and the aboriginal leaders met with the Prime Minister and the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. Demands, different views and many concerns were all outlined and negotiations took place. By listening carefully, some give and take from all 17 people involved sitting around that table, that consensus, this package, this Charlottetown agreement was reached.

This Charlottetown agreement, this agenda, is the only offer that is plausible. Rejecting the deal, thinking that there is a better one that can be negotiated is not possible. It cannot happen. We have an amending formula that we have to operate under and that is what we have been doing.

I want to outline a few areas that are contained in the accord. Senate reform originated in Alberta. I am from Alberta. My two colleagues here are from Alberta. It is 10 or 12 years old. The new Senate is going to be elected. It is going to be equal and it can be very effective.

It will be able to block appointments. It will be able to veto any tax policy changes that directly relate to natural resources, and that means no more national energy programs which devastated us in 1982.

The House of Commons is going to have more seats: 42. Lots of people disagree with this, actually I do, but it is a compromise. The Senate is going to be based on equality of provinces and this House will reflect the representation by population which was set down in 1867.

The Supreme Court: with nine members of the Supreme Court, three are going to come from Quebec. That is nothing new. That has been in the Supreme Court Act since 1949.

Immigration: bilateral agreements on the immigration for all the provinces, not just one province. It is quite interesting to note that the province of Alberta is undergoing negotiations today with regard to a special immigration agreement.

All the provinces are equal. All the provinces have been offered the same thing. All the provinces are different. This agreement is flexible. It allows Canada to face reality today, to grow up and see how we have changed, to meet global demands and move ourselves into the 21st century.

The transfer of powers; there are seven areas. Those transfers can go to each and every province. Those who want to reject it can. They are offered to all the provinces and they allow the provinces to make their own decisions. That is where the decision should be made on specific issues.

There is one thing that I am disappointed in. It has to do with the economic union and the fact that there was not more consensus reached in the area of bringing down interprovincial barriers. We move into trade with our colleagues south of the border. We will even be negotiating NAFTA, debating it in this House. We see Europe 92 coming together and yet here in Canada we have over 500 barriers that cost us about $6.5 billion a year.

It is provincial jurisdiction but only by working together are we going to be able to break down those barriers and have free trade in Canada.

I do believe the aboriginal constitutional reform that is contained in the package is extremely historical. The inherent right of self-government is long overdue. There will be a five year delay in the justiciability of any right that is given. We are treading into new territory. I ask all Canadians to be patient. I want them to be understanding. It is new territory. The aboriginal people will finally be able to take their place in Confederation. It is long overdue. We are treading new territory. This will be worked out through negotiations and arbitration with the provinces, with the aboriginal peoples and with the federal government. The progress to self-government is going to be through an agreed, orderly process.

I wish to emphasize that all Canadians throughout this 17-month period have had ample opportunity to make their views and their concerns known, whether at the open meetings, through their members of Parliament, their senators, their aboriginal leaders or their territorial leaders. They have had an opportunity.

We are asking them to do one more thing, to make themselves a little more knowledgeable with regard to the Charlottetown accord. This country has to stay together. We have to put our differences aside. It is so very important.

One thing I want to mention has to do with all Canadians, specifically women. We are very concerned with equality, health care, education, social services, housing and the environment. These concerns have all been met in the Charlottetown accord. Canadian women were widely consulted and they were actively involved. I know that some of you here and read the press today think that perhaps that did not take place. They were invited. They did participate and they were involved.

• (1930)

In conclusion, I offer my sincere thanks and my gratitude to all those involved, first to the Prime Minister and to all the members of the House of Commons and the Senate who participated in all the conferences and all the federal committees. I thank the provinces and the members of the legislatures right across the country who worked so hard to come to a consensus on what would be right for their province and would help the unity of our country. I thank the staff and the assistants, all the men and women who participated. This is everybody's Constitution. It is the Constitution of the people of Canada.

Most important, I would like to give, not only for myself but on behalf of my fellow colleagues from the province of Alberta, my sincere thanks to the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs who has, over the past 17 months, devoted himself and given his all to this country. I ask that people really take a tough, hard look at this because it is only by voting yes that we will be able to keep this country together so that it will still be successful in 125 years.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to address the issue put before us today, which we will be debating for a day or two in this House. Many of the members speaking appear to be addressing the accord itself. The actual subject of the debate is the question that will be put on the referendum, in the very Canadian way of ratifying or giving consent to the arrangements, constitutional and other, that have been agreed to by the Prime Minister, the premiers of the provinces, representatives of the two territories and representatives of the aboriginal peoples.

I want to begin by noting all the work that has been done on this issue by Canadians, including members in this House and members in the Parliament that preceded this one. The names read like a litany. Much of the work involved commissions and a series of hearings to which we have attached the names of individuals. Those individuals themselves have done a lot of work, but so have many other people who worked with them: non-parliamentarians, members of the House of Commons, members of the Senate and, I should not say countless, the many public servants who worked with them to make those exercises an effective reality in discussing our constitutional future.

I would like to mention the Beaudoin–Edwards committee, the Beaudoin–Dobbie committee, the Charest committee, and the Spicer commission, and in Quebec the Bélanger–Campeau commission and the Allaire report. There are others as well. We have spent a number of years now discussing the need to revise our Canadian Constitution to meet the needs of a modern Canada and we are close. It has, to be sure, been a very rocky road and at times there have been many Canadians who have suggested that the process we had adopted lacked legitimacy. Many Canadians felt excluded. They felt that perhaps the elected politicians, or even more specifically the premiers and the Prime Minister, were hijacking the Constitution and the country and not giving adequate heed to the real wishes of Canadians.

We went through the whole process. As I look back at it I can see that while it might not have been perfect it really was all we had. The process that we went through was the best we were able to do.

Some suggested earlier that we should attempt a constitutional convention, one which would bring together Canadians from all walks of life and all regions in an attempt to reconstruct our Constitution. It is not that it was not considered at some point, but I would point out that we were not creating a Constitution from scratch, we were simply revising a very old one.

It has been tough. It took us over 50 years simply to patriate the Constitution from Great Britain. The patriation occurred in 1982 and it opened the door to 10 more years of fun and games.

We seem to have reached a watershed today. Subject to the views of Canadians, we think that we are going to be able to put the Constitution to bed for maybe another generation. Perhaps we will invent what I might call an evergreen constitution. Maybe we are going to change our Constitution and update it every five or ten years. That is not really what a Constitution is supposed to be there for, it is supposed to be a foundation document on which to build a country. You do not go back and change your foundation every five or ten years. However, we will see where we go from here.

The goal of the exercise now, if perhaps the process did want some legitimacy by giving Canadians a role in putting the pieces together, by consenting, commenting, sanctioning and acknowledging, is to hold a referendum. My party has consistently supported a referendum almost from the beginning. We feel a sense of pride now that we in this House have been able to give this referendum to Canadians.

We are now debating what the question will be on the referendum. I recall that this round of constitutional reform was called the Quebec round some years ago. There was an attempt to address the views of many people in the province of Quebec that the Canadian Constitution, as put in place in 1867, was wanting in some respects and did not serve the constitutional needs of that province. Ottawa began responding by getting through the patriation, which took 50 years. We apologize for that delay. That was 10 years ago.

We then began attempting to address the expressed views of certain groups in the province of Quebec. Eventually, in my recollection, we had difficulty because a minority of the people in the province of Quebec really did not care much about Canada. Therefore, we began to confuse the expressed views of separatists who really did not give a damn about what happened to the country, with the legitimate, expressed views of Quebecers who did see the need for constitutional change.

For some period of time there was a blurring of the Quebec voice. During this time there was a provincial government in Quebec whose expressed objective was to take Quebec out of Confederation. This made the discussions and the negotiations a little more difficult than perhaps they should otherwise have been. However, all through that period there were Quebecois who were Canadians, who were expressing good faith and solid reservations about the existing Canadian Constitution. Ottawa and the other provincial premiers made efforts to address those. There were difficulties to be sure, but the process began.

Some of those issues involved those who should have final authority for appointing judges to the Supreme Court of Canada, how many judges on that court would come from Quebec or would be related to the particular set of laws that come from the province of Quebec. There were proponents of Senate reform from the perspective of Quebec which had its own Senate in the province until not too many years ago.

There were the requests, demands or views of aboriginal Canadians that they had been excluded from the original Constitution. I think most Canadians would agree they were. I have often heard reference to the two founding peoples or cultures in Canada. Whatever was founded back in 1867 was certainly done with the consent or acquiescence of the aboriginal Canadians who were here long before the "two founding peoples".

In any event, as time went on the constitutional train got very crowded. We were not only addressing Quebec-focused issues, we began to address a whole cart-load of other issues as well. In fact, the train got so crowded that unfortunately, after the Meech Lake accord the train derailed. It just got too busy, too complex and we had to pick up the pieces and start all over again.

I want to say that I also had concerns about aspects of the Meech Lake accord. Now that we have gone through the exercise again, I believe we have a much better document.

All of these issues we have to address in this referendum evoke many questions. Unfortunately, we are not going to be able to have a referendum that has many questions. We have to address a modification of the definition of Canada which would make reference to aboriginals, the distinct society in the province of Quebec in a defined way and the French and English speaking minorities across the country.

We have the issue of economic union which I understand and Canadians will come to understand simply has not been adequately addressed. That is a little embarrassing in face of the current North American free trade agreement which we have not adopted yet. We are looking at the agreement. We certainly have free trade with the U.S.A. but we do not have free trade among the provinces.

Senate reform, the Supreme Court, the whole area of first ministers conferences, jurisdictions and powers, air transportation, disease control, communications did not exist in 1867. Our country has changed a great deal since 1867. We badly need a redefinition, a reworking of the powers.

My leader has said we are happy to discuss these jurisdictions and these powers. You have to do that in a federal state. In his words they must not make Canada more difficult to govern. The changes must facilitate adaptation to the new economic realities. They must not paralyse the role of our national government. Those were the criteria he used. I believe they are good ones.

Those are some of the many questions that come out. There are also the changes to the amending formula and changes in the evolution of the way aboriginals govern themselves in this country. That is an extremely important issue and aboriginal Canadians have been reaching out for decades demanding their right to organize their affairs and govern their peoples in a way that was appropriate to their culture. I do not think any Canadian would say that is inappropriate. That is a challenge we have addressed. We have not nailed it down completely yet, but we have taken the first major step.

With all of those questions, do we ask 10 or 20 questions on the referendum? Are we going to have a cafeteria-style referendum? You like this, you do not like that? Yes for this, no for that? It could produce a very complex and inconclusive question on a referendum.

Rather than go with the cafeteria-style package what comes to mind is a dictum I recall hearing from time to time. It is keep it simple, stupid, lest the complexity simply overwhelm everyone. In order to keep it simple we therefore have one question.

While I would really like a chance—and I am sure many Canadians would like a chance—to comment specifically on separate aspects of the constitutional accord, it just may not be possible. I guess it is not because we only have one question.

With all the complexity, all the frustration that Canadians have, and the boredom, there are a lot of Canadians out there who do not want to hear anything more about this. There is a certain ennui out there. They do not want to hear any more. Amidst all of that we will try to keep it simple with the one question that asks Canadians whether they will agree to the principles contained in the Charlottetown accord of August 28 reached by the Prime Minister and the premiers.

Answering yes to that question permits Canada to move on. If the answer should be no, those who wanted to see the end of constitutional debate in this country may just see the beginning of a whole new thing which may not involve Canada as we know it now.

There is the question. I support it and I intend to vote yes during the referendum.

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to speak on the question that is before the House today:

> Do you agree the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992?

When I speak to my constituents of York—Simcoe at different functions people ask me: "Why are you spending all your time on the Constitution? Why are you not spending more of your time on the economy?" That is a fair question for people to ask because people are concerned about their individual lives and about how they are going to cope with this world economy that Canada is entering into.

I think it is fair to recognize from the public's perception that this has been a very hot media topic over the last year and a half or two years, and for very good reasons. I will discuss them a little later on.

We must recognize that the government is continuously negotiating freer access to trade because trade is the life-blood of this country. The ongoing negotiations with GATT, the NAFTA, the free trade agreement, and negotiations that are taking place internationally are going to help build this country.

When we examine some of the other aspects of the economy that this country and this government has addressed, it has put us in a position of improvement and gain. We are gaining a greater resolve in the international market.

We cannot forget that this uncertainty facing Canada at the present time is hampering our economic recovery. It is detrimental to investment because foreign investors are not sure where Canada is going to be in a couple of months or three or four months down the road from today. It is also costing us when we borrow from international markets. The fact is that we do have to borrow there. We do not like to but that is something we must address.

By resolving this long-standing constitutional discussion we can put Canadians in a position to take advantage of all the things that Canadian federalism has to offer.

• (1950)

The other question that I am asked most often is whether this is just Meech Lake all over again? Is this Meech Lake 2? I do not think that is the the case at all. There were two basic problems we faced in trying to put together the Meech Lake accord. They concerned process and mandate.

The process was very limited. There was very little opportunity for Canadians to have input into that process. This process has been exactly the reverse. There have been public forums. There have been national forums. There have been committees that have travelled the country. There have been local committees. There have been opportunities for virtually every Canadian from every walk of life, from every corner of this country, to have input into this process.

As a result of that we have changed the mandate. The mandate of Meech was very specific and very limited, and rightfully so because it was addressing the difficulties that the province of Quebec and the people of Quebec had faced since 1982.

Now we have really gone into a Canada round. We have gone into a Canada round because that is what the people of Canada have asked us for. They want to address the issues that are fundamental to them, to the way this country is governed and to the future of this country.

We looked at the things that Canadians and the people who were conducting these negotiations and discussions have asked us to address. We think of the Canada round, and the Canada clause in particular, as demonstrating what it means to be a Canadian, of showing that Canadian identity. It is the unity that brings us all together and our diversity that makes us different from all the others.

It was mentioned in the House earlier today that we are a family, but we are not identical twins. We have our own characteristics and our own needs. Those have been addressed in a very fundamental statement that is straightforward, which everyone can grasp, and that really defines what we are as Canadians.

We had to address our institutions. At the centre of the Canadian federation we have an institution that needed change. It had not been substantively changed since it was originally founded in 1867, but it is much more responsive now. We have an elected, equal and effective Senate that recognizes the provincial differences and the differences in geography in this country. On the other hand we have better balanced the House of Commons so that it provides representation by population.

That is good stuff. That is the basis of democracy.

We have recognized our aboriginal community. For so long, for 125 years, for longer than that, our aboriginal community has been neglected as a part of Canadian life. It will now have the opportunity, as I discussed with my native community in Georgina, to stand on its own, to create an economic base, and to really show and protect its culture and heritage. That is what those people want.

We can go through the whole package. There is the reduction in friction that will occur because we can now separate federal responsibilities from provincial responsibilities in a way that will reduce that overlap. That is important to all Canadians.

There are many other points in the package that are extremely critical, but time does not allow me to discuss them. I want to return to one final point, which is the process. We recognized the difficulties, as I mentioned earlier, with the previous process. We are now going to the ultimate consultative process. We are going to have a referendum that all Canadians are going to be able to take part in. I hope that all Canadians do go out and vote on October 26.

When we have a referendum, when we have this consultative process that asks every Canadian to make up their mind, it is critical that every Canadian understand what they are voting for. What they are voting for is a package of constitutional renewal, a revitalized federalism, a revitalized Canada. It is critical that every Canadian take the time to read the constitutional package, to understand what it means to them and not be influenced by some rumour that they heard in the coffee shop next door.

They should not be influenced by a newspaper that has written an editorial to try to gain some headlines or a TV writer who is again feeding on rumour, on innuendo, on these kinds of things.

Every Canadian should take the time, and I believe they will take the time, to read that package. If Canadians read that package they can decide for themselves. I firmly believe as one Canadian who has read that package that I understand it. There are questions about it that I have and I am sure I will always have but it is an opportunity to revitalize this country.

If everyone reads that package, they will say yes to a renewed and revitalized federation. They will say yes to a new Canada.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I just want to point out something to the hon. member for Laurier–Sainte–Marie who is rising. The last speaker had notified the Chair that he would share the 15–minute period with a colleague. Therefore the hon. member for Calgary West has exactly 7 minutes left.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for sharing his time with me and for his truly Canadian attitude, which we all share in this House.

I really love my country, Canada.

[English]

When I arrived in this Chamber close to 14 years ago, if someone had said that to me I would not have understood what they were saying. It is coming to this Chamber as a member of Parliament that gave me the opportunity to learn the other official language of this country, to experience the culture that is involved in that other official language and to enhance my understanding and my feeling for this country in all of its parts, with all of its people.

As someone born in the city of Calgary, in the west, I had a French teacher in high school who could not speak French. We took French for four years in high school and there was not a word of it spoken because none of the teachers could speak it. That is my world of the late 1940s and the early 1950s in one of Canada's larger cities then and now. It is a city that has grown a great deal.

I guess whatever feelings I had for my region and my country when I came to this place were enhanced 10 times. The experience and the opportunity to share 14 years of my life with colleagues in this Chamber who come from every corner of this land has been an enriching experience that far too few Canadians have an opportunity to experience and to enjoy.

When the United Nations recently said this was the number one country in the world in which to live, that would come as no surprise to anybody who had served in this Chamber and who had travelled on behalf of this country to some other parts of the world on the kinds of things that we are charged with the responsibility to do.

I ask myself sometimes why this country would be number one? I try to contrast it with other places I have been. I have been to France, England, the United States and Asia. There are places I have not been but I have not encountered another nation like this one. This nation is encouraged to believe in an idea, a dream that is really built on the celebration of diversity.

When I look at other countries to a greater or lesser extent, there is a tendency among the people to narrow down and say, "we are", and to try to define it with a few sets of words. When we look at our geography, from the far north to as far south as we go, from east to west, it is inconceivable that it could be more diverse. When we look at our people, it is inconceivable that there is a country in the world with a more diverse population, with cultural traditions that come from every corner of this globe. They enhance the lives of all of us because of the celebration of diversity. It is not viewed as a negative or a detriment, it is viewed as a positive.

In immediate terms, Madam Speaker, we have just been through an exercise which began with the constitutional change in the early eighties. I arrived here in 1979 and lived through the enormously emotive protests we had in this Chamber, and through changes where the courts said that we could not do it this way, we had to do it that way, and finally nine of the provinces agreed. That left us with some problems, and this is the third attempt in the last five years to resolve some of them. Three times we have come to unanimous agreement to change the Constitution of Canada in positive directions. We have lived through the Spicer commission and different parliamentary committees, provincial committees, ministerial committees, and finally the first ministers' committee.

I just wanted to make those few comments and to make a commitment to the people of my riding. My commitment is to tell them clearly, absolutely and without equivocation that I will vote yes on the referendum question. I believe it is important to the future of this country I love so much.

I make commitment number two, to make myself available throughout the referendum period to any group, no matter how small or how large in my community that would like to sit down and discuss the proposal in detail. I pledge that my own behaviour will be as non-partisan as possible in explaining the words and what they mean, and what I see as the possible outcome of the adoption of those words in the Constitution of Canada. In that way people can exercise not only their democratic right but their democratic responsibility.

My experience in this Chamber has taught me that the big enemy of democracy and the kind of life that this country stands for is apathy. If people do not understand what it is that is being proposed in terms of the change in arrangements for this country, then they are much more likely to stay home. I would much rather lose this referendum vote with 90 per cent of the people voting than I would win with 20 per cent of the people voting. What we need in this country is a celebration of the reality that we are in a phase of renewal which will see us into the next decade and the next century in a more harmonious way.

I say to those people who are listening tonight, who are worried about the economy and worried about jobs: resolving our political differences will enable us to take an enormous step forward in terms of the economy and the availability of jobs. The world community is watching us and a 65 per cent vote or a 70 per cent vote in favour of this agreement will have more impact than a 51 per cent or a 55 per cent vote and so will the voter turnout.

I will be doing my best to encourage the voters in my riding to support this proposal and to accept their responsibility in a democracy by getting out to vote.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Madam Speaker, we have in front of us an agreement which is not based on legal texts. Can you believe it? After all, it is the future of Canada and of Quebec that we are debating and yet, we have no legal texts.

I was once a union negotiator and I would never have told a union assembly called to renew a collective agreement that I had an agreement but no text. I got you a raise but I do not have the numbers. There is not one businessman who would close a deal without having it in writing. There is not even one landlord and one tenant who would sign a lease without seeing it in writing. What it boils down to is that they would like us to sign a blank cheque. When I think of the process which took place in Quebec with the Bélanger-Campeau commission which was rigorous and transparent and which recommended a referendum on sovereignty, there can be no comparison.

Yet, the Quebec government and its federalist allies here in the House refused to hold that referendum on sovereignty. The debate will therefore be on the agreement, on those general principles of the agreement which we know about but not on the legal text since we do not have one.

The proposed question refers to a renewed federalism and a covenant based on the agreement. It means, therefore, that once the legal documents have been written, the agreement could be different from the one we will vote upon and we will be thrown right back into a debate which will end only when Quebecers, and nobody else but them, will decide to choose their future through a referendum on sovereignty and nothing else.

We also hear about a renewed federalism. It reminds me of a an old Campbell soup ad that was popular a few years ago: soup like Grandma used to make but served the modern way. It is slightly the same: an old-fashioned constitution served in a modern style, but Quebec's soup bowl is smaller. Out went the two founding nations concept; now we talk about ten equal provinces. The over-all veto for Quebec disappeared; now we propose a series of narrower vetoes, trifles, which do not concern—

An hon. member: What do you mean by trifles?

Mr. Duceppe: Look it up. It is in the dictionary. Maybe you do not understand; it means trivialities, insignificant things.

Trivialities which say nothing about the right of veto and the creation of a new province. Some say that the vetoes concerning the institutions such as the House of Commons, Supreme Court, and Senate, is as if everything was to be decided even before we obtain the right of veto. It is equivalent to entrusting ecologists with the management of a forest just after it has been cut bare.

We also hear about new powers such as forests, mines, tourism, housing, recreational activities, municipal and urban affairs. However, all of that already exists in the 1867 Constitution. There is nothing new there.

There will be a series of administrative agreements limited to five years concerning immigration and training. Most of all, the federal spending power will be enshrined in the Constitution. Therefore, the federal government will be able to intervene in all fields. Indeed, we are told that the provinces can opt out and receive instead financial compensation. However, there is compensation to the extent that the provincial program meets national standards. In other words, Ottawa will establish policies and Quebec will manage the political will of Ottawa.

An hon. member: It is you who said it.

Mr. Duceppe: There is a Senate with a double majority, a French and an English one. In Quebec, there could be an English senator who also comes from cultural minorities. There could well be two French senators from New Brunswick and two from Ontario, one from Manitoba, one from Alberta and, for some exotism, why not one from Yukon, so that Quebec, which is the national home of Quebecers and French people, could be a minority within the French majority. This would be an equal Senate where Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland would have the same number of senators.

Most of all, some odious scheme would force Quebecers to determine on a racial basis who should represent them. We, the sovereigntists, say that all men and women who live in Quebec are Quebecers, whatever their origins.

There will also be 18 new members of Parliament for a while. What does it change ultimately? In 1942 Quebec members represented a third of the Commons, and the conscription was voted nonetheless. In 1982, Quebecers made up the majority of the Liberal caucus, but that did not prevent the patriation of the Constitution. This morning, the newspaper Le Soleil tells us that 54 per cent of Quebecers oppose the deal, but only 8 Quebec members out of 75 are here to fight against it. Ten per cent is hardly representative of the opinion of Quebecers.

• (2010)

The distinct society clause is also restricted to culture, civil law, and language.

An hon. member: Notamment.

Mr. Duceppe: There is no equivalent for that word in English, and anybody who studied law knows that it means "of the same nature".

On the other side aboriginal people get not only that but more. For example they get the integrity of their society, of their way of life, of their relation to the environment. I am proud of that, but it can be said that the aboriginal people are thus defined as a nation. They are called aboriginal nations, but there is no mention of a Quebec nation. Under this Constitution, the people of Quebec are not a nation, but the aboriginal people are. I have to congratulate Ovide Mercredi, because he certainly is a good negotiator. The same cannot be said of Robert Bourassa though.

This whole distinct society issue will collide headlong with the development and blossoming of the minority, and this can lead to an attack on Bill 101. It will also lead to attacks on immigration, because some people in Quebec will say: "We do not have a number of English schools proportional to the English population in Quebec". Based on this concept, they will ask that immigrant children be accepted in French schools, and the whole debate will be launched all over again.

There are many questions which will have to be negotiated in this agreement. There are, for example, natives' rights. No one says how much they are going to cost and how native self-government will be financed. Will there be a native income tax system? Will there be an equalization program? Will it come from Ottawa or from Quebec? There is not a word on that.

The door is also open to an interpretation of land rights based on existing treaties and ancestral rights which do not jeopardize Canadian land because self-government will take place within Canada, but which could challenge Quebec land. The power to decide, in case of disagreement between the partners, what rights will be defined in the Constitution is left to the courts. It is unacceptable for Quebec. It is Quebec and the native peoples who must themselves decide what their relations will be within Quebec. That does not contradict the native peoples extra-territorial relations because they already exist. Take the case of Akwesasne, where one part of the reserve territory is in Quebec, another one in Ontario and another one in the United States. The American border was never questioned. I do not see why the Quebec border should be.

Sovereigntists are in favour of the recognition of aboriginal rights, as the James Bay Agreement proves. It is Matthew Coon-Come, big chief of the Cree Council of Quebec, who said in the state house in Augusta, Maine, in 1989: "As a people, we were guaranteed the possibility of preserving our lifestyle in terms of hunting, fishing and trapping, as well as our language and our culture. With the agreement, we got what we never had before: full authority over education through our own school board, full authority over social and health services, land management, as well as a strong voice in the approval of new developments on our territory, rights that respect the resources from the land, entitlement to police protection and a modified justice system and guarantees that we can fully participate in the development of Sub-Arctic Quebec". It was Matthew Coon-Come who said that.

Sovereigntists will conduct these negotiations, and even develop a relationship between Quebec nations and aboriginal nations, on the basis of the 1985 statement of the National Assembly.

At that time the Lévesque government moved a motion saying: "That this assembly (the National Assembly) recognizes the existence in Quebec of the Abenaki, Algonkin, Attikamek, Cree, Huron, Micmac, Montagnais, Naskapi and Inuit nations, their existing native rights and the rights contained in the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreements; and that it considers these conventions, and any other future convention or agreement of the same nature, as treaties. That the government reaches some agreement guaranteeing them the right to self-government within Quebec; the right to a culture, a language and a tradition; the right to own and control land; the right to hunt, fish, trap, harvest and participate in wildlife management; the right to participate and share in the economic development of Quebec, in order that they develop as distinct nations having their own identity and exercising their own rights within Quebec, these rights being equally applicable to both men and women; and that the government reaffirms its commitment to protect in its fundamental laws the rights prescribed in the agreements signed with the native nations of Quebec".

This is the way to follow, and this is the way that Mr. Bourassa chose not to follow, choosing instead during the Oka crisis to send the Quebec Provincial Police and then the army, when it should have been negotiating for months. That man does not make decisions, he puts the future of Quebec and of the Quebec nation as well as native nations in the hands of the Supreme Court.

The future will show that in a sovereign Quebec, native peoples will be able to develop their respective nations in an atmosphere of mutual respect, fraternity and progress. Then Canada will be able to learn from our experience.

I urge all federalists to come to Quebec and debate the merits of these agreements, instead of hiding behind the curtains, debate the agreement, and apply enough pressure so we get the texts and they can explain them. This is their duty, and we will judge the fundamental value of this agreement. They want a debate on the agreement and not on sovereignty, that is what they will get.

[English]

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to have this opportunity to participate in the debate on the motion:

> That, pursuant to the Act to provide for Referendums on the Constitution of Canada, this House approves the following text of a referendum question:
> "Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992?
> _____ _____ "
> yes no

I know that I speak for other members of my party in welcoming the opportunity which has been given to Canadians to participate in this meaningful way in our constitutional renewal process. For some time now, the official position of my leader and our party has been that there should be a referendum held so that Canadians could have their say. We know there were many divergent views expressed as the constitutional process unfolded over the past number of years.

The leaders who sat down and drafted the latest accord represent many shades of the political spectrum, but all have had one thing in mind: the preservation of a strong and united Canada. I salute them for their efforts and their vision. I urge Canadians, now that they have been given this opportunity, to ratify the constitutional changes and move forward together as one united nation.

We must always remember those who took part in the process were keeping the best interests of Canada in mind. While we may not agree 100 per cent with every paragraph of the proposal, we should support it as the best possible deal for Canada at this time. I am very proud we are giving the Canadian Constitution back to the people of Canada.

There are things we are not happy with as has been stated by my leader, but I know that as time goes on these things will be remedied.

It is also very appropriate that the final agreement after years of discussion should be reached in Charlottetown a city which I am very proud to represent in this House. I know as all hon. members realize the original conference which led to the confederation of the colonies of North America into Canada was held in Charlottetown in 1864.

I was very pleased to have a motion passed some time ago which recognized Charlottetown as the birthplace of Confederation. Now our citizens can proudly state that our city is the place of the rebirth of Confederation.

• (2020)

There was an interesting coincidence in Charlottetown during the First Ministers' Conference. Great George Street, the street where the original Fathers of Confederation walked while on their way to the 1864 conference, was designated as a special heritage site. I congratulate the people who were involved with that, and especially the minister responsible for his part in it. It was also very appropriate that many of the First Ministers from across the country were there and able to take part in the ceremonies. I know that many years hence Canadians will still be coming to visit this area in Charlottetown and making it one of the very special places in our history.

I feel also that it would be most appropriate when this constitutional package is approved by the voters following the referendum that the first ministers should return to Charlottetown and conduct the formal agreements and ratification. They then can take their places as the new Fathers of Confederation alongside those great men of 125 years ago whose vision led to the formation of this great nation.

There are those who will condemn this new constitutional deal and who will urge Canadians to vote no. As I said, I do not pretend that this is the perfect solution to Canada's problems, nor am I naive enough to believe that there will ever be a perfect solution to these problems. As I mentioned earlier, politicians from every political stripe were included in the discussions which led up to the agreement, and while it may not be perfect, it is a good basis for the rebirth of this nation.

We must assume that those who campaign against this agreement are those who would like to see this country die or be split into tiny pieces, none of which would be the strong vibrant country that we see today.

We have done well over the past 125 years. We have built in the northern part of North America a nation which is envied around the world. It is a nation of opportunity, a nation of freedom, a nation of fairness and a nation of compassion. We must use every ounce of our strength to preserve what we have built and we must proudly go forward, urging Canadians to vote yes so that the ever evolving country of Canada can continue to grow and prosper.

Constitutions are a guide to the way our country should operate. They are, in my opinion, a living thing which will and must change as times change. No constitution can be written in stone. There must be a flexibility which allows us to adapt and be able to seize ever-changing opportunities. This agreement may not be perfect but it represents an opportunity for renewal and a compromise of which we must take advantage.

One of the most famous authors of the United States' Constitution, Thomas Jefferson, stated in 1789: "No society can make a perpetual constitution, or even a perpetual law". He made that statement in a letter to James Madison, urging that the Constitution of the United States be revised every 19 years so that each succeeding generation of Americans could legislate for itself.

I do not believe anyone would advocate such a drastic proposal here, but it does serve to illustrate that change must come and change will come. We are fortunate that the changes to our Constitution will come about as a result of peaceful discussion, not as the result of violent action such as is taking place in many countries around the world.

I believe that we have to emphasize over the next few weeks the things which bind us together and the things which we share in common.

A young man from Thurso, Quebec, flying down the ice at the Montreal Forum brought joy and pride to youngsters from Newfoundland to Victoria. When a young baseball player from Maple Ridge, British Columbia steps into the batter's box at Olympic Stadium and hits a home run for the Expos he shares that with all Canadians. Finally, when a young swimmer from Montreal loses an Olympic medal because somebody pressed the wrong button, Canadians from coast to coast to coast grieve with her.

I mention these few sporting events because sporting events represent so many things that bind us together. I could just as easily have mentioned our scientists, our two Canadian astronauts and the thousands and thousands of successful business people, the farmers, the fishermen and the artists who make this country their home and who share in our common and very precious heritage. These people are taking advantage of the very special country which we enjoy.

Let us ensure that the forces which would divide us are not allowed to do so. Over the next few weeks we must persuade all Canadians of the true value of this country and in so doing assure that this constitutional agreement is ratified.

I have long held the belief that Canadians do not spend enough time or effort in celebrating the things which unite us and the institutions which bring us together. We could take a lesson from our American neighbours who go to such lengths to honour their nation and their flag.

This year's celebration of the 125th anniversary of Confederation got us off to a good start, but let us make sure that is only the beginning. Let us teach our children about the genuine Canadian heroes who have distinguished themselves around the world.

It is my great privilege to be my party's critic for veterans affairs. Since I assumed that post, and before that, I met many Canadian heroes who served their country at great personal sacrifice because they believed in what Canada stood for. They offered their very lives to protect the way of life we have enjoyed. To turn our backs on Canada would be to turn our backs on them and this we must never do.

Let us instil in our children and in ourselves a pride of those things which bind us together and make us different from any other nation on earth. Let us forget the things which people say would divide us and let us go forward confidently into the future as united people.

Former Prime Minister Sir Wilfrid Laurier said nearly 100 years ago that the 20th century belonged to Canada. Let us urge Canadians to vote yes in this referendum. Let us build on the Charlottetown agreement of August 1992 to assure that the next century, which we are soon to enter, truly will belong to a strong, free and united Canada.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I rise tonight to speak on a matter of very vital importance to our country as a whole and for my province of Ontario, that being the constitutional agreement reached on August 28.

First I will deal with the key components of the agreement, how they improve the status quo, and why the agreement is good for the country. Then I wish to take some time to explain why the approval of this agreement is vital for Ontario.

I believe the agreement represents a blueprint for a new, modernized and flexible federalism. It will make the fundamental law of the land clearer, fairer and better able to respond to the economic and social challenge of the future.

A Canada clause expressing fundamental Canadian values would be added to section 2 of the Constitution Act. The clause will guide the courts in interpreting the Constitution. The Canada clause also contains a statement ensuring that the Constitution is integrated in a manner consist with the preservation and promotion of Quebec as a distinct society within Canada.

This distinctiveness is based on Quebec's French speaking majority, its unique culture and civil law tradition. In recognition of Canada's linguistic duality, the Constitution is to be interpreted in a manner consistent with the commitment of Canadians to the vitality and development of the language and culture of English speaking and French speaking minority communities throughout Canada and the role of their governments in protecting the linguistic rights of those communities.

The inherent right of the aboriginal people to self-government would be recognized in the Constitution and confirmed in the Canada clause, as would the status of aboriginal government as a new third order of government within Canada. This represents a new partnership with the aboriginal peoples of Canada, a partnership based on respect, rights and responsibilities. The general principle of the division of powers would be that what is available to one province should be available to all.

This represents a new consensus on how different governments should share responsibilities in the Canadian federation. There would be exclusive provincial jurisdiction in eight areas which we believe are best handled provincially, those being forestry, mining, tourism, housing, recreation, municipal and urban affairs, labour market training and culture.

Federal spending in these areas would not require provincial consent. The provinces would have more power over immigration and would be able to negotiate agreements with the federal government. Culture would be an area of exclusive provincial jurisdiction with the federal government maintaining responsibility for existing national cultural institutions and agencies.

Frankly, without these reforms Canada will continue to be an over-governed nation. Presently federal and provincial powers overlap and too many programs are duplicated. With the agreement, it will be responsible to have the level of government which should run a program actually run it.

This agreement represents a new consensus on how different governments should share responsibilities in the Canadian federation. As to the amending formula, unanimity would be required for changes to the Supreme Court and Senate. Each province would have a veto on constitutional change.

The Supreme Court and its current composition would be entrenched in the Constitution. The federal government would be required to name judges from lists submitted by provincial and territorial governments. An aboriginal role in appointments would be developed.

The Constitution would contain a new provision setting out policy objectives underlying the social and economic union. These would include a comprehensive health care system, adequate social services and benefits such as housing, food and other basic necessities and high quality primary and secondary education; protecting, preserving and sustaining the integrity of the environment; working work together to strengthen Canada's economic union; the free movement of persons, goods, services and capital within Canada; the goal of full employment; a reasonable standard of living and suitable and equitable development.

There is also a new consensus on how to make our Canadian federation more predictable for all its members. Canada's system of equalization payments will be protected from unilateral change and the Canadian commitment to regional development and national economic infrastructure will be strengthened.

The Senate will have equal representation from each province. It would be elected either by the people of each province or by provincial legislatures. The Senate's powers would make it effective in that it could defeat legislation imposing new taxes on natural resources, delay supply bills for up to 30 days and force a joint sitting of the House of Commons and the Senate by defeating other legislation.

A government that wants legislation passed in a timely fashion will have to consider the views of the Senate. For Ontario, this compromise on the Senate was secured by increasing Ontario's representation in the House of Commons by 18 seats.

Over the last 18 months, we Canadians have been facing up to the reality that our Constitution needs to be amended. We have recognized that the ground rules under which we operate no longer work properly, that they are incomplete in some instances and outdated in others. The status quo is no alternative and the costs of standing still are too high.

To my way of thinking, this constitutional package responds to the concerns of many individuals, the provinces and the territories, and the aboriginal peoples. It will help in building a more united Canada, a stronger Canada, a Canada ready for the 21st century.

In essence the agreement represents a compromise which secures national unity. It goes a fair distance in resolving many of Canada's long-standing constitutional grievances and achieves fairness for minority groups in our society. The balance that so many Canadians seek between a strong central government and a strong provincial government or governments has been achieved in this package.

These are only a few of the reasons why I believe this agreement is good for Canada as a whole. I would now like to discuss specifically the importance of the approval of the agreement for Ontario.

Trade is Ontario's and Canada's economic life-blood. It sustains our standard of living. Political instability would threaten our economic stability, which in turn would erode our capacity to compete successfully in a highly competitive global economy. In short, domestic and foreign investors are attracted by stable political and economic climates. Instability discourages investment. It denies Ontarians and Canadians opportunities for growth and prosperity.

I believe Canadians and the people of Ontario want to get on with securing their economic future. They wish to put the constitutional bickering behind them. A stable, viable economy in Canada and Ontario will encourage the investment needed to get the engine of economic growth going again in Ontario and Canada.

Canadians and the people of Ontario also want justice for our aboriginal peoples, a renewed social and economic order, and a more effective Parliament. These are the gains in this agreement for Ontario, gains which the people of Ontario do not wish to lose. They do not want to turn the clock back. They are pressuring us to move forward, to use the combined energy of all Canadians to get this great country of ours moving again and in the right direction.

The constitutional agreement will give all Canadians the new tools needed to move forward together with confidence and pride toward the 21st century. If this constitutional package secures our national unity and prevents the breakup of Canada, the agreement is worth all the compromises that had to be made.

The October referendum on the agreement will be the most important vote ever taken in Canada. Come October 26, I believe that Canadians can answer the referendum question in only one way: a resounding yes from coast to coast for Canada and the dream that our forefathers brought into being 125 years ago.

I will be supporting the referendum in every way possible. I will be available to the constituents in my riding to attend the meetings, to provide information in any way possible. I am certainly confident that the riding of Parry Sound—Muskoka will come up with a very resounding yes.

In closing, I think back to a meeting some three or four years ago where a group of parliamentarians from the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association visited Parliament Hill. It was in the summer recess. One of the questions they were asking even at that time was the Quebec question and national unity. A parliamentarian who was one of the speakers for one of the provinces of India directed a question to me.

He said: "Mr. Darling, can you tell me the cause of the dissension? I live in a country of some 800 million people. We have 50 provinces. We speak 121 different languages and dialects, at least 10 or 11 of them major languages", many more than our English and French. He said: "We wonder when we can get along with all that diversity what the problem is in Canada".

I hope that on October 26 we will be able to show them that there is no more diversity and there is real union.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, I am honoured tonight to participate in this historic debate.

I was also honoured to participate in two special joint parliamentary committees on the Constitution. The first was the Beaudoin–Edwards committee, which examined the amending formula for the Constitution, and the second was the Beaudoin–Dobbie joint parliamentary committee, which recommended the direction for this constitutional change in which we are now engaged.

Those experiences, combined with the constitutional conferences and the aboriginal process that ran alongside that, ensured an unprecedented level of participation from the public. It was an unprecedented inclusive and open process. All who participated should be commended for their role. If anything demonstrated to me that Canadians cared for their country that was it. The apathy of which we are frequently charged was nowhere evident throughout that process. People appeared in record numbers before the parliamentary committees to give testimony, to give their views on the country and on how the constitutional malaise with which we have suffered could be addressed.

Participants on those committees regularly restrained their partisan instincts. They had learned throughout the process that the patience of the electorate, which had already been sorely tried, was not to be further tried by partisan posturing on this issue which is so crucial to their country.

I want to begin my discussion tonight by talking about the perception of politicians when we are playing politics. I know that there is a lot of derision attached to that view. However, when, as in the case of those parliamentary committees, the politicians actually work toward and succeed in achieving a consensus on tough issues the same degree of notice is not taken. The media does not say: "Oh, they all agreed on something", and that makes national headlines. It is only when we disagree that it seems to be worthy of news commentary. That is what news is. My father is a journalist and it is conflict that makes news, not harmony.

My experience on those parliamentary committees also taught me about the role of an opposition member of Parliament. That is also much misunderstood. It taught me about the positive contribution that an opposition member of Parliament can make in the politique of this country. It was a privilege to travel through all parts of Canada—the territories and the provinces—meeting with all sorts of people, listening to Canadians and their divergent views on how to solve this constitutional problem. I confess that at times throughout that exhaustive process I was weary. It made me envious of those countries that did not have a written constitution. Focusing on the Constitution as the salvation for us all seemed to me to be rather ill-spent at times. However, hopefully we are near the end of that path.

Canada is an example for the world in many, many aspects. It has been said before in recent days that this agreement is a compromise. It bears repeating. It is an agreement that is not perfect. It is certainly not perfect. I have real difficulties with parts of the agreement, but my experience on those parliamentary committees and my 45 years of living have taught me that I do not get everything I want and compromise is not a dirty word. As my leader said, compromise is a very Canadian quality. It is not something to be criticized. I think it is a nice quality. Nice is a nice word, compromise ain't so bad. When you look at the nightly newscasts and see what else other countries are suffering through, compromise ain't so bad.

As I said, I have difficulties with some parts of the agreement but I can live with them. This national psychoanalysis in which we have been engaged must now end. We must stop this introspection and now reach out to those people and those issues that have not received the attention they deserve during this period of self-definition.

My role in the coming days will be to explain and to give information. I will not participate in name calling those people who disagree with my position for the yes side because I have learned a great deal in this constitutional examination in which I participated in that I have confidence in the wisdom of the Canadian people. They will do the right thing on October 26. No name calling is going to change that.

My role has been an information giver. People will know where I stand.

For those people who say that the agreement does not address their concerns, and I know there are many who feel disappointed, I remind them, and I say this with a smile, if anything, our history should have taught us that the solution to our political problems is not found through the constitutional route.

The New Democratic Party believes in an activist government. We believe that if there is a political will, great things can be achieved. For those people who feel left out, I call upon them to get involved. What is not written in the Constitution can be achieved through political will. To the women, to the disabled, to the ethnocultural community, I say get involved. Elect members of Parliament, elect senators, elect members of provincial legislatures and elect councillors who care about what you care about. It is only through political will, not by the fine tuning of legal texts in a constitution, that real change is achieved.

I feel that much of this process, having been conducted parallel to the latest examination of the UN Conference on the Environment and Development, is equivalent to Nero fiddling while Rome burned. While we have been engaged in this national introspection, hundreds of thousands of children have died, hundreds of millions of acres of rain forest have been destroyed, species of plants and animal life have grown extinct and we talk about notwithstanding clauses.

One wonders about the collective intelligence of human beings whose priorities could be so misaddressed. That is why we have to get off, as I call it, national psychoanalysis. We have to get on to those issues. We have to develop and articulate a sense of urgency for our country and for the world. We can no longer have the luxury of more constitutional talks.

That is the reason I am supporting this. It has been a useful process, but we have to consider the alternatives. Last weekend at the Saanich Fair in my riding a constituent asked: "What would happen if this was not agreed to? What is the alternative"? I answered honestly in that I thought if Canada said no on October 26 there would be international curiosity as to what Canada was all about. There would be a declining confidence in the Canadian dollar, declining investment in our economy.

As if that were not bad enough, we would have another 10 years of trying to disentangle from Quebec, negotiating with the aboriginal people of Quebec, negotiating with the Government of Quebec as to what constitutes Quebec and what constitutes Canada. I am not going to an alarmist, but I do not think that would be very neat and tidy.

We have achieved a great deal through this process. My colleagues on the parliamentary committees know as well as I do that this agreement reached on August 28 in Charlottetown is a real achievement. It is a compromise and compromise is not dirty word.

In conclusion I reiterate what I said in my own caucus. I have had it with constitutional purists. I want to get on with debating the issues that propelled me to seek office: to change this country, to make it a more just, fair and environmentally concerned country. I want to stop talking the c word.

Countries have curses. We see it every night on the national news. There is famine. There is war. There are natural disasters such as occurred in Nicaragua last week. One's heart bleeds for those countries. Think of Bangladesh, think of Somalia, think of what was Yugoslavia. Our national curse seems to be constitutional ferment.

I assure the people of Saanich—Gulf Islands that as much as I wish we would never have to talk about the Constitution after October 26 we will because that seems to be our national curse. However, as national curses go it is not bad. We just have to watch the nightly news and compare what we have in this country to what other people in the rest of the world have. I add my voice proudly on the yes side, proudly to Canadian compromise.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, September 9, 1992

[Editor's Note: Continuation of proceedings from Volume A.]

[Translation]

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome—Missisquoi): Madam Speaker, over the course of nearly 125 years, hundreds of debates held in this House have shaped the history of this country, page after page, day after day and speech after speech.

But beyond these walls, in my riding of Brome—Missisquoi or in yours, Madam Speaker, in the streets, in our living-rooms, around the kitchen table, thousands of others speeches are being made—somewhat less pompous maybe, using everyday words—but nonetheless important because they speak the heart of the people. Politicians, lawyers, constitution experts, plumbers, carpenters, teachers, students, all are concerned with our economy, but at the same time every one is very concerned with the future of this country that we will hand down to our children.

That is why we are looking into the renewal of our Constitution today. Why? Because the promises made to the people of Quebec at the time of the referendum in 1980 have not been fulfilled; because the Constitution signed in 1982 was unacceptable for Quebec; because my Prime Minister promised in Sept-Îles in 1984 that Quebec would regain its rightful place in the Canadian family; because of the failure of Meech in 1990; and above all, because in Charlottetown, a couple of weeks ago, a change in winds brought about a consensus which will be decided upon come October 26.

I am neither a lawyer nor a constitution expert. It is more as an observer of the political scene in Quebec for over 50 years that I asked to take part in the debate tonight.

I can still hear Maurice Duplessis say to Ottawa "We want our booty back", not to mention Jean Lesage's "Québec comes first", Daniel Johnson's "Equality or independence" and René Lévesque's "sovereignty-association".

I have seen all these premiers, regardless of their political affiliation, spend all that energy defending Québec. It is not surprising that some of them died in the middle of their carreer.

That explains why I understand so well, after 50 years of struggle, the impatience showed by my compatriots from Quebec, my brothers and sisters, my children. One of our great writers, Félix-Antoine Savard, taught them that they were of "a race who refused to die". Today, Gilles Vignault sings to them that they "have a country to build".

As for me, here is what I have to say to them: "This race which refuses to die, this country which we want to build, in a word, this future and this heritage we will leave to our children and grandchildren must not and cannot be less than ours".

To my Quebec compatriots I wish to say also that we now have before us a series of offers which are not perfect, I must admit, but which nevertheless reflect a consensus and are acceptable, honourable and realistic.

These offers, if accepted, will enable us at last to concentrate on our economic development; these offers were approved by great citizens like senator Claude Castonguay, the very one who had convinced Robert Bourassa to reject the Victoria agreement in 1971, who said that the July 7 offers were unacceptable, but who, today, believes the new accord contains more than Meech and gives Quebec the guarantees it needs to preserve its distinctiveness.

I repeat, for the benefit of my fellow Quebecers, what another witness and actor in the great constitutional debates, Mr. Claude Ryan, said, and I quote:

> Quebec can still contribute enormously to the growth of a strong Canada. If Quebec is a happy and confident partner, if Quebec feels it is understood and accepted for what it is, there can be no imaginable limits to the aspirations of this country.

Speaking about this country, I would now like to speak to my fellow countrymen and women from outside Quebec.

[English]

I know that with translation they will get my message.

[Translation]

Because of them, I often suffered in my soul as a francophone when I participated in commissions or read the results of polls or heard some media reports. However, I do not hold it against them, I still respect them and I will tell you why.

How can they understand, and even less appreciate, the attitude of a nation, the people of Quebec, the French speaking Quebecers whom they too often know little about?

During the Meech Lake debate, I saw them cheer on Clyde Wells, Elijah Harper and other political leaders. I heard them express their feelings in front of the Spicer commission. When I travelled outside Quebec, I could feel the distance between us. I heard some of their leaders express for the Beaudoin–Edwards commission, opinions that would make you shiver.

Such an attitude can only be explained by a total ignorance of this country's history, its past, its pioneers, its creators. I hate to use this word—ignorance—but it seems that it is time to admit the fact.

Am I wrong in presuming that the vast majority of the English-speaking people of this country, who automatically oppose all of Quebec's claims, are almost totally ignorant of whatever concerns the francophones of this country?

For a good number of them, our history starts with the Conquest, that is 200 years too late. What do they know of this country's founders, of Cartier, Champlain, Laviolette, Maisonneuve, Jeanne Mance and Marguerite Bourgeoys? Or explorers such as Jolliet, Marquette, La Salle and La Vérendrye, the very same who settled the territory stretching from Lake Winnipeg to the Rockies. This territory was theirs as early as 1733. What do they know about the pioneers whose memory we are still celebrating on this 350th anniversary of Montreal, to name only these among hundreds of them?

As for those who were taught the history of British North America, do they know how hard the French speaking settlers had to fight to survive as a people on this continent? How did we explain the deportation of the Acadians to them? What about the 1774 act? And the 1791 act? And the role the French Canadians played in resisting the American invasions? And the 1837 rebellion? And the Durham report? And the 1840 Union Act?

Happily, I also sometimes realize that highly intelligent and smart Canadians understand the importance of what is at stake. The name of Andrew Brewin, who was a member of this House and who is the father of one of our colleagues, comes to my mind as a case in point. In 1967, he wrote the following in a supplement to Le Devoir:

> Indeed, the future unity of Canada does not lie solely in a constitutional agreement. It will demand a lot of common sense, patience and mutual understanding from every citizen all across Canada. But it will also require the will to tackle problems, even a problem as tough as the renewal of the Constitution.

More recently, Mr. William Thorsell of The Globe and Mail, when addressing the members of the Canadian Club, said last January in Toronto:

> The present constitutional debate is putting to the test the tolerance of English Canada, our faith, our sense of social justice, our understanding of history, indeed our very imagination and our intelligence as a people.

Mr. Thorsell added that "by restricting Quebec's constitutional prerogatives, English Canada deserves to lose its status as a country and to become an annex of the United States".

Yet, if we look back on our country's history, General Murray had this to say about francophones in a letter to the King of England:

> It is a brave and courageous people. If it ever decided to leave the country, it would be an irreparable loss for the Empire.

Would he say the same thing today about Canada and Quebec? I suppose so because it is a view shared by many clear-minded and enlightened anglophones. But unfortunately, those views are still too rare and people are still not ready to listen. Time goes on, debates drag on and on, emotions are high and wounds take a long time to heal.

Twenty-five years ago, Claude Ryan wrote this:

> A thousand times in the last few years we said to the rest of Canada: "Listen to the other voice, accept the other view before it is too late and before the hope of a new dialogue is killed prematurely by your repeated refusals and your indifference.

Those are the sentiments that inspired my intervention here tonight. I would like all Canadians to share those sentiments and not to be blinded by mistrust, ignorance or political interest. I would like them to fully realize what is at stake here, that is the survival of a country, of our country, a country which is the envy of all peoples all over the world.

[English]

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Madam Speaker, what can we really say now about this Constitution that has not already been said? What can we do when we talk about interpretive clauses and propose changes that have not already been interpreted by so many people in the press, the commentators, the journalists and by politicians? How do we discuss an issue that has truly dominated and captivated, that has disgusted, mesmerized and yes, even enraged Canadians for over the last three years?

How do you project what might have been if the same efforts that we have imposed to effect constitutional change could really have been directed to our economy, to the creation of jobs and to the economic reality of competing in a global marketplace?

What would have happened if we had put our minds and our efforts in working our way out of this terrible recession? Instead, we spent our efforts and the majority of our efforts on the Constitution and the debate that is before us today.

I hope from this experience which we have gone through in the last few years that those of us in government have certainly learned from it. Not only members today, but those members who come after us as well. The lesson tells us that the people who elect us to public office want us as politicians to concentrate not on constitutional issues, but to concentrate on their hopes, their aspirations and their needs and to concentrate on a united country.

As politicians in this country, I am sure we have all received the message at all levels, federal, provincial and municipal, that Canadians are no longer going to tolerate a government that concentrates the entirety of its efforts on issues that do not unite us but issues that tend to disunite us.

One thing is certain. On the evening of October 26, this chapter of the constitutional debate will be over for a short time.

I am assured by our leader that should the present trend continue and our side of the House form the next government, during any Liberal government, on a ranking of one to ten, the constitutional issue will certainly take up a position 20 to 30 and not be part of the agenda. We think on this side of the House that the debate is over and should be over for a long time to come.

This is welcome news for the constituency of Thunder Bay—Nipigon which I represent. I am sure it is tremendously good news for all Canadians to realize that the issue of the Constitution is once and for all done away with for at least the foreseeable future.

I want to congratulate the member for Papineau—Saint-Michel who participated in this process and led the charge on behalf of the Liberal Party. Certainly he represented our party with the highest degree of integrity throughout the whole process.

I also compliment the minister of constitutional affairs and our colleague, the NDP member for Yorkton—Melville for conducting themselves at all times in the very best interests of Canada and all Canadians. They all deserve a vote of thanks from every member of this House.

As members looked at the process going through its terrible stages, I think we all learned to appreciate the virtue of patience. It is a lesson that I hope all members will never forget as we attempt to fulfil our respective duties, not only to our own constituents but to all constituents in Canada.

It is interesting to look for a few moments at the historical events of this week. The two founding nations of our country, Quebec or Lower Canada, had its genesis in France, and Upper Canada with its origins in the British Isles, have such a diverse history of their own constitutional development.

France has written many constitutions since its inception. It is a country that has had a series of constitutional debates. Britain, the genesis of the other founding nation in our country, has yet to write its first Constitution.

Yet the citizens of both countries enjoy a standard of living which is envied throughout the world. Both countries have recently willingly entered into a European common community and they entered that association as equal partners. Over their histories both have created very vibrant economies. Both are truly great nations.

As we talk tonight about the two founding nations of our country, we think of the aboriginal peoples of Canada who have never had a constitution. Much like the English, all of their societies and governments have been based on tradition and precedent.

We cannot help but look at the third of Canadians today who chose Canada as their home, or their parents or grandparents chose Canada as their home. They made that decision because Canada offered and still offers freedoms and opportunities that perhaps their parents or their grandparents or themselves did not have offered to them in their own homelands.

I am very positive, as we discuss the contents of the Constitution today, that not one of the people who chose Canada as their home sat down and read the British North America Act before they made the decision to come here. They did not read the changes in 1982, make a decision based on the reading of that document itself and say they will go to Canada because of that document.

I say unequivocally that one-third of Canadians today chose Canada as their home and their parents or grandparents came to Canada because they knew in their very hearts that what we have here is opportunity, what we have here in Canada are freedoms.

What we have here in Canada is a chance of a better life for their families, themselves and for the future generations. I am sure that is the main reason why over one-third of Canadians we welcome to this country and who have made magnificent citizens have chosen Canada as their home.

What am I trying to say when I talk about the historical significance of the two founding nations, the French and the English, the many new Canadians who make up over one-third of our population, and our aboriginal peoples? What I am trying to say is the Constitution is really only a document. The Constitution is really only a piece of paper that may be tested many times in our court systems, and I am sure it will be. What I talked about is the written Constitution.

What I want to spend the last few moments of my time on is the real Constitution of Canada. The real Constitution document is truly a living and breathing document. It moves with the times and changes with the times. It represents how many of us envisage the way people treat each other. It is a way that those who truly need help and assistance in our country can get help and assistance without going through any demeaning process in order to get that help and assistance.

It is a way people can practise their faith in this country, or they can choose not to practise any faith at all. It is a way that we educate our children. It is a way that lets us care for the elderly and the infirmed in our communities that is better, unequivocally, than the way elderly and infirmed people are treated anywhere else in this world.

It is a Constitution by which all Canadians who are sick can be treated and cured or treated and made more comfortable evenly with all other Canadians and without having any concern about bankrupting themselves or their families in order to get that cure. That is what the Canadian Constitution is all about.

It is a way in which we create opportunities and we must try to create opportunities for all Canadians. It is a way by which we live through a system of law and order. It is a way that is guaranteed and I think this Constitution is guaranteed in the hearts of the men and women of Canada. It is guaranteed in the hearts of the boys and girls throughout this country, from St. John's to Victoria.

The Constitution is really a test of faith. From the very beginning of our constitutional history in Canada, from 1867 with the passing of the British North America Act and all of the changes that were made to that act since that day, to the repatriation which began in 1980 and culminated in 1982 and adopted the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in this country right up to today, the Constitution is a test of faith that Canadians have in their country and we as politicians have to respect that test of faith.

I am satisfied that with what we have gone through in this process, what we have experienced in the last three years, the real Constitution of this country is not only embellished in what we have here before us today, but is a test of faith of all Canadians to do what is right for all Canadians and I am sure that document will meet those requirements for all Canadians.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): I am happy to have the opportunity to rise in this debate. I must say the limitation of 15 minutes on something so fundamental as the Constitution which governs all members in this Chamber does present difficulties. It is almost as bad as Picasso trying to do a portrait on a postage stamp. We will try to do it justice but because there is a 15 minute limitation I am going to refer a little more to a written script and notes than normally is my custom.

The tone of the debate has been even and positive. I am glad that we are debating the issues. Let us get the poetry and patriotism out of the way. I believe in this country as much as anybody from coast to coast, sea to sea. I respect the opinions of all my fellow colleagues. Almost all of us in this Chamber I think are patriots of this great land and want to keep the land together. Our problem is that on something so fundamental as the Constitution, we obviously have different approaches and different views as to how best to do it.

I must say that I have been wrestling with my position on this. On the earlier problem of Meech I had no problem at all because of fundamental flaws as I saw them in that document. The Charlottetown agreement was arrived at with the best intent from all 17 leaders that the minister of constitutional affairs said earlier produced this document. Quite frankly, it surprised an awful lot of Canadians, including myself, that there was an agreement. Notwithstanding that our duty, because we are talking about a constitution, is to think not just of today or tomorrow. As my colleague in front of me said, we have to think of the future.

Constitutions are very difficult to change. There is a fundamental flaw I feel in this document that makes me come down fairly hard on the no side of the equation.

I have heard a lot about constitutional fatigue. I know we are all tired of constitutions and talking about them. Frankly, the lesson of Canada and the life of Canada has been a constitutional dialogue, whether it has been up front on conferences or whether it has been in between with bilateral agreements. It is part of our very existence. It is part of the tension in the land. In fact, it is a healthy tension in the land.

The only ones that do not have disagreements in terms of human conduct are those who are under the sod, those who are dead. The only countries that do not have constitutional tensions are countries that really are not very vibrant. This country is very vibrant.

I believe that there is a smouldering. One of the factors that has not been mentioned today, that I have heard, is that there is a smouldering discontent of the public, like in Meech. The leaders of the land got so far away from the people, especially because they were sort of in an incestuous incubator trying to resolve all these difficulties and they were not reaching out to the people, that there was a groundswell across the land that said no, we are not going to have Meech.

In somewhat like fashion, but without at the moment the emotional element that was in Meech, I believe there is a smouldering discontent of the public at large basically with politics and/or politicians. One of the biggest questions I have about the document, which of course most Canadians—I agree with my friend—will never read in detail, is the fundamental simple question: "Good gracious, Pat, do we need more politicians. The last thing in the world, do we need more politicians?"

Another question I get on the street from people who will never read the document, and I understand that, is: "Patrick, we wanted less government. We are going to get more government here. Pat, is this going to end constitutional dialogue and debate?" Yet, right in the constitutional agreement there are situations first of a constitutionalized First Ministers Conference once a year, which is going to be an ongoing thing. There are sections in the agreement which are going to have an ongoing constitutional flavour. There are six jurisdictions that have been basically handed back to the provinces which basically decentralize and take away a little power from the federal government.

Yet already in the debate in Quebec we have heard, understandably, in trying to sell the message there that in effect there is going to be even more dialogue and debate to make sure there are more powers that are given to certain provinces because they feel for their reasons they need them.

While some in this Chamber think that this debate and/or even October 26 will close the chapter—and I agree with my colleague—on this section, the fact of constitutional debate and dialogue in some form is an ever present factor in our country. It is something that we should recognize and not try to shy away from.

Let us also not fall into the trap of thinking think that if we settle the issue, albeit for a while, on October 26 that they then are going to settle all the other issues that Canadians quite understandably complain about because that is an ongoing thing.

Time is extremely limited. The first ministers tried to come up with an agreement and eventually confirmed it in Charlottetown. I hestitated to do it but I felt as a member of Parliament with some years experience here that I should let my constituents and/or anyone else interested know what I felt about what had been agreed upon so before the ink was dry I issued a press release on August 21.

It said among other things:

> Even in this summer of constitutional fatigue, all Canadians, and especially new Canadians, should be concerned with some of the constitutional proposals coming out of the incestuous incubator in Ottawa—in the laudable effort of nation-building, and practising the Canadian history of compromise to an extreme, Canada's first ministers, in spite of all the political euphoria, may very well be creating more problems than this country can digest. In particular, the so-called Senate agreement is a Triple-E charade, centralizing even more power in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec and Quebec's guarantee in perpetuity of 25 per cent of the seats in the House of Commons—

I do not mind a guarantee of seats, but not 25 per cent of the seats in the House of Commons in perpetuity. There is not a jurisdiction in the world that guarantees a percentage of seats forever and a day in perpetuity. As part of the Charlottetown agreement it will take unanimous consent to change federal institutions. Once we get a percentage involved in a constitution for an amount of seats we are never going to change it.

I suggested that it was a time bomb to federalism and representation by population. Frankly, with all the dilemmas and all the problems, it is even more dangerous in the long run than any threatening referendum deadline in the province of Quebec. I continued:

> And, while all applaud the agreement in principle, to recognize the plight and resolve the exclusion of native peoples in the decision-making process, a creation of an undefined third level of government is fraught with peril for a meaningful federal state—for instance, does the vague and general peace, order and good government power of the federal government, usually applied only in emergency in times of national crisis, mean that this new order is not subordinate to the laws of the federal and provincial governments—and where does the Charter of Rights and Freedoms fit into such a scheme?

I speak as a Nova Scotian whose province is going to lose seats in this agreement. The power is going to be centralized even more and there will be 42 extra members. We have not even talked in the House about the costs involved not only of new members but of the elected Senate.

I am one of those who is for the abolition of the Senate, but I am also one who feels that if we are going to have a Senate it should be elected. I have been wrestling with this problem. I have to compliment those who came up with the Charlottetown agreement on a most ingenious document, sort of a mutation between a parliamentary system of representation by population and a recognition of provinces of equal and yet also special characteristics. In effect they are to have equal senators but then have within the Senate a double majority on issues of language and culture. Perhaps at the most there will be 15 francophone senators, some from Quebec, some from New Brunswick, some from Ontario, and most likely one from Nova Scotia. Those 15 will be able to veto any legislation affecting language and culture.

For the preservation of the French fact and the French language I have no hesitation in terms of language. That is pretty definitive but, Madam Speaker, you have been an expert and have graced the stage in Quebec. You know more about culture than I do.

What is the definition of culture? I could suggest the ramifications of what could be culture and could be affected by this mutated Senate and House of Commons but I do not have the time.

I do not know. There is all this talk about the Senate having no power. We could have an interesting debate on that, but we are going to have 62 senators and in effect a joint session of the House. Where is the equality on some issues like this double majority? There will be the 15 francophone senators or up to 15. I do not imagine there will ever be any more. They will be able to veto legislation and in a joint session of the House the numbers will apply. Forty-two new members is more than what we have in Atlantic Canada today; we have 32 members. There will be 18 and 18 from Quebec and Ontario. Even those 36 members are more than we have in the total of Atlantic Canada. That is one of the reasons.

I know time is limited, but I want to refer to a person for whom I have a great deal of respect although I have never met him. I want to be fair on this. This man, Dr. Michael Bliss, in The Toronto Star of Thursday, September 3, wrote one article about the unity deal.

This article is entitled: "All the laws of Meech—and more". Then, to be fair, he said he would write another one, which he did on Sunday, September 6 in which he said in effect: "Opting for constitutional peace in our time". That is the dilemma that members face in terms of this debate. Do we examine this in terms of the negatives or do we try to opt for constitutional peace in our time? He has summarized it and I am going to his little article very quickly.

It is the negative side which I have come down on in terms of this constitutional conference. He summarizes in very succinct detail the problems that I have with this Charlottetown agreement. He wrote this article before Charlottetown. We have not seen the legal text, of course we are not going to see it, and of course who is going to read it anyway? Whether Canadians will even have a chance to see it before they vote is something that we do not know, but the fact of the matter is that we know the general outlines.

In effect, Mr. Bliss says let us assume that the outlines are there and then presents the case for voting against the changes. He states:

> The deal is indeed Meech plus. It contains many of the flaws of Meech plus a few more.
> Quebec gets special status. The whole Constitution, including the Charter, is to be interpreted in light of the recognition of Quebec as a distinct society.
> Quebec is guaranteed 25 per cent of the seats in the House of Commons no matter what happens to its population. It might eventually become absurdly over-represented, especially as immigration increases the population of the West.
> Moreover, a handful of francophone senators appointed by the government of Quebec will hold effective veto power over any changes to Canada's language legislation and perhaps to a wide range of language-related cultural institutions.
> Ottawa surrenders power to all of the provinces. Any province can, and Quebec certainly will, require Ottawa to vacate a wide range of jurisdictions, including immigration, tourism, recreation, mining, forestry and manpower training. The provinces probably will become dominant in cultural affairs and perhaps in telecommunications.
> Complex delegation provisions in the deal apparently make possible the transfer of many more powers to the provinces. Limits on Ottawa's use of its spending power will probably prevent new national social programs.

I have not got the time but we well know that in the autobiography of the then premier René Lévesque called Options is a statement on page 300-and-something that says: "Give me the power to opt out of federal programs and that is a more important power than a veto for Quebec because if I have the power to opt out I can define my own programs, my special programs, and therefore have my special society within the context of Canada and/or a separate society". I could quote that if I had the time but I do not.

I already mentioned the complex delegation problems and that the spending power will probably prevent new national social programs. We have not really discussed that. I think we have almost given up on that. Every man who ran for the leadership of the Conservative Party when the present Prime Minister took office at a contested Conservative convention, other than the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs, was totally against financial compensation for opting out because they said then, and I still believe correctly, that this will negatively affect social programs. We most likely would not have had medicare, and goodness knows where the devil day care is going to fit if we ever even come to that.

Continuing with Mr. Bliss' article. He states:

> The problem with creating a checkerboard country this way is that eventually the provinces will find ways to impede Canadians' mobility. As the possibility of a real national labour market fades, people's economic opportunities shrink. They become clients of their provincial governments, dependent on government handouts.
> Atlantic Canada in particular will remain over-populated, poor and absurdly over-governed. Senate equality practically rules out the possibility of uniting the Maritime or the prairie provinces.

Ottawa gave up the best hope of countering some of these tendencies. In the final bargaining the Prime Minister again failed to speak for Canada when he abjectly surrendered Ottawa's position that our Constitution must support a real economic union.

If there was any bottom line in our original Confederation, it was that there must be free trade between the provinces. Power-hungry provincial governments have subverted that dream by erecting literally hundreds of barriers to the movement of goods and services.

By the end of the 1990s there may be freer trade between Ontario and Alabama than Ontario and Manitoba, more trade barriers between New Brunswick and Nova Scotia than France and Germany.

Great builders of Canada these provincial premiers, who got a lot and gave up nothing. Proud fathers of a new Canada—a Canada with no national immigration policy, no national manpower policy, no national education policy, no national common market. Something of a comic Canada.

Perhaps a tragic Canada insofar as its native peoples are concerned. Instead of experimenting carefully with native self-government, we are leaping into constitutionalizing a third order of government bound to keep aboriginal Canadians separate from the rest of us.

This is a type of quota and a form of apartheid. It is something that in every other country we object to, but we are going to put it in our Constitution. I say that is a negative.

The reserve system, which the South African racists used to taunt us about as a kind of apartheid, will be strengthened as the basis for a separate realm of native institutions. The self-governing "homelands" of native peoples are unlikely ever to generate the wealth necessary to create real independence and self-reliance; the children of native separation are always going to see themselves as set apart from the Canadian mainstream.

Does the pride that comes with self-government (at least to the newly empowered leadership class) translate into an end to poverty, illiteracy, hopelessness and social disorganization? Ask the people of Africa.

Are we stronger, though, if we make these concessions for the sake of constitutional peace? In the long run nobody believes that the separatist dream will vanish from Quebec or that separatists will never again get power.

Our grandchildren may also note that we made this new Constitution under duress, when Quebec put a knife to the throat of Canada. They may ask themselves whether this was worthy of a free people. They may ask why we wrote the faddish ideas of the 1980s—inherent self-government, the NDP's social charter—into a Constitution that was supposed to last for centuries. Above all will they ask why we agreed to strengthen the powers of governments to restrain the liberties of individuals. Why did we turn our backs on Pierre Trudeau's vision of Canada, in which the people were more important than the politicians?

When they tell us that a "no" vote is a vote—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I must interrupt the hon. member.

Mr. Nowlan:

—is a vote to dismember Canada, remind them that we have a functioning Constitution. Quebec probably would not separate, and if it did Canada would survive. If necessary, it would be better to have two real nations than one pretend country.

Madam Speaker, in conclusion I have a suggestion—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Please. Would the hon. member who has been here a long time give the Speaker some courtesy. I wish the hon. member had asked because more than likely members would have allowed him an extra 30 seconds to end his speech. I am quite prepared to ask the members. I have been asking the hon. member to conclude and it is now almost two minutes past the time when he should have stopped.

Do members agree to allow the hon. member a few seconds to conclude?

An hon. member: One minute.

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Speaker, I just had to read that. It just summarized so many thoughts and there are so many other things that could be said about this. I have not even gone into general equality in Nova Scotia where my premier says there are going to be three women and three men. Historically we have always had an Acadian senator. We can get into a whole argument there.

I have a positive suggestion for both the no and the yes forces. I think the smouldering disdain of the public is something that is not going to be anti anything. It is not going to be anti-Quebec. It is not going to be anti any one issue in this constitutional agreement. It is really going to be anti-politicians when the public realizes that we have more politicians and more types of government, such as self-government for the aboriginals, where there are over 650 bands that could have forms of government. Are they paramount with provinces or above provinces? From a distance, after you get rid of euphoria, it is a real mish-mash.

I know there are some in this Chamber that want to make sure the country breaks up. I feel the country has a pretty good Constitution at the moment. It has grown from 1867 and has done a lot of things for Canadians in the 125 years we have been here. That is where we can go back to the bedrock. However, if the no forces really want to win, then if they promise Canadians, whether it is in Quebec or anywhere in the country, that if there was a no vote there would be a moratorium on constitutional conferences and discussions for 20 years, I think that would help them.

In conclusion, the yes people, as Premier Getty did today, will have to remove themselves in a political way and move forward to help get a yes vote from the majority of this country.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, I first would like to thank the hon. member for Mount Royal for her courteous gesture in letting me speak after I missed my turn because I was not paying attention.

Like all Canadians, I imagine, and like all the residents of Beauharnois—Salaberry, I am very glad and very pleased today, at long last, to see the light at the end of the constitutional tunnel.

The debate on the Constitution has been part of the national political scene for most of my life, and I must admit there were times when I thought I would never see the end of this debate during my lifetime.

• (2140)

I am particularly glad because I worked as parliamentary secretary to the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs and witnessed all the hard work done by this gentleman, this great Canadian, whose dedication to his country goes beyond personal consideration. I was very pleased to have this opportunity to work under a truly great minister.

I also take great satisfaction in the fact that the agreement to be ratified by Canadians on October 26 not only gives Quebec its historic place within our federation but also responds to the traditional aspirations and demands of the other great components of Canadian society: the western and Atlantic provinces, by providing a remedy for their feelings of alienation from the central government; and to the aboriginal people by recognizing their inherent and historic right to self-government.

We have before us an agreement that is acceptable and honourable, both for Quebec and for Canada as a whole. It is up to us to take up the torch and say yes to this agreement if we want to leave our children a dynamic and prosperous country. I repeat, we have before us an agreement that is acceptable and honourable.

Madam Speaker, one of the debates in this House which I particularly appreciated was the debate on abortion. I remember that at the time I met people whose position was similar to mine, one I initially supported, and I told them: "There is a flaw in your proposal. It is realistic but it is not votable". We always have to make sure that when we adopt legislation in this House, it will be acceptable to the majority of Canadian men and women. It must be legislation that Canadians and the people in the ridings approve of. The same applies here. We must have a proposal that is votable here and votable by Canadians in every riding in this country on October 26.

[English]

I am especially proud of the fact that the interests of all Canadians have been addressed in the August accord. As a Quebecer and as a Canadian I am not blind to the realities of Canada. Just as recognition of Quebec as a distinct society is an important, meaningful symbol for Quebec so an equal Senate is an important symbol for the west, as is the recognition of aboriginal Canadians' inherent right to self-government, a reality that has always existed and will always continue to exist regardless of what a constitution says or does not say.

[Translation]

Had it been adopted, the Meech Lake Accord would have had much the same result but only for Quebec. It would have led to a first series of constitutional amendments meeting Quebec's expectations but this first phase would have been followed—as provided for in the accord reached two or three years ago—by a succession of planned constitutional conferences growing increasingly difficult and time-consuming. We would probably still be a long way from completing the constitutional amendment process and meeting the demands of all the parties involved.

But all is well that ends well, as the saying goes, because it is better at this time to settle the constitutional question for a while so that we can turn our attention to economic issues too urgent and too important to be set aside by our little conflicts and family feuds.

At a time when Europe is redefining itself as a monolithic economic entity and the countries of South-east Asia are thinking of doing the same thing, when the former communist states are about to embrace the free enterprise system, when we must learn to live with North American free trade and market globalization, the time has come, Madam Speaker, to start working together to hold our own in an increasingly competitive world.

We have seen plant closures as well as the sudden dissolution or merger of formerly reliable large businesses—as has happened in my constituency of Beauharnois—Salaberry where, as you know, Madam Speaker, the Goodyear company has experienced difficulties. But now Dominion Textile is closing its last plant in the riding, in Valleyfield, after having given birth to the city itself. There have been major plant closures and industrial changes. Unfortunately, the technological progress and unemployment caused by these unpredictable complications are only the tip of the iceberg in terms of the impact of the economic realignment currently in progress all over the world.

[English]

While all other countries are moving forward and seizing the future we cannot afford to remain riveted to the past, looking inward.

It is no wonder that Canadians, particularly job seekers waiting for the fruits of economic recovery to reach them, are tired of hearing about the Constitution. To be perfectly frank, I agree with them. We must move on to other things and deal with other priorities. Canada is already paying the price of continued uncertainty on the constitutional front.

One thing is certain. All Canadians and Quebecers agree that we need a workable and durable solution to the constitutional dilemma we face. We need it so that all governments can concentrate on building the stronger economy we need to ensure prosperity for all.

[Translation]

Last week on the news I heard Quebecers say how concerned they were about their immediate future because they had just lost their jobs. Unfortunately, they believe that the completion of the constitutional process will not improve their own situation. I sympathize whole-heartedly with these people and I would like to tell them that it is perhaps because of the constitutional instability in Canada that they are now in such in a difficult position and that once we have put all these discussions behind us, we should be able to regain the confidence of foreign investors and create jobs for those who want to work.

Positive co-operation between trading partners in Canada has, until now, given us a favourable competitive position in relation with the United States and the other great economic powers of Europe and Asia. The strong business links between Quebec and the other Canadian provinces have done a lot to give us international credibility. Thanks to these strong economic relationships, Canada now enjoys a very high standard of living, indeed, the highest among the world's seven most industrialized countries. In this regard, the purchase of the de Havilland aeronautics company by Bombardier from Quebec, thanks to the support of the governments of Canada and Ontario, is an excellent example of economic co-operation among Canadian partners.

As the chief executive officer of the SNC group, Mr. Guy Saint-Pierre, said:

> No country, no people can guarantee its own social progress and development without economic prosperity.
> Economic prosperity and national unity are indeed two indissociable elements which will put Canadians in a better position to meet international challenges resulting from the globalization of markets.

Canadian companies and businesses now enjoy international confidence, thanks to a reputation which took years to build up and which has virtually become a trademark itself.

Also, as we know, this year the United Nations Program for Human Development put Canada in first place in terms of over-all quality of life.

I am convinced that we are all happy of our fate when we compare ourselves to others and also happy to be living here. In fact, it would seem that a lot of foreigners, including some from rich and prosperous countries, are envious of our life-style and our standard of living.

If we were able to get there it is because others before us had the wisdom to invest in economic union and co-operation by signing the federation pact 125 years ago. It is because our ancestors, our grandparents and our parents took over from each other and strived to improve their situation and that of their children. And they were right, Madam Speaker.

Of course there have always been tensions within the Canadian federation, sometimes very strong ones, but Canadians were always able to make the adjustments and the compromises necessary to preserve the gains achieved and continue on the road to social progress and economic prosperity.

Some even feel that it is precisely those tensions between the different regions and the different components of our country that give us our strength and our energy. This is particularly true in the constitutional field.

Indeed, it was not easy to reach the present agreement. On the other hand though, it is the first time that there is a consensus on a package of amendments which, as I was saying, are accepted by the leaders of all governments.

It is the first time there is a consensus on a package of amendments and I want to emphasize that.

[English]

I want my children to grow up proud to be Quebecers and proud to be Canadians. I want them to enjoy all the benefits I had of growing up in a large country, large in size, large in spirit, large in generality, large in tolerance and large in opportunity.

• (2150)

This is what this debate is about. It is about saying yes to a future together.

[Translation]

Let us decide once and for all if we want to stay one of the frontrunners among the main industrialized nations and to face with confidence and optimism the great economic changes of the 21st century.

[English]

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak on behalf of the constituents of Mount Royal riding in this debate on the referendum and the question to be placed before the people of Canada which will begin that much wider dialogue by Canadians with Canadians and about the promise and the opportunities for a united future together.

Early in this century, Prime Minister Laurier said that the 20th century belonged to Canada. Since then we have grown and prospered as a nation. We have met and overcome many difficulties, many formidable challenges and we are now a nation on the verge of greatness.

Without national unity, however, we will not achieve this potential. The question is whether greatness is within our grasp. As a nation, we have chosen to measure greatness not on the basis of military might or purely on the basis of economic or material well-being, but on our capacity to give all Canadians access to the diverse benefits of citizenship, even as they share in its obligations.

We have identified equality as a central value, a goal still to be attained. We have progressed from a vision of two solitudes to one of a bilingual and bicultural Canada to the real vision of today, a Canada that is a bilingual, multicultural society. That is a truly proud achievement.

The message of this vision is that unity can exist alongside diversity, that difference and distinctiveness are precious, unlimited resources waiting to be tapped for our mutual benefit. Ironic as it may sound, Canada's unity lies in this diversity and I would suggest to you that if we would accept it and build upon it, we would build a strength as a people and a nation that is unparalleled.

The United Nations and the world see us as a wonderful country, but it would be even more wonderful and certainly a model for the world. All of this positive spirit flows from our diversity when fairness and equality are our core objectives. If we can translate this pluralistic vision into reality, the 20th century will surely have been Canada's and the 21st century will be as well.

It is true that there was some malaise in the east, in the west, in the north, among the aboriginals and in Quebec. These various groups felt that they wanted to have some of their concerns addressed once again.

I am not so sure that we needed to reopen this Constitution. I think we would have been far better off if we paid more attention to the economy and to those daily bread and butter issues that affect our country. Notwithstanding that, this government did decide to open the Constitution, and the consensus which was arrived at in Charlottetown on August 28 speaks to this vision and to the values of our nation, its history and its many diverse realities, be they cultural, geographical or traditional.

As we know, a constitution is a living document that outlines the structures, responsibilities and arrangements that help bring order to a society. It is in a sense a primer, expressing the values of a people and how they wish to live and work together in neighbourliness and in understanding.

I do not want to give the impression that this is a perfect document. It is not, but constitutions as living documents must change as the society changes. I think this may well be the best that we could have done at this time.

There was a little disturbance in the gallery today and I think there is some misunderstanding about what has been accomplished in these changes. The Charter of Rights and Freedoms remains in place.

Our commitment to multiculturalism remains in place. Section 15, which is the section on equality and non-discrimination and allows for affirmative action for people who are mentally and physically handicapped, for minorities of all kinds, remains in place.

Gender equality remains recognized in the Constitution. The country holds fast in its commitment to these values and these are not being changed; those things that were brought in in 1982.

What is important in here and what is new is we have amendments that recognize officially the linguistic duality of this country and the responsibility of governments for the vitality and development of official language minority communities throughout Canada.

It puts into the Constitution the Canadian reality of racial and ethnic equality, of respect for individuals and collective human rights, and again for the equality of men and women. It is not perfect, that is true. On that we all agree and certainly our leader, my leader, spoke to that eloquently today as did the member for Papineau—Saint-Michel who has so capably handled the dossier on this side of the House.

As a package at this time in our history it is an agreement that I and the Liberal Party are prepared to support. While some say this is a consensus by exhaustion, I say to you I think it represents a degree of progress.

My view of this constitutional agreement comes from many sources as it will for most Canadians; life experience, family experience, community experience. They all form a part of how we see our country and the Constitution.

I say to you I am a proud Quebecer. I am a proud Canadian. I am an English speaking Canadian living in Quebec, living in great harmony with my neighbour in many languages, not only English, or not only French. For me and for most of my neighbours speaking two languages is no hardship, it is an enrichment. Speaking three is better and speaking four is even better. Living comfortably with my neighbours is not a matter of language.

I am very happy to be part of this Quebec family just as I am a part of my own family and, of course, just as a I am a proud member of the Canadian family. Just as we love our family and that love is built on values, on sharing, caring, and respect, so too is our love for this much larger family, that of Canada.

Sometimes we do not all agree. I certainly have heard of the local husband and wife who have had an argument. I too have fallen into that category more than once and I do not always agree with what my children do or say, but they are always welcome at our table and they come loved and blessed, as does anyone who is part of the Canadian family.

I have faith in Canada and in our wonderful country and our ability to build consensus and to live together peacefully and in harmony. If you look around the world and see what is going on in many other nations of this world, you can say this is a very small and civilized way in which we are looking at the concerns that are being expressed and trying to bring them into a cohesive force.

I would hope that many of the residents of my riding will actively participate in the democratic process. I hope they will be encouraged to join in what is the ultimate exercise in democracy in Mount Royal riding and everywhere else in Canada. Get out and vote is my message.

If I were to travel in a helicopter and circle over the riding of Mount Royal I would see a great plurality of cultures, a tapestry of language, faith, colour, and religion. The people in the town of Mount Royal, Côte St. Luc, Hampstead, Snowdon, Côte Des Neiges, come from various backgrounds but what ties them together is their deep abiding appreciation for the freedom to move about and to be associated with anyone with whom they choose, to speak out on issues that concern them freely, unfettered, uninhibited, and to enjoy the benefits of this great country. They may worship or not in freedom and this is a wonderful open society.

To be sure many in Mount Royal still struggle to get by working very, very hard to achieve the standard of living they desire for themselves and for their children. It is for this very reason so many chose to come to this country in the very first place. They have come to Canada. Over a third of this country have come. Actually, outside of the aboriginals, we were all immigrants to this wonderful land.

I am amazed at how day in and day out, where there has been such great unemployment and such large instability and a degree of racism which has raised its ugly head, they have not felt discouraged. But no, these people came here. They are prepared to persevere for themselves and for their children. They came because of this community, their province and this country which holds out so much promise.

They do not realize the full impact or the detail that is in this Constitution. In fact, for them they often say that it is giving them constipation. But they do know it is affecting the quality of their lives and they want to get this over with. They want to say yes to a healthy inclusive Quebec in a strong Canada. They know they have a stake in the decision.

The constitutional agreement at hand, as I said, is not perfect. My leader addressed some of its achievements and some of its concerns in his speech. There are many changes and improvements however that I want to bring to your attention.

There is a reformed Senate. It is equal, it is elected. It may not be as effective as we would want and hopefully there will be ways in which we can improve that. There is a recognition for the first time of the inherent right to aboriginal self-government and for this alone we should be very proud.

The Canada clause in itself is a value statement. Who and what we are and what we wish to pass on to our children is found in that document. I would say there are many characteristics which are affirmed in the new Canada clause. One of them is the distinct society clause. I support the definition of Quebec as a distinct society because it is defined with its language, its culture and its civil code.

I also believe that the vitality and development of linguistic minorities must be recognized as an integral element of Canadian society. Clearly, any agreement on the renewal of the Constitution must place the responsibility on both federal and provincial governments to recognize these realities. This would affirm the idea that the unity of Canada is based on its diversity from coast to coast to coast.

Mr. Speaker, I want to bring to your attention a matter that is of some concern to me and I hope this is just some draft language that has come out of the consensus report on the Constitution.

In the value section that is in the Canada clause we talk about Canada being a democracy that is committed to a parliamentary and federal system of government and to the rule of law. We go on to talk about our commitment in it to the distinct society, to the vitality and development of the languages, racial and ethnic equality. The word is "committed".

On the French side we use an entirely different word which does not fully translate the meaning of commitment to me. It may well be that I do not have the language skills, but when we say "committed" in English and we say on the other hand—

[Translation]

—the fact that Canada is a democracy "attached" to a parliamentary system and that all the characteristics are those of an attachment instead of a "commitment",

[English]

I would hope that we have clarity in the final document that will be tabled.

I wanted to just bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, some of the other concerns I have not only with respect to the Senate and with respect to the linguistic minority and the attachement and engagement and commitment, but as well to the fact that the final legislative document I hope will be fidèle to the text that was there before.

Also, as my concern is often expressed around the cultural content in our society,

[Translation]

—we must preserve the artistic rights and freedom of expression of Canadian men and women across the country.

[English]

I believe that official bilingualism and multiculturalism are the essence of Canadian society today. The cultural community must be able to access doors to enable its creative work at all levels of government and the private sector to be distributed, seen and heard anywhere. The arts are essential to the development of Canadian identity and sovereignty. The Liberal Party believes the role of the federal government must be to ensure Canadian artists have opportunities to practise their art and that all Canadians have access to it. We need that strong federal public role as a complement to provincial, municipal and private roles.

I would conclude by saying to the constituents in Mount Royal riding that I would urge them to get out and vote. I just want to bring to their attention a small document. This is a document which the government has produced which everyone should read to understand better what is going on. They can get it by either calling my office or they can call 1-800-561-1188 and they will be better informed because a 30-second TV clip will not give them the full picture.

Get out, support the referendum, do your work everybody, and participate in the great act of the democratic right to vote.

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief as I will be sharing my allotted time with my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton—Strathcona.

Today and in the days and weeks ahead leading up to October 26, we are being confronted with an historic opportunity, a chance to renew the Canadian federation in a way which respects and reconfirms the three essential equalities of our nation: The equality of persons, the equality of provinces and the equality of our founding English and French linguistic and cultural communities. In addition, we have finally recognized in a truly Canadian way the inherent right of our aboriginal citizens to form their own governments within Canada.

This is not a simple deal, nor is it, as many speakers have noted, a perfect deal from any one point of view. This agreement was not reached from just one narrow point of view. It encompasses a careful and public consideration of millions of points of view which were brought to the table by 17 or more negotiators, including premiers, territorial leaders, aboriginal leaders and, of course, our Prime Minister, the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs, and the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

I wish to congratulate and thank all of these great Canadians for their dedication and for putting one point of view above all others, that of Canada.

I would like to pay special tribute in this regard to the premier of my own province, the hon. Don Getty, who today has announced that he will soon be retiring as premier of Alberta. Mr. Getty took on a seemingly impossible task during these negotiations when he determined to follow through on the promise of Meech Lake to bring about meaningful change in the Senate. By championing and leading the fight for a Triple-E Senate, he has truly changed forever the dynamics of Canadian politics.

The new Senate will be elected, equal and effective. It will clearly allow the five smallest provinces and one territory to prevent the imposition of another national energy program. Mr. Getty deserves recognition and our sincere thanks for this historic achievement. I wish him, his wife Margaret and his family all the best as they embark on this new phase of their lives and careers.

In the few minutes available to me tonight it is only possible for me to highlight the agreement. I do not expect nor do I advise anyone to make up their mind to support this agreement without investigating it in detail. There are some major achievements for Albertans which I would like to point out.

First, there is the reform of the Senate, which I have already mentioned. By a simple majority, the new Senate will be able to kill federal legislation which taxes natural resources. It will also be responsible for approving federal appointments to such bodies as the Bank of Canada and other national institutions. Similarly, it may suspend bills for 30 days. Most important, the Senate, whose members will have the credibility which comes from election, will be able to force a joint sitting with the House of Commons if it rejects a bill by a simple majority. The joint sitting must be preceded by a conference to discuss differences and try to reach a satisfactory compromise. I predict that this function, along with the ability of the Senate to initiate legislation, will become one of the most powerful and effective tools in our body politic. When the House and the Senate sit jointly there will be a dramatic shift in the way legislation is treated.

Parenthetically, I would like to note that this is a tremendous improvement over the American process in which disagreements between the Senate and the House of Representatives can lead to gridlock, preventing urgent and necessary action from being taken. History will show that this is another example of the power and efficiency of Canadian compromise.

Alberta also wins in the House of Commons. We will get an additional two seats immediately, and most probably another two after the 1996 census. Fortunately, when this agreement is ratified the total number of members of Parliament, Senators and MPs will be the same as it is now.

Alberta also gains from the recognition of exclusive provincial jurisdiction in the oil, gas and mining industries, not to mention in the areas of forestry, tourism, housing, municipal and urban affairs and labour market training. In the future, if Ottawa sets out a national program in these areas the province can implement its own program with complementary objectives and request its share of the funding. This will bring decision-making closer to home. Alberta, like other provinces, will also be able to negotiate an immigration agreement, giving it better control over people who are coming to our province.

Finally, Alberta has achieved full equality with other provinces in being given a veto on any future changes to our national institutions, namely the Supreme Court, the Senate and the House of Commons. It is important for Albertans to understand both the power and the limitations of this veto.

I have heard people saying that they are disappointed because Quebec got the veto. In my view, this shows a clear misunderstanding of the battle for equality that Triple-E advocates have been fighting so vigorously. Having won the Triple-E Senate, we would not want seven provinces with 50 percent of the population to be able to undo it without our agreement. If we are to truly respect the concept of provincial equality in our federation, then it is fundamental that the make-up of the Senate, the Supreme Court and the House of Commons cannot be touched without our consent or the consent of every other member of the federation.

One of the most difficult tasks in achieving this agreement was the reconciliation of provincial equality, personal equality and the equality inherent in our linguistic duality. I have received a number of comments about Quebec's minimum 25 percent allotment of the seats in the House of Commons, which is a recognition of the equality of our two founding linguistic and cultural communities. It is important to balance this with the guarantees given to other provinces of minimum numbers of seats, regardless of their populations. These guarantees reflect provincial equalities.

For example, when the House and Senate sit together each resident of Prince Edward Island will be represented by 10 votes compared to only one vote for each resident in my constituency of Calgary North. Quebec would be about 3 per cent under-represented in this situation and Alberta would be slightly over-represented. This is a clear indication that at least for smaller provinces the provincial equality that we fought so hard for is well represented indeed.

In closing, I want to again thank everyone: the citizens of Calgary North who attended town hall meetings, answered questionnaires and wrote me letters, all the people in Canada who seized this opportunity to participate in the future of this country and particularly our aboriginal, territorial, provincial and national leaders who worked so tirelessly to draft this extraordinary agreement. On October 26 I will say yes to Canada.

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased tonight to speak on this most important matter facing our nation. At the outset, I would like to thank the member for Calgary North for sharing his time with me.

Although many of us have constitutional fatigue we must persevere through this debate in Canada because although the Constitution is distant and seems academic at times, it affects each of us every single day of our lives. The constitution is the basis for how society is governed, structured, and organized. If a constitution is rigid and unyielding, society will experience social stresses and economic strains and perhaps even disintegration. Constitutions should be living documents.

Tonight I will not speak to each and every issue in the Charlottetown accord because of time limitations. However, I do want to endorse many of the comments my Quebec colleagues have made about how the accord affects them, Quebec and the people of Quebec and those who have spoken very eloquently about how the accord deals with aboriginal people.

I will limit my comments to those issues which are of concern to western Canadians and to those issues many of my own constituents have expressed to me.

Constitutions are important because they affect us every day. For example, trade barriers between provinces make goods more expensive and Canadians have fewer dollars in their pockets to spend. This is the direct result of how a society is organized by way of our Constitution. Our standard of living is lower than it should be. Overlap and duplication by having separate federal and provincial departments cost us money. We as a nation have experienced social stresses, most notably in dealing with our aboriginal communities.

Our constitution up until now has not allowed for new approaches to accommodate different needs of French and English Canadians and of aboriginal Canadians; for example, the francophones outside of Quebec and English Canadians within Quebec and minorities and others. This accord, although not perfect, makes these necessary accommodations.

A constitution needs to be a framework for society. It must embody values and provide stability, but it must evolve to accommodate and balance these interests. It affects us every day. One might say that the Constitution, because it had few or no regional checks or balances, allowed a gross abuse of power in the early 1980s which was perpetrated on Alberta through the National Energy Program.

Today's proposals respond to changing needs and now would protect, for example, the interests of western Canadians. A national energy program would no longer be possible under the accord reached at Charlottetown.

I ask Canadians to take a close look at these proposals, to look very carefully. The Constitution affects us every day. It is vitally important for every Canadian to consider their future and their children's future.

The accord is not perfect. It is a compromise. As compromises go, it is a pretty good compromise. I believe this accord will wear well. Today's criticisms, viewed from a perspective of 20 or 30 years experience, will seem exaggerated and perhaps unfounded. For example, a Senate will become a unique Canadian institution. It will be effective. Most members of Parliament do not have their hands on the levers of power but they are effective. They express their concerns through their caucuses, through the House of Commons, through committees, in speeches and in statements to the media. Governments need the support of their members. MPs have influence. We are effective. The new Senate will be effective.

As elected officials, senators will gain a degree of legitimacy never before seen. There will be very few of them, so in using their powers of review, ratification of appointments and the ability to block legislation, they will have plenty of clout.

Some people on another issue have said the west was short-changed by not gaining as many seats in the House as it deserves. This, as the hon. member for Calgary North pointed out, will be rectified. In Alberta we will gain two seats right now and after the next redistribution in 1996 perhaps two more.

As time goes on and the House becomes fully represented by population, this will all equal out. The west will particularly gain because the west has a fast growing population.

Although I support this accord fully, I must sound a cautionary note by loading up the House of Commons. We will sacrifice efficiency and effectiveness if we expand the House indefinitely. The House must continue to evolve to allow members to better represent their constituents.

• (2220)

Tonight I thought I would express my views on one or two aspects of the Constitution. I want to go on to say a few words about the social and economic union. I am disappointed that we did not achieve full economic union. I encourage the government and the premiers to examine the issue of an economic union very closely. The initial agreement of July 7 had 13 exceptions. That is far too many. We need to bring down our trade barriers. We need to organize our economy on an efficient level and this is one of the challenges of the future.

In closing, I want to thank those who contributed to the making of this constitutional accord. First and foremost, I want to thank the leaders of our provinces and the Prime Minister and especially the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs and the Minister of National Health and Welfare. They did a tremendous job and put in a lot of long hours.

I especially want to pay tribute to Don Getty who achieved a lifelong dream for many Albertans of a Triple-E Senate, an elected Senate. Mr. Getty announced his resignation today. He will be noted in history has having made a vital and outstanding contribution.

I want to also thank those Canadians who participated in the many commissions and who will participate in the referendum. There is a lot at stake for each and every one of us and I encourage every Canadian to get out and vote to support this accord.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to briefly speak on the question of the Canadian Constitution.

I want members to know that I intend to support the constitutional agreement reached by the federal government, by the provincial and territorial first ministers and by aboriginal leaders in Charlottetown on August 28. I will be encouraging people in my constituency to support the agreement and I hope that all Canada will support it when it comes to the referendum to be held on October 26.

Many members have indicated that this agreement is essentially a compromise. Nobody who went to Charlottetown on August 28 really came out of that meeting with all they were demanding or exactly what they were demanding. Like any agreement in a democracy, people make demands, expect to concede in some areas and to gain in others. I believe that what came out of Charlottetown was probably the best that a collection of first ministers and aboriginal groups, representing diverse areas of the country and diverse groups within the communities of this country, could possibly hope to achieve.

As the previous speaker suggested, all Canadians should be congratulated on the effort that went into achieving this agreement and the tremendous amount of time, interest and enthusiasm that was put into it by all Canadians.

As many members have pointed out today, the agreement is not perfection. If any of us were capable of perfection, whether in drafting a constitution or drafting legislation, there would no longer be a use for an entity such as Parliament and we could close down and go home now. Therefore, I do not think we are going to get perfection.

When some members were speaking I was concerned about the fact that they said: "Thank goodness it is all over. The constitutional fatigue that has set in will be finished on October 26". I have a message for those folks as well. This country has probably been involved in the constitutional game a lot longer than any other country on the globe, from the time of the military orders that were passed by Guy Carleton and Governor Murray in Quebec City in 1759, through the Proclamation of 1763, the Quebec Act of 1774, the Constitution Act of 1791, the new Constitution in 1840 and 1841, and the Constitution of 1867 and 1982.

Given the perspective of Canadian constitutional history, I am not convinced that the constitutional issue will be closed when Canadians vote yes for this constitutional agreement on October 26 of this year.

Having said that, it has to be acknowledged that at Charlottetown some very dramatic things were achieved by those who were involved in this constitutional debate. First and foremost is the acknowledgement that Quebec, should the referendum pass in Quebec on October 26, will become a party to this agreement and will become a part of the Canadian constitutional family. Its unique cultural and historic position in the Canadian union will be recognized in the Constitution.

The real progress that has been made in this constitutional document and I think one that held up the Meech Lake accord is the recognition of the inherent right of aboriginal self-government. In recognizing an inherent right this Constitution is not creating a right for aboriginal people. It is doing what is unique among the nations of the world, and that is recognizing aboriginal people have had this right to self-government since before we non-aboriginal people came here, from time immemorial.

It means they have the right to make laws, to govern their own people, to enter into agreements with Canada as to which laws of Canada and the provinces will be binding on aboriginal people. It is quite a unique position for aboriginal people to occupy in a constitution in any country around the globe. As time wears on, the one thing that will be recognized around the world about this Constitution is the revolutionary change that has taken place in Canada with respect to the constitutional recognition of aboriginal people.

This part of the document will become a model for other countries of the world to work on, to improve on, and perhaps those improvements having been adopted in other countries will then be brought back to Canada and Canada may build on those improvements as well. Therefore I think in that part of this document we have created a lesson for all of the world, and it is a lesson all Canadians can be proud of.

Nobody can really understand what aboriginal people in this country have gone through over the last few centuries. When European colonists first came here in the 15th and 16th century they found aboriginal civilizations that were more highly developed than the civilizations they came from in Europe that were just emerging from the Dark Ages. They respected those people and feared those people because of their superior civilization and organization. Rather than conquering them which they did not think they were able to do, they traded with them, entered into agreements with them, recognized them as sovereign powers and signed treaties of mutual friendship and mutual support with them.

Somewhere along the line the Europeans who came to this continent did gain power and were able to exercise that power over the aboriginal civilizations, to suppress them, to colonize them, to marginalize them, and to make them second-class citizens. It is an era of shame that all Canadians, all North Americans, should be ashamed of.

What has been done with this Constitution in terms of recognizing aboriginal Canadians as an important part of our society, recognizing the historic contribution that aboriginal people have played, and recognizing the inherent right of self-government they enjoyed on this continent from time immemorial, is one of the unique things that has ever happened in this country.

As I say, it is going to be a model and a lesson for the rest of the world. That is one thing about this constitutional accord that I am extremely proud of.

It has been mentioned tonight that one of the things we can boast about getting out of this constitutional agreement is the Triple-E Senate. It is one of the things I was most concerned about. Throughout most of the period of constitutional debate in North America the debate has been between democratic institutions and institutions that represent the propertied interest, the landed gentry.

You will remember when the Constitution Act of 1791 was put together, Mr. Speaker. It may have been a bit before your time.

I do not want to suggest that you are that old.

The Governor-General of the day suggested that this constitution of 1791 would be the image and transcript of the constitution of Great Britain. What he wanted to see most of all was a house in Canada similar to the House of Lords in London that would put into place an indigenous landed gentry in Canada that could look over the shoulders of the democratic rabble that would be elected to the legislative council.

At that time democracy was considered the equivalent of mob rule and it was felt that the landed gentry should have their own house to oversee the House of Commons, in which the democratic rabble have their deliberations. If they found, after a period of sober second thought, that it was not appropriate legislation they could veto it.

I think that kind of idea has gone out of currency. However, today we still have in Canada that relic, that appointed house, the Senate opposite. Another of the things that has been achieved in this Constitution is the end of that propertied, appointed house that was set in place to oversee as a house of sober second thought the democratic rabble and the mob rule that was supposed to be taking place in the elected legislative council.

Fortunately, that concept has gone out of currency and we are now going to see an elected Senate. I would have preferred to see the Senate abolished because I do not think it is necessary. In fact, I think it is an expensive addition to the House. However, if we must have one in order to achieve a constitutional compromise then we have done the right thing here.

What we have not done is what certain elements in Alberta and across Canada were asking for, which is a Senate that represented individual provinces with an equal number of seats per province and ignored the concept of representation by population. It ignored the democratic concept of one person, one vote.

The compromise we have achieved in the Charlottetown agreement is one that recognizes the supremacy of the democratic principle—one person, one vote. Yet it provides for input on a province by province basis into decisions that are made within Canada's national democratic institution.

It is not ideal but it is the ideal compromise that we could get out of those two conflicting beliefs. One is that property should be represented and the other is that people should be represented on the basis of one person, one vote.

The other thing that is a unique achievement in this Constitution is the social charter that was introduced. I think the premier of Ontario should be congratulated for keeping this issue before the public. I know it was endorsed in many of the meetings of citizens that were held across the country.

This charter states that public health care will be a national policy of Canada and that adequate social services and benefits including housing, food and the basic necessities of life should be accessible to all Canadians. Quality education systems, the rights of workers to unionize, environmental protection and the goal of full employment; all of these rights are now stated as policy statements within the Canadian Constitution.

Those statements, while they are not judiciable—they cannot be taken to court—at least can stand in the Constitution as instructions to legislative bodies and to governments in Canada so that they know what the sentiments of the people of Canada were at the time this Constitution was drafted.

I do not share the view that this Constitution is going to stand for all time. Members should not expect that on October 26, once the referendum resolution has been passed in all parts of Canada, the constitutional book is then closed. Canadians love the constitutional debate. They may be tired of this particular one.

There are many things within this Constitution that have to be dealt with. How are aboriginal governments going to be structured? How are they going to relate to other governments in Canada and other governments around the world?

How are policies going to be structured? The Constitution is a framework for policy not the policy itself. Canadians must realize as well that constitutions do not create equality. They do not create prosperity. In that sense they are hollow documents. People have to understand that if they are looking for prosperity, if they are looking for equality, they have to elect politicians and governments that make a commitment to those issues.

Once we pass this Constitution and once we develop the new framework, one thing people must do is take a look at the government that they have in Canada today, the government that in my view has done a great deal of damage to the unity of this country, change that government and elect governments that can bring about prosperity within the framework of our new Constitution.

That is going to be the priority of all Canadians after this debate is over on October 26.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I stand before you today to speak not only for my own constituents but also for a great number of Canadians who have expressed their reservations about this latest constitutional package and the impending referendum.

These people have been made to feel a sense of guilt because they have called into question many of the deficiencies of this proposal put forward by the Prime Minister and the premiers on August 28, 1992. These democratically minded citizens have been labelled enemies of Canada for no other reason than that they have chosen to examine the proposal and voice their concerns.

We know from the latest Environics poll that at least 25 per cent of Canadians would fit into this category, enemies of Canada, as determined by our Prime Minister. It is no wonder that Canadians feel intimidated and suppressed when their own government tells them that if they do not agree with this deal they are unpatriotic at best and perhaps even traitorous.

This is a grievous affront to democracy and a dreadful insult to the Canadian people. This is not a referendum on unity or even a referendum on sovereignty. The Quebec government has changed its own question from sovereignty to the substance of this deal. Therefore, let us be very clear about that.

Despite the tactics of the government, abetted by the Liberals and the NDP, a great many Canadians have shown the courage to ask some tough questions about this deal. One of the questions that has been posed to me by my constituents in the past few days is: "How can the House of Commons possibly approve a question for the referendum before the legal text of this agreement is even written?" It is highly unethical to commence a referendum campaign before the voters even know what the agreement really says. "Let the buyer beware" is as meaningful in politics as it is in day-to-day purchasing.

I find it incomprehensible that neither the Liberal Party nor the New Democratic Party needed to see any text at all before they quickly committed themselves to this deal.

Fortunately the Canadian electorate will be making its decision based on the merits or deficiencies of the package rather than on political expediency. I cannot stress this point enough.

It must be made emphatically clear what the public will actually be voting on. Are Canadians to merely vote on a loose set of principles outlined in this so-called consensus report, that incidentally is not even signed? If so, will this loose set of principles be interpreted broadly or will it be interpreted narrowly by the premiers and the federal government?

The fact of the matter is that neither the Canadian public nor the House of Commons, nor even this Prime Minister, knows exactly what we will be voting on. This government has an obligation to produce a legal text before it puts into motion the wheels of a referendum campaign. The bottom line is that we cannot ask the Canadian people to vote on something they have not even seen. That may be good enough for some of the politicians in this Chamber unfortunately, but I do not believe that it is good enough for the Canadian people.

On Thursday of this week, tomorrow, the caucus of nominated Reform Party members will be announcing our formal positions on the constitutional deal itself. We have not succumbed to the political and media pressure to just jump on any bandwagon. Our position will not be based on political expediency but on thorough research and thorough consultation with the people to whom the Constitution actually belongs.

Aside from the fact that the government is asking Canadians to commit to a deal which is not really a deal, it is also asking them to vote on a question that is not really a question. In other words, the referendum question posed by the government is simply not politically neutral. The phrase "Do you agree" is leading language. No pollster worth his or her salt would ever use such a phrase because it biases respondents to automatically say yes. The term "renewed" is an evaluative, not a descriptive word. It has all sorts of positive connotations that imply implicitly support for the package. Gallup, a well respected Canadian pollster, has remarked that this is a particularly loaded term.

The most frightening aspect of this question, however, is that it does not actually ask voters whether they accept the package or not. Rather it asks whether the Constitution should be changed on the basis of the agreement, not on the agreement itself. Why? The answer is because there is no agreement at this point, at least no legal text.

Such an open-ended question will allow the first ministers to alter the agreement after the referendum if they find it expedient to do so and perhaps even to go ahead with ratification despite a no vote in one or more provinces.

Australians go about their constitutional changes by bringing constitutional amendments for ratification through their federal system and only when those amendments are drawn, written up and debated in Parliament do we see that the people are consulted on it.

I think every Canadian who is watching us tonight and who loves this country, regardless of whether they would vote yes or no, is painfully aware that this system is going about it completely backward, where we are asking people to ratify a deal before they have even seen the deal.

If the government were truly serious about conducting a fair referendum campaign, it would amend its question by changing the word "renewed" to "amended" and by putting the question on the actual legal text rather than some nebulous agreement.

I appeal to my fellow members' sense of justice and objectivity. If members vote in favour of the wording of this particular question, they must realize that they are voting against a balanced and fair referendum campaign.

There are those who might say that if members vote against the particular wording of this proposed question, they are voting against the referendum itself. This of course is absolute nonsense. It should be pointed out that although I disapprove of this particular phrasing, I am fully behind the concept of public ratification of constitutional amendments through national referendums, provided that they are gone about in the right way and that at the end of all these constitutional debates and wranglings and amendments in the federal Parliament as well as every provincial legislature that they would be voted on by people.

Mr. Speaker, you will be aware that I voted for Bill C-81 in the spring despite the many shortcomings that the referendum legislation had. In fact, the Reform Party was the first national party in the House to advocate referendum approval of constitutional amendments. I am aware also that the Liberals have been talking recently about bringing in a referendum but we must also remember that history will bear out that the Liberals have been in charge of this country for roughly two-thirds of our history and this is the first time that we have ever really heard the word referendum. They had many opportunities to bring it about before but it has not come up.

The Liberals have adopted the positions, as with the Tories, albeit reluctantly, but Canadians must ask themselves this question: Why did it take 125 years to do so? The answer lies in the timing. It just so happens that a referendum was deemed to be favourable to their electoral fortunes at this time. Nothing grieves me more than seeing this used as a political tool, rather than an effective means of ratifying something as important as the Constitution of this country.

Political opportunism is evidenced by the fact that they are supporting the biased question now before us. They are merely manipulating the referendum process for political advantage.

I therefore ask all Canadians to take a good hard look at the motivation behind each party's position concerning this question and ask these questions of themselves before they vote on October 26. Is it based on principle? Is it based on consultation with their members and the public or is it based on strategy? I trust that the Canadian public will ask many tough questions and scrutinize the motivation of all members who leaped on to the bandwagon to pass this deal so quickly.

We would hope that the actual legal text that I referred to earlier would be available.

I had a very prominent person say earlier to me today: "I have not seen any legal text, I don't know when I will see any legal text, and I am getting nervous about it and I will be very nervous if I do not see the actual wording of this before October 26".

We all remember painfully the Meech Lake debate and the pain and concern that was demonstrated across the country because of that. Only when the actual text of the Meech Lake accord was put into newspapers across the country was it that Canadians sat up and said "We need to take ownership of this Constitution". When they saw that, they saw that there were deep, deep divisions and serious flaws in the Meech Lake accord. History will bear that out, as I believe history will bear out on this constitutional agreement that was brought forward in Charlottetown, when people get a chance to read it. They are not ignorant, they are not naive. Canadians are not people who would say: "Well, who cares? Let's just get this out of the way". People are deeply concerned about this and when they are given the chance to read the actual legal text I believe that they will do that with conviction and I believe that they will vote regardless of the fact that they may be painted as enemies of Canada by prominent politicians in this country. People are very tired of that.

My friend from Annapolis Valley—Hants referred to that earlier when he said that people are just smouldering with disdain for politicians. I am wondering if this debate will rise above that, or if everyone will just paint it with the stroke of a brush, saying this is political expediency and nothing else.

Recently, one of my Liberal colleagues asked: "Who will speak for Canada?" Yesterday the Prime Minister replied in this Chamber that he would speak for Canada. If that is the case, I must therefore ask who then will speak for Canadians? There can be only one answer. Canadians themselves. This is the Constitution that belongs to them and somehow, finally, we must get to the point in this country where they say: "This is ours and we will take ownership of it, and maybe, just maybe we won't believe everything all the politicians say and we will get hold of this document, whenever it becomes available and we will look at it and we will be allowed to make the decision on this regardless of any amount of political manipulation" which is shown them on TV and I am sure will be in their mailboxes for the next several weeks. They will become very tired of it.

Canadians must be allowed to understand exactly what it is they are voting on. They must be allowed to speak their hearts and minds without fear or threat of being labelled enemies of Canada should their decision not coincide with the Prime Minister's.

The time has come to test the true waters of democracy in Canada. I would encourage anyone watching this debate this evening, anyone who is either politically involved or not politically involved, not just to lie down and say they are tired of listening to this, but to get involved, to read the documents, to talk to people, to phone people with information, and get out and vote on October 26 and not allow themselves to be held ransom to the fact that somebody may be criticizing them, that somebody would say to them: "If you vote yes you are a proud Canadian, but if you don't vote yes then you must not be a proud Canadian".

I have been labelled personally an enemy of Canada, in this Chamber and across the country, by the Prime Minister and some other senior cabinet representatives. I want it on the record that I am offended by that; that I, as well as hundreds of thousands of Canadians who I am speaking for are offended and I daresay resent the fact that because they are trying to look at this in a reasoned and intelligent light that they would be called that. I would beg and implore people in this House of Commons and in the Senate and anywhere else where people are going to campaign as they freely may on the yes side or the no side, that they would rise above that and that we would look at what this is for and exactly what it will do.

Will it freeze the Senate? I do not believe that the third E, effective, will do any good. I believe that when the Senate says in its highlights that we looked at, where we see such things as each province would be assigned six senators and each territory one, that is a breakthrough for the first E of equal. Then we see where they say that additional seats would be added to represent the aboriginal peoples of Canada. If I could see that in a legal text I may be able to have the question answered, how many seats, when, where, how? And then, regarding the second E, election; elections of senators could be by the people, which is what we thought was going to happen. That was wonderful. And then the second half of that sentence says "or by their provincial or territorial legislatures". That means, then, that election of senators is virtually non-existent. It says they can be elected then by their provincial or territorial legislatures.

Maybe things have not come as far as we thought they would. When my premier, Don Getty, came home a couple of weeks ago from Charlottetown saying: "I am Mr. Triple-E. I got a Triple-E. I am all in favour of the yes-side of this referendum." Today, less than 24 hours after legislation is put into place, he resigns. Could this be an abdication from somebody who went home and realized that it is not going to fly? This is no more Triple-E than flying to the moon.

People need to look at this document, test the waters, see what they think of it and in all good conscience vote either yes or no to it, but only after they have taken the time to study the document. Hopefully, the government will bring out the legal text so we will really know what it is we are voting on for Canada.

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I must take a couple of moments at the outset of my comments this evening simply to respond to a couple of the comments that have just been made by the hon. member for Beaver River.

I have to say I am saddened by the tone and the negative approach of this hon. member in her comments here this evening. She claims to have been offended by comments alleged to have been made by the Prime Minister in which she claims to have been labelled as an enemy of Canada.

It is only fair that I set the record straight. The only people who are enemies of Canada are those who would choose to split this country up. Those in the province of Quebec we know well. There may be others in other parts of the country. They can only select themselves.

I believe the Prime Minister has made it clear. There is no question about it when he made a comment in reference to people being enemies of Canada, he was speaking of separatists who declared themselves as separatists and nobody else. I do not think it contributes to this debate to perpetuate that misconception because it is only in the narrow, partisan interests of certain people to perpetuate that kind of unfair characterization of comments.

I have every belief that the hon. member for Beaver River is not an enemy of Canada. I believe people are entitled to differences of opinion on this issue and should not be an enemy of Canada and are not enemies of Canada but simply hold different points of view. To perpetuate this unfair characterization does not serve this debate whatsoever. I would hope that the hon. member would recognize that.

Second, there was a suggestion made that Canadians would not have access to information in this debate. Let me put that to bed right now. Canadians will have full information, including the legal text on this debate, well before October 26 so that they can analyse and understand it. Why in the world would 13 governments and aboriginal leaders in Canada agree to something where they could not put the facts before the people and allow people to make their decisions? They would not do that. That is not a rational decision they would enter into.

I think the people should take a rational and reasonable look at this case. We are all Canadians and we are engaged in a very important debate. All sides of the issue have to be reviewed. People have to look at the information and make up their own minds. That is what I genuinely hope will happen during the course of this debate. I hope that we will not have negative partisan perspectives put forward during the course of this debate, but rather that people will speak from the heart to the issue of Canada, to the future of this nation and to the future that we can all build together.

I am really delighted to have the opportunity to speak here this evening in this important debate. This is an historic debate. Only twice before in this country have Canadians had the opportunity to speak in a referendum in this manner. That is important because referenda do not happen very often in this country. In this nation it is really a measure of our youth and it is a measure of the fact we have only 125 years of maturity behind us that we have experienced only two such events. That means we should take this question very seriously and consider it extremely carefully.

Most important, we have never had an opportunity to vote as a people on such a fundamental and defining characteristic, a defining question, as the one that we have here before us today. This question allows us to go to the very heart of how we define ourselves as a nation, how we treat each other, how we respond to the needs of the diverse regions of this country, how we start over again in building a relationship between aboriginal people and non-aboriginal people, how much respect Canadians are prepared to accord to each other, and to bring it right home, how much we respect ourselves as individuals.

As someone who has laboured long and hard over the last three and a half years, first of all working with people on issues that affect aboriginal Canadians and, second, over the last year on this national unity issue, I am very proud of the accomplishments of the various leaders of this country and the outcome they have been able to achieve in this agreement.

When the Canada round takes its place in the history books that future generations of Canadians will study, it will be remembered as much for its effort to consult as many Canadians as possible on renewed federalism as it will for its success in reconciling differences that have troubled Canada since Confederation.

I have to come back to one point. My colleague from Beaver River suggested that we should ask ourselves what was the basis for our decision to support this package. Was it a question of principle? Your are damn right it was a question of principle. This package has aspects to it that I think lead us to a stronger, more united country, a stronger economy, a better way of life for our people. Was there consultation with Canadians? There has never been consultation with Canadians like there has been over the last two years. Never in the history of this country and never in the history of any western industrialized nation like Canada has there been a consultation like there was in this case to hear from Canadians what their views were, to distil that, to work it through, to work with Canadians who were keenly interested in the issue to arrive at a result.

That has not been done anywhere before. The consultation has been thorough. This is simply the last step in a very long process. I would hope that we would be able on October 26 to finish that off in a manner that does justice to all Canadians and responds to the very real need to have direct input from every single Canadian who has an interest in doing that.

The effort to consult Canadians on the shape they want for their country and to take the time to do that has been fully justified. Canadians felt the time was ripe for change and they wanted to play an active role in determining it. Though the call for reform took different forms in different parts of the country, Canadians held a common wish that their federation reflect and anticipate the challenges of the next century. As much as any other region, it was important for leaders of western Canada to hear the concerns of their constituents and bring them to the negotiating table. That is exactly what happened. Their bottom line objectives soon became very clear.

Any final agreement would have to result in a fairer, a stronger and a more united Canada. It would have to provide for a more effective regional voice in national affairs for Canada's regions and it would have to preserve the federal government's ability to act in national interests. These objectives and many others were met in the Charlottetown First Ministers' Conference on August 28. Most significantly, the Canada round was shaped by the recognition of the principle of equality of the provinces. In turn, this was also reconciled with the equality of individuals and that of Canada's founding linguistic groups.

Great strides have been made in the Canada round to reform Canada's national institutions. For western Canadians the agreement of the provinces on a reformed Senate is a tremendous victory.

Let us not compare this package to the ideal, to the best Senate one can ever dream up or the best Senate an academic can put together on paper. Let us compare this proposal to reality, to the Senate we have today and to where we are today: a Senate which is not elected, which because it does not have electoral legitimacy is not able to be effective. It is not equal; it does not represent all regions, all provinces of the country equally. The proposal in this package is miles ahead of the existing situation so let us compare the new proposal to the current reality, not to some ideal that somebody might have.

This new Senate will give all regions including the western provinces more clout. Together western seats will account for a full 40 per cent of the entire Senate. With a 62-seat Upper House it will be far more effective and people oriented.

Just think of it, with only six senators the citizens of Alberta will all probably know the names of their senators. They will know who they are. They will know how they stand on important issues. They will know whether or not they are effective representatives of Albertans in the national government. That can only be a tremendous step forward.

A new partnership in this package is also formed with aboriginal peoples. They will be represented in the new Senate. Their numbers and the distribution of those seats will be settled at a later date, but the commitment is there to aboriginal people to be involved at the core, at the centre of this country.

Most important, the six senators from Alberta will have the same clout as the six senators from Ontario, as the six senators from Quebec, as the six senators from British Columbia and as the six senators from any other province. That is an important consideration to keep in mind.

The Senate will be able to put the brakes on the power of the government and of the House of Commons by forcing the government to take the Senate into account in preparing legislation. That is a very important consideration.

The Senate will also have the power to block bills on fundamental tax policy changes directly affecting natural resources by way of a simple majority preventing arbitrary and discriminatory measures like the National Energy Program from which we suffered so greatly in Alberta.

On supply bills the Senate will have a 30-day suspensive veto. The Senate is also a marked improvement over the existing one in that it will have the ability to block ratification of appointments to federal boards and agencies. This is an often forgotten element of influence or in fact direct power this Senate will have.

We often forget myriad federal agencies out there that have regulatory authority over the lives of Canadians through one means or another. I think of the CRTC, the National Energy Board, the Bank of Canada, or many other bodies. The heads of those agencies and many other national agencies will be named by the Prime Minister but they have to be approved by the Senate. This takes power directly away from the Prime Minister and gives it directly to the regions of this country and to the Senate of this country. That is a very important change that we have not experienced in this country before.

In addition all other legislation will, if defeated by the Senate, trigger a joint sitting where a simple majority will decide the passage or defeat of legislation. Indeed future constitutional amendments related to the Senate will require the unanimous agreement of Parliament and all the provincial legislatures.

In the House of Commons the number of seats will be increased modestly in order to reflect the principle of representation by population. The increase goes from 295 to 337 seats, but we have to keep in mind that the number of parliamentarians, senators plus members of the House, stays the same. We are shrinking the size of the Senate and are increasing the size of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I see you are signalling that I have only a couple of minutes left. I could go on for quite a while longer because there are many very constructive and positive aspects. However, let me wrap up on the issue of the recognition of the inherent right to self-government for aboriginal people within Canada.

I am very proud of this. I was very proud to be a part of the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee, a part of the committee that worked with aboriginal groups to help define the parameters within which this proposal would work. I was very pleased to see that taken up by the First Ministers and by the other leaders.

I think that it is a tremendous leap forward for this whole country, not just for aboriginal people. It is for this whole country. What we are doing is taking the old view of things. We are taking the old Indian Act which was drafted in the 1800s and which was based on a colonial mentality. We are saying that that moves aside.

In its place, we have a new recognition of the inherent right of aboriginal people to govern themselves, to provide their own leadership, to govern their own communities and to provide the kind of internal strength that emerges from that kind of a system.

This is probably one of the most important aspects of this proposal. I am delighted to see it there as somebody who has worked closely with aboriginal people in this country for the last nearly four years. I am delighted to see it there. I ask all Albertans regardless of political stripe or orientation to join with us, to debate these issues and to support yes on October 26.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise in this House tonight to speak on the referendum question.

I want to say right off that after speaking to constituents throughout my riding, in Simcoe, Caledonia, Delhi and all around the riding, there is really one feeling, that is the feeling of support. I want to say that there are various reasons that people have come to me to say that they support this deal.

Many of them do not know what is in the deal, frankly, and they understand that. They do not know what is in the legal text. In fact, many of them do not even care what is in the legal text. They figure that it is my job to read that and to explain to them what is in it.

There are many points in this deal that some have problems with. I frankly have problems with a few points in this deal also. I frankly do not like the idea of adding 42 or so members to the House of Commons. I do not think it is necessary. I would have rather seen members of the House of Commons taken away if they had to equalize them.

I do not like the idea that the Prime Minister and premiers could not come to some sort of an agreement on economic barriers between provinces. I frankly see that as a way that we can help rejuvenate the Canadian economy, if we can start breaking down some of these barriers.

I do not like the idea of the Senate, and I do not like the idea that much of this constitutional deal is still up in the air. I could probably nit-pick this deal to death, but I will not. I will not ask my constituents to do that either because there are those out there who will surely during this debate come to them. They will tell the little individual parts of this deal that they do not think is right.

I realize as I think my constituents realize that for the good of the country, this deal has to be ratified. I believe it has to be ratified now. I am not saying as some have that those who are against the deal are traitors. I do not believe they are. What I am saying is that those who vote against this deal would have us debate constitutional deals and wrangle over this Constitution for years and years to come.

I am one who frankly does not believe that this country can put up with this any longer. I believe this would play into the hands of those in Quebec who are separatists and those who do not want to see a strong and united Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I say to you and I say to Canadians that this has not been an easy deal to reach, nor is it an easy one for most people to understand. Even though we have yet to see the legal text, there is information out there for Canadians to read.

The Government of Canada has put out a booklet for Canadians to read and they can receive it by calling the 1-800 number which is 1-800-561-1188. Canadians can get this and they can read it. If they do not know the answers to some of their questions, they should be calling their members of Parliament.

I say to my colleagues in the House here tonight that we should be studying this deal and we should be looking at the legal text. We should be telling Canadians what is in here and why it is that we feel that they should support this deal.

The fault of our national unity problems do not lie in one part of the country or another or with one group of Canadians or another group of Canadians. Sadly it is uniformly spread throughout this country. It is not only a Quebec problem, it is a national problem. It is not only an English versus a French or a French versus an English problem, it is a problem for all Canadians to face. It is a problem dealing with western alienation and eastern provincial poverty levels where rates of unemployment have reached some Third World levels.

Intolerance seems to be a product of hard times in this country. I see it surrounding us in today's society. Unless we as politicians deal with some of these problems I believe intolerance will overtake us.

We will not solve these problems by putting the blame on somebody else because we are going to need everyone in this country to help solve this problem. We need everyone pulling together.

I know this debate is confusing. It is confusing and irrelevant to people's day-to-day struggles. I know Canadians are concerned about the health of the Canadian economy. I know they are worried about their jobs, their families, and about the future of their children.

I know if you are in a small business your business has probably been off 30 per cent or 40 per cent this year. If you are a lawyer or an accountant, your client base is down and you are dealing with too many bankruptcies. If you are a farmer, you have had some of the lowest commodity prices ever. In fact, I know some farmers who have had to turn to welfare. Farmers having to turn to welfare.

I know taxes are too high. I know the national debt is a problem and bureaucrats in Ottawa and throughout the provinces seem to be out of control.

I know that governments and politicians do not seem to be listening. But let us not let these problems skew our vision of this country. Let us not misdirect these fears or these misunderstandings into hate for our national institution or, indeed, our country.

I believe our economic problems will not be solved unless we deal first with this national unity problem and I believe there are solutions. I do believe we are slowly coming to a consensus in this country as to the answers of how to resolve them but there is much work ahead, and there are many bridges to go over before we solve this problem.

We as Canadians need to rejuvenate national pride and restore a national sense of purpose and a common cause in this country. But let me warn you we do have a difficult task ahead. People are upset. They are upset with politics, they are upset with politicians, with government, with national institutions, and certainly they are upset with these constitutional discussions. Some believe the breakup of this country is inevitable. In fact, some believe it is a better alternative for this country, but better for whom?

It is certainly not better for Ontario, which I represent, with $20 billion of trade and 400,000 jobs depending upon a trading relationship with the province of Quebec. Certainly we cannot have a strong Ontario, we cannot have a strong Haldimand—Norfolk without a unified Canada.

Ontario is in a unique position on this debate. In fact, it is a major partner in Confederation. It is the motor that runs the nation, and the bridge between the east and the west in this country. We in Ontario, especially in rural Ontario, must play an active role in defining the type of Canada we want.

To those who say the breakup of this country is inevitable, I say no. To those who say we will break up and we cannot solve these national unity problems, I say this country will be unified and we can reignite the political will to reunite this country.

To those who say it will go away if we ignore it, I say you are being silly. These problems do not go away and they may never go away. But I say national unity and this economy go hand in hand. If we want to tackle the problems of the economy we must first tackle the problems of national unity. That means dealing once and for all with this constitutional question that is before us today.

This country was built on compassion, compromise and understanding between peoples who came to this country and who worked hard and well. Our forefathers came from all parts of the world, especially in Haldimand—Norfolk, where people came from different parts of Europe and who built farming communities and agricultural products and agricultural commodity groups that have really been the envy of the world.

It would help, though, if we knew a little bit more as Canadians about our history, how we have stayed together as a country and what it is we have accomplished together over these past 125 years. Surely no one is aware in this country that the three main peoples—the English, the French and the aboriginal peoples—lived in harmony in Canada prior to the foreign French and English wars that transformed lower Canada into a battleground in 1759. In 1774, when all was said and done, the Quebec Act gave French Canadians in the lower St. Lawrence the right to their language, their religion and their civil law. They did this because they knew what was happening south of the border in 1776. They knew what was coming and so this is what happened.

The Quebec Act was recognition of what we call today a distinct society. We would not be a country today if the First Nations or the French on the St. Lawrence, upper Canadians and United Empire Loyalists had not supported a British North America in 1812. Does anyone in upper Canada think that they could have defended themselves without the help of the first peoples or the French in Quebec? I do not think so.

Have we have forgotten Chateauguay, where 500 British North American troops, 90 per cent of them French Canadians, drove back and defeated an American army of some 7,000? We went through two world wars and the Korean conflict together. We have lost men and women from every part of this country. Have we forgotten as Canadians why we did that?

I believe the problems that we face today as a nation are due to the fact that we have forgotten our history. When difficulties arise, we do not have anything to turn to. We have forgotten why we have become such a great nation. If we are going to save this country we are going to have to start remembering what we have accomplished together and why we have always pulled together and how through working together we have overcome our differences in the past.

We must stop bickering and entrenching our positions or threatening separation if we do not get our way. I believe the common people support the common good and support a united Canada.

The intelligentsia in Quebec or the constitutional purists in other parts of the country and those in Canada who seem to be against everything for nothing but their own political goals will try to convince Canadians that they should vote against this Constitution for various reasons which may seem to Canadians to be important at the time. However, I asked Canadians and the people in my constituency to look at the bigger picture.

I believe we are debating tonight the future of this country and I would not say otherwise. I believe we are talking about a country that can no longer deal with the constitutional wrangling. I believe that the costs have been too great already for our country, not only economically but a cost in human pride for the country.

We as a country have always believed that it is better for us to work out our differences because in the end history has proven that we as a country have stayed stronger united than in little pieces. That is why in the end we will stay together, because we have survived some of the most divisive issues facing this country and in doing so we have become stronger not only as a country but as individual Canadians.

I ask that constituents in my area look at this constitutional debate. Look at this referendum openly and ask yourself the question, what is the alternative? Are the problems or the differences you have in this referendum big enough to break up this country?

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to be in the Chamber again with a colleague whom I just heard speak from Haldimand—Norfolk.

I had an enjoyable visit to another country this summer, one that I might add probably has far more and far greater problems than Canada. It is an ally and a friend of Canada, Israel. However, that is for another day.

• (2320)

I would like to begin by asking those who are listening this evening across this land and those who may read the odd speech to remember that in this building there is a Peace Tower and in that Peace Tower is a chapel. In the chapel are the names of Canadians from every province of almost every nationality who fought and in the Boer War, 1902, in World War I, World War II, and the Korean war on behalf of this country and gave their lives. They were probably French Canadians, Metis Canadians and German Canadians. There is no end. Their names are there for all history to see.

Over the last 125 years Canada has evolved into a country recognized the world over as a peacekeeping nation that finds compromise before it seeks conflict. We had a great Prime Minister by the name of Lester B. Pearson, and others who preceded him, who probably set the tone for Canada. It is our responsibility as legislators to protect that image through any compromise necessary as long as it keeps our nation strong and builds a future for our young people. That is our duty and our job as elected people representing this great nation from coast to coast, of any political stripe.

I look, first of all, at those other great nations, and there are too many to mention, but I will just mention a few. Can any here imagine the United States of America without the great states of California or Texas? Can anybody imagine England without Wales or France without Normandy today? Germany, which was divided because of a ruthless leader, once again finds itself united. In fact, Europe strives to find a way to not only unite itself economically but politically. Obviously, that is a different scenario.

What about Canada? What has caused some people to feel that Canada should be divided by some people? I believe that it was not led by grassroots individuals. This country faces the demise it faces today because of political leaders who led through the desire for power, possibly. It was started by a visitor who stimulated that independence movement in Quebec and was followed by some individuals who saw themselves leading a province out of Confederation.

We know there was a vote once before in the great province of Quebec and people rejected that thesis, and there was a collective sigh of relief. However, since then the stimulation has occurred again. In my view, this time it is not just driven by some factions in Quebec but by people outside.

For example, I want to bring to the attention of the House a recent occurrence when a minister of the Crown announced the expansion of some armouries and military installations. The Government of Canada spends $11 billion a year on defence. It is going to spend $165 million on a former air force base in my riding. That seemed to sit well with everybody else. However, when less than $12 million was just announced for an armoury in the province of Quebec some very zealous leaders of this country stood up and said: "See what I mean. They are giving it all to Quebec". I resent that capitalization on what are normal expenditures by ministers across this great land. The government is spending $165 million in my constituency, and that is fine. However, when a lousy $12 million is announced for an armoury in Quebec for the reserves, of which my son is a member—not in Quebec but in Winnipeg—because he believes he would like to be a peacekeeper if that occurred, what did we get? We got political leaders jumping opportunism in the worst way and saying this is no good for Canada. This is what I mean when one part of the country gets everything, especially Quebec. I am sick and tired of that nonsense because it is just not true.

What made matters worse at that very instant was some of our journalistic people who like the sensationalism of the National Enquirer headlines, jumping on it and saying "see, folks, headlines, Quebec gets it all". What kind of nonsense is this? It is up to us to dispel those wrongful happenings and bring some sense to the government and the opposition which are looking at a referendum—and I see there is a vast amount of support—to follow it.

What is the problem? We have gone for 10 years looking at our Constitution and wanting to find a solution. I believe, and pardon the expression, what has happened after the 10 years of consultations since 1982 and the troubles and the discussions, the thousands of meetings, the millions of words, we do not have a pig in the poke anymore when it comes to a new constitutional effort.

I think we have something real when we have the premiers for the second time working, not behind closed doors, but in a very public way as best they could, with countless advisers, the two leaders of the territories as well as our native leaders. I think they have come up with something, albeit I would not like every part of it but I can compromise. Maybe some members opposite do not think it is perfect but I am sure they would like to compromise rather than go through another 10 years. There has to come a time when we look at it and say enough is enough. It will probably work as well as anything we could come up with in another 10 years.

There you have it. What is really important today is to look from coast to coast. We have a fishing problem on the Atlantic coast. There are people without jobs. It is not the government's fault. We did not steal the fish out of the water, but there is a problem. There is an economic problem. We are ending up in a recession in Ontario. The real machinery, the real engine of this country is in a recession. Some people may want to blame it on the government but recessions do occur. I am sure they would like this government to spend some more time on that issue as soon as it could.

In Manitoba, right here in the prairie provinces, we have heard what has happened to the tremendous grain crop that developed in the ridings of Alberta where there was such a tremendous amount of snow and a very promising crop. What are the chances of those farmers' reaping even a possibility of a profit after having to fight every way they can, using government programs that were put in by a government to assist when they were needed? Still what are their chances of making a great profit on what was going to be and is now a difficult year? As it rains, grain cut, thousands of tonnes, will probably be lost because they are sprouting and there will be of no value, not only to Canadians who like to sell them to the market, but to those starving people we have supplied food to for so many years.

The oil prices in Alberta have not been the greatest. There are difficulties there. I suppose the only place we can suggest things are not too bad is in British Columbia. We do not hear about a lot of problems there but I am sure if I talked to my colleagues out there they would know. As we speak tonight there is a possibility of a merger of an airline. I would hate to see a western developed airline maybe somehow end up not existing anymore. Is that the government's fault? I think we have probably had overkill in the airline industry. We had too much servicing and too few people and so there is a merger. What does that mean to consumers in terms of price? As the chairman of the consumer and corporate affairs committee, I intend to make that an issue. How can we look after consumers, or shall we let the marketplace? Just throw it at the market and whatever happens, happens. We have an obligation and I think it is important for us to look at these different situations.

I know I do not have a lot of time, but I say to you, Sir, and to those who view this as a very serious issue that the riding I represent of Portage—Interlake has as much history in it as any other western province. Obviously it was developed and settled by the French coureurs des bois, the great Hudson's Bay Company and the Northwest Company, both of which still exist today.

Our country would never have grown without the participation of our two groups of founding peoples. Also, it would not have sustained and have become labelled the number one category by the United Nations. I believe it is likely to remain the number one nation.

Perhaps we could put our collective head together and get out of this dog fight of who can become the leader on the basis of dissension. Why do we not find out who will remain the leader and who will become the next leaders based on what we can collectively do together to find jobs for young people like these young pages who have joined us once again for another year? They will see how from time to time this House of Commons acts, and they will not be here every night this late, I can assure them.

However, that is our goal. That is the goal of the collective sides of this House of Commons. I really have no time of day for those who would see this country divided, who would put thoughts into peoples' minds that we would be better off to split the country up because no sovereignty type of an agreement is possible. I do not believe that. I think the Prime Minister put it best when he stated that other parts of Canada had compromised in a major way to see that Quebec would be an equal partner, with some differences admittedly, for another 125 years.

I would like to pay tribute to one particular gentleman who is not with us this evening, the right hon. Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs who was dedicated to the work of bringing this very difficult subject together in the form of the package which was agreed upon in Charlottetown. I say to him that this country indeed owes him a great deal of respect for the time and effort he has put into it. Before it is done, which is not too long from now, I believe we will have a strong and united Canada and, yes, I intend to support it with a yes vote.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, we are debating today the following motion proposed by the government:

> That, pursuant to the act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada, this House approves the following text of the referendum question:
> "Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992?"

I would like to refer to the consensus report on the Constitution. It is a report which is not signed and it is not binding. It has many flaws. How can we vote positively or negatively if the final document is not available? The legal document is not available.

Any constitution has a legal implication. Every word in a constitution has a legal implication. It is going to be interpreted by judges and lawyers in the future.

As I said, we do not have that legal document. What we have is a consensus report. We are trying to amend a Constitution that has served Canada relatively well for the last 125 years. The Prime Minister of Canada indicated to the people of Canada that this Constitution had not worked well and that we needed changes to it. Instead of addressing the fundamental problems Canada faces today, that is economic problems, he garnered all the energies of the premiers of the provinces and of the federal government to deal with the constitutional issue that is certainly not in the forefront of the preoccupation of the average Canadian. The average Canadian believes that we have to address economic issues first, be competitive, have higher productivity, have security of employment and jobs for the 1.6 million Canadians who are unemployed today.

Ask yourself: does this consensus report pass the constitutional test? I would like to elaborate on that.

First, would this document provide for Canadians to have constant input on constitutional amendments or changes? I would say no because there is no mechanism for binding referendums that would allow Canadians to deal with such issues as amendments to the Constitution. Therefore, there should be a provision in any constitutional amendment to have a referendum process that is binding on the government. This is essential if we believe in democracy.

Second, a constitution should have provisions that all its citizens are being treated equally, and again it fails on that second point.

In our Constitution there is a provision of a notwithstanding clause. A notwithstanding clause is a clause that allows for governments, both federal and provincial, to opt out on issues that infringe on human rights and equality. This question of the notwithstanding clause has not been addressed by the consensus report on the Constitution, and I wonder why.

At this point I would like to mention that the Prime Minister of Canada said not so long ago in this House that a constitution that contains a notwithstanding clause is not worth the paper it is written on. So tell me why he has not addressed this fundamental question of equality.

Third, a constitutional amendment should articulate a vision and the fundamental values of a nation. This document is being sold on the basis that the west is finally being admitted into this new Confederation of unequal basis. As well Quebec will rejoin Confederation as a signatory to the Canadian Constitution and this will stop the constant bickering and fighting in Canada.

I would like to quote from The Toronto Star of Monday, September 7, 1992. It says: "Vote on unity won't settle our demands, Bourassa says". Is the bickering going to stop on October 26? Certainly not.

Fourth, any constitutional document should be clear, simple and flexible. This consensus report on the Constitution would probably make world history in bringing into constitutional documents a series of political objectives underlying the social and economic union. I like to quote. It states further that those policy objectives or provisions should not be justiciable. I had to look in the dictionary to find out justiciable means. It simply means that you cannot challenge it in courts. This is a constitutional proposal that probably existed in the Soviet Union where you could not challenge it in the courts.

Now we have two unacceptable provisions in this new drafted Constitution: the notwithstanding clause and the provision that certain elements of that Constitution would not be justiciable.

As you know, I have been an ardent supporter of parliamentary reform. I believe in binding referendums. As well I do believe that the Senate should be reformed and that it should be a Triple-E Senate, a Senate that is really elected, that is really effective and that is really equal. What this proposal or this consensus report suggests is that we will have a bastardized Triple-E Senate. The Senate will be half-elected and the legislatures can appoint senators. The leader of the government simply suggests to the legislature the person who should be a new senator. It is not elected; it is really appointed.

• (2340)

There is also an option to have an election, but as time passes I think that most of the senators would be appointed by the legislatures because we have party discipline in our parliamentary system.

Normally the people should be able to elect senators. Its effectiveness has been cut because there is no veto power. Third, it is not equal because senators who declare themselves francophones—and I would like to quote from the document. Article 14 on the Senate talks about double majority:

> The originator of a bill should be responsible for designating whether it materially affects French language or French culture.

We note that the originator of a bill is usually a minister so he can designate a bill the way he feels.

> Each designation should be subject to appeal to The Speaker of the Senate under the rules to be established by the Senate. These rules should be designed to provide adequate protection to francophones.
> On entering the Senate, senators should be required to declare whether they are francophones for the purpose of the double majority voting rule.

Naturally there would be senators with one vote and senators with two votes.

> Any process for challenging these declarations should be left to the rules of the Senate.

On the other hand, article 9 on the Senate states:

> Aboriginal representation in the Senate should be guaranteed in the Constitution. Aboriginal Senate seats should be additional to provincial and territorial seats, rather than drawn from any province or territory's allocation of Senate seats.
> Aboriginal senators should have the same role and powers as other senators, plus a possible double majority power in relation to certain matters materially affecting Aboriginal people.

We are creating three types of senators: those with one vote, those with two votes, and those with three votes.

> These issues and other details relating to Aboriginal representation in the Senate (numbers, distribution, method of selection) will be discussed further by governments and the representatives of the Aboriginal peoples in the early autumn of 1992.

After we have voted on this proposal further discussions are going to take place. I have just quoted two articles and the senators are not equal. Their votes do not count in the same way, and therefore it is a bastardized Triple-E Senate. Some journalists in Quebec call it a One-E Senate, meaning half-elected.

With this proposal there will be first-class senators and second-class senators.

In summary, the question being debated today infers that the Prime Minister and the premiers have in fact reached an agreement. This is not a legal document. What we have is an unsigned declaration. What we have in reality is a manifesto that constitutes the first of future political accords. We have a manifesto that creates new institutions, institutions that will cost Canadian taxpayers a lot of money in increased taxation. We have created a constitutional industry for bureaucrats and lawyers.

This is a manifesto that repeatedly refers to the next round of negotiations. It is full of asterisks. What we have is a document supported by the Conservatives, the Liberals and the New Democratic Party that is full of rhetoric and contradictions, convoluted language and anti-political objectives.

We as Canadians now face a national referendum on the constitutional deal concocted by the Prime Minister, the premiers, the territories and aboriginal leaders.

I believe as Canadians in a matured democracy, we should be entitled to make a full assessment of the merits of the deal for extensive debate. We should feel totally free to accept a deal if we think that it will strengthen our nation or to reject it if we do not.

We should not be branded as anti-Canadian if we do reject that deal. I cannot support that deal. It does not meet the criteria put forward by people who believe that the west has been left out of the constitutional fold. Some say you have to hold your nose and vote yes anyway.

The party system that we have has already committed most or all of the members to voting in favour of this agreement. Even so, they have not seen the results of the referendum process. This alone should convince us that we need a real constitutional reform or a real made-in-Canada Constitution.

Hon. Bob Layton (Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis): Mr. Speaker, I believe that Canada's 125th birthday year has generated and is still generating a tremendous sense of national pride among Canadians, including those who live with me in my riding of Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis.

One Lachine resident, Andy Lacroix, telephoned my office today to say that he had seen a worn out Canadian flag flying over a Canada Post office and thought it should be replaced. A few days ago, residents of Dorval complained when they noticed that our flag there was not flying high at Dorval airport. Those are two very small examples of the growing pride we share in our nation and its symbols.

Just prior to Canada Day, I was happy to play a role in Parliament for the formal amalgamation of la Chambre de commerce de Montréal and the Montreal Board of Trade. These two great and longstanding associations represent the common interests of the francophone and anglophone business communities in the Montreal area, respectively.

Their amalgamation is again a signal that the leaders of our business community are ready to plan and to build together, and to say yes to working together for Canadian unity at this most critical time in our history.

Today I rise to join this debate to thank all those who were involved in the negotiation process and to congratulate them on the successful completion of an exhausting job, a job extremely well done. This was the most massive and sweeping consultation process that Canadians have ever witnessed and shared. The Spicer commission and the Beaudoin-Dobbie commission laid the groundwork for our elected leaders to follow.

The eventual, unanimous agreement reached in Charlottetown between the Prime Minister, 10 provincial premiers, two territorial leaders and four representatives from the aboriginal community is an exceptional and remarkable accomplishment. The negotiating authorities came from all sides of the political spectrum and from all parts of this extensive and diverse, sometimes perverse, country.

They still succeeded in establishing an accord with unanimity. They are greatly appreciated and will long be remembered.

Perhaps the most remarkable picture Canadians witnessed was the process of compromise which evolved and flourished for the benefit and protection of the whole country. The final success came from hard work and hard choices, both of which were faced each day of the negotiating process.

The Prime Minister quoted Sir John A. Macdonald who said 125 years ago: "The whole scheme bears upon its face the marks of compromise". Canadians can and should once again discard their traditional modesty and congratulate one another because we have achieved a remarkable milestone in Canadian and in world history. We have achieved substantial constitutional change without violence or massive political upheaval. We accomplished change through peaceful negotiation and compromise, thereby setting the example for so many others in dispute.

• (2350)

Even the historic Constitution Repatriation Act of 1982 missed the consent of my home province of Quebec. The Prime Minister was accurate and justified in stating that the accord reached in Charlottetown was a uniquely Canadian process of pragmatic compromise and compelling vision. The Prime Minister and our hon. colleagues, the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs and the Minister of National Health and Welfare, deserve high praise for their determination, vision, patience and negotiating skills.

The Charlottetown agreement has something for everyone. As the Prime Minister said just yesterday, it enables a new generation of Canadians to say yes to Canada with pride and confidence. This agreement includes a special reference recognizing linguistic duality as a fundamental characteristic of Canada.

My Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis community is part of what makes Quebec and Canada unique. My neighbours, including their elected representatives at the municipal, provincial, federal and institutional levels live, work and play in both of Canada's official languages. We appreciate our neighbours and we welcome our differences.

Commitment to vitality and development of minorities is essential for Canada. For over two decades many anglophones in Quebec faced an uncertain future. These uncertainties and lost job opportunities led to a massive migration of our youth and of many qualified citizens. The Charlottetown agreement provides a commitment by all Canadians and their governments in the plural and total sense to the vitality and development of linguistic minorities. Ratifying this deal I believe will put an end to the uncertainty.

My neighbours in the Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis riding have a responsibility to maintain and expand the links between the two linguistic communities in this great country. Let us commit ourselves and vote to keep all Canadians together. After 66 wonderful years I want to call Canada and Quebec my home forever. I believe that Canada is a tolerant, pluralistic nation where constitutional peace can only lead to shape and foster our economic union, our national identity, our special character and our wonderful heritage.

It is easy to speak of heritage, representing a community like Lachine. Madam Speaker, I know that as a regular visitor you would share with me the sense of glory of the patrimoine, the buildings that have stood for hundreds of years and served the community, religious, educational and municipal and other services. The fur museum is a worth-while visit for anyone taking the time to want to know something of the origins of Canada as the coureurs des bois, the voyageurs, left Lachine to explore and trade with natives across Canada.

We, each and every one of us, have a special role to play. We must persuade ourselves and each other that we are going to win this referendum. We must build bridges of confidence, create partnerships, celebrate our history and rebuild our national pride. We can start by saying yes to Canada, yes to this agreement, and yes to constitutional renewal and peace on October 26.

The United Nations Human Development Index rates Canada as the number one place in the world to live. We also have the seventh largest economy in the world. We have a lot to be proud of and a lot of previous hard work and sacrifice to build upon. As the Prime Minister said on Tuesday: "We are so evidently stronger together than we could be apart".

I believe this agreement is good for Canada, good for Quebec, and good for my community and its citizens on the towns bordering Lac-Saint-Louis. We look to approval of this agreement by Canadians as a sign of constitutional peace for generations to come. Please register your support on October 26 for a renewed and revitalized Canada. Vote yes.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak tonight, and in particular to speak after the hon. member for Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis, who by coincidence is the member for the riding with which my riding is twinned in the bureaucratic nightmare we have all come to know as Voyageur 92.

Certainly I think the hon. member and I have been doing our best to promote Canadian unity and to promote knowledge among young Canadians of each other and of their respective provinces and cities through the efforts we have been making to make these various exchanges work. There have been a few glitches along the way. We hope everything will work out and everything we planned will come to fruition.

I would like to begin my remarks this evening by hearkening back to the comments made before the Standing Committee on External Affairs in June 1990 by Sonny Ramphal, the then soon to retire Secretary General of the Commonwealth. Mr. Ramphal, an outstanding citizen of the world I think and always a very articulate and knowledgeable person, in appearing before the committee spoke to us of the situation Canada was facing at that time which was of course right at the time when the Meech Lake accord was coming undone.

He spoke not to the content of the Meech Lake accord or anything like that, but he spoke to the responsibility, regardless of one's position on that particular constitutional accord, that Canada had toward the rest of the world. He made a plea to the committee that even if Canadians were not willing to save Canada for themselves, they ought to do it out of a sense of responsibility to the world community because to the extent that other countries have looked up to Canada as a place where people of different heritages, linguistic communities, backgrounds, races, et cetera, have been able to live together in not perfect harmony but relative harmony to the extent that the world looked up to Canada in that way.

For Canada to somehow fail that vision by coming undone in some way would be not just a sin against ourselves but a sin against hope, a sin against hope for the entire human race which should we fail would then be in the position of being tempted to the despair of saying if Canada with all its resources, with its democratic traditions, with its other traditions of tolerance et cetera cannot do it, cannot manage to stay together, cannot manage to find a way for these diverse needs and interests and communities to find a way to live together, then why should other countries which find themselves in much more desperate circumstances even try? It is that responsibility that we are faced with again tonight and in the days to come as Canadians contemplate whether to vote for or against the agreement that was reached in Charlottetown.

It is not a question, as so many people have rightly tried to point out, of being anti-Canada, certainly if one has questions about the agreement—I have some questions about the agreement myself—or even if one is finally moved to oppose the agreement. I would certainly say to those who are thinking about opposing the agreement—and I am speaking now to those who are not committed like my colleagues in the Bloc Quebecois to sovereignty in any event but to Canadians who are not part of that particular opposition to the agreement—to consider the consequences.

They should not operate out of fear, that is not the way it should be looked at, but should seriously consider the consequences as I have just spoken about them in terms of what kind of message that might send to the world. They should also consider what the consequences might be for Canada if we were launched into a scenario in which the separation of Quebec became a real possibility, or even if we were just launched into another long period of constitutional limbo where we could not muster the political energy to finally get around to dealing with some of the problems that so desperately need to be higher on the political agenda than they are able to be because of this preoccupation with the Constitution.

One of the things that Canadians are going to have to do in the coming months is to not let their feelings about the Prime Minister get in the way of their feelings about the country. I think this was a very real problem during the time of the debate around the Meech Lake accord. However, I am not here to debate history. I am here to describe what I think needs to happen in the next little while.

Canadians need very much to keep in mind that prime ministers come and go. What we are interested in is the future of a country, a future which will long outlast not only the current prime minister but all of us here in this Chamber. We should be considering not the political status or future or points that may accrue to any one particular leader or party but what is, in the final analysis, good for the country.

I make an analogy, because I do think this is a serious problem, with those who went to war on behalf of this country in various conflicts, whether it was World War I or World War II or the Korean conflict. They did not go off and put their lives on the line for Mackenzie King. They did not go off and put their lives on the line for Sir Robert Borden or Louis St. Laurent. Those who happened to be the Prime Minister or be running the Department of National Defence were subject to all kinds of criticism at that time and rightfully so in many cases. People did not let that get in the way of their willingness to do the higher thing for the country.

That is the attitude that we have to take now and which many Canadians have to take with respect to this agreement. It should be easier to do than it was with respect to the Meech Lake accord because in many respects this Charlottetown accord is not the document that the Prime Minister himself would have written had he had the chance to write it himself. The Prime Minister wanted economic union and the elimination of interprovincial trade barriers to be in the constitutional accord. It is not there.

The Prime Minister was not early on committed to the insertion of the inherent right of self-government of aboriginal peoples into this particular agreement. It is there. Earlier on the Prime Minister did not even take seriously the idea of a social charter or a social covenant, or the social union as it has come to be called in the document that we have before us, but it is there.

There are many things in this particular constitutional accord that we have before us that are there because many others had an opportunity to contribute to this particular process. I think that those many others had that opportunity to contribute partly because of the influence that was brought to bear on the process by my leader, the member for Yukon, and by others from my party. If the House will recall we, as part of the condition for returning to participation in the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee, demanded there be a set of conferences.

It was those conferences that overturned the idea of the economic union, rejected it out of hand. It was those conferences that established the need and the widespread acceptance for a social covenant. It was the conference on aboriginal self-government that called for the inclusion of the inherent right of self-government. All along the way this broader participation, coupled with the presence at the table of aboriginal leaders and territorial leaders, made this much broader and more inclusive document, both in terms of process and substance, possible.

I want Canadians who might be listening and others who might be contemplating what they might say to their fellow Canadians over the next little while to realize that this is not something cooked up in the Prime Minister's Office. It is the result of a legitimate process that was far superior to the process that preceded the Meech Lake accord.

For those of us who are unhappy with the current government and not happy with the Prime Minister let us not let that get in the way of seeing what real accomplishments there are, for instance in terms of aboriginal self-government. Looking back on those days in 1990 I think the aboriginal people have a right to feel vindicated by the way in which they were instrumental in bringing down the Meech Lake accord.

I was very worried at the time that they were taking a very big risk, not only with themselves but with the country, and that what they thought they might get out of bringing down the Meech Lake accord they would never get. The fact of the matter is that for them it paid off. They must be thinking about this with a great deal of satisfaction at this point. They have made gains both in terms of what is in the document and also in terms of the participation at the constitutional table, which was unprecedented.

There is one other thing happening here, and I feel compelled to mention it. When I listened to the Prime Minister yesterday he had no qualms about using his speech on the Constitution to promote his own particular economic views. He spoke of the need, as he saw it, for freer trade between the provinces and referred to the free trade agreement. I hope that as the Prime Minister has set the precedent of inserting the free trade debate into constitutional speeches I might be forgiven for saying that there is another constitution being amended in this country now. That is the economic constitution under which we live.

We used to have our own economic constitution, which was obviously impinged upon by international grievance, by GATT and other things. Lately, as a result of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement and now with the possibility of a North American free trade agreement we are entering into and I quote no less an authority than Ronald Reagan who said when he was promoting the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement that he was changing the economic constitution of North America.

One of the things I hope Canadians will be able to do in the next little while but probably not with as much focus as I would like until after the referendum is to consider also the way in which their economic constitution is being altered and has been altered. Like the political constitution, these agreements are things which, I suppose, have amending formulas and unlike constitutions, they even have abrogation formulas. However, they are very difficult to get out of and they last for a long, long time.

I would hope at the same time as Canadians are thinking about their political constitution and how they regard what is now being put before them that they will think also of these agreements. That is why we suggested today in the House of Commons to no avail that perhaps the government should consider consulting the Canadian people on the North American free trade agreement as well as the Constitution.

I see you waving at me, Madam Speaker. I will try to wrap up very quickly. The fact is there is a great irony happening here. At the same time as I and many others are willing to join with colleagues from other parties in doing the right thing for Canada as a community we are in my judgment, I know others would disagree, but nevertheless, we are engaged in a process with the other hand of government. We are engaged in a process through these various free trade agreements of breaking down the community, of breaking down our ability to act as a community economically speaking, of breaking down our ability to even perceive ourselves as a community through the elimination of borders and control over our own lives.

Let us get our act together. If we are going to build a community with one hand, let us not tear it down with the other. Let us try to build it up with both hands and consider not only the political constitution we have before us but the economic constitutions we have before us in the form of free trade agreements.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, certainly I am pleased to have the opportunity tonight to speak on this very historic legislation which will give Canadians the opportunity to approve a new constitutional package through a national referendum.

In September of 1864 the Fathers of Confederation met in Charlottetown to create our great country. I am very proud of the fact, being from Prince Edward Island, that just a month ago, in August, Prince Edward Island was given the opportunity to play host to another meeting of historical significance.

I am very proud of our premier, the Hon. Joe Ghiz. His wealth of experience, his knowledge of constitutional matters and his well–known ability to excel under pressure played a very, very important role in the outcome of these negotiations.

As we embark on this historical referendum campaign the words of our first Prime Minister, Sir John A. Macdonald, are worth repeating: "We are a great country and shall become one of the greatest in the universe if we preserve it. We shall sink into insignificance and adversity if we suffer it to be broken".

Canadians recognize that what we have here in Canada is not perfect. But they also recognize that we are a very privileged people compared to the rest of the planet. We have inherited what is widely considered to be the best country in the world in which to live.

It is within that context that I join in this historic debate tonight. As I rise this evening, I hearken back to April 1991 when our leader originally proposed that the best way to handle this whole issue was to hammer out a deal and then put it to the Canadian people through a national referendum.

This was the best way to ensure we could get over this constant stumbling block of constitutional debate that has for many years taken far too much time, effort and energy. I am proud that our leader had the vision 17 months ago to lay out a nine–point plan, a plan that set much of the agenda in the constitutional discussions that followed.

I cannot remember a time in our history when an opposition leader has made such a significant contribution to a national debate such as this. Of course, the cornerstone of that package was that these changes are so monumental that Canadian people deserve an opportunity to say yes to Canada, yes to Quebec, yes to the aboriginal people, yes to the east, yes to the west, so that we join in a united effort to put our country on a stable and united road as we prepare for the 21st century.

In speaking with Islanders this summer and throughout the constitutional process I recognize that many of them, including myself, believe we have spent too much time already talking about the Constitution. The time we have spent in debating, in negotiating and in drafting our Constitution is time that could have been spent on serious problems facing this country, like the unemployment problem, improving our education system, and preparing to take on the challenges of increasingly competitive international economy.

To the average Canadian, the significance of the constitutional debate pales in comparison to their need to find work. One of the results of the constitutional reform will affect them in the long run. In the immediate future, their concern is to ensure that their children are well fed and that their rent or their mortgage payments are made.

This is why we have to settle this constitutional problem now, so that our time, efforts and energy can be put to solving some of the other serious problems in this country.

This package may not be perfect but as I say, we cannot afford another 10 years in this country of talking about the Constitution. Those seeking perfection in this deal will simply have to lower their expectations. As I said, it is not perfect, but I honestly believe it is the best deal, the best possible deal that the Government of Canada, the premiers, the aboriginal leaders and the leaders of the territories could have put together.

Canada is a very large and diverse country with many competing interests. In order for us to continue as a strong and united country there has to be some give and take. This deal is good for Canada because it will ensure that we remain united. It provides us with a reformed Senate. It provides a just and a dignified arrangement for aboriginal people. It strengthens the constitutional commitment to equalization and regional development.

Most important of all is that it supplies the glue needed to hold the country together as we head into the next century. This is important. It is important that we keep this country together and probably more important in my part of the country than anywhere. I come from eastern Canada and the prospect of being cut off from the rest of Canada would have all kinds of social ramifications for easterners.

There is no telling how much investment our country has lost in recent years due to constitutional uncertainty. The jobs that this investment could have created are desperately needed, not only in my province of Prince Edward Island but all across this country.

I say in this Chamber today to the constituents of my riding of Malpeque, to Islanders and to Canadians that this is our opportunity to put the national unity uncertainty behind us and unify our future together.

Let us take the opportunity so that future generations will benefit from the strength that our country will gain from putting the constitutional uncertainty behind us.

If our leaders are to spend or had to spend another decade dealing with the Constitution and national unity, then surely many of the crucial issues facing Canadians would not be dealt with in an adequate way.

Today we have this referendum question before us and certainly I will be supporting it.

I realize that there are risks involved in referendums. Referendums can be divisive as some people say, but they can also be unifying because they give us all an opportunity to say yes to Canada, yes to Quebec, yes to the aboriginal people, yes to the east and yes to the west. Therefore, they can have a very unifying effect in this country. I would say that on this issue there is as much or more risk in not holding a referendum.

I believe that the Constitution belongs to the people. Therefore, it is only just that Canadians should have an opportunity to approve the deal through a referendum.

When this referendum legislation is passed, and it certainly appears that it will be passed in this House of Commons, the responsibility for the results of this measure will move from the hands of the politicians to the hands of individual Canadians.

Surely Canadians will stand up to this challenge as previous generations have had to do and as our forefathers did 128 years ago in Charlottetown.

If you visit the legislative chamber of Province House in Charlottetown, the room where the basis was established for Confederation in 1864, you will see a bronze plaque which commemorates their efforts. The plaque reads:

> In the Hearts and Minds of the Delegates Who Assembled In This Room on September 1, 1864 Was Born the Dominion of Canada. Providence being their guide They Builded Better than They Knew.

On September 1, 1864, our Fathers of Confederation gathered to create a country that has since become second to none.

Over the next few months Canadians will have an opportunity to ensure that the country that these people built will remain strong, united and independent.

I believe Canadians are up to that task. When they go to the polls on October 26 across the country, we will emerge as our forefathers did with a country that is better, stronger and ready to take on the challenges of the 21st century.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): This evening, Madam Speaker, I do not claim to be a constitutional expert, but we have been discussing the Constitution for so many years that all of us are or claim to have become constitutional experts.

There will be a referendum on October 26. Pursuant to Bill 150 passed in Quebec, the referendum was to be on Quebec sovereignty. We know the Quebec government has proposed amendments to hold a referendum on the offers instead. However, how can one possibly agree with the agreement reached in Charlottetown on August 28 when the legal text will only be available after October 26, that is after the referendum? I think that English Canada should be as concerned as Quebec about the implications of the legal text which will not be available after the referendum.

This agreement is bad. It is bad for Canada; it is bad for Quebec. We do not have time to go into detail this evening, especially not in 15 minutes, but I would like to go over the main points that were discussed and that might have been accepted or rejected during the constitutional negotiations.

Economic union was a very important issue for Quebec, and indeed for all of Canada. How can we seek to maintain tariff barriers between the provinces of Canada and have free trade with the United States, and soon with Mexico? It is preposterous. Even the minister was against the July 7 agreement, and therefore against the August 28 agreement because the problem of economic union had not been resolved. That is one of the issues.

As for the division of powers, just think of the demands in the Allaire report that was presented to the 1991 Liberal convention when the Liberal Party demanded 22 powers. If you study the agreement, you will find any number of powers that are already under provincial jurisdiction such as leisure, hunting, fishing, mining, urban affairs and housing. No new power is being transferred to the provinces or to Quebec as a result of these demands.

The right of veto, which was so important to Quebec, has been replaced by insignificant veto rights. After giving everything to everyone, how can you then claim to want a veto? One of the principal areas over which the Quebec government and the province of Quebec wanted a veto concerned the creation of new provinces. In this case also, there is no veto that could prevent or require discussions on the creation of new provinces.

• (0030)

As regards the Senate, what a joke. What a big joke. When the Prime Minister wanted the GST legislation passed, we saw him just appoint eight new senators to rubber stamp his bill in the Senate, and now they are talking a Triple-E Senate. This represents a considerable loss for Quebec.

Apparently there is some compensation. About 40 new ridings throughout Canada can be created or elected, of which approximately 18 will be in Quebec, 18 in Ontario and a few others in British Columbia and possibly elsewhere. There are already far too many members in this House. Everyone knows very well that when the government decides something, most of the government members have to accept that decision. That is how the system works. Even if there were 10, 15, 20 or 30 more members, what would that change when we know there is a party line in this House and you have to toe that line or else leave the party. That is the democracy being practised. That is what you find in traditional political groupings and that is why there is a complete consensus among the traditional parties in this House to pass this unacceptable agreement.

As for the Senate, even Senator Beaudoin, chairperson of the Beaudoin–Dobbie commission, was against amending it as has been proposed. You do not hear anything about that anymore. You no longer hear the senators objecting. And yet they were the ones who, following the July 7 agreement, that was reached while Quebec was not even present, protested that it was absolutely unthinkable and completely unacceptable. Then on August 28 there was an agreement, a consensus to approve and adopt those very same points. We are told that the agreement was unanimous, but everyone around that table was against something. Then it was tabled here in this House, and in about three days, a few hours, the members are to ratify the agreement and enable a national referendum to be held, in accordance with Canadian legislation in effect in English Canada, in accordance with Quebec legislation in Quebec. At the same time it is hoped that federal funds will not upset or use the situation in Quebec and that they will be used in accordance with legal provisions.

The Supreme Court is also a very important element because it seems the House of Commons, the elected officials, our government, may turn increasingly to the Supreme Court to make decisions, with the government thereby abdicating any decision-making responsibility. Quebec is guaranteed three judges, and it is stipulated that they must have been accepted to the Quebec Bar. They may have practised outside Quebec for any length of time and taken bar exams in any other province. Judges appointed to the Supreme Court may not necessarily be practising or sitting in Quebec.

Distinct society, what a joke. Obviously, it is difficult for the man in the street to interpret this term. In fact, this was not going to be a restrictive expression in the Meech Lake accord. In the Charlottetown accord of August 28, it is restricted to language, culture and the Civil Code. One could not claim to be teaching Quebecers anything new. Quebec has always legislated in areas of language, Quebec is different as regards its culture. The civil code is not found anywhere else but in Quebec. But the meaning is restrictive. In French, the text uses the term notamment, which implies that something else may be included. The word, notamment, is not in the English text. In English Canada, the accord is meant to help anglophones understand and in Quebec, it is meant to please francophones.

The situation of the native peoples is increasingly similar to that of Quebecers, but they obtained what they wanted in the agreement reached on the 28th of August. They had a firm negotiator, someone who wanted to address a problem and appears to have resolved it. In the current agreement, much more consideration has been given to natives than to the people of Quebec.

For all these reasons, this agreement should be rejected by all of Canada. It has been said in this House that those people in Quebec who decide to vote against the agreement are against Canada and want to break up Canada and that those outside Quebec who vote against the agreement are doing so because of their personal opinions. No, we are not against Canada. In Quebec, we are for Quebec. The constitutional problem will be resolved only when Quebec obtains its political sovereignty. The question that the federal and provincial governments are going to put to the population deals only with offers that are unacceptable.

I say to Canadians that the issue has only been put off. Those who claim that after October 27 there will be no more talks about the Constitution are wrong, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by saying that I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on what indeed is an historic question and an historic debate, even though as I do so I recognize that in all likelihood very few, if any, of my constituents of Brandon—Souris will be watching it as it nears the hour of one o'clock here in Ottawa.

In my opinion, the question before us is probably the most important one facing Canada since Confederation. It is a question which merits the very careful consideration of all Canadians. I hope they will study the proposal carefully, give it their careful consideration, and accept their responsibility to be a part of a decision-making process on October 26.

• (0040)

The question before us is one which is obviously a result of the negotiation process. It is one in which there have clearly been compromises made by the various participants. But what has emerged in my opinion is a reasonable and equitable compromise.

Before discussing the nature of that compromise I would like to remind our listeners that the Confederation put together in the 1860s was of a similar nature. It was a compromise in itself.

Speakers before me have paid credit to John A. Macdonald and George-Étienne Cartier. Mention should also be made of George Brown who in several capacities made a significant contribution during the 1860s.

The individuals of whom I have spoken in putting together a Confederation pact in the 1860s did not achieve all that they as individuals desired. In fact Confederation in 1867 and subsequent changes were a series of pragmatic responses to the realities which exist. Confederation indeed was a compromise in itself.

As I speak I am reminded of the fact that John A. Macdonald would have preferred by way of example not to have had provinces. He preferred the British model, but he recognized that in the reality which would become Canada that was not a logical goal and it was a goal which he readily and quickly abandoned.

I am reminded of the fact that the entry of my province of Manitoba into Confederation in 1870 was very much a result of compromise. It was not a decision which John A. Macdonald and the leaders of the nation would have preferred at that particular time, but it was a pragmatic response to the realities of the Red River rebellion of 1869.

I am also reminded of the kind of Confederation that was put together then and in subsequent years. It has not always conformed perfectly to our stated goals. I am reminded of the fact that some provinces, by virtue of the rules on which they entered into Confederation, have more members on a per population basis than do others.

I, for example, during my term here have represented on average some 75,000 residents of Brandon—Souris. Other members of Parliament have traditionally represented less, while many have represented more.

It seems to me the very art of governing in Canada is the art of seeking and attaining such compromises. I am reminded of the definition of politics that I most often gave to my students. It was that politics was the art of the possible. What we have before us is a demonstration of that type of art form at work.

I believe the compromise before us is a reasonable and equitable one. I believe this properly called Canada round is a significant step beyond where we were some two years ago. I believe a reformed Senate will be more relevant than the present Senate has been.

I believe the principle of election, the principle of equality of representation in the Senate, and the desire to make that body effective have been achieved to a very significant degree.

I also believe that we have made a significant step forward with respect to aboriginal rights.

For someone who has taught Canadian history for much of his life, I am very conscious that the history of relationships between the aboriginal, now called First Nations of Canada, and previous governments of Canada has not always been a happy one. In fact at times it has been a history of which we have little reason to be proud.

While we cannot in this Parliament or at any other time redo the history of the past and undo mistakes that may have been made in the past, those who have been primarily involved in the preparation of this particular agreement have recognized the importance of the principle of self-government. I believe we are moving in the right direction.

Certainly there remains much to be done in this particular area in that many do not fully understand the details which will indeed prove to be self-government. But I am confident of the good will which exists and I believe the principle is one which should be endorsed.

I also believe that the sharing of powers between the federal government and the provinces as proposed is reasonable. I say that mindful of my own background of being someone who came to my politics to a very large degree as a result of being a student of John A. Macdonald. I became knowledgeable of John A. Macdonald through those excellent biographies written by Donald Grant Creighton. I must confess and I do so readily that I believe it is important for the federal government to have and to continue to retain a very significant role within the federalism which is Canada.

Quite frankly, I am pleased that some of the proposals which have existed which called for greater decentralization than is currently before us were not in fact successful. I am particularly pleased that the federal government's role with the shared jurisdiction as protector of the environment is one which has been recognized in this proposal.

I am conscious of the fact that there are critics of this proposal, critics who are concerned about the fact that the proposal does not address their own individual concerns. As I speak, I am mindful of a great deal of activity by certain women's organizations within my own constituency who I know that individually and collectively are somewhat disappointed by the end result. I would remind them that the process which is being put in place today and which is being proposed before us is not one in itself which is absolute nor is it necessarily the end of the line. Our Constitution has been amended on numerous occasions in the past and indeed that will obviously prove to be the case in the future.

Therefore, to those who are disappointed because the present proposal does not achieve all which they would wish, I would say to them that I hope they would judge a proposal first of all as a package on its merits and that they would compare it not with the model which they had in their own mind but with the situation which exists in Canada as of today.

I would also like to say a word or two about the process that is under way because I believe the process in itself has been significant. Certainly there has been an immense amount of consultation with Canadians during the course of the last many months. I believe that consultation has had direct and significant results. Certainly the proposal which is before us now is significantly different than that which was initially tabled by the Government of Canada.

Where the changes be with respect to the Senate, with respect to the division of powers, with respect to the question of inherent aboriginal rights or with respect to the wording of the Canada clause, most of those changes are a very direct result of the public consultation process in which so many Canadians participated.

I am also one of those who has believed for some time that the referendum which is now beginning would indeed be beneficial for Canada and should in fact occur. As I say that I am very conscious of the fact that many of my colleagues have not shared that view and that they have been concerned that such a referendum process would prove to be divisive and thus damaging to national unity.

The reason I believe a referendum would be valuable is that I am convinced Canadians will accept the responsibility of being a part of a decision-making process. I believe they will accept the responsibility of carefully evaluating the proposal which is before them. I believe in making their decision they will in fact be making a commitment to Canada. That I think will have positive and lasting results.

One of the things about politics that has distressed me these last few years is that there has been a growing tendency, it seems to me, on the part of Canadians to blame the process and to blame the politicians for what they perceive to have been the things that have gone wrong. Certainly the nature of the process in which a relative few make decisions on behalf of the many is the type of process which perhaps encourages that sense of feeling, that sense of alienation.

Now the decision is not up to the members of this House. It is not up to the members of the legislatures across the country. Indeed the decision is now one which must be made by Canadians. They have an opportunity to participate. They in fact have a responsibility to participate. By participating they also have to accept the responsibility for the decisions which are made. I believe as a result of their doing so they will identify much more clearly with the end result than they would be simply if others were to make that decision on their behalf.

I know there are concerns about the cost of the process. There are concerns that perhaps people will not give careful consideration to the issues before them. I believe my constituents, and I sincerely trust that this is true of Canadians elsewhere, will give very careful consideration to the issue. I believe they will approve the resolution because they believe in Canada and they believe that the compromise which has been created is reasonable and just. They understand it is not perfect, just as I understand it is not perfect.

This is not the document that I would have written if I had had the sole opportunity to do so, just as the document which is before us, Mr. Speaker, is not what you probably would have written. What is different now is that never again in our history will such documents be written by an individual or even by a few individuals. What is more important is that such documents must be written as a result of a collective consultative process, and I am pleased therefore that the decision on that document must also be made in a collective manner.

I am confident and I say with great hope because I love this country that the end result on October 26 will be approval in each and every province of the proposal before us so we can enter into the next century conscious of the fact that we have put many of our problems behind us.

[Translation]

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you for your patience and thank your for recognizing me.

[English]

The referendum question before us tonight raises a number of other questions. Any pollster will tell us that by asking "do you agree" we are asking a leading question. You ask an unbalanced question that the opening part of this question ought to be balanced by putting it in terms of do you agree or do you not agree.

When it comes to the subsequent line, what does "should be renewed" mean? It is not just a matter of renewing the Constitution. We are talking here of a profound change. What does the term "on the basis" mean? Does it mean subject to the legal text? Actually what we are debating here tonight is not exactly a question but more of a sales pitch.

Other questions come to mind when reading the proposed question. When will the legal text be made available? Will the legal text subsequently be changed? Will there be a parliamentary committee to examine such text? Will there be amendments? If a province should turn down the referendum, what will happen next? Does it mean that voters in such a province are to be branded as bad Canadians? Certainly not.

The Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs made an interesting point this afternoon when he said that people should vote on what the package actually says and not what anybody tells them it contains. Let's take him to task.

People think the deal contains an effective social charter, but it does not. People think the Senate will be elected, but it will be only partially. People think that interprovincial trade barriers are removed, but they are not. People think the Senate will be effective, but it is not quite so. People are being told this deal is strengthening federalism, but it is not.

People are being told this deal will ensure national unity, but in reality it sets into motion a two-nations Canada. People think that we will get less government through a smaller Senate, but in fact we will get more government through an enlarged House of Commons. People think that powers are being transferred to the provinces in exchange for powers being transferred to Ottawa, unfortunately this is not the case.

People are told that we must globalize trade and compete internationally. How can we if this deal gives the provinces the responsibility for training the unskilled and the unemployed? People expect the federal government to set national standards in education, in the environment, in skill training, et cetera, yet this deal does not meet these expectations. It actually makes it more difficult to establish national standards and meet international commitments in environmental matters.

There are good features in this deal, such as linguistic dualism, even if the English and French texts of the deal are at variance. However that can be remedied. There is also the recognition of aboriginal rights and the right to aboriginal self-government. We finally recognize them as partners in Canada. This is a great step but it needs totality. If one looks at the forest and not just the trees then one must conclude that this deal is not good enough for Canada. It may be good enough for the provinces, it is a provincial vision of Canada created by premiers, but it is not good enough for Canada.

I come from the constitutional school of Pierre Elliott Trudeau and Eugene Forsey, one which believes that the nation is more than just the sum total of its parts, that the nation must have the tools to develop national cohesion to compete and sustain its development with respect for the environment. In a federal nation, there has to be a give and take of powers according to changing times and requirements instead of a one-way flow of powers from the federal to the provincial governments as in this deal.

When it comes to such a profound change in our system Canadians have to be given all the means and time to understand how the proposed changes will work, not just a six-week wonder with no legal text, with no public hearings, with no expert analysis.

It is worth while noting at this point that to the question: "Do you think there has or has not been enough public consultation about changes to the Constitution", 60 per cent of Canadians answered no in a poll just published by The Toronto Star.

To the question: "If the new proposals are rejected by Canadians in a vote will this lead to the break-up of Canada", 54 per cent answered no.

If you look at satisfaction, this deal does not fare well among Canadians. In Atlantic Canada 49 per cent say their region has been short-changed. Quebecers are also dissatisfied with this deal, and so are westerners with 55 per cent saying the west does not get enough. This dissatisfaction may explain why, according to the same poll, 54 per cent of Canadians said yes to the question: "Do you think there should be changes made to this package of proposals?"

It is very hard to understand for any observer who was not party to the negotiations why the federal government would agree to give the provinces responsibility in labour market training, housing, forestry, tourism, mining, urban affairs and not obtain anything in return. It is also hard to understand why in the Canada clause which expresses Canadian values the fundamental importance of the natural environment would not be included. If there is a value which strongly unites Canadians, it is the deeply felt desire to protect and sustain the natural environment.

To relinquish housing is also a bad move. It means that there will no longer be a federal role in land use, creative design, new approaches to land use and environmentally inspired new approaches to urban living.

To relinquish forestry means there will be no federal role in research, no leverage in silviculture, no national voice at international gatherings.

To relinquish mining, urban affairs, and tourism is a bad move because of the role the federal government could play, and does play if it wants environmental objectives to be kept in mind.

To give the Senate powers to defeat by a simple majority any bill from the House of Commons that involves fundamental tax changes directly related to natural resources seriously undermines the federal government's ability to influence environmental behaviour in the future.

It is this weakening of the national fibre which is so upsetting and makes me sad, and which compels me to say: "No, this is not good enough for Canada". This is not the way to go because we cannot build a strong nation by giving in to requests from left, right and centre with the inevitable result, ironically, that everybody still remains dissatisfied, as revealed by the polls I just brought to the attention of the House.

Perhaps the mistake was made right at the beginning when we failed to ask ourselves: "What do we want to achieve with the Constitution? What purpose should it serve? What are the essentials? Where do we strike a balance in the federal state?" It is now becoming clear that we have put the cart before the horse, that we took the pragmatic route without first establishing what we wanted to achieve in this constitutional journey. This journey, was it really necessary? One wonders.

To conclude, for the reasons I have given, reluctantly I have to say that on October 26, if this deal remains unchanged, I will have to vote against it. This decision should not be viewed in terms of partisan politics, nor in terms of lack of support for my leader for whom I have the greatest respect, admiration and devotion.

In a gesture of great generosity and statesmanship, my leader has risen above partisan considerations in the constitutional debate. He felt, and quite rightly so, that this issue transcends partisan considerations. In doing so, he makes it possible for me to pursue the same approach but to arrive at a different conclusion.

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, the United Nations came forth with a quality of life index this year.

That quality of life index said that of the five billion people in the world, of the many countries of the world, the best country to live in in the whole world is Canada. That felt good.

It feels good that you and I, all of us listening tonight and all of Canada, have somehow put something together that has produced the highest quality of life for our citizens in the world. I am proud to be part of that Canada. British Columbians are proud to be part of that Canada and particularly those of us in the lower mainland of British Columbia think that we live not only in the best country in the world but in the best province and in the best part of that province.

Our first feelings are feelings of appreciation to our nation, to our province, to our community. We are appreciative of the quality of life that we have come to know. I would also like to say on behalf of the people I represent that they are also getting tired of the wrangling about the Constitution. They want to get on with the strengthening and the building of our country.

It is not quite that simple. I think we need to have this debate. We need to have this discussion and we have to bring it to a conclusion through a referendum. I think this is all correct procedurally. I wish I could stand tonight, though, and say that British Columbians are now satisfied, we are ready to support this package wholly. I am not really sure I can say that without issuing some qualifications or expressing some of my traditional concerns that I have expressed in this House over many years.

Even with this package, the alienation that is felt in British Columbia is still there and it is very real. It has some basis. I have always wondered about equalization grants, transfers of payments from some supposed have province to have not provinces.

I was in the maritime provinces last week in the have not provinces. I kept looking for the have nots and all I could see was new road construction, buildings being restored or new construction. I did go to a fish plant and saw a lot of people being laid off but I could not see the have nots when I compared it to my province of British Columbia.

I can go around my province and see have nots everywhere, in city after city or town after town.

The constitutionalization of equalization grants, a trend that started many years ago, I do not like that idea. I do not think we should be subsidizing poor provinces. We should be subsidizing poor people wherever they are found in Canada. That is a traditional argument that I cannot seem to win or we cannot seem to win and so we concede. British Columbians give that to the rest of Canada because we say we are Canadians. We are proud and we are strong so I guess we will have to accept the constitutionalization of equalization grants as a way of life for Canada for the foreseeable future. However, that does not mean we necessarily approve of them or think that they are necessarily the right way to go in Canada. It just means we are perhaps willing to put that aside for another day because it seems to be the consensus of the nation that we should have equalization grants.

I grew up in Saskatchewan and like so many young people, when the jobs were not there, I left for a different lifestyle and economic advantages in British Columbia. I have a very special empathy when we take the funds of Canada and we transfer them back to the farming communities of my birth. I feel good that as a Canadian I am able to share that with them.

The question of representation is a little more difficult for me to explain because I do not really understand how it is easier to represent in British Columbia than it is in Saskatchewan or P.E.I.. I do not quite understand how I somehow should be able to represent 100,000 constituents more or three or four times as many constituents as another in a smaller geographic area. I do not quite understand the fairness of that, but I am willing to accept that and I am willing to say that I am strong, I am proud of Canada and I can represent those extra 100,000 or 200,000 people here for you and I will do it if I need to do it for Canada. I am not complaining about it, I just bring it to your attention. It is another thing that we give from British Columbia to try to make this new Constitution work. It is an attitude of giving and compromising that has come and is coming from our province.

It is kind of hard to explain that others have a fixed percentage of the population of proportional representation. Our province is growing the fastest of any in Canada and we are never, ever going to reach our proportions in a fixed formula the way it is being established now. It is hard to explain, but we say in British Columbia that we will accept that and work for those changes later because we are Canadians and we want Canada to work as it does work. Therefore, we will give again.

When B.C.'s share of national procurement stagnates at 4 per cent, 5 per cent or 6 per cent or even falls, we say we will give that to eastern and central Canada as well. We will take the government procurement and we will try not to complain. We will stick with the free market system and we will throw that in for Canada.

As we compromise and give to our nation, I have to say that the alienation would disappear if somehow it were recognized that we are giving from British Columbia.

We are reaching out with compromise to save and support our nation. It does not hurt to recognize the contribution of my province. It does not hurt to recognize the contributions of every province in Canada.

We get tired of the minority situation in Canada all the time in British Columbia because every one of us out there is a part of some minority or vested interest group. They keep rearing their heads and demanding and demanding, instead of asking what they can contribute. We really need to stop demanding and start saying this is our list of what we have to give. This is what we are giving, we are giving this, we are giving this and we are giving this because we love Canada.

If every province listed all the benefits that they receive from the Government of Canada and if they felt good about their contribution, we would not be having any problems here at all.

I think that everybody should make a list of the advantages of being a Canadian. You list all the advantages. Over here you list the disadvantages. I tell you that disadvantage list is pretty short, not only in Canadian terms but in global terms. No matter where you come from, this is a great nation. I love the parts of it. I am ready to contribute to the parts of it. If I have a little more, I am willing to share that. Let us all have that idea. Let us all have that attitude so that next year and the year after the world will look at Canada and see it as number one.

I will support this referendum, not because I agree with it entirely, but it establishes a framework that I can work within and try and change some of the things over time that I am not satisfied with. Almost every British Columbian says to me in the final analysis, "I do not want to lose my country. I want to build it and keep it strong". That is why I am here at a quarter after one in the morning. That is why you are here at a quarter after one in the morning, Mr Speaker, and I thank you for being here, and I thank Canadians and ask them to be generous and tolerant in the spirit that built our nation and will build it for generations to come.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, we are here discussing tonight, or rather at 1:15 this morning, the content of the question to be answered by Canadians concerning the Constitution and the future of Canada. Despite the fact that there is general support for the wording of the question within this Chamber tonight, as the vote tomorrow will no doubt substantiate, this is an important question that will likely create some dissension among a number of Canadians, and therefore the members of this House would be well advised to proceed through the upcoming referendum campaign very carefully.

The agreement covers a lot of ground and I think all Canadians owe it to themselves to have a good look at it before they vote in late October. An informed decision is the most important decision.

I support the wording of the question being put to us today. I support the consensus reached by the First Ministers on August 28 in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, and I support a yes vote in the referendum campaign. I would like to talk about that to some extent tonight. At the same time, I want to stress that the Constitution is not the only issue that concerns me tonight and I think that during the next seven weeks during the referendum campaign itself, the issues of the economy will be the ones that occupy the majority of my time. I believe this because I believe strongly that if our country cannot support itself, that is, it cannot support farmers on the land, cannot keep workers in their jobs, cannot keep small businesses in business and cannot keep young people enthusiastic and optimistic, then we have a country that is in desperate need of change and looking for redirection.

I think it is obvious on the economic front that this country does need change and redirection.

• (0120)

I am told that by the media, by my colleagues, by my friends, but more important, I am told that by my constituents. I see that in my constituency. In The Battlefords—Meadow Lake in northwest Saskatchewan we are losing farm jobs, processing jobs, manufacturing jobs and jobs in the retail and service sectors because the Canadian economy as it is today will not support those jobs.

We are in northwest Saskatchewan by and large a regional resource based economy. We are dependent on many things beyond our immediate control. Government policy affects us directly because we are vulnerable in so many different ways. Low grain prices, the Canada–United States Free Trade Agreement, policies which have kept up the value of the dollar and until recently interest rates, the newly initiated North American free trade agreement with the United States and Mexico and tax policies which favour the multinational corporations over ordinary wage earners are all examples of government–driven initiatives that are driving jobs and people out of Saskatchewan.

The public has been consulted in the constitutional process and throughout that consultation process ordinary Canadians have raised economic issues as being a priority concern. They said their governments should proceed with real solutions to their daily problems.

In November 1990, Keith Spicer was appointed to head the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future, a royal commission designed to find out what Canadians were thinking about with regard to national unity. After millions of dollars were spent and tens of thousands of Canadians were consulted, Mr. Spicer reported that Canadians were feeling betrayed, confused and angry and his royal commission agreed that they had reasons to feel that way.

I would like to quote briefly from Mr. Spicer's report. He states: "Canadians repeatedly raised the subject of the economy throughout the forum process. Indeed, in many cases, economic concerns ranked higher and were pressed more insistently than any other. Canadians are right to be concerned about their economy. Chronic deficits and a high and rising national debt have contributed to high interest rates. These, together with a high foreign exchange rate, have caused job losses, lost exports, missed job creating investment opportunities and a sharper cyclical downturn than necessary".

There is no doubt in my mind that the sooner the federal government, the provincial governments and all their parts, the MLAs, the MPs, the cabinet ministers and the First Ministers can devote their full–time energies to dealing with the human issues affecting people, the issues that determine quality of life, the issues that ensure some personal and family security, the sooner this country will feel better about itself and the sooner we will feel united as Canadians with an optimistic future.

Because the constitutional unity in this country is important as well, the economic debate has been overshadowed by the political debate and the attention of the public has been diverted for too long by this constitutional debate.

This was a debate that stirred the emotions of people from coast to coast to coast. I have also been wrapped up in the emotion of the constitutional debate. I have shared the disappointments of failed talks, failed negotiations, failed dreams. I at times thought that agreement might be impossible.

Therefore, it was with some surprise, but also with some pleasure, that I watched the First Ministers reach a tentative agreement on July 7 and then seal it with Quebec's participation on August 28. The consensus agreement, with its 60 parts contained in 20 typewritten pages, is an interesting document. It is obviously a compromise document, a negotiated agreement in which no one can claim complete victory but everyone can see some advance. The importance of that agreement is more than its substance, although substance is important.

Its importance, however, lies in the fact that representatives of the federal, provincial and territorial governments, together with representatives of the aboriginal communities in Canada, cared enough about this country to say they would accept what was written as the bottom line. The consensus agreement establishes that Canada remains a country guided by tolerance and compromise. It establishes that despite our many differences, Canadians remain willing to co-operate to achieve greater well-being for all.

The agreement establishes beyond all else that Canadians have a right to be Canadian in different ways, in different times, in different places, and yet feel we are all Canadians just the same. There is a lot in the agreement and parts will be, and in some cases should be, criticized because at some point in our future we will look at this document and say this did not work, that did not work. However, when taken as a whole with the knowledge that it is a compromise document the agreement can be supported.

I acknowledge that the deal is not perfect. In fact, I know that if I thought the deal was perfect then there would be others for whom the deal would be completely intolerable because there are many, including members of this Chamber, with whom I do not agree.

Our differences threatened, and perhaps still do threaten, to tear this country apart. The constitutional debate took us to crisis proportions throughout Canada. The consensus agreement can remove that crisis. There will still be a debate. There will always be a debate about the constitutional issues in this country. The constitutional debate has been a fluid thing. It moves, it rolls and it bounces around, but with this agreement the debate can lose those crisis elements and it can return to a rational and relaxed level.

If I were to have written the constitutional agreement all by myself it would have been a much different document and I would have been a much happier person. By the same token if the Prime Minister had written the constitutional accord by himself it too would have been a different document than the one we have in front of us today and I would have been a very unhappy person in those circumstances.

The premiers and the aboriginal leaders in this country are to be congratulated and thanked for their efforts. When one looks at the time they required to achieve their consensus one recognizes that each of them wanted this deal to work. If that time, research, negotiating principles and effort had gone into discussing Canada's economic problems instead of the Constitution, I know there would be less economic insecurity among farmers, business people, students, pensioners, wage earners and others in this country today.

Canadians would be feeling more optimistic and less fearful for their personal financial security. We still have to cross that bridge. If Canadians vote yes in support of this agreement, the First Ministers' meetings, with aboriginal and territorial participation, can begin to deal with our real Canadian crisis.

If we vote no in opposition to this deal we are telling the political leaders to go back to the drawing board, to go back into that constitutional crisis and to argue about amending formulas instead of economic development, to argue about numbers of senators instead of the price of wheat or beef, to argue about spending power jurisdictions instead of about job creation, to argue about court appointments instead of intergovernmental or international trade agreements like the free trade agreement and the North American free trade agreement.

Personally, as a member of Parliament and as a resident of Saskatchewan I really do not think this is much of a choice. When we support this consensus agreement we are participating in the end of one historical drama and beginning a new one. The end is a pleasant one and the new one is a challenge. We are beginning the process that will allow Canadians to reclaim their economy, to reclaim their country.

In fact, I would like to put it in more personal terms. We will have a chance to reclaim our country if this constitutional consensus is accepted.

When my leader, the member for Yukon, yesterday said in this House that despite its flaws Canada is a great success and a very fortunate nation, I recalled the television images coming into our homes and offices each night; images captured forever in countries like Somalia, Bosnia and the former Yugoslavia, Iraq, and even in parts of the United States; images that capture the human suffering of people without homes, without food, without clothing, without freedom, and without hope.

We are a fortunate nation by comparison but we have problems and those problems need to be addressed. We have the ability to solve our problems but only when we are prepared to confront them sensibly and without undue emotion. The October 26 referendum gives us a chance to put the crisis of the constitutional debate behind us. It gives us a chance to move on to other issues. It gives us a chance to begin a new process that is built from co-operation not confrontation. It is a chance I want to take. It is a chance I want others in this country to take. I urge all Canadians no matter where they live in Canada to join with me and other members of this House in taking that chance by voting yes in the October 26 referendum.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased and proud to be participating in this historic debate. First, I would like to say that I am proud of my Italian origin. I am proud to be a Quebecer, but I am especially proud to be a Canadian. As a result of this historic period in our history, we shall, after October 26, emerge as a stronger, greater, more generous and more tolerant country.

I am proud to be a member of a party that has always shown leadership on constitutional issues and I am proud to have a leader, the Leader of the Opposition, my leader, who, at the outset, had the courage to testify before the Bélanger-Campeau commission in Quebec and present the case for Canada. He had the courage to rise above all political partisanship and propose a plan of action, that is a nine-point plan to break this constitutional deadlock. Much of this plan is present in the Beaudoin-Dobbie report and today it is present in the agreement of August 28.

As Whip of the official opposition, I would now like to thank my colleagues who, on behalf of the Liberal caucus, participated in this process—especially within the Beaudoin-Dobbie parliamentary committee. First, I would like to thank our official spokesman who, for two years, has done an excellent job within the Bélanger-Campeau commission and within the Beaudoin-Dobbie parliamentary committee: the member for Papineau—St-Michel. Thank you on behalf of the whole caucus. I would also like to thank the member for St-Boniface, the member for Mississauga East, the member for Western Arctic, the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys and the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, six members who represented us and did an excellent job, and of course all the other members of this House who contributed to the work of the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee and to other bodies.

From the beginning, when the Leader of the Opposition suggested that once the agreement had been reached that Canadians should vote on it in a referendum, I supported this idea. I remember having participated in public debates on open-line radio shows, even with government members, and I am happy that today we finally have agreed, on both sides of the House, that a referendum is necessary because the Constitution belongs to the people. Of course, there are people who said at the time, and who still say today, that a referendum implies a risk and may be divisive. Of course, there will be emotional debates. However, the fact is that between now and October 26 we will speak emotionally, but we will also have the opportunity to get to know each other, to get to know our regions and to appreciate Canada, this great country of ours. This will also give Canadians an opportunity to show in practical terms our tolerance and our generosity, qualities which make Canada what it is. I am sure that on October 26, this tolerance and this generosity will be reflected in the results of the referendum, because I am convinced that in all regions of Canada, there will be an overwhelming yes vote.

In the 12 or so minutes that I have left, at this very late hour, let me deal briefly with the agreement.

I would like, first of all, to touch on what I call the two solitudes that constitute Canada. There are those Canadians who think that we should not give too much to Quebec or who believe that this agreement gives too much to that province and who are therefore against it and would like to vote against it. On the other hand, there are a number of Quebecers who think that this agreement does not give enough to Quebec and who think that they have to vote against it also. That is the dilemma of the two solitudes that we have in Canada.

Given those two options, those two solitudes, if we were to go with the view that all of the powers must be maintained, that none should be given to Quebec or to the other provinces and that we should have a central government and a very centralized form of federalism, we would end up in such a rigid situation that the country might disintegrate.

If, on the other hand, we were to agree with those Quebecers who are demanding the transfer of all federal powers, we would then no longer have any reason to maintain a federation or a federal government and in that case also, the country might disintegrate.

The only way to keep this country united is the Canadian way. Thus the need for compromise, for taking a middle ground, so that all the regions of Canada may be allowed to develop and prosper, while at the same time having a federal government able to provide a prosperous future for this country as a whole and lead us into the 21st century.

If you go back in history, you will see that the discussion has changed very little in the last 125 years. Nevertheless, a compromise was reached, which gave us our Constitution. I think that the same thing will be done again.

Let us look at the arguments from those who are against the agreement. I would like to point out at the outset that the agreement is not perfect because I would not want anyone to be able to come back later on, if I were to criticize the agreement, and say that I had said it was perfect. No, the agreement is not perfect. Moreover, mere mortals cannot aspire to perfection. I do not think the agreement reached 125 years ago was perfect, nor was the agreement to patriate the Constitution in 1982, nor was the Meech Lake accord, and nor is the agreement that we have before us today. But the situation is such that, even with all its imperfections, and I intend to look at them in detail, this agreement, however imperfect, must be approved because, as I mentioned, it is a compromise position and, historically, Canada is a country built on compromise. As long as there is a willingness to compromise, there is reason to believe in and hope for a bright and prosperous future for our children and grandchildren.

Even though the agreement is not perfect, I believe it must be supported. We heard some of our colleagues here tonight who are against the agreement. Just what was the thrust of their criticism? It was simply that there was no legal text.

We want to consult the people. We have an agreement, a political document. The Prime Minister of Canada, all the provincial premiers, the leaders of the two territorial governments and the aboriginal leaders have agreed to this compromise. They have said publicly that there was a consensus and therefore an agreement, and although there are people who say it was not signed, to me that is as good as a signature.

• (0140)

As I said earlier, part of the process suggested by my leader, the Leader of the Official Opposition, was to submit the agreement to the people for consultation. This is unprecedented in the history of this country and I think the fact this is happening should give us cause to rejoice. For once, citizens, and not a small group of elected representatives, will decide on the future of the country.

The legal text will come later. It is our responsibility as elected representatives and legislators to ensure that the legislation as such, after consultation with and approval by the people, respects and reflects what was in the text of the August 28 agreement. That is our responsibility. For the time being, we must put this agreement or compromise before the people of Canada so they can decide and then we can continue the process.

It is like buying a house. What do you do when you buy a house? You go and look at the house, meet the seller, negotiate and strike a deal. For instance, the seller wants $150,000 and the buyer offers $120,000. Finally, an agreement is reached on the price, and a purchase offer is signed. In Quebec the offer goes to the notary and elsewhere in Canada it goes to a lawyer who prepares the sale contract. While legal experts prepare the purchase or sale contract, the buyer can show the house to his family. Before the final signature, he has plenty of time to show his family the house. In Quebec there is a law that provides for a cooling off period during which the purchase offer may be cancelled.

I must say that if the issue of the legal text is the only case opponents can make against the agreement, they do not have a very strong case, and I am sure that by October 26, Canadians will realize that.

People must understand the legal text is not an issue, since we have a text.

You are telling me that I have only two minutes left and I would like to tell about something that happened to me last week. Last week I had the honour and the pleasure of visiting one of my schools in the riding where it was celebrating the 125th anniversary of the Canadian Confederation. During that visit, I was given a book called Anthology of a Student Riding. This is from the school board on which I was honoured to serve as a commissioner and chairman until I was elected in 1984.

I am sure that my colleague, if I ever pass my time, will forgive me and allow me to read into the record the thoughts of a young boy which are so pertinent to what we are doing all day today and now at 1:45 in the morning. Andrew Wieczorek is a grade five student. I quote:

"Canada, ah, what a country. But have any of you noticed the different languages which people speak, the beauty of the forest and nature or all the jobs and employment?

[Translation]

This country of ours is much more than a geographical entity.

[English]

I am just one citizen of Canada and I am very proud to be Canadian, but sometimes I am discouraged by the attitude of our fellow Canadians. For instance, people who live in Quebec are wondering if separating from Canada is a good idea. I think that these people are foolish because they do not realize the fact that they are still Canadian and that they should look out for their country.

As a Canadian, I am proud of this vast, beautiful country from the eastern fishing coast to the prairies and of the rich forest land of British Columbia. Where else but in Canada can you have a chance to be different and enjoy it? There are St. Patrick's Day celebrations for the Irish, Columbus Day for the Italians and of course a May 3 celebrations for the Polish. Then, on July 1 all Canadians celebrate Canada Day as one big, united family.

All people from nation to nation are welcome in our country full of freedom. People who emigrate to Canada see a future for their children here, a vision that this would be the greatest country in the world. My grandparents were also immigrants and it is because of their dreams for a new life that I am here as a Canadian today.

Canada also means freedom. As a Canadian, I have the freedom to develop into whatever I wish and to wave my flag and be proud of it. Other countries do not possess this freedom we have. I have freedom of speech and freedom of religion. When I am 18, I will have the freedom to vote for whomever I think is best to lead this great country.

Even though I am a young Canadian, I hope that my dream of a Canada staying together continues.

My country, it's you, it's me, it's Canada".

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening to this debate from the beginning, and I have come to the conclusion that those who are speaking for the proposal are all trying to sidestep the issue. I have just heard the member for the Montreal area, who, of course, ended his speech on a patriotic note. I also heard the Prime Minister of Canada. His was also a very patriotic speech. Previous speakers have told us what a wonderful country we live in. They have tried at all costs to extol the virtues of this country, a country where borrowing has been a way of life for the last 20 years and which is on the fringe of bankruptcy. But they chose to ignore this and resort instead to emotional arguments, suggesting that this proposal, this draft package that has been tabled, could end up dividing the country.

I would say that they are obviously trying to sidestep the question. That strategy was, of course, made clear when on the television you had Premier Bourassa, from Quebec, and the Prime Minister, with big smiles on their faces, shaking hands and saying: at last, we have an agreement.

You also saw the Prime Minister meeting with the members of his caucus the next day in Drummondville. They were all kissing each other and crying phoney tears in order to show the population that at long last they had reached an agreement. Of course they thought that Quebecers would say:"What a welcome relief. We have been talking about the Constitution for two years; enough is enough. They finally found a solution; we will not hear about this anymore."

• (0150)

First thing the following morning, Quebecers started to hear experts saying: This is not an agreement, it is a rough draft, a sketch. It is not an agreement since nobody dared to sign it and since there are no legal documents. We do not know how to interpret this so-called agreement. They used words like "we should do this or that", "this should be", but nothing was clear and we are about to ask Canada's and Quebec's population to spend, directly or indirectly, nearly 200 million dollars in government money to give an answer for a proposition which is not really a proposition. According to me, this is a downright waste. We could have obtained the same results through a poll for only a few hundred thousand dollars.

Since the experts have started to analyse that draft agreement, the people, particularly the Quebecers, have realized that this agreement is really unacceptable not only for them but for all Canadians.

Since according to the polls the members of Parliament have little credibility, this evening I will first refer to what experts have to say. I would like to quote several of those who analysed this project and expressed themselves. I am going to quote a few of them. For the most part they say that the status quo is worse. That is to say that we keep exactly what we had before but it is even worse. The truth is, of course—or the credibility in any case—that Quebecers should read the analysis made by experts who come straight out against what we hear in the speeches from people who claim to see in this agreement something extraordinary, when in fact it is so "unextraordinary". That is why it is unanimous; it is because there is nothing in it; nothing final, everything will have to be renegotiated over and over again.

I will start with the distinct society. According to expert Josée Legault, this so-called agreement only pays lip service to Quebec as a distinct society; it will put French Quebecers in a minority position and in an ethnic strait-jacket. That is to say that they will once again be a minority in their own province. I know what it is like. When I arrived in Montreal from a small town in central Quebec, I really felt I was a member of the minority there, in Montreal, in my own province. This is what she said, a political scientist at Université du Québec in Montreal. She can be trusted since she is an expert: ; "You can soon kiss goodbye to whatever is left of the French character of Montreal."

Let me give another example. Eight experts from five or six major Quebec universities, together with the University of Ottawa, state that the distinct society clause is a step backward for Quebec. These are the people that are to be believed instead of listening to those speeches which are unrelated to the substance of this deal, those patriotic speeches such as those I heard today which have nothing to do with the proposal before us.

Turning to powers, it is claimed that Quebec will have extraordinary powers, but Carleton University political science professor François Rocher, who is not a Quebecer and surely not a sovereignist, says that this is the crowning moment of centralizing federalism and a deal that brings to a halt 30 years of dynamic political development in Quebec. I am not the person saying this. It was stated by a professor of political science form Carleton University in Ottawa.

As regards the claim that Quebec gained a great many powers, a neutral expert says the opposite, that this is the crowning moment of centralizing federalism, although in 1984 the Prime Minister was saying "No more centralizing federalism" in his speeches. Today the same man supports a deal that centralizes even more power in Ottawa.

In her column in Le Devoir, Lise Bissonnette, a well-known and highly credible commentator in Quebec says the following: A yes vote will mean the start of sterile negotiations and fresh problems. Of course, nothing is settled with this deal since everything is to be negotiated. Everything will have to be negotiated point by point ad vitam aeternam. This is what she says. These are not politicians speaking; these are not great patriots. This deal is real and has been tabled in this House. This is what must be debated, not Canada's beautiful mountains, and not Macdonald or Cartier who helped found Canada. We should be talking about the future, not the past. What is at issue is our future and that of our children.

Let us talk of the future of our children. Surveys conducted in Quebec CEGEPs show that between 80 and 85 per cent of young people, especially francophone young people are against this deal. They have their future in mind. Forget about the past and look at the future, and you will see clearly that people are against this proposal, at least those who are looking toward the future.

Let us talk about business people. The president of the Chamber of Commerce of Metropolitan Montreal, Bernard Roy, former chief of staff for Prime Minister Mulroney, stated: Clearly, what is being offered here is not what business wanted. This is the new president of the Chamber of Commerce of Metropolitan Montreal speaking. He added that giving an equal Senate more powers than those of the current upper house will make the operations of the federal government even more cumbersome and inefficient. This is not just anybody speaking; this the president of the Chamber of Commerce and a friend of the Prime Minister. Mr. Le Hir, who also represents the Canadian Manufacturer's Association, the most important association in Quebec, one that is vital to our economy. Quebec could not survive without its small businesses. Mr. Le Hir says that it is the status quo, which is even worse. This proposal must be rejected, and not only by Quebecers. If this constitutional proposal is adopted, you can be sure that Canada will continue to be ineffective, have large deficits and make people poorer.

This proposal is bad not only for Quebec, but for the whole country. Let us forget about all those patriotic speeches and start thinking about the proposal. The government's strategy is to elude the real question and then people will say that, unfortunately, it did not see what was happening. We have to open our eyes and realize that this proposal is bad for Canada's economy and even worse for Quebec's economy.

How much time do I have left, Mr. Speaker? One minute. In one minute, I will tell you that Quebecers are intelligent people who, more and more, go to university and are able to understand. I can assure you that this strategy of trying to elude the issue will not work in Quebec. Quebecers are not water carriers anymore; they are intelligent people who are able to understand. I am convinced that Quebecers will vote no because if we vote yes to this accord, we will have endless negotiations and that will be harmful for the Canadian and Quebec economy.

I will vote no and work very hard not to get into this kind of project that will totally kill Quebec and its economy.

[English]

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, there are moments of truth in the lives of nations just as there are in the lives of individuals. The national referendum on the constitutional agreement will be a moment of truth for Canada. Perhaps it might be said that it is one of the most important tests in our 125 year history.

A positive vote in this referendum would not mean a final resolve to our almost pathological predisposition to bite our own tail, but it would be an affirmation of our nationhood. It would be a vote of confidence in the future of this country. It would allow Canadians to get on with their lives. It would allow us to begin to tackle the many pressing economic difficulties that also threaten the future of this nation.

On the other hand, a negative vote, whether it is a negative vote by a single province or in fact right across the nation, would only drive us into further turmoil. While it may not precipitate the departure of Quebec—and there is really no indication that that would be the final outcome—a negative vote in this referendum would ensure the continued paralysis of the federal Parliament as this nation struggles to regain its balance to find yet another formula for success.

A negative vote on this referendum would decimate the dramatic gains that this country has made at redressing the historic wrongs to our aboriginal peoples. It would jeopardize what amounts to the quantum leap we have made politically in reforming our antiquated Senate. A negative vote would ensure the continuation of the kind of economic malaise that has gripped this nation, which we have seen throw thousands and thousands of Canadians out of work and compromise and jeopardize our very economic future. This country will have no future. It will have no economic prosperity until it resolves once and for all our current constitutional dilemma.

I do not pretend for a moment that this constitutional agreement is a panacea to all current or future constitutional squabbles. Lord knows that Canada's favourite pastime has become its obsession with constitutional self-flagellation. Why are we tough on ourselves? When we look at it, we really have so much going for us as a country and as a people, it is really beyond reason but it seems to be the propensity of Canadians and of the Canadian system to be very hard on themselves, to be very critical.

With respect to the agreement that has been brought together by the first ministers of this country, it is not a perfect deal by any means. But it is an agreement that has been honourably achieved by political leaders, who I believe have been genuine in their intent in acting in our national interests.

It settles Quebec's unique status as the homeland and the protector of the French heritage. More important, it brings our aboriginal Canadians into the Constitution in a very meaningful and justifiable way. It responds to the demands from our western provinces for Senate change and for a larger presence in the national scene.

For British Columbians, the changes to the House of Commons and Senate that have been agreed upon will ensure a stronger voice for that province at the centre. An expanded House of Commons will give British Columbians greater representation and a guarantee of fairer representation by population with the awarding of seven new seats over the next six years. The reformed Senate will ensure that B.C. has an elected and responsible representation, essentially equal to Quebec or Ontario. That is really quite an accomplishment when one considers what we have now.

While the constitutional journey has been an arduous one, we have managed to achieve what was thought to be essentially impossible in a country as large and as diverse as Canada. We have achieved consensus through compromise. This constitutional deal is like a patchwork quilt, a skein of trade-offs if you like.

When the agreement is analysed, many of the elements would never stand on their own but each one is crucial to the survival of the deal because each one balances in some fundamental way some other compromise in the package. While almost no one is satisfied with the total package, I would submit that most Canadians agree that it is perhaps the best we can hope for. It is a satisfactory resolution of widely divergent views and widely divergent geographic and political interests. If politics is the art of compromise, I think most would agree that Canada's first ministers have embraced a package that is the very embodiment of that sentiment. While I am certainly not happy with all aspects of the deal, I am willing to concede that an agreement that at least partially satisfies the various regions of this country is far better for the future of this country than no agreement at all.

I would also like to emphasize that I am not going to be wrapping myself in the flag to sell this deal. While I support it personally, I am not its architect and I cannot take credit for its strengths. At the same time I refuse to take the flack for its weaknesses.

My role, as I see it as the representative of the Okanagan—Shuswap in this particular referendum campaign, is really very simple. I consider it my duty to provide opportunities for my constituents to learn as many details as they can about the pros and cons of this agreement so that they can make an informed, reasoned and an intelligent choice when it comes to the vote on October 26.

I am not going to sell it. I am not going to become the bagman of the Prime Minister, should he try to play Captain Canada with it. I am not going to wrap myself in the flag or try to exorcise the demons of the no vote because there are no demons, there are no bad Canadians. There are people who might feel differently and vote differently than I do and they have every right to do so; that is our democratic process. I am going to do my best to explain this agreement, its strengths and its weaknesses, so that my constituents in Okanagan—Shuswap can make the best choice as they see fit.

I believe in the use of referendums as a legitimate tool in the democratic process. I supported the government in its decision to implement the referendum legislation. Although I agree it is an imperfect tool, a referendum is a legitimate way of enhancing the powers of the democratic process through empowerment of the people in a vote of ratification. That is why I am willing to abide by the expressed wishes of the constituents of the Okanagan—Shuswap and place my faith in the collective wisdom of the people of Canada through referendum.

Now that we have the proposed agreement, it is time to let the people decide quietly, to reach that decision intelligently, essentially free from the political rhetoric and the hyperbole that often confuses more than explains.

Let me add one further thought in this regard because it strikes me as odd that while we have debated the social constitution of this country to the point of exhaustion, and I submit to national nausea on the issue, we have essentially failed to recognize a very important event that has unfolded almost unnoticed before the eyes of Canadians. While Canadians have been focusing exclusively on this one debate, the government has quietly rewritten the economic constitution of this country through the agreement of the North American free trade deal between Canada, the U.S. and Mexico. There was no public debate and no parliamentary process.

If the government feels obliged to test the mettle of our social constitution through a process of public referendum, then it should certainly feel obliged to put the North American free trade agreement to the same test of public scrutiny. That is why my colleague, the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, earlier today called upon the Prime Minister in the House to call a parallel referendum on the North American free trade agreement.

I support his plea for a call for a referendum on the NAFTA deal. Put it to the people as has been our social constitution and let them decide on the re-writing of our economic constitution. Whether it is distinct society, whether it is Senate reform or whether it is the formation of a continental trading bloc from the Yukon to the Yucatan, Canadians should be allowed to ratify such sweeping social and economic changes through the process of referendum.

It is simply hypocritical for the government to call a referendum on the social constitution and not call a referendum on the re-writing of our economic constitution.

In closing, let me refer to an editorial which I found in one of my local newspapers today which I think neatly summarizes my views. It relates to the referendum process and it cautions the readers. It states:

> Whatever your views on the constitutional package, base your final decision on what your head says, not your heart. An issue as important as this shouldn't be clouded by emotions.
> The majority of the public is tired of the constitutional debate, but now is the time to set aside that malaise and learn everything possible about the proposal put forward. The future of our country is at stake.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, it is rather interesting at this hour to follow the learned and well-spoken member for Okanagan—Shuswap. The riding of Stormont—Dundas and his own are paired in a very positive initiative, ongoing right now, with our young people across Canada, Voyageur '92. The feedback we are getting from our young people who have been to the Okanagan—Shuswap area and have had the opportunity to exchange views, shows they have a far better and greater understanding and more respect for young Canadians of that region.

I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate on the constitutional referendum on which Canadians will vote on October 26. There is no doubt the outcome of this vote will have a considerable impact on the future of Canada. If Canadians decide to accept the Charlottetown agreement, fundamental changes will be made to the way Canada is to be governed.

Conversely, if the agreement fails to be approved, one can only speculate as to how serious a setback this would be for Canada. One should not associate a rejection of this agreement as being a direct catalyst for the break-up of Canada. However, from a realistic point of view, a continuation of the constitutional paralysis which has plagued Canada for many years, can only lead to increased political and economic instability throughout the country.

[Translation]

Surely Canada's existence as a united political entity could be jeopardized. Moreover, steps to solve the pressing economic problems the country now faces would again be postponed, which could also complicate the situation. Therefore, on October 26, Canadians will have the opportunity to decide their future in clear terms.

[English]

By way of a national referendum, Canadians will have a clear means to say yes to a renewed Canada. The constitutional agreement that will be voted on was achieved through a long process of consultation and public debate. The views of Canadians from across Canada have been taken into consideration.

The Liberal Party of Canada was on record from the outset that Canadians must not be excluded from the constitutional process. Furthermore, we have maintained that the people of Canada must have the opportunity in a referendum to pass judgment on any agreement. I am sure Canadians are pleased that these two points have been met.

The constitutional agreement does not contain everything Canadians would have liked to see included. The Liberal Party would like to have seen more with regard to establishing a stronger economic union, including a more detailed framework for the elimination of interprovincial trade barriers. In addition, we would like to have seen a more effective Senate than what was devised.

Regardless of these outstanding issues, it is important for Canadians to remember that this agreement can be amended in the future. We live in a dynamic and changing society. The needs of Canada and Canadians change over time. The agreement has an amending formula and if changes become necessary, they can be introduced. However, the constitutional agreement does provide Canadians with a basis to work from.

[Translation]

If they accept this agreement, Canadians will continue to enjoy a standard of living which is envied the world over. It has been said that Canada is a difficult country to govern. True, we live in a huge country, with an ethnically diverse population. Yet, during the past 125 years, we have built a strong country which has much to offer to its inhabitants. This agreement gives Canadians the opportunity to make their country an even better place. Yet, during the past 125 years we have built a strong country which has much to offer to its inhabitants. This agreement gives Canadians the opportunity to make their country an even better place.

[English]

This agreement will enable Canada to meet the economic and social challenges ahead as we prepare for the next century. We live in an increasingly complex and competitive global marketplace today. For Canada to survive, we must be strong and united, both economically and politically. We have an opportunity before us to provide Canada with a blueprint for reform and renewal.

Canadians have traditionally expressed a desire for compromise. This agreement is an example of compromise. It offers hope for a better future for all Canadians. Regardless of our origins, the language we speak or where we live, Canadians have shared this land in harmony.

We all have hopes and aspirations for ourselves, our families and for Canada. We have, however, realized what Canada has managed to achieve over the last 125 years. We take pride in Canada's place within the world community. We are a country committed to peace and social justice. While more work is required, we are grateful for what we have and want to remain Canadians.

Canadians want to continue to share in our country's rich resources and heritage. We want to continue contributing to the growth of Canada. More important, we want to pass on to our children and future generations of Canadians a country that will provide them with the same countless opportunities for social and economic advancement that we have enjoyed.

In my riding of Stormont—Dundas, English and French speaking residents have lived side by side for many years. In addition, the city of Cornwall is next to the Akwesasne reserve on Cornwall Island. My riding is a microcosm of Canada.

[Translation]

On the economic level, Stormont—Dundas has had its fair share of hardships. But its population knows that economic growth and future prosperity depend on a strong and united Canada. Canadians in Stormont—Dundas live together in harmony, in a community made rich by the cultural heritage of its francophone, anglophone, native and multicultural roots. This riding is an example of what Canada can go on being, that is to say a diversified nation whose diversity is an advantage rather than a handicap.

[English]

October 26 will be a milestone for Canada. Canadians will be able to support the constitutional agreement and proceed with the creation of a better Canada for every Canadian. We can choose to preserve Canada and build for its future.

All three major political parties in Canada have expressed their support for the constitutional agreement. Labour unions and business organizations across the country have also come out in favour of this agreement. However, it will be left up to the people of Canada to have the final say on whether or not this agreement will come into effect. This is as it should be and I am confident that the decision of the people will be the correct one.

I believe Canadians will want to endorse this agreement. I am sure Canadians understand the difficulty in arriving at a constitutional agreement. Certainly they know it would have been virtually impossible to obtain a constitutional agreement that would suit everyone. For that matter, arriving at a consensus for an agreement in itself is not an easy task, as the first ministers would certainly attest. Yet an agreement was reached and it is now up to Canadians to vote on it.

While the agreement is not all encompassing, it puts forward an acceptable resolution to the seemingly endless constitutional debate. I plan to campaign throughout Stormont—Dundas in favour of this it and I hope a number of my constituents will do likewise. Canada has devoted a significant amount of time and energy to resolving our constitutional differences. We have finally arrived at an agreement worthy of support.

In conclusion, I believe Canadians will make a decision to support the constitutional agreement. I will urge my constituents to vote in favour of it on October 26. In doing so, they will be a part of an historic moment in Canadian history, when Canadians from across the country will say yes to constitutional reform and yes to a renewed Canada, a Canada that will be strong and united.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, it being 2.25 in the morning, I feel I should remind our viewers what it is we are debating. Therefore, I quote from our Orders of the Day. What we are debating is:

> That pursuant to the act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada, this House approves the following text of a referendum question.
> "Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992.
> _____ _____ "
> yes no

We have the Consensus Report on the Constitution, Charlottetown, August 28, 1992, final text. I remind the viewers it is not the legal text but the final text. Tomorrow I am assured that we will receive the legal text.

In 1930 at the beginning of the Great Depression, my father Walter Flis and my mother Anna Flis decided to cross the ocean with two children and choose another country where they felt they would make a better living, not so much for themselves but for their children. They came to this great country called Canada. They were not coming to Ontario, Alberta or British Columbia, they were coming to Canada. That is all they knew about this country. It was Canada.

Because the immigration rules of the 1930s required that if you had no relatives in Canada you had to work two years on a farm, they were heading to Alberta to work their two years on a farm.

On the boat coming from Poland they met other friends and those friends said that they had relatives in Saskatchewan. They were persuaded to go to Saskatchewan. The two-year commitment to work on a farm in Saskatchewan turned out to be 22 years. They purchased a homestead and a half section of land. From two years they ended up farming for 22 years.

As it is today, the income from farming in Saskatchewan was insufficient to support a family, a mom and dad and six children. During the winters my father would go to Kenora, Ontario, to work in the bush camps to earn extra money to buy seed in the spring to sow the next year's crop. Other winters I remember my father and my oldest brother, who was only 16, going to Nanaimo, B.C., to unload coal off the ships, again to earn a few extra dollars to buy grain and pay for groceries for the coming year.

That reminds me that there is something wrong with this package agreed to on August 28. I am reminded that there were no labour barriers, no trade barriers of any kind between provinces. My father and brother could work in other provinces and bring the money home to supplement the farm income.

In 1952 after three crop failures in a row, my father could not see any future for four sons and two daughters in farming. He sold the half section of land and moved to Ontario. The farms in Ontario were too expensive. He could not afford one so he ended up buying a little family restaurant business and this went very well. It put me through teacher's college and university for which I am very thankful.

I was in my mid–20s when I met my wife at the opening of the seaway in Cornwall. The late Prime Minister John Diefenbaker was there. I always credit the late John Diefenbaker for getting my wife Sophie Radziszewiski and myself together. The former parliamentary secretary is holding a book up of the former Prime Minister.

My wife was raised in Quebec. I was born and raised in Saskatchewan. We got married and where did we settle down? In Ontario. Again, there were no barriers for my wife or myself. We were free to move across this great country. Then why could the Prime Minister and the first ministers not once and for all remove all of the barriers between the provinces now, the labour barriers, the trade barriers, et cetera?

My son did the reverse. He saw no future in Ontario. He is managing a restaurant and a brew pub in Saskatoon but he cannot buy beer from Alberta or New Brunswick. He has to buy the beer that is produced in Saskatchewan and yet we want to be competitive on the world market.

Here is a Prime Minister who boasts in this House how he has removed the barriers between Canada and the United States, how he has removed the trade barriers between Mexico, Canada, and the United States. Yet we seem to have been powerless to remove the barriers between the provinces. I see that as a big flaw in this package we are asking the people to vote on in the referendum on October 26.

During the summer I did a lot of door–to–door canvassing. I listened to what my constituents had to say about this whole Constitution debate. Of course, they have had enough of this debate. They say: "Get on with it. Vote for it. Get it out of the way and concentrate on the important things that are troubling this country".

They pointed out what they agree with. They are very pleased the aboriginal people will have finally been recognized, that they have the right to self–government. They were very pleased with the reforms to the Senate, reducing the Senate to 62 seats.

They were not pleased with increasing the members in the House of Commons. I must say I agree with my constituents on that. For the number of people we represent I do not think we need more members. I think what members need is additional staff. Give me an additional staff person so I can serve my constituents better, but I believe we have enough MPs now.

Their biggest concern was that we are giving away too many powers to the provinces in this package. They want a strong central government. My constituency is made up of 40 per cent Anglo–Saxon Canadians and 60 per cent Canadians of other backgrounds. What they want and wish for this country is a strong central government. They are very concerned we have given away too much power to the provinces, which will weaken this country.

One of the things they pointed out was immigration. Why on earth would you give immigration to the provinces? There may not be many problems in the next decade, but who knows 30 or 50 years from now? Immigration patterns may change. Some provinces may be very selective and discriminatory and embarrass Canada because we may be breaking the United Nations conventions on immigration. We may be breaking and violating the human rights of people from certain countries. What an embarrassing situation Canada could be in because some province may want to be very selective in its immigration policy and may embarrass the whole country. We could lose the kind of reputation the United Nations gave us today.

Let us look at the powers we gave to the provinces on human development and training. Why would we give away training to the provinces when we are in such difficult times with unemployment and economic issues? We hear a lot of criticism today about our educational system. I do not blame the educational system. I blame us in this House, the federal leaders, for not having the foresight and the leadership. What is lacking as far as education and training? National objectives for this country are what is lacking. We do not set national goals for the next 30, 40, 50 years. If we do not have these national objectives how can the provinces strike curriculums to meet national objectives? It is no wonder we are floundering.

The reverse should have happened. Training and education should have been more centralized so that we can give our country direction. If, for example, in the next 30 years we feel we want to move further into space technology, then we should be building that into our school curriculums from kindergarten right on through university, but central federal government control over this is needed.

Twenty years ago I visited the school systems in Czechoslovakia, Hungary and Poland when they were still under communist regimes. I was quite impressed with the high calibre of their educational systems. However, their educational systems were highly centralized, too highly centralized for my liking.

As a federal government we have to take a look at how, through setting national objectives for the country, we can strengthen the whole educational system and training. Unfortunately, we have gone the other way.

My constituents have great concerns about weakening the federal government.

I am sure the parliamentary secretary and you, Mr. Speaker, must be thinking: "God, is Mr. Flis voting against this agreement? Is he going to campaign on the no side?" No, Mr. Speaker. I will use every ounce of energy I have to work for the yes side of this agreement because as associate critic for external affairs for our party, I have had the opportunity of visiting and working in many other countries, including Ethiopia, Pakistan, Lithuania, Russia, Ukraine, you name it. Every time I return I am so thankful to the Lord that my parents chose to come to Canada.

I was just handed this year's silver dollar. It so beautifully captures what Canada is all about. I hope every Canadian will go to the bank and get one of these dollars and carry that dollar in his or her pocket on October 26. If they do, I am sure every Canadian will vote yes.

The coin designer, Rita Swanson, who comes from my province of birth, Saskatchewan, says this about her design:

> Underlying my inspiration for the design of the new Canada 125 dollar coin was a desire that it be meaningful—in a national sense. I therefore chose what I believe to be strong national symbols: the flag as our national emblem; children as our future and our source of inspiration; the Parliament buildings as testimony to our history. I hope the design and the coin will help to remind everyone of how lucky we are to live in such a wonderful, unique and very special country.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and a pleasure to speak in the House tonight in this very important debate about Canada's national unity and the referendum in which all Canadians will be participating in a short six week's time, on October 26.

As I look at the clock, at one end of our country in a couple of hours the people of Newfoundland and Labrador will be getting up, ready to start their day. At the other end of the country, in my province of British Columbia, perhaps some people are still awake and some are sleeping. To those people who cannot get enough of Parliament or who are not sleeping well tonight and maybe have to be put to sleep or who are working at the all-night 7-Elevens or gas stations, we want to get a message across to those people. Here in the Parliament of Canada people are doing what they feel is their best to get the message across that the debate we are having today and will be having from now until October 26 and beyond is an important one for the future of our country, for the day-to-day lives we all lead, what it means to our country and our fellow Canadians.

We are talking tonight about the question on the referendum that all Canadians I hope will participate in on October 26. It is a question that is going to ask Canadians about the constitutional agreement reached in Charlottetown between the Prime Minister, the premiers, territorial and aboriginal leaders.

It is the best bet so far for a united Canada and in particular for resolving the drawn-out debate on the Constitution. The best news of all for many is that we can put the prolonged debate about the Constitution behind us and move forward to address many pressing economic and social concerns in our country.

We know that after October 26 the Constitution will not disappear forever from the public agenda. We know and all Canadians know, now that we have the ability to amend our Constitution on our own and in particular, and as those rules are clarified in the agreement reached in Charlottetown, that we will be debating the Constitution further.

There is a sense of fatigue as has been mentioned. Certainly among most Canadians there is a desire that this Canada round be dealt with now so that when we do carry on the debate about the Constitution and about what government and agencies of government should do, that debate will then be framed around the rules of our Constitution that will have been established.

From the discussions I had with my constituents over the Labour Day weekend, I would say the main message I heard was that it was important to put these discussions behind us. Of course, they were particularly concerned about the future of our country and keeping a united Canada from coast to coast to coast, from Newfoundland and Labrador to British Columbia, to the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

They are trying to capture just what it is to be a Canadian. We have had some difficulty doing that over the past number of years. We all know that often we define ourselves as not being Americans. As a young nation of some 125 years we are really now just making our first serious effort at trying to define exactly what a Canadian is.

The Canada clause is not ringing poetry, but it is a way to try to put on paper what it is that we think Canada stands for. I think that is a particularly important start for a sense of nationhood for us in the future.

When I look at the unity agreement, as I call it, I see a web of compromises and balances that tries to meet the needs of the different parts of Canada, including those of British Columbia and other areas. We are a large country and a diverse nation. As a Confederation we attempt to hold those different regions together under a common agreement and provide us with a reason to exist.

Through the course of the debate on the Constitution in the last two years I have provided information on a regular basis to my constituents by way of a constitutional updates mailing list, regular community meetings on the Constitution, and in particular a constitutional forum that I co-sponsored with students of the College of New Caledonia in Prince George. All the participants at least had a commitment to their view of Canada. It was a Canada that saw our differences, that had debate about those differences, and a lot of questions often as well about those differences, but the bottom line was that we had to stay united as a country.

Our leaders, our premiers, the Prime Minister and others have attempted, certainly over the past two years, to frame an agreement that meets the demands of the different parts of Canada. As many have said before me—and it will be said from now on as we head toward the referendum date—it is not a perfect document. I recall one speaker saying that earlier today. If there were a perfect document here tonight then it would be my guess—and I would share the thoughts of the member from The Battlefords—we would likely offend a great number of people.

I would just like to comment very briefly in the short time I have on a couple of the concerns I have with the package, some of the positive areas, and then look down the road to October 26.

I have always been, I guess one might say, a little old fashioned about the Senate. It has been always my view that our country might have been better served if we did not have the Senate. Of course that is not to be. Certain governments and groups in Canada felt that in fact we needed a Senate, a revised and new Senate, and that is what we have now.

As Canadians get to read the material that will be provided to them, likely ad nauseam, there will be plenty of information around in the next couple of weeks on this. If anybody is worried about not having any reading material over the next couple of weeks, there is going to be plenty. They can mark my words.

It is still unclear what influence the new Senate will have on national politics and policies. Will it bark or will it have a bite? Like any part of a constitution, like any part of any agreement, we will have to see it work and see what happens and down the road refine and improve that agreement.

I know a trade union organizer, a long-time resident of the Prince George area, who likened this agreement to a first contract. The employer does not like it. The workers do not like it. But they know they all have to sign it because it is a place to start from. I do not think that is a bad description of what we are debating today.

Another concern I have falls in the area of the division of powers, the exclusive jurisdiction to be granted in provinces in various areas. Two particular concerns come to light. The first one is my concern in terms of the question of a national training program and labour market training.

I have my concerns in that field and I hope this particular area will be monitored closely. I have faith that those provinces that are better off—British Columbia, Alberta, perhaps Ontario and parts of Quebec—will do okay. However, I wonder how successful those provinces that will have to continue to rely on the helping hand of the federal government will be. I urge caution in this particular field.

I mentioned another area that I spent my first months in this Parliament on, the whole question of forestry and the jurisdictional supremacy that we are prepared to give through agreement to the provinces in the field of forestry. We spent some time passing legislation in this House to get a federal Minister of Forestry. We want to make sure he still has a job to do, or perhaps it is not necessary to have the minister any longer. However, with growing concerns about the world environment and our forests, it is an area of concern that I have.

We receive from many businesses in particular and our constituents concerns about the duplication and red tape of government. I suppose one could say, and I am thinking of mining in particular, that is an area where a great deal of duplication may disappear. Some mining companies might be pleased that some effort will be made to reduce the duplication between the different levels of government.

I am pleased that we are going to see in the agreement the whole question of a social union. This will show that we are a caring nation and one that places importance on the identification of social goals which help define us as a country and give direction to our governments.

I am particularly pleased that the whole question of native self-government has been resolved. I see us going down the road to resolving many of the problems we have in that area. I understand some credit is due to the premier of Yukon for providing some guidance and assistance to premiers and to the federal government in terms of what efforts have been made in that area in Yukon and the success that has been had there. It is something we can all learn from as we resolve problems that have been with us for some time.

I am very pleased with this particular part of the agreement that has been reached. I am hopeful about the progress in the future in this area.

In terms of where we are going now in our debate, there will be a vote tonight in this House where I certainly will be voting yes in favour of this referendum question. I am not worried about the wording of a referendum. I am not questioning the intelligence of the voters of Canada. They know what they are going to be voting on. When they go to the polls on October 26, I know that Canadians will make sure their votes are informed and educated.

All members of the House will it their duty to ensure that information is available to our constituents so that they can make their decision. I have said that before in the House. I voted for that question in the House. I believe my constituents know how strongly I feel about it.

Regardless of position and in closing I pay tribute to my leader who in supporting the yes cause of this referendum also paid heed to those who may differ because as members of Parliament we represent those people as well. I look forward to a vigorous and reasoned debate. I look forward to offering all of the information I can to my constituents so that they can make an informed vote. I encourage everyone to participate in this important and historic vote.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, the clock on the wall says seven minutes to three o'clock Eastern Daylight Time. It is a rather extraordinary time to be speaking here in the House of Commons, but after all this is rather an extraordinary issue and these are extraordinary times. Therefore I guess we should not be surprised that we are doing such things at such an unusual early hour of the day.

I am here early this morning to say unequivocally that I support whole-heartedly the Charlottetown accord. I support the October 26 referendum as a means of getting a decisive opinion from Canadians on the Charlottetown accord. I am here to say that I support the question that will be put to Canadians in the referendum of October 26.

First the question. I have heard, not directly, some criticism of the question. I really do not take the criticism seriously because I believe the question is very clear, very straight forward and neutral. I do not think people will have any difficulty understanding the question. I do not think it could be much more clear than the way it is written. It reads:

> Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992?

I think that is pretty clear. I concede that some people would have preferred a question that was tied a bit more directly to possible sovereignty for the province of Quebec. That might have made, in the eyes of some Canadians, the choice a bit more stark. But let us not fool ourselves. When people are responding to this question with a yes or no, whether they approve the agreement reached on August 28, I am sure that in the back of the minds of most Canadians who will take time to answer the question will be the matter of sovereignty. I am not concerned about that at all. I think the question is very fair.

Now the referendum, the vehicle by which we get the decisive opinion from Canadians. My party, the Liberal Party of Canada, has been solidly behind and advocating a referendum on this issue for more than a year now. We have stated publicly many times that we support a referendum because, in my words anyway, I think it is the only way we are going to settle this issue once and for all.

We know that talking about the Constitution is a kind of Canadian disease. There is no doubt that even after the referendum and if the issue is finally settled people will continue talking about the Constitution one way or the other. We need a decisive response from Canadians and this is the only way we are going to put the issue behind us and put the issue to bed. It will really be the only way to shut some people up.

If we get approval from Canadians, and I sincerely believe we will, we can go to those people who will continue harping on the Constitution and simply put to them that the people of Canada have spoken and enough is enough. We cannot go on with this forever. I think they will respond. They will pay attention to the opinion they will hear from Canadians. If they only hear it from politicians, academics and journalists, I think they will go on. This is one time we have to get the public opinion and we are going to get it. I believe we are going to get a resounding yes vote. That is my feeling and my hope.

In so far as the agreement is concerned—let us talk about that—I do not want to go through every piece of it. I do not want to go through the agreement line by line. That is something that was left to negotiation. We can only hope that the first ministers, the territorial leaders and the aboriginal leaders went through the agreement line by line and have come up with this package. It is now for us, for all Canadians, to vote on this agreement. They will either vote it up or they will vote it down.

When I take the position that I am in support of the accord or in support of the agreement, let us be clear that I am not totally happy with every component of it. This is not a perfect piece. But I was not looking for perfection. I knew before this process started that we were not going to get perfection. At least I was right on that. There is grumbling in Atlantic Canada, there is grumbling in Quebec, there is grumbling in Ontario, there is grumbling out on the prairies, there is grumbling everywhere. Because everybody is grumbling maybe the job was not so bad after all. It is the nature of this constitutional business that there will be grumbling, and we have got it.

It appears that people of one region are saying: "We didn't get as much as people did in some other region of Canada". I think that is a pretty typical response.

I am not happy with every piece. I will give an example, the Senate. I was really hoping for a revised, a renewed Senate that would have more clout, that would give western Canada a larger voice in the Parliament of Canada and I do not think we got it. I think that the institution that we are going to get out of this is going to be largely symbolic. I do not think it is going to be very powerful at all.

I think the negotiators, the first ministers, the territorial leaders and the aboriginal leaders, sacrificed too much of the second E so that they could get the third E, the so-called equality E. But that is what they came up with and I am prepared to live with it.

I am optimistic that if we get this new Senate that it will grow, that it will develop, that it is not going to remain as is for 1,000 years. I remind you, Mr. Speaker, of the development of the U.S. Senate. It developed over the decades. It started out as an appointed body. It is not an appointed body any more. It has grown into a very powerful institution in the United States. I am hoping that the same thing will happen with the new Senate here in Canada.

I think it is unfortunate that the agreement allows for the appointment of any senators. I have really had it up to here with the appointment of senators. I do not think that is the way to go. My guess is for those Canadians who do not have the opportunity to elect directly their senators that it will not be long into the future before they will be demanding of their politicians the right to vote for their senators directly. I assume their argument will be if other Canadians can have that right, why not all of us. I think that is going to come, but it will take time.

Constitutions are documents that are designed to evolve over a long period of time, but of course the evolution is extremely slow. I can certainly live with the accord and I will support it enthusiastically because we have got to get on to other things.

The country is in an economic mess. Wherever I go in my constituency of Winnipeg—St. James, people are saying we have got to get off the Constitution and start working on the economy. The unemployment problem is horrendous. We are talking about unemployment of at least 11.6 per cent of the labour force. If we counted the people who have given up looking for jobs, I suspect that the real unemployment rate is closer to 12 per cent and it could be well over 12.

We have many, many serious economic questions facing us because of Tory mismanagement. There is the free trade agreement that was signed four years ago. There is the NAFTA. There are all kinds of social issues.

When I was door knocking this summer in my riding, if there was one particular message I heard from constituents over and over again, it was: "Let us get the Constitution out of our way. Let us do it with that old Canadian flare of compromise and get on to some very, very pressing economic problems". I would hope that when the referendum is completed on October 26 that the very next day after we get the yes vote, which I believe we will, we can train our guns on the economy because it is in a serious, serious mess and we have to do something.

I would say this to those people who are inclined to say no to the agreement: Sure we can talk about it for another year. We could talk about it for another five years. We could talk about it I suppose for another 10 years. More talk, more debate, more wringing our hands is no guarantee that we are going to get a better document than the one that is before us.

It is decision time. The document reflects compromise. Sure, it is not perfect. Sure, we are frustrated. Think about the people in some other countries in the world; the people of Sarajevo, South Africa, Somalia and in some of the former Republics of the Soviet Union. Think of their problems and ask yourself whether they would prefer our Canadian problems over theirs. I would suspect that they would say almost unanimously that in the full context of world issues, ours are not too bad.

I am glad that we have exercised compromise and that we have come up with an offer to the province of Quebec that will give Quebecers the opportunity to say yes to Canada. I think Quebecers have wanted that opportunity for a long, long time. They want that opportunity. It is here now. It is actually for Quebecers to decide whether the offer is good enough for them. But my feeling is that they will say yes to it and they will say yes to it enthusiastically. When they do and when the rest of Canadians give support to this agreement, we can turn this particular page and go on to some other things.

In my final few words, I would want to say to my constituents that I hope they participate as much as they would want to in this referendum. I would hope that they would seek out as much information as possible so that they feel comfortable with the question and with the issue.

I am prepared to do anything possible for them and to provide them with information. For example next Wednesday at the United Church in Headingley, Manitoba, which is on the west side of my riding, I will have one of my regular open houses. That is next Wednesday evening. At that time I would be more than happy to distribute material on this particular agreement. I invite as many people as possible to come out and ask questions and get the written material so that they can be as well informed as possible. Thank you for this opportunity to participate in the debate. I am satisfied this agreement is a success and we will go on to much better days for this great country.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to be given this opportunity to participate in this historic debate this evening. This is only the second time this century that the government has asked the people of this country to make their wishes known through a referendum. As the member for Kingston and the Islands, I am pleased to have this opportunity to convey the thoughts and ideas of my constituents.

The agreement reached by the Prime Minister and the provincial premiers is, like the agreement creating our federation in 1867, a great compromise.

As the constitutional affairs minister said today in his speech, it was a cobbling together of interests and issues, and I fully agree with what the minister said.

I agree also with my colleague from Winnipeg when he said this agreement is not perfect. In fact, I think almost every member of this House has said the agreement is not perfect. I am sure if every member was canvassed as to what the imperfections were, there would probably be 295 different opinions as to what was right and what was not.

There is a wide diversity of view in respect of this agreement. There is plenty of room for disagreement in respect of it. Any one of us can find fault with various provisions in the document, but in spite of that I believe it represents a reasonable compromise and it should be supported.

I do so not because of great enthusiasm for the agreement, but I do so because I think in the long run it can work for our country. I think it represents a significant improvement on the Meech Lake accord and for one particular reason. It is for this reason I had grave reservations and, in fact, opposed the Meech Lake accord for what good that opposition did at the time.

This agreement deals with the Senate. Meech Lake established a Senate that was appointed by the provinces and which left unchecked the Senate's powers. It also provided that the Senate arrangements could not be changed except by the unanimous consent of the provinces. Once the provincial governments got the power to appoint their senators, the Senate had an absolute veto on the House of Commons and the provision for that appointment could not be changed except by unanimous consent.

We had a situation where the provinces in effect took control of the federal Parliament in a very direct way which in my view was completely contrary to the scheme of the British North America Act, our Constitution Act, and of course contrary to any principle of separation of powers which we have in the federal system because it gave the provinces a very powerful override in this Parliament.

It was for that reason I was concerned that the Meech Lake accord was seriously flawed and should be opposed. This deal has solved that problem. I do not particularly like the way it has been solved. As the Leader of the Opposition said, we in this party have reservations about the arrangements in respect of the Senate.

[Translation]

We still have some unresolved issues pertaining to the Senate, but I think that we have at least come up with something that is acceptable and I can live with the over-all agreement when I consider all of the other solutions proposed in the agreements that we have here this evening.

Finally, the time has come to conclude our discussions on the Constitution and to begin talking about the other problems facing this country, particularly the economy and unemployment, which is a major problem for Canadians today because of this government's economic policies.

[English]

I want to make it very clear also why we are discussing this whole issue tonight because I think that throughout this debate Canadians are going to remember why it is that the constitutional crisis has been brought on this country at this time. It is the direct result of the election of this government in 1984.

The Prime Minister, this government, chose to meddle in constitutional matters when no one in Canada was discussing the Constitution. He had to muddy the waters, he had to ride like a white knight through the constitutional morass that is Canada.

Our Constitution has never been anything but a patchwork of agreements and compromises, and instead of leaving well alone, the Prime Minister and his cabinet decided to bungle into the area as they have bungled into so many things in the course of their administration, and they came up with this crisis. They created this crisis and they have had to solve it.

Everyone is expressing great relief—not everyone but a lot of people are expressing great relief—that the matter has apparently been finally resolved and we will know more on October 26.

The sole reason that we are facing this crisis is because of the incompetent bungling of this government. If it had left this issue alone we would not be facing this problem today. We would not have spent the last four or five years haggling over this particular difficulty.

Members of the opposition have tried to co-operate with the government, have tried to show some leadership—indeed, the Leader of the Opposition has shown tremendous leadership on this issue—to extricate the country from this morass. We have not been players directly in the negotiation of the agreement—that matter has been settled between the premiers and the Prime Minister—although it is certainly true that as an opposition we had some input in the various committee hearings that preceded the final accord.

We have been anxious to get this matter off the table. This is part of the reason for our support for the agreement that has now been reached. But the government has almost destroyed our country in its constitutional foul-ups and bungling and Canadians will not soon forget that particular sad part of the equation, and that is a very important part of the discussion tonight.

The other thing that is important to remember is that the resolution of this dispute or this conflict will do absolutely nothing to create jobs for Canadians, to provide food for Canadians, or to provide additional moneys for those who are desperately in need.

[Translation]

Indeed, we will be losing jobs after the referendum. Those people who were employed by the government to assist with the constitutional negotiations will not have any work once the referendum is over. Obviously a constitutional agreement does nothing to help those Canadians who need jobs, work or assistance in providing food for their families.

[English]

What I fear about the referendum debate is the activity of two groups whose aim is to break up Canada. On the one hand, we have the group in English Canada who seem to think that perhaps we can dispense with Quebec, that we should kick Quebec out of the country. On the other hand, we have a group in Quebec who believe they would be better off going it alone and should abandon the rest of us and establish their own state and break the country up.

In my view, neither of these groups is sufficiently large on its own to cause the damage that each would like to do. However, an apathetic view on the part of other Canadians, indifference to the outcome of this referendum on the part of well-meaning Canadians, and an unwillingness to enter into this agreement in the spirit of compromise and vote against the question in the referendum and vote no in the referendum, will all add to the strength and the power of those groups that seek to break our country apart.

It is important that we get behind the yes vote in this referendum and I, of course, indicate my support for it. I will campaign to ensure that the yes side does as well as can be done in my constituency of Kingston and the Islands and anywhere else I can be of assistance.

In his famous report, Lord Durham early in the last century reported that he found "two nations warring in the bosom of a single state". That situation, of course, has changed. There is not a war on. However, what I fear has been happening in Canada for a long time and which I hope has been changing in the last few years is the fact that we have two nations living apart under the same roof. Too often we fail to get together and look at each other, examine each other's culture and see what we have in common.

[Translation]

Notwithstanding changes in the past years, we still have two solitudes in Canada. Bilingualism is the way to slowly change that. Our history is filled with examples of agreements between the two founding nations. People who deny that there are two founding nations or that it is now an important concept in Canada are putting at risk both our country and the present agreement which is so important for everyone. We must study the history of Canada, as the minister responsible for constitutional affairs said today. That study will reveal everywhere the importance of this great partnership between the two nations that founded our country.

[English]

We have to build our country much as though we were neighbours in a community. When one of us goes to assist a neighbour who is in need of assistance, whether it is taking food over because of a problem or going to relieve the other for various physical problems that may beset him or her, we do community building. We feel better ourselves. We strengthen ourselves. We build our self-esteem. We strengthen and help the neighbour. We build up the neighbour's feelings of community and importance and strengthen him or her.

Why can we not do the same between our communities? Why are we unable to reach out and help another, build each other up by trying to learn and appreciate the other's needs, weaknesses and strengths?

We have in our country the opportunity through our culture, our multicultural heritage, but certainly through the original culture of the two if you want to call it that—the aboriginal culture which is all very much a part of it—to build a very strong and very vibrant community.

We have it now. What we need to do is build on the strength that we have developed in the past, give our citizens an opportunity to continue the job of nation-building which was begun 125 years ago and I believe it can be continued under the new arrangements that have been negotiated.

It will be slightly different. There will be changes. But I do not believe those changes are detrimental to the basic fabric of this country which all of us have lived in, worked for and will continue to strive for in the years ahead. I am not gung ho on the deal, but it is something I can live with. I will support it and I urge my fellow Canadians to do so in the hope that we can put this sad chapter of our constitutional history behind us and get on with dealing with the economic problems that beset our country.

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have an opportunity to speak on the issue before the House tonight and before Canadians, that is the referendum question that will be presented to Canadians for their consideration and decision concerning amendments to the Canadian Constitution.

I see this issue in a rather simplistic way. After the patriation of the Constitution from Great Britain in the early 1980s, Quebec refused to sign the document, refused to become a part of the Canadian Constitution because of various deep-seated grievances.

It has taken virtually a decade to develop a process and a package that would allow Quebecers to consider joining once again with other Canadians in bringing this country together. That is the issue before us; a set of provisions which provide an opportunity for Quebec to remain within Canada. The amendments to the Constitution appear to do this. The signals from Quebec are that there will be a very deep and divisive debate. It looks as if it will divide families. It will divide friends and divide social organizations. It will be a very intense debate in the province of Quebec.

People in other parts of Canada are very hopeful and very optimistic that these changes will meet their needs and that the majority of Quebecers will vote in support of this question and remain with Canada to build a future together.

It reminds me of a sign I see in more and more places where individual Canadians are saying: "My Canada includes Quebec and my future includes Quebec, with all Canadians together". I think many people are very concerned about the difficult debate that will go on in Quebec. Hopefully it will be resolved without lasting scars and will allow Quebec to move forward.

It is a serious concern when we hear the Prime Minister of Canada saying that he is going into the province of Quebec to fight separatism. It worries me and many others. We conjure up a picture of a badly damaged Prime Minister in the eyes of Canadians, going into Quebec trying to resurrect his self-image and the self-image of a damaged government by attacking Quebecers.

Many people in this country believe that Quebec should be allowed to debate this question itself and not have this badly damaged Prime Minister moving into Quebec like Sherman marching through Georgia to burn Atlanta and the damage that could result from that, motivated by personal and political self-interest. I hope that does not occur. I hope that many of us are mistaken in our interpretation of his remarks. It is going to be difficult in Quebec. Our best wishes go with them. The vast majority of Canadians want Quebec in a renewed Canada facing the future together. If Canada was without Quebec it would certainly be a damaged country and one whose prospects for the future would be grim and difficult indeed.

This document does not contain everything I or any other Canadian had hoped to see. It is unfortunate that the package that left the table is going to be difficult to improve before it leaves this House, before it is considered by Canadians. We do have a compromise arrangement.

Another aspect of the constitutional agreement is extremely important and that is the issues affecting aboriginal people. The aboriginal people of Canada seem to be relieved and supportive and to some degree very pleased at the outcome, that a right to aboriginal self-government exists within this document. The opportunity to create aboriginal self-government situations across this country is now recognized and exists.

Aboriginal people have another cause for optimism. There seems to be a movement in British Columbia, an area where I believe there has been no positive movement, on the question of aboriginal land claims. That now seems to be moving forward as the Government of British Columbia and the government here in Ottawa move closer to reaching agreements for a process to begin the resolution of that issue.

• (0330)

The Constitution, coupled with what appears now to be a determination to resolve aboriginal land claim issues and aboriginal rights, is now moving forward. I would think the next decade would be one of great optimism for many aboriginal people in Canada to leave the terrible ghettos in which they have found themselves and open a great opportunity to this and succeeding generations of the aboriginal people of this country.

Those two provisions give me great cause for optimism, that we can find Quebec solidly within the national framework and working toward the future together and that we resolve the issue or put on the road to solution the issue of aboriginal self-government and the aboriginal land claim.

I do not support the Senate agreement. I see the Senate as an obstacle to progress for Canadians. I certainly do not share with the previous speaker from the Liberal Party his view of the Senate. The hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James, the previous speaker, believes the Senate needs to be strengthened. I see it as an impediment to Canadians making judgments. In many cases the United States Senate has been a terrible curse inflicted on the democratic process of making decisions in the United States. In Canada we face the same process. I have always felt that I would abolish that institution if I ever had a say.

Unfortunately, it is the reality of the package. It is a compromise. I cannot have what I want in the Senate and the speaker from Winnipeg—St. James cannot have what he wants in the Senate. At least it appears to be elected. At least it appears that it does not completely override representation by population, the basic foundation of a democratic society. So we will both have to, as indicated, vote yes and support this package, knowing that there are many elements in it that we do not support.

This is the dilemma of all Canadians who are looking at this package, considering a vote in a referendum. They will not like everything in it and that is the reality of a compromise. That is the reality of Canada and it is going to be difficult. It is going to be extremely difficult in the province of Quebec and I know the hearts of the vast majority of Canadians go out to them as they make this very difficult decision. We all cannot have what we want.

When the premiers, the aboriginal people and those who participated in hammering out this agreement left with the accord from Charlottetown worked out and basically put before us a package of amendments, that was essentially it. Canadians, members of Parliament, everyone from coast to coast will have an opportunity to say yes or no.

I will support this. I will definitely vote for it. In the area I represent in North Island—Powell River we are holding public meetings in the major communities to provide information to people, a forum in which they can discuss it. We are also forming a yes committee, a committee which will encourage Canadians who live in that area to consider and then support the proposition.

We have a difficult task. We have to convince them that this is not Brian Mulroney or the Conservative government's proposal. This is a proposal hammered out by a group of people in Canada based on very wide public hearings on it, of consideration, debate and compromise. It is a package brought forward by many people. It is not a package of the Prime Minister of Canada or the Conservative Party.

We will convince the people that it is a much broader document. It is a document of extreme importance to Canada in that it has the opportunity to make us whole again and face the future together. I believe the people in that area will support that document.

We have a problem and I think the problem has to be identified here and dealt with. I call it the dog in the manger problem. We had a number of members of the B.C. Conservative Party who used the opportunity to attack Premier Mike Harcourt of British Columbia.

When the agreement came together, it was a compromise from all parts and when they each agreed on it, that was the end of it. We have members of the Conservative caucus, who represent areas in British Columbia, and the GST senator criticizing the premier of British Columbia instead of saying: "Look, we will go forward and work together and have British Columbians support this document to ensure we can go forward together with the province of Quebec, with aboriginal people, and with the other positive aspects of it". They chose the dog in the manger route.

Another one of British Columbia's dog in the manger advocates is the Liberal Leader, Gordon Wilson. It is extremely disappointing that rather than accept this as a compromise, part of a living document that goes forward and changes to meet the needs of Canadians as they move forward into the future, the dog in the manger approach uses it to attack the premier of British Columbia rather than to work with British Columbians in understanding the document and bringing it forward.

It is my hope, and I understand this is under way, the federal Liberal caucus is working hard with Mr. Wilson and his caucus to bring him into line, to encourage him to support this document as a compromise document, and to stop the attacks on other partners in the yes approach, to stop the attack against women.

When Mike Harcourt and other members of the New Democratic Party in British Columbia and other organizations, including the Liberal organization nationally, have said that women do not have fair representation in Canada, it is incumbent on Mr. Wilson to stop his attacks.

On two occasions on two different issues he said pay equity is not a thing that can happen now because we cannot afford it and we cannot afford to have gender equity in the political institutions. That is wrong. That I think is anti-basic principles. My colleague says anti-democratic and I know she will be one of the ones trying to put Mr. Wilson back on the correct path of co-operation.

I think Mr. Wilson's approach right now is anti-aboriginal Canadian. It is anti-women and it is anti-Canadian. The dog in the manger approach cannot be continued.

I personally believe the Vancouver Sun falls into that area of the dog in the manager journalism. The attacks on the premier of British Columbia at this point in time are absolutely counterproductive. When I see Nicole Parton's article, I am disgusted by a former Social Credit candidate having a pen to attack the premier in the dog in the manger approach.

It is my hope that major institution of media in the province will turn and begin to support and provide useful information to British Columbians to help them understand this document, help them understand how important it is to Canada, even though it is a compromise, and to then lend support to the vote in support of the document.

It is time to end the dog in the manger approach to this and to work together as Canadians to get this document into position, to get Quebec back into the mainstream of Canada and get aboriginal people back into the mainstream of Canada, and then build and work with this living document into the future, together.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I enter this debate tonight to talk not primarily as a Liberal, not primarily even as a member of Parliament, but primarily as a Canadian.

From the first time I took my seat in this Chamber I have been very aware that I have a tremendous responsibility to all the generations that have sat in this Chamber before us and to all those to come after for whom we are creating the future.

I have to ask myself as we begin this important debate, are we being true to the vision of our forebears who dared to dream of a great nation, united from sea to sea against all odds of geography and distance and economics, who dared to dream that we could combine the best of different cultures and build a nation not fragmented by our differences but richer and stronger because of them. I have to ask if we are being true to our future in a world where a country like ours is a model of how people can live in harmony without suppressing their differences but in appreciation of those differences and of what we all contribute to the fullness of humanity.

This is truly an historic moment in our long journey as a nation because for the first time Canadians have claimed their Constitution for themselves. Never again will a handful of people be able to emerge from behind closed doors proclaiming that only they know what is best for Canadians and that no one else has anything to contribute to the debate. We learned that does not work.

Tribute has been paid today and yesterday to members of Parliament, ministers, leaders, officials and experts who have led us up to this accord. I too have the deepest respect for the agonizing, difficult and heartbreaking at times process that those people have been through, but I pay tribute tonight to those thousands of Canadians, probably tens of thousands, who rejected the secret deals by a select few and who fought for a Constitution that could truly be theirs.

I pay tribute to all our fellow citizens who have spent years pleading for open doors, presenting briefs to various committees, travelling the country to attend consultations, baring their souls to the Spicer commission, talking to their neighbours and friends, putting up posters, designing T-shirts, expressing their love and their hopes for this country in whatever way they could and expressing their insistence that they have a voice in its future.

Now it is time for us as parliamentarians to trust the wisdom they have brought to that process, a wisdom that has helped our leaders finally come to an accord. We have to trust them and we have to say that those who question aspects or even all of this agreement are not bad Canadians. They are not disloyal to our country. They are not anti any part of our country or any of its people.

It is the right of every Canadian to carefully consider, as we must do, the pros and cons of what they see in this agreement and for each Canadian to make his or her own final judgment and know that that judgment will be respected by their fellow Canadians.

We must trust all Canadians to bring a fair and open mind and a generosity of spirit to their decision and to make a decision based not on self-interest and pettiness, but on what is best for Canada, and I believe that is what they will do.

We must treat this referendum period, short as it is, as a time to build consensus, to restore the trust of Canadians in one another, to replace the fear, despair and mistrust that has been growing and has been eating away at this country, to replace those with confidence in our wholeness, confidence in one another and confidence in our future.

We must also be prepared, as we try to build that consensus, to listen and to bring back to this House their thoughts and their ideas so that as we put legal language and form on the accord that we now have in general terms, we remain true to the trust those Canadians have placed in us.

I say with confidence that I believe they will support this accord if we remain true to the trust they have placed in us in bringing their thoughts, their ideas and their misgivings back to this House and trying to produce an even better document.

There will be people who will say no to this accord. By and large they will say no because they feel it is not good for Canada. There are others who do not want this accord to succeed because they do not want this country to succeed whole and strong.

There are those who see Quebec as a thorn in the heart of Canada, who see only one culture and one language group that should dominate this country, that their way or homogeneity is the way of the future for Canada. Most of us do not see it that way. They will fight this accord because they do not want the country to stay together.

There are those within Quebec who do not want the country to stay together because they believe in the separation of Quebec. They forget that they lost a referendum a decade and more ago when Quebecers rejected separation under different terms. They are trying to win that battle again, and I do not believe we can let that happen.

Do I have concerns about this accord? Yes, I do. No agreement so all-encompassing can contain everything I hoped it would contain or can be free of faults that I would rather not see there any more than it can be 100 per cent satisfactory to every Canadian.

For instance, in an era when we know that the health of our environment determines our future survival and our economic prosperity, I find it a great lack that we have a Constitution that talks about an economic union but neglects to integrate with that an environmental union.

I have concerns for the linguistic duality that has been so much part of our history and of our richness when I see that it is possible to enter into agreements with the provinces but service to Canadians in both official languages will be an optional add-on to those agreements when the federal government provides resources but allows others to deliver programs.

I have concerns for the commitment we have had to all parts of our country to share equally in the opportunities of this great experiment called Canada. I have concerns that the agreements to be entered into with the provinces may diminish the ability of Canada and the Government of Canada to act on behalf of all Canadians and to meet our international obligations which will become increasingly important. I have concerns that an equality that is more than geographic has not been fully met or respected in this document.

I also rejoice that we have recognized the right of aboriginals to a fairer place in Canada, to determine their own future. I rejoice that we have recognized the need to break down economic barriers within Canada, that we have framed a commitment to a social contract, that we have a Senate which parts of the country that have felt left out of the process now feel answers some of their needs.

I see in that Senate new incentives for more open government because a Senate that is there to represent specific interests and capable of blocking the deliberations of this House at the last moment is going to force more open consultation in advance of putting in legislation. I think that is positive progress for this country.

It will lead to more open, honest and more democratic government as will the need for federal provincial agreements which I think every member of this House and I will insist be negotiated openly, honestly and in full view of Canadians.

We have been through a process that was needless to begin with, that has been longer and more painful than necessary, that has sapped our energy from crucial issues that we must be addressing. The 1.6 million Canadians who are out of work today and the close to half a million who are suffering because of the high unemployment level certainly want us to get on with dealing with those issues.

I do not believe and I do not believe that most Canadians believe that this will be the end of the Constitution forever and ever. We have always had a changing dynamics, adaptable country. Others have spoken today of compromise. I do not speak of compromise because that implies people giving in and giving up things. I speak of accommodation where we work together to find what works best for all of us. It is also not what I started out wanting or what somebody else started out wanting but what together we will think will work.

It is time for Canadians to trust one another again. We have had to do that throughout our history. Our Constitution has never been firm and definitive and final. There will always be a tension because we in this country are charting a course, a new way of living together as human beings, a new pattern of unity and diversity that is a beacon of hope for the world.

Let it be a creative tension we live in. Let us never again stretch the ties that bind to the point of breaking. Let us deal with those tensions with respect, with generosity and, yes, with love.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the House I am proud to take part in this debate even though it is 3.50 a.m. It is important for Canadians to debate the Constitution and the referendum that I support. We on this side of the House demanded a referendum so that the people of Canada could voice their opinion on the consensus report on the Constitution agreed upon by the first ministers in Charlottetown on August 28, 1992.

The Canadian people want this issue settled so that attention can be directed toward the economy and the 1.6 million people in Canada who are unemployed, people who need jobs and want to work to continue building a nation that is the best in the world.

This will be the first time in the history of Canada that all Canadians will have an opportunity to express their views on such a package on the same day. The Charlottetown agreement, though not perfect, reflects a broad consensus among the 10 first ministers of the provinces, the ministers of the Government of Canada, the three main parties of this House, the people and the leaders of the territories and the aboriginal peoples.

To go a bit further, the Liberal Party on this side of the House worked very hard on this constitutional program. In fact we laid out the official position of our party in April 1991. Consequently we are pleased that many of our concerns were responded to and are reflected in the document.

In the 1860s, going back in the history of this nation, the concept of Confederation remained a very elusive one until finally in 1867 the log jam was broken. One of the major builders of Confederation was the member for the constituency of Lambton from 1854 to 1857 of the Canadian Assembly of Upper and Lower Canada. While he was not a member in 1867 his untiring efforts have served us well. In the words of Lord Monck who later became Governor General: "Without the untiring efforts of George Brown the concept of Confederation would not have been feasible". Even though he was not a member of the assemblies at that time, he was one of the men who brought together the concept that was agreed upon in Prince Edward Island at the time. He has to go down in history as being not only one of the Fathers of Confederation but also the founder and publisher of The Globe.

A few years later Prince Edward Island joined Confederation and part of that agreement was that it would have four members in the House of Commons. We also took over its railway. To show good faith it threw it into the package. Of course the rest of Canada did not realize the debt load that went with it at the time. Prince Edward Island became part of Canada. It has a population today of about 125,000 people and it still has four members of Parliament representing an area not much larger than my constituency and with a slightly larger population base.

Therefore the precedent was set back in the early 1870s when Prince Edward Island joined Confederation guaranteeing a province a specific number of members in this House. That is the provision Quebec has sought and achieved in this last agreement, asking for 25 per cent of the seats in the House. It is no different from the precedent set at that time, even though at the present time Quebec has slightly more than 25 per cent of the population of Canada within its borders.

It was not until World War I that Canada shed its colonial vestiges. In the battle of Vimy Ridge under the leadership of Sir Arthur Currie, again from my constituency, the strategic ridge was captured, where other armies had failed.

In World War II Canadian men and women distinguished themselves in world conflict. It was after World War II that our social safety nets were put in place to care for the less fortunate, safety nets that are the best in the world and that resulted in the nation being considered one of the best of all nations in the world. Our nation was built on the principle of compassion and caring to assist the less fortunate. All Canadians are considered as equals.

Since World War II there were several attempts to patriate and amend the British North America Act, our Constitution at the time. It served us well for many years, but like any piece of legislation it had to be amended and updated to keep abreast of changes in society. We had to go to the Parliament of Westminster with cap in hand to have those amendments made.

In 1972 we thought we had achieved an agreement but it fell apart too. That was 20 years ago.

In 1980–81 we brought the Constitution home from Parliament in England and enshrined the charter of rights. However the preamble reads that Canada was founded on principles recognizing the supremacy of God and the rule of the land.

That reflects our Canadian identity and our sense of pride as builders of a nation that is celebrating its 125th birthday this year. While other nations are involved in civil wars and thousands of people are being killed, we resolve our problems here in Canada through negotiation and compromise, the Canadian way.

This package includes provision for the distinct society requested by Quebec. It is defined. It points out the language difference, the difference in the court and the legal system. Quebec has the civil law and the rest of Canada has the common law or the British system. Its culture is different, but it still has its hockey and ball teams. The people of Quebec are Canadians too.

It was the people of Quebec who opened up their homes in early years, in the pioneer times, to immigrants from Ireland suffering from famine and plague who came to this land. In some cases whole families were wiped out by the plague. Children lost their parents and children were lost. It was the people of Quebec who took these orphans into their homes and raised them as their own. These people have a sense of pride in being Canadian. I believe a sense of pride can help us keep this nation together and realize the necessity of moving forward with this package.

This document is not perfect. I am not satisfied that the proposed Senate will be effective enough, but this can be strengthened at a later date. I firmly believe we must have a Senate, because any successful democratic society must have a series of checks and balances to operate effectively. In our system of government the Senate is one of those checks and balances.

• (0400)

Over the last few years we have seen attempts to better our Constitution. One of the tragedies of the eighties was that when the Constitution was patriated we realized that the Government of Quebec was in favour of separation from the rest of Canada and it chose not to accept the new Constitution.

Let us hope that this era of our history is behind us and that we will move on as a united Canada.

The Spicer commission criss-crossed this nation listening to Canadians. The Dobbie-Beaudoin committee, made up of members of this House and the Senate, held hearings from one side of this nation to the other and thousands of Canadians expressed their opinions. Finally, the first ministers have expressed their opinions and arrived at an agreement.

The agreement includes the aboriginal peoples, a revamped Senate, a distinct society clause and a Canadian clause and the Canadian people now have the final voice on this whole issue through a referendum.

As I indicated earlier it is not perfect, but I believe it is the best we can achieve at this point in our history. Therefore, I will be supporting this package. My offices will work to provide information to my constituents so they can make an intelligent decision when they vote on October 26. We intend to make all of our offices and our facilities available to those who request information.

I am also pleased that many of the items that my colleagues and I from this side of the House had asked for were included in this package. I would be very much remiss if I did not pay tribute to those members of Parliament and senators who worked so hard in the Dobbie-Beaudoin committee and came up with a unanimous report. In particular, I want to pay tribute to the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel who spoke earlier in this House today—he was the spokesperson for the Official Opposition from our benches—and to my colleagues who worked with him on that committee. I was confident that those members would strive to come up with a proposal that was in the interest of all Canadians. I hope we have achieved that objective.

As a member of Parliament in this House, and having witnessed this process twice—first in the early eighties when I was here, and then again now—I am deeply concerned that while we wrestle with constitutional problems here in Canada the government has negotiated two trade agreements that will have a traumatic long-term impact on the lives of our people and the economy of this nation.

I speak about the Canada–U.S. trade agreement in which Canada gave away the right to make legislative decisions or regulatory decisions that will impact on this nation for years to come. For example, in the agriculture portfolio alone eight acts were changed with 15 amendments to conform to that agreement. By the same token no U.S. laws were changed or amended.

At this point we do not know what changes will be needed to conform to the North American free trade agreement. No doubt, there will be some and they will again take away our ability to make decisions in the interests of Canada. Our standards are the very highest in the world. They have been compromised. For example, of 48 chemicals used in food production and processing in Mexico 12 are banned in Canada. Are the lives of Canadians going to be endangered, is the health of our citizens going to be endangered to conform to an agreement that was conducted behind closed doors, in quite a contrast to the hearings held by the Dobbie–Beaudoin committee or the discussion by the 10 provincial premiers?

These trade agreements are pushed by huge trans-national corporations that know no loyalty or corporate responsibility except to their shareholders. We are seeing government by corporate decision as these companies close down the plants in Canada and move to Third World countries where cheap labour exists and environmental regulations are virtually non-existent. In the name of global competitiveness this country's standard of living will suffer.

It is a national disgrace that not only do we have 1.6 million unemployed workers here in Canada but our Canadian farmers also have to find other work to put food on their own tables, even though each Canadian farmer feeds 120 other Canadians.

In 1990 the average Canadian family farm income was almost $37,000, which included income earned by the spouse or the farmer himself from sources other than the farming operation. Of the $37,000, $21,500 came from income earned from these other sources leaving a balance of $15,500 from that farming operation. Of this amount, $8,091 came from government subsidies, federal or provincial, leaving a balance of only $7,400 from the sale of those farm products alone.

This is a national disgrace. We are allowing corporate interests to achieve a level of control that forces down the price of basic products at the farm level and increases food prices for our consumers.

Just today I read an article in a European newspaper saying that a similar downward trend in farm prices in Europe did not result in lower prices to consumers. The tragedy of all this is the number of victims of those nations that are being governed by corporate decisions, those persons in our cities who have to rely on food banks to survive and, even more tragically, the millions of starving people in Africa.

Finally, I just wanted to say a word about rekindling the spirit and the sense of pride of being Canadian. I was in Calgary at the Calgary Stampede. In the evening performance the Company of Young Canadians, young Canadians from Calgary, put on a variety show. They began with a melody of songs; 15 or 20 came out and sang songs from Newfoundland; another group came out and sang about Anne of Green Gables; and another group sang some of the songs from Nova Scotia and Anne Murray. In the end they all came out together and sang "This Land is My Land, This Land is Your Land from Bonavista to Vancouver Island". While they were on stage they asked everybody to rise and 30,000 people stood and sang O Canada with them, many with tears streaming down their cheeks.

We have to rekindle that sense of pride of being Canadian. Let us hope this document will achieve that objective.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, in Canada, as Canadians, we have been very complacent about who we are and who we have been. Most of us have also been proud of who we are. We have been proud with good reason. Canada has been a place where the citizens generally have felt comfortable. Canada has been a place where people from anywhere in the world could work, study, play and find a niche for themselves where they felt comfortable.

We have not been the melting pot of the United States. We have not harboured the hostility of national groups like in Bosnians, Macedonians and Serbians in the old Yugoslavia or the Georgians or Armenians of the U.S.S.R. Canada has been a model, not a melting pot but a free and accepting home for people from every part of the world. People came from all across the world knowing they would be accepted and have a somewhat equal chance of making a good home for their family in Canada. Most of them left their hostilities behind and found that they could be what they wanted to be, keep what they wanted to keep from their old culture and blend with their new country and add a new dimension to Canada's culture. We did, in Canada, what no other country has done quite so successfully. We allowed and cherished a mosaic and nourished it with policies that recognize the differences of people from other countries, and only demanded from these newcomers an acceptance in a belief about what Canada was.

• (0410)

These constitutional discussions have not been about community relations, race relations, freedom of religion or freedom of speech. We take all of these for granted in Canada as part of our heritage and part of our democracy. The constitutional discussions have not been about language, although many people try to make it seem as if that is implied. Rather, these constitutional talks have been about the empowerment of the people of all regions and all parts of the country. Empowerment of people means giving them, as many as possible, the decision-making opportunities without endangering the rights of others to also control their destiny.

We must look at this constitutional consensus in that light. How much power can we give each group or each region without reducing the ability of the other groups or regions to control their own destinies?

The players in the constitutional negotiations were all hoping that they could protect their own territory, be it land, opportunity or culture. The west had concerns about political and economic domination by central Canada, basically Ontario and Quebec. This is a position which, for westerners, is as old as Confederation.

The Indians, the Inuit and the Métis wanted a part in the decision-making group in Canada. After 300 years of never quite breaking into the governing structure, after 300 years of being on the outside looking in the aboriginal population wanted a structure which would let them have control of their own affairs.

Quebec, one of the founding nations, looked upon the rest of Canada with a certain amount of unease. Quebecers found themselves a diminishing portion of a largely English-speaking continent and felt themselves to be without the tools, without the powers if you wish, to protect their language and their unique culture. Without the powers to protect their position they could only look forward to continuing assimilation and eventual loss of their identity.

Many people across Canada from other nationalities who came to Canada will be saying that may be true but: "What about us? We also gave up our culture and our language to become Canadians, why should the French be different?" However, there is a difference. My family came from Norway expecting to learn the language of their new country. They kept a considerable amount of national pride in being Norwegian and became part of the mosaic. The French of Quebec were here, with a language and a culture which they did not give up to become part of Canada. In fact, they were not even asked to give it up. They were encouraged to keep and develop their culture, which they have done quite successfully for the last 200 years, particularly in the last 125 years that Canada has been a federation. Can anyone blame them for figuratively manning the ramparts when it seemed to them that an alien culture started bombarding them with communications, business investment, economic control and most of all, a diminishing need to speak French? Quebec did the natural thing. It demanded the tools to protect what it was and that is what we should have expected.

Ontario has much to protect as well. Those of us from the prairies and the maritimes probably think that Ontario's power to exploit the rest of Canada needs curbing. Those very ideas, that very thought are the seeds that produced the Triple-E Senate idea: More power to smaller provinces so that they can protect themselves from Ontario.

People in the maritimes also had the need, desire and ability to make decisions in their lives. The territories also felt limited in their ability. They wanted to be able to grow and develop as they felt they should and not depend upon others. They, too, wanted to be empowered and break out of the colonial status in which they had found themselves.

These are some of the elements that went into the negotiations on the Constitution. The consensus we are discussing tonight is what came out of those negotiations. A lot of compromise and a lot of give and take had to take place to come up with something acceptable to all.

Almost everyone has some concern with the consensus. There are parts of this consensus I do not like. You have heard that many times tonight, I am sure, Mr. Speaker. I am sure that there were parts that people in every province did not like. Only compromise could make a consensus possible, and that is what we are asking the people to vote on now.

A yes or even a no vote will not stop the evolving of what has been agreed on in this consensus. The aboriginal governments will grow and evolve. The powers that have been moved to the provinces will be explored and measured. Some may even be given back to the federal government. Federal powers will also be explored and broadened or narrowed to fit the circumstances in which the government finds itself.

What I am really saying is that the Constitution consensus is not the end of this process. A yes vote will confirm that the direction taken by the negotiators in this consensus is acceptable to most Canadians. A no vote will mean that most Canadians feel that the status quo was acceptable and the status quo will survive.

In either case, Canada will still be here and we in this House along with most of the participants in these negotiations will get at least part of what we considered necessary. No one in this consensus, if it passes, will get everything they wanted. No one it would appear left the negotiations feeling that their hopes, their ability to affect their own destiny had been diminished in any way. All felt that the other negotiators, the provinces and the territories involved in these negotiations, recognized the desires and understood the needs of the other members of the group.

Now it is our turn, the turn of this House and the people across the country. It is our turn to put our trust in those we have chosen to negotiate on our behalf and to support what they have started.

• (0420)

If we get the support for this consensus, we can look forward to Canada continuing as a country which makes a place for all types of people of all races and makes them feel comfortable enough to continue calling Canada their home.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I am privileged to take part in this historic debate and hopefully to reflect the sentiments of my constituents in the riding of Winnipeg North. The motion before us states:

> That pursuant to the Act to provide for Referendums on the Constitution of Canada, this House approves the following text of a referendum question:
> "Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992?
> _____ _____ "
> yes no

Implied in this motion is the decision to hold a referendum on the constitutional package approved on that date in Charlottetown. The decision reflects the vision of my leader who on April 21 of last year included it as one of the nine-point proposals for constitutional reform.

Indeed, the Liberal Party of Canada has always believed the Constitution belongs to the people. Therefore, any reform package has to be submitted for their judgment. The voting citizens shall have the final say on acceptance or rejection of any constitutional proposal. I would like to respectfully remind the government that a referendum should automatically bind a government to the voter's wishes.

The proposed wording of the question for the referendum vote, although in my judgment is still amenable to improvement, is no major impediment to citizens exercising a democratic vote and now the constitutional package itself, called the Consensus Report on the Constitution as agreed to in Charlottetown on August 28, 1992.

Last July, I took my family to Charlottetown for a one-week vacation. We wanted to visit the seat of Confederation, as we as a people are engaged in a national debate on the future of our nation. I had no premonition that the present consensus on the Constitution would again be crafted in the same historic city the following month. I could only imagine the enormous task then before the Fathers of Confederation. I now salute the parents of a renewed Confederation. They did not achieve a truly perfect accord, but they achieved an accord that I hope we can all support.

Imagine a patient being seen by his doctor who knows the only remedy he has at hand will not totally cure his patient. But the doctor also knows that the prospects of discovering a real curative drug are distant. He knows that the ideal drug may not be discovered in time to give his patient a chance for a cure. Would you or would you not agree that the physician should give the imperfect but nevertheless partially curative medicine now? If you were the patient, would you or would you not expect the doctor to give you that prescription today?

Time is of the essence in any decision–making. Leadership, it is known, is a function of time.

The time is now some 20 minutes past the early morning hour of four o'clock on September 10. Late yesterday, I walked past Parliament Hill watching the glorious day fade as the sun dipped in the west. Overhead were hot air balloons in all the colours of the rainbow. I wondered about their view, up so high. To them the Peace Tower would be a needle threading the sky, the lawns a quilt of green edged in red flowers, the stately buildings like children's toys so far below. It was then that I paused for a moment to look, to really look at the sky, the green lawns, and the trees beginning to sport their autumn colours. I watched the people, some hurrying home, others strolling. There were couples, young and old, walking hand in hand past the aged buildings of Parliament Hill.

I felt that all was right with the world. My mood was pervaded by optimism for the future. Very soon, on October 26, the people, the Canadian citizenry, would speak and their answer would be a resounding yes, a salvo of love for the country.

This was one of those moments when you fill your lungs as though the clean Canadian air were the most delicious thing ever tasted. It was one of those moments when you thank God you are alive and to be living in such a glorious place.

You see, Mr. Speaker, I am a newcomer to this country. Canada welcomed me in 1968 as a landed immigrant from the Philippines. As a new citizen I have often wondered about Canadians and the depth of their love for their country. Patriotism has always been such a degraded word, as we shirked from what we thought were over–zealous displays of flag–waving south of the border.

No, Canadians are calmer, quieter people who do not wear their love of country on their sleeves. Instead, they wear it tucked inside their shirt pockets, close to their hearts, but within easy reach in times like this when our new constitutional proposals will fly or die on the decisions of Canadian citizens.

What does it mean to be a Canadian citizen? Everyone has filled out a form or a paper at one time or another where there is a box marked "citizenship". Most of the 26 million people in this country check "Canadian" and never stop to wonder what it must feel like to check the box that reads "landed immigrant". Those landed immigrants and refugees are the people who want so much to be citizens of this great country. Over 250,000 people each year are pressing to be a part of this great nation.

I am a Canadian who chose Canada instead of being born into it. Many of my constituents did likewise. We are first generation Canadians who came to this country by land, air and sea to make their homes in the embrace of this great land.

To live in a country that is not Canada, that is not democratic and free, is to live a life decorated in black and white. Your decisions in life are meagre, your opportunities bleak. Justice is perverted. Money greases the palms of bureaucracy. Government is corrupt or non–existent. We see these countries on the evening news and click our tongues on the roofs of our mouths in sympathy. We say: "What a shame. How horrible for the children".

To live in a country without hope is to live partially buried. That is why I feel our newest citizens are often the greatest supporters of Canada. They have seen the alternatives.

On August 28, the Prime Minister, the 10 premiers, the heads of government of the two territories and four aboriginal organizations through their leadership gave their seal of approval to the Charlottetown agreement.

I respect and support the consensus reached. Their job must have been terribly difficult. They laboured night and day and I appreciate their determination and success to reach a really genuine consensus.

• (0430)

Nevertheless I now bring to this debate some concerns raised by the ethnocultural community, all together comprising a quarter to a third of the total Canadian population and as much as 40 per cent in some major cities.

Section 2, paragraph 1, subparagraph (e) of the Canada Clause states:

> Canadians are committed to racial and ethnic equality in a society that includes citizens from many lands, who have contributed and continue to contribute to the building of a strong Canada that reflects its cultural and racial diversity.

In contrast, the preceding subparagraph (d) states:

> Canadian and their governments—

—I underscore "and their governments".

> —are committed to the vitality and development of official language minority communities throughout Canada.

Why, I ask, this seeming hierarchy of rights?

The ethnocultural community would have been greatly assured had section 27 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms been strengthened to insure that it guarantees ethnic and racial equality. Strengthening this section and subparagraph (e) of the new section two, by adding the phrase "and their governments" would truly reflect the aspirations of the ethnocultural community since the Canada clause, according to the Charlottetown accord, states:

> —would guide the courts in their future interpretation of the entire Constitution, including the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

There are other ethnocultural concerns I would like to address. While the policy objectives of the new provision, entitled "The Social and Economic Union," which will form part of the new Constitution, are not limited to the items stated in the accord, it would have been reassuring to the ethnocultural community if this list of policy objectives already had addressed the the issues of providing culturally sensitive social services, providing services to ensure rapid integration of immigrants, and providing programs to combat racism and discrimination.

Also, it would be greatly reassuring to the ethnocultural community had the policy objectives set out on the provision of the economic union already included a commitment not only to the goal of full employment but the equality in employment for all Canadians. As well, the policy objective set out in the provision for the free movement of persons, goods, services and capital should have spelled out a commitment to finding the appropriate mechanism for accreditation of foreign-obtained professional and vocational credentials.

Such a latter commitment would have helped enhance the self-esteem of many new citizens who bring to Canada a wealth of talents and skills.

It is recognized that increasingly the Supreme Court is playing a vital role in interpreting the intent of lawmakers, sometimes to the chagrin of the latter. It is, therefore, the submission of the ethnocultural minorities that they be also consulted regarding appointments to the highest court of Canada, just as much as the current accord specifically requires the federal government to consult with Quebec and aboriginal peoples. The basis for the latter specification equally applies to the needs of the ethnocultural minorities.

Last, but equally important, the ethnocultural minorities would like to be reassured that the devolution of powers agreed to in Charlottetown on matters such as skills training, immigration and culture will not in the future jeopardize in any way the best interests of multicultural minorities.

While I am still reflecting on the perspective of the ethnocultural community, I would like to remind the government that the Canada committee for the referendum be advised that print and broadcast advertising not exclude the ethnic media. I would also like the government to help Elections Canada to prepare brochures, using the heritage languages when necessary, to ensure full involvement and participation of the ethnocultural community during debate and on voting day.

I have two other concerns from the perspective of the west. We on this side of the House feel the Senate reform achieved, that of equality of the provinces, fails to clarify, to clearly define the effectiveness of this Chamber.

The other concern relates to economic union. The Liberal Party feels we did not get as much as we had wished. We recognize that a common market within Canada is crucial to our ability as a country to compete in the outside world.

We are confident and my leader has already made a commitment that we will address these deficiencies in the accord at the appropriate time.

I am also confident that the wisdom of Canadians of tomorrow will likewise address the concerns of the ethnocultural community.

I realize others will have similar or additional concerns and for those concerns, they will not be able to support the Charlottetown accord. It is the essence of a democratic society that differences, debate and dissent occur. We shall respect this essence of democracy but we cannot respect those who will champion the breakdown of this country. At all times we shall not allow the coolness of reason to yield to the heat of passion.

I would like to close by emphasizing the achievements in this accord. We have given Quebec the distinct society clause in a manner that is clearly defined as to what it means in terms of civil code, language and culture.

We have given the aboriginal peoples their right to self-government. This alone is a milestone triumph for our first peoples.

We have given the west and the Atlantic the first step in the reform of the Senate; namely, equality and electiveness. We have achieved a measure toward economic union within Canada. We have affirmed our commitment to a social covenant among all Canadians.

Most important, we have preserved the fabric of the Confederation, the sinews of Canada. We could have done more in an ideal world but we live in the real world of today.

I support this accord and I will fight for its victory. I love my adopted country and I want to share it with my family and my children and my children's children.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening carefully to this debate in the last few hours and yesterday. I must confess that I am having grave difficulty with this consensus report on the Constitution.

I realize in this country right now we are all tired of the Constitution and we all realize that the economy is really in deep pain. We have 1.5 million people not working. There is this great temptation to say that we have been talking about this Constitution for so long and is there not some way that we can just get rid of it, get it off the agenda?

I would like to do that but I feel that the way we are doing it has some danger signals attached to it.

I find in my constituency that most people do not even know what is in this document. I did not receive this document until late Thursday night, last week. I read some of it on the weekend. I am not a constitutional lawyer. However, I took the time to speak to some constitutional lawyers. During my remarks I would like to put forward some questions that I have.

We all realize what is at stake here. I realize that things are very fragile in the province of Quebec and no one wants to see the country separate. No one wants to be perceived as anti-Canadian because they question something in a document like this. I listened to the minister for constitutional affairs speak late yesterday afternoon.

He said just read this and judge by what it says. I went home last night and read it again. Part of the reason I have difficulty with this document is that I do not really understand some of the clauses in it and, quite frankly, I find some of the sections contradicting one another.

I would like to be very specific about some of my concerns. First of all, under section 2(c) it says Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society. I really do not know exactly what that means. In the same phrase it says "which includes a French-speaking majority and a unique culture". I say to myself that there are many cultures in this country which are unique. In other words, which culture is not unique.

I then go on to (d) and I see that Canadians and their governments are committed to the vitality and development of official language minority communities. I do not really know what that means. I find it very difficult to just sort of say I go along with this, I do not know what it means, but I am going to go along with it.

Under section (f) it says Canadians are committed to a respect for individual and collective human rights and freedoms of all people. I find that sentence is a little bit illogical for me. I cannot see how it squares.

It goes on, under section 2, to say that the Government of Quebec is to preserve and promote the distinct society of Quebec. However, under section 3 it says that nothing in this section derogates from the powers and rights or privileges of the Parliament or the Government of Canada. I naturally say to myself, does this not contradict section 2?

We go to the accord and under section 3 it talks about linguistic communities in New Brunswick and it talks about the equality of English and French linguistic communities in New Brunswick. I said to myself that if we have this in New Brunswick, why do we not just use the same clause in Quebec?

These are the kinds of questions that I ask myself. I must confess that many people in my community are not interested in the Constitution. There are probably 1,000 to 1,500 who are interested in the Constitution and they would tell me if you are voting for something or you are voting against something, you should know what you are voting for and what you are voting against. That is the reason why I feel this sort of stress. I do not really feel that I am totally in understanding of everything that is in this document. Quite frankly, I feel that there are a lot of Canadians who feel the same way.

The thing that bothers me about this is that we are going to be approving something that is not a federal–provincial agreement, it is a Constitution. The chances of reversing this Constitution or changing it are going to be very difficult. I am concerned when I see things such as the powers, roles and responsibilities under the federal spending powers.

I see things. My leader has cited some of these concerns under labour market development and training which is no longer a responsibility of the federal government. I see under culture it says:

> Provinces should have exclusive jurisdiction over cultural matters within the provinces.

What does exclusive mean?

The following sentence talks about the fact that this agreement also recognizes the continuing responsibility of the federal government in Canadian cultural matters. How can the federal government retain responsibility in Canadian cultural matters when in the previous sentence it says that provinces should have exclusive jurisdiction over cultural matters?

I go to the issue of exclusive provincial jurisdiction over forestry. I realize that many of these operations were in the provincial jurisdiction before. I always believed that the reason why the Government of Canada also had forestry, mining, tourism, housing, recreation, municipal affairs and regional development was because we as a national government were there to either supplement or support when times required the federal presence to participate in these areas. Maybe a particular province lagged behind in a certain area. It could have been housing. The federal government through Canada Mortgage and Housing would move in to stimulate or supplement or support an economy in a particular region of this country.

Under this agreement, it says:

> Exclusive provincial jurisdiction over housing should be recognized and clarified through an explicit constitutional amendment and the negotiation of federal–provincial agreements.

What does that mean?

I talked to many people in the provinces and they think it means that we, as a national government, are out of the housing business. Yesterday in the House the member for Don Valley East asked the minister of constitutional affairs that very question on Canada Mortgage and Housing. Would this mean that there would be 10 Canada Mortgage and Housing operations operated by the provinces? He said no, that Canada would still be in the housing business. These are the kinds of questions that really need to be asked.

It is interesting. Under the issue of forestry, I see on page 12 of this agreement it says:

> Considerations of service to the public in both official languages should be considered a possible part of such agreements.

Does this mean that we may pass these instruments on to the provinces without having attached to them official bilingualism?

It seems to me that all of these national departments which are under our bilingualism act should maintain that status. If the provinces want to operate them, then surely they should be operated in the same way. If they do not have to be, then we should tell people.

If it is not mandatory that tourism, for example, not be considered bilingual in every province of the country then I am sure that it would be a regressive move for promoting bilingualism in this country. I do not think most francophones would really appreciate that.

I realize I only have a couple of minutes left. I go back to the remarks of the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs yesterday when he said that in 1982 Quebec was left out of the Constitution. That is not totally accurate because the people of Quebec did not vote to be left out of the Constitution in 1982; in fact, 73 of their 75 federal members voted in favour of the 1982 constitutional accord. We should remember the fact that it was Mr. Levesque, who did not believe in Canada, who wanted separatism, who said, "we are not signing on here".

It is very important that we try in a very rational and factual way to put this paper before Canadians. I am concerned that if we do not put the facts before Canadians that one or two or three months from now, when they start to discover what really is in this agreement, they may come back to us and ask: "Why didn't you inform me what this document really meant in terms of my day-to-day life and the future of my country, not only for me but for my children?"

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to take part in the debate on the motion that "pursuant to the act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada, this House approves the following text of a referendum question: Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992? Yes or No."

I rise on this occasion to give an unequivocal yes to that question. When the referendum day arrives on October 26 I will be voting yes. I will be voting yes for a lot of reasons. That is not to say that I do not have one or two reservations about the agreement that was reached—called the Charlottetown accord now—and we will get in to some of those slight reservations a little bit later.

I was at a reception hosted by Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vancouver South, not that long ago on the occasion of the 150th anniversary of the Geological Survey of Canada. The implication there, of course, is that some of the processes that went into the formation of this country were in place before 1867 and the formal Constitution of the country began.

I am not going to try to quote Mr. Speaker on his feelings about Canada, he has done that so eloquently himself on many occasions. But I do remember him saying that anyone who thinks that this country did not have a lot going for it before 1867 had really better take another look at history. I will not going to go into a lot of the history either, but I am certainly willing to take Mr. Speaker's word for it on the evidence. Of course, anyone who has a fairly good understanding of what the Geological Survey of Canada does would realize that a tremendous amount of political will, a tremendous amount of economic will and, of course, co-operation as well, had gone into the Geological Survey.

On a more personal basis, on an occasion such as this, I cannot help but put some of my feelings surrounding this question into personal terms. I can remember, and it dates me somewhat I suppose, when there was no such thing as Canadian citizenship.

Certainly this whole question of the Constitution and the question before us prompts one—it certainly prompts me—to think of citizenship. It is only about 40 years ago, which obviously means that I am over 40 years old, when there was no such thing as Canadian citizenship. This may be part of the formation of our multicultural nature of our country.

In those days, what we used to have to do if we moved—and it was during the war and I moved around quite a bit with my parents because my father was in the service—every time you went to a new school one of the first questions the teacher asked you was not what nationality you were but what was your national origin. That was simply because there was no such thing as Canadian citizenship. I remember that well.

I have come to think of other things as we approach this new time in our country's history. As far as my citizenship is concerned, I now do proudly proclaim it as being Canadian, of course. Something I reflect upon is Canadian citizenship when I am out of the country.

I have found that after I have been out of the country for as short a time as two or three weeks, a feeling of homesickness descends upon me and I begin to realize, regardless of where I am on the face of this earth that Canada is a rather pleasant place to be, a rather wonderful country to belong to and Canadian citizenship certainly does mean something, not only in the sense of a place to call home but also I have come to realize from association with people abroad that Canadians are viewed as a very special group of people upon the face of the earth.

Citizenship in our family means something which it does not in every family, although certainly there are many families in the country that share what I am about to talk about. My wife was not born a Canadian citizen. I understand that the figure now is somewhere around 35 per cent of our population who have become Canadian citizens through naturalization.

That, of course, brings up the whole question of immigration, which again prompts me to feel a great deal of pride. Certainly as a member of Parliament, something I have become much more aware of is the fact that the 35 per cent of the population that are immigrants have chosen this country as a home. It is a great source of pride to me to hear these people talk about this country from that perspective and how proud they are to have become Canadian citizens.

When we talk about immigrants, I guess we really have to confess that all of us are immigrants. We are certainly aware of the English based immigrants to this country, as we are certainly aware of the French based immigrants to this country, the founding two races of Canada and the negotiations, I presume, not all that much different in the same city of Charlottetown in the years leading up to 1867. I suspect the negotiations which went on were not that much different from the negotiations that went on over this summer and for several years into the past as well.

It is a fact that for various reasons which history attests to and for which there is no reason to go into because of that, the French element of our society has felt as though the objectives of 1867, the formation of this country, for them was not complete. Over the years their feelings have been expressed in several different ways. Certainly the negotiations that took place this summer and previously, most recently the Meech Lake accord, attest to the efforts of all of us to come to some kind of accommodation of this fact.

I do not wish to belabour the point at all. It does seem to me that the Charlottetown accord has completed the circle and I am certainly willing enough to take the word of the Premier of Quebec on the basis of his satisfaction that the accommodation is a satisfactory one for the French-speaking people of this country. I am only too pleased to acknowledge that and only too pleased that it occurred.

There are some things I would like to have seen addressed more thoroughly. There is no question of the reality of 52 per cent of the population not being sufficiently recognized, and I am referring to the women of our nation. It is part of the reality of 1992 and I think it is not necessarily only in Canada. World-wide, the rights of women and the need for women to be expressly protected in constitutions and in courts and so on have not been properly addressed. The Charlottetown accord is deficient in that way. It does not mean that I am not going to vote for it.

Also, coming from an absolutely pure working background and having been very much involved in the labour movement I would like to have seen more reference to the rights of working people to be able to form their organizations unmolested by society. It is a bit of a tragedy in our country that this should be the case. In western Europe, for example, labour unions are extremely well accepted but do not feel in their situation that they ought to be protected by the constitutions of their countries and to the best of my knowledge they are not. They are an integral part of society and rightfully so. In order for them to be a full part of society in Canada they ought to have been referred to.

Immigration, of course, implies a multicultural nature to the country. I do wish that the Charlottetown accord had addressed the multicultural aspect of Canada more thoroughly. It is tremendously gratifying to me and the constituency of Saskatoon—Dundurn to see the multicultural associations within the constituency do things to foster their ethnic backgrounds. I assure you that I would be almost content to view singing and dancing as almost enough insofar as multicultural expression is concerned. These communities go far beyond that.

One of the joys I have experienced over the last period of high school graduations was to see students who have taken the heritage language training, not within the schools system, but as part of the community. These students did it in their spare time after school and on Saturdays. It just demonstrates the tremendous vitality in those communities and it certainly adds to the enrichment of the country. They ought to have been far more widely recognized than they have in the accord.

I see my time is running out. The Senate could very well have been abolished. It is a change, however, that it is now to be elected.

Without a doubt, something that I am tremendously gratified over is the inherent right of our aboriginal people to self-government. I suspect that there was not an intent on the part of the negotiators to have an international reflection when it came to that segment of the accord, but that inherent right of our aboriginal people to self-government within Canada will become a shining beacon throughout the world, similar to other aspects of our country such as the peacekeeping and so on. It will be a tremendous credit to our nation. It is a tremendous credit to our negotiators, aboriginal and otherwise, to have come to that accord.

Obviously I am going to miss some, but I would like to recognize as many people as I can; namely, my member of the legislative assembly of the province of Saskatchewan, the hon. Bob Mitchell, the minister for constitutional negotiations who has received a lot of public acclaim for the work he did and the premier of my province, Roy Romanow. I am particularly proud of his work.

I see my time is running out. I assure the House, I assure the people of Canada and in Saskatoon—Dundurn that I will be forming a Canada committee within the constituency to do everything we can to make sure that the constituents receive as much information as they want and as broad an understanding of the accord as they need to be able to understand it. I am sure once they do understand it they will be voting in the affirmative.

[Translation]

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is late, I know. There might be some among you who have not slept yet. I had a few hours of sleep.

It is an honour tonight, or rather this morning, to say a few words about the referendum.

[English]

What we will go through between now and October 26 will be a debate on a clause that asks if we as Canadians agree with the consensus that was reached on August 28 last. Canadians are going to hear lots of concerns that people may have. I think the overriding concern right now is that Canada must be Canada the day after. I do not think that is a scare tactic.

I, like everybody else, think that Canada is a great country. I am proud to be a Canadian of this country and as a politician I am proud to represent an area that shows sometimes some very good parts of being a representative from a small area in Canada. At other times perhaps we do not have enough power, coming from some of those areas, to have this debate during reasonable hours.

However, that having been said, particularly since we are going to be off for another 38 days, I guess that is the reason that Canadians feel our institutions are not working. My concerns about the present consensus are just on that point.

Before getting to my concerns, I would like to make it very clear that I think this agreement reached by the Prime Minister, the 10 premiers, the two leaders of the territories and the four national organizations for the aboriginal people in Canada is on the whole a good document and it should be agreed to by the Canadian people, agreed to or their opinions given for this House after October 26.

I have some concerns. I just want to say that my concerns are not with the Canada clause, which I think has a lot of good points in it. It was needed.

[Translation]

Among the characteristics included in the Canada clause, there is parliamentary democracy, Canadian federalism and the rule of law; linguistic duality; the distinct nature of Quebec society; the ancestral rights and the responsibilities of aboriginal peoples and the recognition that their governments will constitute one of the three orders of government in Canada; racial and ethnic equality; respect for individual and collective human rights and freedoms of all people; equality of men and women—I am sure that exists today in most cases—and equality of provinces and recognition of their diverse characteristics.

• (0510)

[English]

That Canada clause alone should make us say yes, that and the fact that the aboriginal people have arrived at a process by which they can present to Canada and Canada can accept in the future their full responsibility as a partner in Canada. There is also the 25 per cent which shows a distinctiveness or the distinct society that we see in Quebec within Canada.

My concerns have to come in two areas. One is on the responsive institutions. I can only say, like my leader, that the Senate will have to be an effective Senate if it is going to play a part in the future representing the weaker areas in Canada.

I accept the equal. It has to be and so I am pleased with that. I accept that it should be elected and I am hoping that some day in the future it will be fully elected. I am not for gender equality because I think women, more and more, are getting into the mainstream of politics, whether at local, municipal, provincial or federal levels. I would certainly hate to think that in the future if I would want to run for the Senate, I would have to run as a woman in Nova Scotia.

I have held my own for 18 years with most of the men in this room. There has not been what I consider any separation of the goals that are strictly Canadian. Perhaps we as women have worked a little harder to make sure that some of the legislation has been directed and has helped women to be able to arrive at the same end in their careers, whichever way they want to go in Canada.

I accept that it should be elected. I am not sure it is very effective. We will have to wait and see. We will probably have to wait and see about negotiations long after October 26. I do feel that Canadians must trust the Prime Minister, their premiers, their leaders and others who sat around the table that they wanted to see an effective institution.

My largest concern, and the concern that I have heard, is with the size of this House. To increase that size, and I use the example of 42 seats, means that those 42 members are more than we have from the east. Our population would have to grow extremely fast to come up to 42 new members who will be coming in here.

We go down in percentage. We could have a base and I agree with one of the members who said we have guaranteed the east a floor. That floor is there. I think it is section 41(b) of the 1982 Constitution and it is fixed. Nova Scotia can never have fewer than 10 members of Parliament. New Brunswick cannot have fewer than 10 members of Parliament; four in P.E.I.; six in Newfoundland. The floor is geared to the present number of senators sitting today and the number coming from the east. They have given us a floor under which we cannot go down further. Therefore, I guess we will always be guaranteed 30 members from the east. The east in this great country can probably holler as loud as the other 307 members of Parliament that we will see in the future, but I think there is a disadvantage and perhaps this will be looked at by Canadians and changed in the future.

As I sit here in this House and with my experience in this House, I realize how hard one must travel from the extremities of Canada to be here. I also realized that if I wanted to speak in this debate I had to be up tonight to speak. I do not consider that my constituents would have been well served had I fallen asleep tonight and not come to speak. That concern and confusion that my voice is only one from an area that covers the whole size of metropolitan Toronto, where there are numerous members of Parliament, is sometimes discouraging to the rest of my constituents as to how effective the role of the member of Parliament has become in Canada.

I do not think that is enough for me to vote against because surely these are areas that our negotiators will have to look at, but I do think it is a very serious concern. As a federalist who has looked to Canada for its programs, the last part does scare me about Canada. I am not against the social and economic union, it is very good in the package. I am not against, as I said, self-government for the aboriginal peoples. This is excellent and I congratulate these people. I am not against the amending formula. However, I do have problems in another area besides our institutions, the Senate and the House of Commons, on the rebalancing roles and responsibilities.

I can only say to Atlantic Canadians that it will be a tougher world out there after because we will be even more so at the mercy of the more powerful provinces in Canada. We will be at their mercy because if they do not join a national program we will still get the financing that is equal for our area, but we will not have the support if British Columbia opts out or Alberta, Ontario or Quebec. Let us say it is day care. If the provinces take their money and present an adequate day care system to Canada, which I am sure they can, we will not have as much.

I look at the training and the system of employment across Canada and I think of those larger provinces which have equally the same fears today of no jobs, equally the same fear of trying to train, as quickly as possible, the work force in their provinces, and equally I am sure fearful that this government has not done enough to stimulate jobs or to provide training. I look and say that I come from an area that needs that superstructure. Will we have it?

I guess that is the part that is the scariest, because as our numbers decrease we can still holler, but as the dollars decrease we could probably become—and I hate to say it—very much out in the cold. We will need to have a very, very strong voice to keep this country operating in national programs.

I am glad to be able to take part tonight. I realize that my time is up.

• (0520)

I am glad to be able to say to my constituents that more than anything else, this country is worth keeping together. I have to say that looking at the package, we will be negotiating a technicality. I am sure that in the understanding of Canadians across Canada that we will negotiate a text. We will negotiate afterward a far greater Canada.

The flaws that I am talking about will come out. They are flaws in my view, coming from the east. Maybe that is what the premiers looked at and said: "We will be stronger if we have an effective Senate". We must have an effective Senate if we come from the east. It is a necessity that we be able to at least show our dissatisfaction through a very effective Senate if our House of Commons position is getting smaller.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, you have been through a very tough evening and I appreciate the fact that I am the last speaker. I would like to say that I will be voting yes. I just want to say to my constituents that my office is available for any distribution of materials. It is certainly accessible for any problems.

I think that Canada comes first in this debate.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. It appears that that will be the last speech of this morning.

I just want to, on behalf of all participants and as one who has been here for the last 15 hours as you have, Sir, thank you and thank all those who were involved in making this debate possible, the participants and the Clerks at the table, the pages and all those who are involved in the House running this so smoothly.

It has been a long night, an historic night and through you, Sir, on behalf of the government our thanks.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

CONFERENCE ON SECURITY AND CO-OPERATION

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34(1) I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the Canadian delegation to the first parliamentary assembly of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe held between July 2 and July 5, 1992 in Budapest.

PETITIONS

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents from Clearwater, British Columbia. They point out their strong opposition to a company's intention to divert water from the North Thompson River and eventually sell that water in San Diego, California.

They simply ask the government to introduce legislation that would prohibit Canadian waters from being sold to the United States as a commodity like coal or copper.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, on another matter, petitioners from throughout western Canada are simply asking Parliament to ensure that we maintain the current level of services provided to veterans through the Veterans Independence Program and to ensure there are no increases in charges to veterans for board and lodging in those long-term care institutions in which veterans are resident.

VIOLENCE

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, it is my honour to present thousands of signatures on petitions today. These signatures are from every part of Canada. We have over 500,000 that have been presented on the same topic.

The petitioners believe there are serious deficiencies in the criminal justice system. Women, children, and disabled persons are particularly vulnerable.

They also believe that crimes of violence against persons are intolerable and constitute the most abhorrent crimes society faces.

They ask Parliament to recognize that crimes of violence against persons are serious and abhorrent to society and to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act, 1972, and the Parole Act accordingly.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, it is my duty and pleasure, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present several petitions totalling more than 100 names and asking Parliament to urge the minister of immigration to issue minister's permits for spouses and dependent children of refugee claimants who have been permitted to apply for landing from within Canada, including persons in the backlog and persons accepted under the new legislation, and to allow them to be reunited in Canada for inland processing.

HOUSING

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I have two other petitions. One is a petition of 36 names mainly from the community 680 Queen's Quay West, a government assisted housing project.

• (1010)

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to recognize housing as a shared provincial-federal responsibility, to support the federal non-profit co-operative housing program, and to maintain the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I have a petition from 508 persons from various parts of Toronto, including some within Trinity—Spadina who have asked me to present it. They are concerned about the preamble to our Constitution which affirms that our country is founded upon principles that acknowledge the supremacy of God and on respect for moral an, spiritual values.

They point out that about four million Canadians do not believe in God or are unsure and the ones who do, disagree on the nature and desires expressed by God and that for many Canadians freedom is founded on secular values rather than spiritual values.

Therefore they request that Parliament remove references to God and spiritual values from the Constitution, ensure that the Constitution is a secular document that defines religious belief or unbelief as the right of the individual, and that the Constitution forbids the state any religious endorsement.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, the petition I have the pleasure of placing before you today is from Canadians from across the country.

They are urging the government not to proceed with Bill C-91 and to repeal Bill C-22 which was passed in 1987 so that Canadians will have the full benefit of lower priced generic drugs and so the provincial and private drug plans can serve Canadians without being forced to charge higher fees and/or provide less coverage.

RURAL CANADA

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I rise today to present a petition signed by over 125 residents of northwestern Ontario, rural Thunder Bay and Thunder Bay.

These petitioners are concerned about what they see as a direct attack on the rural way of life: cuts to VIA, abandoning the rail lines, neglect of fishery, forestry and agriculture, and erosion of rural postal service, particularly the closure of small rural post offices.

They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to support Canada's rural way of life, to support the maintenance of rural post offices and postal services and to reject the Conservative government's agenda of cutbacks and closures.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I rise to present a petition signed by several hundred Canadians from the provinces of British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec.

They point out that the price of both new and existing drugs has increased substantially to individuals on provincial and private drug plans since the passage of Bill C-22 in 1987. They call upon this government not to proceed with Bill C-91 and to repeal Bill C-22 in order that Canadians may benefit from generic competition.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36. This petition originates in Toronto and across the country.

Whereas the incidence of violence against women and children is unacceptable, the undersigned petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to accept legislation designed to eliminate violence against women and children. As in duty bound your petitioners humbly pray.

OLD AGE SECURITY

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Madam Speaker, I also have a number of petitions signed by over 2,600 Canadian seniors from all across Canada indicating that hundreds of Canadian senior citizens live below the poverty line, that it is desirable for all Canadians to provide senior citizens with the necessary support to live their lives as independently as possible, and that the federal government has the primary responsibility to ensure the adequacy of seniors' pensions.

Therefore the petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the government to ensure that Canadian Old Age Security pensions are sufficient to meet the basic needs of Canadian senior citizens.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I too have a petition to present pursuant to Standing Order 36. It is signed by hundreds of constituents in my riding of Broadview—Greenwood who have indicated that the incidence of violence against women and children is unacceptable.

They are calling upon this Parliament to accept legislation designed to eliminate violence against women and children.

They are asking for special effort in the training of police, lawyers, court workers and judges to become knowledgeable about women and child abuse and to focus public attention on this very important and long ignored problem.

OLD AGE SECURITY

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Madam Speaker, in co-operation with my colleague from the great riding of Cardigan, under Standing Order 36 I would like to present petitions on behalf of seniors from the province of Prince Edward Island and across Canada who have been offered a 37-cent increase in their old age pensions.

This is basically a reaction from the seniors about the niggardly amount of money that the government seemed fit to give people who are in need, most of whom are single women.

They humbly pray that Parliament take into consideration seriously this petition from the seniors of Canada.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I would ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have received an application pursuant to Standing Order 52. I will hear the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

Government Orders

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I rise today under the provisions of Standing Order 52(1), of which I gave you notice, to seek leave to adjourn the House in order to debate a matter of national importance.

The decision by PWA Corporation to agree to merge Canadian Airlines with Air Canada will create an unregulated monopoly and this House must impress upon the government the need to bring in regulations to protect the consumer from price gouging and the communities from arbitrary loss of service.

This House also must impress upon the government the need to work with the new single airline to fairly treat any employees who may lose their jobs as a result of the merger.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Madam Deputy Speaker: After receiving the hon. member's notice that he would be requesting an emergency debate today, the Speaker and I talked about it for quite a while and we have come to the conclusion that today would not be the appropriate moment to have such a debate.

The hon. member or any member of the House should not see this negative response today as a lack of understanding of the seriousness of the situation and of the need for the situation to be discussed. We feel that it would not be appropriate today.

THE CONSTITUTION

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

The House resumed from Wednesday, September 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Clark (Yellowhead) (pp. 12785-12786).

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, this is really a wonderful moment for our country and our people. It represents with the prospect of a Canada-wide direct vote on the constitutional amendments a new partnership between Parliament and those who send us here.

We have seen a long history in this country of efforts to make major changes that have not involved the people directly. A century and a quarter ago Sir John A. Macdonald refused the appeal in 1866 of some 20 members of Parliament from Canada East, Quebec, who petitioned for a mandate from the people prior to implementing the confederation plan. What we saw was the development of a feeling against the plan, particularly in Nova Scotia, that led to successionist movements. There has been a long period throughout our history of trying to have the people involved in major changes.

Robert Borden wanted a plebiscite in 1914 on the question of Senate reform. There was no legislation in place for that and he lost his moment of opportunity and no such vote was possible. Prime Minister Trudeau, a decade ago, sought a national referendum in relation to constitutional amendments, but he was neither able to get his legislation through Parliament in spite of two efforts bringing it before the House, nor was he able to get the agreement of the premiers to such a process.

Today for the third time in our history there will be a national plebiscite, but for the first time in our history it involves the Constitution.

I have no doubt whatsoever that the success that has been possible in negotiating this current comprehensive package of amendments to our Constitution was possible because in June of this year Parliament passed the enabling legislation, the Canada Referendum Act. This act made it very clear to all who gathered in Charlottetown that if they were unable to come to an agreement there was another avenue open, namely that the government could proceed with the support of Parliament in going directly to the people.

We have crossed an important threshold in our country. We are now in a period of transition in which the people are becoming much more directly involved in the process of fundamental change. I note that the promise in the May 13, 1991 throne speech by the government has been fulfilled. At that time, it was said that the men and women of Canada would be asked to participate directly in the process of constitutional change.

I am personally very happy to rise to speak in this debate. I have read all the Hansard accounts of the 1898 debate on the Dominion Prohibition Plebiscite Act of that year and also the debates that took place in Parliament in 1942 on the plebiscite relating to conscription for overseas military service.

In 1942 the Prime Minister of the day realized, having made a clear promise in the 1940 general election and having received a mandate from the people based on that promise, that he could not within two years reverse the position that had come from the people in a clear mandate without going back to them.

That certainly, when we are on the subject of mandate, is fundamental in a democracy. The far-reaching constitutional changes that are now proposed have never been discussed in a general election either nationally or provincially. There is no conceivable way that this whole package, as it is now put together in a new 1992 statement, could be said to have been contemplated by the Canadian people or discussed by them as the comprehensive package that it is.

It is absolutely important and vital in a democracy that the people be part of the process and that they give after deliberation a mandate with respect to this package.

[Translation]

The Prime Minister told this House in his speech that the Canadian model was used for the Australian constitution. In 1900, way back at the beginning of this century, the Australians decided that any amendment to their constitution would have to be ratified by the people. Therefore they added to their fundamental law specific provisions to that effect and, on 32 occasions since the beginning of the century, when changes to the constitution of Australia were contemplated, the people of that country were called to the polls to vote on them. In eight cases the proposals were ruled satisfactory by the majority and ratified, but they were voted down in every other instance.

I suggest that is how democracy should work. If the majority of the people cannot be convinced of the relevancy of a proposed change to the supreme law of the land, there is no legal or moral way it should be adopted. The rationale behind this is that democracy operates basically through consensus among citizens, not through coercion. If a majority of citizens cannot be induced to support a given position, the country will be in deep trouble, and in time the schemes the political leaders devise to put new deals together without getting the public on board will get the country in trouble. As a matter of fact, the present feeling of disillusionment created by governments and politics in Canada is largely due to the fact that for 20 years or so major innovative policies have been put in place without first gaining the support of the people and reaching a consensus, which is a necessity in a democracy.

A direct vote from the people preserves the commitment principle in that the responsibility involved in the decision-making process rests with the people of Canada themselves.

[English]

The coming campaign for the direct vote on October 26 will be like a national teach-in. Canadians have listened for several decades now to discussion about constitutional change but it was always in orbit, distant from them. The fact that now every citizen of our country knows that he or she will have to mark a ballot indicating yes or no to these proposed amendments will focus their attention and give real meaning to citizenship in our country.

In his speech on Tuesday the Prime Minister said that the question on the ballot is in fact a proxy for many other profound questions about who we are and where we are going. That indeed is the process of the campaign that will now unfold as we debate sincerely, and with differences, from different perspectives and backgrounds who we are as a Canadian people.

This exercise of self-definition will be a transforming element in our country. We have passed the stage, happily, in which those who govern believed that they could patch together fundamental changes. Perhaps fearing the fragility of something Scotch taped on here and held with a paper clip there they end up as if they are walking on eggs and not really wanting to let people see it or examine it too closely or breathe on it. Certainly they would never have put it out so that there could be intense public debate on it over a four, five or six week period, as in a national plebiscite campaign.

We are now past that stage. The people are partners with those of us in Parliament and the provincial legislatures in dealing with this question. Indeed, all we are really debating in Parliament at this stage is the wording of the question and the process. The real decision now, through the conclusion of the campaign, will be with the Canadian people themselves. That proves that we have come to the point of recognizing that constitutions belong to the people and not to governments.

Indeed, when Her Majesty spoke in our capital on July 1 she mentioned that constitutions are not simply written documents on parchment but must, if they are to be effective and meaningful, live in the hearts and in the minds of the citizens. Therefore, we now come to examine what citizenship is really all about in 20th century Canadian parliamentary democracy.

There have been several criticisms that have been directed to this process which I would like to address. One is that it is an abdication of responsibility by Parliament and the legislatures.

Second, people do not know enough about the issue to cast an intelligent vote.

Third, the cost of this process is too great.

Last week when I was being interviewed on CFRB about this process several callers phoned in with that very comment. They said: "We elected you to be in Parliament and decide these issues. Why is the government bailing out? You are ducking responsibility".

• (1030)

We have not heard the other side of that coin so much this time, but certainly in 1942 and 1898 parliamentarians said: "I was sent here to decide issues. I was elected. We cannot just take these things back to the people all the time". All the time? This is the third time in our history that we are doing it.

Perhaps the best statement of all dealing with that concern was made by the finance minister, a Nova Scotian, in 1942 when speaking in that debate after many people had criticized the government of Mackenzie King for lacking the courage to deal with the issue in Parliament and taking it to the people. In fact, I quoted what the finance minister, J. L. Ilsley, said in the House of Commons in my new book, The People's Mandate, on this very subject. Here is what he said in February 1942 in justifying a national plebiscite: "Surely the cowardly government or Parliament is the one which fears to ascertain the views of the people". Ilsley said that it was far more an act of leadership to define the issue and then to go to the people and defend it and explain, in partnership with the people, what was intended.

On that same point a former Prime Minister of Canada, Arthur Meighen, wrote in 1937 about the fact that about 98 per cent of what goes through Parliament did so without ever having a mandate from the people. They came from the ordinary grind of government and public business, detailed amendments to statutes and changes in the tax act and so on. However Meighen went on to make, in terms of the popular mandate and support from the people, a very important exception. He said that any legislation that would "affect positive principle going to the root of our institutions" ought only to proceed when there is a clear mandate from the people.

No one could read the comprehensive package of amendments negotiated at Charlottetown and then suggest that they did not constitute legislation or change going to positive principle of our country. They most assuredly do. Therefore, there is very clearly an answer here to this criticism that Parliament is somehow ducking its responsibility by going to the people. I see it as Ilsley did, as a high act of national leadership and partnership.

Just to briefly mention those final two criticisms. First, that people do not know enough about it to answer the ballot question. That is precisely what the next four, five or six weeks are all about. We will have a national teach-in and all Canadians and certainly we parliamentarians have the duty and responsibility to share that information. We will go through an exercise of self-definition of who we are as Canadians that will be very valuable.

Finally, as for the cost. I would point out that the largest element of cost concerns the preparation of the voters' lists. It should be borne in mind that the voters' lists prepared for this national direct vote will be used in next year's general election campaign, simply being revised for that purpose. Therefore, the cost of that election will be significantly reduced. Those are the accounting principles.

On the broad question of value to a democracy we have now come to a moment that is historic for our country and I am glad to be able to rise and support this initiative.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): One hundred and twenty-five years young, Canada is a new country, a country with promise, a country that is the envy of the world. Today we are called upon, as citizens of this great country to say yes to a chance for constitutional renewal, to a chance for rebirth and to a chance to get our country working again.

I am proud to live in a country built with the tolerance and generosity that is the envy of the world. Aboriginal people, French, British and yes, Irish and other settlers, immigrants from all over the world have built a country that we call home.

[Translation]

Aboriginals, people of French or English descent, immigrants of every country in the world, together we have created a nation envied by all.

Last Monday, 17 Romanians were found hidden in a container in the port of Antwerp, trying to sneak into Canada. Why? As they said themselves: "Because Canada is an ideal country".

[English]

On October 26, we will be called to reaffirm our faith in this country of ours. Faith in a country that has given her children opportunities. Faith in a country that saw the children of the Great Depression, not educated, not having the same opportunities as my generation, raising families that can be the best they want to be. Faith in a country that over generations has struggled with linguistic differences but has bridged them. That is what makes us unique as a people. We are not pseudo-Americans. We do not believe that to be equal you have to be the same.

In this particular debate we will set aside political differences, partisan differences to stand up for Canada. We will have to work hard together, New Democrats, Liberals, Conservatives, and believe me, for me that will be difficult. But we will have to work together to convince those who have doubts that it is worthwhile to live together in honourable compromise.

You may be tempted to ask on the ballot: "What is in it for me?" But I know that Canadians in the final analysis will set aside individual self-interest to ask: "What is in it for Canada?" This deal does not solve all our problems. It does not guarantee gender equality. It does not give the homeless a place to sleep. It does not solve forever all linguistic tensions and it does not guarantee racial equality.

But the bottom line is this deal makes sure that we will have a country so that we can build to bridge those differences. We will have a Canada to work out those problems.

[Translation]

Our challenge in the next 50 days is to convince Quebecers to say yes to Canada and to convince Canadians outside Quebec to say yes to Quebec.

I am not afraid to tell Quebecers: "Yes, you are a distinct society and I am proud of it."

We must convince native people to say yes to Canada and other Canadians to say yes to native people.

[English]

To people in my great city of Hamilton you may ask: "What is the point?" There is a point. On October 26 every citizen in the city of Hamilton will have a chance to say: "Yes, I want self-government of the aboriginal people to be a fundamental part of my Constitution. I want the capacity of francophones to speak their language enshrined in the Canadian Constitution. I want to say yes to Quebec. I want you as part of my Canada and I want the west and the Atlantic provinces to feel that they too have a share and a stake in our society".

• (1040)

I fear in my own area the fight may not be between yes and no, but the fight may be between those who will vote and those who will stay home. When you are called to vote and fight for your country, it is not the time to stay home. Therefore, I urge you to circle October 26 and get out to vote.

When we recognize someone else's rights we do not lose, we all win. By empowering others we become stronger, not weaker. Ontario will be stronger in a stronger Canada. The west and Atlantic Canada will also become stronger, and a stronger Quebec makes a stronger Canada.

[Translation]

I am asking Quebecers to say yes to Canada, to a Canada they have built themselves throughout the centuries. Tomorrow's challenges will be met by those who speak more than one language. They will be met by those who can live in peace and co-operate with their neighbours.

We hear a lot about Europe 92. I was there last summer and I now realize that Europe 92 is what we have known in Canada for centuries. What we have here are people who can get along in any language. We already have two official languages. We have in Canada people who speak all sorts of languages. This agreement is not perfect, but it is unanimous.

[English]

I too was one of those who thought it could not happen. I wondered whether Atlantic Canadians, Quebecers, westerners and Ontarians could sit at the table and reach a unanimous agreement.

[Translation]

This unanimous constitutional agreement is living proof that we can live side by side and make the compromises necessary to get along in this country in spite of all our differences.

[English]

This referendum gives us a chance as Canadians to explore our heritage of tolerance and generosity and to build upon it. We are a living example of what many countries in the world could not do: different people, different languages, different cultures living together peacefully and respecting our differences. We are sending a powerful signal to the world. On October 26 the world is going to be watching whether that signal will remain as clear and vibrant as it has been for the last 125 years.

[Translation]

I agree with the Prime Minister when he says that this is an opportunity to say yes to Canada and to be an example for the rest of the world. I agree with the Leader of the Opposition when he says that it is essential to give the Constitution back to the people through this referendum. I also agree with the Leader of the NDP who says that this vote is a vote for all of Canada.

[English]

This deal recognizes the rights of minorities to feel at home wherever they live in this country. Whether you are an anglophone in Quebec or a francophone anywhere in Canada you are home.

[Translation]

You are home, that is exactly right. This is what we have accomplished. We have gained something for Quebec. We have also gained something for Canada by recognizing aboriginal rights. We recognize the balance between the different regions which have developed since the foundation of this country. We recognize a basic fact, namely that French is not simply an insignicant historic detail in this country.

[English]

This Constitution guarantees forever that French is not a simple footnote in our history books, that those who came to this country 450 years ago and carved the land out, and indeed in the beginning of the historic agreement between the British and the French said that we will have two peoples, two languages, two cultures, two religions, it was a fundamental guarantee that led to a country where we did not tell everyone that to be a Canadian you have to be like me. You can choose this country.

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Italian.]

[English]

They chose our country because they saw a country which said from the beginning of its historic roots that differences are welcomed here. That is what Canada is all about and that is why those who say "let the French go" are waving goodbye to a piece of Canada that makes us unique and different from all other countries in the world.

[Translation]

My French speaking friends, Canada is your country. You have built it. The fact that my daughter started school this week in a French Catholic public institution here in Ontario speaks volumes. The fact that my brother in Montreal is raising his daughter Béatrice in French—as an assimilated anglophone—would only be possible in a country where people have realized that speaking two languages and recognizing two official facts in their Constitution is not a loss but a gain on both sides. The fact that francophones can feel at home in every part of the country is quite something.

[English]

The deal is complicated. It is not perfect. I do not know of any constitution in any part of the world that has achieved perfection. But is that a reason to throw away a great country? Some opponents may say: "I don't like section 3(1)(b)". That is fine. There are some details that I am not crazy about. But I say this unanimous deal is a chance to bring Canada back to the real issues.

Let us examine the alternative. The alternative is intolerance, exclusion, further constitutional conflict and indeed potential chaos. Canadians have a chance now with a unanimous deal to avoid the bloody histories of other parts of the world. There may be those who say: "Well, if Brian Mulroney is for it and Jean Chrétien is for it and Audrey McLaughlin is for it then I am against it". And I heard that. I heard it on a local radio show in Hamilton.

I ask Canadians not to let their anger at politicians kill our country. This vote is not about settling grudges. This vote is not about teaching a lesson to an MP or an alderman. This vote is about our desire to keep Canada together. You will have a chance to express your disappointment, your disenchantment, at the ballot box in the next election. This is not what October 26 is about. Do not confuse the issue. Set aside our political differences, our partisan differences and work as a united front.

Canada is more than the individual interests of individual provinces or individual Canadians. This is one of those rare times in the history of a country where we can say yes.

[Translation]

We can say yes to Quebec and yes to Canada.

[English]

It is one minute to midnight, the clock is running out, and the chance is here now for Canadians to say yes to Canada so that we can rebuild a great country into the 21st century.

• (1050)

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure today to rise in support of the motion which approves the following question for the referendum on October 26.

"Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992?

_____ _____"

yes no

I support yes. I am asking the voters of Trinity—Spadina in Toronto particularly to vote yes. I am also asking people across Canada, where I have many friends and acquaintances, to vote yes to this. I am not asking them to vote blindly. I am asking them to study this document and the information that will be distributed about the agreement that was unanimously reached by the Prime Minister, by the First Ministers of the provinces and the territories and for the first time in our history or perhaps in the history of the world, by the representatives of the aboriginal peoples of Canada, and then consider whether they can conscientiously vote yes.

If they decide they cannot and decide they should vote no, I honour their conscience in doing so. However, I hope they will have examined the document that was arrived at unanimously.

I would like to point out six reasons. There are more but I would like to point out six reasons why they might vote yes. The first and to me the most important is that it recognizes the inherent right of the peoples who have lived here for thousands of years, before any of my ancestors came to Canada, to the self-government they never gave up.

I have to confess that I thought I was an educated Canadian when I had two university degrees. In the last three or four years I have found that I grew up grossly ignorant of certain important parts of Canadian history. Like a lot of other people in Canada, I have learned a lot in these three years. I am very glad to have that history restored to me by the process that has taken place in the last three years and confirmed by what is in this document, recognizing that they have always had that inherent right.

There will be many questions we will have to work out with them. We have five years at least to negotiate. This document sets the foundation for that.

Second, there is the reconciliation that I believe is now possible between the people of Quebec and francophones in other parts of Canada and all the people of Canada, in Quebec and elsewhere.

The essence of the Meech Lake five points is present; the distinct society, the three members representing civil law in the Supreme Court, much more independence and responsibility for immigration, clearly defined limits and responsibilities in federal spending and the right of veto on changes to federal institutions. Besides that there is an assured share of the membership of the House of Commons and a sharing of federal powers.

[Translation]

I want to say that our two daughters who have been living in Montreal for a number of years, as well as their husbands and children who speak French, are all bilingual. They can go to Toronto, just like my wife and I can go to Montreal, without crossing a border between Quebec and Ontario.

[English]

Also very important for me is the social contract. I wish to read some of the points that have been made in the social contract that was incorporated in this agreement.

"The objectives of our country shall include providing throughout Canada a health care system that is comprehensive, universal, portable, publicly administered, and accessible. Providing adequate social service and benefits to ensure that all individuals resident in Canada have reasonable access to housing, food, and other basic necessities. Providing high-quality primary and secondary education to all. Protecting the rights of workers to organize and bargain collectively". I am particularly proud of that because that has also never been so fully recognized in the history of Canada and now it is in our Constitution as proposed for this vote.

"Protecting, preserving, and sustaining the integrity of the environment for present and future generations". Those are only promises but they are now promises that should be part of our Constitution.

There is a Canada clause which undertakes to state the general nature and commitments of our country. I regret it is not as strong as it might be in at least one way. There was a strong request that section 27 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms be amended to say not just that the people of Canada are committed but the Government of Canada is committed to preservation and promotion of racial and ethnic equality and that clause should be exempt from the notwithstanding clause.

I believe that was a reasonable and fair request to make. I wish it had been included, but I believe we can make progress in that direction nevertheless. I will come back to that.

There is the division of powers in which the provinces which have grown greatly in population and economy throughout Canada now have greater flexibility to exercise their powers as they see need locally in the provinces and yet with a strong federal government that can provide financial support and co-ordination.

There is the reform of the Senate. I have agreed most of my life with my party about the abolition of the Senate which has been undemocratic fundamentally and in practice. This abolishes the undemocratic Senate and replaces it with a Senate whose constitution aims at providing fair representation to all sections, not just geographic, but all parts of the population of Canada.

I regret there also we did not go as far as many many people asked us to go to including proportional representation of women in the Senate. I will come back to that.

I see three problems we should deal with. They are not problems that should cause us to vote no or to stay home on October 26. They are problems I believe we can deal with better after we have voted yes and after this agreement has been put into law by the legislatures of Canada.

There is one problem, and I am happy to see that the Secretary of State is here and I respect his continuing attention on these subjects. There is a problem of pressure on certain visible minority groups and ethnic groups to be manipulated. That is to say there are phone calls, so I am well advised, coming to certain leaders of ethnic and racial groups from the multiculturalism department and/or the Secretary of State's office, talking about their vote, talking about the grants that come to their organizations, and in fact strongly suggesting they should vote in accordance with the grant.

There is the appearance that grants are greater to organizations that undertake to vote in support of yes and smaller or to absent organizations that do not agree to vote yes.

• (1100)

This is not a practice to be dealt with directly in the Constitution, but it is a matter that could be dealt with by the minister between now and voting day on October 26. I ask the minister to review the conduct of his office and his department to see whether it is possible to remove any hint of manipulation of the vote through the use of public funds. I ask that because I want those people to vote yes. I do not want them to be alienated by a sense that they are being manipulated. As is often said, it is important not only that justice be done but that justice appear to be done, and that is one of the problems.

I believe the minister and his department can deal with that in the next few weeks. I also believe the wider problem of the absence of the amendment to Bill C-27 can be addressed by premiers of Canada. At least one of them, the Premier of Ontario, has already addressed it, the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs has addressed it and some of the native leaders have addressed it by urging that an amendment to clause 27 be incorporated. It is not possible to incorporate it now into the agreement on which we must vote on the 26th, but there could be a public pledge by the premiers and other leaders that they will see to it that it is considered a minor amendment that could be incorporated into the final drafting after the 26th when, as I hope, the vote will be resoundingly yes.

The final problem, and I have heard this from a number of my constituents, is that while this process proceeds in promoting acceptance of a political Constitution for Canada, there is another process afoot that would establish a very much changed economic Constitution for Canada, what President Reagan called the economic constitution of North America. When Canada signed the free trade agreement with the White House, that was President Reagan's triumphant declaration. Now we have an economic Constitution for North American and he obviously had in mind Mexico, which is now under way.

I want to quote what my leader said about 12 days ago: "We have begun the journey into the 21st century. There are those who tell us that it is a journey that must be led by the strongest and survived by the fittest. There is no choice. On their journey there is no time to pause and help a child born into poverty or a family forced into need. They are wrong. They are so very wrong. We have not struggled to politically unite this country only to have it divided socially and economically. Canada's journey into the 21st century has to be a journey with room for all, a journey where the strong help the weak, where the healthy care for the sick and where every child will rise up with confidence and hope. Then and only then will the hard work and struggle have been worth it".

I believe it is highly relevant to what we are doing today because these two processes go together. The government, with millions of dollars of the taxpayers, is funding its view in favour of the North American free trade agreement while we continue with this referendum process.

Therefore, I find it necessary to call on the people of Canada to present the other side since three-quarters of them, according to public polls, reject that agreement and with reason. They reject it through knowing that more than one and a half million out of work Canadian adults and their families are living on their savings or unemployment insurance cheques or welfare and that is a poor living.

The U.S.-Canada trade deal has cost half a million good jobs, mostly in manufacturing. We are now being drawn into a negotiation with Mexico in which the standards of wages and environmental protection are so low that they are bound to damage the standards in Canada.

We are asked to join a trading block which will shut out the people of Asia and the people of Europe and break the concept of unified world trade for which most nations of the world have struggled since the end of World War II.

Finally, it would be a deal that would turn the raw material producing areas of Canada into areas of low-wage workers, hewers of wood and drawers of water, as General McNaughton said almost half a century ago when he warned against giving away our water. The workers in the present manufacturing areas of Canada would be reduced to low paid service workers, the equivalent of hewers of wood and drawers of water.

I ask that we look at these things together. The North American free trade agreement must be debated further. We do not even know whether the United States will accept it. It must be debated and we must begin now. I ask people in Trinity—Spadina and in Canada to vote yes, to put an end to this constitutional crisis which has seized us and to get on with building a democratic economy in Canada.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Madam Speaker, you may have noticed that for the past three days harmony has reigned in this House. Liberals, New Democrats and Conservatives have become a mutual admiration society, and all for the sake of making us accept a so-called constitutional agreement. Why so-called? Because in the preface we read the following:

> The asterisks in the text that follows indicate the areas where the consensus is to proceed with a political accord.

That means no agreement was reached. In fact, I counted 28 asterisks in the text, which means 28 items on which there is no agreement as yet. At the end of the text it says:

> Other constitutional issues were discussed during the multilateral meetings. The consensus was not to pursue the following issues:

This is followed by a list of 14 items. If this is an agreement, I wonder what is being agreed to. Finally, it says:

> Other issues were discussed but were finally resolved, among which were:

Another six items are mentioned. That is certainly not my idea of an agreement. It is full of gaps, and there are still many issues to be settled, as we just heard.

Like the majority of Quebecers, I refuse to accept this agreement. In addition to the considerations I just mentioned, I have other reasons for doing so and some very concrete examples.

Take the economy. That Canada's economy is deteriorating is no secret. In fact, there is a connection with the constitutional fatigue people are talking about. Governments have taken advantage of the constitutional debate to cover up their inertia, their lack of initiative, their lack of innovative ideas for restoring the prosperity of this country. As Jean Allaire put it, Canada is technically bankrupt. The economy is a disaster. For some time, Quebec's demands have ceased to be political.

• (1110)

They are more closely related to economic matters, because Quebec is willing to do anything to build its own prosperity. This need to regain control, to obtain all the tools required to rectify the situation, has been misunderstood in Canada. Quebec is stuck in a country which denies its need to obtain more powers to overcome its difficulties, while, on the other hand, the federal government increases its debt, mortgages the future of its citizens, imposes policies unrelated to regional realities, is unable to increase competitivity, and finally insists on controlling everything, even though there is increasing evidence that it has lost all ability to control anything.

In this context, it is surprising to hear comments about the terrible apocalyptic scenarios were Quebec to refuse to ratify the proposals. If it has to make a choice, why would Quebec opt for the worst, namely for a federal, centralizing, controlling system which overspends without taking into account the distinct realities of Quebec? Quebecers have long understood that it is useless to ask what Canada can do for them. They now ask themselves instead what they can do for Quebec. And what we can do now for Quebec is to say: no thanks.

But what about the draft agreement of August 22 on which Quebecers and Canadians will be asked to vote? It is important to analyse what benefits Quebec can find in this hastily achieved agreement. A more equitable sharing of powers? Certainly not. Quebec is far from having gained a new arrangement which would give it the powers it has demanded for 30 years, at least according to François Rocher, professor of political science at Carleton University.

Is there any need to remind the House that Quebec has been asking for the same thing for the past 30 years, to assure that Quebec will have the powers required to manage its own cultural, social and economic development? The so–called agreement of August 22 does not grant any new powers to Quebec. It provides for six exclusive fields of provincial jurisdiction: tourism, recreation, fisheries, housing, mines and urban affairs, which all came under provincial jurisdiction in the 1867 Constitution. I must also point out that the minister of constitutional affairs has even watered that down. He stated this week in the House that some sectors in these fields of juridiction will continue to come under federal responsibility. He said so to reassure one of his Conservative colleagues who had asked a question on the subject. As an example, he mentioned housing, which is quite a large exception.

Let us deal now with culture and immigration. Culture will come exclusively under provincial jurisdiction but—and it is an important but—the spending powers of the federal government in this area are confirmed. In addition the federal government will continue to control certain institutions such as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the National Film Board. It is another example of the federal government giving with one hand and taking back with the other.

As for immigration, the only so–called advantage is an agreement under which the federal government simply undertakes to negotiate agreements on immigration, which it has been doing since the sixties.

Finally, under the draft agreement, manpower training would come under exclusive provincial jurisdiction, but once more, there are restrictions, such as the fact that unemployment insurance would remain under federal control.

As for regional development, negotiations are planned for the provinces that desire to play a greater role; what role and within what limits we shall see. In any event, it will be renegotiated in five years.

We must therefore admit that Quebec gains nothing in the distribution of powers. The answer to the federal offers is a very simple no.

Turning now to the distinct society, which was the cornerstone of the Meech Lake accord, and considered the bare minimum required for Quebec, this concept is worthless in the new constitutional agreement concocted by our first ministers.

The distinct society clause in the draft 1992 accord has virtually no value for Quebec, based on its nature, its wording and its context. The distinct society clause loses all its value because it is followed by a clause providing that the Quebec and federal governments have a commitment to the growth and development of the anglophone minority in Quebec. This clause totally limits the scope of the distinct society.

In sum, the distinct society clause in the proposed constitutional agreement becomes a mere interpretation rule subject to the discretionary power of judges; furthermore, by mentioning three criteria that distinguish Quebec, namely language, culture and civil law, the limitations are increased.

This will make it hard for Quebec to defend its social and economic legislation on the basis of the distinct society clause. For example, the law on the language of advertising and commercial signs could be overturned on the basis of this clause.

Since Quebec gets no advantage or, worse, loses the little power it has, the answer to the offers of August 22 is a simple no.

The proposed constitutional agreement provides for a new equal Senate that confirms the triumph of English Canada's vision of federalism which diminishes Quebec.

As Professor Guy Laforêt of Laval University says, by making Quebec a province like the others, the equal Senate is tantamount to official recognition, in the very heart of the Canadian political system, of the end of the dual vision of the country.

The equal Senate confirms Quebec's loss of power in the Canadian political system; its share of the representation will drop from 23 per cent to 9.6 per cent and maybe even 7 per cent, with the seats reserved for native people and new provinces.

In practical terms it means that a senator from Prince Edward Island will represent 21,717 citizens, whereas a Quebec senator will represent 1,140,833. It is quite a difference. To offset this loss of 18 seats, they are being transferred to the House of Commons. Quebec will have 93 members instead of 75 as now, but what will that change?

In any case we know that the 56 Conservative members from Quebec blend with those from the west and the maritimes. They have no opinion of their own. They will follow their party line.

Looking at the Senate and representation in the House of Commons, we cannot speak of advantages for Quebec. That is why I will again say no thanks to the offers of August 22.

• (1120)

Let us talk about this right of veto. Meech gave Quebec a general veto over changes to federal institutions and the establishment of new provinces. Now the federal government only has a moral obligation to consult with provinces regarding the establishment of new provinces.

What is Quebec gaining from this so-called right of veto? Nothing. Our only option is to say no to these offers.

This proposed constitutional agreement includes an interesting section concerning native issues. It is interesting because it reveals the open-mindedness of English Canada toward the aboriginal people, in contrast to its attitude toward Quebecers. The agreement recognizes aboriginal self-government without defining it, leaving the concept open to all kinds of interpretation.

After five years of negotiations the courts will have to settle the matter and will be free to define this important notion unrestricted by clear criteria.

It is just the opposite for Quebec where English Canada was determined to limit to only three areas the distinct society clause. Obviously English Canada's open-mindedness varies according to whom it is dealing with. Because of the insult to Quebec I say thanks, but no thanks.

All in all, English Canada's attitude is an insult to Quebecers who have shown through the years their trust in democracy, peace and negotiation only to face continued rejection. We must recognize that Quebecers are patient and tolerant.

Madam Speaker, you are indicating to me that my time is up so I will close by saying that Quebecers cannot accept the August 22 package. Because we must reject the centralization of powers at the federal level I say no on behalf of Quebec. Because we must refuse to become architects of our own failure, I say no on behalf of Quebec. Because we must prevent the decline of one of the founding nations of this country, I say no on behalf of Quebec.

[English]

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think you would find unanimous consent in the House for the debate to continue through the mid-day interruption, that is from one o'clock through to two o'clock.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: The member for Outremont has the floor. I am told he will share his speaking time with the member for Manicouagan.

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Madam Speaker, I have less time than I had hoped and I will have to use it sparingly. Time is precious and it is my pleasure, as you mentioned, to share this period with my colleague from Manicouagan.

I will make a few comments, primarily from my unique perspective.

First I want to make some corrections. Yesterday the leader of the Parti Quebecois gave his reply in the National Assembly to Mr. Bourassa's speech. He made a presentation that was a reflection of the man. He was calm and proper. On a few occasions, he referred to another premier of Quebec, Mr. Lesage. He did so with great gusto. He talked about him at length. Nothing was usurped. He alluded to the place occupied by a premier that belongs to the Quebec people and their past.

Nobody is offended by that. But then the Bloc Quebecois leader got all upset when the Prime Minister of Canada referred to another Quebec premier, Mr. Lévesque.

This premier belongs to me just as much as he belongs to all Canadians. No one has the right to be so intolerent and think that this man only belongs to a caste.

Finally I want to get back to my university colleague and repeat again that Mr. Parizeau is an economist. If you really want to know what the agreement is all about you consult a constitutionalist, and this is what I did. I consulted our colleague, Senator Beaudoin, who is a constitutionalist of international reputation. Senator Beaudoin tells me that this agreement is a good one. He is an expert on that issue. I accept his analysis and his conclusion.

I want to deflate another falsehood. The Bélanger-Campeau commission is not and was not the Bible. In fact it never will be the Bible. You had to be a member of that commission to see what went on. I was there. One must not minimize the work done by the commission, but at the same time you must not put it on a pedestal that it does not and never will deserve.

If you look at pages 53, 54 and 55 of its report where it deals with solutions, the commission makes a new attempt to redefine the status of Quebec. I am talking about the title of the paragraphs that follow and will follow within the Canadian federal regime.

They start by saying: "A first solution, as we saw, would consist for Quebec to try once again to obtain major changes within the federal constitutional framework". A little farther they add: "Federalism, as a principle of political organization, is characterized by the flexibility of the structures that it makes possible". A little further still we can read this: "The general concept of Canada and of the federal regime that prevails today appears rigid and clearly geared towards a search for uniformity and the negation of the differences".

What happened under the authority of other governments that managed the affairs of the country in the past no longer takes place since the Conservative government has been in power and since the present Prime Minister has been in control.

This man and this party want decentralization as well as the respect of regional entities and identities. Pages 54 and 55 of the document mention changes that Quebec would accept: the need to create a new relationship based on recognition and respect between that province and the rest of the country; a sharing of jurisdictions and responsabilities; the allocation of jurisdictions and responsabilities to Quebec regarding its social and economic developement, et cetera. Madam Speaker, all that you find in the Charlottetown accord is in this presentation made on pages 54 and 55 and on which the Bélanger-Campeau commission agreed.

As Mr. Parizeau says, the content of the question is clear. You answer yes or no. Just like in any relationship negotiation is a continuous process, but this process can be done with either a conciliatory or antagonistic approach.

• (1130)

I would like to emphasize the fact that the Charlottetown process made it possible to search for a consensus in a climate of confidence. The objective was not to look for a compromise, but to recognize the true worth of all parties involved.

When the Canadian people including Quebec vote yes, it will be to demonstrate their self-confidence and its wish to control their own future.

Research has shown that national unity is possible, both in theory and in practice, even if we also promote regional differences. The people of Quebec and the way French-Canadians and Quebecers can now function show us that this nation is going through a maturing process and is becoming increasingly self-confident. Thus, these negotiations will not be the last ever. It would be illusory to believe so, but they will be productive and positive.

Voting yes will give Canadians and Quebecers another opportunity to show their maturity.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, Canadians are being invited to make an historic decision on October 26. On that day they will be asked to reply to the referendum question now being debated in the House of Commons.

The question is short, clear and, most important, non-partisan. Its wording will allow all Canadian citizens to vote on the most important constitutional renewal project since the foundation of our country.

It will certainly be no surprise for anyone here or for the residents of the Manicouagan riding to learn that I shall reply yes to the referendum question. I shall vote in the affirmative because I am deeply convinced that the agreement achieved in Charlottetown a few weeks ago will make it possible for our nation to meet two basic objectives.

The first is to maintain the unity and integrity of Canada as a country which is respected and envied throughout the world. The second is to strengthen Quebec within the Canadian nation.

The provincial premiers, the leaders of the governments of the territories and Yukon, the representatives of the First Nations and the Prime Minister of Canada have come to an agreement which represents an historic stage in the evolution of the Canadian nation. This agreement completes the process begun in 1981, a process from which Quebec was unfortunately left out at the time but which was relaunched and carried out tenaciously in November 1984.

I was there in Sept-Îles in 1984 when the right hon. Prime Minister undertook to bring Quebec back into the Canadian family with enthusiasm and dignity. All those who witnessed this commitment applauded the Prime Minister and gave him their support.

This commitment has now been met, thanks to the agreement achieved in Charlottetown a few weeks ago.

Why can we say today that Quebec comes back to the constitutional table with enthusiasm and dignity? Anyone who reads the text of the consensus report on the Constitution will understand.

Through this agreement Quebec consolidates its position in a number of jurisdictions including immigration, culture and shared cost programs.

Through this agreement Quebec makes major gains, including recognition of the distinct identity of Quebec's society, full responsibility for manpower and manpower training programs, and full jurisdiction over forestry, mining, tourism, housing, recreation and municipal and urban affairs.

This agreement recognizes Quebec's expanded role in regional development and telecommunications.

The agreement also confirms Quebec's right to appoint three judges to the Supreme Court and gives Quebec 18 new seats in the House of Commons.

These are historic gains for Quebec.

[English]

This agreement, to which the Government of Quebec agrees, recognizes in its Canada clause that Canadians and their government are committed to the vitality and development of official language minority communities throughout Canada. Here is a commitment that will reassure the anglophone communities of the lower north shore in my riding. This clause assures them that their rights will be respected, will be recognized, will be protected and will be promoted.

This historic agreement makes all Canadians proud to be Canadians and it also makes the people of Quebec proud to be Canadians.

[Translation]

The aboriginal people of Canada and Quebec have finally obtained recognition of the principle of self-government. I am glad our partners in Confederation recognized the need to include in the Canadian Constitution the principle of self-government for aboriginal nations.

In 1988 I made a commitment to support this principle, and it is with great pride that I invite my Montagnais constituents on the North Shore to examine the agreement and measure the gains their people have made as a result of agreement.

It is of course understood there will be further discussions on this great principle of aboriginal self-government. The discussions will have to continue. Just because the principle has been recognized and will be enshrined in the Constitution does not mean discussions will no longer be necessary and that all obstacles have been overcome. On the contrary, we must be prepared to compromise and to continue the discussions on the principles of aboriginal self-government, in order to help undo the wrong done to aboriginal peoples since our country began and accept them as full citizens and partners in the development, including the economic development, of our country and help them achieve their legitimate cultural, language and developmental goals.

In concluding I would like to pay a real North Shore tribute to the right hon. Prime Minister, the North Shore boy who will go down in history as the man who made it possible to conclude this agreement. His perseverance and that of the right hon. member for Yellowhead have produced positive results for our country and Quebec.

[English]

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, what the Prime Minister characterized as a Canadian compromise is certainly cause for congratulations to the Prime Minister, and particularly to the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

• (1140)

Those gentlemen, the leaders of our country, are entitled to bask in the glow of their achievement. For Canadians generally, however, the consensus at Charlottetown is more cause not for congratulations but for a collective sigh of relief. It is some release from the constitutional fatigue that has been building into a national trauma.

It all began when Quebec was excluded from the 1982 agreement. Reopening the constitutional issue in 1985 might have been a beau risque, to use the words of René Lévesque cited Tuesday by the Prime Minister. It was a dangerous risk, too.

Nonetheless, the Prime Minister did achieve an accord at Meech Lake. It was an accord which, to my view, supported by good constitutional advice from across the country, particularly from the then attorney general of Ontario—Ian Scott, who retired from the legislature early this week—was a satisfactory compromise allowing Quebec its recognition as a distinct society within our Confederation without yielding federal power.

Despite all the assertions to the contrary there was no sacrifice in that accord of the federal spending power. Indeed, the accord was specific in stating that nothing in that agreement altered in any way the balance between federal and provincial constitutional authority.

Granted, the accord responded primarily to Quebec's concerns but it would have been a useful first step in the renewal of our Confederation. It was contemplated by all the first ministers, and it was certainly contemplated by the Prime Minister, that the problem of western alienation and the injustice shown for centuries toward our original peoples would have been addressed thereafter.

I read that document of Meech Lake carefully. I have read the current document just as carefully. Meech Lake was a far cleaner deal than the document we now have before the House. In my view, those who opposed Meech Lake will bear the burden of history for the national disruption of the last three exasperating years, lost opportunities, a gnawing national frustration and who knows what permanent damage to the psyche of the country.

I have always been suspicious of referenda or plebiscites. Of course they are the ultimate democratic gesture. But the more complicated the national fabric of a country, the more divisive a referendum can be. A referendum is simplistic, reducing complex issues to a simple yes or no answer.

Moreover, under our parliamentary system we have representative democracy. In Canada we elect those who sit in the House and in the legislatures, and those who are municipal councillors. We elect those whom we charge or mandate to analyse the issues for us, to vote for us, and we hold them to account regularly at general elections.

A referendum tends to be an abrogation of that process because under our representative democracy we rely on the judgment of our members of Parliament and members of the legislatures. We rely on their ability, in the best interests of their constituents and of the country generally, to act on our behalf and to vote on our behalf.

A referendum is an abrogation of that style of leadership. It is the quick fix. Having said that, what is done is done and there are provincial referenda in place. Therefore, I accept the fact that we now have a referendum. The people will decide and we will await their ultimate decision. I can tell you it is far from a done deal in many parts of Canada right now.

Looking at the substance of this consensus report from Charlottetown on August 28—I have never in 30 years since being elected to the House of Commons had trouble as a Canadian, certainly as a former member of Parliament from Quebec, with the concept of a distinct society. For me it reflects reality. A different majority language, a different system of law, a different history, a different culture, different traditions, and a different sense of humour.

It is now more clearly defined in this document. I reiterate what I said in the House once before, which was reconfirmed by the judgment of the late Justice Jean Beetz in the Supreme Court of Canada on the sign language law, that a distinct society in Quebec includes not only a French speaking majority but it includes the English speaking minority. That is part of that distinct society. There is no impingement of minority rights by the concept of a distinct society.

Mr. Speaker, in Vancouver, which you and I have the honour to represent, and elsewhere Quebecers are visiting us this summer, certainly on the Voyageur Program. They must feel pretty good seeing those bumper stickers that say "My Canada Includes Quebec". For me there is no Canada without Quebec.

[Translation]

If I were a Quebecer, I think I would be satisfied with this agreement. It might not be as good as I would have wished, but it is probably better than what I expected. I cannot present at length the case for Quebec, but this was done, anyhow, by my friend and colleague, the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel, in his masterly speech yesterday. I can say that it was among the best pleadings I ever heard in this house.

If I were a Quebecer, this document would provide a better protection for my language, my culture, my heritage, my system of civil law. Quebec's control over its natural resources and immigration is improved, and Quebec is guaranteed a third of the Supreme court judges and, more importantly, 25 per cent of the seats in this House, that is to say 25 per cent of the shares in the business that is Canada. It has a perpetual guarantee of 25 per cent of the seats in order to protect the home base of French speakers in Canada: Quebec. On top of that it has veto power over any change in federal institutions.

If I were a Quebecer, I would say again: My homeland is Quebec, but my country is Canada.

[English]

I salute the justice finally accorded to our first peoples. Finally recognition of the inherent constitutional rights of our original peoples, the constitutional right to self-government. I want to caution the House that strong leadership is going to be needed from all quarters during the next five years to make it work.

These provisions—the distinct society and the inherent right to self-government for our original peoples—were perhaps what Sir Wilfrid Laurier had in mind when, in this House, he recalled a visit to Canterbury Cathedral in London, a cathedral made of granite, oak, and marble. This is what he said to the House:

> It is the image of the nation I wish to see Canada. For here, I want the granite to remain granite, the oak to remain oak, and the marble to remain marble. Out of these elements, I would build a nation great among the nations of the world.

• (1150)

What about the Senate? We argued this issue in this House on a government motion by the then Minister of Justice, now Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, on June 7, 1985. I remember it, it was my birthday.

At that time I repeated what I had written in a thesis that is now gathering dust in the library at the University of British Columbia, although there is a well worn copy in the Senate library here. The thesis was to the effect that the Senate should be abolished and, if not abolished, elected so that it became a real territorial balance against the overwhelming population of our central provinces.

Now we will have an elected Senate, an improvement certainly for western Canada. We are going to have an equal Senate, as the Leader of the Opposition said on Tuesday, at the price of being a less effective one.

I have always supported the British Columbia thesis advanced by the late W.A.C. Bennett when he was premier at the 1971 Victoria conference when I was attorney general under Mr. Trudeau. The British Columbia thesis of the five regional divisions for the Senate was the thesis advanced again by Premier Harcourt, which I supported.

Parenthetically, permit me to congratulate our current premier for his very constructive role throughout the long and difficult negotiations. He spoke for British Columbia but, as the unanimous report of the legislature advised him to do, he put Canada first. That is what the legislature, after touring the province, came to the conclusion that British Columbians wanted him to do and he did it. In my view, he deserves the support of all British Columbians in supporting this agreement.

There will be a better equilibrium in our Confederation as the result of an elected Senate, but it is impossible to predict how effective individual senators are going to be under our new parliamentary process. It is impossible to predict the interaction of the two Houses. One thing is certain, the power of the Senate to defeat a bill and then force a joint session of the House of Commons and the Senate will add a new dynamic in the power structure of this country and, frankly, I am optimistic that it can work.

On the issue of division of powers between federal and provincial jurisdictions, I do not believe that the federal authority gave away too much, although I have some doubts about culture, telecommunications and broadcasting and I deplore, as the Leader of the Opposition does, the weak economic union clause.

As I said during the trade debate, I have read the document. It is not a perfect document. It is not my document. But it is the only document we have. It happens to be the document resulting from hours and days and months of strenuous negotiations finally culminating with our democratically elected leaders from every part of the country and every segment of the country agreeing on this consensus. For that reason it deserves our support.

We Canadians ought to recognize that this referendum is more than just a debate about words, laws and powers. It is about the future of our country as a cohesive, emotional, economic union. This debate not only involves our future as a people, but our individual well-being as citizens. It involves our future as a country that can continue to welcome citizens from every corner of the globe as a proud country.

We have been warned by the new political gurus of our age, the omnipotent pollsters, that we should not preach fear in this debate.

Does that mean that we cannot say to our fellow citizens that there are economic consequences of failure for all of us, that we should not warn that dividing up the huge public debt will not be costly, that we should not caution that there will be an effect upon our credit rating in the markets of the world, or upon the exchange rate, or upon interest rates, or that our trade would not be affected, or jobs and investments not lost?

No, this is not an abstract debate. This has real consequences, on a daily basis, for every one of us and every one of our constituents. More important, if we fail, it will affect the way that we feel about ourselves. We will feel that we have let ourselves down. We will feel that we have lost, perhaps irretrievably, the uniqueness we had as a special nation.

Canadians want a positive conclusion to this question. Most of us in this country believe that we have a great and beautiful land. Most of us believe that Canada has been a wonderful experiment. Most of us believe that Canada has been a great achievement. We are reluctant to sing the praises of our country, restrained in our patriotism. Waving the flag is not our way, not our style.

I happen to believe that we need renewal. Certainly we need renewal of our Constitution. We need renewal of our pride in our country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): We need to shed our cynicism and our negativism and our sense of frustration. We need to feel good about ourselves again.

Let us remember what we have here. Let us remember what we are talking about: a land of limitless space; a tolerant people, a fair people and a decent people. Let us reassert our belief in ourselves as a nation, using the words of Laurier, "great among the nations of the world". We are the envy of the world.

It is time we woke up. It is time we shook ourselves out of this lethargy. I hope that this national debate encourages all of us, all Canadians, to stand up, to speak up strongly and loudly and clearly for Canada.

I support the motion and I will campaign for it.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1200)

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Madam Speaker, I would like to congratulate first of all the speaker from Vancouver Quadra on a very excellent, eloquent speech this morning in his defence of the amendments and of the proposal to present the referendum to the Canadian people. I found it most illuminating and historic. I would congratulate him on a very well thought out and well presented speech and text.

I am also from British Columbia and I would like to present a slightly different point of view. I would like to discuss some of the concerns that we have in British Columbia with the constitutional representation in the referendum as it has been presented to us. The Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs has done an excellent job, an outstanding job, and at times an impossible job in bringing the premiers together to present a completed document with unanimous consent. Each one involved in this whole episode and exercise deserves our thanks and appreciation for the hard work and the compromising which they have done.

I would like to point out, however, that this is a debate in which various points of view are presented. I would like to present some points of view from British Columbia that I feel are significant and need to be discussed.

There are four points that I would like to make and the first one is that the redistribution of the seats or the increase in the number of seats compounds a problem which we in western Canada have complained about and have been concerned about for many years; namely, the increase in the centralization of power in central Canada. The idea of a Triple-E Senate was presented to resolve that problem. In a way it has done that in that the Senate is now equal according to provinces. As the previous speaker mentioned, it is a question as to how much effectiveness there will actually be. I think that is something that will have to be developed as time goes on.

One of our major concerns is the increased centralization of power within central Canada. Forty more seats in central Canada is the equivalent of more than what B.C. has in total in the House. It is equivalent to what the Atlantic provinces have. It means that there would be increased Cabinet representation, increased membership of committees and everything that is entailed in having more members in this institution.

The second concern that has been voiced to me by many British Columbians is the increase in number of seats. They say we want less government and not more. It is recognized that by reducing the number of senators and increasing the number of MPs, the numbers will remain essentially the same. However, we should point out that it is much more expensive to maintain a member of Parliament in today's atmosphere than it has been in the past to have our senators. The new senators also will be much more expensive to maintain with their increased office staff, their constituency offices and the many things which they do not have at the present time. There is a real concern in British Columbia about the number of members of Parliament and what they will be doing. At the present time, we find that 60 per cent of our time is spent with immigration matters and such things. This is not a responsibility of members of Parliament primarily and I think we could best spend our time doing other things.

A third area that is of great concern to British Columbians, probably more so than any province in Canada, is the concept of aboriginal self-government. To me it is a potential time bomb and one of the most serious concepts within this whole document that needs to be studied, examined and worked on with all due care and attention that is required. It will affect British Columbia more than any other province because we are not covered by any of the treaties by which the other provinces have been covered. None of the groundwork has been done. Concerning our land claims at the present time, 120 per cent of our province is claimed by the natives, by the aboriginal people under the land claims. There are more Indian bands in British Columbia than in any other province. We have 53 separate bands, each with its own language and system of government. There will be a very complex problem of self-government.

The majority of aboriginals in British Columbia are not going to be satisfied with the status or the Sechelt pattern as has been described. Rather, they are concerned that their goal is to have either provincial or federal status for their people. We can see that there is going to be a lot of conflict. Some of these things need to be formulated. They have told me personally that they would not be satisfied with the municipal form.

In relation to this point the costs are unknown. It has been shown in the referendum document that the federal government will be responsible for the costs that are involved. As I say, with 53 bands the educational, legal, justice and administrative systems that will be set up will be tremendously expensive to maintain because of the small numbers of people that will be involved in them. This is a real concern for the people of British Columbia.

These are some of the major concerns of people. Another major concern, the fourth concern, is the unanimity clause that has been included. Every speaker so far has pretty well said that this document was flawed, that it had problems and that they had reservations. Yet we are going to carve in stone the unanimity clause which says that all provinces and the House must agree to changes in the Constitution. Rather than doing that, we should be perhaps writing it on paper so that it can be changed much more so than carving it in stone. I cannot see any reason for putting this clause in at this time when there are so many doubts about it.

The people of British Columbia have looked at these problems and considered them. On the other side they ask: "What are the benefits of getting this referendum through and agreeing to the constitutional package?" This is a major issue that is going to be present in this whole referendum. Re-establishing political stability within the country will allow our economic problems to be resolved. We will be able to direct our attention to the economic problems which each province and area is facing.

Residents of British Columbia will have to weigh these two factors: the shortcomings and the very positive commercial aspects. As a previous speaker pointed out, the great pride we have as Canadians within Canada about Canada must also be considered.

I look forward to further debate and discussion on this matter. I hope the final package will show fairness to all Canadians.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton—Wentworth has seven minutes.

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Madam Speaker, my first thanks goes to the hon. doctor from Delta who yielded half of his time to let me make about a three-minute speech on this vital issue.

My congratulations go to the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra who made one of the most magnificent speeches that I have heard him make in this House of Commons. He was fighting and has implored us to fight for this country. I really applaud him.

Some hon. members: Tell him that.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth)): They say: "Tell him that". I did.

The other right hon. member in this House who should be applauded is the right hon. member for Yellowhead, the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. My wife and I are very proud of that right hon. member. I have never seen him in better form, tired as he may be, over the 16 months of trying to cobble together what is the most important Canadian exercise since we were formed 125 years ago.

The question that people are being asked is the following one:

> Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992?

I went into Zehr's Plaza across the street from where I live in Ancaster, in beautiful downtown Hamilton—Wentworth, and I asked the first 10 people: "What does the question mean to you?"

• (1210)

In effect, what they said was: "What the hell are you talking about? What package? What is in it? Will you be specific?" With the co-operation of editors of six weekly newspapers that I put my column in every single week, I decided to ask my own question. The question is in two parts:

1. "Do you want to keep Canada together? Yes ____ No _____"

2. "What is the best way to do that?"

Really what we have to decide is whether we believe in Canada. If not, why not? I am not putting that in writing. I am just saying that. I feel that you can examine nothing with a closed mind. Let nothing be invoked but the truth and the truth is we have the best country in the world to reside in according to the United Nations and according to all of us who live here. The truth is that the only answer can be yes to keeping this country together.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, I first want to say at the outset that as a British Columbian I have to respond to the statement made by the former Prime Minister of this country who happens to be not only a great Quebecer but a great British Columbian as well.

The member for Vancouver Quadra did a profound service for every Canadian, in my opinion, with his speech. Sometimes some of us can transcend political lines and talk about higher goals that the very nature of this institution attempts to implant in us. No one can accuse me of having done that very often. When I hear it and I recognize it, I must applaud it. I am proud to be a member of this House and to have heard the speech made by the member for Vancouver Quadra.

Let me say at the outset as a former premier of the province of British Columbia, I am not happy with this deal. It is imperfect. I imagine there are a lot of people in every corner of this country who are not happy with this deal and say it is imperfect. What else do we have in front of us? I do not like either/or situations. Like all politicians, I would rather move around, come out and duck back in again. However, there is no room for moving around, no room for coming out and ducking back in again. It is either/or.

Who placed us in this position? In my opinion it is the Prime Minister of Canada who must be responsible one way or the other, whether you agree with him or not on every other issue. He must take the political responsibility with the premiers to come up with a deal.

I am not crazy about referenda. Referenda catch the spirit of the moment. The population can be inflamed or cooled by intemperate remarks. Prejudices can be appealed to. Biases can be appealed to, and more important, the lowest common denominator can become the basis of debate which confuses people.

I intend to hold my nose and vote for this deal. It is not Dave Barrett's deal, but who is Dave Barrett to hold up the whole country? If I had my druthers, I would have written my own constitutional deal, voted on my own referendum and said here it is, it is my best and it is mine.

Fortunately or unfortunately, nobody asked me to do that and I am presented with a human document that I am forced to make a decision on.

I was against Meech Lake. My simple pithy comment on that was go to another lake. They did and they nearly got drowned by the demands of every single sector of this nation that has a single issue it wants represented, mine included.

I am forced to look at the document. Some of the injustices that this nation has unconsciously or consciously inflicted on our aboriginal people are finally being dealt with. That is morally responsible. No politician has a monopoly on morality. When we see a morally responsible decision being made by politicians, we should have the courage to applaud it. I applaud it.

Dealing with the regions, yes, there have been compromises and deals and back room arrangements, and yes, the adjustments will be made over a period of time. The fairness of Canadian people and the fairness of our system, if you have confidence in our system, will ensure that every region is adequately represented.

I am going to vote for it. I regret that we cannot have a political debate on the economy, on NAFTA. I would have preferred to see a vote along with this on NAFTA, but that is not going to happen.

Now I am being asked, as a British Columbia politician and as a former premier, to state publicly what my position is. I say unequivocally, because the document is not perfect, it is not Dave Barrett's, but I am going to vote for it.

I want to talk some politics. I am profoundly disturbed that Conservative backbenchers, upon the immediate release of this document, attacked the premier of British Columbia for nothing more than crass political purposes. To this day, those certain Tory backbenchers have yet to say publicly if they are for or against the deal. They are spreading false and malicious information about this document without having the courage to challenge the Prime Minister on this issue or to state publicly in my province if they are for or against it. That is crass, cheap politics that is damaging no one else but every single citizen of this country.

If any Tory backbencher thinks that by their equivocation and their attack on Mike Harcourt, the premier of British Columbia—whether it was W. A. C. Bennett, Bill Bennett, Vander Zalm or myself—if they think playing politics is building Canada, let me go on record as saying that it is despicable and doing great damage to this nation.

I am not opposed to their having an opposing point of view, I am not opposed to their having criticism, but if you are going to oppose and criticize, have the courage to say yes or no. Do not play the middle ground to stir up animosities in my home province of British Columbia. Those backbench Tories who saw their own leader and the other premiers of this country craft a deal that was a compromise for everybody have yet to say publicly what side they are on. They are still stirring up dirt on an ignorant basis in my home province, hoping to gain some cheap political points.

I hope I have made my point clear. I hope I have made my point clear that if you are opposed to this, stand up and say you are. If you are in favour of it, stand up and say you are. For God's sake stop playing cheap politics by ducking in and ducking out, dumping on individuals who participated, without having the courage to say exactly where the hell you stand. I find that reprehensible.

I want to address some remarks to the Liberal leader in the province of British Columbia. My dear friend, the Liberal leader of British Columbia, has decided to go on national television and attack this deal without offering alternatives, and that is his right. He, too, has yet to come out and say whether he is for it or against it. I challenge him publicly to stand up in the province of British Columbia and say he is opposed to this deal, and as a Liberal he will not support one federal Liberal candidate who is running who supports this deal, and he will write a letter to his federal leader and say he will not support him because you he is in support of this deal.

Why would he not do this? Is he, too, playing crass politics? Is he appealing to the lowest common denominator in my province of British Columbia, trying to lie in the bushes?

• (1220)

Many would suspect it. Not I. I am waiting for his answer. However, I would advise the Liberal leader of British Columbia to carefully read what the former Prime Minister of this country said, what the member for Papineau—Saint-Michel and his leader said in this House. They were profound statements on the basis of the Liberal Party.

My last parting comment to the Tories in British Columbia who are playing this game is: Go to their leader in his office and tell him point blank that they will not be supporting this deal or will be supporting it. Have the courage of your convictions to face your own leader. Tell him what you have been doing in British Columbia. Tell him what you have been spreading in British Columbia and the problems you are creating in the long run for every single Canadian by not taking a position on this. Say yes or no, but for God's sake stop stirring up the water in a malicious political way that is hurting all Canadians along with the Liberal provincial leader in my province.

It appears that I am being somewhat emotional about this. It is true, I am being emotional. I come from very humble beginnings and I have never forgotten that. This country for which my father fought in the First World War, where he ultimately lost his sight, was worth fighting for. This country, with all its diversities, all its races, creeds and cultures, has been contributed to by every single one of them, including the Quebecers who have given a unique experience that has enriched all of our lives, just as we British Columbians know that we have given the rest of Canada a unique experience that enriched their lives—different maybe, different necessarily, because each one of us in each region has given something to make this country Canada.

I am not a flag waver and I never have been. I have never wrapped myself in the flag. I have just been damn thankful that I have lived in a country that has never had false pride and chased itself around with a flag. It has pride in its regions, as Quebecers have pride in themselves and we in British Columbia, who know we are the best in Canada, have pride in our region. I have also understood that British Columbia is my home, Canada is my country.

Where else on the face of this earth could such a debate take place as we have had over the last year? Where else would you see members from all sides of the House with passion and feeling sitting on committees and working their guts out to come up with some kind of compromise? There are not many places. Ask the Czechoslovakians, ask Yugoslavia. It will never come to that in this country, but we could reach the same kind of emotional wounds that physical wounds create. That is the danger.

We have another agenda in this nation that must be dealt with. It is our duty. I am talking about the economy, the different philosophy of the Liberals, the different philosophy of the Conservatives, the different philosophy of the NDP and the Reform Party. Tragically the Bloc is trapped in a mindset that does not see the potential of building Canada but wants to pull it apart.

The essence of this Chamber is for competing philosophies to come up with goals. This single issue transcends all of those.

I appeal to those who are opposed in my province of British Columbia who sit in this Chamber to stand up and say yes or no. Stop playing games. To the Liberal leader in British Columbia, I say the same thing. I am proud to take my place with the Prime Minister on this issue. You will not catch me on any other one, not even in Tia Juana as the offer was yesterday, or non-offer. I would do it with the leader of the Liberal Party and with the leader of my own party. I regret the tragedy of the Reform Party that has fixed itself in some far distant past that never was there.

This is a multicultural nation, a multi-racial nation, a nation of multi-religions, multi-beliefs and multi-creeds. We have tolerated it all. I hope to God in my children's, my grandchildren's and my great-grandchildren's time the same attitude prevails; no flag-waving, perhaps a birthday party every 125 years, but get on with being Canadians and not with cheap political games.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, on October 26 the people who live in the riding of Halton—Peel will be asked to vote yes or no to a package of changes to Canada's Constitution and the way this country is run.

It is a serious decision and it is also an historic one. It bridges many years in our nation's history from 1864, when a constitutional accord was starting to evolve in Charlottetown, to 1992, when again in Charlottetown we have another constitutional accord that brings Canada into the future.

It bridges as well our first Prime Minister, Sir John A. Macdonald, with our current Prime Minister. I am sure that history will document both as being nation builders. The people in my riding will have an historic opportunity to vote. They will also have an historic opportunity to make real input into the political system.

In fact this government is the first one in 50 years that will actually be trusting the people to decide on the way their own country is run in an exercise of direct democracy. Of course it is expensive. It is going to cost approximately $150 million to have this referendum, and that is a real concern for those of us who worry about financial responsibility.

Given the geography of Canada and its sparse population it is probably inevitable that amount of money will be spent. However, there is also a lesson in the cost of this referendum for those people who would have those of us in the House of Commons take every decision based on this form of direct democracy.

The Reform Party, for example, thinks that every decision we take here of major consequence should be put to the people. The budget for the House of Commons for this whole year is about $250 million. That would represent just two decisions taken by referendum or direct democracy. It is important for us to remember that.

In summary, we have an exceptional event ahead of us and we have to take it seriously. While doing that it is important that we not view this event out of context. Some people would say that this is a measure of loyalty, that every Canadian now must vote for Canada or against Canada. That is wrong.

As the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs, a man who deserves praise from all sides of this House, said in this House yesterday: "This is not a test of loyalty". Instead it is meant more to move the country forward into the future. I think we all know what is coming in the future.

It is evident that Canada is moving into a future that will be dominated by trends like globalization, as trade barriers around the world come down and countries have to be more competitive in order to prosper and succeed in the world to come. As well, we are looking at a country with rapid demographic change. Canadians are growing older. The population is getting more stable. We have to consider what that means for our finances and economic future.

We are also coming into a future with new technologies. Technologies are changing so rapidly that the countries that are going to compete and be successful in this globalized world will be those that have modern, flexible constitutions, rules that govern their countries.

We know what is coming in the future. Therefore it is important to put constitutional change behind us so that we can concentrate on what is coming. Trade, prosperity and national unity are linked.

Trade is important to the people in my community, to the people who live in Halton—Peel. This riding is home to many companies that compete globally. They not only compete, they are successful.

The issue of Canadian constitutional unity and peace is important to the people in my riding. That is one message that I think the people of Halton—Peel would like me to record here on the floor of the House of Commons. However, there is another even more important message, which is about democracy, freedom and all the things that make this country the best in the world in which to live.

To the voters in my riding who will face a decision on Monday, October 26 I have one brief message for them. Soon you will be asked to accept or reject the package of changes to the way the governments of Canada are structured. It is an important vote. The future of our country will be very much determined by its outcome. However, while the federal government, the provinces, the territories and the aboriginal leaders are all supporting this package, that does not mean that you have to. You have a clear choice and a right to vote as you see fit.

As the member of Parliament for the riding of Halton—Peel I would like to tell the voters of my riding that I do not intend to tell them over the coming weeks how they should vote. Politicians have no corner on patriotism. I will be supporting the agreement and I have an obligation to tell people why I will be doing that.

Many of the people in my riding know that I have campaigned for things that are not in this agreement, things that I would like to have seen such as a guarantee of property rights and a stronger economic union. People in my riding also know that I wanted less government, not more government. I would like to have fewer politicians, not more members of the House of Commons.

I would even like to see an end to the 19th century concept that this country is comprised of 10 provinces, widely different in size, population and economic structure. In the future other rounds of constitutional reform can perhaps restructure Canada on the basis of five regions.

In this deal I did not want to see a social charter that inhibits the flexibility that we need for the future. I did not think a reduced role for Ontario in an elected House of Commons was fair. Having said that, let us remember a fundamental truth as we reform Canada. Let us remember that there are no perfect countries, as there are no perfect marriages or perfect business partnerships.

Canada is a huge place. Many people are very attached to their regions. It is also a country that was founded by two peoples in 1867 and that remains true today and needs to be recognized.

Addressing all of these things takes compromise. In fact, if we cannot compromise we may not be able to keep our country together. The former Yugoslavia, Bosnia and Croatia, is a place where they have not been able to compromise.

Some people in my riding will not like this accord. Today members of the Reform Party are deciding whether they can support it or not support it. I sincerely hope they are with us. I hope we can speak with one voice to accept this.

My personal conclusion is that the accord that people will vote for on October 26 is not the one that I would have written, but is one I can support. I ask the voters in my riding to take time to understand this agreement, to study it, to appreciate it and then come to their own conclusion.

God bless Canada.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Sarnia—Lambton has seven minutes left.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to be able to speak for a few minutes on the constitutional agreement reached on August 28.

A constitution is a framework of law, the fundamental law of the land. It is also more than the rules by which we govern ourselves. A constitution should reflect the values, the characteristics, the beliefs and the tolerances of a country.

For quite some time there has been a desire, a need to re-evaluate our present Constitution. Many areas of our country have expressed dissatisfaction and concern that their particular needs were not being addressed. The constitutional proposals reached in Charlottetown on August 28, after over two years of consultation and discussion by citizens across our country, represent a great deal of dedication and hard work by the individuals who were there: the Prime Minister, the premiers, the leaders of the territories, the aboriginal leaders. They worked together to develop this compromise agreement.

I give special tribute to the chairmen of the meetings, the Prime Minister and at other times the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs, for the leadership they provided, as was brought to our attention by the participants at this final meeting.

The challenge was to remake the Constitution in the image of the country that we have become, not the country we once were. I believe that the proposals certainly achieve this goal.

Canadians have expressed a desire for change. They have demanded more responsive institutions and accountable government, justice for our aboriginal peoples and the rebalancing of the roles and responsibilities between federal and provincial governments. This agreement, although not perfect, is a solid step toward making our constitution work for the entire country of Canada.

The agreement that I am sure will be endorsed on October 26 by the Canadian people will mark an incredible milestone that has eluded many Canadians for a number of years. Outlined in this agreement is a statement of what it means to be Canadian—the Canada clause. This is important for it gives us a sense of the values that we hold in common while also accommodating our diversity in this country.

The Canada clause entrenches certain fundamental characteristics such as parliamentary democracy, linguistic duality, Quebec's distinct society, and equality of race and gender, to name a few.

For aboriginal peoples this agreement represents a long overdue justice through the recognition in the Constitution of the inherent right to self-government. Our first peoples will now feel that they are truly Canadian. They can now confirm their commitment to share in building a new and stronger Canada.

By reforming our Senate to make it equal, elected and effective in responding to the demands and concerns of Canadians the Senate should become a more effective legislative body and not simply a rubber stamp.

This agreement provides for better discipline in the use of federal government spending power and the protection of intergovernmental agreements. Provinces will now receive exclusive jurisdiction, if they desire, in many areas they were requesting.

These proposals will also deal with the important issues of social and economic policy, regional development, equalization payments and the amending formula.

As I said, this agreement is not perfect. There were compromises made on all sides, but in the end I feel we have reached an agreement that all Canadians can live with. It resolves the most pressing concerns that have dominated the national debate for many years. Quebec's interests were satisfied, western Canada got its equal and elected Senate with more legislative power, and our aboriginal peoples finally achieve self-government.

In my constituency of Sarnia—Lambton I get the distinct impression from those I have talked to that over all there is great support for the constitutional amendments that have been agreed upon. I have also talked to my provincial counterparts—and I will not get into politics—the elected members of the NDP Government of Ontario. They certainly have expressed their interest in working in my constituency and theirs in support of these amendments. I will certainly be available there to provide support. I am supporting these amendments.

I also will be available in my constituency as a resource person to answer questions and provide information. I ask all my constituents to take this very seriously and to be sure to cast their ballot as they see fit. I ask them to study it with serious concern and interest. I know they will. If they need information I certainly will be available to provide it to them. It is a chance for our great country to stay together and to make this a better place to live.

My family came to this country in 1849. They were also, as said the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, hard working, solid families. We came here and have thrived in this great Canadian family. Certainly my family, and also my neighbours, friends and constituents, look forward to carrying on our all-Canadian future with all of us in a confederated family staying together. These important amendments will allow us to do that.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I will be supporting this set of proposals. I will be voting yes on October 26. Obviously the first question is why. Undoubtedly the major reason is that I really want to unshackle this Parliament and future parliaments from the constitutional crisis we have suffered over the last several years. Many of my colleagues in this House and I want to get the country working again, Parliament working more smoothly and Canadians back to work.

There are other reasons I want to go through quickly to give my constituents and other Canadians a sense of where I am coming from. We all know that in any negotiation no one party ever gets everything he or she wishes. This is the case in this particular instance.

I believe that under current circumstances it would have been difficult to have had a better set of proposals that most parties could have bought into, that most parties would have supported. I think that is a significant achievement.

We have an over-all consensus. Let us remember that. The Prime Minister, 10 premiers of our 10 provinces, the leaders of the two territories, and the leaders of four major aboriginal organizations are supporting this set of proposals. Clearly there should be some sense of satisfaction in recognizing that these individuals feel this is a good deal for Canadians and for Canada.

Let us not forget as well what is happening on October 26. It is a referendum, an opportunity to go to the people and ask Canadians whether or not they will support it. I am hoping with all my heart that the majority of Canadians in every province and each of our two territories will say yes. I am very much hoping that will happen. This referendum is something my party under the leadership of the hon. member for Beauséjour has been calling for, for a long time. I am delighted the other parties have agreed this is a good idea.

Let us not forget as well that as a result of this referendum there will be no future substantial changes to our Constitution without going to the referendum. That is a major gain for all Canadians.

What are some of the other gains? Obviously aboriginal self-government. I have always felt, and I wish it had been different, that many of our aboriginal peoples from a social economic perspective can be compared, and not always favourably, with Third World nations. That is a shame. I am hoping this particular initiative will permit them to break out of the cycle of poverty.

The distinct society has been recognized and accepted. It has now been defined for those who had real concerns. There have been other gains for Quebec. If I were a Quebecer I know I would want more. Obviously I would want more, but I think we have to recognize it will be better for Quebec after this referendum, assuming that it is won, than it was before.

Canadians from origins other than French, English and aboriginal have had some modest gains as well. Linguistic minorities have much of the protection and the support they sought, providing the political will is there of course.

In the division of powers it is much clearer today, or it will be once this is accepted, what level of government supplies what kinds of services for its population. That has always been a contentious issue.

There is a social charter and albeit perhaps not as strong as many people would have liked it is there and it gives us a sense of direction as to what are our social values and our commitment to social programs.

There is a "reformed Senate". That will be contentious. There are some reforms but people will question the significance of them.

Those are some of the major reasons I will be supporting this agreement.

Do I have concerns? Obviously anyone who has read the agreement, anyone who has read any agreement, will have concerns. Yes, absolutely I have some concerns. I have several.

Self-government just because it is realized in the constitutional agreement is not a reality. We will require an openness of mind, a generosity of spirit, and political will if it is to happen.

Canadians of origins other than English, French and aboriginal have not felt they were sufficiently included in the process coming up to this agreement. They do not feel, certainly the people with whom I have spoken, they are sufficiently recognized in this set of proposals. Therefore there will be some problems there.

The linguistic minorities have had what they sought in terms of constitutional guarantees, but you and I know that even the constitutional guarantees will not necessarily correct the injustices that have occurred.

If there continues to be laws such as those passed in Quebec, Alberta, and Saskatchewan limiting the use of one of Canada's official languages, be it English or French, there will continue to be tensions. That will go on until we can in fact open our hearts and recognize there is enough space in this country for everyone.

I would hope as well that subsequent to this agreement—

[Translation]

Provincial governments are realizing that the Supreme Court of Canada reached numerous decisions that indicated that French minorities outside Quebec had the right to administer their education system, had a right to school administration. It is a priority for that group.

I hope that finally we will go ahead and that we will not hesitate to give them their responsabilities, that we will allow them to grow, to take their own decisions for the future of their children.

[English]

The division of powers will also cause difficulties because even though it is written and somewhat defined there continues to be a need for additional work. It will require further discussion and negotiation. There is no getting around that.

The complexities of government when one looks at the federal, provincial and municipal levels are such that one cannot possibly define it in one document without having some further discussions.

On the reformed Senate the major issue is the whole notion of effective. Is it effective? We could debate that. It has probably made some gains over what exists but I wonder how many gains.

I would have much preferred the proposal my party had advanced that called upon an elected Senate, an effective Senate, and an equal regional representation of senators. It would have been better to have accentuated the effective rather than equal provinces, but it is not to be. I can accept it with some difficulty, but I am prepared to do what I can to improve that effectiveness within the tools available to us.

Because it is unclear as to whether or not senators will be appointed or elected—they may be—potentially that is very contentious. I would hope that all provinces and the territories would decide to elect their senators. I really believe it is a must.

I believe as well that we should have a system of election which is proportional, which will make sure that the under-represented groups such as women, Canadians of aboriginal origin, Canadians of origins other than English, French and aboriginal, will get an opportunity to be elected as senators.

If not, what are we going to do? We are simply going to extend that which we have at a national election, which is probably more of the same, that is more of the same people who are from the governing party. I think that would be unfortunate. We need to have mechanisms that will permit women, visible minorities and others to serve this country. This is a great opportunity to start doing something significant about it.

We should also be exploring the feasibility of having French speaking senators outside Quebec and English speaking senators in Quebec to ensure those two large linguistic minorities are fairly represented.

I would like to see a reduction in the number of members of Parliament. Rather than go to 337 we could virtually keep the same number or reduce it and still keep the same proportions if that is necessary.

We would be responding to that cry out there that we are overly governed. We would be responding to that cry out there that government is too costly. We would be saving a lot of money. A 15 per cent reduction, for example, would amount to roughly 287 members of Parliament rather than the 295 that we have now and the 337 that is expected with these new proposals. That would save over $20 million a year, and that is not without looking at additional costs of infrastructure and a number of additional costs to support MPs.

[Translation]

I would really like for us to recognize that even if the proposals are there, even if there has been an agreement between the first ministers, the leaders of the two territories, the Prime Minister of Canada and the leaders of the four aboriginal groups, there is still time to improve some aspects without changing the basic principles.

• (1250)

I think that if we examined what people with some concerns are saying, we could reach a better consensus with much more support.

[English]

I want to point out that in my opinion the no side will have to put up. It is not sufficient simply to say that one is against something. It is necessary to propose an alternative.

What is the alternative going to be? Will all the people voting on the no side be able to get a coherent package together that the Prime Minister, whether it be this one or another one, and the premiers, the leaders of the territories and the aboriginal leaders, whether it is the ones who are there now or others, will be able to accept? Will they be able to do that? No, I do not believe it for one moment.

If they think they can, let them put their package on the table and let us take a look at it. It is not good enough to stand on the sidelines and swipe and snipe and attack. It is necessary to put forward constructive proposals.

I think there is still time to improve the package. I have made some suggestions, some modest proposals. I stressed the election of senators. I really believe that is essential. That gives senators legitimacy. It gives them additional power. If they continue to be appointed there will still be the criticism that is legitimate today.

I believe that there should be proportional elections of senators because there are under-represented groups that are not serving the nation as members of Parliament, as senators and at other levels of government.

I also believe that we have to look at whether or not we have done an injustice to those Canadians who are labelled disabled, those Canadians who have disabilities. We are not without knowing that they feel they have not been treated fairly. We saw evidence of that yesterday in this House. They believe that they were included in the first set of government proposals and that they should be included again. Let us not forget that these Canadians with disabilities are among the poorest of the poor and that they do not sufficiently often have people who advocate to better their economic and social conditions. Therefore we should look at that.

We should seriously look at the reduction of MPs. What is there to lose? We could save money. We could keep the same proportions if it is necessary. On the other hand, those two large provinces, Ontario and Quebec, if they chose, could accept fewer MPs than they would have received in order to bring about a reduction. If we could reduce the number of MPs it would not only save money, but it would give senators a greater proportional weight when there is a joint session. Of course if there were a generosity of heart from Ontario and Quebec to take one-half of what they would have received in these proposals then clearly that would be well accepted by other parts of Canada.

[Translation]

I suggest that we go ahead, that we try to reach specific conclusions in order to get to other issues, in order to ensure that Canadians who rely on us, on all members of this House to try to resolve the deep problems of this country, can do so.

[English]

As I complete my remarks I want to just make a couple of very brief points. We must remember that it is much easier to destroy than it is to build. That is one of my great fears as we go out on this adventure. We also have to remember that it only takes a little drop of poison to poison a whole lake. My great, profound fear is that the several drops of discontent that will occur could kill Canada.

I believe that if we look at the pluses and the minuses over all this accord is worth supporting.

[Translation]

I intend to support it. I will not tell my constituents how they should vote, but I am ready to talk to them about it.

[English]

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I take pleasure in taking part in this debate because for weeks, months and literally years the Canadian public has been treated to the vicissitudes and the vagaries of constitutional debate.

There has been a constant emotional tug of war for all our people because inevitably this constitutional debate is divided into camps of them versus us, winners or losers. Did they get more than we got?

Finally, we are coming down to the debate. This tug of war has created feelings of uncertainty about the outcome and what would happen to our community, what would happen to Canada and what would happen to our place within the nations of the world.

Now we have the benefit of debate with a text before us. We are no longer dealing with promises, conjectures, vagaries and anticipations. We are now dealing with a text. I am encouraged by the fact that people in my community are calling my office asking for copies of the text. We are not talking any more about newspaper reports, what the hotlines are saying, what the news is saying. We are now talking about a document which everybody can have before them. We are talking about the precise wording in that document.

The difficulty of the debate is that there have been some premature conclusions made all across the country because of assumptions, because of fragmentary news articles, because of rumours and feelings that it is them or us and feelings of conflict within the country that have been generated by this debate. This has developed the mindset of for or against the proposals, the consensus. Too often it has been a premature decision to be against the proposals even before the text is seen.

I want to emphasize throughout this debate that we have to return to the text and what it says, not what other people say, not what other people think it says. But actually, what it does say. The first question we have to ask ourselves is that very one: What does it say?

Today we have to make a decision in this House. On October 26 the people of Canada have to make a momentous decision for the country. Again, not on rumour, not on speculation, not on fragmentary quotations, but on the entire text and what it says to us.

In the process we have to reject some myths. The first myth is that we have to agree with the total package. That is an impossibility. Nobody is going to agree to the total package. The 17 people in the room negotiating and reaching a consensus on this did not agree on the total package. I do not agree with the total package. There is not one member in the House, I believe, who agrees with the terms of the entire package. What we are talking about is not individual items but the wholeness of the package. We have to destroy the myth that says if we do not agree with the package, we cannot vote for it. The fact is, we have to deal with that myth.

As the member from Winnipeg said previously, I do not believe the membership of the House should get constantly larger. Maybe we could do with a reduced number of members in the House. With the Senate being reduced in numbers, they do not necessarily have to be added to the House. We could reduce the proportion.

I do not agree with the economic package. I do not think it is strong enough. I find various segments of this package wanting, but as the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs said in Halifax some weeks ago: "If I had been alone in a room writing this package I would not have written it this way. But I was not alone in the room. There were 16 other people there".

What we have to do is deal with the myth that we have to agree with the whole package. Nothing could be further from the truth. It could never be true that 27 million Canadians are going to enjoy unanimity on all of this.

There are Canadians who have genuine detailed concerns about individual items in the package. These need to be explained. We have a duty to go to those people as much as possible and explain the items in the agenda so that we can deal with those concerns. Many of those concerns are very legitimate. They are based not on speculation or on feelings, but on text.

• (1300)

We need to look at the implications of each of the ingredients and see what those implications are for the future of Canada, whether it is in the Senate proposals, the distinct society, the aboriginal agreement, or the economic package. We need to look at those implications and see what the future of Canada would be like once we have implemented those particular proposals. In the end, it is impossible for 27 million Canadians to agree.

The second myth we have to deal with is that we can oppose this. We can vote it down and simply return to the status quo. There is no stable status quo. We cannot return to the past.

The very process we have been going through has been one of dynamic change. People's attitudes have changed. People's viewpoints have changed. There is no returning to the past. Does anybody believe if we reject this package that the west will tolerate another 10 or 20 years of wrangling about institutional reform? Does anybody believe that?

If we reject this package, will the aboriginals easily accept another promise when this one is so close to being fulfilled? Can we return to some mythical status quo there? Would anybody believe the people of Quebec will quietly defer their cultural aspirations if we reject this package? Will the business community or the economic climate withstand any further postponement of this issue?

The fact is there is no returning to some kind of a mythical status quo. We have to deal with it and not pretend that we can vote it down and simply return to the past and start all over again.

Ultimately there is a big question. I am speaking now to my friends in my constituency and to the country at large. If you oppose individual items in this package, what changes would you require to be made on individual items to make the package acceptable for you?

Write them down. Is it the Senate package? What do you need changed in the Senate? Is it the 25 per cent floor for members from Quebec? What is it that you need to have changed? Write them down and then come with me to the maritimes, to Nova Scotia or New Brunswick. I will introduce you to fellow Canadians there who also have a list of bottom line demands that they think are imperative to make this a complete package. Sit down with this Nova Scotian and compare those lists. I can assure you they are not the same lists. They will be different.

How will you accommodate two intransigent positions and satisfy both regions of the country? For the west, any federal government involvement is intrusive. For the maritimes, federal government involvement is imperative. Try to reconcile those. If we in the west feel so very strongly about individual items on the agenda that are so important for us, let us sit down with people from other parts of the country and compare with them what their demands are.

A second big question is: Do we really want to have a break in the impasse? Do we want to have constant wrangling? If we want to have a break in the impasse, what is it that we are willing to concede in order to break that impasse?

I am reminded of the words of Leo Tolstoy who once said: "Everybody thinks about changing humanity; nobody thinks about changing himself". It is the other person who has to change, not me.

In an impasse it is impossible to think of a change, a resolution or a reconciliation unless both parties make a concession. The danger we have in this debate is we will overlook an ancient truth. Believing is not so much an act of gathering more information, but an act of the will. We decide to believe. We make a conscious decision that we will believe or reject certain things. Look at the people who smoke and the limp excuses they use to prove it does not hurt them: "My Uncle Fred is 90 years old and smoked two packs a day. He never died of tobacco use. He was hit by a bus". They will believe that because they want to and they have decided to believe that.

In an issue much more critical for our country, we cannot embrace ancient and continuing prejudices and accommodate new realities all at the same time. We cannot do that. We decide to believe or we can decide to reject information.

The whole commitment to education is built on the notion that we spend billions of dollars so that students change. We do not expect them to come out of educational institutions the same way they went in.

Now we are asking the public to participate in a process of change for our country and to experience what 17 leaders of our nation experienced over the last few months in intense negotiations and in intense dialogue. Can you imagine 17 more diverse people with strongly held views sitting here in Ottawa or in Charlottetown discussing what bottom lines are for them?

Compare Premier Wells with Premier Rae and their bottom line positions, Premier Getty and Premier Bourassa, or the aboriginal leaders and the premiers. They have very opposite points of view and yet they came to an agreement. Would anyone suggest that Premier Wells or Premier Rae denied their convictions when they came to an agreement? The fact is they kept all their convictions. What they did was they found it acceptable to acknowledge the validity of somebody else's point of view. They did not deny their own convictions. They accepted additional ones.

We ask ourselves whether there is a risk in all of this. Of course there is. There is risk in any change and we fear change because there is risk involved. Ask any businessman about an investment that he has to make. Is he afraid? Is there risk? Of course there will be risk and there is risk in this, but that is the nature of change. There is change and there is risk in the nature of change of relationships and we must accommodate that risk, not overlook it.

We are not asking for reckless, blind acquiescence to the terms of a document. What we are asking for is a willingness to be objective about the terms of a text and what it says and that we look at it with reason in the cold light of day. We ask for a willingness to accommodate change and the change of mind, the change of attitude and the change of heart.

The fundamental simple question is: Will Canada be better off with these changes? Will Canadians' futures be brighter as a result of these changes to which these people have agreed? If we ask that question and look at the text in that context, we will say a resounding yes to the package and we will have a bright future for Canada.

I close with one statement from William Penn who said: "Oh, Lord, help us not to despise or oppose what we do not understand."

• (1310)

May we look at this text in the cold light of reality and find it in our hearts to look at other people's points of view at the same time.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, let me commence my remarks by congratulating the member who has just spoken. I think he presented a very thoughtful speech to this House.

On October 26 Canadians will be asked the following 21 word question:

> Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached August 28, 1992?

That is really the preamble. The question itself is yes or no.

I like the question. It is short. It is easy to understand. All Canadians can participate in the process and feel comfortable that at least they will understand that which they are voting on.

Contrary to the past constitutional accord, the Meech Lake agreement—and I voted for Meech Lake—this deal was not only approved by the first ministers. It was also approved by the territorial leaders, by the aboriginal leadership, and it will be subjected to a referendum.

Furthermore, it has been the result of extensive consultation.

[Translation]

Extensive consultations were held for nearly two years: the Spicer commission, the consultations I had in my own riding, the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee, the Unity Forum sponsored by the aboriginal people which I attended, the meetings of first ministers, with the exception of the premier of Quebec, followed by further meetings, this time with the premier of Quebec attending.

[English]

To those who say there has not been sufficient consultation, I think that Canadians have heard enough. They probably feel they have been consulted and they want to get this issue over with.

Meech Lake took too long to ratify and I think that is one of the causes of its demise. Once the deal is approved by this House, once it is ratified not only by the Canadian people, which it will be on October 26, it has to be ratified by all legislatures and by this Parliament. I really hope we can do that quickly, having received that instruction by the Canadian people.

[Translation]

I would like us to do Canadians a favour and promise them the agreement will be ratified before Christmas. Would that not be a nice Christmas present? I know my constituents would appreciate the fact that we would not be talking about the Constitution for a while.

Talking about the Constitution is not a bad thing in itself. We will have an agreement approved by Canadians in a referendum and by the legislatures of all the provinces and both Houses of Parliament. Of course we can talk about the Constitution at some point in the future, although right now I have a slight case of constitutional indigestion.

As soon as we have that consent we will be able to talk about it without the threat looming on the horizon of Canada breaking up.

[English]

Discussing constitutions is not in itself wrong. There are constitutional talks in the United States. It has had one since approximaltely 1787 and that is not unhealthy. Every time it discusses a constitutional change, the fabric of the country is not threatened by the fact the U.S. talks about it.

Once we ratify this Constitution by way of a referendum and the subsequent votes of our legislatures and our Parliament, we could talk in the future if we so wish about constitutions without threatening ourselves and our very existence.

[Translation]

There are a few parliamentarians who say there is not enough in this agreement and who do not like certain measures. Granted, some measures may not be winners, and if I put on my partisan hat for a second, I would say my leader is a better negotiator than the leader of the party opposite. If I did not think so, I probably would not be a member of my party.

Of course the agreement could be improved on, but that is not the point. The point is not whether the agreement is perfect. As far as I know, the last perfect person was crucified nearly 2,000 years ago. The point is whether the agreement is good for our country, and my answer is yes. Of course the naysayers are grabbing the headlines today, but you can bet they are not going to stay in the House. Everybody knows who they are. Everybody is talking about them. Everybody is saying, or at least some people are, "he said more or less what I was thinking".

People will remember Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir George Étienne-Cartier. People will remember George Brown who set aside partisan concerns for the sake of this country more than 125 years ago. But who remembers William Hannon, Antoine-Aimé Dorion, L. H. Holton and A. J. Smith who were against Confederation in 1867? With the exception of Mr. Dorion who had been a Prime Minister several years before, I had never heard of them.

We all know about George Washington and Thomas Jefferson in the United States. How many of us would remember names like George Mason, Richard Henry Lee, George Clinton and Robert Yates, the American anti-federalists of the time? They are no longer in the news today. No buildings or bridges were named after them.

[English]

There might be a moment of glory in being against this deal. Those who at this moment seek that advantage for their own personal gain, in the long term will be forgotten much easier because of what they are doing today.

I have the intention of voting in favour of this referendum.

[Translation]

I will urge my constituents to do likewise. This Saturday, I will set up a group in my riding to form a common front for the yes campaign in this referendum. Yesterday I contacted the presidents of the NDP, Progressive Conservative and Liberal riding associations and other groups. I invited them to a meeting on Saturday to form this common front in support of our country.

[English]

I also intend to organize three rallies in my riding, at least three. Perhaps this committee that I am appointing will recommend more. There will be one in Glengarry, one in Prescott and one in Russell.

They will be rallies which people could attend and hear speakers in favour of this constitutional accord. I would like to invite Conservative members of Parliament to come to my riding to speak at those rallies. In turn I would volunteer to go to theirs if that is what they choose.

I have never done that before as you can probably imagine.

[Translation]

Earlier today I was talking to the hon. member from Quebec City. He is a cousin of mine—once removed, but a cousin just the same. His family is originally from Cornwall, next door to my riding. In fact, his great-aunt, who is my great-aunt as well, still lives there. I asked the hon. member from Quebec City, the President of the Treasury Board, to come to my riding and make a speech during the referendum campaign and he said he was interested.

• (1320)

I invite other friends opposite to do the same, and perhaps I should explain that despite the impression we get from watching television, just because our role in the House is an adversarial one does not mean we are enemies. When I refer to my friends opposite, I mean what I say, because there are a number of members opposite I consider good friends. I would ask these parliamentarians to pay us a visit and I would be glad to share the platform with then.

[English]

The Leader of the Opposition said it well a few days ago when he reminded all of us that he had shared the stage in his own constituency in 1980 with the Leader of the Opposition, voluntarily doing so at that time in the 1980 referendum to speak with a united voice in favour of this country. It was that speech which inspired me to try to do the same thing in my own constituency in an attempt to show that we, as parliamentarians, not withstanding our divergent opinions on many issues, can work together for the unity of this country.

[Translation]

That is why we all have a duty to work together to defend the interests of this great country of ours.

[English]

I am a Quebecer by birth, a franco-Ontarion.

[Translation]

I have lived in the province of Ontario for many years, and the riding I have the privilege to represent in this House is right on the border with the province of Quebec. For instance, the eastern part of my riding borders on Quebec to the north, east and south.

Although I represent an Ontario riding, I feel at home and I am at home in both Quebec and Ontario, but I also want residents of Quebec to feel at home in Vancouver, Newfoundland and anywhere else in this country. Canadians should be made to feel once again that this country belongs to all of us. I would ask the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean and those who are like-minded to consider, when he flies over the Rockies in Alberta and British Columbia that those mountains belong to his children. He tends to forget that, and he is not alone.

I do not say this out of contempt for nationalist feelings, because there are times when members of a minority feel they are being treated unfairly, and they are often right. However, there is a difference between feelings aggrieved and refusing to have anything to do with the rest of the country.

I believe this constitutional agreement has managed to combine a certain measure of autonomy for the provinces and regions in this country with what I believe will remain a strong central government.

I also think that the principle of guaranteed representation for Quebec in the House of Commons provides a unique safeguard that recognizes the distinctness of Quebec.

I have read the agreement. I have also read what it says about language minorities outside Quebec. Of course there were concerns, but I am satisfied that the agreement contains sufficient safeguards for the minority in my own province and language minorities elsewhere in Canada.

[English]

I will vote for this accord. I ask all my constituents to do so as well. To all members of this House, to the few who disagree with my position on this, I say that there is still time. There is still time to reconsider for the greater good. George Brown did it some years ago. There is still time for all of us to think that way. Just maybe we will be remembered if we do it that way, not forgotten like some of the others who were against Constitution 125 years ago.

[Translation]

Mrs. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I will gladly share my speaking time with my colleague, the hon. member for Abitibi.

At this critical time of our history, this special moment when all Canadians, from Halifax to Quebec City to Vancouver, are about to decide the constitutional future of their country, I have the great honour, as member of Parliament for the beautiful riding of Ahuntsic, in Montreal, to take part today in this important debate to end the constitutional adventures, so to speak, of the past few decades.

Since 1867, the year the Confederation came together, the year that saw John A. MacDonald and George-Étienne Cartier decided to found a new country, Canada, a land where freedom and democracy would flourish and both founding nations, the French and the English, would unite to build a multiethnic and multicultural society. The Canadian people have encountered political ups and downs and obstacles that they have always managed to overcome and which in retrospect have strengthened their determination to live in freedom and unity.

This constitutional agreement is fair to the French speaking province of Quebec, with the distinct society clause protecting their higher interest for years to come, as well as to the English speaking provinces which scored some points with the Triple-E Senate.

This is also an historic moment in our life as a nation, as the native people of Canada, these oft forgotten First Nations, were invited for the first time to participate freely and fully to negotiations aimed at reshaping Canada as a land whose sons will all have equal opportunities to blossom, from Halifax to Vancouver.

As far as I am concerned, as a Quebecer and the member for Ahuntsic, one of the most francophone ridings in Montreal, I am proud to be a Canadian and to support this agreement which will allow Quebec to re-enter the Canadian family, as our Prime Minister had promised.

He did keep his word. Not only does this agreement which will close a chapter in our national history and open a new one respond favourably to the historical demands of Quebec, the economic, social and cultural development of which continued within Canada over the past 125 years and has been rather outstanding, but it sets out the main thrust for a renewed country with a nice spot for a truly empowered province of Quebec to blossom freely.

On top of the five conditions contained in the Meech Lake accord, Quebec made gains in the areas of training, manpower, forestry, mining, housing, municipal affairs, tourism, recreation and culture, the most important of which, in my opinion, aside from the distinct society clause, is the guarantee that at least 25 per cent of the representation in the House of Commons would be from Quebec at any given time, whatever the population of our province may be.

• (1330)

Because of our disappointingly low birth rate and our aging population, this guarantee gives Quebec unmatched political and decision-making power. Once they have learned about all these gains, Quebecers in general and the people of Ahuntsic in particular will approve this agreement, the only hope for a better future for their children. They will not listen to the sirens of independence who proclaim the division and breakup of a country that despite all its problems and difficulties has the best quality of life of 160 countries in the world, according to the United Nations. The place Quebec holds in Canada and in the world is envied by over 160 countries.

By giving a majority yes vote to this agreement, Quebecers, aware of the past that they have built with the other peoples of Canada and of the present that they are building with them in mutual respect, will give a clear answer that Quebec belongs in Canada and avoids hatred, racism and division.

I know that in the Quebec referendum, the advocates of independence will accuse us of being prophets of doom who frighten people. Is it the truth that frightens them? Their idyllic talk of bright tomorrows has more to do with passion than with reason, with narrowness than with openness, with destruction than with construction.

By saying yes to this agreement, Quebecers in general and the people of Ahuntsic in particular will say yes to Canada and especially yes to Quebec.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Abitibi has eight minutes.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, as part of my speech today, I would like to read into the record excerpts from an article by Roch Carrier published in the September 1992 edition of L'Actualité, in which he described incredibly eloquently his vision of Canada. I can only do him justice by quoting him. He said: "I have inherited Canada as a whole".

I do not intend to settle for a piece of it, be it celebrated by the poets. I feel no urge to leave Canada when people from all over the world are seeking refuge here. If we are to get off this boat, we better make sure that, like our separatist shepherds we can walk upon the water.

The global economic context will remain unchanged. What will become of us? We will be a smaller nation, so tiny next to the United States. We will also have lost the authority we presently have over the Canadian territory. No proclamation will change that.

The separatists claim that independence will give Quebec the tools required to control its own economy. When the reaction of the Tokyo or New York stock exchanges to some event sends shock waves world-wide, newly redefined boundaries—and what would they be—would not afford Quebec better protection.

Did Confederation prevent the growth of Bombardier, Lavalin or that of the Cirque du Soleil? There are admittedly a few irritants. That is no reason to scuttle a country. It calls for discussion, negotiation, not brooding!

China and Asia are restructuring their economies. Europe, Mexico, the U.S. and Canada are preparing for free trade. Latin America is putting its Mercosur into place. Black Sea countries are grouping together, and what is Quebec doing? Sadly a high percentage of our fine minds which have been preoccupied by constitutional humming and hawing for too long have been driven to stupidity by nationalism. Proclaim independence if you wish, but which state can claim to be independent in the world today with a 20 per cent illiteracy rate, with too many workers unable to meet today's challenges, with too many teenagers with very little education?

Is it really necessary to separate from Canada to put an end to this tragedy of so many young people condemned to a life of menial jobs, unemployment, prostitution and welfare? Unfortunately nationalist ramblings leave little room for those who want to decry the urgency of the situation.

I learned the lessons of tolerance from the French philosophers and I am extremely wary of nationalism. It can serve to unite a people without resources, as we saw 25 years ago. We no longer need nationalism. We should now be sufficiently lucid and self-confident to no longer need to worship the twist of fate which determined our place of birth.

The separatists want to take over all the economic tools in countries with a strong economy. It is quite obvious that the only economic tools are work, education, imagination, information, planning and ambition. No constitution can replace those tools.

According to nationalist doctrine, English-speaking Canadians constitute a homogeneous group whose only purpose is to threaten Quebecers. I find this vision of ourselves narrow minded, frustrating and disheartening. Are we really suffering that much? Is the St. Lawrence River overflowing with the tears of our distressed population? The only thing that matters is interdependency. A country can only be free if it is interdependent. In the chaos of recent years, certain populations have broken their chains. In the future, they will group together and probably reinvent what we now have in Canada.

Confederation is the best invention after democracy. It is based on the respect of differences. Someday, all countries will join in a world confederation where individuals will no longer be sacrificed to tribal rivalries. I may be naive, by I would rather be politically naive than adhere to an outdated nationalist ideal which takes its fear for courage, its withdrawal for conquest and its small mindedness for greatness.

I believe that it would be a disaster in the long run to isolate ourselves. In Abitibi the people would rather work and have a stable job. They have families to support. What is most important for me is to help my constituents to put bread and butter on their table.

These are feelings that all of us, Canadians and Quebecers, should share because we have the marvellous opportunity of living in one of the best countries in the world, from sea to sea to sea. My Quebec understands Canada. On October 26 I shall be saying yes to this agreement, for Quebec and for Canada.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, last week I was fortunate to attend a conference in London on the new Europe. The Danish foreign minister was in attendance at the same meeting and was asked the question: "What happened to the referendum in Denmark? Why was it defeated?"

He gave a very interesting answer that is important for all members to understand. He said: "We lost touch with the ground. We lost touch with the people. It was a matter of all the people in powerful positions, the politicians, the journalists, the academics all saying it was a good thing to have a new Europe but we had not been able to touch the hearts and minds of the people we represented".

I raise that point because it is a lesson that is important for us all to recall as we embark upon this important referendum in Canada. We must not lose touch with the people. We must understand that their concerns and interests spread way beyond the legal wording of the Constitution. This important debate must be a time of listening. We cannot simply rely upon the public relations campaigns, the slick advertising, and the television promotions, but must be out there listening to what they have to say, listening to both the advocates and the critics, those who support it and those who are against it.

They are all going to be trying in their own way to define what this country is, to use this important occasion, as Canada debates where it wants to go, to discuss where the country should be in the future. It is a chance, if you like, to awaken the slumbering potential for goodwill within the country, to bring people together from all parts of the country in a common cause.

[Translation]

I remember this past summer we welcomed the young voyageurs from Drummondville riding, which is represented by their good MP. We had a party on the shore of Lake Winnipeg, which was discovered by La Vérendrye over 100 years ago. It is very important to have groups from Quebec and Manitoba get together to discuss concerns like work and our common future.

[English]

These young people from Quebec and from Manitoba were not making false distinctions based upon some kind of frontiers that were divided 100 years ago. They were young people searching for their own concern about the future and looking forward to a relevance coming from the political system that maybe we had not been providing as well or as effectively as we should have in the past.

Let us use this time effectively. Let us use this time well to make sure that those rare meetings that I was part of in my constituency this summer on the shores of Lake Winnipeg when two groups of young people got together to talk in both their languages about their common problems is an example for the entire country to fulfil.

Let us make no illusions. There are concerns out there that will not be answered by this particular set of propositions in this deal. In my own part of Canada there is deep unrest and unhappiness about some of the proposals as they relate to the Senate. It is not a matter of being equal, it was a question of having a better balance of power in Confederation. Western Canadians felt that they had a better chance of having their voice heard and being listened to in this Parliament and in the councils of national influence and decision making. For many westerners that was not achieved in this deal. That is not in itself reason to oppose it because what we should be saying is that there are chances in the future to improve, to augment and to change.

My own leader, in his speech a few days ago, indicated that one of our concerns and interests will be to use the debate on the legislation of the Senate to ensure that there is a clear understanding that the Senate is not simply another chamber to which we refer legislation. It is the balance wheel of Confederation for the less populated regions, for the hinterlands. We must bring that together to make sure that it is not a question of numbers, it is a question of fairness and equity. Equal was not the operative word, it was equitable and fairness that had to be applied.

There will be much work to do to make people understand how we can use this constitutional referendum to listen to people from western Canada who are going to talk about Senate reform, and we will hear that, to say that this is not the end of the chapter, it is just that we have to write more chapters to improve upon them.

Similarly, think about the concerns, and again I reflect on my constituents, of what is happening in our cities across Canada such as the incredible case of joblessness among our young people and older workers being laid off, a real shortage of social housing and, real problems of public safety on the streets.

In this deal we talk about exclusive concern for urban affairs, housing and training being turned over to the provinces. It is going to be very important that we show Canadians during this time that simply giving exclusive jurisdiction does not mean the end of concern or involvement or an attempt to work together in a co-operative partnership way to deal with those real underlying, deep abiding sores that afflict Canadian society at the present time.

I look forward to and welcome this referendum. I think it is a great opportunity for us not only to encourage Canadians to agree to a deal that will repair some of the injuries of the past but will also provide some building blocks for the future.

We must do it in the proper spirit and the proper sense. In that sense I go back to a saying that I will never forget. Vaclav Havel, the former President of Czechoslovakia, had just left office. He wrote a book, Summer Meditations, which I read just in the last month or two. He said: "Those who find themselves in politics bear a heightened responsibility for the moral state of society, and it is their responsibility to seek out the best in that society, to develop it and to strengthen it".

We have a rare opportunity, one that has come around maybe only every third or fourth decade, to bring Canadians together and to give them the leadership that we in elected office have to provide, to bring out the best in society, to awaken the best potential, to make sure that we understand that this is not a matter of a battle between good and evil. It is a matter of how we find the best potential for all Canadians. We must reason together in both our languages, in all our regions, to ensure that the referendum becomes not a matter of dividing Canadians but of bringing them together and showing them that we can now go on to deal with the issues that concern the people of this country so that they do not lose touch with the ground but rather bring us all together.

[Translation]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, I rise today as a Canadian who is proud of my country and a Quebecer proud of my province to say that I support the constitutional proposals and I encourage all Canadians and especially the people of Saint-Laurent—Cartierville to say yes to the referendum question. I encourage all Quebecers to say yes to a promising future in which the French language and culture will be protected in a country of 27 million.

I encourage all Quebecers to say yes to employment and a more stable economic future. I encourage all Canadians to say yes because the time has come to change political priorities. The time has come to talk about the economy and to find solutions for the problems affecting everyone.

[English]

Provincial premiers, territorial leaders and representatives of our native communities have said yes to a new constitutional deal. They have said yes to a new Canada and have now asked us through this question to say yes to Canada as well.

I believe that this deal will at the same time protect the interests of Quebec's francophone population and ensure the survival of a vibrant English speaking community in a Quebec that is strong and that is also a strong member of the Canadian family.

[Translation]

We are gathered here in this House today to approve the question that will be presented to Canadians on October 26. The question is simple and the options are clear.

However, some people do not want to have anything to do with Canada. Members of the Parti Quebecois and the Bloc Quebecois want an independent Quebec. They oppose these offers because they are basically against political union with the rest of Canada.

Their leader, the member for Lac-Saint-Jean, says that the Charlottetown accord gives Quebecers nothing. That is completely wrong. Quebec is guaranteed 25 per cent of the seats in this House and is entitled to 33 per cent of the judges on the Supreme Court. Recognition of Canada's linguistic duality is reflected in the distinct society clause.

But the separatists' struggle will continue not because they want to improve Quebecers' daily lives but because they have an ideological agenda. They have a personal agenda that has nothing to do with the betterment of our province.

[English]

These people would never be satisfied with any offers from the federal government because they are ideologically committed to the break-up of our country. Do you think they really care about the average citizens of our province? Do you think they really care about the well-being of the aging population, the seniors? Do they have a plan to look after the homeless or the poor? Do you think they have a plan to battle skyrocketing unemployment and to settle political instability? The answer on all counts is absolutely no.

[Translation]

I think it would be a good thing at this time to remind ourselves that the agreement reached in Charlottetown on August 28 represents the conclusion of a long consultation process undertaken across the country. Everyone had the opportunity to participate in this process to express their expectations, their doubts and their hopes. Every Canadian had a chance to speak out and today we see the results. The active participation of the Canadian people through briefs, submissions and interventions was the first step. The second step will be the upcoming vote for or against the proposed package. It is important that every one of us as Canadian citizens has a say in the final decision. It is our duty. Nothing should be taken for granted. We must work together to win the fight for a strong Quebec within a united Canada. We live in a wonderful country offering the highest standard of living in the world.

Our country is rich in physical and human resources. We cannot risk losing everything because we have become indifferent to what is happening. Every vote is important because the total number of votes will dictate the policy to be followed by the Prime Minister.

[English]

October 26 must be at the same time an end to a process and a beginning of a new time in our history, a time when we will be able to declare once and for all that the Constitution is settled.

This constitutional deal needs the support of all Quebecers committed to a united Canada. That is why I am making a personal appeal to the people of Saint-Laurent—Cartierville and Saraguay to get out and vote. Tell all of Canada that you want to remain part of this country. Tell the separatists that they do not speak for Quebecers or Quebec and tell them so by voting yes on October 26.

I would also like to send a message to members of all three federal parties in my riding. We need your help. We need your fight and your help to keep Canada united. As the Prime Minister and leaders of the oppositions have said, this is beyond partisan politics. There will be time for that later. We need each and every one of the people committed to Canada to join us in a proud fight for our country and our province. The alternative is not a pretty sight. There is no pot of gold at the end of the rainbow and there is no paradise in a separate Quebec.

Let us not kid ourselves. A vote for the no side on October 26 will set in motion the gears that will result in independence. A vote for the yes has the chance of putting a nail in the coffin of the separatist option.

[Translation]

The question should be simple and specific, quite a challenge in an environment with a tendency to elaborate endlessly. We seem to have succeeded, as Canadians will soon be able to judge for themselves. The people of this country will read, debate among themselves and make up their own minds so that they can tell us in the referendum what they want their country to be.

The coming days will be tense. There will be discussions and differences of opinion but we must remember, however difficult it may be, that we are first and foremost citizens of a wonderful country. Let us make every effort to keep it strong and united. On October 26 vote yes for a strong Quebec within a united Canada.

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Madam Speaker, on October 26, 1992, Canadians, Quebecers and the residents of Lévis will have to vote on the constitutional agreement that was recently proposed to all of Canada.

In the days following this agreement I had the opportunity to discuss it with some representatives of my riding. Their comments could be grouped into three categories. First are those who question specific points.

I was told that more could have been done to abolish trade barriers among the provinces of Canada. They could have been made unconstitutional or lower trade barriers could have been encouraged and east-west trade made easier. I was also told that some duplication in some departments was overlooked. However, we know that this agreement is the result of consensus and that a perfect agreement is not possible. Perfection is the enemy of the good, something like acrobatics is bad for gymnastics. We must try to have what can be obtained and not something unrealistic. We have an agreement. This is the best agreement since 1867. It does not contain everything that each of Canada's 27 million citizens might want, nor does it have some features that the 7 million Quebecers in Canada might desire, but it bears the signatures of the Prime Minister of Canada, the ten provincial premiers and the First Nations' representatives.

This agreement is the conclusion of a generation of effort. It includes the historic demands of Quebecers. Among other things we are guaranteed three Supreme Court judges, 33 1/3 per cent of its members, forever, because of our civil code is different. This agreement guarantees that we will have 25 per cent of the members of the House of Commons of Canada. It confirms what the Quebec Act, 1774, said, namely that Quebec is a distinct society. It confirms that formally and irrevocably. This agreement gives Quebec full authority over immigration, education, manpower training, the management and exploitation of its natural resources, etc.

I also heard some very negative comments. People spoke to me of humiliation, defeat, groveling, kowtowing; they said Bourassa is a traitor and so on. That is the kind of talk usually heard where Quebec separatists congregate, but is it even worth commenting on? Can such language be justified? On the contrary, does it not show the lack of practical substantial reasons for Quebecers to take their province out of Canada? These comments are exaggerated. When we ask for positive things that would flow from separation, they answer "Campeau". Who is Campeau? He was an accountant at the Caisse de dépôt, which handles mainly funds from government employees. When he went into management, the first thing he did resulted in a $500-million loss for Domtar; the second thing he did with other people's money cost Quebec $100 million in the Steinberg affair.

They tell us about Parizeau. Parizeau incurred a $500-million loss, the press reported recently. The asbestos corporation is being sold again because Parizeau made a half billion dollar mistake.

They tell us about Larose. They say that he must be a sensible guy. I talked about Larose to my constituents. In my riding the shipyards employ 3,500 people. I talked to the wives, the workers, their children and relatives and I told them, "Ask Larose who uses your dues to attack the federal government what has kept the shipyards going for ten years". Every cent comes from the federal government. What is Larose proposing to them? Nothing. He tells them, "Separate and we'll see after".

Finally, I met supporters of the agreement who will say yes for its intrinsic qualities and its positive effect on the economy and because the alternative would be a fiasco for our families and middle class, who would have to pay more tax for a generation as Parizeau and Lucien Bouchard have admitted.

• (1400)

Mr. Parizeau and Lucien Bouchard admitted that those people will have to pay more tax for a generation. Remember that Mr. Parizeau is capable of doing that because he is the one who cut Quebec public servants' pay by 20 per cent at one point. It would be a fiasco for seniors who are worried about their income security and social services. Where will they get the money so that our old people can continue to live comfortably? It is a fiasco for the less fortunate. Where will they get the money to continue to assist our disadvantaged? We have no specifics from the propagandists of separation. It is a fiasco for our young people as well except for those who camp in front of the legislature. Young people who want to develop the country but not break it up, who want to continue and not start all over, still want a solid foundation. That is why they ask us to vote yes and yes is the way the riding of Lévis will answer.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being two p.m., the House will now proceed to statements pursuant to Standing Order 31.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, when I first heard the question "do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992 in Charlottetown", I smiled inwardly as I contemplated the public's reaction, a public that has become cynical because we have not dealt with this matter more expeditiously.

As I have said many times in this House compromise lacks perfection. Perhaps perfection is achievable only at another level, but now we have an outstanding compromise before us.

We should learn from the turmoil in other parts of the world that this is an extremely important matter. Constituents of Regina—Wascana will treat it as such.

Early this year I circulated a comprehensive questionnaire on constitutional matters. The intelligent, informed and passionate results form the basis of my own personal constitutional position which I circulated to each household in my riding.

Decision time is here. I pledged to my constituents to make myself available, for it is important to send signals to other Canadians of how important our respective contributions can be. We must show ourselves that we do not have to be exactly the same to be equal and by living in different areas of this vast country, we still have the same aspirations.

We must become informed Canadians in order that on referendum day we can all smile inwardly as we vote with intelligence and understanding to support a country which for 125 years has supported us.

ROYAL OAK MINES INCORPORATED

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to join with my colleagues, many of whom have said they will be voting yes in the referendum. I think there are very few people in this House of Commons who would be on the no side.

I would like to draw your attention to the serious labour dispute between Royal Oak Mines Incorporated of Yellowknife and the members of the Smelter and Allied Workers Union. This has been ongoing since May 23 of this year.

I and my colleague, the labour critic for the New Democratic Party, feel the time has come to proceed with an industrial disputes inquiry with a view to restoring confidence and jobs in Yellowknife. My colleague, the member for Western Arctic and I have been particularly worried about the rapidly deteriorating situation which has led to tension and the feeling of unnecessary and unduly harsh police intervention in this matter.

I would like the House to take notice of this point.

TRIBUTE TO MRS. LOUISE ARCAND

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, today I want to pay tribute to Louise Arcand who was a host, a reader and a journalist with Radio-Canada for more than 20 years and whose sudden death last month, at the age of 48 from brain cancer saddened us all in Abitibi and in Amos where she was born.

All agree that Louise was a remarkable woman, a formidable go-getter with great strength of character, like her parents and the members of her family, who are pioneers in Amos.

Louise found out about her illness in the spring of 1991. At that time, she had been a journalist for three years on the program Les affaires et la vie on Radio-Canada.

Louise will remain present in the hearts of the people of Abitibi. She will remain close to us all.

DRUGS AND PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, with Bill C-91 being rammed through this House next week low priced generic drugs will be sacrificed on the altar of the Mexico-U.S. free trade deal.

The promises made in connection with the Canada-U.S. trade deal in the previous drug patent bill of 1987 have not been honoured. The promised 3,000 research jobs have not materialized and more than 700 jobs in the drug manufacturing area have been lost. The promise of not a single cent in higher drug prices is ignored.

This government even ignores its own drug price regulations when 40 per cent of all new drugs are allowed to exceed the price guidelines of the Drug Prices Review Board.

Bill C-91 will compound these mistakes because the NAFTA negotiations required the sacrifice of the cost efficient generic drugs as part of the George Bush trade deal.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, every spring tens of thousands of farmers take to the fields from Prince Edward Island to British Columbia planting millions upon millions of acres of fertile soil in the hopes they will receive a good bountiful harvest.

This year, although the weather was damp and different, that bountiful harvest seemed to project a tremendous result and guess what happened. As we stand here today, there are thousands of acres of grains in the west, in Alberta, that have been pushed down because of snow. We have had tremendous rainfalls which hamper the harvest and now we have had frost to damage the quality of the crop.

As I sit here, every member of this House and everyone in this country should pray that some good weather will come so that we can in fact reap this harvest. Then Canada can once again sustain the markets that it has and it can feed those in great poverty around the world. It can also help the farmers end up making a little bit of profit.

Thank God we had the foresight to put in programs like GRIP to improve the crop insurance programs farmers can turn to. Yes, we are hoping to bring the cash advance because farmers need help today. Pray for good weather.

THE DISABLED

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, Canadians with disabilities are disappointed that they have been left out of the Canada clause in the constitutional agreement. This came as a surprise because the federal government's draft proposals last September, Shaping Canada's Future Together, included a clear reference to disabled persons.

The Canada clause contains a number of provisions to protect specific groups in society including aboriginal people, linguistic groups, ethnic groups and women.

Persons with disabilities want to know why they have not been included this time. They would like some assurance that their rights will not have a lesser degree of judicial protection than those other groups.

There is particular concern about disability rights following the cancellation of the Court Challenges Program earlier this year. This program helped disabled Canadians and other communities clarify their legal rights under the charter and in the courts.

Canadians with disabilities are looking for some sign that this government is committed to the protection and promotion of their rights.

FISHERIES

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, during the past summer an experiment was tried in British Columbia allowing for a native commercial fishery.

Also this year there has been an alarming decimation of some salmon spawning runs with only a small percentage of the salmon expected actually arriving on the spawning grounds. One of the factors is no doubt the native fishery.

This is not due to the fact that the fishery occurred but that there has been a complete failure to enforce the regulations, to keep accurate catch tallies and to control the escapement of adequate spawning stocks on several rivers.

An extremely tense situation is developing between whites and natives and between various native groups. I call on the government to get control of this fishery situation immediately by enforcing all regulations to ensure that which occurred on the Fraser does not develop elsewhere, notably in the Port Alberni and Cowichan areas.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, veterans affairs offices across this country have received thousands of calls of concern, fear and anger from veterans whose independence program benefits have been drastically cut. This valuable program allows veterans to remain in their own homes at minimal cost to taxpayers.

The minister's office has assured me there may have been miscommunication to veterans, but in reality there were no cuts. I would ask the minister to relay this good news to the thousands of veterans and hundreds of councillors who indicate quite definitely that the cuts are real and dramatic.

I cite one example of a recent stroke victim whose monthly benefit has been cut from $300 a month to $6.11 per month. Health needs were not a consideration of those who made an arbitrary, unjust decision against the advice and judgment of those who work in the field.

Rumour has it the minister is reconsidering this decision and will restore the original monthly allotments already promised to veterans. I ask him to do so promptly. Veterans are the least among us who should be subjected to this kind of treatment.

There is a positive prologue. In discussion with the veterans affairs office in Prince Edward Island I was told things will be well very soon.

RENEWAL OF THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Gaby Larrivée (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday August 22, in Charlottetown, the federal and provincial governments agreed on a new project for the renewal of the Constitution.

This agreement is one of the most ambitious constitutional renewal projects ever undertaken by our governments since 1867. This accord is extremely important for Quebecers since it takes into account the traditional claims made by their province throughout its history. In spite of some flaws this is a good agreement. It gives Quebec solid guarantees concerning its identity as well as new powers.

This new deal negotiated by Quebec provides Quebecers with the necessary tools for their economic, social and cultural development. I am proud to give my full support to the agreement because it represents the best possible compromise between Quebec and its Canadian partners.

THE OLYMPIC GAMES

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, not long ago, Canadians marvelled at Silken Lauman's determination and Sylvie Fréchette's dignity and grace during the Summer Olympics in Barcelona. Indeed the Canadian team got the best results ever obtained by Canada in any non-boycotted Olympic Games. With 16 medals our athletes represented Canada with honour and the highest sportsmanship, showing once again the unifying power of sports in Canada and its role in the history and culture of our people.

Sports fans across Canada enthusiastically encouraged our athletes. They did not care where these athletes came from. The important thing was to know that they were giving their best.

On behalf of the House of Commons and all Canadians, I salute the Canadian participants in the Barcelona Games whose outstanding performances dazzled us. I also want to extend my best wishes to Canadian athletes who take part in the Paraolympic Games for paraplegics in Barcelona.

EDUCATION

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, this week the OECD issued its report card on Canada's economy. It had some good news and some bad news.

The good news is that Canada's economy is expected to grow 2.3 per cent this year and 4.3 per cent next year. Inflation should hold steady at 2.4 per cent this year and next and the unemployment rate should drop to 9.9 per cent by the second half of next year.

The bad news is that we are not getting value for our money when it comes to education. Canada is the biggest spender on education in the G-7. However, too many students are graduating from high school functionally illiterate.

The OECD message is that if we are to prosper as a country in the future we have to ensure that our young people have the skills to meet the challenges of the next century. Education is a type of investment. Let us make sure that we invest wisely.

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, once again the Minister of Employment and Immigration has failed workers in the rural area of Westmorland. After giving them a glimmer of hope in June he has refused to take any action and is now ignoring them. The unemployment situation in the area is as serious as anywhere else, and workers will be unable to find enough weeks of work to make them eligible for unemployment insurance.

[English]

The minister cannot ignore the situation in which the workers find themselves. He has to find a way to render justice to the workers of rural Westmorland who are in a completely different situation from the people living across the street in the riding of Kent.

The people of this region deserve better from this government.

CRIMES OF VIOLENCE

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my deepest condolences to the family of six-year old Corinne Gustavson. Tragically, the day before yesterday, her body was found sexually assaulted and smothered. This incident is only one of many violent sexual assault crimes which occurred this summer in Edmonton.

Many Edmontonians have called my office and those of my colleagues to express their belief that our justice system has failed.

We need to send a clear message that such crimes will no longer be tolerated. We need to increase the education in our society about sexual abuse and provide education and treatment for those offenders. We must impose tougher penalties on violent and dangerous offenders. We must restore the faith of Canadians in our justice system.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, within the last month veterans have received a letter from Veterans Affairs informing them that the department is changing its payment process for some VIP services. Instead of submitting receipts every month, the VIP recipients will receive an advance cheque to cover their average monthly expenses. This amount was derived from the expenses incurred by the veteran last year and does not necessarily reflect the ceiling amounts allotted to each individual by the department.

Many veterans have contacted my office and expressed fear that this was changed without cause.

Have the veterans and their organizations asked that this change be made? We can ask ourselves and the minister if this change has been brought about to benefit the veterans, or has it been brought about to benefit the government that will now be able to run a more computerized and less personal service to the veterans? Will the minister assure the House that this change has been carefully thought out and is not the forerunner of diminished service to our veterans?

We must always remind ourselves that the payments made to veterans are not a benefit but rather their right as a grateful country tries to pay them back for the valuable service they performed.

EDUCATION

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, this government's failure in the mid-1980s to develop a national youth policy helped create Canada's generation x, a generation largely ill prepared by education and training for the present or future economy. Statistics on youth suicide, crime, violence and drug use depict a rising level of social pathology linked with a high youth unemployment rate of 19.2 per cent, nearly double the national rate.

Neo-conservatism and its Darwinian economics continue to fail these youth as well as other Canadians. The government gives us free trade and now NAFTA so that profits are reaped by sending jobs south. It talks of the new competitiveness while cutting training, post-secondary education and job creation expenditures for youth.

What could be a stupider approach to a high value added economy? What more perverse a denial of the opportunities necessary to build it? When will the government understand that future prosperity is indispensably dependent upon the opportunity for Canadians to learn and to create, or that economic growth and social justice must go hand in hand? Or, will the continued failure of this government lead to Canadian generations y and z and perhaps omega?

NORTHERN COD FISHERY

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, in June of this year the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans announced a ban on the northern cod fishery, and I supported that decision. But that decision has deprived a great number of fishermen and plant workers in my riding of a substantial source of their revenue.

I would like to ask the minister today to speed up the process so that compensation payments start flowing to those communities as soon as possible.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Deputy Prime Minister.

My question is related to the merger of Air Canada and Canadian Airlines yesterday. As we all know, Canada's first Prime Minister drove the last spike in building the national railway and the present Prime Minister is driving the last nail in the coffin of airline competition in Canada.

In the face of the announcement yesterday, what is this government planning to do to maintain some competition in the air in Canada?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, representatives of both national airlines have indicated yesterday in separate press releases that they had agreed in principle to a merger, that a merger committee would be put together with representatives from both airlines, and that the details of the transaction would be ironed out in that committee.

When that deal is complete, it will be investigated by two agencies of the government. At that time we will know what the content of the transaction is and we will be able to act accordingly.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the light of this airline merger, will the government take steps to ensure that Canadians will not be grounded as a result of further increases in domestic fares which are already too high? Everyone is worried that Canadians will no longer be able to travel in this country, thanks to the disastrous policies of the Minister of Transport.

• (1420)

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is common knowledge that one of the main causes of the financial difficulties of both companies is the price war which has been raging during the past few years. As I said earlier, as soon as the transaction is complete it will be examined and the Bureau of Competition Policy will ensure that competition will continue to exist within Canada's civil aviation system.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister.

As everybody knows, a very conservative estimate of the loss of jobs in that transaction is at least 6,000. Of course the Minister of Finance who seems to be comfortable with 1.6 million people unemployed might not be too preoccupied with that.

I would like to quote the Deputy Prime Minister. On July 16, 1985, when he was Minister of Transport, he said: "We promise to assist those who might suffer severe economic dislocation under a new regulatory regime".

Will the Minister of Finance keep the promise he expressed in this House in 1985?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, during the talks held in recent weeks the federal government made sure that Canadian Airlines International would have a chance to examine all the options, including the generous proposal made by its employees. We did our utmost, and we hope that other levels of government would do the same.

[English]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to remind the Minister of Transport of something that was said by his predecessor and now Minister of Finance in the House of Commons on April 12, 1988. He said: "The results of regulatory reform and the passage of the National Transportation Act have created a new environment and with it a stable, viable and very competitive airline sector in Canada".

Now we know that the result of the policies pursued by this government is an unstable, non-competitive and in fact monopolistic airline environment in Canada.

The minister now has two choices before him. Is he planning to re-regulate the industry and turn back the reforms of his colleague, or is he planning to let U.S. carriers compete on Canadian routes against this new merged carrier? Which one will it be?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has probably not examined the results of deregulation properly, because he would have noticed, for instance, that total passenger traffic grew by 19.5 per cent from 1986 to 1990 to almost 37 million passengers and passenger kilometres on scheduled services grew by 25.3 per cent to 50 billion.

The situation in which the Canadian airlines are finding themselves at the present time is equivalent to what other airlines around the world find themselves in not because of deregulation but because of the Persian Gulf war which was the spark plug of the present situation and the world-wide recession that ensued.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister might look at the war of attrition between our two air carriers that was carried on without any direction or policy interference by the Government of Canada.

[Translation]

All the experts agree that the airline resulting from this merger will not be able to survive without a major injection of capital. Surely the government examined the same figure. Can the minsiter tell us how much Canadian taxpayers will have to pay to help this new giant of the skies, with its super debt of $8 billion?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, first we hear concerns about competition and then we are asked why the government failed to intervene to prevent companies from competing with each other. The Liberal Party will have to make up its mind. Either it wants competition or it wants regulation, which by its very nature eliminates all opportunities for competition.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. The merger of Air Canada and Canadian International goes to show what a failure deregulation has been. Yet when extolling the virtues of deregulation, government promised increased competition, lower fares and better services. What we are getting is the exact opposite: no competition, high fares and fewer services. Will government undertake to demand that this new monopoly serve our communities well and offer reasonable rates to the public?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, the hon. leader of the NDP should examine carefully the effects of deregulation which has resulted in reduced air fares across Canada and better services. All consumers have benefited from deregulation and their situation at present is no worse than that of all other airlines in the world.

This all started with the Persian Gulf War and the world-wide recession that ensued.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, we have very carefully examined the effects of deregulation. When the Liberal Party proposed deregulation we opposed it as well.

We see now that the effects of deregulation are in fact creating a failure and this government's policies are crash landing. If this government's deregulation policies on the airlines continue and we do not have some kind of regulation, the only thing flying over Canadian airspace is going to be Canadian geese.

It is the workers of Canada who are paying the price for this government's failed policies and now we have a projected 6,000 more job losses in the airline industry.

What adjustment programs will this government bring in for the workers who have lost their jobs as a direct result of the failed policies of this government and their families?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if the NDP leader is so much against the merger that took place, she could have used her good services over the past couple days to convince Bob White and his union to contribute to the plan proposed by the employees to make sure that two airlines would continue to exist in Canada.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, it is clear the minister does not want to deal with questions about the effects of the deregulation program and will not deal with the loss of jobs to Canadians and the projected 6,000 job losses.

I would like to say to the Deputy Prime Minister that deregulation has been bad for the economy. Bad trade deals have lost 360,000 manufacturing jobs in this country. We are about to lose another 6,000 projected airline worker jobs.

It is clear that from coast to coast Canadians are suffering from the policies of this government. There is one thing this government could do right now to begin to reverse that trend, and that is say no to the NAFTA deal.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister do the right thing for Canadians and say no to the NAFTA deal?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Western Centre for Economic Research reports that the merger between Air Canada and Canadian Airlines will result in the loss of over 4,000 jobs in western Canada and a substantial loss of services. This means the loss in western Canada will be disproportionate in terms of the entire country.

My question is for the Minister of Transport. When will the government take its responsibility to govern and give assurances that the airline industry in western Canada will be maintained and that there will be proper, effective, accessible services to the people of western Canada in our airline industry?

• (1430)

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we are hearing the usual gloom and doom hypothesis of the Liberal Party. The airlines have indicated that they are going to enter into a merger elaboration of the transaction. When the transaction is completed we will know exactly what will happen. They have committed themselves to maintaining as many jobs as possible.

It was known by everyone in the country that there were too many people employed in the airline industry compared to every other criteria used by airline industries throughout the world.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to provide one correction for the minister. The problem in Canada is not that there are too many jobs. There are too few jobs and everyone knows that.

I want to ask the minister this very specific question. Under the Air Canada Privatization Act clear guarantees were given for the continuation of a maintenance base in Winnipeg and the computer centre and other maintenance services across Canada.

Will this government say today that it will stand by that guarantee and ensure those important facilities in western Canada will be maintained?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Again, Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind people that I never said there were too many jobs in this country. I said that because of the over capacity in the two Canadian airlines, there were too many people for the jobs available and this has caused them great problems.

As far as the law of Air Canada as well as the law that created PWA by the Alberta legislature, we have said and the Alberta government has said that they do not intend to change the content of these two pieces of legislation.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, it is a very bleak day for people in many parts of Canada because of the job losses that are inevitably going to result from the takeover of Canadian Airlines by Air Canada. Another vital institution to western Canadians is being gutted with the complicity of this government.

My question is for the Minister of Transport. The Air Canada president said on September 2 that the proposed joint holding company "will strive to ensure the equal and fair treatment of employees and to minimize job losses in each region".

Does the minister actually believe that the new CEO of Air Canada, who has probably never been west of Chicago, will really care about the jobs of British Columbians and Albertans in this matter?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I certainly have no intention of undermining the credibility of the chief operating officer of a respectable company.

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member puts a supplementary question, I wonder if I could just point out to hon. members that the question as phrased was very marginal indeed and I am not at all sure that the minister needed to answer.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, if the minister thinks that his government can wash its hands of this deal, he is sadly mistaken.

It was his government which blocked loan guarantees to Canadian Airlines and did not have a five cent piece to assist the employees to try to rescue this plan. Now as many as 10,000 people can lose their jobs as a result of this takeover.

My question is for the same minister. He has a clear obligation to ensure the livelihoods and careers of people who will lose their jobs. What is he going to tell this House about it today?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, to demonstrate how the member opposite is completely wrong, here is an excerpt from Mr. Rhys Eyton yesterday at his press conference: "The federal government was there all the way". The only government that got involved in this to make sure that Canadian would have all the time to examine all their options was the Canadian government. All other governments turned them down.

NORTHERN TELECOM

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my question is for whoever is answering for the Minister for International Trade.

Recently Northern Telecom, perhaps Canada's high-tech jewel, announced that it is moving 36 jobs from its Saskatoon production plant to its factory in Mexico. The company says that these are lower-skilled, assembly-type jobs and moving them to Mexico "makes a lot of sense to us".

While this action may make sense to Northern Telecom concerned only with its bottom line, and perhaps the 36 people involved may be only small potatoes to the Prime Minister, this does not make sense to hard working Canadians who have lost their jobs.

When will the government start realizing that the future and family of 36 workers in Saskatoon are more important than his discredited fantasies of free trade prosperity?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, there are a few facts that the hon. member overlooked mentioning to the House of Commons. The first is that it is the intention of Northern Telecom to invest some $5 million in the Saskatoon plant to increase its fibreoptics manufacturing capability. This will result in new employment opportunities.

Second, as a result of NAFTA, we will have access to a market in Mexico estimated at $10 billion with the result of the creation of jobs in Canada.

I invite the hon. member to send a message throughout Northern Telecom to say that he wants those jobs lost. He does not want those sales possibilities to Mexico.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, the investment that the minister mentions will create only ten jobs in Saskatoon. Thirty-six jobs will be lost and ten jobs will be created. If we carry on like that, nobody is going to be working in this country.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

An hon. member: Some logic.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Perhaps I could ask one simple question of the minister which is not dealt with in the government's propaganda which is presently being circulated to Canadians at taxpayers' expense.

What are the government's projections for the number of Canadian jobs which will be lost to Mexico over the next five years? Would you at least tell Canadians how many of them will have to pay for this government's disastrous economic policies?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says that if what is happening in the telecom industry in terms of sales to Mexico continues nobody will be working in this country.

Our telecom industry is making millions and millions of dollars of sales to Mexico with the creation of thousands of jobs in Canada.

The potential in coming years for growth in telecom jobs in this country is enormous. If the NDP is opposed to creating those jobs let them say so. For our part, we want those jobs for Canadian workers.

COMPETITION POLICY

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

More than any other minister in this House this minister has the responsibility for representing the interests of Canadian consumers at the cabinet table when issues of public importance are being decided.

Now that we see the results of this government's destructive air transportation policy, Canadians demand to know where his voice was. Why did he on their behalf agree to a transportation policy that may very well result in an unregulated monopoly in the air, higher prices and poorer services for Canadian consumers?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, my colleague is well aware that we have in Canada a competition policy as well as a Bureau of Competition and a Competition Tribunal. These mechanisms are there so that we may keep an eye on mergers, relocations, expansions or acquisitions purchased abroad. The hon. member is well aware of that. I can also tell the House that the director of the Bureau of Competition, under section 9 of the Competition Act, has already begun to look at this situation.

My colleague will certainly agree that the two parties have simply announced their intention to merge. As soon as the papers are filed and the merger has occurred it will be examined closely by the Bureau of Competition, which is completely independent from the government. The bureau is free to take any action, to make recommendations to both parties and even, if necessary, to go to the Competition Tribunal which can then intervene. I truly believe that Canadian consumers and competition generally are very well protected.

[English]

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, the Competition Bureau is the responsibility of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

During testimony before a House committee in September on this very issue the chair of the Competition Bureau gave every indication that a merger between these two national airlines would have great difficulty in being approved by that bureau.

The question I want to ask the minister is this. Will he give this House and the public his assurance today that neither he, his officials nor members of this government will interfere in any way, shape or form with the examination of this merger proposal by the Bureau of Competition Policy?

• (1440)

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention whatsoever of interfering with the responsibilities of the Director of the Bureau of Competition.

I can assure my colleague and all members of this House that we should let those people do their jobs, make a full assessment of the proposal and make their decision. That is the way it is and that is how I will let them do their job.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, let us call this deal for what it is. This merger was a conspiracy between the Conservative government in Ottawa, provincial NDP governments and Bob White. That is exactly what it was.

I can understand the total embarrassment of the Deputy Prime Minister not wanting to rise to his feet. After all, it was he who said back on July 16, 1985 that the government would monitor the effects of regulatory change on the employees and respond to any adverse consequences as humanly as possible. He promised to assist those who might suffer severe economic dislocation under the regulatory system.

Now that this tentative merger has been negotiated, what is the Deputy Prime Minister prepared to do in order to halt the loss of the 6,000 to 10,000 jobs in this country?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said many false things in his speech before asking his question, but I only want to address one. He said that a deal has been completed. He is completely wrong.

It is in all the news media that they have agreed in principle to a merger. A committee will be formed to determine what the conditions will be of the merger. Both companies have indicated that they will do their utmost to reduce as much as possible the burden of job losses.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, let us ask the government to think ahead a little bit.

An hon. member: Don't ask the impossible.

Mr. Keyes: Since it is a given fact that Air Canada and Canadian Airlines control most regional air carriers, I want to ask the Minister of Transport what he is going to do to ensure the viability of the smaller carriers and their employees and to ensure that the high levels of service and competition between regional centres such as Hamilton, London, Windsor, et cetera, continue?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, over the past years the aviation industry has served all corners of Canada. There are a number of small airline companies that are servicing different parts of this country.

The question of competition, as we have repeated many times, is going to be examined by the Competition Bureau and it will make its recommendations after it examines a deal that has yet to be completed.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

In his interesting and constructive speech yesterday, which was very general and certainly did not paint broad strokes, there was little detail. Since this matter is not going to a parliamentary committee and the education process for Canadians has to start somewhere, could the minister answer this question to clarify a lot of confusion? How many aboriginal self-government units are we talking about in the package and is the law for that self-government to be paramount or subordinate or equal to the federal and provincial laws?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as is clear in the agreement, what is proposed is that aboriginal self-government will after the adoption of this proposal be one of three orders of government in the country.

As a result of intensive negotiations at Charlottetown and concerns that have been expressed by several governments, there was an agreement on the part of the aboriginal people as to the sequence by which aboriginal law would come into place. There was an agreement that aboriginal law would always be within the context of Canada and would be subject to arrangements which are essential to peace, order and good government.

While I am on my feet, and I know there is a concern about legal text, I simply want to correct an impression that was left by the Reform member yesterday who will not be here to vote tonight. I am sure she was acting inadvertently.

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. I do not think it is proper to be commenting upon whether a member was here or is here.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the answer of the minister as far as it went. Could he tell Canadians with some certainty how many self-government units we are talking about? Where does the charter of rights apply in this matter?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give a precise number today just as I could not offhand give an indication of the number of status Indian bands there are in the country, or the number of aboriginal communities such as Métis communities, for example, that there are in the community.

What I can say is that when we speak at the national level about a third order of government we are talking about a very limited number of people who would take their place in time at the constitutional table.

The proposals that have been brought forward after, I must say, extensive public hearing including by committees in this House, will allow status Indians who are now governed by an Indian Act enacted in colonial times to assume more rights and more responsibilities for themselves.

It will allow Métis people, who have been the forgotten aboriginal people in Canada for generations, to have greater control over their own destiny in Canada. It will allow urban aboriginals, who in very many cases are the victims of the most cruel personal injustice inflicted upon aboriginal people in the country, to be given some capacity to exercise more control over their own lives.

It does involve to some degree some faith on the part of the rest of us in giving effect to this agreement. It also involves a recognition that the system that we have now is dead wrong and has to be changed.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Weather conditions across the prairies are having a severe impact on the quality and harvestability of crops in that region of the country. Already Alberta, including the minister's own riding, and Saskatchewan have suffered huge losses and Manitoba's crop is very vulnerable.

Not only is the weather reducing the amount and quality of the harvest, but the recent addition of $1 billion to the Export Enhancement Program by the U.S. will further drive down the prices on the crop that is realized.

Does the government have any plans to financially assist those areas that need it? If so, what are those plans?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

It is a very urgent situation. I am advised by my colleague the Minister of Agriculture that an assessment is currently being undertaken of the crop damage. I think the hon. member knows that there are a number of programs available such as crop insurance, GRIP and NISA, which hopefully will offset any losses that may occur.

I can assure the hon. member that it is being monitored and assessed very closely. Working with the provincial departments of agriculture, we will certainly respond if there is a necessity or a need to respond.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that answer.

In a normal year 75 per cent of the crop in fact would be in the bin. However, this year only something like 6 per cent has been harvested. This is the type of prairie disaster for which a third line of defence payment was originally designed.

In the U.S. George Bush is making disaster relief payments available to farmers in areas that are affected by weather, including North Dakota. Will this government admit that farms in rural communities throughout the west are facing an economic disaster of monumental proportions? Will it commit itself to providing economic assistance under the third line of defence?

I remind the minister that some crops such as alfalfa are not covered under any program.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that a preliminary assessment shows that up to $500 million could be provided under the crop insurance program and well in excess of $1 billion under GRIP.

To suggest that there are no protective programs or safety net programs in place is wrong. These programs are in place. If the losses are there they will clearly be triggered for that amount, which is not a very small amount I must say.

RAILWAY PASSENGER SERVICE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. After so many studies on railway passenger service in remote regions of Quebec, has it been decided to maintain and improve the VIA Rail service from Montreal to Clova, Senneterre, Barraute, Amos, Taschereau and La Sarre in 1993 through to the year 2000?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Abitibi will agree that VIA Rail recently showed how well it could adjust to the new realities of rail transport in the Gaspé region by renewing its transportation methods and material.

As for the other remote areas I would like to be able to give an immediate answer to the hon. member, but we are now completing a very detailed study on this very matter. We shall shortly be able to suggest solutions to the problem so that Canadians can enjoy reliable and safe railway transport services throughout Canada.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mrs. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. As the minister knows, northerners fly four times as often as people in the south. Air travel is not a luxurious option. It is our lifeline in most cases.

Will the minister please explain how he plans to maintain and implement airline competition in the north? For instance, what will be the impact on the Inuit-owned First Air, an independent airline that competes in the north with Canadian Airlines through an alliance with Air Canada?

An hon. member: Good question.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I was able myself these last few months to note the efficiency of the transport service provided by the Cree line. I can assure the hon. member that under present circumstances there is no reason why this airline should not continue to provide the same quality of service to its users.

[English]

Mrs. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, it is quite obvious that this minister does not communicate with the head of that particular independent airline, Mr. Creighton. He would have quite a different thing to say about it.

My supplementary question is for the same minister. It is only a matter of time before the new merger forces increased fares, fewer flights to remote communities such as in the Northwest Territories and the streamlining of jobs. In fact, for our really depressed economy in the north it will be a colossal loss of jobs. The north's already fragile economy cannot withstand another devastating blow. Will the minister promise northerners they will not suffer from another increased cost of living, increased isolation and a decreased standard of living?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): I would like to inform the hon. member that I have met on occasion the president of the Cree line and again I will tell her that the deal has not been completed. We do not know what will be the conditions of that merger situation between the two airlines. I repeat that I do not see any reason why the quality of service and the price offered in the north would be changed as a result of that merger.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, my question deals with the same subject. It is obvious from both sides of the House that we have a very grave concern in this proposed merger.

First of all, I am convinced and committed to the logistics of a competitive, viable Canadian aviation industry. Given this turmoil that has been before us, I am convinced that the employees must certainly be facing a period of uncertainty.

I would like to ask the minister, though, given all this turmoil and given the fact that we are involved in the U.S.–Canada air bilateral air transportation agreement, has the federal government considered it wise to suspend these negotiations, or what is the status of them?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to underline the excellent work of the hon. member two years ago on the committee in charge of examining a bilateral agreement with the United States. We entered these negotiations because we wanted Canadian airlines to have better penetration on the American market. Far from wanting to slow down these negotiations which should be very useful, we shall be intensifying our efforts to ensure that Canadian airlines will be better able to penetrate the American market and increase their profitability.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, in March the Minister of Transport invited proposals for the privatization of terminals 1 and 2 at Toronto's Pearson airport. The government's announcement was based on the assumption of the continuation of two domestic airlines. Now, six months later, we are to see the merger of the two airlines into one.

Does the minister intend to accept the original proposals which were based on the two airline system or does he intend to ask those bidding to accept the major losses that would be involved in submitting new proposals?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, contrary to the assumption of the hon. member, our assumptions were not based on the number of airlines. They were based on the number of passengers.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows perfectly well that those assumptions based on the number of passengers necessarily involved two domestic airlines. He knows that and there is no point in him trying to duck the issue.

Let me ask him this. In light of the statement and indeed of the fact that today we are going to see the merger of the two airlines, does he stand by his earlier promise made in this House: "that the privatization of terminals 1 and 2 will create 3,200 jobs for the people in the Toronto area for five years"?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, again I would say to the hon. member no. In fact the assumptions were not based on the number of carriers. They were based on the number of passengers.

We based our projection of passengers on a 2.3 per cent increase annually. The Association of Air Transport Companies recently indicated that its prediction is a 5 per cent increase, and yes, I maintain what I said earlier in the House.

OLD GOVERNMENT HOUSE

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works.

One of the great symbols of Canada's history is Old Government House in my riding of Fredericton—York—Sunbury. This magnificent property reflects the proud traditions of all three of our founding cultures, native, French and English and was the site of some of the early meetings which led to Confederation more than 125 years ago.

Today, as the minister knows, these premises are in a state of serious disrepair and a restoration plan for its long range future has been adopted by all three levels of government.

I want to ask the minister what progress and consideration has been given to the proposal which was presented to him for a partnership funding of this restoration.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, as members know, my colleague has been a very eloquent proponent of this project. Our government has already made a financial contribution in this regard.

I will take his question as a representation and point out to him that it will require some co-operation from the province of New Brunswick at a time when considerable capital expenditure will be required to complete this project. We will look at it carefully and if possible we will see what we can do.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Of the helicopters purchased by the government, 35 are supposed to be used on the new frigates and the destroyers that are being refurbished at great expense to the Canadian taxpayer.

When the Minister of Finance approved the purchase, was he aware that the helicopters are too wide to fit on the frigates and too heavy to land on either the frigates or the destroyers?

• (1500)

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be helpful if my hon. colleague actually checked his facts. He is incorrect in the facts he has put before the House.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the minister may be aware that today the government is spending $5 million on consultants to figure out if the ships are compatible with the helicopters.

Why did the government, before it set out on this purchase, not simply invest $2.89 plus GST on a ruler?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, in the spirit of jest of my hon. colleague, I would just like to reconfirm to him that we are well aware that the helicopters will indeed fit on our new frigates, which are the most modern state of the art ships almost in the world and are our top ships. Some minor adjustment which will be required—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Collins: No, no, let me finish—for any new equipment, not for the weight and not for the width but just to ensure that they will fit within all of the factors on our new ships. Nothing major, I can assure you. We do not use rulers any longer; we tend to use computers.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if I could advise hon. members that there has been some discussion among members about a matter which I know the House will want to deal with this afternoon, a tribute to one of our deceased colleagues. But I will accede to the request of the hon. House Leader of the Official Opposition and take the usual Thursday afternoon question which will be followed by tributes, and then I will be hearing a question of order from another hon. member.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the government House Leader. Would he indicate to the House and to its members the business for Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, as well as the remaining days of next week in terms of government business.

While the minister is on his feet, could he also indicate to the House whether or not he anticipates any new economic measures will be introduced next week to deal with the terrible situation confronting the Canadian economy at the present time?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I think the second half of that question might have been more appropriately put during Question Period. Of course, with the OECD and the IMF predicting that Canada will lead the world in 1993, I think most countries of the world are looking to what we have done to see how they might emulate it.

As to the question on House business, when we return on Monday I will be calling Bill C-80 with the intention that it be finished at report stage and third reading next week in order that we would be able to commence cheques flowing to children in need effective January 1, 1993.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Andre: Judging by the clamour on the other side, Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member could use this long weekend to read the bill and determine that I am accurate in my description of its intent.

I am still having discussions with colleagues, but it would also be my hope that we would consider having second reading on the extension of the Patent Act since there are a lot of research investment decisions and a lot of scientists in this country anxious to see that commitment followed up on. I will have to get back to the hon. member in terms of that.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my hon. friend the government House leader. As we leave shortly to participate in the unity campaign we recall one or two announcements that the government made recently that many of us thought were not necessarily helpful in the unity campaign.

I wonder if the government House leader could give us an undertaking that during the six-week referendum campaign that government announcements about major products and so on would be made with some sensitivity to the campaign under way?

Mr. Andre: Obviously all government announcements are intended to have a positive effect. The House leader of the Liberal Party just asked for a kind of budget next week and the House leader of the New Democratic Party asked for silence I gather next week and beyond. We will try to balance these two different points of view and bear in mind what the hon. member says.

Seriously, we certainly do appreciate that. I would expect that all members on this side, as well as all members on that side, will recognize that for the next few weeks leading up to October 26 we have at issue something far more important than a partisan game for any of us and that we will all bear that in mind in terms of our public utterances.

Mr. Speaker: I now ask the House to contribute to tributes to a former member of this place and a former colleague, the Hon. Pauline Jewett.

THE LATE PAULINE JEWETT

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise in tribute today to a very special woman, a very extraordinary member of Parliament and a passionate Canadian, Pauline Jewett.

Before I begin I would like to mention that the member for New Westminster—Burnaby who replaced Pauline Jewett, who worked for Pauline Jewett for many years, is not able to be here as there was a memorial service last night in Vancouver for Pauline and she sends her regrets for being unable to return in time today.

Pauline Jewett had a remarkable career as a professor, as the first woman to become president of a Canadian university, a university chancellor and a member of Parliament. Pauline was a fighter who took on the struggle for social justice and never let it go. She was a pioneer who opened doors that had for far too long been closed to women. The changes that she helped to make still echo today both through the halls of higher learning and on the floor of this House of Commons.

One of the changes she made of course was moving from the Liberal to the New Democratic Party, an example of her great wisdom and an example I know that all members of this House will agree is sure to be followed by millions of Canadians in the years ahead.

Pauline Jewett was indeed a woman of great vision. She had a vision of a world free from nuclear threat where common security and international development took the place of arms races and poverty. She saw in Canada a country that could embrace all its peoples and in particular the people of Quebec.

[Translation]

Pauline firmly believed that the Constitution should be renewed. Almost every time I spoke to her during her last months, she wanted to talk about the Constitution: every new development, every new turn in the debate, every new information. She wanted to know everything, to hear everything. She was a fanatic about the Constitution because she was a fanatic about her country.

She never relented in her struggle for equality. She stood up to everyone. She gave in to nobody, neither to the administration of Simon Fraser University nor to four prime ministers of Canada.

[English]

Sometimes Pauline Jewett won her struggles and sometimes she knew victory would have to wait for a little while, but she never gave up. Perhaps the greatest of her struggles was with the disease that eventually claimed her life. Despite the pain of that last fight, she faced it with humour, courage and dignity.

In many ways, if I may allow a personal note, I learned more from Pauline in those final months than I will learn from many of the fine speeches made in Parliament.

With Pauline's passing my party has lost one of our most passionate and dedicated voices. Canada has lost one of our real heroes, but Pauline Jewett's spirit will live on in our work for fairness and equality, for the healing of our country's divisions and for a world that rejects mass destruction and embraces peace and justice for all.

Canada will miss Pauline Jewett. Her party will miss her. She is a great loss to us all.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I rise too with my colleagues to pay tribute to our former colleague, Pauline Jewett, whose death this summer has really saddened us all.

Pauline was a very special person. She was a trail blazer in so many different fields. She was a woman who never feared to speak her mind and she was never consumed by blind partisanship. I think that is one of the reasons she had so many friends on all sides of this House and I know the deepest respect of the Prime Minister.

She served in this House for two different periods. Of course the first one was as a Liberal and then later as an NDP, the period when I got to know her.

• (1510)

However, that was not her only contribution to Canada. We all know of Pauline's outstanding work, particularly her presidency of Simon Fraser University. She was the first woman to hold the presidency of a major Canadian university. She was indeed a trail-blazer during those years. She refused to be daunted by the sometimes sexist comments or arrangements that existed. She broke down so many barriers for women.

She was a founder and president of the Canadian Research Foundation for the Advancement of Women. She was on the forefront in all areas for the advancement of equality of women, not only by what she said but by what she did. It was for those reasons that she was indeed a role model and a mentor for so many others.

Pauline will certainly play a very major role in the history of this country and she will go down in the history books. As the leader of the NDP has said, she loved this country with such a great sense of passion. She understood its diversity and its uniqueness. She lived in many parts of the country. She cared deeply about international issues, the arms race and the fundamental equality of all persons.

I had many opportunities to meet with Pauline as friends, and we spent some time on trips together. Her contribution was very special. I was so pleased when that contribution was recognized, not only with an Order of Canada but by being made a member of the Privy Council in the last days of her life, an honour that she so richly deserved.

She would show strength and determination throughout all her life but perhaps none more than during those last months when she was faced with her illness.

Pauline was an example to us all. We are very much the lesser by her passing. I would ask that we all be left with her legacy, which is the empowerment of all of us in public life, to reflect on her spirit, her decency and her determination to achieve fairness for all persons. Her life has left us richer and in a better country.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to speak in honour of the life of a distinguished member of Parliament, an officer of the Order of Canada and a member of the Privy Council of Canada, Pauline Jewett.

Although Ms. Jewett spent most of her years in this House as a member of the NDP caucus she began her House of Commons career in 1963 as the elected Liberal member for my riding of Northumberland. Although she was born in St. Catharines, Ontario, she felt a kinship for the village of Brighton in my riding where several of her relatives lived.

As relayed to me by constituents, Pauline was a very self-directed person, bright yet very personable, and an inspiration to many. She determined to seek the Liberal nomination in Northumberland and to this day she is remembered fondly in Northumberland by many of all political stripes.

Pauline not only made her mark in Northumberland but across Canada. As a member of the NDP caucus she held critic portfolios in external affairs, arms control and disarmament, post-secondary education and federal-provincial relations, among others. Pauline was also a very strong advocate of women's issues and rights and we owe her much for advancing women's legitimate role in Canadian society.

Pauline Jewett was the first female elected as a member of Parliament for the riding of Northumberland and certainly broke important ground for me as a female successor some 25 years later. It was not an insignificant feat to become a female member in the rural conservative riding of Northumberland in 1963.

We remember Pauline Jewett for her many contributions to Canada, especially to post-secondary education. I personally remember her vividly and fondly for the phone call of congratulations I received from Pauline shortly after my election. She spoke affectionately of her former riding of Northumberland and with pleasure that once again a woman held that seat.

As she maintained a special affection for Northumberland, so many constituents remember Pauline Jewett with a similar affection and with respect for her many accomplishments.

We are the richer for her contributions.

May her family and friends be healed of the sorrow of her loss with the memory of the important contributions that Pauline Jewett made to Canadian society.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join in this tribute to Pauline Jewett.

Both the member for Yukon and the member for Northumberland referred to her previous career both in the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party. The member for Yukon mentioned her both as a politician and as a professor.

I first knew her as my professor when I was at Carleton University. She was my supervisor when I was doing my thesis essay. Through that experience I came to know much about her commitment to issues, public life, and public policy formation.

The thesis that I was working on concerned the role of public opinion in Canada, its formation and its influence on Parliament and public policy making. Certainly a lot that I came to understand about that, which subsequently gave rise to things like my initiative here with a referendum on a plebiscite bill, goes back to some lessons that were learned with Pauline Jewett out at the Rideau River campus of Carleton University in the early and mid-1960s.

In concluding, I would like mention the song of another woman from British Columbia, Ann Mortifee. In one of her lyrics she talks about the fact that life is not confined by time. Pauline Jewett in her experience andlife voyage has shown us that. She has also shown us that political commitment is not confined by party or by party boundaries.

More important than party boundaries is a commitment to fundamental principles. That was the hallmark of her career throughout. It is fitting that these tributes are being paid to her at a time when in the House of Commons, which she served so nobly for so many years, we are setting aside party differences to concentrate on something fundamental like the formation of Canadian public opinion about our country and its future.

In a broad sense that is a way that all of us as parliamentarians through our words and actions in this place today are paying tribute to what Pauline Jewett stood for.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words about the late Pauline Jewett.

I had a chance to get to know her and work closely with her for a number of years. I regarded her as a close personal friend, as I know many other members did. She was a great Canadian who made a great contribution to this country and had a very distinguished public career. She was also a very warm individual, a very outgoing and friendly human being. She touched and moved thousands of people whom she came in contact with over her lifetime.

I know all members of this House join in paying tribute to the contribution she made to this country and the impact that she had on our lives and those of so many others in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: I want to express my thanks to hon. members for the comments that have been made. Perhaps I can also observe that I knew our former colleague very well, especially during her years in British Columbia.

POINT OF ORDER

STANDING COMMITTEE ON ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, my point of order concerns the failure of the minister of Indian affairs to comply with Standing Order 109.

Point of Order

That Standing Order requires the government to respond to a report of a standing or special committee within 150 days, if the committee requests such a response at the time the report is tabled in the House.

On February 13, 1992, at page 6919 of Hansard, the chairman of the Select Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs tabled the second report of the committee relating to the Arctic exiles of Grise Fiord on Ellesmere Island.

The chairman made the request, pursuant to section 109, that the government table a comprehensive response within 150 days. I have checked with the minister's office and with the Journals Branch. To my count 210 days have now passed and the government is seriously in violation of Standing Order 109. The minister is saying that he refuses to meet with the Grise Fiord people until the report is tabled in the House and on the other hand he refuses to table the report in the House, contrary to the Standing Orders.

I would urge you, Mr. Speaker, to investigate this matter and to take whatever action is necessary to ensure that the government respects the Standing Orders of Parliament.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I had not had any knowledge of this particular issue. I will certainly take it under immediate advisement and endeavour to get back to my friend at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members know that under the particular rule which has been raised by the hon. member for Comox—Alberni there is no sanction that the Speaker can apply. In these matters I am dependent upon the goodwill of ministers and the government to do everything they can to comply with the Standing Order.

I note that the hon. parliamentary secretary has answered for the government and I would hope that that would resolve the problem. I thank the hon. parliamentary secretary.

THE CONSTITUTION

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Clark (Yellowhead) (pp. 12785-6).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte for seven minutes.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, to begin I will pick up where I left off on Tuesday, September 8. Under Standing Order 31 I did have a few comments on the national referendum.

In my comments on Tuesday afternoon I pointed out that the question we will be facing as Canadians on October 26 will be very simple and very straightforward. At that time, not knowing exactly what the question would be, I suggested it might be as follows: "Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached August 28, 1992? Yes or No". That will in fact be the question we will be addressing on October 26. Canadians will have to decide if the answer is yes or no.

One of the things I pointed out in my comments was that although the question itself is simple and straightforward, the constitutional package that we will in fact be voting on is rather complex. There will be many Canadians, in fact there are many Canadians today, asking what is in that package and wondering if they will know on October 26 exactly what they are voting on.

This will be the first time in 50 years that Canadians have had a chance to express themselves through a national referendum. That question concerning whether they will know is a very important one. That is where we as members of Parliament come in. Many of us in the last couple of days in the House have taken the opportunity to step through the package and attempt to explain in our own way what we see in it.

That is what we will have to do back in our constituencies as well. That is what I am committing myself to do back in my home riding of Carleton—Charlotte. In other ridings around the country if I am invited to speak I will.

This is really a follow-up to a consultation process. We are going back almost two years, spending at least 17 months on this whole process of constitutional renewal. We all know what has happened in the last couple of years.

As suggested this morning by, I believe it was the hon member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, after the collapse of Meech Lake he said that the message was to go to another lake. As he suggested, and I suggest, they did that. The Canadian people did. We have done it together. We have moved on from that and we have gone through a very lengthy consultative process.

We have gone through the various committees and the Spicer commission. Provincial governments have done the same thing. Individual members of Parliament have gone back to their constituencies and have carried that process forward as well, wanting to know the views of individual Canadians on the Constitution.

I did that as a member of Parliament in Carleton—Charlotte. We had 20 such meetings in my constituency. We started out late last fall and into the early winter months. I had a chance to hear what my constituents thought. It was a very helpful and healthy process.

The logical conclusion to this is for members of Parliament to get out into their constituencies and explain the proposals. Much of what we discussed in those late autumn days of 1991 and early winter months of 1992 are in these proposals and that is very refreshing.

Obviously much has been left out and there is some in there we do not agree with, but it will be up to me and others who will join me to explain what is in there so when our constituents from coast to coast go out on October 26 they will have a real sense of what they are voting for. That is the challenge for me and other members here.

It is refreshing to see we are going to do this on a non-partisan basis. In those constitutional meetings I had late last fall and early last winter I invited our provincial members of the legislature to join me in those discussions. They did for the most part, as did mayors and councillors from the municipalities and ordinary folk. They did that. They responded well.

We are going to carry that process forward in the rural riding of Carleton—Charlotte. Many have already accepted the invitation to join me in explaining the package to the people of Carleton—Charlotte and indeed, the people of Canada. It is important that we understand this package when we go out to vote on it.

I want to quote from an article by Peter Newman in the September 14, 1992 issue of Maclean's magazine. I think he sums it up best when he says: "The real issue of the October 26 referendum is deciding whether we have a future, not the shape of what the future will be". It goes on and concludes by saying: "Maybe the 20th century never really did belong to us. But if we do not as a country vote yes on October 26, we will not belong to the 21st century".

I do not think any of us could put it any better. It is incumbent upon us to get out there, work through this process, bring it to its logical conclusion. The logical conclusion of this very consultative process is to support a united and strong Canada that will lead us into the 21st century. If we can do that, maybe we will preserve this nation for at least another 125 years.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by thanking the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan for sharing his time with me. It was very gracious of him and I will try to use the time wisely.

October 26 is a very important day for Canada. We have gone through endless discussions on the Constitution over the last number of years. At one point during the infamous Meech Lake talks it looked as if Canada was going to have a resolution of this, at least for the time being. However, for various reasons that did not come about. Over the last couple of years a number of lessons were learned from the failure of Meech Lake. As a result, Canada is now looking at substantial improvements on that agreement.

One of the lessons we learned goes to the heart of the referendum before the House today in which the people will be participating on October 26. That is it is critically important that the public of Canada be allowed into the process of Constitution making. It was simply unsatisfactory for constitutions to be dealt with exclusively by first ministers behind closed doors. We have now had an unprecedented public process which has brought us to where we are today.

We had the Spicer commission and the citizens' forums across Canada. Despite the cynicism, thousands of Canadians participated in those sessions. That produced a beginning of a change in the atmosphere which had been so poisoned by the failure of Meech Lake. This was followed by parliamentary committees which heard over 3,000 presentations and then decisions in this House as to the position we would take to the legislatures and across the country.

This summer first ministers spent hours working to come up with a package, an agreement which can be put to the people of Canada. Now, for the first time in our history, Canadians as individuals will vote on constitutional amendments that will eventually come back before this Parliament and the legislatures.

The final stage will come after the referendum takes place on October 26. That is the ratification of the decision of the voters on this constitutional measure. When that happens we can then turn our full attention to the other critical issues that face this country, jobs, the environment, the free trade agreement with Mexico, and so on. This is a very important process we are undertaking and it is a very important date for Canadians.

My experience in Victoria has been that most of the people I talked with until now have left the detailed discussions to those who have been involved. Therefore, there is yet to be detailed understanding and knowledge about what is in this agreement. There is an initial scepticism born from long experience that the system can produce anything of value. In that atmosphere there are voices already passing out myths about what is in this agreement.

It is said, for example, that Quebec has too much. It is said in British Columbia that British Columbia has too little. As well, it is said that this agreement seriously weakens the capacity of the federal government to provide the necessary leadership on national programs.

I have had a chance to review the agreement and I look forward to assisting my constituents in reviewing it carefully. Let me say the highlights in this agreement offer a real opportunity for Canadians to come together in a common understanding of our purpose as a country and to reform substantially the systems by which we govern ourselves.

This agreement provides for a renewed Canada clause, a new clause in the Constitution which sets out the fundamental characteristics of Canada. Not only does it include as it did at the time of Meech Lake a clear statement, an entirely justifiable statement that Quebec constitutes a distinct society within Canada which includes a French speaking majority, a unique culture and a civil law tradition it also acknowledges the commitment of this country to parliamentary and federal democracy, to the aboriginal people and the critical role they have played and the need to recognize their institutions and the integrity of their societies. It acknowledges the multicultural communities and goes on to acknowledge as well the individual and collective rights of Canadians.

The agreement provides for a social and economic union. It spells out the commitments of government not only to such things as the health care system, but also to free collective bargaining and to the rights of workers in this country.

The agreement deals with major reforms of our parliamentary institutions and these are very important gains. Above all, the agreement finally offers to our aboriginal people the fundamental rights to which they have been entitled within our Confederation and which so far have been denied them.

This is a very important agreement. I look forward to sharing the details with my constituents over the next few weeks and to working with those of whatever persuasion to see if this cannot be an important, clear and rational debate within our community.

Let me close by referring to a speech made in 1874 by the hon. Edward Blake. I am grateful to Hilda Judd of Calgary for providing this to me. My friends indicate he was a Liberal then and I knew that. But since then the New Democratic Party has come on the stage and I am sure he would have been particularly interested in what we have to offer. But all of us share the sentiment that he then offered when he said:

> The future of Canada, I believe, depends very largely upon the cultivation of a national spirit. We are engaged in a very difficult task—the task of welding together seven provinces—

That was said in Aurora in 1874. Since then we have gained three provinces and we have the territories and our aboriginal peoples. The issue remains today. We are building a nation and we are building a federal nation. It is an important task we set on today. I commend this agreement to the people of Victoria and to the people of Canada.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, recently a letter to the editor in The Nanaimo Daily Free Press quoted someone making the observation that there are people in Quebec who think they can get along very well without the rest of Canada and there are people in the rest of Canada who think that they can get along very well without the people of Quebec. The people would survive. I believe we would all be worse off but, whatever, we would not be Canadians. It would not be the Canada into which I was born and not the Canada into which you were born, Mr. Speaker, and not the Canada in which I have lived all of my life and expect to live the rest of my life.

I am very proud to live in Canada. I am very proud to be a Canadian. I am very proud that people know I am a Canadian when I travel. That is the kind of Canada I want to remember. That is the kind of Canada I want to continue. For that reason I am supporting this referendum. I will be voting in favour of it.

I am sorry there are people who feel otherwise. They have the right to their opinion. In my opinion, they have the right to be wrong. I could not help but agree totally with my hon. colleague, the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, when he took issue with those who, for political advantage, are attacking the government leadership in the province of British Columbia.

The premier of British Columbia was one of the 16 at the table bargaining, giving and taking, on behalf of Canada as a whole. To try to destroy that person is to try to destroy the referendum result in British Columbia. What would be the result? How would we interpret it if, when the referendum ballots are cast and counted, we find that British Columbia has voted against accepting that referendum? I think that would be a very bad situation for Canada and very bad for British Columbia. Trying to destroy that premier for partisan political advantage, as important as that may be to some of us, is doing a disservice to British Columbia and a disservice to Canada as a whole.

I must separate from the group of government backbenchers, the hon. member for Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, because of the way he spoke in the House today. He blasted critics of Premier Harcourt. He knows that in blasting Premier Harcourt what they are trying to do, without saying so, without admitting it, without having the intestinal fortitude to come here and say it, is saying they really do not like it and they want the referendum to be defeated although they do not have the nerve to stand up in the House and vote against it.

• (1540)

I intend to do what I can to see that a Canada Yes Committee is established in my riding. I intend to do as much as I can to see that it will be widely representative of the people of that constituency. I intend to make myself available to that committee, to speak anywhere and everywhere in the riding where I am invited so that I can tell people how I feel about Canada, about how I feel about the referendum.

I was never so proud of a cabinet minister as I was when the minister of labour, the Hon. Moe Sihota, spoke at a public meeting in my riding a couple of months ago. In speaking about the Constitution he said that "there is no single issue which of itself is important enough that we should risk destroying Canada because we can't achieve our ultima". That is what the leader of the Liberal Party is saying in British Columbia. He has an ultima, a single issue. Because he cannot have that, he thinks that the government of British Columbia should have walked away from the deal and destroyed Canada.

It is not worth the price. We have to do what we can to preserve this nation. I do not think when this is all resolved, and I am hoping it will be resolved soon, that the people of Canada are going to notice very much difference the morning after, the week after, the month after or the year after. The economic problems besetting this nation are the ones that will make them feel differently now and into the future, until we do something about them.

Let us get this behind us. Let us vote in favour of the referendum so that we do have a country that can hold up its head among the nations of the world, setting the kinds of standards that Canada has become famous for: in social services, in peacekeeping. There are important jobs that we as a nation can do that we could not do if we were to fall apart or separate deliberately. We would be weakened tremendously, and the world would lose as well as Canadians. That must not happen.

I believe the way to save it for the present is to vote in favour of this referendum. That will give us time. We can always sort this out in the future. We might even decide to send the Constitution back to Westminster and let them look after it. It was not nearly as much trouble when it was there.

In the meantime we have to start talking about economic problems, dealing with economic issues, dealing with unemployment. Once we get this behind us, surely then the government will have no reason, no excuse, for not dealing with the real problems facing Canadians today.

I will be doing what I can to support this referendum in my riding and I will do everything I can to make sure that it passes.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, while Canada ranks first world-wide among 167 UN nations for quality of life, this government put the future of our country in the hands of the people.

It is normally the job of the elected representatives to administer and manage the business of the country in the interest of its people. Now, for some exceptional reason, we the elected representatives are asking the people of Canada to decide what they want from this country. What kind of constitution do they want? Would they agree that the Constitution of Canada be renewed on the basis of the agreement the premiers has reached in Charlottetown on August 28?

The proposal before us today is not a haphazard one. Let us be reminded of how hard is has been for many Quebecers to find the will to go on following the failure of Meech.

I come from a fiercely nationalist region, the Saguenay—Lac-Saint-Jean, the riding of Jonquière to be more precise, where being nationalistic has come to take two meanings over the years. For some, to be a nationalist means to advocate a sovereign Quebec. For others like me, it does not necessarily mean that. It means defending the interests of your province and trying to the best of your abilities and talents to guarantee that your province can develop and progress within Canadian federalism.

Many wanted to give up after the failure of Meech Lake. The Prime Minister asked several members of his caucus, including myself, to try again to renew our Constitution and to find solutions to our problems. We had two options: to try again or to give up and throw in the towel.

For my part, I took up the challenge to defend the interests of my province as a member of the Beaudoin–Edwards committee and then of the Beaudoin–Dobbie committee.

It took a lot of courage on the part of the Prime Minister to make such a decision, but he wanted Canadian unity and he had the courage to want to try. Because of this several of my colleagues from the opposition parties and from the government met a large number of individual Canadians and representatives of various organizations. We listened to what they wanted for their country and to their suggestions on how to amend the Constitution.

It is only human for a member or a chairman of a committee to hope that the decisions of the government will reflect exactly what was recommended in the committee report. It is only human and quite natural. However, should we say no simply because the contents of the constitutional proposal does not reflect exactly our own recommendations? What we must do is evaluate the agreement. This is our responsibility. We must evaluate it.

Let me give an example. The chairman of the Allaire Committee simply gave up because the agreement does not contain all of his own recommendations. He simply gave up and said: I cannot agree to that. There is the matter of the environment, for instance. Mr. Allaire wanted the environment to come under provincial jurisdiction. The people of Jonquière are well aware of the fact that the environment and pollution know no boundaries. It cannot come under exclusive provincial jurisdiction. It is impossible.

In negotiations we have to ask for a number of things and afterwards see if the contents of the agreement as a whole give us enough of what we wanted.

I am a Quebecer. Let us look at the proposal. What does it contain for Quebecers? What are we being offered? We are offered a veto on Senate reform. Quebec has wanted for years to make it impossible for the other provinces to change the Senate without our agreement because we are one of the co–founding peoples of this nation. Today this is what we are being offered. We are being offered a veto on any change to the House of Commons. Under the present Constitution seven provinces could decide, for instance, that there will no longer be proprotional representation in the House of Commons. They could decide on equal representation for each province. Such a decision could be made by seven provinces and without our agreement. This proposal offers us a veto on any future change to the House of Commons.

Third, Quebec is being offered 25 per cent of all seats in the House of Commons from now on. Why is that important? Each year, a large number of immigrants are admitted to Canada. They can go to any province. Under an agreement on immigration which will now be entrenched in the Constitution Quebec can accept between 25 and 30 per cent of the total number of immigrants admitted to Canada each year. However, these immigrants do not have to remain in Quebec once they are there. They can go elsewhere, to any other province, and vice versa.

There is no guarantee that Quebec will always represent a quarter of the population of Canada. In spite of that the other provinces and premiers agree that Quebecers will always hold one–quarter of the seats in the House of Commons. This is very important. We would have a quarter of the seats in the House. A majority of 50 percent plus one is needed to pass an act in the House of Commons. Since we are assigned 25 percent of the seats, we represent half of the votes required to pass or reject any bill in the House of Commons. In the future Quebec members would be, for all practical purposes, protected against any form of abuse from future governments. We only have to consult with each other. We have the tool we need in our hands. How will we use it? It is up to us to use it to shape our future.

I have another point. We are being offered a veto over any change to the Supreme Court to be composed of nine members, of whom three must be from Quebec. This is another permanent form of protection. It is important because this country was founded in 1867 by two peoples: francophones from Quebec and anglophones from other provinces. Over the years, since there are now 20 million English Canadians and 6 million of us, Quebecers have asked for such a protection.

The constitutional offer that will be put to a vote on October 26 finally recognizes Quebec as a distinct society. Section 2 of the Constitution would be amended to read "Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society, which includes a French speaking majority, a unique culture and a civil law tradition". Another important clause has been added: "The role of the legislature and Government of Quebec to preserve and promote the distinct society of Quebec is affirmed". To those who claim the term distinct is not good or strong enough, I say this: should a Quebec law concerning our language ever be challenged before the Supreme Court of Canada? We could as Quebecers use the distinct society clause to justify such a law. If the Supreme Court rejected our arguments we could still invoke the notwithstanding clause to tell the judges: Notwithstanding your decision to declare our law unconstitutional we will keep it. We enjoy a double protection.

Furthermore—and Quebecers and Canadians alike must realize this—when we were sitting on the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee, the first ministers and lobby groups were telling us not to impose something against their will while insisting they wanted the same as Quebec. It was pretty difficult to deal with.

The distribution of powers as provided for in the constitutional offer meets this demand. How? Any province can ask the federal government to withdraw from areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction such as mining, tourism, forestry, recreation, housing and urban affairs. At the request of a province, the federal government would be obligated to withdraw. It would then be required to negotiate how to provide reasonable compensation. All this would be entrenched in the Constitution for five years.

Any other province preferring the federal government to remain involved can stay that way. This is what I call flexibility. To those who say that it is not good enough because it is only for five years, I say think again. The Constitution will be around for a long time. The 1867 Constitution lasted until 1982 before getting a facelift and even today we see how difficult it is.

If we had an intergovernmental agreement giving us back a certain power with all the related responsibilities, we would be stuck with it forever. We could even have done ourselves a disservice. The proposed formula gives us more flexibility. It would allow a province to make corrections as the need arises. It meets Quebecers' expectations. We want more powers. Others may want less than we do. It is their choice. But let us look at the offer on the table.

Let us now talk about the aboriginal issue. In 1867 those who preceded us drafted a constitution that did not include the aboriginal peoples. Today we want to correct that mistake. We recognize that the aboriginal peoples have the inherent right to self-government with basic forms of protection. Just what is important? It is always to try to correct or avoid, as much as possible, any abuse of power by anybody. We have benchmarks regarding what is looming on the horizon for aboriginal peoples, namely that the legislation will always have to conform with the notion of order and good government. It is even provided that, as the aboriginal peoples gradually take control of their destiny, they will be able to contribute financially, in proportion with the resources that they have.

The fact that the aboriginal peoples blossom within our society does not take anything away from me as a Canadian; on the contrary, it makes me grow. I grow when people next to me improve their lot. To recognize that the most beautiful country in the world can continue to move forward while respecting the needs of everyone as well as the characteristics of its different provinces.

I notice that I only have a few minutes left. I want Quebecers to think seriously before saying no. If we say no to this offer it means that we say no to something that I have been trying to get for a very long time: a veto on the reform of institutions, a guarantee providing for 25 per cent of the seats in the House of Commons, the enshrinement of our agreement on immigration, as well as other powers.

I took a close look at the accord. I did not read it only once. Of course there are times when we would like to get more in life, but there also comes a time when you have to look at what is offered. For Quebecers, this is a good offer. It is interesting. We have guarantees concerning our language, our development as well as the characteristics of the country and our own as francophones from Quebec.

When you have all this you have the necessary tools to continue to blossom as Quebecers. Before rejecting all this let us ask ourselves this question: Has that country served us that badly? Honestly, the answer is no. We come first among 167 countries in the world in terms of quality of life.

I intend to support this agreement in my riding of Jonquière, elsewhere in Quebec and also in Canada. I believe that this time a majority of Quebecers, and particularly people from the Saguenay—Lac St-Jean region, will say yes to Canada.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, the question that the government tabled yesterday reflects the true nature of behind the scenes dealings in Charlottetown. It is an acknowledgment of the failure of federal-provincial negotiations, an acknowledgment of impotence when faced with the renewal of Canada, because the Charlottetown accord is somewhat a real house of cards; the more you blow on it, the more it crumbles.

Without a real agreement the government, in collusion with Liberals and New Democrats, wants to ask Canadians and Quebecers to sign a blank cheque. Whatever my former colleagues from the Conservative Party are saying we are very far from the Meech Lake accord substance. The Meech Lake accord was subjected to a real constitutional diet. The Meech baby was not very fat in the first place. We can imagine how he looked after the drastic diet and deprivation of a few days imposed on it in Charlottetown. The five minimal conditions became trifle. Indeed, eight distinguished constitutional specialists from Quebec examined the distinct society clause and concluded it was a setback for Quebec. Surely they cannot all be wrong, and I say this for the benefit of the member for Jonquière. The distinct society concept has been completely diminished. The only distinctness remaining is culture, language and civil law. Quebec's distinctness is far more than that. Quebec is also a distinct society in the social and economic sense. Consider its social measures, including health insurance; measures affecting labour relations, such as anti-scab legislation, legislation to regulate real estate transactions, credit unions and so forth.

• (1600)

At the time of the beau risque which the Prime Minister of Canada likes to recall, René Lévesque stressed the importance of recognizing the existence of Quebec as a people in the Constitution. The concept of two founding peoples has now been swept aside in favour of provincial equality. Genuine special status has been obtained only by small provinces like Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island.

The distinct society, which was to be the subject of an interpretive clause, is lost in the Canada clause which says that governments are committed to the vitality and development of official language communities.

Political scientist Léon Dion, who has been advising Premier Bourassa and Minister Gil Rémillard during the constitutional talks, expressed his apprehension with respect to Bill 101, especially concerning the language on signs and the language of work. If the agreement is ratified, Bill 101 might become a target for people who feel frustrated. Quebec wanted veto rights over any changes that might affect Quebec's role within federal institutions, the structure of those institutions and their jurisdiction, the appointment of members of these institutions and the creation of new provinces. Instead, we now have only bits and pieces of a veto that is no longer significant and, more important, no veto over the creation of new provinces.

As for the division of powers, Quebec now has fewer powers than it had at the beginning of Confederation in 1867. What was supposed to bring Quebec back into the constitutional fold with honour and enthusiasm has now become a millstone around its neck. What the draft agreement gives Quebec with one hand, it takes away with the other. All this for a few more seats in the House of Commons which is no guarantee that Quebec's superior interests will be defended. Remember the patriation of the Constitution in 1982. At the time, with more than 28 per cent of Quebec members in the House, of which almost 50 per cent were part of the Liberal caucus, the party in power, Prime Minister Trudeau negotiated the unilateral patriation of the Constitution, without Quebec, thus creating the unfortunate situation we have now.

Perhaps I may recall that at the time, Quebec members voted in favour of this proposal, although the Quebec National Assembly objected almost unanimously.

Although my former colleagues in the Quebec Conservative caucus can boast the same membership as their Liberal counterparts in 1982, they nevertheless ignored Quebec's demands with respect to environmental issues during the debate on Bill C-13. They ignored Quebec claims during the debate on Bill C-62 on telecommunications and the same applies to the federal government's recent intrusions into the areas of education, health and regional development.

In this week's L'Actualité, Quebec Communications Minister Lisa Frulla-Hébert says in a very outspoken article, and I quote:

"If the Minister of Communications of Canada were a Quebecer, he would wonder about the federal government's lack of respect for Quebec's cultural priorities".

She adds: "I saw during my trip to Seville this summer the gap between the Canadian and Quebec conceptions of our culture and societies. The Imax movie showed Canada as a land defined by its vast open spaces, its multiculturalism and its native people. There was no mention of a country founded by two great cultures, past and present. Nowhere is the existence of a French Quebec mentioned".

So says this Liberal minister of the Quebec government in this week's Actualité.

The August 28 agreement renews the main elements of the July 7 accord negotiated by the federal and provincial governments except Quebec.

In fact, the only guarantee offered by the agreement means we would remain a minority forever.

The slim guarantee of 25 per cent of seats can only get smaller as representatives of the territories and the aboriginal people will be added.

We are a long way from Quebec's traditional demands of the last 30 years.

Before this agreement Quebec had three options: some were opting for the status quo, others for a genuine renewal of the Canadian federation, while the majority preferred sovereignty.

Whatever their preference, all Quebecers have a duty to say no to this agreement.

For some, rejecting the agreement means going back to the status quo.

For others, rejecting the agreement means scrapping this so-called constitutional renewal and forcing politicians to go back to work.

For others still, rejecting the agreement means calling for a real debate on sovereignty.

All Quebecers must reject this agreement that leads nowhere.

This is an agreement whose clauses are being challenged even before the legal text becomes available, an agreement that is only a rough draft.

From the drawers of water we did not want to be are we going to become permanent beggars of federal-provincial accords in our own areas of jurisdiction?

No, Quebec deserves better than this.

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to take this opportunity to thank all those who took part in the discussions that have led to the Charlottetown agreement.

It is not often that a group of people with sometimes very different interests, such as the Prime Minister of Canada, the premiers of all the provinces, the representatives of the aboriginal peoples, and the leaders of Yukon and the Northwest Territories, can get together and reach a consensus, particularly on an issue as crucial as the future of the country.

I also want to aknowledge the important contribution made by my leader.

As the member representing Acadie—Bathurst, a riding in the only bilingual province in Canada, I am pleased that at last the substance of Bill C-88, an act recognizing the equal status of the two official linguistics communities in New-Brunswick, would be enshrined in the Constitution.

This element of the agreement reached in Charlottetown is a major gain for the Acadian people in my province. There is no doubt that those who want to find flaws, shortcomings or omissions in this accord can easily do so.

In fact perfection is a rare thing and it never happens in politics. If we want to look for a winner, let us say that all of Canada is the big winner in this last round of negotiations because I am convinced that we have succeeded in preserving our country.

I do not hesitate to express my profound belief that a united and strong Canada is more indispensable to the four Atlantic provinces than to any other region of the country for obvious reasons.

We must not be naïve. Do we want a Canada that goes from the Atlantic to the Pacific to the Arctic? Or, do we want to run the great risk of dismantling bit by bit this great country and have nothing left? The choice is clear. The answer can only be yes to the question: "Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992?"

[English]

Our world is undergoing as dramatic a change as any since the birth of the nation-state. All over the planet people are demanding independence. Too many are dying for their dream of statehood and at least here in Canada we can still debate our differences.

The evolving world political order demands of us that we be a model of how diversity can be welded together to create a strong and prosperous nation.

We had best take a close look at what is happening here at home, analyse the problems and consider what kind of future we face in this country. Listen to the despair of the Atlantic fishermen and plant workers. Hear the resignation in the voices of the unemployed from coast to coast. Feel the frustration of the young men and women from Quebec who cannot understand why their identity is being questioned and bargained over like so many poker chips. Listen to the men and women from the prairies who had their hopes of being equal partners in Confederation dashed over and over again. Recognize the anger of thousands who have lost their jobs in manufacturing in Ontario who are told "it is all right, Jack".

Most of all, beware of the undisguised contempt for the political process held by Canadians from St. John's to Victoria.

If we listened to the people, we would hear a simple message. They are angry. They are profoundly alienated but thankfully they still believe in the country though not necessarily in its politicians or the system.

Canadians despair because their political institutions are not working. They are disillusioned because the ad hoc process of constitutional reform over the past 15 years has failed to adequately address their concerns and their needs. Those involved in fine tuning the Constitution, which should lead Canada confidently into the next century, have spent much of their time and their energies not on improving Canadian national institutions and our political structures in the best interest of Canadians but on shuffling the deck, on redefining federal-provincial relations, never really addressing the underlying fundamental reason for the crisis in confidence that is eroding the fabric of Canada.

The political pendulum continues to swing between federal and provincial interests. The price has been the alienation of the people of Canada from their governments and their politicians. That is the source of the deep malaise in Canada.

Economic, social and political problems are traumatic and painful but more dangerous still is the lack of hope, the absence of trust and the discouragement of Canadians upon realizing our political system seemingly is incapable of dealing resolutely with deeply felt concerns.

Our protracted constitutional debate has demonstrated just how out of touch we are with what Canadians are really troubled about. Years have been spent trying to codify what nearly all of us already know and accept, namely that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society, that aboriginal people have a right to self-government, that an elected Senate should have real power and that Canada should be an open and free economy from sea to sea to sea.

Everyone wants reform but reform of what? I believe reform must begin at the heart of the political system in Parliament itself. We must reform the Senate and also the House of Commons. To do this we must be prepared to reveal the failings of our system.

We must explain why elected members of Parliament do not play a meaningful role in the governing process, why the House of Commons is a rubber stamp and why we have allowed the executive to usurp the legislative functions of government.

When there was agreement to reduce the number of Senators, the size of the House of Commons should have been decreased, not increased. The charade must end that ordinary MPs on all sides of this House exercise any real power of any kind.

Canadians want a democratic Parliament. We need a responsible government and accountable politicians. Surely Canadians are creative enough to devise a system of government that will combine the best elements of the various models we are very familiar with.

Until this happens we will not be able to encourage more capable and competent men and women to participate in the political process and confidence will not be restored in our institutions.

Future generations will judge us harshly if we fail and we will have much to answer for because we have had every opportunity to get it right.

Canadians want to continue to survive as a nation where people have overcome diversity of language, culture, ethnic origin and religion and lived together in relative harmony.

There is no doubt in my mind that we must agree to answer the referendum question that is before us in the affirmative, but we had better begin the process of restoring integrity and credibility to our political institutions. Any student of history will tell you that great nations are not the result of constitutional, legalistic arrangements, but rather are the achievements of men and women committed toward working together to create a system of government truly responsive to the needs and aspirations of its people and to the building of a society that strives to achieve the ultimate goal of providing everyone of its citizens with an equal opportunity to live in peace, prosperity and dignity

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, it is quite difficult in the eight minutes allotted to members on this side to try to begin to discuss what is the premier piece of federal legislation for Canada, its Constitution.

For the benefit of this debate we have an onus to distinguish between the constitutional package and the constitutional process.

On the process, we are voting later this evening on a referendum question to be put to Canadians. I recall as early as last year that we as a national party and our leader as the national leader were alone in advocating a national referendum. Many people and experts thought that would never see the light of day. Others suggested we were only posturing in terms of calling for a national vote.

We took that seriously simply because it is our firm and unshakeable belief that the Constitution in the end belongs to the people. There needs to be that voice. There needs to be the consultation with the shareholders of this public company called Canada. It cannot simply be run by the chief executive officer or its board of directors which we are.

I do not think we should quibble with one or two words in this evening's question on the referendum because quite frankly by the end of the 36-day debate, Canadians from one coast to the other will certainly size up the stakes and the consequences of voting one way or another and not necessarily on the meaning of one word or another.

It is also important in that process not to castigate Canadians for raising particular concerns, that they are no less Canadians, that they are not small Canadians, or little Canadians, or enemies of Canada as they have been referred to earlier by the Prime Minister, or not to coerce Canadians into voting one way or another.

I have received calls, for instance, that a number of ethnic organizations are quite uncomfortable with being called by the political staff of the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship to ensure they vote the right way, the yes way, and at the same time talk about funding from the federal government to that particular organization for the coming year. The message is very clear but it is also a message that is quite intimidating and quite improper.

On the package, our leader and our party in April, 1991 came up with a nine-point constitutional framework that not only guided our deliberations to this moment but also was utilized as a measuring stick by which we would measure any constitutional proposal.

The deal we are discussing this evening and for the referendum campaign is not a perfect deal and no one should pretend perfection. It is also at the same time not perfect to our nine Liberal points and we on this side are not pretending it is either. We also have to recognize fairly and squarely there are a number of victories contained in this constitutional proposal.

The first is the referendum that allows Canadians to decide the future course of their country and their Constitution.

The second one is the unanimity that was achieved by all representatives around that constitutional negotiating table.

Third, the Quebec government on behalf of Quebecers and Canadians in Quebec has signalled a yes that it is in the constitutional tent, not out of it, and I think that is highly significant.

Fourth, the distinct society clause has been defined and has gone a long way in trying to address properly the concerns flowing out of Meech that Canadians had perhaps with the concept of special status for some Canadians in one region of the country. By its very definition it tends to be more limiting as opposed to being more expansive.

• (1620)

Fifth, the entrenchment of aboriginal self-government is a landmark and an extension of our nation's hand to the aboriginal community of Canada, a hand that reflects the best in respect and in tolerance, which is Canada.

Sixth, the principles of linguistic duality are protected unlike in the earlier Meech Lake accord, which means that the French language will not be ghettoized and relegated only to Quebec and the English language in the other nine provinces, but rather, as our leader has always eloquently said across this country, you can be comfortable whether you are French Canadian or English Canadian or Italian Canadian in any part of this great country.

Seventh, a Canada clause that describes the fundamental values of who we are as a people and is much more inclusive than was the opening preamble of the Meech Lake accord which talked basically of two fundamental characteristics. Now all of its people and the breadth which is Canada are included in that opening Canada clause that does us proud.

There are concerns. We have talked about them. We have talked about the fact that there is not an economic union package. We have also talked about the fact that the Senate has lost a great deal of effectiveness in order to achieve equality. It is our hope and intention to try to modify those shortcomings, but on balance those shortcomings do not outweigh the victories that I and others have spoken about.

In closing, it must be said that since the Prime Minister opened this file in 1987 we cannot ignore the role that the five-year time period has played in today's equation as we consider a referendum campaign in two ways: fatigue and the situation in Quebec. I am not suggesting that fatigue should be a motivation for voting or changing our Constitution but it is an undeniable variable of this equation and it is also something that translates into frustration by Canadians because they feel the government has spent so much political capital, so much political energy in the constitutional dossier to the detriment of an economy that is aggravating the lives of Canadians.

In my own city the unemployment rate is higher than the national average and highest since the Great Depression of the 1930s. That is why Parliament should continue to sit.

On the situation in Quebec, in 1987 we were told that we needed to overlook the deficiencies of Meech Lake in order to allow Quebec to be pulled back from the edge of that political constitutional cliff. I did not believe that it was at the cliff then, nor did many Canadians. Now, after five years of debate, now that Quebec is finally at the table, now that Quebecers are waiting for that offer, now that Quebec has its own rendezvous with its own referendum and now that we have a federal wing of the separatist Parti Quebecois, namely the Bloc Quebecois, to say no to this deal would be to allow the separatists in Quebec to push Quebecers to the edge of the cliff.

In summary, on October 26 I will be voting yes to Canada and yes to a Quebec within Canada. I urge my constituents to participate, to involve themselves, to speak up, to read the document and then choose the one option that is in Canada's interests for its future, and for their own future in Canada.

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will not be surprised that I want to register right from the outset my very strong and unequivocal support for the proposition that we are debating here this afternoon and which will lead to a vote later on in the evening.

It has been a long and arduous process. We are all a bit fatigued but perhaps not more so than the Canadian general public itself.

At the same time I am sure we have all had the experience I have had that every time we talked about the Constitution to one of our constituents we would have a response of frustration with the ongoing interminable process. Yet, as soon as those frustrations were expressed, people would give their own version of what their perfect model of a Canadian Constitution should be.

We have all learned over these many months and years that there is no perfect model that would satisfy all the legitimate needs and all the aspirations of all of us, no matter where we live in this great country or the different interest or ethnic groups to which we might belong.

We live in the largest country in the world, which is also by all objective criteria the most prosperous country in the world. I ask whether it does not stand to reason that our predecessors and perhaps we ourselves in our modest way have not done a few things right to bring us to this enviable position.

We are a very young country relative to the other democracies after which we have fashioned our public institutions. When you think about it in terms of our Constitution we are also among the older countries of the world in the sense that we have not changed our Constitution very much over the last 125 years.

As an example, let us look at Germany. It is an interesting comparison in the sense that it was precisely at the same time in 1867 that the northern German states first organized themselves into some kind of loose federation. Shortly thereafter, in 1871, the first German Reich was founded which in turn led to the so–called Weimar Republic. It in turn was followed by the Third Reich and after the war it turned into the two Germanies. Of course we all remember the dramatic events which in 1990 led to the reunification of Germany which gave form to the present federation.

One would hardly be inclined to envy the Germans for their eventful and colourful 125 year history. They did manage to relieve themselves of the kind of rigidity through these various reforms which we find necessary now to change in our own Constitution.

The historic facts which led us to where we are today date back much further than 125 years. They go back to 1763, the royal proclamation, which established a relationship between the settlers in the new world and the aboriginal people they would encounter. In 1774 the royal proclamation established certain rights the French would enjoy in the new world. The Quebec Act, 1791, dealt with language rights, the Napoleonic civil code and certain religious rights that would have to be granted to the French population in the new world.

To ignore or to attempt to wipe out these rigid historic facts would require nothing less than the kind of convulsive and revolutionary change that shaped the history of countries such as the one I mentioned earlier.

Canadians never had a taste for that kind of change. We are more inclined to agree to changes through consensus and through honourable compromise which requires tolerance and understanding and good will toward others. In fact, as some of our colleagues have mentioned, this is what we are known for throughout the world. This is what is distinctively Canadian. It is also what led to the accord which is now before us and which we are asking the consent of the House of Commons and the people of Canada to support on October 26.

Cartier said in 1867, and I quote him as did the Prime Minister yesterday:

> We sealed our pact without bloodshed and without exploitation of the weak by the strong. All it took was fairness, justice and some compromise on both sides.

Sir John A. Macdonald added:

> If we had not met in a spirit of conciliation and with an anxious overriding desire to form one country under one government we would never have succeeded.

In order to rally the Canadian people around the accord with the kind of conviction that we should all bring to it, we must not avoid speaking about the main irritants underlying the resistance we are experiencing from some quarters.

• (1630)

Bilingualism, the Official Languages Act and Bill 101 in Quebec are such irritants. I cannot make any excuses for the Quebec sign law except to say that perhaps had Quebec been included in the 1982 constitutional changes with the kind of reasonable guarantees which are included in this accord, I doubt that the Legislative Assembly in Quebec would have deemed it necessary to proceed with such laws, particularly since they were deemed unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of Canada.

I represent an area of the country where the Reform Party claims to have strong support. Bilingualism is one of the areas around which it is trying to mobilize dissent. The Reform Party members and their leaders are generous enough to accommodate the people in Quebec with their right to speak French all they want as long as they do not have it shoved down their throats, to use the expression these kinds of people normally use.

In other words, they want their right respected to speak only English. If Quebec people want to speak only French they say that is okay too. Incidentally the Reform Party is also in favour of a strong federal government, not two but one strong federal government.

Does it not stand to reason that it requires a bilingual Public Service in order to guarantee such rights to both the English and the French ethnic groupings? Is it not a fact that the Official Languages Act applies only to federal services to which all Canadians should be and must be entitled?

What I see in the Official Languages Act and the regulations that give it effect is nothing more than a guarantee of service from the federal government and its regulated service industries for every Canadian regardless of his or her choice of language.

Is there a cost to the federal taxpayer for this guarantee? The answer is yes, but this is the cost of having a united, strong and prosperous country.

If we wanted to draw another comparison with the European experience we should look at the European Community. The Maastricht treaty will lead the European Community by the year 2000 to a total integration of their economies, their trade, their monetary system. There will be no more liras, francs, marks and whatever other currencies there are in Europe. There will be one single currency, the ECU. There will be a single standard throughout Europe. A pharmacist from Portugal can open a shop in Manchester, England.

There is also and there always has been a clear understanding that there cannot be an integration of culture. There will always be French, English, Italian and all the other languages spoken. No attempt has ever been made to deprive someone of their culture, someone of his or her soul, which some people say language equates with.

Our friends in the Reform Party are talking about a new society, a new Canada. Will this new Canada be a more prosperous, more peaceful and secure Canada? Will it be a more tolerant and more compassionate Canada? We do know it will be a more God-fearing society if we listen to the leader of the Reform Party.

What about those of us who would prefer our God to be a loving God? We already know it will be a more fundamentally Christian society, but are there not enough signs around the world to indicate that religious fundamentalism is as much an obstacle to peace in the world as anything else?

Preston Manning's politics are the politics of another age, an age through which Canadians lived 50 years ago. I for one, and I am certain the majority of my constituents, have no taste to be reliving this age. People like myself who are neither of English or French extraction, particularly those for whom that fact is visible, are fearful of Preston Manning's politics and perhaps for good reason.

The changes that are now proposed will provide us with the opportunity to streamline our government structure and to streamline the operations and our relationship with the provinces, particularly in the area of avoiding duplication. In my own department or area of jurisdiction there was never a dispute about whose exclusive jurisdiction forestry should be. But the new deal allows us to better define a perhaps more legitimate role in forestry.

It will provide the provinces the opportunity to assist us in determining how we might best manage the international obligations that we have as custodians of 10 per cent of the planet's forests and how to best respond to our society's ever-changing needs and the values we attach to our forests; how we in Canada might be able to modify through research our practices in forestry to give meaning to the concept of sustainable development.

There will be opportunities to arrange bilateral arrangements that will have legal status and will be designed to meet both the national and the regional interests and objectives in this critical area of our national life.

I look forward very much to negotiating and working with my colleagues through the Council of Forest Ministers and in a bilateral sense the different ministers of forestry throughout the country to accommodate a new deal.

I conclude my remarks on perhaps a very personal note. I came to this country 41 years ago at the age of 19 years. I came alone and brought with me only the dream that was inspired by what I knew and what I had learned and read about Canada. Incidentally I discovered to my surprise that I knew much more about the history of my adopted new homeland than what my children are now learning in school.

The same might be true for most post-war immigrants and that might be the reason why we have heard very little from any of the ethnic groupings in this debate. Not only are they aware of the historic facts that I have mentioned, the constrained constitutional reform process in which we were involved, but they also have a much deeper sense of appreciation of what this country can offer its citizens.

In my case I had the good fortune to launch a successful career in business together with my wife and family. I earned the privilege which all of us here enjoy, to be elected to the Parliament of Canada, and in my case to become a member of the Privy Council.

But my story by itself is not an exception. It is the story that is repeated and celebrated every day in every part of this great country as part of our national life. It is not a story you would find repeated anywhere else in the world, incidentally. It is a reflection of my Canada such as I want it preserved for my children and my grandchildren.

We can expect a resounding yes from the one-third of Canadians who were not as privileged as others were to have inherited this country by birth but who chose this country by themselves.

I will join our colleagues over the next few weeks, not so much to sell the accord to which we have agreed here in the House, but to explain it to the Canadian people and to appeal to their good will. I sense that there is a lot of good will in this country and that we will find a yes answer to our plea.

I too can find lots of flaws in the proposition we are now debating. But I also know that it represents the best possible, the fairest and the most honourable compromise that was possible.

I congratulate sincerely our Prime Minister whose exceptional skills, strong conviction, his passionate love for our country and his faith in a united Canada were, after all, the glue and the bond that brought it all together. I would like to congratulate the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs and thank all of the premiers, the native leaders and the territorial leaders who sat around the table and who deserve our thanks.

History will be extremely kind to all of them.

• (1640)

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, the question we are debating today is the following one:

> Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992?

In the minute amount of time that I have been allotted to speak on this question and on the broader question of the accord, I do not intend to get into lofty constitutional discussions but I do want to make a few comments from my perspective first as a lawyer and second as a representative of the people who live in the riding of Scarborough West.

As a lawyer I have come to respect the value of words, what they mean and how they are used. I look at this question and I see a word which offends me. The methodology of the use of the word and the attempt to manipulate which offends me. The word is renewed.

One might ask: Why quibble with words? My answer to that is that the way we communicate, the way we convince ourselves, is through the use of the word, spoken or written. We have seen in the very recent past how the courts have interpreted words, how they have written meanings in where there were no such meanings, and how they have taken words out that were written in. Therefore it is very important to be as precise as possible when using words.

There was no need to use the word renewed in this question. A simple word which would have made the question completely neutral would have been: Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be amended on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992? It should have been amended instead of renewed. Renewed puts this sort of who would be against renewal spin on it. That to me is an attempt to manipulate, that is to play us, myself, my constituents and the people of Canada, for fools. I personally resent it.

Is that going to be enough for me to vote against this question? Of course not, because I believe that this question should go to the people of Canada and should be considered by them.

However, I want to put on record that it is unnecessary for the Prime Minister of this country to fool with words when a simple neutral question could have attained the same results.

Let me take a few minutes to talk about the Charlottetown accord. Many constituents have called my riding office and have asked: "What is this accord? What does it mean? What does it say? How are we supposed to vote yes or no on something that we do not know anything about?" Those are legitimate questions and I have an answer for them.

I want to remind my constituents, and I am speaking primarily to my constituents now, that this is a momentous and historical occasion. This is the first referendum that we have had in half a century. Let us take it seriously. Let us not ignore the commentary for the next number of weeks and then either simply fail to vote or not bother to vote because the subject is too complex or too boring or we are too tired of it or simply go in there, close our eyes, mark an x and hope for the best. That is not the way to deal with the future of our country.

Rather, I ask constituents of Scarborough West and the people of Canada to reflect very carefully on the words of the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. Yesterday he said: "Canadians should judge this agreement by what it says, not by what others say it says". That includes us here by the way. He went on to say: "This is not written in Morse code. Canadians owe it to themselves to read it themselves".

I whole-heartedly support the minister's statement. Do we care enough about this country to spend a few minutes to pick up this document and read it? I am not going to say that we will understand it immediately, but do we care enough to investigate is?

What is my role going to be in the next little while? I am going to try my best to give the facts as I see them to my constituents. I want my constituents to know that I am going to be having a meeting on September 24 on this very topic at which I will distribute copies of the documentation and raise some questions and answer some questions if I possibly can. I am not going to be in the voting booth for each and every constituent. They will be there themselves, marking their ballots. I sincerely hope they do it, having apprised themselves of the facts.

That meeting is going to be on Thursday, September 24 at Our Lady of Fatima School library. I will have another one two weeks later on October 1 at St. Agatha separate school at 7.30 p.m. on Thursday. I will continue to have them as long as there is interest by my constituents to come out and talk about this accord. Copies will be made and we will discuss the issues.

What issues? I would like people to ask themselves what is going to happen if the referendum vote is overwhelmingly yes. Is this going to put an end to our constitutional discussions? The answer in my view is no. The Charlottetown accord is not the beginning of the end. Rather it is merely the end of the beginning.

The premier of Quebec has already stated that negotiations will continue. He said this in the National Assembly yesterday. We will continue our negotiations but in an era of solidity, stability. By no means will a yes mean that we are finished with the Constitution for the next generation. Quite the contrary. Negotiations are going to continue.

What is going to happen if the referendum vote is no? I remind Canada that the Prime Minister of this country predicted that the world as we knew it in Canada would come crashing down around us if the Meech Lake accord was rejected. The Meech Lake accord was rejected. The world did not end. The sun rose the next day and life went on. We managed to continue the dialogue.

How about some questions? Did we in this accord achieve a Triple-E Senate? Is the Senate elected? I say only partially because it can be partially appointed. Is it equal? Who knows? Is it effective? Again, partially. What does that mean? What sorts of ramifications will that have in the future. What does aboriginal self-government mean? Who pays for it? How much of this accord will be fleshed out by the courts in interpreting words, further withering the democratic powers of this House of Commons, sadly no longer the highest court of the land by the very abdication of its members to grapple with tough issues? The courts are answerable to no one but themselves.

Finally will the results be binding on anybody, on any level of government? The answer is legally no, morally I hope so.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Prince Edward Hastings for eight minutes.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure and a privilege to rise today to speak on this topic of the upcoming referendum on the renewal of the Constitution of Canada.

First I would want to thank all those in the House, in the Senate and in the Public Service for the extra time and effort they have taken to work on this proposal over many months. I also want to thank those in my riding of Prince Edward—Hastings for their participation, whether that was through letters or phone calls to the Spicer commission, the Beaudoin–Dobbie commission, the Charest committee or whatever it might be, and the hundreds of people who either phoned me, wrote to me, met me on the street or came out to town hall and public meetings I have held in the riding on this issue over the last number of months.

I can assure them their views were heard and they were passed on by myself to people who were more closely involved in this issue. I also remind Canadians, not only those in Prince Edward—Hastings riding, that we have the privilege in Canada to do that. Many countries in the world today do not have that privilege, that freedom of speech, that freedom of association, and we should all remind ourselves how fortunate we are.

Where are we now? We have a proposal, if it is passed on October 26, that I feel will certainly keep Canada together. If it does not pass, I do not even want to talk about it because I shudder at the fallout that will likely come from that. The important thing is that all of us as Canadians have that choice to make now. We have that opportunity. It is not a perfect proposal as so many of my colleagues here in the House have said. We know that. However, all of us have been involved in enough negotiations, whether they be large or small, throughout our lives that we know at no time can everyone go away from a negotiating table getting exactly what everyone wants. The deal that put Canada in place in the first place was a deal of compromise, and so is this one. The Charlottetown proposal in my view is the best that we could get at the present time.

By passing this we can tell the rest of the world and we can tell Canadians that for now at least we have made up our mind on the future direction of our country. We can get on with doing what we need to do as a country, that is get our economy going again and get people back to work and people earning money. That is important.

As I say, it is not a perfect proposal. If I had written it I would have made the Senate more effective, but it is the best we could get right now. The economic union is not as strong as it could be, but I think we can work on that. The recognition is there that it needs to be improved, and that is a step forward.

Let us look at the positive aspects of it. Of concern to many people in my riding are the words distinct society. I want to remind them that in the Canada clause distinct society is defined to refer only to language, civil law and culture. It is important that definition is there. Francophones are protected with this agreement outside Quebec and anglophones are protected within Quebec. The Senate is elected and equal and it can be made more effective by changes in the rules of the House. The aboriginal people will be given self-government as they should have. Changes to national institutions such as the House, the Senate and the Supreme Court can only be made with the full agreement of all provinces and the Parliament of Canada.

Yes, Mr. Bourassa can say that Quebec has a veto on this type of action, but I remind people that every province has a veto and that is not a special veto given to the province of Quebec.

New provinces can be created by the Parliament of Canada. I have always said that if we are going to redistribute the jurisdiction of forestry, tourism and mining to the provinces nothing special should be done for any particular province. Nothing is done special for any particular province. The opportunities in this proposal for one province are there for all provinces, and that is important.

The Canada clause protects the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and it keeps it foremost and strong. There is a commitment and it is a very strong one. Canadians are committed to social and ethnic equality. There is a commitment to the equality of female and male persons.

Yes, we could pick holes in this agreement. Let us not get caught up in partisanship, narrow minded bigotry or narrow personal thoughts. We are talking about the future of a country, one that has withstood a lot, one that has been formed from people coming together from all parts of the world, and one that offers so much to so many.

We have in our country of Canada a very precious country and to me it is far too precious to lose. My Canada is the whole of Canada. I urge Canadians to support the Charlottetown proposal for a renewed Canadian Constitution.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to have this opportunity however brief to address the historic question before us about the future of our entire country.

The real question before us is whether we are to say yes to a new and stimulating move forward in Canada's journey as a unified nation or whether we are to say no and continue to drift in the agonizing impasse of constitutional conflict and threatened separation.

While it is tempting to many to forestall the heavy burden of facing that question directly and perhaps to seek refuge through preoccupation with the broad range of significant individual factors for which the referendum question will be a single proxy, it remains essential for every Canadian to address the only question that really counts squarely: Do we say yes to the unity of Canada at this time or do we say no?

Therein lies the challenge for every member of Parliament, indeed for every elected representative at every level of government and for every citizen who can be encouraged to join the referendum campaign, to ensure that Canadians are truly inspired with the magnitude of the responsibility and the opportunity now being presented to each one of us. It is a rare chance for every individual of voting age to make a direct and measurable contribution to the future directions of our country.

Over the next several weeks leading up to October 26, every citizen will be able to experience the essence of the political process in a direct and dramatic way, to recognize, to consider and to evaluate all the complex issues involved in Canada's future, and then to exercise all that collective personal knowledge and wisdom in the form of a single judgment and decision to move Canada forward in unity and inspiration or to keep Canada mired in division and discord. To be sure our first job is to inform and educate ourselves and our fellow citizens about all of the issues involved to the greatest extent possible in the time available. That in itself will be no easy task. Even at best, we must accept the reality that very few of us will really be knowledgeable about Canada's constitutional complexities before it is time to make our decision.

However, that should not be cause for frustration or undue concern because the average citizen cannot be expected to gain instant expertise in such affairs. That is why Canadians have yearned for the kind of leadership in this issue in which they can place their trust. Fortunately, and to an extent perhaps never before displayed in Canadian history, we have seen such leadership in this constitutional mission. It has come from every major jurisdiction in every corner of the country and its recommendations are unanimous about the direction in which it points us. That is not to say that Canadians should blindly follow any leadership without due caution, care and consideration, particularly in such a critical direction as we are now heading.

However, it does mean that in the absence of perfect understanding or ultimate knowledge or divine wisdom, which obviously none of us will ever have, there is a compelling basis for trust and and confidence in following the leadership which the first ministers of Canada have demonstrated along with their territorial and aboriginal colleagues in reaching the constitutional consensus that was signed at Charlottetown on August 28.

In the absence of better information or higher knowledge or wiser choice, I believe that the Charlottetown agreement is a foundation for judgment on which any Canadian can rely in making an affirmative referendum decision. Certainly it is on that basis that I will cast my own vote.

It is especially imperative that we encourage Canadians to come to grips with the very nature of our confederation and with the realization that we continue to build Canada today in the same spirit of collaboration, concession, compromise and consensus as it was founded 125 years ago.

As the Prime Minister said in opening this debate two days ago, Confederation itself was a creative innovation to cope with the major constitutional and economic problems of the day. He went on to quote Sir John A. Macdonald who said at the beginning: "The whole scheme bears upon its face the marks of compromise. Of necessity there was a great deal of mutual concession". Obviously we now see clear evidence of a similar approach which our present leaders have used in reaching a constitutional accord.

Frankly, I would like it even better if the Charlottetown agreement was called just that, the Canada accord. For me, at least, those words more aptly describe the essence of Canadian federalism in the modern day. The concept of accord seems a stronger and more rational expression of the inter-relationship and interdependence which must exist among all participants in a federation such as ours. In truth, that is effectively what has been achieved, a Canada accord which reflects a reasoned and fair reconciliation of all the diverse interests which exist throughout this vast country.

This Canada accord is not a menu of half measures to merely provide each participant with a little bit of something and not much of anything as some critics have claimed, but rather it is an innovative and effective working plan for the continued development of Canada as a unified nation. It has been achieved through long and intensive consultation with Canadians from every walk of life, in every part of our vast land. It expresses the diversity of their hopes and aspirations in a balanced approach that offers the best prospects yet defined of making those hopes and aspirations attainable.

The Canada accord is a statement of vision for our country, a vision that is based on unity and a vision to which we must each address ourselves. It is simply not possible to side-step this ultimate question of vision. That is what the referendum will be all about. Is our vision of Canada based on unity or is it based on division? In the most simple of all terms that is what we shall each be expressing in the voters booths on referendum day: our own vision of Canada, securely unified or dangerously divided. We simply must not deceive ourselves about that question and the responsibility for each one of us to vote yes for the Canada accord and support a solution that will keep our country whole or to realize that in voting no we are accepting the prospects of continued deep division and probably even disintegration within Canada as we know it.

The day of judgment and decision for Canada will come quickly upon us.

• (1700)

The entire thrust and spirit of the referendum campaign will be to ask Canadians if they are prepared to place a priority on the context of the country as a whole and to accept the principles of the Canada accord which have been reached to make unity possible.

As I have said, the challenge before us is not simply to make some selective choice among individual elements of the accord, but rather to lift our sights and our judgments to the future of Canada in its entirety. Those alternatives, yes or no, are competing visions. For the destiny of Canada we must each accept the solemn responsibility to make our choice between them.

For me and my house, and I believe for most citizens in my constituency, we shall choose to stand proudly for a united Canada.

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, after two years of the widest possible consultation in the history of Canada, through the Spicer commission, the Charest committee, the Beaudoin-Edwards committee, the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee of which I was a member, we now have a unanimous agreement by 17 people consisting of the Prime Minister, the 10 premiers, two territorial and four aboriginal leaders.

The Charlottetown agreement goes far beyond the Meech Lake accord which for a time also had unanimous agreement. It goes beyond Meech Lake in its extensive consultation process, through its involvement with literally hundreds of thousands of Canadians and through the participation of our aboriginal peoples.

Further, the Charlottetown agreement goes beyond Meech Lake in that it provides a clear definition of the distinct society clause and its guarantee of protection for our two official language communities both in Quebec and across Canada.

There are billboards across Canada that carry the words "My Canada includes Quebec". I would go further and agree with the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra who earlier in this debate said: "It is not just that my Canada includes Quebec, but for me there is no Canada without Quebec".

I would also add that this agreement with its distinct society clause, its protection of our two linguistic communities, the new division of powers, as well as the limitation of the unilateral use of the federal spending powers, is consistent with the vision for Canada of Macdonald and Cartier.

Both Macdonald and Cartier grasped the fundamental reality and secret of Canada, that of two founding peoples, English and French speaking, working harmoniously together while respecting each other's language, culture, religion, and civil codes.

Not only is this agreement consistent with the 1867 British North America Act, but it is also in harmony with our history and with other acts such as the Quebec Act, 1774, and the Canada Act, 1791.

The agreement goes far beyond Meech Lake in that all 10 provinces and the federal government are now correcting a long-standing historical problem through the recognition of the inherent right to self-government of our aboriginal people.

Additionally the agreement's process and focus is different. Meech Lake attempted to correct a past omission for a province. The Charlottetown agreement corrects that omission and focuses on the Canada of the future.

The details of the agreement are very important. I hope every Canadian will read them, but when they are read I hope every Canadian will seriously consider the months and months of deliberation and discussion, of debate and compromise, and do what the 17 individuals did in Charlottetown on August 28, 1992, and what the Fathers of Confederation did beginning at Charlottetown in 1864 through to 1867. That is to put their own agendas and preferences aside and make them secondary to the national interest and to the needs of a strong united Canada.

I am disappointed that the preamble that was unanimously recommended by all 30 members of the House and Senate on the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee was not accepted by the required seven out of 10 premiers. Nevertheless I want to publicly thank the Prime Minister who tried both in late July and again in Charlottetown to gain acceptance of that preamble. I am also disappointed that property rights were not added to the agreement for inclusion in the charter of rights. Who in this House can forget Boris Yeltsin's words to us on June 19 of this year when he said that one of the key reforms to rebuilding Russia and the democratic rights of its people would be to add the right to private property to their new constitution.

I am also disappointed that section 121, the economic union clause, was not significantly modernized and strengthened. I am however pleased that the Prime Minister and the premiers have agreed to revisit that weakness as a top priority item once the agreement has been ratified.

I am sure that all 295 members of this House and all 26 million Canadians would each have written a slightly different version of the agreement and that none would be totally alike, but I whole-heartedly endorse this agreement. It is a result of hard work and of compromise in the best sense of that word, of democratically elected representatives from all levels of government, from all regions and territories, from all political parties and involving our aboriginal people. That is why I will support the agreement.

However, the details of the agreement alone are not what this vote is all about. This vote on October 26 is about Canadians participating in a process to get Canada working again. The question is very sharp and unequivocal, requiring a simple yes or no. The issue is clear: continue or terminate.

I also believe it is not fear-mongering to simply put the stark reality of what a no vote could mean. A no answer could set in motion an irreversible unravelling of our national fabric of health care, education, transportation, social services, justice system, business cohesion, fiscal integrity and national defence. All the essential ingredients of our country would be at risk and could ultimately be compromised.

We owe it to ourselves and future generations to look beyond the details of this agreement and recognize the ultimate outcome of a no answer.

Let me say that I am the son of immigrants who fled the Soviet Union and came to Canada in 1923. My parents taught me to love Canada, to thank God for Canada and to work for the people of this great land, the best in the world. We know that and now the United Nations is saying that as well.

Canadians do not do much flag waving. In fact we complain far too much and we are far too cynical about ourselves and of our great nation. But October 26 gives us a chance to brag a bit, to feel good again and to purge some of the cynicism and some of the poison from our system and say yes to Canada and to say yes to our future. We owe that to ourselves and we owe that to the rest of the world that looks to Canada and to Canadians as a beacon of hope, good will, tolerance and common sense in a world that desperately needs those qualities.

To close, I would like to quote from George Brown who in 1865, during the American Civil War, said: "We are endeavouring to adjust harmoniously greater difficulties that have plunged others into all of the horrors of civil war. Have we not then cause of thankfulness that we have found a better way for the solution of our troubles?"

Canadians have found a better way. On October 26 we can vote yes and continue in that tradition of the better way in which we can build one another up as fellow Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, newspapers like La Presse in Quebec have already printed surveys which show that half the people who would have voted yes to that agreement would have done so because they were fed up with the constitutional debate. I was particularly shocked to hear, a few weeks ago, people like Bourassa, Mulroney and Clark, the ones who proposed that agreement, say that Canadians were fed up with the constitutional debate and that that could be used as an argument. That strategy has surely worked because nearly half the people who would vote yes would do so not because they believe the agreement is a good one, but rather because they are fed up with the constitutional debate. Constitutional weariness is what I want to talk about today because it is a fact. It is affecting not only those who may find the agreement unsatisfactory, but also those who oppose this particular deal. Constitutional weariness is affecting everybody. One thing is sure: we are suffering from constitutional weariness. But could it have to do with the length of the debate? Could it be due to constant and persistent lying on the part of the leaders who prepared this agreement? Are we going to ask the people of Quebec to vote for this agreement because we feel they have had it up to here with unkept promised? Is that what we have in mind?

• (1710)

Let me tell you straight out what I think. If people are suffering from constitutional weariness—not so much the fact of being fed up with the Constitution or a particular piece of legislation but that of being tired of being taken for a ride and lied to by politicians elected to make decisions—it is because these very politicians, often for the sake of playing for time, talk absolute nonsense, loosing any credibility in the eyes of the people.

They may well end up sickening the people. Then to turn around and ask them to vote for this agreement, just because they have had enough of the lies they have been hearing for the past seven or eight years, up to thirty years in some instances, that is a bit much. I do not fall for it and, come voting day, I am convinced that the people of Quebec will not fall in that trap either.

This reminds me of an issue that has been one hot issue in Quebec for the longest time, and that is public funding. You remember, Mr. Speaker, do you not? You had even spoken in support of it at the time. You may also recall that it was one the main themes of the Mulroney government platform in the last campaign. As a matter of fact, it was used as an umbrella to prevent the scandals they were plagued with from getting out of hand during the campaign.

At the very end of the campaign, three days before polling day, the Prime Minister solemnly promised the people of Quebec, and it made the headlines in La Presse, that he would establish democratic public funding the very next day following his re-election. How did he play for time after that? He set up committees and commissions then waited a few months. When complaints about him not keeping his word started flying again, he said: "This is a somewhat complicated issue.

We are going to strike a royal commission of inquiry." The Lortie commission went to great lengths for some three years I guess, to bury the problem. Today the Prime Minister operates under the assumption that the people do not remember. He thinks that the people are so fed up that they will have forgotten. He thinks he can go before the people in the next election and tell them: "No, this is no longer valid". He believes that is the way of keeping his credibility intact. But that is not the way things work in the real world. Next time around the people of Quebec will pay the Prime Minister back for his constant lying. They will give him a ticket, all right, a one-way ticket. That is how you thank people who deceive you.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon, member, but I notice that he has referred to lies and lying on four occasions already. I believe it is contrary to parliamentary practice to ascribe such intentions to our colleagues. I would therefore urge him to be more careful from now on.

Mr. Gérin: As I was saying, the people will remember. With regard to the constitutional agreement, this one point in particular.

Mr. Bourassa told us, I do not know how many times, from the beginning that there would never be an equal Senate where Quebec would have the same weight as Prince Edward Island, which is as big as my riding and has almost the same population, a Senate where Quebec would have as much clout as Newfoundland, for example, or any other province. Quebec will never be treated like the rest of the province. He told us that constantly, all the time. He repeated it. Today he accepts it. People are fed up, disgusted, but I do not think that is a reason to vote for the agreement. I do not think that is a reason.

Both the Prime Minister of Canada and the premier of Quebec told us that Quebec's five conditions for repairing the affront of 1982, the five minimum conditions of Meech, would be guaranteed and there would never be less than that. It was a prerequisite, a precondition.

Three years ago, the Prime Minister began the downward slide into accepting anything with the Charest commission. Mr. Bourassa signed this agreement or this offer from English Canada. They have completely broken their promises. Mr. Bourassa said that he would never negotiate again with 10 partners. This time he did not negotiate with 10 but with 16.

Today, with a decision to make for or against the agreement, the same Mr. Bourassa and Mr. Mulroney ask Quebecers to vote for it not because it is good but because they have had enough. So much so that the Conseil du patronat du Québec says today that we will have to vote for it but without enthusiasm. We will have to vote for it because it is the best we can hope for. That does not mean it is good. There will be nothing better. We are not worth much, are we? Then he adds: "Why couldn't we have more? Well, when you have to negotiate with 16 others, it is very hard to come up with a good agreement". It comes down to that. He says: "Well, we will support it".

We have had 30 years of debate on the Canadian Constitution. In the 1980 referendum, Quebecers were told to vote no, to vote against the question put to them and we would have a renewed federalism in which Quebec would have a place of honour. What happened? A year and a half later English Canada, in Quebec's absence, came up with a constitution that forced Quebec to take its punishment. It was an affront, a slap in the face. That was the answer.

We wanted to correct that affront with an agreement. Today we are told: "Well, you will have to take it. It will be enough. It is better than nothing. We cannot offer you more". Do you think Quebecers will accept that just because they are fed up with the constitutional debate? Personally, I think we can do better.

When we are fed up with something and have had it we must consider why. The reason we are disgusted is people have not been able to keep their promises. They say one thing one day and something else the next. They are politicians who cannot be trusted any more. All the polls show that throughout Canada, in Quebec but also across Canada, people have lost confidence in their institutions. Why? For those reasons.

I really hate that so-called agreement. It bothers me. It makes me sick, but I cannot vote for it by saying that will be the end of all that. I cannot sweep it under the rug like that. None of the problems raised by Quebec is solved by that agreement.

The agreement itself contains 79 points still to be discussed. They even wrote that. On the one hand they say: "You must vote for this agreement because you are sick of hearing about it". They say we should vote for the agreement because it is time we went on to other things, but on the other hand, they say there are still 79 items to discuss and finalize. Anyone who thinks the constitutional debate will end on October 26 when people vote in favour of the agreement is greatly mistaken. The leaders on the yes side are making a case based on arguments that are totally misleading. I am shocked and appalled.

The Bloc Quebecois, however, offers a valid alternative, to tell people the truth. Bloc leader Lucien Bouchard gave up ministerial privileges including staff, additional allowances and a limousine. Bloc members also gave up a lot of privileges such as trips abroad. My friends opposite know exactly what I mean. On the other hand they now have a chance to tell people the truth and nothing but.

Today the truth is yes, we are fed up with the constitutional debate; yes, 30 years of this is more than enough; and yes, some people are incapable of making decisions when they are supposed to. There are governments that govern by opinion polls, their only interest being in getting re-elected when election time come up, which applies both to the Mulroney government and the Bourassa government. However, some people realize that and will say no to the agreement because they are sick and tired of this kind of treatment.

We can hardly be expected to applaud in a supine position. Why should we applaud the fact that we have to get down on our knees? I think that is beneath our dignity.

Why should Quebec, which is demanding a number of historic rights, accept this agreement and say yes? Quebec has at least as many rights as the aboriginal people. The point is that Quebec's historic rights are extremely important. We cannot sell our birthright for a mess of pottage. There are a number of issues that are extremely important. If our leaders, our first ministers, are unable to meet their commitments, to keep their promises, to respect Quebec as it is and in such a way that Quebec will feel at home in Canada and will again become a part of the Canadian family, with honour and enthusiasm, to quote the Prime Minister, if they cannot do that then they should get out, and If they do not go willingly there will be an election pretty soon.

Next year there will be a federal election, and there will probably be a number of elections at the provincial level as well. Then we will be able to deal with the real problems, because we are not getting anywhere here in the House.

We are being asked to approve an agreement without any kind of legal text. We are given a document that is not a final text and we are told that the final version will not be ready until Christmas, but just the same we are being asked to approve this one on October 26.

Why the hurry all of a sudden when the Charest committee, the Spicer commission, Castonguay-Dobbie and Beaudoin-Dobbie met for months and this was in addition to the constitutional conferences? All of a sudden we are confronted with a non-definitive draft agreement, no text, and it is all very urgent. As members of this House neither I nor my colleagues have been asked to work on this text. It was drafted without any consultation with Parliament. The best face they can put on this is to say: "Vote for this agreement because it is the best we can do. In any case, you are so fed up you might as well vote in favour of the agreement to get rid of the whole thing".

I am sure Quebecers will pronounce a resounding no to this proposal and this charade.

[English]

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I am most pleased to be able to speak on this historic occasion. Like many Canadians I have roots in all parts of Canada. When my father emigrated from Russia he landed in Montreal, moved on to Winnipeg, and settled in Edmonton. My mother was born in southern Quebec. I was born in Alberta, my wife was born in British Columbia, my daughters lived in Nova Scotia, Ontario and Quebec. I have aunts, uncles, brothers-in-law, sisters-in-law, nieces and nephews in every part of Canada.

For me, the loss and cutting off of one part of Canada would mean the loss and cutting off of part of my family. I, as a Canadian, will not allow this to happen. That is why I am supporting the accord reached in Charlottetown.

I am one of these people who has had some unique opportunities. I have been a negotiator for unions. I have also been a negotiator for management. I have negotiated on both sides. I have made recommendations to principals to accept the outcomes of negotiations on numerous occasions. Not once were those recommendations based on the fact that I had got everything I wanted, that I had got everything I had asked for, wished for, or dreamed for; or that the deal was perfect or that was going to be the last time there was going to be discussion about it. Contracts, like constitutions, are living. They are not static and they will evolve. However, I made recommendations based on the premise that at this time that was the best deal I could arrive at.

For me, the constitutional accord had a number of bottom lines. It had things which I felt had to be there for me to support it. There were five of them in particular. Some other minor ones, but five in particular. First, there had to be justice for our aboriginal people.

For 200 years we have kept the aboriginal peoples from controlling their own lives and their own destiny. We have stopped them from fulfilling their potential, fulfilling it in their own way and within their own culture and values. This constitutional agreement, through its recognition of the inherent right to self-government, meets my concerns to allow for justice for our first peoples. The fact that the aboriginal peoples will also be guaranteed seats in the Senate strengthens their rights and recognizes their special status in Canada.

The second point that this constitution had to include was what we call a social charter. There had to be some recognition that Canadians had social rights within this country, and this agreement does that. I am most pleased to see that it sets out policy objectives. The first is providing throughout Canada a health care system that is comprehensive, universal, portable, publicly administered and accessible. Right now in British Columbia that is very important because our medical association has gone on record stating that it does not support those five principles of public medicare. They are now enshrined in the Constitution.

• (1730)

It provides for adequate social services and benefits to ensure reasonable access to housing, food and other basic necessities. It provides an objective for quality education, both primary and secondary. For me and people who have been involved in labour, it recognizes the rights of workers to organize and to be collectively represented. It recognizes the need to preserve and sustain the integrity of the environment, not only now but in the future.

It met my concerns around the second point, guarantees for social rights.

My third bottom line was to abolish that abomination of a non-elected Senate. We are in a democratic society in which we are still being governed by people who are appointed in a manner that is reminiscent of colonialism and the landed property rights of the wealthy. There is nothing more insidious than that other place has been over the years. It is an anachronism in a democracy. No other modern democracy would have tolerated it for the length of time that Canadians have.

This agreement finally abolishes the non-elected Senate. It provides us with an elected Senate that equally represents the provinces and has a meaningful role in the government of this country.

My fourth requirement was that this Constitution, and I am sorry that the previous speaker has had to leave, gives Quebec the tools and resources it needs to maintain itself as a distinct society in terms of its language and its culture.

I visited Quebec on many occasions and I love it. I love it because it is French. It is a different culture and a different society. That is what makes it so valuable. It is the one thing that I sometimes cannot understand when I talk to people, particularly people from the Reform Party. They seem not to understand that the very thing that makes Quebec so valuable to Canada is that it is different, that it is distinct, that it does have a different culture and a different language. It is like a part of a family. If everybody in the family was the same, you would not value them. You value them because they are individual, they are different, and they are distinct. That is the value we place on Quebec.

This Constitution gives Quebec those tools.

Fifth, particularly important for me with my concern for social justice and social programs, was that the federal government had to have been left with the power to institute new national programs such as day care. This constitutional agreement makes it clear that it can.

It is still going to take a government that has the will to do it. Simply because it is permitted within a Constitution does not mean that it will automatically be done. It will take a government that has the will.

Yes, there are things that I do not like about this agreement, things that fell short of what I would have liked to see. Quite frankly I am disappointed that the federal government is surrendering so much of its responsibility in the area of social housing. There is a need for social housing programs and policies that are nation-wide and uniform.

I would have liked it if the needs and wishes of the handicapped and the visible minorities were better addressed. I certainly would have liked it if issues around promotion of gender equality were addressed more strongly in the Constitution, and felt that they could have been.

That is always what happens when you go into negotiations, you do not get everything you want. On balance you have to make a decision.

My householder is coming out. It is already being printed. I would like to read what I am saying to my constituents of Surrey North which is, as everybody knows, the fastest growing riding in Canada. It consists now of 55,000 households.

> As I write, a national referendum is being planned on the constitutional proposals agreed to by the first ministers and now being considered by Parliament.
> I urge you to take part in the debate accompanying the referendum and to make an informed voting choice.
> The constitutional process has been long and arduous but B.C. has made gains through a more equal Senate and a total of seven new House of Commons seats between now and the 1996 census redistribution.
> My own choice is to accept the agreement. I have many reservations but the social charter, the recognition of native self-government and increased B.C. power in the House of Commons are clear advances.
> We cannot start from scratch yet again and hope to retain one country—
> Vaughn Palmer, writing in The Vancouver Sun of Aug. 28, said: "This accord represents a defeat for separatism and it will allow our leaders to get on with issues like economic recovery. For those reasons alone, the deal is a good thing and we ought to accept it".

I want to say one other thing. I am not worried about the no forces being led in the province of British Columbia by the Reform Party or by the carpings of people like Gordon Wilson, the provincial leader of the Liberal Party. However, I am very much concerned about the bickering and sniping of the Tory caucus from British Columbia against the premier of B.C.

That is the only way that the referendum will be defeated in British Columbia. I urge them to unequivocally stand up, each and every one of the Tory caucus, and declare that they are fully behind this accord and fully behind the premier of British Columbia so that we may all move forward with this constitutional deal. As Vaughn Palmer says: "For those reasons alone, the deal is a good thing and we ought to accept it".

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker and hon. members, it is a very great privilege for me to stand in the House today and participate in this very important debate.

It seems to me after listening to some of the speeches that surely the truest test of democracy is its ability to withstand dissent. In this Canadian discussion we have certainly had many opposing points of view to bring forward. However, in spite of all that, on August 28 in Charlottetown Canada's first ministers and the territorial and aboriginal leaders finally reached a consensus on a number of constitutional reforms.

The path to this consensus was a long one with many stops for consultation and reflection along the way. However, I suppose that is the way it should be, because nation-building is a never-ending journey.

This journey that Canadians embarked upon to make Canada whole again and to revitalize our federation has been a long and sometimes a difficult one. There have been set-backs; there have even been set-tos. Throughout the journey all of us who had the honour and the privilege of participating in the process were inspired by one single goal, that at the end of the day if we listened to Canadians and heard what they themselves had to tell us then surely the outcome would be a stronger, more united, more modern Canada.

• (1740)

We are close to achieving that objective. On October 26 Canadians will have an opportunity to express their views on the consensus for constitutional accord that was reached and on issues that will change the fundamental laws of our land.

Consensus itself does not reflect any individual idea of perfection. Instead it is an agreement representing the majority view after all sides have been heard and have been listened to and after all issues have been thoroughly discussed. Consensus building is the modern and civilized way to deal with opposing viewpoints.

The other old way involved conflict, anger, bitterness, all those emotions that lead us blindly and ultimately to destruction. Those engaged in building consensus know that their personal opinions, their own dearly held convictions are at risk of being lost in the search for an accord that everyone can accept.

In this discussion there is no question that the me's and I's are irrelevant. What is relevant here is the common good. Certainly the August accord reflects most of the constitutional aspirations that Canadians themselves have articulated over the past number of years and months. Canadians certainly have been articulate in this particular Canada round.

Let me just tell you a little bit about some of the consultations. It began with the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future. Some 400,000 Canadians were heard. Then the special joint committee on the amending formula heard testimony from 209 witnesses and received over 500 briefs from 450 groups and individuals.

The results of these initiatives played a very important role in shaping the 28 proposals the federal government put forward last September in Shaping Canada's Future Together. This then was referred to the 30–member Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada I had the privilege of co–chairing.

Of course my committee travelled across Canada. We visited small and large communities. We heard from Canadians from all walks of life in all stations. That was part of the fulfilment of our mandate to get advice from people across the country on the government's proposals. Some 3,000 concerned individuals and groups took the time to send written submissions to the committee and another 700 appeared before us as witnesses.

The committee also initiated a series of government–sponsored conferences that involved 1,500 participants including interest groups, academics, civil servants from various levels of government, and perhaps most important but certainly most especially, ordinary Canadians. All of this led to the final unanimous report by the committee that was tabled on February 28.

Then, of course, each of the provinces and territories held constitutional hearings. The aboriginal community itself participated in the discussion and held hearings across the land.

Equipped with the results of these extensive individual consultations and dialogue, federal, provincial and territorial leaders, and for the first time in Canadian history, aboriginal leaders from Canada's four aboriginal associations met as equal partners and looked for a consensus that was already emerging.

Throughout this phase of the Canada round, reality and flexibility were the watchwords that carried the day. We had learned from the Meech Lake process that closing doors does not open minds. At the end of each day after the negotiations, people came out and said what they thought, mentioned where they had made progress, expressed their concern and involved the public in the discussions that were going on.

On July 7 unanimous agreement on the principles of constitutional reform were reached. This opened the doors that allowed Quebec to come to the table for a first ministers' conference.

Finally on August 22, after extensive discussion, the Prime Minister announced the premises and principles of this particular accord had been achieved. The first ministers, the aboriginal leaders, the territorial leaders had reached a fair and workable consensus.

I think it is very important to remember all of these things as we proceed to the debate over the referendum question, the question on the Charlottetown accord.

We must also remember consensus does not respond to any particular interest. Consensus responds to the common interest, and the common interest at hand in this particular case is to unite our diverse federation with the threads of the agreement that were spun from the consensus at Charlottetown.

It worries me greatly when I hear interest groups making statements that spurn the accord because their particular agendas are not being met. I remind all of you whose interests may not have been specifically addressed that this is not the final constitutional round. I remind you the Constitution is a living tree with roots going deep into our past to find nourishment and growth for the future.

There will be another chance. In the meantime of course we are all protected by the kind of country Canada is, by its social order, by the genesis in the British parliamentary system and the guarantees that are already contained in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. No single interest can prevail in this particular discussion.

As I said before, there will be other times for compelling interests still to be heard and ultimately entrenched in the Constitution if it is proven they are for the greater good of our country and our society.

Let us turn now to what is in the accord. The first thing that strikes me as I read the document is that it is an affirmative document. It is a document that is positive and expresses things that say yes.

It is an affirmative statement about the interdependence of the partners in the Canadian federation. It is an affirmative statement about Quebec's right to remain in Canada while maintaining its language and its custom of civil law, both of which created a distinct, unique culture. I might just say this distinctiveness lends character to all of us as Canadians as well. I do not think any Canadian who thinks about it for very long will agree that Canada would be Canada without Quebec.

The Charlottetown consensus is also an affirmation or statement about the kind of nation we are, a parliamentary democracy wherein people respect and care for each other and where we draw strength from our diversity and from our individuality. It is an affirmative statement about our ability to be flexible about our institutions, open to changes that respond to the imperatives of the times.

It seeks to rebalance the sharing of power, to maintain the integrity of a strong federal government in a federal system. It seeks to empower first peoples by returning to them their right to determine their own affairs. It seeks to address an old and compelling sense of alienation and regional imbalance through changes to the Senate and through entrenched first ministers' conferences where matters of the federation can be addressed in a regular and more productive basis.

These are the issues, the important premises and principles that Canadians must keep in mind as we go through the next weeks of this discussion about the particular question at hand. It is important that we not be side-tracked by single special interests. It is important we set aside our special interests in the pursuit of a common goal.

We also must resist the temptation to get bogged down in wrangling over details or even more interestingly, get caught up in the fascinating but often unproductive exercise of constitutional hair-splitting.

When all is said and done most of us want the same things. We want fairness, equality, freedom, respect, prosperity, and the ability to have a say in the things and decisions that will affect us. Most of us want desperately to keep this country together because these are the things that Canada stands for. These are the things that are reaffirmed in this constitutional accord.

• (1750)

As we have heard before perhaps we do not have perfection here, but if it is not perfection, at least we know it is an honest attempt by honest men and women and by honest people everywhere in Canada to build a better country, one that will last for a millennium, a country for the future.

Mrs. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured today to rise to the debate on the referendum and the Constitution of Canada, the renewed Canada's Constitution.

This debate is not about our past; this debate is about our future. It is about reordering our constitutional priorities in a way that will better reflect who and what we are as a nation and what we want to become.

In the process of finding solutions many different options were put forward. The agreement reached between federal, provincial and territorial governments and the representatives of aboriginal Canadians is not the perfect solution to all our problems. Everyone recognizes that fact and it has been stated over and over again in the House.

Many of us on both sides of this House have many questions about different aspects of this new arrangement. For example, there is no national economic union clause. That begs for more discussion.

Of course many would say it is an imperfect Senate because there is a trade-off there. Effectiveness is traded off for equality in the number of seats. Delay in the justiciability of self-government to five years rather than immediacy. Perhaps too great a shift to the provinces and the weakening of the federal government's role and the true meaning of a strong central government.

Some problems of course are referred to with the ambiguity of the words in the question itself which states "on the basis of" and means that the Charlottetown accord will be subject to interpretation by several different governments.

However, I personally believe that the deficiencies of this constitutional package do not outweigh its many positive aspects. For that reason, I intend to encourage the support of this agreement and encourage all Canadians, northerners, aboriginal people, women, minority groups, all Canadians to vote yes on the referendum on October 26.

It seems clear to me and to most other Canadians that after several years of trying and after the failure of the last attempt to reach a constitutional consensus, this proposal is the best we can expect.

I have personally been involved in several rounds of constitutional discussions. I have learned a lot and I pay tribute to those members of Parliaments, the people who provided legal advice from the various departments and from our party's perspective and to the senators who have the accumulative experience to have shared with us. It has been an honour to serve with people like Senator MacEachen and to learn from these people who have been through numerous rounds on the Constitution.

I was on the Charest committee and the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee. I have also had some dealings with the Meech Lake accord and with the last first minister's conference which I feel was a dismal failure, not just a failure for individuals but a failure for this country. It was a failure for First Nations and a failure for northerners.

I always said that I would accept Meech Lake amended and I believe what we have with this particular consensus is Meech plus. I am satisfied the aspirations of the north will be met because with the Northwest Territories we wanted to have the pre-1982 conditions prevail for the creation of new provinces and this deal gives us that.

We have a yes team in the Northwest Territories. I spoke to the Minister for Aboriginal Rights and Constitutional Development who has worked very hard for the north and the aspirations of northern peoples. He definitely agrees with this consensus that we have reached and would support what was agreed to in Charlottetown.

We also have a premier in the north, Nellie Cournoyea, who worked very hard. We had Rosemary Kuptana from the Northwest Territories who is the president of ITC. We also have Roger Gruben, president of the Inuvialuit Development Regional Corporation, who is also very instrumental. We also have John A. I always call John Amagoalik John A, the other John A, who also played a role in numerous rounds of the Constitution. We have Gary Bohnet who represents the Métis First Nations in the Northwest Territories.

These people have made a significant contribution. We have other people who have contributed from the north who have contributed as well. Because I am a northerner, I have to speak of northerners. These people are Mary Simon from northern Quebec who is adviser to Rosemary Kuptana. We have Francoise Paulet who participated in the AFN's national circle on Constitution.

I want to say that I feel that after numerous rounds on the Constitution we have come to a point, come to a position where we have to say this is good enough. This is as good as it can get.

I am prepared to make that commitment. I am prepared to stand with my party and with my people and say that if we proceed to open up this whole can of worms again we stand to lose everything. I believe we have achieved a lot on the inherent right to self-government. We have the four national leaders to thank for that.

We have the Assembly of First Nations Chief, Ovide Mercredi, we have Ron George from the Native Council of Canada. We also have Yvon Dumont from the Métis and we have Rosemary Kuptana from the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada.

Northerners and aboriginal people have made a significant contribution to what will become the renewed Canada. Aboriginal Canadians love this country. They love this land. They use this land. The rivers are not just scenery. The mountains are not just to look at. They are there because the aboriginal people claim title. The reason they claim title and the reason that aboriginal people find it unacceptable to extinguish their rights is that they really believe that if you utilize the land, if you respect it, you cannot be separated from it. That to us is what is Canada.

I am proud today to say: "Canada, you have my support. My people are important to me. This country is important to me. As aboriginal people we are going to contribute. There were many concessions that were made on all sides, but I have to tell you, Canada, you have my yes".

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, it is with honour and with great pleasure that I stand here today to take part in this historic debate on the Charlottetown accord. At the end of the day we will have the vote that will be set down in history.

I would like to take this opportunity to join with my colleagues in the House in congratulating the minister for constitutional affairs, the member for Yellowhead, for his work. It has been a hard road for him as well as for all Canadians, but we now see the light at the end of the tunnel.

I believe that when one looks at the positive side, and there are many positive factors, of the whole constitutional debate that has taken place in recent months, one can only conclude that it has brought us closer together and has made us more aware of one another.

This proposal is a result of numerous forums and public meetings, national and regional consultations with aboriginals, women's groups, with all kinds of organizations and business interests. As the Leader of the Opposition said Tuesday, we have been consulting on the Constitution since 1980.

I can report that many of my constituents took the time to tell me of their feelings about Canada and what follows is a summary of those. We now have completed the consultation process and we are at the pinnacle of our democratic system, the preparation necessary for holding a national referendum.

• (1800)

In April 1991 the Leader of the Opposition proposed the use of a referendum. I am extremely pleased that the federal government took the initiative to utilize this process.

We have been committed to this process every step of the way. The polls indicated that Canadians wanted a referendum and now each and every one of them will have the opportunity to help decide this country's future. October 26, 1992 will give every Canadian an incredible sense of pride to be able to mark their ballot.

The outcome of the October 26 vote will be a yes to Canada, a yes to a stronger and much better Canada.

Canadians are eager to turn the page on the Constitution. They are anxious to deal with another ailment, the economy. We have record unemployment in this country and we are facing many new challenges as we prepare for the 21st century. Now we will have the tools to face these new challenges as the country will function as a unit, as a team.

I realize that time does not permit me to speak on all the points that I wish to, but I would like to address a few issues. I am pleased that our initiative to have a Canada clause has been accepted and that it ensures a commitment by all Canadians to the future of this country. The commitment to linguistic duality also gives the two official linguistic groups an opportunity to flourish and to guarantee under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms the protection of individuals' rights.

For all of us, economic union is of the utmost importance. How can we expect to be competitive in the world market when we cannot resolve our country's interprovincial barriers? It is difficult to understand that we can have a free trade agreement with the United States and we can be taking part in negotiations on NAFTA, and yet interprovincial trade has met with numerous obstacles with no agreement in sight. We must become united economically. I strongly believe that protectionism defeats to a certain extent the spirit of the Charlottetown agreement.

In 1982 the Liberal Party enshrined in its constitution the inherent right for native self-government. I am very pleased that since then the concept has evolved and many first nation communities are prepared to determine and to control their destiny according to their values and traditions. However, this objective can only be attained if the federal government and the provincial governments supply them with the economic tools favouring a balanced development of the communities.

I do have some reservations about the Senate. I really question the logic behind the allocation of senators. Do we really need a Senate in its proposed form? If we are to have a Senate we must ensure that it is useful, that it has adequate powers to be effective. Moreover, I fail to see how a senator could emulate his duties as a legislator as well as answer his constituents' needs. For example, a senator in my province of Ontario would have well over 1.5 million people to serve. It is not humanly possible to do both jobs adequately. It should be revisited, as it needs much improvement.

For the time being we have come a long way and years down the road we will look back with pride and a sigh of relief at this period in history. Once again I would like to say that I am pleased that on October 26 Canadians will be voting in a national referendum. Canadians will, once and for all, put the record straight by voting to strengthen the bonds that bind our regions together and retain this country called Canada.

This morning I was standing in my office and on the wall I have a framed copy of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The quote at the end of the charter summarizes exactly what we are trying to accomplish: "We must now establish the basic principles, the basic values and beliefs which hold us together as Canadians so that beyond our regional loyalties there is a way of life and a system of values which makes us proud of the country that has given us such freedom and such immeasurable joy".

We are the envy of the world and I am proud to be a Canadian.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise in the House in support of this consensus report on the Constitution reached in Charlottetown on August 28, 1992. I am also delighted to be here in the company of members of the House from all sides who are supporting this consensus.

We in Canada are privileged to engage in what is surely one of the most fundamental exercises of democratic tradition, a national referendum on a renewed Constitution, the fundamental document of our democracy.

There are millions of people around the world at this very moment who are not privileged, whose disagreements are settled by bullets instead of by debate, whose freedoms are defined by command instead of by consensus, whose futures depend on the laws of force instead of the force of laws.

As Canada's Secretary of State for External Affairs for the past 17 months, I have been honoured to represent Canadians at the most important international organizations in the world, the United Nations, the Commonwealth, la Francophonie, the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, the Organization of American States, to name just a few.

[Translation]

In each of these organizations, Canada's voice is very special and highly respected because it speaks for tolerance, respect for diversity and human rights, progress, prosperity and above all peace and stability.

[English]

Our achievements in these regards are reinforced by our actions, whether in the dangerous battlefield surrounding Sarajevo or in the desolation of Somalia. In Cambodia, in the Middle East, in Central America, Asia and in the South Pacific Canada is a welcome intervener, whether as a peacekeeper or a mediator or as a partner in development through trade or through assistance.

There are very few people, citizens of very few nations of the world, who are accorded the same passe-partout that is accorded to Canada and to Canadians. We are blessed with a very special measure of goodwill from virtually all of the peoples of the world. This goodwill does not show up in our national accounts, certainly not directly, but it is a very real part of our national heritage, a heritage that we have built as Canadians together, one that is shared by all Canadians.

When the nations of the world see Canada, they do not see a collection of provinces. They see one country, Canada; a country where the whole is greater than the sum of the parts. When they hear Canadian voices at international meetings they do not question the fact that we speak English or French or a combination. They hear the voice of one country, Canada, and they know the message they are hearing is an important one.

When Canadian teachers or athletes or business people go abroad, people in their host countries do not ask if they are aboriginal or first generation or second generation. They are welcomed as the citizens of one country, Canada.

At the United Nations the face of Canada is a francophone woman from Montreal. Our face in Latin America is a man from McLennan, Alberta, and at NATO it is a native from Ontario who speaks for all Canadians.

• (1810)

The faces of Canada abroad are much the same as the faces in this Chamber and the faces on our streets and neighbourhoods around this great nation.

These people many times over the past several years of gruelling constitutional negotiations and discussions have time and again been asked: What is happening to Canada? Will Canada stay together?

They will now be able to answer those questions with a resounding yes, Canada will stay together. Yes, Canadians have sorted out their differences in the great Canadian democratic tradition. Yes, Canadians have found new ways to live together in our diversity as neighbours and as friends with dignity and with respect for one another.

Yes, we have reformed our institutions to enhance our democratic principles. Yes, we have provided fundamental justice to our first peoples. Yes, we have rebalanced internal roles and responsibilities to ensure continued progress and prosperity. Yes, we have developed new processes that can be a shining light to those peoples throughout the world who seek sometimes at great cost their own democracy.

Yes, the shining torch of our ideals, our values, our principles can be passed to the next generation and to many generations to come. Most of all, yes, we have done this despite disagreement, despite tension, through discussion with sensitivity and a sense of compromise with our only weapons: reason and love of country.

[Translation]

It will be a great day for the nations of the world because Canada has always had a reputation as a country that uses democracy to the limit. That it can reach this limit without oppression and bloodshed is a lesson that many other countries will want to learn thoroughly, whatever their own stage of democratic development.

Seeing a modern Canada emerge from this process even stronger and better prepared to face the challenges of the next century, they will be even more inclined to follow us on the paths of peace.

I just said how well disposed other countries in the world are towards Canada. Our great success in resolving our own internal conflicts can only strengthen that good feeling.

[English]

Canada and Canadians have never backed down in the face of suffering or adversity, from the Canadian soldiers with roots from all parts of Canada who died in distant places through two world wars, in Korea and in numerous peacekeeping missions, to the proud young men and women who carry the name Canada on their uniforms today to new and dangerous situations.

We have been and will continue to be a force for peace and justice in the world. We are on the verge of achieving inner peace and that will only strengthen our resolve to bring this same gift to the many troubled nations of the world.

Two weeks from today I will have the honour of addressing on behalf of our country the nations of the world at the 47th session of the United Nations General Assembly, an association that Canada was very active in founding. Much of my speech will deal with the quest for peace in the world, for the need for democratic development and the protection of basic human rights.

As I deliver those words in New York my thoughts will be with the thousands of Canadians who serve us around the world and those other thousands of Canadians who participated in our discussions at home through commissions and task forces, whose valuable work and insights ultimately guided the agreement reached in Charlottetown.

They have done a great service not just for Canada but for the world's community of nations. They have wrestled with many of the same problems and shown that there are in fact reasonable and honourable solutions peacefully achieved.

By saying yes to Canada, Canadians will play no small part in establishing a standard for peace and tolerance to be emulated by all the nations of the world.

When I see how other countries are tearing themselves apart through ethnic hatreds, whose roots are lost in the obscure myths of history, I thank God for our country and I thank God for our success in achieving this solution so recently come to that is bringing us even closer together as Canadians. I think as well that were Canada to fail, God help the world.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to say a few words here today on behalf of my riding on an issue which future generations will most likely judge to be of great historical importance.

The agreement reached at the Charlottetown conference is the culmination of five years debate and it needs to be supported as a major step toward the evolution of our Constitution.

Previous speakers have mentioned people in their provinces, the Prime Minister has lauded a number of people who have participated in the debate leading up to the agreement, and members of my party and the New Democratic Party have done likewise, but I do not think anyone has mentioned to this point the contribution made by the host of the Charlottetown conference, Premier Joseph A. Ghiz.

Premier Ghiz over the past five years of constitutional debates, successes and failures, has always had the national good first and foremost in mind. The provincial interest of Prince Edward Island he felt would naturally be taken care of if the national good was taken care of first.

He always believed in a country which included all provinces, which included all people within those provinces. He has made an immeasurable contribution to the success of the Charlottetown agreement and I believe he will be recognized in the future as one of the new fathers of this country.

One of the things which Premier Ghiz agreed to and which still seems to be a centre of debate not only with government members but with members of my own party, was an equal Senate.

Prince Edward Island, regardless of its population and regardless of the fact it has four members of Parliament, is much more than that. There are ridings in this country which are much bigger than Prince Edward Island, there are ridings in this country which have a greater population than Prince Edward Island, but these ridings never were, are not, and never will be provinces.

Prince Edward Island was accepted as a province in 1873 after a number of years of courtship by John A. Macdonald and the other Fathers of Confederation to enter into the Canadian union. Finally they accepted and agreed to become a participant in Confederation and they were accepted as a province by the Fathers and have been a province ever since.

The new concept of the Senate I believe is long overdue. It not only recognizes Prince Edward Island as an equal to our sister provinces, it also will be able to play an effective role because of its legitimacy as an elected body in forming legislation for the eastern region. The Atlantic region and the western region combined will have 80 per cent of the Senate. It says in one of the booklets which were passed out that the Senate could have prevented policies like the National Energy Program and the GST from ever happening. I would think if that is true, and I believe it is true, I believe the reorganization of the Senate is probably three years too late in one regard for Prince Edward Island. If that Senate had been in effect in 1989 the closure of the search and rescue facility in Prince Edward Island and more particularly in St. Eleanor's and Summerside would not have happened. I think the Canadian people recognized that particular move as a very unfair policy of a very vindictive government. I think they would have stopped that particular policy move and Prince Edward Island still would have enjoyed a military base as each of the other provinces do.

As we know, the federal government and the 10 premiers, the two territorial leaders and the leaders of our aboriginal peoples have come together in an historic, classic Canadian compromise. Rejection of this accord would not guarantee that some time down the road we would have a better deal. What it would guarantee, however, are many more years of tortuous constitutional debate. Canadians have been beaten to death by this constitutional debate.

For the past five long years they have undergone such a constitutional bombardment that now throughout the country there is a desperate cry for relief. Accompanying this cry is a growing demand for action on what is considered the real problems of this country. The people of Canada want this forum here, this House of Commons to get down and address the real day-to-day problems of this country, whether it is the 1.6 million people who are on unemployment insurance, the many more who have given up even looking for work and the many who have had to go to relief or welfare. The people of this country, and I think with good reason, want us to get on with the business of this country, governing this country and creating jobs for the Canadian people.

Despite all these problems that we have had, a few short months ago the UN chose Canada as the best place in the world to live. After 125 years we are now at the top of the heap as far as the 160 most developed countries in the world are concerned. I do not think we are prepared as a people to throw this rating down the drain. There are very few Canadians who do not realize what will happen economically if this particular agreement is not supported.

In conclusion, I want to say that I am prepared in my riding of Egmont to form a non-partisan group of political parties, of Royal Canadian Legions, of businessmen, whatever it takes to make sure that the vote in my particular riding is a positive vote for this country.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, the Charlottetown agreement represents the culmination of the most inclusive public political process that this country has ever experienced, a process which is in sharp contrast to the Meech Lake process where we saw a small group of men cook up a deal behind closed doors. The Charlottetown agreement was preceded by the Spicer commission. It had the input of the Allaire report, the Belanger-Campeau report, the Edwards' committee report, the Beaudoin-Dobbie report, provincial reports, public constitutional forum reports which were held across this country and televised and which included the direct active participation of hundreds and hundreds of Canadians. Last but not least, it includes the recorded opinion of my constituents in Northumberland who responded to constitutional meetings and public forums, surveys and submission requests.

As a Liberal member of the House of Commons, I did not have a personal, direct role in the formulation of the Charlottetown agreement, yet I endorse it. I did have an ample opportunity to input to the Liberal Party of Canada constitutional policy process.

I am especially proud of our leader and our constitutional affairs critic for their leadership in moving the proposal in directions which I believe reflect the history, tradition, values and wishes of the majority of Canadians. Of course they were closely and diligently assisted by other members of our caucus.

I was particularly proud when our leader appeared in 1991 before the Belanger-Campeau commission, the only federal politician to speak unequivocally and forcefully in Quebec in support of a strong, central federal government.

What we have before us today and what we are being asked to vote upon by referendum on October 26 is the so-called Charlottetown agreement, a final constitutional agreement. Because it represents the final consensus of the federal government, 10 premiers, leaders of the territories and aboriginal leaders who reflected upon all the earlier mentioned reports, I believe it has validity as a document and must be seriously considered by all Canadians.

Since the end of last week we have had copies of the actual agreement text as agreed to at the meeting in Charlottetown. The fact that we do not have the legal language translation of this is not in my opinion terribly relevant although cast as essential by those who would oppose supporting this agreement, I suspect for other reasons.

The agreement in plain English is before us and is available to anyone in the constituency of Northumberland or Canada who wishes a copy. We do want Canadians to be fully informed on what they are being asked to make a decision on October 26.

Although the Charlottetown agreement represents a broad consensus of opinion it is not perfect, but I believe it is not possible to produce the perfect agreement, the perfect agreement to meet all of my concerns and the concerns of each and every Canadian.

Nonetheless, the agreement encompasses some very important principles and values which will enhance the character and well-being of all in our country. It will allow us to take a fresh breath of Canadian air, clear our minds of constitutional legalities, and have a vision of a new prosperous future in Canada and a perspective of Canada's important and respected place in the international community.

I am particularly pleased that the Charlottetown agreement recognizes the inherent rights of our native peoples to self-government. I am pleased that the agreement recognizes Canada's historical heritage of linguistic duality and that it recognizes Quebec's distinctiveness.

The desire of Canadians to encompass all Canadians' heritages and cultures within our mosiac is important. These positive messages must be conveyed to all citizens.

I am, however, disappointed that we did not achieve the economic union we advocated and that the Senate reform falls far short of the ideal. I do believe that much can be done to correct these inadequacies through House of Commons rules and the amending formula encompassed in the agreement.

Canadians will be urged by me to support the Charlottetown agreement. We are all weary of the constitutional issue, as my leader says: "sick to death". We are not going to get a better alternative. We have a culmination of many ideas, visions in this agreement. We do not now have room for destructive prejudice and historical misunderstandings to undermine our achievements to date.

We must get on in this country to deal at the national level with the issues that are crippling and plaguing our country: joblessness, poverty, economic and regional woes of every sort, environmental issues, equity issues and legal issues.

I will work in my riding of Northumberland to continue the public information process begun several months ago. I am promoting the organization in Northumberland of an official yes committee and will encourage all political parties, all groups and individuals who support a yes vote, to participate.

I will hold more public forums in centres such as Port Hope, Cobourg, Colborne, Campbellford, Brighton, and Trenton, much the same as was done by me previously in Northumberland, to get my constituents' views into the constitution development process.

I am anxious to meet with school groups, clubs, organizations, ad hoc groups of constituents at any time between now and October 26 in order to help in building an understanding of the Charlottetown agreement. I am pleased that the Liberal Party request and the wishes of 98 per cent of my constituents for this referendum are being met. Our Northumberland yes committee will endeavour to get a resounding yes to the Charlottetown constitutional agreement and to Canada on October 26.

• (1830)

In closing I would like to remind other Canadians and my constituents of Canada's very special qualities through the words of a constituent, Phetwaney Luangrath, who arrived in Canada from Southeast Asia as a refugee at age 5 and who now, at 19, won a Cobourg Rotary Club essay on the theme of Canada and national pride. After living a year in a refugee camp in Thailand, she writes:

> We had the opportunity to apply to the country in which we wished to live. The countries that one could apply to were the United States, Canada, France and Germany. My family applied to Canada, a place we had heard believed in freedom, dignity, respect, equality and fair treatment and was a country of opportunities. These were all the qualities for which my family was looking.

In conclusion she writes:

> I do not think that a parent can do anything more special for their family than bring them to a country of peace and freedom.

Let us all reflect upon the words of this young Canadian. Let us all with open minds endeavour to understand the choice we are being asked to make on October 26, consider the implications of refusal and make an unequivocal choice for a renewed Canada, a land where we envision future generations of Canadians living in peace and freedom and with an abundance of opportunity and well-being for all.

[Translation]

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, the question we should be debating today is: Do you agree to give your governments the mandate of negotiating changes to the Canadian Constitution on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992? Yes or no.

We are really dealing with endless negotiations here. Indeed, in this 60-point agreement, Mr. Jean Allaire from the Quebec Liberal Party picked out 60 points requiring negotiation or clarification following the referendum. What we are really asked for is a mandate to negotiate without a deadline.

I guess that when the Minister of National Health and Welfare and member for Roberval says that he does not want to hear about the Constitution after October 26, that is just his way of telling us he plans to resign, probably in hope of being appointed ambassador, something he has been dreaming of for months.

The question is not whether there will be further negotiations but whether we agree to further negotiations on the basis of the preliminary agreement reached on August 28, 1992. To believe that this referendum will close the constitutional debate is pure nonsense. Especially considering that, under the guise of a democratic process we are asked to surrender all our aspirations. We are asked to accept minority status under federal authority. What the proposal really amounts to for the people of Quebec is the slow death so well described by Mrs. Lise Bissonnette, editor of Le Devoir.

The Prime Minister still dares to talk about honour and dignity. He still dares holding up the Canadian federalism as an example of tolerance where the French language will be protected till kingdom come. He did not make that statement in English, mind you. Two languages, two messages.

In French, this is called demagogy. Saint-Exupéry said that demagogy sets in when, in the absence of a common denominator, the principle of equality is cause to degenerate and turn into that of identity.

That is why the Prime Minister is spending tens of millions of our tax dollars in publicity to make us believe that we are Canadians and proud of being Canadians, as if the pride of a nation could be bought and sold like a box of soap.

Although the target of repeated brain-washing attempts, the vast majority of the people who live in Quebec have grown to become first and foremost Quebecers. That is the true identity we want to affirm. And millions of dollars in publicity cannot change that.

To get along with the rest of Canada, we are not prepared to lose our identity as has been the case for millions of francophones outside Quebec who were assimilated with no regard for their rights.

Let those who describe Canadian federalism as an example of tolerance tell us why Mr. Ovide Mercredi cannot remember that his ancestors spoke French.

We all know that since Confederation, of which the Prime Minister praises the visionary character and the spirit of tolerance, the rights of francophones have been disregarded. In fact, at one time the will to preserve one's francophone identity was even considered high treason.

Louis Riel would be ashamed to find out that more than a hundred years after he was hanged, a simple statement by the House of Commons praising his patriotism would make us forget the real history of intolerance towards francophones in this country.

We can understand that francophones outside Quebec would want to be protected as the minority group which they have become. They have a right to such protection, but Quebecers do not want to be recognized as a minority in Canada: they want to be recognized as a majority in Quebec. They do not want the provisional safeguards that the rest of Canada would deign grant them. They want, today and forever, be the masters of their own future.

Quebecers are no longer merely trying to survive: they are now asserting their full cultural, economic and social potential.

You all know very well that this basic reality is at the root of the recurring political crisis in Canadian federalism.

For Quebecers to assert their cultural, economic and social potential requires an appropriate political framework, and there will be no constitutional peace as long as the political institutions will not recognize this need.

We all know that the citizens of the rest of Canada want the federal government, of which they form the majority, to have the right and the power to intervene in all aspects of their cultural, economic and social life. But we also know that, to the extent that Quebecers refuse to give to the federal government the tools necessary to shape their future, we will continue to be in a crisis.

We want to put an end to these endless political and constitutional crises. That is why Quebecers have reached a consensus on an approach and on concrete proposals, through the Bélanger–Campeau commission. Among them, those who want to preserve the federal link have made a list of the rights and powers that they want exercised by the National Assembly, and a list of the rights and powers that they want to be exercised by the federal institutions, whereas others have proposed the patriation and devolution of all the rights and powers to the National Assembly, as well as forms of co–operation other than the federal link with the rest of Canada.

The basis for negotiation under the agreement reached on August 28, 1992 does not in any way satisfy the demands of even the federalists in Quebec.

We had reached a large consensus on our future and the decision made by Mr. Bourassa to break this consensus and accept the basis for negotiation proposed by the rest of Canada generates a major crisis in his own party, as well as disapproval among the majority of the population in Quebec. How can he claim that an agreement reached on that basis would put an end to the political crisis and the constitutional debate?

The about–face made by Mr. Bourassa will only increase tensions in Quebec and with the rest of Canada. We must call him to order. Quebecers have the opportunity during this debate to look at various aspects of the negotiation framework proposed in the August 28 agreement.

• (1840)

As financial critic, I am responsible for dealing more specifically with the economic side of these negotiation proposals.

Let us listen to Mr. Bernard Roy, former chief of staff of the Prime Minister and current chairman of the Chamber of Commerce of Greater Montreal. He tells us: "It is obvious that what they are offering is not what the business community was asking for. Providing for a discussion procedure to give Quebec control over some areas of provincial jurisdiction through a five year agreement is not very efficient. And the proposal to give an equal Senate more powers will make the federal government more difficult to manage and less effective."

He then asks himself: "But if such is the price we have to pay to maintain the federal system and prevent the country from breaking up, are we going to turn our backs on this agreement because it creates some kind of monster?"

I still do not know how Mr. Roy will answer his question. I must thank him for having decided, despite his personal friendship with the Prime Minister of Canada, to make public such a clear assessment of the economic aspects of the August 28 proposals.

I can also understand the premier who decided to sell these proposals despite his friends' assessment and who joined forces so quickly with the head of the Liberal Party of Canada and Leader of the Official Opposition in the upcoming referendum campaign. He has chosen his side; let us choose ours.

With the economic challenge facing Montreal and all other regions of Quebec we must not agree to live with a monster just to save an overbearing federalism. On the contrary we must give ourselves political structures meeting the aspirations of both people and allowing them to finally express, without unnecessary and costly obstacles, the economic, cultural and social leadership they are capable of.

Why accept any longer the horrendous costs and inefficiency associated with having two ministries of Science, Technology, Justice, Immigration, Labour, Manpower, Revenue, Industry and Commerce, Financial Institutions, Health and Welfare, Energy and Resources, Agriculture, Environment, Transport, Recreation, Communications, Social Affairs, Regional Development, International Trade and even External Affairs?

This duplication is exceedingly costly for taxpayers and produces well–known horror stories such as a lack of co–ordination, inconsistency and even outright contradiction between programs run by both levels of government. It has become impossible for the taxpayer to know which level of government is responsible for what and to make their elected officials accountable for their decisions.

If we want to stop wasting federal public funds we must take away from the federal government the power to collect and spend our taxes as it sees fit in all areas essential to the development of our cultural, economic and social potential.

Preserving the federal power to collect and spend taxes as proposed in the August 28 agreement means not only giving growth hormones to an exceedingly costly bureaucratic monster but also relinquishing to the federal Parliament, where we will always be a minority, the power to use our taxes to manipulate our development as it sees fit.

Canada must not be developed at the expense of Quebec and its people. We must say no to the unacceptable proposals before us.

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, dear colleagues, dear fellow citizens who are listening to the debates in this House, I must tell you that it is a great privilege for me to have this opportunity to publicly voice my opinion regarding the Charlottetown agreement.

As we all know this unanimous agreement was reached by the leaders of this country after incredible efforts and long negotiations reflecting a sense of belonging to Canada and most of all in keeping with the democratic principles so essential to the survival of a people.

As the former UN Secretary-General, Mr. Javier Perez de Cuellar, said yesterday, our respect for democracy is an example for the rest of the world to follow.

Indeed this Canada where every one is free to express their opinion without having to retort to violence or being its victim is well worth our making together all possible efforts to preserve it. This is really the raison d'être of the present agreement.

Did you ever wonder why so many people want to become Canadians, Mr. Speaker? The answer to this question is obvious. A country is a whole, a family. And as in any family, each member has his or her own peculiarities, expectations, needs and idiosyncrasies. If we thought of splitting up whenever there was a disagreement, where would Canadian families be? For me, this agreement is evidence of the necessary adjustments we have to make to allow for the evolution of our community, and we can do it through dialogue and sometimes compromise.

Perfection does not exist in every day life. It is impossible for everything to be perfect in a country, but there are enough positive things to keep it whole and agree to make the necessary changes as we go along.

For far too long we have been talking about constitutional reform without ever reaching an agreement which would allow us to channel our energy toward other important issues. I think that we have done it this time. Canadians, just like us, want to resolve this issue. Ask manufacturers, workers, seniors, mothers or our young people. We are mature enough to finally decide to stand strong and united in this country which is the envy of the world.

The words diversity, distinct character, dignity, honour, compromise, concession, success, strength, nationalism and patriotism are not incompatible. To the contrary, they are the very essence of the human being, a constructive not destructive human being.

One has to strive for a country of such quality and it is now time for the Canadian people to make their choice known. I therefore commit myself from now on to making sure that my fellow citizens in Québec-Est will be able to make their choice an informed one and to providing them with all necessary information.

I will explain the content of this agreement to them: the will to recognize the inherent right to self-government of the aboriginal peoples, a concept of justice and equity; the Senate reform, a concept of efficiency; all the implications of the Canada clause; the social and economic union; the changes affecting the Supreme Court; the representation in the House of Commons; the First Ministers' Conferences; the amending formula and any other questions. I will inform them.

The cultural wealth of Canada is recognized all over the world. We are lucky enough to have this great territory to share with people who profess different values, have various ways of thinking and speak different languages. That reality must be entrenched once and for all in our Constitution so that we never have to relive the negative experiences of the past.

This being said, I must add that my intention is not to delve into the past; I am eager to go forward and to prepare the future for our senior citizens, for our own generation and for our children and grandchildren. All parents at one time say to a child: "don't get angry that way, try to understand your brothers; go kiss and make up".

This sentence is an exact image of what Canadians are: peaceloving people who care for the quality of life they have acquired over the years in this country which is dear to them.

• (1850)

I want to remind my fellow citizens that the agreement reached in Charlottetown is the necessary tool for this renewal that can no longer wait. I do not want my family to be subjected to a weakening of any kind. This is why in 1984 I decided to run in my riding of Québec–Est. At that time I put all my faith in the Prime Minister. Some were talking about a "risk worth taking". As for me, I preferred to talk about this very determined man with an incredible sense of honor. The years have shown that I only knew part of the strength of that man and I want to pay tribute to him today for all that he has done for us and for our country.

I will end with this motto: Vox populi, vox dei.

[English]

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, this is an unusual debate in that apart from my friends in the far corner off to the right, there is not a great deal of debate and yet, as every member would recognize on all sides, the issues that we are discussing are of the greatest importance to this country and to its future.

I have not participated in every constitutional debate in this House, most people will be glad to know, but I have participated in a few over a great number of years. Every time one of these debates occurs, it strikes me what an unusual country we have. It was a bit more than 20 years ago when Mr. Bourassa, in his first appearance as the Prime Minister of Quebec, appeared on Quebec television and said: "Québec, ce n'est pas une province comme les autres."

After the events of the last few years, as we have debated all these constitutional issues, you could say: "Canada ce n'est pas un pays comme les autres. When you recognize the degree to which this country can engage itself and the kinds of discussions that have gone on at every level, from the level of first ministers down to the average citizen, you realize that we are a very strange country indeed. It is not just that we have such an enormous land mass, the largest now in the world and covering so many time zones, so many types of geography and different communities, but it is a bit staggering to realize that for the first almost 100 years of our existence we did not have a flag, a national anthem or even our own Constitution.

We functioned from 1867 to the early 1960s without any of the trappings that most self-respecting nations had for themselves. It was some time in the 1920s that we started to be concerned about such things. It was with the meetings that took place and the Statute of Westminster in the 1930s when we got serious about having our own Constitution and perhaps ultimately having a flag which we got in 1964. We got around to ratifying O Canada in 1980. We ultimately, with a great deal of turmoil, brought the Constitution to Canada, retrieving the British North America Act and writing a charter of rights 10 years ago in 1982.

However, as we all recognize, the great element that was missing was, if one can put it this way, the oldest colonized part of the country which was Quebec which, in a formal sense, from the government of that day, did not participate in the constitutional accord. Therefore we spent another decade finally closing the loop.

Nobody should doubt that both in the Meech Accord and in the Charlottetown accord our first item of business was including all the provinces in this agreement.

We were told over the last year that this is a Canada round, and it very much is a Canada round, but it is crucially important that if the Constitution of 1982 is to be the Constitution of Canada, the province of Quebec be fully a part of that accord.

Second, there was the concern for a whole variety of related matters affecting the functioning of the federal Parliament, the nature of the Senate, institutions related to it, economic and social concerns. A certain measure of progress has been made in finally democratizing the Senate, something that should have been done a very long time ago. How effective it will be remains to be seen.

I want to say that for my mind Canada has again broken new ground among the Commonwealth of nations by recognizing and righting a wrong that took place here half a millennia ago, beginning with 1492.

Finally in 1992 it is recognizing that the aboriginal peoples and all their various communities are equal citizens of this country, even to the point of describing what is being agreed to here as a new third order of government.

There is a great deal of concern around the world about what has happened over the decades and the centuries to aboriginal peoples. Nowhere has this been more poignantly revealed than in the events of Africa and the continuing events that are searing the face of southern Africa.

The recognition of aboriginal peoples as being a third order of government is absolutely crucial to the renewal of Canada and to the example Canada gives to the nations of the world. I have spent a bit of time in constitutional committees. I could spend many hours pointing out in the 60 clauses of the Charlottetown accord the weaknesses, the dangers and where the problems lie. I have to say that if Canadians from coast to coast to coast do not find this an important step forward in the history of our country, then I am a monkey's uncle because I believe that what has been achieved by first ministers, by aboriginal representatives, by a host of officials and experts is an important contribution in the 125th year of this nation's history.

I will be urging every one of my constituents in downtown Toronto and in any part of this country where I speak to say yes on October 26, a date that Canada has with history.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, the last time I participated in a debate dealing with the Constitution of Canada was in 1990 on the Meech Lake accord.

Up to 1987 and leading up to the establishment of Meech Lake, there were legitimate problems in Canada. Among the major problems that we were facing and have been facing was western alienation. The west was feeling that it did not really participate in the life of the nation, that all the big decisions were made in central Canada, particularly in Ontario and Quebec, a feeling that anything that the central government did was always done for the benefit of Quebec.

We had the problem of ignoring the First Nations as part of the Canadian Constitution. We also had the problem of the formal recognition on integration of Quebec into Canada.

The perception that grew about these problems was that they became more aggravated. Economic disparities became greater. Immigration brought people into Canada whose cultural backgrounds were certainly different from Canadians who were here. The injustices to First Nations were totally unacceptable to a vast number of Canadians. Changes were in order. We had to do something about this.

Those changes were not to the basic principles of what built this country. We were not going to change the principle of tolerance. That was not going to change. The ability to respect differences was not going to change. It was not going to touch the principle of accommodation which is the invitation to share the welcoming, to be part of the whole. It was not going to change the principle of fairness, a recognition that human rights as well as collective rights and individuals rights have to be respected and that we have to make sure that the people of this country can share in the production of the wealth of the country. There was also a need to update the social contract. This arrangement would allow the citizens to share more fully in the wealth that they helped to produce. The attempt was made in 1987 with Meech Lake, and it failed. I supported Meech Lake and I have no regrets about having done so. What followed the failure of Meech Lake was a long and elaborate process to come to grips with these problems that we were facing. It was long and protracted, and that is typically Canadian.

It is the way we do things in Canada: millions of hours of meetings, dozens of committees, hundreds of reports, thousands of publications, dozens of forums, and hundreds of debates. Hundreds of thousands of citizens were consulted, hundreds of millions of dollars were spent, I would like to think invested.

Not one bullet was fired. Not one person was killed. Not one life was lost in this emotional, draining and sometimes very boring exercise. That is our nature in Canada. We are looked on as people who would rather talk than fight. We are people who are seen as those who would rather spend hours and hours debating how many angels would dance on the head of a pin than put on the boxing gloves and take on somebody.

We are known as a nation of compromisers. In fact, there is the notion that Canada was built on compromise. There is a lot to be said for that, when you examine the history of the formation of Canada. That is the price we pay to be—

An hon. member: The best.

Mr. Rodriguez: That is the price we pay. We do not mind people making comments about us, about how boring we are, about how we would rather talk than fight, and so on. That is the price we pay and that is a price we are willing pay. It reflects a very unique heritage. It recognizes that we have different groups in this country and that we have to let groups have a chance to say something.

When governments do not listen to what the groups have to say governments find out in a hurry that the groups do not want deals cut behind closed doors. They want a more open process.

Of course there are short cuts. If people do not like the process that we have been following there are short cuts and they can follow those short cuts. Those short cuts are Lebanon, Yugoslavia, Tajikistan, Nagorno–Karabakh, and Georgia. If people want the short cuts they can go for them.

We have chosen our way. We have chosen to respect the principles that built this country which meant that we have to go through this process of consultation. What we have is the consensus report, third revision. Is that not typically Canadian? We are not over it. This is only one of the many steps before we get to the end of the process.

This package represents a compromise. Even the late Senator Eugene Forsey underestimated Canadians' ability to compromise. I want to quote something he said in his presentation at the time of the Meech Lake accord in 1987. He said: "The chances of any amendment being adopted even under the seven province formula are virtually nil. Ontario and Quebec will never accept any reduction in the number of senators from either province nor will the Atlantic provinces any reduction in their quotas. The House of Commons will never accept any change that gives the Senate more real power. The reformers will never accept any change that does not. Under the unanimous consent formula, the chances of change are microscopic".

What we have here is an agreement for change. The late Eugene Forsey underestimated the ability of Canadians to compromise because I believe the document that we have before us and that we are debating is really a compromise.

How does the compromise agreement deal with the problems I have listed? What were they? Do you remember, Madam Speaker, the concern for First Nations to be finally recognized as important and integral to Canada? The First Nations are now going to be placed four square in the Constitution. That is a big step forward. That alone merits very positive support from Canadians.

The concerns of western Canadians have been advanced. I do not think they had been fully met. They may not be satisfied with respect to the Triple-E Senate which was their big push, but I think their concerns have been addressed to some extent and they have been advanced. I would think they would like the proposed agreement rather than the present system.

Quebec is recognized as a distinct society and its ability to be a master in its own universe has been consolidated, advanced and enhanced.

The Constitution is only a framework of how we relate to each other, how we govern ourselves and how we manage our affairs. But a country is more than a framework, just as a human body is more than a skeleton. A country is made up of people, people who have dreams, who have hopes, who have aspirations. They have basic needs: bread and butter, security and shelter.

While we Canadians have been in the back of the airplane discussing constitutional renewal, we have left the airplane in the hands of financial interests both national and international. They have been only too pleased to continue signing real estate deals, signing trade agreements, shuffling paper, putting money into their pockets, building their own and strapping on their own golden parachutes in case the airplane goes down, while large numbers of Canadians have become unemployed and have been thrown on to the welfare rolls of the municipalities and the provinces and on to unemployment insurance.

Those skyrocket and the victims are blamed for having put these funds into deficit. Imagine the unemployment insurance fund for the first six months of this year is already $10 billion in the hole.

While we have been continuing our discussions in the back of the plane we have watched the deindustrialization of our nation. What good is it if we defeat this agreement and continue discussing constitutional change in the hope of getting the perfect constitution and everyone saying: "This is the perfect constitution that I support" and we inherit at the end of it an economic wasteland for a country?

I am not supporting the agreement because it is my ideal. I suppose the only way it would be my ideal is if I had written the bloody thing. I am supporting it because it is the best we are going to get for now. We have established in this agreement what I consider to be the most important elements. With this agreement we can now hold governments accountable for what I consider to be important things to the people of the country. I want to read the things that I consider important: providing throughout Canada a health care system that is comprehensive, universal, portable, publicly administered and accessible; providing adequate social services and benefits to ensure all individuals resident in Canada have reasonable access to housing, food and other basic necessities; providing high quality primary and secondary education to all individuals resident in Canada and ensuring reasonable access to post-secondary education; and protecting the rights of workers to organize and bargain collectively.

This commitment is now being made. Look at the fuss we have in Ontario over the labour bill. Now we are establishing a national goal to which all the provinces subscribe.

I also consider protecting, preserving and sustaining the integrity of the environment for present and future generations to be important.

The policy objectives continue, and here is my favourite. Now we have written into the Constitution the objective or the goal of full employment. No longer will a government sitting across the aisle be allowed to use the unemployed in this country as cannon fodder in some war against inflation, recession or whatever else.

Ensuring that all Canadians have a reasonable standard of living and ensuring sustainable and equitable development are also important.

Those are the issues. Once we have disposed of this agreement, those are the issues on which we should concentrate all our efforts, our minds, and our strength. Those things affect Canadians very sensitively, such as the right to a job. We have put those things on hold for the last couple of years. We have left all these things to John Crowe, the international bankers, the domestic bankers, and others like them. They have been only too happy to accommodate us and now we are living with 12 per cent unemployment in this nation. Our people are taxed beyond their limits.

An hon. member: It is nothing to crow about.

Mr. Rodriguez: There is certainly nothing to crow about, absolutely nothing to crow about.

As a social democrat I am supporting the agreement because I believe those things identify clearly the kind of co-operative federalism we have always talked about.

We are putting in place a clear injunction to ourselves as lawmakers that we are indeed our brother's keeper. We do have a responsibility for each other. On that basis I believe this agreement is worthy of support and I intend to work in my riding for the yes position on this agreement.

Hon. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, I am pleased in the final hours of this debate on the national referendum question to join with colleagues from the three national parties in indicating that I will be supporting the yes vote.

I have been encouraged in the last number of days by the numbers of calls that have come to my constituency office in Waterloo, Ontario. They are from people, many of whom come from a multicultural background in an area that is largely German speaking, a high percentage, wanting to know more about the deal, wanting to know how they can be a part of sending messages of the importance they see in Canada.

I think of this year's largest ever, most vibrant Canada Day celebration. I think of the expressions of affection for Canada that have come largely because we have begun through the process of the Spicer commission, through the hearings of our parliamentary committees and other fora, to focus on what Canada is. We each have our own reasons for voting yes. As I speak in the Chamber tonight. I think of my days in student political life in Canada—

[Translation]

I have developed a close friendship with two members of the House of Commons, the members for Saint-Denis and Papineau, that offers me an opportunity to understand the essence and the spirit of the province of Quebec.

[English]

I think of my time with CUSO looking at Canada from Africa. I think also of the importance of English and language in that great continent.

[Translation]

I think how very important it is for the development of Africa and for numerous young men and women who work there, thanks to CIDA and to other governmental programs, I think about the Canadian contribution to development.

[English]

Along with the hon. member for Rosedale, I think of the contribution of the churches, English and French, with their connections in the developing world and in Eastern Europe. I think of Canada's partnership and leadership. I think of the challenges facing our world and I recognize what Canada has done. I feel that the best days are still ahead of us.

The great Canadian, Joseph Howe, used to say: "Brag about your country, boys". We all know we have not been much accustomed to making this sort of speech either here in the House, in committee or in the country. I am looking forward to going across Waterloo region and other parts of the country to encourage Canadians to see ourselves as others see us.

In the last five years, as a member of our Canadian delegation to the General Assembly of the United Nations, I have had the opportunity to see how others see us, how they feel about us, our contribution, what they feel about our ability to deal with minorities, our sensitivity to the kinds of world problems that are on the news every few moments.

I want to say a word about Canadians serving abroad. I noticed in today's media that 30,000 Canadians who are imprisoned in provincial and federal penitentiaries will have the vote. Members of our foreign service, members of our military, members of CIDA and development staff who are overseas and are based in Quebec have come to my attention.

[Translation]

These bureaucrats are officially domiciled in Quebec. They have lived in Europe and worked for the United Nations for more than two years and they do not have the right to vote.

[English]

I asked the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. I asked the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs if they will not review this because there are no prouder Canadians than those who serve overseas for us in our embassies and peacekeeping forces. If they have been at Lahr for a number of years and have suddenly gone into Yugoslavia to be a part of that situation, why should they lose a vote?

We have time to get the apparatus in place. Let there be consultations. There are many in Central America and many in eastern and central Europe who look to Canada and say: "We feel that you can live together". At recent conferences of the United Nations development program, people came again and again and said: "We are glad to hear your three parties have a positive proposal to put forward. We are with you and we want you to succeed".

The external affairs committee visited the former Soviet Union, Russia and Ukraine. We saw what we have to offer. We know the links in Canada, people who have their roots there. We looked at southern Africa and tabled a report in June. We saw what we can do with democratic institutions, respect for minority and the whole infrastructure role.

Let me say we have already looked at the ingredients which are part of the Charlottetown package, the importance of the recognition of Quebec as a distinct society, the aboriginals, the question of an elected and equal Senate and the new division of powers. Let me conclude by reflecting on this to Canadians as we gather to talk about our future. Let us reflect that when the Japanese want to learn about peacekeeping, they come to Canada; when the brave democrats of eastern Europe and Russia want to find out about parliaments, banks, stock markets and legal systems, they come to Canada; when Mikhail Gorbachev was Minister of Agriculture and wanted to improve Soviet farms, he came to Canada; when the Americans want to find out how to make health care more efficient and effective, they come to Canada; when the Namibians want expertise in municipal affairs, they come to Canada and to Kitchener—Waterloo; and, when South Africans, black or white, want to learn about elections that are fair, a new legal system that is just and modern, an economy that works, they come to Canada.

Canada is in the heart of all of us. Each of us has a different perspective of it. We have much and have given much; we have much to receive from the world. All of our futures are best off with a peaceful, just world. Canada has that reputation. The resources of English and French give us a unique position in the family of nations. I, for one, will be working to encourage a very positive yes vote in order that the legislature of Ontario may quickly pass it, along with the other legislatures, and we can move on to the important issue of jobs.

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Madam Speaker, I am proud to be able to participate in this historic debate. During my eight years in this House there have been many important issues and bills discussed such as capital punishment and abortion. We voted to have a free trade agreement with the United States, and we voted to go to war last year in the gulf. In my opinion none of these debates or votes was as vital as the issue we have been debating for the last few days, the future of this magnificent country, Canada.

On August 28 the Consensus Report on the Constitution was agreed to unanimously by the Prime Minister of Canada, the 10 provincial premiers, the leaders of our two territorial governments and the representatives of four aboriginal associations. The agreement by these 17 leaders culminates the most extensive consultation ever with Canadians. The agreement is not perfect. It does have some flaws. I am concerned, for instance, about the cost of the increased size of the House of Commons. I am not sure if the new Senate will be effective or if it will create legislative gridlock. I believe it is accurate to say that not one of the 17 leaders meeting in Charlottetown was totally satisfied with the agreement. This situation was expected if an agreement was to be achieved. There had to be understanding, compromise and a good spirit of give and take.

Now is the time to turn to the people of Canada. One of the main criticisms of the Meech Lake accord was that it was done by 11 men behind closed doors. This negotiation process, the Canada round, was just the opposite. As I said earlier, during the past two years we have witnessed the most extensive consultation with Canadians in the history of this great country. It is now appropriate and democratic to go back to the people for their say on this historic package of fundamental changes in our parliamentary system. Between now and October 26 Canadians will be asking questions and making comments. The greatest challenge we are faced with is communicating the essence and the highlights of this Charlottetown agreement so that Canadians can make an informed decision when they cast their vote.

I know there is a great deal of cynicism about the process. Some Canadians believe we have spent too much time on this issue. They believe we should be spending more time on economic issues and job creation measures. I agree these economic issues are of vital importance, but solving the constitutional impasse is crucial for resolving economic problems. The two are entwined.

The lack of constitutional agreement has created financial instability. Foreign and Canadian investors have put projects on hold. A positive resolution of the Constitution impasse will open the path and create a climate conducive to addressing the very real and pressing economic and social challenges facing Canada. As the Prime Minister said on September 8: "This agreement, if endorsed by the Canadian people and enshrined in our Constitution, will mark an accomplishment that has eluded many generations of Canadians and their elected representatives". I think it is useful to highlight some of the fundamental objectives that had to be attained in order to achieve a durable and lasting national reconciliation. For decades the western provinces have felt frustrated with their lack of power and influence on many major decisions made in central Canada. Atlantic Canada has had to deal with many aspects of economic disparity.

As the Prime Minister said, we must find a way to ensure that Quebecers, whose special character so enriches the distinctiveness of our national life, become willing and enthusiastic partners in Canada.

The voices and concerns of the people of the north and our aboriginal peoples had to be addressed in an understanding and compassionate manner. The time has come for Canadians to embrace the inherent right to self-government of aboriginal peoples.

In trying to achieve all of the above objectives, we must not ignore the frustrations and concerns of the people of Ontario, whose great contributions to the well-being of Canada are in my opinion sometimes either misconstrued or not recognized and appreciated.

I believe these fundamental objectives have been met. It is now time for Canadians to reflect on the proposals within the agreement, ask questions and discuss it with friends and neighbours.

I thought Peter Newman made a profound statement in a recent Maclean's article when he said:

> The real issue of the October 26 referendum is deciding whether we have a future, not the shape of what that future might be.

A yes vote at least gives Canadians the chance to shape our future as a united country. A no vote does not. We have a great, tolerant, diverse, rich country that we must fight together to preserve. We must continue to be proud of Canada and all we have achieved since our birth as a nation.

Sir John A. Macdonald's words, spoken in 1861, ring equally true today:

> Whatever you do, adhere to the union, we are a great country, and we shall become one of the greatest in the universe if we preserve it; we shall sink into insignificance and adversity if we suffer it to be broken.

I understand the House will rise next week so that we can spend the next five weeks in our ridings talking with our constituents, listening to their views and answering their questions.

I plan to help organize a yes committee in Markham and in Whitchurch-Stouffville. These will be non-partisan committees comprised of concerned residents who will help co-ordinate activities.

Canadians must have the opportunity to arrive at the polls on October 26 in a position to make an informed and bold decision about this constitutional package and the future of Canada.

On October 26 I will be voting yes to a united Canada. I hope that our pride and confidence in the future of this great nation will encourage all Canadians to participate in this historic referendum and give a renewed Canada their enthusiastic stamp of approval.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this important and historic debate. I want to say from the outset that I intend to cast my vote with millions of other Canadians on October 26 for the yes side in this referendum campaign which will begin in a matter of days.

All across the country there are many voices, particularly the voices of the premiers who sat around the negotiating table, the voice of the Prime Minister and the leaders of the opposition parties that encourage us to examine constructively this Charlottetown accord. I hope Canadians will do that. They will find a document which I think reflects Canada, reflects the shared values of a nation that is diverse from sea to sea, that is different from sea to sea, but nevertheless holds in common a set of beliefs about ourselves as a people, how we organize ourselves and those things we believe to be important.

It reflects a spirit of generosity, a spirit of tolerance, a spirit of brotherhood and sisterhood that is unique among nations of the world and certainly must be seen to be unique among the nations of the world as we watch with anguish night after night the bombs in Beirut, the bullets in Bosnia and the starvation in Somalia.

We sit in the security and the comfort of our homes watching this horror. Much of the world is unveiling itself to us nightly on our televisions as we sit secure in our homes with the knowledge of the protections afforded to us in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

We have to reflect upon these values of being a Canadian. I want to say that something that has bothered me as a member of Parliament for a great many years about this constitutional debate, something that I think has to cease during the course of this referendum campaign, the tendency in this country to be asked to define ourselves and our role in Canada as if we in our respective communities or provinces were mere pieces on a Monopoly board.

If we were to believe those who would seek to divide us, there are no Canadians in this country called Canada. There are only Newfoundlanders, Nova Scotians, Ontarians, the people of British Columbia, Quebecers or Albertans. That is not true. For every voice that would ask us to examine this constitutional accord based on what it did for me in my back yard, I am convinced that there are 100 more in whose breast beats the heart of Canada.

I am a Newfoundlander, but let nobody marginalize me. Let nobody seek to reduce me. Let nobody seek to constrain my vision and my participation in this great experiment on the northern half of the North American continent to Newfoundland and Labrador, as wonderful as that is.

I take pride in all of this country. I have driven through the Rockies and their majesty. I have seen the great individualism of the people of British Columbia, their resilience and energy; people on the prairies; the great entrepreneurship of the great industrial heartland, Ontario; the uniqueness of that distinct society that is the people of Quebec and the rich tapestry of the colour and the energy of the people of Atlantic Canada. Every part of it is part of what I am. I am part of Canada.

I say to my fellow colleagues that if we ask the people of our ridings, the people of our constituencies, the people in the provinces from which we come to measure this accord on the basis of whether or not within our own back yard, whether it is our community, our town or our province, we somehow won a great victory, we came away with a larger share of the national pie than our neighbour, then every one of us is doomed to come to the conclusion that we failed. But if our vision is bigger than our own back yard and if our imagination is broader than the boundaries of something called a province, if we can see, feel and participate in this referendum campaign as Canadians, if we can see beyond our disappointments, whether individual members, government or political parties, and see the opportunity that still resides in this fantastic country, I am convinced Canadians from coast to coast will say yes to the constitutional renewal of Canada.

There is something else I want to say because it has to be said. One of the reasons I am going to vote not with resignation, not with it is the best we can do attitude but with enthusiasm for this accord is that I believe it is important that we recognize the people of Quebec.

There are a few million francophones in a sea of 300 million francophones who need to know that their language and culture is secure and protected and they need to know they can look to the national Parliament, to the national government here in Ottawa and not just to their government in Quebec City to protect that language and culture.

There is provision in the Charlottetown accord so my fellow Canadians, francophones in Quebec, can count on their national government, national institutions, national courts, national Constitution, the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the good will and generosity of their fellow Canadians to ensure that in a sea of anglophones the Quebec people, their language and their culture are protected. That is the spirit of generosity and tolerance I talked about.

I will not attempt to repeat the analysis done by those who have spoken before me of the individual components of this package. Let me just repeat again that if what we seek in this accord is perfection it will not be found because if perfection had been the measure of success of the British North American Act, the British North American Act of 1867 would have been a failure.

If perfection was the requirement of the Constitution Act, 1982, then the Constitution Act, 1982, would have been a failure. If perfection is what we expected in our families, in our spouses, in our children, in our friends, in our jobs, or in ourselves our lives could be nothing but failure.

If we see as we must this accord, this compromise, this honourable compromise and a spirit of fairness, balance and tolerance, we will see it as the basis upon which to put this debate behind us, to renew this country constitutionally and to help it achieve its full potential as we march as we do toward the year 2000.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise in this debate to support the referendum question and the Charlottetown accord of August 28. I do so with enthusiasm and commitment.

It is true, as many other members have said, that this accord is not perfect, but neither was the the British North American Act of 1867. It went to the Supreme Court and the Privy Council thousands of times. I am not overestimating that, thousands of times. That Constitution and the society it founded, the country it founded, lasted for 125 years.

If the people in 1867 had nit-picked at that Constitution like many of our people nit-picked at the Meech accord and at this accord, we would never have had a country. They had the political will to form a country and to adopt a Constitution despite its imperfections.

I say to this House that despite some imperfection in this accord, it represents many substantial gains for many communities in this country. What are they? To begin with, for the first time constitutionally we have recognized the inherent right of the aboriginal peoples to govern themselves. Those are landmark, world precedent, provisions. We should be proud of them.

If it were only for those provisions alone in the accord I would go to the wall in support of that accord because those are so important all by themselves.

For the first time constitutionally we have recognized the minority language communities in our Constitution with a commitment to their vitality and development. I say for the first time we have recognized the official language communities because in the Constitution of 1867 and in the Constitution of 1982 we recognized the right of individuals to go to court in English and French, to have schools in English and French, but we do not refer to the communities, to the collective rights.

This is the first time that we have said we recognize the collective rights of the communities, the francophone communities outside of Quebec, and the anglophone community in Quebec.

• (1940)

I must remind the House that there are now over one million francophones living outside of Quebec in this country. There are more francophones outside Quebec than there were in Quebec in 1867. There are 800,000 or more anglophones living in Quebec, which is more people than many of the provinces.

Again, these provisions represent a substantial gain for those communities.

Third, the Charlottetown accord contains several provisions that recognize the distinct society of Quebec and assure not only its continued existence but its épanouissement and development.

This accord, without doubt, contains much more than the Meech accord to protect the unique position of Quebec. I cannot understand why those who supported the Meech accord, like the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean and the other members of the Bloc Quebecois who at that time were in the Conservative Party, would now attack this accord when it contains much more than Meech.

If we put the Meech accord side by side with this you would see that everything that was in Meech is here, plus the guarantee for Quebec to keep 25 per cent of the seats in the House of Commons—which it historically has always had more or less so this is not something new, but it is now written in the Constitution—plus a guarantee that they will have one-third of the judges in the Supreme Court of Canada, plus a veto with other provinces on changes to national institutions, plus a double majority in the Senate to protect language and culture at the federal level, plus greater clarification and consolidation of provincial powers.

Again there are definite gains, not all that people in Quebec would like but substantial gains to protect the language and culture and the future of Quebec within Confederation.

Fourth, this accord gives more clout to the west and to the Atlantic provinces through a reformed Senate. It is true that it is not a Triple-E Senate, much to the disappointment of many people in the west. I would have supported a Triple-E Senate. However, it is a two and a half E Senate. It is an elected Senate. It is an equal Senate and it is almost an effective Senate. That remains to be seen.

It is true that the Senate will only have a total veto on matters relating to resources and on matters relating to the French language and culture, but its power to force joint sessions with the House of Commons on other matters will have more significance than many people expect.

Right now the present Senate has full legal powers to veto every bill that comes from this place, but it is rarely done because they are not elected and because they do not have political credibility. They have full legal powers but no political credibility.

Under the Charlottetown accord the new Senate will have less legal power but much greater political power because they are fully elected and there are only six senators from each province. It is my sense that when the 24 senators from the west, with others, turn down a House of Commons bill the government will take that message very seriously and will attempt to work out compromises with the Senate rather than force a vote in a joint session in the House of Commons. I am willing to bet that we will see more compromises worked out behind the scenes than we would otherwise.

Madam Speaker, you are signalling that my time is up. I must say that seven minutes for such an important subject is not enough, but let me conclude.

While this is not a perfect document it is a definite improvement for most Canadians and it does not diminish the rights of anyone. It is time to stop nit-picking. It is time to get on with other economic and social matters. This accord demonstrates that as Canadians living in this great land we have much more that unites us as individuals than that divides us. What is required is vision and political will, and a vote yes on October 26.

[Translation]

M. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Madam Speaker, as the member for that wonderful riding of Richmond—Wolfe in the Eastern Townships, I would like to say how much I appreciate the agreement arrived at by the Premiers because it is good for all of Canada, for all the regions of Canada and especially for Quebec. Therefore, I will encourage my constituents to vote yes in favour of that agreement.

I am tempted to list here all the reasons I will do so, but since time is short and we must compromise, I will give my colleague, the member for Verdun, the opportunity to follow up and complete my comments in a few minutes.

However, I will mention one attitude I believe to be unfortunate and harmful in this debate which is about to begin. I am thinking here about that climate of verbal violence, about those insults flying around, particularly in Quebec. I find it inadmissible, when dealing with such a fundamental issue that people, political leaders, representatives of the nation be so disgraceful, trading insults and spouting abuse at each other. I feel this is a very disturbing start to such an important debate.

My second comment is this: I disapprove, of course, of all the critics coming from the opponents to the agreement, those who favour the no. Let me give you an example. They condemn the government and the provincial premiers for not having a legal document to offer. I almost feel like asking them right out if there were legal documents for the 1980 referendum; at least let me remind them of what the situation was. I would say that the text of the question itself left the debate wide open and gave enormous leeway to any government taking office after sovereignty.

It is therefore unacceptable, that we be condemned because the debate is not supported by legal documents. Let me give you another example. Quite often business people, who are experienced and who have everything to lose because they have a fortune and they have investments will not even read a contract and the legal documents because they trust the person they have chosen to represent them, whether a notary or a lawyer. This criticism is therefore unacceptable.

There is also the so-called vagueness of the question. In my opinion the question is a lot more precise since it asks us to approve a project, a contract that is already on the table, which was not always the case in previous consultations as far as I know. This is a lot closer to something that we can evaluate concretely.

Moreover, this proposal can be improved over time. This brings me to make the following statement. We are criticized because the agreement provides for future consultations which could give rise to disputes, but this is precisely what is good about it. In the present Constitution unanimity is required to be able to make changes with the result that attempts were often made but always in vain because we could never have unanimity. This agreement, however, allows us to improve the content. In a federation, to revise a contract between partners every five or ten years is the least we can do. These criticisms are not justified in my opinion.

• (1950)

Some members of the no side contradict each other. Recently we heard that to say no would not necessarily mean we are saying yes to sovereignty.

But it is rather strange to read this in today's issue of La Presse about the leader of the Bloc Quebecois: "The Bloc Quebecois leader said in an interview that sovereignists will not be bound by a Quebec vote in favour of the provisional constitutional accord". Mr. Bouchard goes on to say: "Legally it would be binding", referring to a vote in favour of the agreement.

If 50 per cent of the voters plus one are in favour it is a decision. Politically though it is different. You can see that the no which Mr. Parizeau said was not a yes to sovereignty seems to be interpreted differently in another statement made by the Bloc leader who said: "Should the yes win, we will keep going and consider that sovereignty will come back".

I see that the clock is ticking away and, as in any agreement between partners, I was willing to make a compromise. I wish to inform you that the member for Verdun—Saint-Paul will take over from me. But I urge the people from Quebec to avoid this climate of verbal violence and insults, to remain calm, to be informed, to read and to make the decision that will preserve the dignity and the honour of Quebec, that is to vote yes.

Mr. Gilbert Chartrand (Verdun—Saint-Paul): Madam Speaker, I am very happy to be able to say a few words on this agreement, especially in front of this very personal audience.

As you are no doubt aware we have always had a touch of nationalism in Quebec, but as it turns out one cannot be a nationalist any more unless he or she belongs to the category of nationalists who advocate sovereignty.

I know from personal experience what it is to be a nationalist advocating sovereignty. To some extent that is why I sit on the other side of the House now.

Just yesterday the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean was saying that he would vote no because he wants a better future for his children, an easier and better life, and he is willing to take the chance.

I agree with that to some extent but my position is just as good. The difference is that, in his mind, his children have a dual nationality. As you know, having married an American, his children will have the choice of settling here or in the U.S. Mine are living here.

They will live here all the time and have to face things as they come. When you go to Quebec you meet sovereignists like the leader of the opposition, Mr. Parizeau, who tells the people that sovereignty has been put aside and so on. I have also had the chance to meet him.

What he is saying is quite simple. He will tell you that the people do not count for much. What is important is to gain power and to do what you want with the people. On the other hand, Mr. Bernard Landry, his right-hand man, is promising jobs for everyone.

Everybody in an independent Quebec will have a job, he said, but what he really wanted was Parizeau's job. So we are faced with a power struggle within the no umbrella group. We in the yes umbrella group are seen as traitors because we want a better future for our children and their children.

Why should we not have the right to a strong Quebec as well as a united Canada? Who is going to deny us that? Really, nobody can deny us that because what people truly want is change. They want to focus on the economy. They need to feel secure. They need to talk about something else.

The agreement is certainly good. You can argue all the legal points. You can show all the advantages. There will always be some people who are for it and others against it. In the end what people want is someone they can trust.

For 11 months I sat on the other side and there is one person I have seen get up and fight for Quebec: the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister always believed that it was possible for Quebecers to have a future within Canada.

The reason I came back is that I trusted one person. The offers we get today are perfectly acceptable. The majority of the people are willing to accept them because they want, on October 27, to be able to work, to be able to move on to something else, to set the Constitution aside, because nobody lives on Constitution.

There are those who say that, on our side, some speak from both sides of their mouths, that the member for Roberval says that he has had enough with the Constitution or that Senator Gérald Beaudoin says that it will go on. Sure enough, Senator Beaudoin will have less work once the constitutional issue is settled. As for the member for Roberval he will resume his activities as minister of National Health and Welfare; that gives him the Opportunity to promote something, to allow people to succeed, to live.

For me, it is rather simple. A yes is a yes to renewal, to progress and to a new life. Personally, what I want is stability; it is political stability that people need. Let them be the judge later on when general elections are called; the choice will be theirs. Right now what we need is for the economy to recover. For that every Canadian should say yes to the agreement.

What also promptèd me to rise tonight is that I saw on television the press conference given by a prominent leader who cannot even make up his own mind. He had to have an 800 line to talk to his followers and get an idea of what he was supposed to do. The Reform Party of Canada said it is against it because people called in at their own expense to voice their opposition to the agreement. The party could not cover people's expenses. People had to call at their expense to give their opinion, to say wether they were for it or against it. It is an extremist like him who will be one of the leaders of the no side. We can imagine the wonderful team they will make, the reformist extremist in the west and the sovereignty extremist in Quebec will take the same side on a question people at large have already a very good understanding of. They know very well that saying yes to the agreement is saying yes to stability and solidarity; they will thus show that they understand we are teaming up together.

There will always be problems between provinces. In Quebec, for once, we gain something definite. People tell us that Mr. Bourassa did not do well in the negotiations. Could anybody tell us what other premier has succeeded in reaching an agreement with all other Canadian premiers? None. No other Quebec premier was able to come to an agreement with his counterparts in the rest of the country. Mr. Bourassa is the first one to do so. He is the first one to present an acceptable offer which he is ready to defend before the people. We must not forget that it is not the big guns of the federal government who will sell the agreement in Quebec. It is Mr. Bourassa who has agreed to present the proposal to the people and defend it.

During this referendum campaign we will stand behind him and provide him with all the information we can get on our side. We are going to build. People on the no side are destructive. They do not realize that, right now, people are not in a destructive mood. The silent majority is listening. It can clearly see direct attacks on issues that are totally irrelevant. They are free to launch personal attacks against the Prime Minister or Mr. Bourassa, but they should not confuse that with the referendum question or the issue of sovereignty or any other issue. There will always be political points to make.

I think this matter is important for the people. As far as I am concerned, I will ask the people in my riding of Verdun—Saint-Paul to vote for the renewal of Canada on October 26, to vote for an economic renewal so that future generations will have a chance to succeed in this world of ours that needs unity. I hope October 27 will be the beginning of a new era.

[English]

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to say a few words tonight, although there will not be many because of the hour, concerning the Charlottetown agreement.

It seems to me that this agreement which was brought together after massive consultation across the country, and with the participation of the 10 premiers and the Prime Minister, represents a very good compromise for our country.

• (2000)

The miracle is that this compromise was reached. It seems to me that during the next several weeks we are going to have a chance to put forth our vision of Canada and Confederation. It represents a compromise in many directions and for that reason many members of the House have many qualms or concerns about individual parts of it.

However, at the end of the day we have to ask ourselves whether we want more consultation. Do we want the kinds of negotiations that we have been going through for the past year to continue? What are the consequences for our great nation? We know that they are very serious.

As I said, it is not a perfect document but it is the kind of compromise which has kept our country together for these many 125 years which we celebrate this year. Most of us believe that a failure in this referendum that will take place on October 26 would have the most serious consequences our nation could ever face.

Therefore I vote for this motion. I work for this Charlottetown consensus document and I hope that other members of the House will do the same.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being eight o'clock p.m., pursuant to order made Wednesday, September 9, 1992, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of government Motion No. 11.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

NARCOTICS CONTROL ACT

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should share, in a fair and equitable manner, the assets seized from prosecutions proceeded by under the Narcotics Control Act, with all local police forces involved in the investigation and arrest of the offender.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to be the sponsor of this particular resolution. As the Order Paper indicates, this resolution was moved on October 7, 1991.

In September 1991 I had the privilege of attending a public meeting in the riding of York South—Weston. The James Street Corridor Community Association sponsored a meeting to discuss the problem of crime and drugs in the community.

One of the issues of major concern to those present was how the proceeds of crime legislation was being dealt with, the fact that police forces, and in particular the Metropolitan Toronto Police Force, were not receiving a share of the proceeds of crime specifically dealing with drug prosecutions. It was felt by that group and representatives of the Metropolitan Toronto Police Force that it was unfair of the federal government not to share in the proceeds of crime dealing with prosecutions under the Narcotics Control Act.

• (1110)

To put this matter into perspective, in 1988, $10.6 million was seized as a result of prosecutions under the Narcotics Control Act. That was before Bill C-61 was passed.

If you recall, Madam Speaker, on this side of the House we have been pressing for a number of years for the government to enact legislation which would permit police forces to freeze and seize proceeds of crime.

Finally in 1989 the government passed that legislation, but prior to the passage of that legislation only $10.6 million was seized. In 1989, $38 million was seized so we can see the dramatic jump as a result of this legislation. In 1990 I am advised that $45 million was seized and this year we should be seizing approximately $50 million.

What happens to that money? Up until now that money would be received by the Receiver General for Canada, would go into general revenues and would be lost in the national bank here. The local police forces and municipalities would not share notwithstanding the fact that largely through the efforts of certain police forces across the country huge seizures were made.

In any event, the government admits that even at $50 million it is still far short of what could be seized if the legislation was properly administered.

When the Solicitor General was in Vancouver in August, he released the RCMP's national drug intelligence estimate for 1991. The RCMP estimates that the drug trade in Canada today is worth between $4 billion and $10 billion, and to date we have only been receiving approximately $50 million as a result of the proceeds of crime legislation.

One of the reasons that the amount is so low is that local police forces have been reluctant to prosecute with full vigour. I would like to quote from a document put out by the Solicitor General. It was a backgrounder when the minister made his announcement in August which says:

> Despite successes, the level of seizures and forfeitures pursuant to the legislation has fallen short of expectations. Key among the reasons for the shortfall are: (1) the absence of a coherent adequate resource asset management regime; and (2) a reluctance on the part of provincial and local police to participate in federal enforcement because proceeds investigations can be costly but the police receive no part of the forfeitures resulting largely or partly by their effort.

That is fairly astounding. There is an admission by the minister that local police forces are not pursuing with all the vigour and the resources they can muster the prosecution of certain drug offences because of the fact that they are costly and the federal government was not prepared to share.

The first reason given was the absence of a coherent, adequate resource asset management regime. In other words the local police were concerned, and the example often given was the ski resort that was purchased because of drug dealing. There was no organization that would manage the assets once they were seized prior to the police forces having the opportunity to liquidate.

I have had discussions with the local police in metropolitan Toronto including Chief of Police McCormack and others within my own constituency. They have reiterated time and time again that one of the major reasons why they have not been able to prosecute as vigorously as they might otherwise like was because of the shortage of resources. It costs money to prosecute drug offenders. It costs money to investigate.

Undercover police officers require cash in order to purchase drugs, to further investigations, and in particular in metropolitan Toronto the police force has been the subject of a tax squeeze. The municipal metro government in Toronto has cut back dramatically the resources available to the Metropolitan Toronto Police Force and the public suffers as a result.

The police chief and others have been wanting for a number of years now, at least since 1989, a fair share of the assets that are seized and then sold as a result of their efforts, as a result of expenditures made by them.

I should point out that in metropolitan Toronto, as is the case in all municipalities in Ontario and elsewhere in the country, it is the local taxpayer, the property owner, the tenants who are footing the bill for what ought to be a federal initiative.

Following that meeting in September 1991 I started a national petition drive. I enlisted the support of a number of groups, organizations and police forces across the country and petitions were circulated. I am pleased to see that in August of this year the Solicitor General finally made an announcement, that the federal government, and I am quoting from his press release, "is planning to share assets forfeited as a result of federal prosecutions of drug traffickers".

I am pleased the minister is moving in the right direction but I am not pleased with the rate, with how quickly the minister is proceeding. He is simply planning. Rather than introducing legislation the minister is dragging his feet. Again he says he wants to consult as if there has not been enough consultation.

If I were a cynic I would suggest the minister was trying to score some cheap political points when he was making his speech before the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police. He ought to have had a piece of legislation to introduce in the House this week or when Parliament was recalled last week. Instead he says he will continue to consult. He is concerned that local police forces or provincial governments might object. I have not heard of one provincial government that has objected to the federal government sending money to provincial police forces.

Under this proposal by the minister—and it is simply a proposal, there is no legislation—he proposes to set up an asset management office in Ottawa that would be responsible for managing assets that are seized under Bill C-61, the proceeds of crime legislation. The responsibility of that office would be to give pre-seizure advice to control and maintain the seized property, the management of restrained property appraisal, the advancement of moneys to preserve property, the disposal of property and allocation of proceeds, et cetera.

In his backgrounder the minister is suggesting that the sharing should be on a 90 per cent, 50 per cent or 10 per cent basis. In other words, the minister is suggesting that at the end of the fiscal year the government would look at how much money it had seized and would dole out to the participating police forces either 90 per cent, 50 per cent or 10 per cent based on the participation of the local force.

For example, if the RCMP and the metropolitan Toronto police were involved in a joint operation and were able to seize millions of dollars then they would share 50/50. In the event where one police force would provide an investigative lead to another police force it would receive 10 per cent.

What is of concern is that right off the top the rake for the federal government is 10 per cent. The minister is saying in this backgrounder that the federal government would rake—and that is my word, not the word of the minister—10 per cent off the top to help pay for the costs of running the office, prosecution and drug analysis, and all other similar costs. It seems to me that the minister and the federal government are nickel and diming the situation. The government should not be relying on its share of this money to prosecute drug offenders.

It is clear that there is considerable jurisdictional confusion and there are significant turf battles that take place among the different police forces across the country that are involved in drug enforcement or in investigating crimes under the Narcotics Control Act. It seems to me that what is necessary is a concerted, co-ordinated national effort, and that appears to be lacking.

The provincial government is responsible for the administration of justice, the federal government is responsible for federal criminal law; and local municipalities are responsible for police forces. It seems to me, from my experience as the critic of the Solicitor General for a number of years and as a resident of metropolitan Toronto, that the tax-paying public is being short-changed as a result of this lack of co-ordination. I have been concerned for a number of years that the federal government has not really provided the necessary leadership on crime prevention and, in particular, the investigation and prosecution of drug dealers and those involved in the $4 billion to $10 billion drug trade in Canada.

I am afraid that Canada is a money laundering haven, as one American senator pointed out some time ago. He is quoted in The Ottawa Citizen as lumping Canada with Panama, the Bahamas, Switzerland, Luxembourg and Hong Kong "as a major money laundering haven for illegal drug profits". That is the opinion of an American senator, and in fact it is the opinion of a considerable number of people involved in trying to curb the international drug trade.

Our government, the Conservative government, has been slow off the mark. It was only three years ago that it passed the proceeds of crime legislation, and then last year it passed legislation that would facilitate the stopping of money laundering in Canada. In any event, the government has not provided the leadership, and on this particular issue it is moving a little too slowly.

The public is concerned about crime and drugs. In my riding, in metropolitan Toronto, it has to be one of the top issues. Next to the economy, crime is the number two issue. A day does not go by when you do not pick up a newspaper in metropolitan Toronto in which there is a story, or two or three or four, about a very serious crime that took place in metro Toronto. People are afraid, they are afraid to go out at night. This has only happened over the last number of years. Even in quiet neighbourhoods people now lock their doors and bar their windows because they are concerned about what is happening.

For example, on the front page of the Toronto Star today there is a story headlined "Family fears killer may win freedom". An individual who was the worst serial killer in Ontario's history is about to be released after killing seven people about 15 years ago. In my riding of York South—Weston two people were murdered last night. The headline in today's Toronto Star is "Couple found shot to death in city of York penthouse".

One of the reasons that politicians are being rendered irrelevant is that people watch what is going on here in Parliament and say: "Well, these people are not really talking about issues that affect me on a day-to-day basis. There is far too much discussion about constitutions and free trade agreements".

These issues are important, but also important is the issue of crime and punishment. This government simply has not provided the leadership necessary to help alleviate some of those fears out there, the well-founded fears of people who are concerned about their safety and the safety of their children. People just will not go for a walk any more in metropolitan Toronto without being in the company of others. They will not allow their children to go out alone at night any more. That is with good reason. People are concerned about the Young Offenders Act.

They are concerned about our immigration laws. They are concerned about judges and the courts who appear to have completely lost touch with reality.

We read time and time again that convicted drug traffickers are given suspended sentences. After being convicted of trafficking in narcotics and selling drugs to young children in school yards these individuals are given a pat on the back and a suspended sentence.

The system is failing. The system is in desperate need of repair.

Mr. Mills: It is pretty tough on the police.

Mr. Nunziata: My colleague from Broadview—Greenwood indicates that it is pretty tough on the police. Darn right it is pretty tough on the police. All too often sufficient support is not given to police forces across the country. They are waging the war on the front lines and are not getting support from the politicians. They are not given adequate funding to carry out the responsibilities they have. They are not getting support from the Crown prosecutors or the judges. Something has to be done. We are at the breaking point. Unless something is done very quickly we are going to forever lose the streets to hoodlums and criminals.

The Young Offenders Act is not working. Our immigration laws allow non-citizens to be convicted of serious drug offences or other offences and remain in Canada. Surely it is not too much to expect the federal government, through its immigration laws and the Criminal Code, to immediately deport non-Canadians. We cannot deport someone who is a Canadian citizen, but surely we should be able to deport someone who is not a citizen of Canada—and that can include people who have lived here five, 10 or 15 years—who is convicted of a serious criminal offence, of an indictable offence, especially with relation to drug trafficking. Surely it is not too much to ask that these individuals be deported.

If the purpose of criminal law is to deter criminal behaviour, then if a non-Canadian knew that he or she would be deported if they were dealing in drugs in local school yards, for example, they would think twice before they did so.

The public is fast losing respect for the criminal justice system. Another area of concern for many people is an obscure section of the Criminal Code, section 45. It allows convicted killers to be released from prison after serving only 15 years. Life does not mean life any more. You can go out and kill somebody today in Canada and as long you are good in prison for 15 years you can then apply to be released.

We have the situation now, under this obscure provision of the Criminal Code, in which Colin Thatcher, Clifford Olson, Saul Betesh, Jon Rallo, Helmut Buxbaum and about 500 more convicted killers over the next year or so will be able to use this obscure provision to seek release from prison. Therefore, is it any wonder that—

An hon. member: The Stevenson case.

Mr. Nunziata: And the Stevenson case as well. In that case the convicted killer was murdered himself.

I am pleased to be the sponsor of this motion. I am pleased that the government is moving in that direction, but I would urge the Solicitor General and government members to push the minister to introduce legislation at the earliest opportunity so that local police forces can start receiving money as soon as possible to help them combat the problem of crime, and in particular drug crime, in our communities across the country.

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Madam Speaker, I have listened intently to the hon. member for York South—Weston. I must say that I agree with many of the statements he made at the end of his speech. However, his Motion No. M-601 arose from the announcement by the Solicitor General that the federal government is planning to share assets forfeited as a result of federal prosecutions of drug traffickers.

• (1130)

I am reading from the news release from the Solicitor General. He said that consultations have begun with provincial governments and municipal representatives on a detailed proposal for fair sharing of crime assets when local or provincial police have participated in investigations.

What the hon. member says about the judicial system in Canada, that it is not well thought of by Canadians, is absolutely true. Some changes have been made to the Young Offenders Act. I support more changes. I know the hon. member does too. We served on the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General for seven years together, a committee which I now chair.

However, while all of these things the hon. member says, we need to change may be true, changes are being made. We have made made changes in the Extradition Act to make sure that Canada does not become a safe haven for murderers from other countries. We have made changes since the member for York South—Weston left the justice committee. We have put through Bill C-36, changes to the Parole Act, so that dangerous offenders cannot apply for parole until at least half of their sentence has been served. Presently it is one-third, and for some sorts of temporary absences, one-sixth.

While I agree with all of those things, what has been raised here is the issue of asset sharing with the local police forces involved in the investigation and arrest of offenders when the proceeds of crime provisions of the Narcotics Control Act result in assets being seized. The government has already announced that assets forfeited as a result of federal prosecutions of drug traffickers will be shared.

I do not know if the hon. member is referring to moneys used by local police forces for drug buys. That is something entirely different. If money is used for drug buys by the Metropolitan Toronto Police Force or the Peel Regional Police Force, for example, then this money should be returned after the prosecution is finished so that it can be put to good use again.

We are talking about something different here. I support the principle of sharing the assets put forward in the motion but I have some difficulty with the specifics. The question of asset sharing is definitely not simple. A number of issues need to be addressed to arrive at an equitable sharing regime.

The mere fact that a seizure of assets occurs does not mean that those assets are available for distribution by the government. Naturally, we must wait for the court to order forfeiture, and this requirement creates a number of distinct issues. There are costs involved in every seizure before forfeiture. Not the least of these costs relates to the rights of the accused person or innocent third parties who may be creditors with a valid interest in the seized asset. If we were to seize a golf course or a ski resort someone may hold a mortgage on it. There are innocent third parties who need to be considered.

There are also victims. Victims' rights are often overlooked. We need to look at victims' rights.

The provisions permit the accused to look to the seized or restrained assets to recover a variety of expenses, subject to the approval of the court. There are also significant prosecution costs and in many cases significant management and storage costs. The hon. member mentioned storage costs.

There are also significant questions of accountability and jurisdictional controls to be considered. Drug testing has to be considered, and so do all sorts of things. I believe that the government needs to retain 10 per cent of the share to look after these things. After that, sharing may be fine.

We must not be blinded by the uninformed demand for funds based on a theory that there is an unlimited flow of money from drug investigations. In the first place, I do not believe this is true when we talk about $4 billion to $10 billion. Most of that money may be going offshore, who knows? What we can seize in Canada may be a much smaller amount. I do not believe we are seizing what we should be seizing, however, when he talks about $4 billion to $10 billion, he may be way out of line.

Second, such a claim merely raises expectations and fails to address the real problem. A response to this claim must address each of the questions raised earlier and provide answers that will advance the real goal. The goal is not to provide an alternate source for police funds in times of tight budgets. The goal must be the continued successful attack against profit motive in the drug trade.

You cannot create a band-aid solution calling for the sharing of assets with police if a greater haemorrhage of these assets occurs because the management of the assets between the time of seizure and forfeiture inadvertently allows the assets to be dissipated. This can happen. The assets can be dissipated away and no one gets any good from them. We believe that there might be cases where restraint related costs exceed what the state could reasonably realize under forfeiture.

The simple policy choice that demands the criminal should be separated from his ill-gotten gain, in spite of the cost, may well justify the initial seizure decision, regardless of the cost. This kind of situation must be addressed before we talk about sharing.

Canada's proceeds of crime legislation, enacted in 1989, was intended to counter the growth of the drug trade by removing the profit potential of drug trafficking. The RCMP is the lead agency in Canada with respect to drug offences in general and drug related proceeds of crime offences in particular. We all know that it is working very closely in co-operation with municipal and provincial police forces, however, we all admit that the RCMP is the lead agency.

The Attorney General of Canada takes the lead in prosecuting these offences, especially since the drug trade does not recognize international or interprovincial borders, let alone municipal borders. In spite of this fact, Canada has encouraged provincial and local police agencies to participate in the investigation of drug offences.

It was brought up by the hon. member that possibly some of these municipal forces are not working to their best potential because they are not sharing. I do not believe that. I do not believe that they hold back one iota in their efforts to combat the drug trafficking trade because they are not sharing in the profit.

I have spoken to the chief of police of metropolitan Toronto who believes that if they make a drug buy with marked money, when that money goes through the court and the appeal period is past, the money should be returned. I believe that. We are talking about something different here. We are talking about forfeiture.

The scourge on the streets occasioned by the traffic in drugs has always been a significant motivater for the local police enforcement community to investigate vigorously drug trafficking. The management costs associated with the proceeds provisions have, however, operated against local police utilization of the scheme.

This may require their creation of an effective process to manage seized and restrained assets for the court, while the forfeiture application is pending. Such a process would leave police and more specifically, the RCMP, free to concentrate on their real mission, the attack on crime, while others would supervise private sector management of seized or restrained assets under the full direction and control of the courts.

The hon. member seems to not like this idea, but I feel it is the only way to operate where we have a management group who looks after the control of all this seized material and leaves the police free. I do not believe this is a function of the police to look after these things. The question must be looked at in relation to sharing.

I agree with the principle that where other levels of government support the federal effort in eliminating the drug trade through the enforcement of the proceeds of crime scheme, they deserve to share in the proceeds, but in the net proceeds. I mention that again, the net proceeds.

• (1140)

Hopefully sharing will foster improved co-operation in the law enforcement community and might invite increased participation in the scheme by that community. I believe they are operating to full capacity right now to combat crime. However, this does not mean that some difficult issues do not need to be addressed to arrive at an equitable sharing.

The local law enforcement community's expectations must be tempered with a realistic appreciation that there are significant costs occasioned by every seizure. The most obvious is that innocent owners and third parties must take priority over the expectations of the police.

I notice that you are motioning that my time is up. Do I have consent for one more minute to finish?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Horner: The most obvious of these is that innocent owners and third parties must take priority over the expectations of the police, as I said before. In other words, a dollar seized will never mean that there is a dollar available for sharing. Any proposal to share must permit the government to evaluate and determine the scope of any eventual equitable sharing.

We must always recognize that the various jurisdictions have a valid interest in the budget issues surrounding law enforcement and the question of sharing must recognize this jurisdictional question. It is easy to agree with the principle of equitable sharing but it is more difficult to agree on the modalities by which this should be accomplished. The sharing of proceeds scheme must not become a driving force for a particular investigation.

The hon. member's motion suggests that any sharing should be with the local police force. This creates difficulties since in many cases there is no separate legal entity and the local force is a department of a local municipality. Therefore, there would be sharing with the local municipality.

Madam Speaker, you are motioning that I should conclude. I also notice that the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River wants to speak. I will conclude by saying that the forfeiture provision is part of the criminal sentence and an efficient way to attack the drug trade. It should not be allowed to become an alternative budgetary device.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to address the private members' motion of the member for York South—Weston who has been a real contributor in the field of justice and the Solicitor General over the last many years. He recently left the critic's spot for our party and works in another area now. However, his work goes on and this is one example of that member's contribution to the work of this House and in committees in the field of the Solicitor General.

This particular motion addresses the issue of the seizure and sharing of the proceeds of crime, more particularly in the field of drug prosecutions. I want to explore very briefly the role of seizure and sharing in the war on drugs.

The purpose of the forfeiture or seizure of these funds is to take some of the profit out of the drug business ex post facto. After the profit is in the bank, after one has bought a plaza, a Cadillac and Rolls Royce, speed boat and condominium with the proceeds of crime, the goal is to remove those assets from the convicted drug trafficker because society does not believe it is fair to permit those assets to remain in the hands of criminals. I believe society has that right.

The second thing is the purpose of the sharing itself after government and courts have seized these assets. I believe it is only fair to share the proceeds of the sale of these assets with the agencies that made them available. Therein lies some of the complexities that have prevented the government from delivering on its promise to execute some kind of sharing among governments. I am a little frustrated with the delay. I can see there is progress but we are not there yet. One thing I wanted to note is that the sharing of these proceeds does not affect the war against drugs.

If the war against drugs is going to be won, it will be won because of the things we do in society, not because we share the net proceeds of a Cadillac. Let us not delude ourselves. This is a part of the program but it is not going to win the war against drugs.

What does the sharing of the proceeds do? It does a couple of things. It injects new money back into the agencies which investigated the crime in the first place. For instance, Royal Canadian Mounted Police funding comes from the taxpayers and if it puts $1 million into a particular investigation, the fact that we seize and make proceeds available later can put back $1 million that was not previously there.

That can also happen on the municipal level where perhaps the money is not as great in some cases. One of the objectives of the current negotiations is to enable some of that money to go back to the municipal level.

A second thing that sharing the proceeds does is it provides a minor incentive to police forces. It is not a big incentive. Policemen across Canada are out there doing their job in any event. The fact that their police force, not themselves personally, but their city or their town has an opportunity to share in the proceeds, is really but a minor incentive to them. It is a tangible recognition of the fruits of their labour if their force can share and if the taxpayer that supports that force can share in those proceeds that are seized.

There are two other problems that sharing will address. It will hopefully remove a couple of problems. One is that the perceived unfairness in not sharing the proceeds may be a disincentive in some police forces. It may discourage certain police forces at certain times at certain places from actively participating in another drug investigation. We are all human and I can understand that.

If there is to be a drug investigation, in many cases it requires co-ordination among police forces. In Ontario and in Quebec three levels of police forces, the federal, provincial and local forces are involved. If there is a perceived unfairness, it may prevent the kind of co-operation we really need among police forces from the beginning right to the end in the planning, the execution, the prosecution and in the seizure.

If we exclude the municipal police forces from that whole process they may not be as active as they should be in drug investigations.

I also want to make a point. My friend from Mississauga West, who spoke very well on this subject, indicated that the lack of sharing was not interfering with the likelihood of police forces participating in investigations. But in the Solicitor General's announcement in the background paper that accompanied it, on page 2 there is a clear reference stating that there is "a reluctance on the part of provincial and local police to participate in federal enforcement because investigations can be costly". That is an impediment and hopefully we are working now to overcome it.

I want to make sure the record is very clear. We have to recognize that there are real costs involved in maintaining the seized assets. If a truck is seized or a piece of real estate, a commercial property, there are costs in maintaining them. The bills have to get paid. The ownership has to be legally altered. Someone has to pay the local taxes. There are costs and we have to realize that. In the end if a bank account with $1 million is seized, we are okay. That we can distribute. But if a truck is seized, it has to be stored and auctioned off.

You have to make a court application, you have to change the ownership and who knows what else you have to do, repair the tire on the front of the truck that received a bullet during the drug investigation, I do not know. We have to recognize those costs. They are really there, and that is why the Solicitor General has talked about taking 10 per cent off the top, to make sure that there are professionals in government who can manage these assets when they are seized and dispose of them.

Near the end here, I again want to reiterate that sharing the proceeds is not going to help us win any war on drugs. It is only a minor dance step here in what is a very significant social challenge. We have to put more effort on education, on enforcement and we may want to alter some of our laws as well.

I want to finish off by saying that I am pleased to see the government has been prepared to address this and to commit itself to sharing. I am disappointed that it has taken at least two years, three years if I am not mistaken, and we are still not there yet. I recognize some of the complexity, but with a dedicated effort I would have thought this business could have been accomplished within a year.

The letters are still out there in all the provincial capitals going back and forth between the bureaucrats. We are not there yet. Hopefully before this Parliament rises for an election, the matter will be history and the public and the local police forces will have the benefit of sharing in the proceeds of crime, an asset brought about by the work of the local police forces.

I want to encourage the provinces to get their act together too, as we try to bring a resolution to this, bring an end to the negotiations and put the meat on the table.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, yes, I have to emphasize the public is very concerned about crime and drugs.

In the 1960s and 1970s, drug trafficking was really not as widespread as it became in the 1980s. The 600 per cent increase in the amount of cocaine seized by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in 1991 as compared to the 1987 numbers clearly demonstrates the situation.

Other police forces have also recorded major seizures of cocaine and heroine as well as other narcotic drugs, so this increasing demand for drugs has really generated a lucrative commerce. In fact, it is running into the billions and billions of dollars.

Under the provisions of the Narcotic Control Act, the Crown can only seek the forfeiture of money which is directly used to purchase drugs or conveyances used in connection with the offence for which a person was convicted. Unfortunately, those provisions did not allow for the seizure and for the forfeiture of assets obtained through legal dealings with drugs.

Thus, there really was a need for new legislation which could justly and firmly grip the criminals, and strip the criminals of their ill-gotten wealth. The new proceeds of crime legislation as my colleagues have mentioned Bill C-61. It amended the Criminal Code and the Narcotic Control Act as well as the Food and Drugs Act, and was proclaimed in January 1989.

This act does provide the courts with authority to order the forfeiture of proceeds, that is property acquired directly or indirectly from the commission of specific offences, including drug offences.

The thrust of the legislation is to increase the capacity of the state to strip the profits of crime from those people who are engaged in specific criminal activities as well as provide for an effective deterrent to any of those people who might even be contemplating drug trafficking.

The legislative amendments also include the insertion of two offences, that is the proceeds of property obtained through specific offences and laundering of proceeds. Therefore, it is noteworthy that this legislation was the subject of federal–provincial consultation before its enactment and we do have to work with our colleagues and our counterparts in the provinces to make sure we become effective in this particular area.

Forfeiture of proceeds go to the federal government or they go to the provincial governments. Provinces had the option to prosecute cases under the Criminal Code, in which cases proceeds forfeited accrued to the provincial treasury. However, undertakings must be given by provincial attorneys general to protect any assets seized. Provinces in general have been a little bit reluctant to assume these undertakings.

Some police forces have suggested that forfeited proceeds money be returned to the police force to cover investigation costs. I think that is what my colleague is discussing today with his private member's motion.

It is important to note that funding of the police forces is a provincial jurisdiction. The federal government really does not want nor does it wish to interfere in any of the existing funding arrangements between the provinces and their municipalities.

Police departments use money to buy drugs from traffickers in order to obtain evidence for court purposes. Health and Welfare's policy is that this marked "buy money" which has been seized is quickly returned to the appropriate police force. All other money seized and forfeited in accordance with the proceeds of crime provision is deposited into the account of the Receiver General and under the terms of the Financial Administration Act can only be paid out by an act of Parliament.

Similarly, forfeited money in cases where procedures were at the instance or at the initiative of a provincial government goes into the provincial treasury. Fair.

I am really pleased to inform the House that the government is presently reviewing, as my colleague from Mississauga West stated, the process by which proceeds from crime can be shared among the various levels of government that have participated in the investigations and in the prosecutions leading to the forfeiture.

As well, the government is presently considering the creation of a cost recoverable consolidated and fully accountable office in the Department of Supply and Services to manage assets seized, restrained, or forfeited under federal prosecutions and a scheme for the equitable sharing of net forfeitures with the provinces and/or the municipalities that are involved. The Solicitor General and the Department of Justice are presently undergoing consultation with a proposal to oversee that matter.

Others have suggested that proceeds money that is received be used to fund programs dealing with substance abuse. I believe the concerns for drug related education and treatment programs can most effectively be addressed through the Canada Drug Strategy program.

As you know it was last spring in the House that the Minister of National Health and Welfare announced the renewal of the Canadian Drug Strategy program with $270 million over five years. This strategy was developed after considerable consultation with the provincial governments, the police forces, and treatment agencies as well as other interested parties right across the country.

Canada's drug strategy was formulated to address concerns identified during these consultations that we had. The strategy provides for co–ordinated initiatives which deal with supply reduction, and more important, programs which aim at diminishing the demand for drugs.

Funding will be made available to treatment programs for rehabilitation as well as to community groups and government organizations to raise the awareness of the problem of drug abuse. The strategy was renewed with the emphasis on aggressive forfeiture programs in funding, and it provides funding to assist police right across the country in their efforts to apprehend drug traffickers.

I am pleased to report that the level of asset seizures has indeed increased significantly since 1989 as a result of the proceeds of crime legislation. Assets seized include such items as money, vehicles, houses, and so forth. The amount seized and forfeited increased from $300,000 in 1989 to $1.1 million in 1990, to $2.7 million in 1991.

• (1200)

I know the hon. member who put forth this motion today used the amounts of $38 million in 1990 and $50 million in 1991. Those were gross figures. Indeed, as the member for Mississauga West pointed out, there are third party commitments, there are victims, there are costs related to this specific issue, and indeed the net proceeds that come out of forfeiting the drug money comes down to $2.7 million in 1991.

While I do agree with some of the proposals put forth in my colleague's private member's motion, I must say that this government is acting upon it, and indeed we will be coming forth with a specific new department. I thank you very much for allowing me this opportunity to participate.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-80, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, to enact the Children's Special Allowances Act, to amend certain other acts in consequence thereof and to repeal the Family Allowances Act, as reported (with amendments) by a legislative committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Madam Deputy Speaker: There are 72 amendment motions on the Notice Paper for report stage of Bill C-80, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, to enact the Children's Special Allowances Act, to amend certain other acts in consequence thereof and to repeal the Family Allowances Act.

[English]

Motions Nos. 1, 3, 5, 7, 9, 11, 13, 15, 17, 19, 21, 32, 34, 39, 41, 43, 45, 47, 49, 51, 53, 55, 57, 59, 61, 63, 65, 67, 69 and 71, standing in the name of the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing will be grouped for debate, with a vote on Motion No. 1 applying to Motions Nos. 3, 5, 7, 9, 11, 13, 15, 17, 19, 21, 32, 34, 39, 41, 43, 45, 47, 49, 51, 53, 55, 57, 59, 61, 63, 65, 67, 69 and 71.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 2, 4, 6, 8, 10, 12, 14, 16, 18, 20, 22, 33, 35, 40, 42, 44, 46, 48, 50, 52, 54, 56, 58, 60, 62, 64, 66, 68, 70 and 72, all standing in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, will not be selected because they are identical to Motions Nos. 1, 3, 5, 7, 9, 11, 13, 15, 17, 19, 21, 32, 34, 39, 41, 43, 45, 47, 49, 51, 53, 55, 57, 59, 61, 63, 65, 67, 69 and 71.

[English]

Motions Nos. 23, 25, 26 and 27, standing in the name of the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, and Motions Nos. 28, 29, 30 and 31, standing in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, will be grouped for debate but voted upon as follows: An affirmative vote on Motion No. 23 obviates the necessity of the question being put on Motions Nos. 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30 and 31. A negative vote on Motion No. 23 necessitates the question being put on Motion No. 25. An affirmative vote on Motion No. 25 obviates the necessity of the question being put on Motions Nos. 26 and 27.

A negative vote on Motion No. 25 necessitates the question being put separately on Motions Nos. 26 and 27.

Motion No. 28 will be voted upon separately.

A vote on Motion No. 29 will apply to Motion No. 30.

Motion No. 31 will be voted upon separately.

Motion No. 24, standing in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, will not be selected as it is identical to Motion No. 23.

[Translation]

Motion No. 36, standing in the name of the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, and Motion No. 38, standing in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, will be grouped for the purposes of debate and voted on as follows:

[English]

An affirmative vote on Motion No. 36 obviates the necessity of the question being put on Motion No. 38. A negative vote on Motion No. 36 necessitates the question being put on Motion No. 38.

[Translation]

Motion No. 37, standing in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, will not be selected because it is identical to Motion No. 36.

[English]

I shall now propose to the House Motions Nos. 1, 3, 5, 7, 9, 11, 13, 15, 17, 19, 21, 32, 34, 39, 41, 43, 45, 47, 49, 51, 53, 55, 57, 59, 61, 63, 65, 67, 69 and 71.

Mr. Milliken: In view of the very large number of amendments, I think there might be agreement to treat them as having been put to the House at this time so that Your Honour will not have to read them all. I know they are all very short, but I do not think we need to hear 30 amendments.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the Chair to dispense with the reading of the motions and consider that they have been put to the House?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Chair is very grateful.

He said: Madam Speaker, there is nothing which characterizes more the approach that this government is taking to children and to the problems of children in poverty than contrasting the government's commitment to spend over $4 billion on helicopters and to put only $400 million into improving the position of children living in poverty.

The approach being taken here in Bill C-80 is to amend the Income Tax Act, to get rid of family allowance, the final ending of what is left of universality in family allowance and to replace it with a system of child benefits which will add nothing, as the government's own officials have indicated, to those who are the poorest of the poor. Those who are living on social assistance will receive not one penny more than they receive at the present time. We know across the country in spite of efforts by some governments to increase social assistance rates, in particular the governments of Ontario, British Columbia and Saskatchewan, children in Canada live at about 60 per cent of the poverty line. Children who are unfortunate enough to be born to poor families live at about 60 per cent of the poverty line. We need to ensure that those children have adequate resources, adequate nutrition, adequate money for their schooling, that they can attend school in a way enabling them to obtain a good education and go on to gainful employment, making a contribution to society and maintaining some dignity for themselves.

Instead of taking that approach, this government has taken what is another mean-spirited approach to the problems of children living in poverty. The poorest of the poor will receive not one penny more from this government as a result of the rejigging of child benefits.

The suggestion by the government that more money is going into child benefits is difficult to understand, bearing in mind the comments which have been made both by finance officials and health and welfare officials suggesting that not one penny more will go to the poorest of the poor.

In addition, those families that work but remain poor will receive $500 more each to help maintain themselves. What this means for those children living in poor families that do not work is that they will be less well off than those who live in poor families that work.

Here the government is continuing in its trend to distinguish between the deserving poor and the underserving poor. A poor child living in a family in which one or more parents work but remains poor is deserving of some extra money, whereas children living in families in which the parents do not work is not deserving of extra money. To explain that to poor children would take an enormous amount of clever arguing and I do not think in the end those children would accept it.

Nothing is being done for those at the very poor end, and for those who are a little less poor there is little being done for them. In contrast, because of changes to the child care expense deduction, benefits are being handed over to richer Canadians. Therefore we have a continuation within this legislation of the gap between rich and poor growing year by year.

The government has made a number of arguments to sustain this legislation, all of which were contradicted by all of the witnesses in the legislative committee. The government has said that the system is simpler. It is only simpler because of the reduction from five categories to four categories and the government and government officials have already indicated that the government will calculate the benefits because it will be too complicated for individuals. It is not simpler, although that is one of the claims that the government is making.

The government says it is fairer. It is not fairer when you consider, as I have just mentioned, this categorization of the deserving poor and the undeserving poor. Even if we consider that adding $500 a year to those families that work is a good idea, how can that possibly begin to cover the expenses of looking after children when child care can cost anywhere between $6,000 and $12,000 a year? Clearly $500 is not going to do anything to help those families.

As I have said, it is not more generous, even though that is one suggestion that the government has made.

If we look at other countries and if we put Canada in the category of countries that concern themselves with their children and with poverty among their children, we see that only the United States has a worse record than Canada of all the developed nations.

If we look at other countries, in particular European countries with a social democratic tradition, we see that not only are child benefits higher than they are in Canada, but also the gap between what a child needs, what a family needs and what a family receives in order to meet the poverty line is smaller in those countries.

As witnesses at the committee indicated, no matter which mechanism for deciding and gauging poverty one follows internationally, Canada shows up very badly in contrast to these other countries.

To suggest, as this government is by proposing legislation like this, that a 20 per cent child poverty level in Canada is acceptable—over one million children living in poverty—is simply not a tenable point when one looks at other countries such as Norway in which the child poverty rate is somewhere around 5 per cent.

If we were committed to our children we would be moving toward providing adequate benefits to them, not the system proposed here which will really make no difference at all to the poorest of the poor.

We cannot just criticize this legislation. We have to propose alternatives. If we look at the cost of poverty in Canada it is a question of whether we can afford not to provide adequate benefits to Canadian children rather than what we can afford to provide.

One estimate suggests that as a result of poverty in Canada—the 1.6 million people unemployed, the over three million on social assistance and the over one million children living in poverty—the total cost to the economy in Canada is over $60 billion. In other words, this country is losing $60 billion in production each year because of these extremely high poverty levels.

Lest we think these proposals are accidental, we know from both Liberal governments with six and five guidelines and this government's obsession with inflation that unemployment has been created in order to respond to the particular economic problem of inflation.

As we know, other countries around the world do not create unemployment in order to reduce inflation. There are other ways to approach that problem and we should be thinking of that rather than putting more people out of work and making more poor as a result of a particular economic agenda.

We must consider that $60 billion of lost GNP. We must consider that it costs the government an estimated $17,500 a year for every person not working in terms of lost taxes and in social payments. We have to consider that and ask: Is it not absurd to continue this loss without providing adequate funding to children and people living in poverty? In this case we are particularly concerned with children.

The cost of having so many children living in poverty is enormous and we must address that in the only way we can, by providing more money to people in poverty situations. In the short term we have to make sure that our children are well fed and can go to school with full stomachs rather than on empty stomachs and not being able to learn. We have to make sure that poor children are given a fair chance.

We find that children unfortunate enough to be born to poor parents will have a lower educational level, will be sicker and more likely to be unemployed.

The solution must be a commitment to full employment, to making employment the number one economic objective of the government. The commitment has to attack the problem from the point of view of ensuring that high quality, good paying jobs are available to Canadians to enable them to work, feed their families and stay out of poverty. That is the solution to the problem, not a proposal of this sort which does nothing to improve the situation of Canada's poor children.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam. Speaker, I join in this debate in support of the motion which has the impact to delete the piece of legislation commonly known as Bill C-80, dealing with the child benefits legislation.

I would like to thank my colleague for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso for supporting the same series of amendments. In the ruling of the Speaker, the member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing's were accepted.

I want to put this on the record because the Liberal Party is so convinced that this is the wrong approach to social policy that starting in June just about every one asked for an opportunity to participate in this debate and has time after time been told by the government that this debate must be hurried or that this debate must be closed down. When the legislation was first introduced back in February as part of the budget no time was set aside to analyse and to discuss the child benefits package. It was introduced by way of the shortest white paper in the history of the Canadian government. A $2 billion expenditure was explained in 14 short pages with no details, no reference to research and no reference to consultation.

• (1220)

In late June we were offered the opportunity to speak about it in the House and the government immediately moved time allocation. Only seven members had the opportunity to discuss it. It was then brought to committee for two days—one of the most important pieces of legislation in the social policy area—and then three days were set aside in June. When we asked for more time because of the many witnesses who had written us, we were told: "Yes, come back in early July".

Every time there has been a national crisis dealing with the Constitution or the referendum this government has used that opportunity in a very sneaky fashion to try to slip Bill C-80 past Canadians. Here again, in the House, when most of us are concerned about the referendum and the new Constitution—we spent last week debating it—we are brought back here, while the rest of the country is preparing for the debate on the Constitution, to very quickly look after Bill C-80. I hope it is not the intention of the government this afternoon or tomorrow to again move time allocation and remove the opportunity to debate from the many members who have tried again and again to stand up in this House and question the assumptions and the advisability of Bill C-80.

The government has taken a premise that every Canadian would agree with, that children in need are deserving of more help than they are currently getting. One of the reasons they are deserving is because since the mid-1980s this government has taken $3.5 billion out of this system that supports those children. Having taken away $3.5 billion the government has come back with a package in which it has tried to appeal to Canadians so that instead of helping all children it would only help those who are poor.

Many social policy groups are concerned about this legislation. When they first heard about it over the news on budget night they said: "Hurrah, somebody is finally listening to us". By the weekend, when they had an opportunity to look at it in more detail, they found that it was just the opposite of what they were looking for.

When we had hearings, when the government did let us have hearings, the government could only find one witness, a junior academic who obviously had done no research in the area, to support the proposition of this legislation. No matter whether people were flown in from Vancouver, Halifax, or Toronto, or drove across the city here in Ottawa, nobody but nobody, with the exception of this one young academic, was the least bit supportive of the legislation.

Here you are dealing with a group that represents groups across the country who are working with many poor families, many low-income communities, and many regions that are very depressed. It would love to be supportive of anything that puts more money into the child benefits system in this country. The goodwill is naturally there for a government that cares because people want to see something done for children. When this group decides that it has to walk on a $2 billion expenditure because it is not suitable to those they have been advocating it is time for the government to understand that it may be on the wrong track.

It is time for the government to use the opportunity of this debate, not to push through a faulty piece of legislation, but to support this motion which has the intent of deleting the legislation. It is time for the government to go back to the drawing board and to ask the basic questions about day care; to ask the basic question as to why people on social assistance are not getting more help; to ask how working families can get more assistance; to ask what to do about women who, in abusive relationships, depend on the small cheques to have at least some cash of their own. The government should ask itself why it did not deal with these issues? Why has the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who historically has been the biggest advocate of change in the national government in favour of health care, child care and the promotion of social programs, refused to debate? Why has the minister refused to appear in front of the committee? How can we have a sophisticated and responsive social policy system if the minister responsible for it declines to participate? Is it really true that social policy is now the domain of the Minister of Finance?

I can remember the Ministers of Finance in the 20th century and, notwithstanding the fact that they share the same party as myself, I would not want many of them to be responsible for social policy. That is not their job.

The job of the minister of health is to be an advocate for children. In the course of this debate, in which many members from the Liberal Party will be participating, and pursuant to other motions that are presented to try to improve this piece of legislation we want to impress upon the government the need to not proceed quickly, the need to not wrap up debate in a few days and the need not to push forward simply to have a January 1 deadline met so that cheques can be in the mail for families, so that we do not give the appearance that we are trying to gain the attention of voters with their own money, and so that this House considers very carefully the uses of moneys for children.

Many of these details have been brought up by the various speakers from across the country who have listened to groups in their communities. I wish that the government would take the time, go into deliberations and withdraw this legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, having spoken to Bill C-80 several times, I welcome this opportunity today to speak once more—this time at the report stage—to a bill that is so important to Canadian families, especially those on low incomes.

I must admit I am a little surprised at the kind and number of motions tabled by the opposition, which unfortunately do nothing to improve the circumstances of Canadian families with children who need support from the federal government. These motions want to reject an investment of over $2 billion the federal government is prepared to make over the next five years. These motions tell Canadian low-income families they should not accept the $2 billion the government wants to give them.

The government proposes to get rid of a system that provided three ways, each with different criteria, to get money every year from the federal government for children. The government would like to consolidate these into a single option. The opposition motions say: "No, let us keep the complex system with its three different ways for the government to send us money." I am very disappointed to see that the opposition ignores the concerns of Canadian families with children and especially low-income families that would benefit enormously as a result of the proposed amendments in Bill C-80.

The current system provides for family allowance, child credit and a refundable child tax credit. Many groups, parents and people generally across this country have said repeatedly: that this does not make sense. There are three ways to get money from the government, with different criteria for each one. Often people have to wait for up to a year after the child is born, the income tax return is filed, and so forth, to receive the money to which they are entitled.

The government is proposing one monthly cheque, paid in advance. The three existing programs would be consolidated into one, with advance payments made every month. Who would benefit? Mainly Canadian families with children, with an income of less than $40,000.

• (1230)

That is the purpose of Bill C-80, which is an excellent piece of legislation because its goals are, first of all, to help low-income families and also to make things easier for these families and reduce government paperwork. We will have one instead of three, and I think the opposition should be able to understand that. We are simplifying the system and investing $2 billion more. Not $200, not $2 million or even $200 million but $2 billion more, to help low-income families in this country. So as I said before in the House, we have a duty to adopt this bill as soon as possible and ensure the system is ready to go by the beginning of 1993. The opposition ought to co-operate and help expedite this bill, because they are the ones who keep criticizing our tax system for being too complex.

Bill C-80 would simplify our Canadian tax system and ensure that low-income families can have access to these funds more readily and in advance, for the benefit of their children.

My colleagues in the government and the Progressive Conservative Party support this bill unreservedly. They wish the opposition parties would realize the importance of adopting this bill as soon as possible to ensure it will come into force by the beginning of 1993.

In conclusion, as I pointed out before, this is an excellent bill because it is fairer, more equitable and more straightfoward and gives Canadian low-income families an extra $2 billion. I hope my colleagues on the other side of this House will get the message and do what is necessary to have this bill adopted as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I rise to speak on this bill. I want to do so from the context of working for many years with poor families, and particularly with poor children.

I think back to the statement made by the Prime Minister calling universal social programs a sacred trust. Over the last few years we have watched how his government has now systematically eroded all of the sacred trusts.

This bill introduces a number of elements that are steps backward in history. The whole concept is based on the idea of deserving and undeserving poor. It is designing a child support program that deliberately and systematically provides more funds to parents who are working, or to children whose parents are working, to the deserving poor and denies any increase in funds to the very poor, those whose parents have no funds and no income and must rely on public assistance.

People should go back and read the Elizabethan poor law of 1601 because it was based on the very same concept of the deserving poor and the undeserving poor. The deserving poor were those who would go into a workhouse and work in poverty, in deplorable conditions, and they would receive some assistance from the state. Those who would not go into a workhouse to work were considered undeserving poor and would receive no assistance.

That is the same concept that is now being built into this legislation. It says that if parents will take some job below the minimum wage or some job that does not pay them enough to earn a decent living, to meet the needs of their families, they will consider them worthy and provide them with money.

In many ways it is an indirect subsidy to low-wage payers in this country. It allows them to keep their wages low, knowing that they can entice a worker to take the job. The government will give them the money that should have been lawfully theirs for work.

This legislation is deliberately aimed at those who are on income assistance. There will be no increase for them at all, and that represents a large number of children in this country.

Many of us who have worked in public welfare have been worried that frequently income assistance families move from generation to generation to generation. One of the reasons for this is that as the children are growing up they drop out of school. It is very difficult to keep a 15-year old child or 16-year old child of an income assistance family in school because the incomes are so low. The kids do not have adequate funds to participate in social activities at school, to belong to the band or to go on the trips. They do not have money to be able to buy clothes of the calibre of their friends so they seem left out.

They also think that a job paying $4 an hour is a marvellous job. When a mother is looking after two teenage kids and getting $700 or $800 a month on income assistance the kid says: "My gosh, I can go out and earn $4 or $5 an hour and make that tremendous amount of money". They drop out of school to take a temporary, poor paying $4.50 or $5 an hour job. They are doomed always to be marginally employed because they cannot secure good employment with a grade 9 or grade 10 education.

We perpetuate income assistance families from one generation to another generation. Clearly we should be providing more resources to that family, raising the level of income assistance, making sure that programs like this are targeted to them so that the children have enough money coming into those families to feel they can continue to participate in the school environment, to make sure they have enough food on the table so the children do not go to school hungry so they can learn and to make sure there is enough income in those families that the children know $4.50 an hour is not adequate to support themselves let alone support themselves and a family down the road.

The children of members of this House know that $4.50 an hour does not even take them to a movie these days. They know that to buy a pair of running shoes costs $100. Our families know that. Income assistance families have been so pushed down that even minimal wages under terrible working conditions may appear to be beneficial to them.

Another thing upsets me about this bill. It cannot be seen in isolation. This bill is a part of a companion attack on the poor. This government is the one who curtailed Canada Assistance Plan moneys to three big provinces: Alberta, Ontario and B.C. Those are the provinces in which 50 per cent of all children live. They have said: "We will not only make sure there is no additional money available under this bill for families on income assistance. We will make sure that the provinces are in a financial squeeze where they cannot provide any additional funds because we will stop any transfers under the Canada Assistance Plan to those provinces".

The provinces are in financial difficulty with rising unemployment and rising demands on public assistance because of changes to the unemployment insurance legislation that have curtailed the number of people who qualify for unemployment insurance in this country. They are under pressure because of the reductions in the Established Programs Financing. They are not then in a position to try to assist to the maximum of their will families on income assistance.

We must understand this is part of a social policy package in which the government has said that the poor are undeserving, that the poor are unworthy, that it is going to go back to the concept of the Elizabethan poor law of 1601, and that it is going to make it even more difficult, more punitive, more restrictive to anybody who applies for public assistance. It tries to help the working poor, but it really subsidizes employers so they can get away with paying poor wages.

Canada is a wealthy country. There is no excuse for child poverty in this country. This bill does nothing to alleviate or end child poverty.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate in support of the amendment by the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing. I want to begin by congratulating my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, for the diligent and intelligent way in which he articulated the concerns of poor Canadian families in Canada by leading our party's opposition to this legislation.

At first glance this new integrated child benefit legislation seems innocent enough, even positive. It proposes to consolidate the family allowance program, the refundable child tax credit and the non-refundable child tax credit into a single, targeted monthly benefit.

This pamphlet which described the child benefit and which was released with the February budget said: "Low income families with one child will receive a monthly payment of up to $144, significantly more than the monthly payment of $35 they now receive. Approximately two million families with incomes below $50,000 will receive larger monthly payments than they do now".

We are told that the new consolidated child benefit will increase the federal government's commitment to child assistance, which was projected to be $4.5 billion in 1992, by another $400 million and will concentrate more of this assistance to those who need it.

Unfortunately a glance is all the government would like the opposition and other Canadians to have at this legislation before it is made law. This government delayed introduction of Bill C-80 until June. It immediately tried to rush it past second reading into committee where every effort was made to deny experts in the field such as the anti-poverty groups and the social policy research organizations any reasonable chance to study and comment on this legislation.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare, whose name appears on this pamphlet and who is the author of the new child benefit, refused to appear before the committee studying this legislation.

Patrick Johnston, executive director of the Canadian Council on Social Development and one of the leading authorities in our income security system in Canada, was given four days in mid-summer to prepare a presentation before the Commons committee. Too bad it was not time enough to study a bill that fundamentally changes the entire edifice of child benefit legislation in Canada since the Second World War; that was all the time he was going to get. Too bad if nearly all of the social action groups in this country panned this legislation as soon as they had a chance to see it and asked for more time to study its implications before it became law. The government was determined to proceed into its agenda regardless of the concerns that these people may have expressed.

Now we are told by the finance minister that this legislation has to be approved as soon as possible because 4,000 bureaucrats have to be hired and trained at Revenue Canada in order to administer this new system.

Why the indecent haste to rush this change through Parliament? Why is the Minister of Finance so insistent that these benefits begin on January 1, 1993?

The answer becomes a little clearer when one notes that the old and new child benefit regimes will overlap during the first six months of next year. During the anticipated period of the next federal election Canadian parents will be receiving double benefits. It is merely a cynical election ploy. It is a way for this government once again to bribe Canadians, this time poor working Canadians, with their own money right before they go to the election polls.

After the election in late 1993 and when Canadians complete their tax forms for 1993, they will find that their child credits and the refundable child tax credits no longer apply. That is okay to the government; by then the election will be over and the child benefit law will have achieved its political objective. It will have temporarily put extra money in the hands of a large number of Canadians and given them the illusion that when it counts this government is concerned about them.

Never mind that over the past five years between 1986 and 1991 this Tory government has taken more than $3.5 billion out of the child benefit system. Never mind that the government has completely reneged on its promises to institute a national child care program. Never mind that the GST has taken millions out of the pockets of poorer Canadians. Never mind that cuts and transfers to the provinces for health care and education have been consistently slashed. Never mind that the poorest members of our society, those on social assistance and living far below the poverty line, will not receive one extra penny from this new system as opposed to the old. This new child care smoke and mirrors bill is designed to make us forget all that.

Canadians will recall the government's tax reform measures before the last election. In 1987 the government announced measures that would lower income tax rates for millions of Canadians right around the time of the 1988 national election. It was only after the election that the government dropped the other foot, the GST, and slashed programs to deal with a burst of inflation and an increase in the government deficit created by its pre-election tax cut goodies. These measures have led directly to the current recession which is impoverishing millions of Canadian families. Now the government is trying to get away with this stunt once again.

I am reminded when I consider this legislation of a colourful local politician in Cape Breton who was campaigning in a closely fought late winter election. Just before the election there was a serious snowstorm which plugged all the driveways in the riding. He was trudging along a long driveway in the wake of this snowstorm to visit a poor but large family of voters. The family welcomed his visit but told him they could not afford to get their driveway ploughed in order to get out to vote.

"No problem," he said, "just leave that to me". Sure enough, before the election a snow-plough came and cleared the road. Naturally the family was very grateful until a few days after the election when they received the bill.

That is what happened before the last election. Tax reform was the snow-plough and the GST, high interest rates and the recession were the bill. That is what the government is trying to do with this child care bill. It offers superficial, short-term help to poor working families in Canada, but it very quickly erodes into insignificance.

Lack of full indexation makes the long term equally bleak. As Dr. Ken Battle of the Caledon Institute of Social Policy told the legislative committee:

> The federal government's proposal to change child benefits is seriously flawed. It does little in the short term and virtually nothing over the long term to make a dent in child poverty. Clearly this is a pre-election reform, since the larger monthly payments will come on stream during the election year. The new child benefit and earned income supplement will be paid monthly and so will look much bigger than the present system since the current refundable child tax credit is paid annually, or for poor families, twice a year. The White Paper proposals are designed to pretend to fight child poverty.

If this government is serious about addressing the growing scourge of child poverty in Canada, which is amply documented in the recent report of the Standing Committee on Health and Welfare, Social Affairs, Seniors and the Status of Women called Canada's Children: Investing in our Future, it would go more slowly and introduce a more comprehensive program to deal with child poverty and the problem of the working poor in this country.

It would implement a child care program that would enable the growing number of single parent families to get out of the welfare trap and be productive members of our society. At the same time, it would begin to properly value the social contribution women make in their child bearing and child rearing roles. It would offer women who choose to stay home to raise their children themselves access to real child benefits to enable them to do so.

This suggestion, which has been made to me by Mrs. Verna MacIntyre of Baddeck, among others, is one of the many suggestions that could be adopted in a comprehensive program to deal with child benefits that may also include the kinds of consolidation measures that are in the child benefit bill.

It is important for the poor to receive the kind of comprehensive treatment of their social situation that is lacking in this legislation. That is why this side of the House recommends the government not proceed with such haste. We recommend the government withdraw this bill to give us more time to study this whole area of social policy and present a program of child benefit legislation that actually addresses this growing problem in Canada.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to be able to rise to make a few comments with respect to this legislation.

Back in 1944 Parliament unanimously passed the Family Allowance Act. It was the creation of J. S. Woodsworth and the former CCF Party and was adopted by all parties in the House.

At that time it was seen as one of the most progressive pieces of legislation in Canada. It was passed not to help the poor in this country but to recognize the value of children in our society and the importance of parenthood.

Over the years the family allowance has become an institution in this country. Now the government is proposing to remove that act in the guise of helping to eliminate child poverty in this country. We have heard the parliamentary secretary for the government side make comments about how it will help poor people in this country. I find it very odd that having made that statement, the Minister of National Health and Welfare chose not to make any statements in this House regarding this bill. The Minister of National Health and Welfare chose not to answer questions with respect to this bill at committee.

I also find it very strange that virtually all the witnesses who appeared before the committee to review this legislation did not agree with the government. In fact, I believe some 25 witnesses appeared before the committee and almost all condemned this bill and said it was not going to help alleviate child poverty. This bill is not going to help the poor in this country. It is not going to benefit the people the government says will benefit from this legislation.

We have heard this government talk about the need to bring in a universal child care program since it came into power in 1984. It has talked about the need to maintain so-called sacred trusts which include universal programs such as the family allowance. We have seen this government renege on those promises.

In 1989 a resolution was passed by this House to eliminate child poverty by the year 2000. It is a very important problem that has to be dealt with. It has been documented many times in many areas that child poverty is a growing problem in this country, as is poverty of all types.

One way to eliminate child poverty is to provide jobs and training. A couple of years ago the government made some changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act which it said was going to help with training. It is true money was put into training. However money was also removed for training those who needed it most. If you are eligible for unemployment insurance in this country then you are eligible for training. If you happen to be one of the needy people in this country on social assistance, it is very difficult to get training.

Some people following this legislation do not understand it or the moves the government is making to eliminate child poverty. There are two funds under the Unemployment Insurance Act. One growing fund is just for people on unemployment insurance with some exceptions. The other fund is the old Consolidated Revenue Fund which is there to help others.

In my riding there are single mothers looking for training who cannot receive it because they are not on unemployment insurance. Counsellors from the Canada Employment Centre have privately told me they are very frustrated having to tell people they do not have a place for them in training programs, but if they were on unemployment insurance they could find training for them.

I had a situation in my riding where a single mother was taking a two-year nursing program. She received funding for the first year but was cut off in the second year because of cuts in the Consolidated Revenue Fund. It is simply unbelievable when the government says it is eliminating poverty. It is a myth and pure fabrication.

One thing this government can do to eliminate poverty and child poverty in this country is to implement a universal child care program. It is certainly very difficult for single parents and even the working poor parents when they do not have access to universal child care.

I know all members in this House can cite examples of people who have been unable to take jobs or have been denied training because they were unable to either afford it or find child care because the institutions were overcrowded. This is the government that promised a universal child care program. Now it is telling us this proposal is going to be a replacement for child care.

• (1300)

The witnesses who appeared before the committee with respect to this legislation were not fooled. Members on this side of the House obviously are not fooled and Canadians are not fooled. This government has ignored the needs of the poor in this country. It is not following its own commitment to eliminate child poverty in this country. It is telling the poor of this country it is going to help them and then it does nothing at all.

I find that very, very tragic and disappointing.

What ever happened to those sacred trusts the Prime Minister promised he was going to maintain? Where did they go? What happened to them? They are being destroyed one by one by the very Prime Minister who said he was going to protect them.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak once again in opposition to this bill. I want to support the amendment put forward by the member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing.

When I talked about this bill last May or June one of the things I did not like about it was the $500 maximum supplement for people in the work force at the lower end of the income spectrum. I thought it was terribly misleading. For someone making only $14,000 or $15,000 a year with one or two children, $500 averaged out over an entire year works out to under $10 a week. That is not a lot of money. That was the part of the legislation I found misleading at the time.

When I went home to my riding over the summer I could not believe the number of women who came to my constituency office and thought I had not spoken out as aggressively as I should have on this bill, and I spoke about four or five times. So I had to go back to the drawing board. I had to go back to my research, my work and my colleagues to get a better grasp of what was really happening here. So often this happens in this place. These bills are a couple of hundred pages long and filled with complicated legal text. Quite frankly, you vote for something and the next thing you know you do not even know what you voted for. We do not ask enough of the right questions on some of these bills.

One of the things that was brought to my attention by some constituents who were obviously very familiar with the legislation was the fact this was really going to affect women who were in abusive relationships. Right now, the baby bonus cheque is the only source of income for many women. It comes to them directly. It is a feeling of comfort. It is a feeling of security and it is a feeling of ever so modest independence, but it is something that is theirs. It is a national program, it is a national institution and it is something that women in this country have counted on for many years. The fact that we are scrapping the baby bonus system does not appeal to them.

When we get beyond that we also see that really even though this bill is represented as something that is supposedly helping low income families, we see that it is really a shifting of the figures. It is like doing gymnastics with figures. It is saying it is doing that but when you tear away the tinsel that covers up this bill, you get right into the substance and see that it is not really doing that.

A lot of women got into analysing this bill because of previous actions by this government. Actions of social assistance in things related to housing and other regressive measures or cutbacks which have been happening vis-à-vis families in this country have regenerated that distrust, that we are going to have to really go through any piece of legislation that this government puts forward.

That is precisely what has happened on this particular piece of legislation. The government's idea of trying to help low-income and disadvantaged families in our country is a good idea and it is a noble idea. When we say we are going to do those things, we really have to do them in substance as well. In this particular case, this bill does not pass that test.

I will continue to speak out against this bill. One of the members on the government side said earlier today that Canadians are going to wonder why the opposition is against helping low-income families in our country. They are going to look at us and ask why Liberals are against helping low-income families. Canadians will not believe that accusation put forward by the government side. If we are here and we are saying that this bill is not fair, it is complex, it is inefficient, we have to have the substantive reasons for backing that up.

We are not alone on this. The Caledon Social Policy Institute has spoken out against this bill in legislative committee. Joan Smallwood, the minister of social services for British Columbia has spoken out against this bill. Citizens for Public Justice in my own city, the Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto, the Child Poverty Action Group and Trevor Williams from Family Services Canada have all spoken out against the flaws in this bill.

On an important piece of legislation like this when we are talking about families and children, we should not let it go through when it is not living up to what Canadians think it is going to do.

I support the member's motion that we delete the bill completely and that we go back to the drawing board.

• (1310)

Hon. Roger Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Madam Speaker, bill C-80 deserves to be run out of here altogether. It is almost an insult to the poor of this country that we are even debating it. At a time when the poor are facing very rough times, we are here seriously contemplating a bill that does nothing whatsoever to deal with their situation. I do not know what is wrong with a government that would even draft a bill like this.

Philosophically, we can understand that it will have a certain philosophical bent, a certain ideological twist that will want it to do this instead of that. I do not agree with the philosophy in this bill. I have told the government that before and I will keep telling it. That is one issue and we will come back to the issue of the basic ideology, the basic mind set that allows the government to come to this point. Surely part of that mind set can never be to sock it to the poor even more. What kind of a warped mind would have that as part of its philosophy to deliberately, overtly sock it to people who are completely defenceless? That is what this bill does.

It does many more things, most of them very negative and disgusting, to the poverty stricken of this country, many of whom live in my riding of Burin—St. George's, many of whom live in my province of Newfoundland, many of whom live all across this country. Poverty is not a respecter of regions, provinces or communities. We have very poor people in literally every constituency represented in the House here today. I find it curious and I find it mind-boggling that many of the people who sit here representing the poor of this country are so willing to ride roughshod over the poor in ramming this bill through the House.

Let there be no misunderstanding. This bill, this piece of legislation, is a bad bit of business. I said a moment ago that there is no new benefit here for people who are trying to get out of the poverty cycle. There is nothing for them. In addition, this bill is the final nail in the coffin of universality. Before we get too far along in this debate, remember what the Prime Minister was saying about universality not so very long ago. On August 18, 1984 he was fighting an election and was looking for some votes at the time from the poor and the rich. In an effort to reach out to the less well off, here is what the Prime Minister said at that time: "Universal social programs are a sacred trust not to be tampered with".

That quote is from eight years ago. Anybody with an IQ of 18 or more will know that in the eight years since on just about everything that Prime Minister has said he has contradicted himself a few weeks later. It is no accident, that he is here today with a piece of legislation that rides roughshod over his very own commitment of eight years ago. That is no surprise to us. The fact that it is no surprise does not make it any less cowardly or any less disgusting. That quote from 1984 goes back to a time when the Prime Minister was perceived as a man who could be taken at his word. People were still at the point at which they believed what he was saying because they had not tested him. It was before the September election of that year. He was not the Prime Minister then. He was the leader of the party, aspiring to be Prime Minister.

People all over this country engaged in effect in what was an electoral sweep to put this man in office because he had said such brilliant stuff. He said universal social programs were a sacred trust not to be tampered with.

Within the fairly narrow purview of this bill I give many other examples. In the shipbuilding area which affects my riding he had a similar graphic quote about how he was going to have a shipbuilding policy or how he was going to protect our fish from foreign overfishing, et cetera.

These are all examples of a man and a team of people who stuck with him and have to share the shame, because he does not take the blame alone, who were prepared to say anything to get elected. He is not the first to have done that. Many people have been known to say all kinds of weird and wonderful things to get elected.

He has gone further. Having said those things, he has shown no concern and no interest in making himself appear to be consistent with the electorate, and that is his crime. He will not now govern on the basis of the principles on which he was elected. Certainly one of the most sacred principles, as he said at that time, is the universality of social programs.

I am not the first person in this Chamber to make the argument about universality. It is an old argument but do not let the Tories think for one minute we are going to stop making it for that reason. It is not only an old argument. It is still a very sound argument.

It is a principle that has served this country very well, particularly in protecting the poor of whom I spoke earlier, and even the not so poor, because this bill if we look at the fine print is also an attack on the middle class. The only people who will benefit at all from this particular legislation in terms of dollars in their pockets are the very well to do, people who have fairly adequate incomes.

Another aspect of this whole discussion which we need to talk about is what happened to the Prime Minister's fond words about a national child care strategy. There was no talk of that here. Another promise has gone out the window; another need, a real need out there for a proper approach to child care across this country. This umbrella package that it is paraded to be does not mention the issue. It ignores another need of people across this country.

Much has been made in the debate about how much the government is going to be pumping into this new scheme. It throws around figures in the order of $2.1 billion. There is going to be a $2 billion increase over the next five years because of this new legislation it is proposing here today.

Why does the government not tell the whole story instead of just one-half of it, the half that is convenient for it, the half it hopes will make it look good in the eyes of the electorate coming up for the election, $2.1 billion more in the next five years?

Let me give an example. If I have an employee and I am paying him $10,000 and then reduce it to $5,000 and then offer him a $3,000 increase, I look awfully magnanimous to give him the increase, bearing in mind that I took it away from him in the first place. That is what this government has done. The $2.1 billion increase it is talking about has to be weighed against the fact that it took out of this system, this child benefit or this family allowance as it was called, $3.5 billion over the past five years, almost twice as much as it is now proposing to put back in. Bully for the government.

• (1320)

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on Bill C-80 today. In my opinion it is a bill that is going to finally destroy what started out as the baby bonus, which is now known as the family allowance.

My understanding of family allowance or baby bonus, as it was known when it started, was that it was a recognition by the government of those people who decided to have children. It was an assistance and a recognition that it cost money to raise children. The government wanted to take part in that process, wanted to indicate to Canadians that it had family values, that it valued children.

How ironic today that we are now trying to save and preserve our family allowance. It is not any easier today to raise children than it was 20, 30, or 40 years ago. Parents face the same problems that existed then.

Today we received from the Minister of Supply and Services a commemorative coin. I congratulate the minister and his department for striking this coin and for offering it to us as a memento. Part of the inscription states: "Children as our future and as our source of inspiration". It recognizes that children play a very important part in our society. They are our future.

What bothers me is that if we are not going to help them to get a proper education, if we are not going to help them to be properly fed, properly nourished and properly housed, what kind of a message are we sending to them? Are we really recognizing them as part of our society and part of a society that we want to help prosper and grow in this country?

In my riding, as a result of lay-offs and as a result of mine closures, hundreds and hundreds of people have been put out of work. There are hundreds and hundreds of people whose unemployment insurance has run out. For a lot of them the only means of support that they had, along with the welfare system, was the family allowance that they got once a month. It helped to instil a little pride in them so that they could be part of the community, that they might be able to go out with their children and buy them a new pair of shoes. For the most part, that is what the family allowance is all about. It is to assist those families in raising those children.

The charts clearly show that for those families that have no income, no earned income as it is termed, the benefit to them is zero. Yet at the other end of the scale, those people who are earning $120,000 per year will benefit by about $2,000 as a result of loopholes that this government has allowed them. This is absolutely absurd and ridiculous.

There is something wrong with the system. We are not going forward; we are going backward. What this government should be doing is looking at the realities and really concentrating on the poor people in this country.

The way to do that is not by destroying our family allowance system, which is there to help and assist those families with the most need. We look at the figures, we look at the formula, and we are told by this government that this is going to be a very simple formula.

It is going to be a formula designed and proposed by the Minister of Finance, and not even supported by the Minister of National Health and Welfare because he did not even appear before the committee.

I have never yet seen a proposal by the ministry of finance or by this government that was simple. To prove that, in this case they have already said that the general public will not make the calculation. The ministry will make the calculation.

The finance department and the ministry of revenue will make the calculation. Is that simple? If it is that simple why not let the people figure it out themselves? I will tell you why. It is because then the people who do the figuring will see very clearly that they are getting shafted.

This bill must be defeated for the benefit of those people who need it most, those people who earn less than $120,000 a year, who earn less than $70,000 a year. If this bill really did put some extra money into the hands of those who really need it I would support it. It does not do that in my opinion. The calculation is shady and the presentations are shady. I do not trust this government and I do not trust this bill.

Thank you for the opportunity to speak on this bill. I certainly hope that members will come to their senses and see to the defeat of this bill.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Bill C-80 today with very mixed feelings indeed.

I was just starting high school when the Hon. Paul Martin, who was then Minister of National Health and Welfare for Canada, introduced and Parliament passed his bill introducing family allowances. I can remember in those days what a great thing that was for mothers and fathers across this country.

My mother was elated to think that she was going to receive something like $8 a month, which was a lot of money in those days, and we certainly used it throughout the school years. It was put to very good use indeed.

Today there is an article in The Ottawa Citizen that is very apropos to this debate. It is headlined: "Bill expected to pass this week ends family allowance system". As I read this article over this morning I could not help but think how ironic this situation is.

If the government insists on pushing Bill C-80 through the House this week it will end for this time the system of family allowances that was brought into this House by the Hon. Paul Martin, Minister of National Health and Welfare, back in 1945. Is it not sad to think that this great social legislation which meant so much to all Canadians is going to die on the legislative books of Canada along with its great author, the Hon. Paul Martin.

We cannot help but have this debate today without paying a tribute to him and to those great governments of King and St. Laurent and on to the days of Mr. Trudeau and Lester B. Pearson.

• (1330)

Mr. Martin served in all those governments and was looked upon, to a large degree, as the social conscience of Parliament, and particularly of the Liberal Party, in those days.

It is sad to see the passing of it, but I want to read this article from The Ottawa Citizen by Mark Kennedy, which I think is an excellent one. It reads as follows:

> "Universal social programs are a sacred trust, not to be tampered with"—

This is attributed of course to none other than the current Prime Minister, on August 18, 1984.

> This solemn pledge was made repeatedly during a summertime election campaign by a politician who was not yet prime minister.
> It's a pledge that will come back to haunt Brian Mulroney.

We all remember very well that famous election campaign of the summer of 1984 and the great promises that were made across this country not only about social packages but about looking after the economy, and managing the finances of the nation in such fantastic ways as they outlined. It has been all downhill after the election of the government of today.

The writer goes on to say:

> That's because MPs begin final debate today on a bill tabled by Mulroney's Tory government. Bill C-80 would kill one of Canada's oldest universal social programs—Family Allowance—and make official what has been apparent for at least three years: universality is no longer a sacred trust.

But we will remember. The writer continues:

> The government is billing it as a way to help children in low-income families. But families living on welfare would not get a penny more under the new legislation, and the so-called "working poor" would only get an extra $42 a month.

Now those are the facts of life about this bill. I compliment the writer on that article.

However, even in the attempt to rewrite the Constitution of Canada there are some things under the social and economic union package in the new Constitution which we must question at this time and determine whether they are really going to happen. Section 4 says that the policy objectives set out in the provision on the social union should include but not be limited to a series of objectives. One of these is "providing adequate social services and benefits to ensure that all individuals resident in Canada have reasonable access to housing, food and other basic necessities".

This very bill today deals with that sort of thing, and the government is doing away with family allowances. It then talks about its child tax credits. You do not get any money back if you do not owe the income tax department. That is a very important factor about the tax system. You have to owe money before you get the deduction on the child tax system. If you do not owe anything you get nothing back.

Another part of the new constitutional proposal under the social and economic union packages is "providing high quality primary and secondary education to all individuals resident in Canada and ensuring reasonable access to post-secondary education".

This year in my own province of Ontario alone over 95,000 students applied to go to university and only 54,000 of them were accepted because there were no facilities to handle any more. At a time when there is a great urge to go on to university the facilities are not there for our young people.

Family members today are being hurt by this new tax measure being brought in by the government which will do away with family allowances for all time as far as they are concerned. It also affects the transfer payments from the federal government to the provinces which have been reduced considerably and consistently by this government over the last few years. Therefore it affects what the provincial governments can do for their people under social programs under their jurisdiction. It affects what the provincial governments can do in the field of post-secondary education and brings about the very situation of those statistics which I mentioned a moment ago.

Surely it is time in this Parliament for a renewed social conscience and a realization of what is happening out there to families today.

There is another one here that I want to mention. It is under section 5 of the same part on Canada's social and economic union: "Parliament and the Government of Canada are committed to making equalization payments so that provincial governments have sufficient revenues to provide reasonably comparable levels of public services at reasonably comparable levels of taxation".

If you are going to provide comparable levels of public services, I suppose that one can be achieved. If you are going to cut back on the funds and provide fewer services, then you are cutting back and providing everybody with fewer services. That is not a good policy. The next issue is that there is no way you can meet the other commitments of comparable levels of taxation because if provinces are going to be cut short on finances by transfer payments from the federal government, they are going to have to make up the differences or the services are not going to be there.

There has been some tremendous legislation that has gone through this Parliament over the years of Canadian history, particularly in the last 50 years, to assist families on low incomes and middle incomes in this country. The bill that is before us today is a backward step and some members say it has to be defeated. Unfortunately, the reality of it is that this government is going to force this bill through in spite of all the complaints it has had about it, in spite of all the representations it has had, in spite of the fact that it cannot find witnesses to come in to even defend the bill before the parliamentary committee. It is going to push it through regardless. That is the history of this government: full speed ahead and damn the torpedoes. That is the way it is going to be with Bill C-80.

I just want to end by saying that I think it is a sad day with the passing of the Hon. Paul Martin, the author of the family allowance system in this country, going back to 1945. It is an even sadder day to think that this government is going to destroy the family allowance system of which he was the author. It is attempting to do it today on the very day that he has passed away.

I want to pay a great tribute to that man who was such a great social conscience to Canada and to extend our appreciation to him for his long public service in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take part in this debate because since it began at 11 o'clock this morning, I have heard all sorts of things and many accusations about our intentions that I wish to correct.

To repeat what the previous speaker said about the Hon. Paul Martin who set up this system, I must say that I also admire the Hon. Paul Martin for what he did, but I am sure that he was open-minded enough to believe that if he had to set up the same system today, it might be somewhat different from the one established in the 1940s. That is the important thing.

• (1340)

What is important in a bill is to keep up with the times. I wonder what twisted thinking would lead one to say in this House that the only way to eliminate poverty is to pay universal allowances. One of my colleagues from the NDP said that just now.

We have to live in 1992: To eliminate poverty where I live—I am not poor, but I do not boast of being rich either—I do not need the waste of energy and time involved in sending me money which I will have to pay back to the government at the end of the year when I file my income tax return.

What does this bill do? It is quite simple. We are removing three measures, one of which was universal, and replacing them with a single one, at the same time adding $2.1 billion to help those in need.

One of my colleagues from the Liberal Party just said that it was a most unpopular measure and electioneering. The party in power is not so stupid as to use an unpopular measure to win votes. You must be logical. It is a popular measure because we are seeking the same objectives. We want to transfer wealth to those in the greatest need and add $2.1 billion to the pot. That is important.

We are told that it has to do with the fact that women are automatically the victims. The only women who will no longer receive a cheque are those whose family income is over $40,000. Try to tell me that they need such an allowance. Family allowances will not solve family communication problems where the woman does not work and the man makes $70,000 a year and does not give a damn cent to his wife and children. The bill will not solve that problem. It will continue just as it is now and will even be increased.

The GST was just attacked. One would think that this House is in a world apart with no idea of what is going on outside. When we passed the GST—and you will recall, Mr. Speaker, how it was attacked—they said that there would be a frightful storm of protest over it. The first people to contact the office were in fact those with low income, because they wanted to know when they would get their cheque.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the 80 per cent of women who now receive family allowances with tax credits only at the end of the year and another cheque three or four times a year will be very glad to get a cheque every month, in advance. Something else we know about poverty is that those poor people who had to get an advance on the family allowance around the middle of the month because they were in difficulty will no longer have to do so.

I disagree with my colleague that it is an unpopular measure and electioneering. Do not doubt that those who need their cheques support this measure.

But we are said to be attacking the Prime Minister's famous "sacred trust", universal pensions. We have to keep up with the times. When the old age pensions and family allowances were established, not many people had money. Before the advent of computer systems and income tax returns, we had no information on people. I remember the discussion when the time came to pay old age pensions. People had to make a sworn statement that they had no more than a certain income, which was absolutely humiliating. We went back and agreed that pensions would be paid to everybody. Today, if anyone wants to find out how much money I have in my bank account, he can. I thought it was confidential, but anyone can find out.

One of my friends who works at the credit union in Valleyfield told me: "Mr. Hudon, we can find out what your credit margin is and how much money you have". I said: "Really?" She said: "You want me to find out?" I said: "Sure".

Two hours later she called back and said: "Mr. Hudon, your credit is good,"—so far so good—"but you owe $572 on your Mastercard account which is due in two weeks time"—or something like that—"and you will owe a certain amount on your Visa account which is due in three weeks".

Today all this is possible, thanks to modern technology. But at the time the program was introduced, this information was not available, so we had to trust people and either oblige them to make a signed statement or else make the program universal. We opted for universality, but today, we do not need that any more.

Why should I get money for my children if I earn $70,000, $80,000 or $90,000 annually? What for? To get a cheque from the Canadian government every month? I do not think it makes sense. We should update our management methods so we can help the people who really need it.

They say there are complaints. Complaints from whom? Some people in my riding complained, but most of them are people who are disturbed by any kind of change. Of course, the older we get, the more insecure we feel about change.

I am sure, that like the GST, this new measure will be welcomed enthusiastically by those who will benefit. It may not happen today, because a government in power does not get a lot of applause. But a month after this program is implemented, Canadians in need will appreciate the fact that they are getting a single cheque, based on income declared the previous year. It is a measure that makes sense.

We do it for old age security pensions, for the guaranteed income supplement, and it works. People were worried at first. They said: «More changes. What is going to happen?» Take my constituents, for instance.

We members said: "This will be a popular measure. The Government of Canada will be able to deposit old age pension cheques directly in the bank accounts of the elderly". We thought it would be a very popular decision. Well, it took some doing to explain. We told them: "Do not worry, the money will get through to your bank, postal strike or not".

I thought it would be much easier to sell. And in fact, I think most people still do not take advantage of this service. Do you know why? Because they want to receive their cheque personally. I told them: "Why not have it deposited directly at the Caisse or the National Bank?" Their answer was: "I want to see my cheque with my own eyes". What can you say?

People must realize that today, with modern technology, the government can administer its social programs far better and is no longer obliged to make them so universal. Programs will be managed more efficiently, so that we will save on administration costs. The first to benefit will be women and children in need.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, in starting my remarks I would like to respond to some of the comments that the previous speaker from the Conservative caucus made.

He made a reference to old people who are afraid of some of the changes that the government is bringing about. He also implied in his speech that we have to live in modern times and therefore we should be using modern technology.

The government should realize that it is not just senior citizens who are against this change or other changes that the government has brought in. It is not the people who are against technology who are against this legislation. In 1985, one year after the Prime Minister promised universal programs would be a sacred trust, this government started a systematic attack against old age pensions and the family allowance. Every year and in every budget we have seen some change which has destroyed the universal nature of programs in this country. It is not technology that people fear. It is not their age that turns them against some of the legislation the government brings forward. It is the government's own track record.

• (1350)

People in this country are afraid of this government. They are afraid they are going to lose their old age pensions. They are afraid the family allowance system will disappear. These are not false fears. They are based on what the government has been doing over the years. We know the government has partially deindexed pensions. We know the long-term effect of that is to make it less and less possible for those in need to rely on the old age pension. As inflation goes on year after year the relative value of the old age pension will decrease. That is a fact.

A member of the government may get up and say they are false fears or we must use new technology, but he is ignoring the real fact that this government has been attacking universal programs on a regular basis. He infers those of us in this House who oppose government legislation are living in an ivory tower. His own example was the GST. There are people right across this nation who know the GST has been bad for the economy. It has been bad for tourism. It has been bad for small business. It has helped to destroy the faith Canadians used to have in our economy. It does not take polls, but we know the polls tell us people are afraid for their economic future in this land.

This government has been in power for over eight years. It has been the captain of our ship. It has been in charge of the economy, but more Canadians now fear for their jobs than in 1984. More Canadians now are concerned about our social programs. More Canadians now do not believe their children will have the same standard of living they do at the present time. This government, which is now taking us into a referendum on the Constitution, has destroyed the faith Canadians have in our economy. It has destroyed our faith in the government assisting us in terms of old age pensions in the future. It continues to destroy that faith.

An hon. member: Right.

Mr. Murphy: That is one of the reasons selling the referendum will be very difficult for those of us willing to undertake that task. There are a lot of negative feelings in this land that exist as a result of past government actions. I refer to that because I am afraid Bill C–80, which is going to destroy family allowances in this country, is only going to further create a difficult situation for those of us who would support the referendum.

I would suggest to the government this bill should not be going forward at this time. As a measure of good faith, it should not be rushing this bill through Parliament. We have been told it is going to try to get this bill through all stages before we adjourn. What is the rush? The public should have the chance to be really informed about the nature of this bill. We had quick hearings at the clause–by–clause stage. There was a quick debate in the House earlier and now we have been told this bill is going to be guillotined in the final stages. That is not acceptable because the one thing this government needs is the trust of the people of this land. It has not earned that. It does not have that at the present time.

This legislation is not going to give a lot more money to the working poor. It is not going to give any more money to those on welfare, but it is going to take away the universal approach to family allowance. That does not create trust. That does not give Canadians a sense that this government is going to play fair in the future.

The government talks about technology and says it is the reason it makes these changes. That does not make any sense to ordinary Canadians. It tells people the family allowance program is dated and no longer applies because it was brought forward in 1945 but that does not make sense to people.

Canadians know as long as the family allowance is universal, the government is saying it is the responsibility of our nation to help with the finances of bringing up our children. They also know when the family allowance program is no longer universal there will be less and less political support for the family allowance as fewer Canadians receive it.

They know in the long run the family allowance, just like the old age pension, is being threatened by this government. Do not talk about technology. Look at your own government's record. Look at the fears you have created out there. The actual record of the government is creating those fears, not the opposition.

The whole economic program of this government is creating fears. With regard to the free trade agreement, we were promised we would have adjustment programs which never appeared. We were promised more money for those in need which has never appeared. We were promised the GST would not hurt the economy and it did. We know the free trade agreement cost us jobs in this country which the government still denies.

We know jobs are leaving Saskatoon to go to Mexico at this very time because it can get away with cheap labour and environmental standards do not exist. That is the proof Canadians have. Those jobs are disappearing. They are leaving this country and going down to the states. There is no way this government is going to sell this program or free trade until it starts being honest with Canadians.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I have been looking forward to commenting on this legislation for some time. We have listened to some very encouraging commentary earlier today.

One almost gets the impression there is a certain amount of legislated manipulation going on here today. The government wants to slip legislation through quickly while attention is being focused on the referendum campaign.

Here is a program that will dismantle one of the programs that has elevated Canada to the top status in the world in terms of providing for its people. We are all proud of the fact the United Nations has named Canada up there with some of the western European countries for having some of the most caring and thoughtful social programs anywhere on the planet.

One of those programs is family allowance. It says if you are a citizen of this great country raising children, we place value on those children. We want to help raise those children so they can play their rightful role in society.

All of a sudden this is going to change. The government members are now saying with Bill C-80, if you are poor enough and can convince us your family income is low enough, we will give you some charity. It is back to the old charity routine. Is this the kind of country Canada is becoming? Is this the kind of Canada that is now turning its back on the children of this great nation?

What kind of manipulation is going on? I do not expect there is a single Canadian who woke up this morning and read his or her newspaper who was not shocked at what he or she found.

• (1400)

My friends across the way smile because they know that there is a propaganda machine now cranking out misinformation and manipulating statistics to influence Canadians on buying the North America Mexico-Canada-U.S. free trade agreement. Secret meetings are taking place. Phone calls are being taped. Lists are being kept. The East German secret police threw out their secret lists. The KGB threw out the lists in the old Soviet Union. But now this government is instituting computer lists of all those opposed to NAFTA.

That is what we found out this morning. There is a secret organization at work scheming across the country to manipulate information. They even said in the transcripts: "We are taking Statistics Canada information and manipulating it for our political purpose to brainwash in the most sophisticated propaganda campaign this country has ever seen in order to fool people into supporting NAFTA".

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but it is my obligation to say that it being two o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to Statements by Members, pursuant to Standing Order 31.

1992 TRIATHLON WORLD CHAMPIONSHIPS

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, after planning for two years, the town of Huntsville in my riding of Parry Sound—Muskoka hosted the 1992 triathlon world championships this past weekend. Over 1,700 athletes from some 50 countries competed, cheered on by more than 5,000 spectators.

Canada did very well. A Canadian men's élite team placed first, the women's élite team placed second and the junior women's team placed third. We should all be proud of the outstanding performances given by our athletes.

This event was an overwhelming success, thanks to the dedication of 1,500 volunteers. The enthusiasm for the world triathlon was clear last Thursday evening when an estimated 6,000 spectators lined the streets of Huntsville for the parade of athletes.

The organizing committee, the many volunteers who helped ensure a smooth-running event, the spectators who came out to support our athletes and the athletes themselves who gave their best for Canada are to be congratulated for making a world-class event an overwhelming success.

The federal government made a generous grant to this event.

CONCORDIA UNIVERSITY

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday a memorial service was held at Concordia University for three professors who were senselessly shot to death on August 24. They were Matthew Douglas, Michael Hogben and Jaan Saber. A fourth professor, Dr. Phoivos Ziogas, is recovering in hospital.

I am sure that all members of the House would want to join me in expressing to the families, friends and colleagues of the deceased our deepest condolences and to Dr. Ziogas, our wishes for a full and speedy recovery.

The university has been overcome by sentiments of grief and horror, confusion, anger and deep concern for the future. Yet at the same time, there has emerged the resolve to protect, improve and develop the university to which these professors had committed so many of their efforts and so much of their lives.

As the rector of Concordia University, Dr. Patrick Kenniff, put it, if a collective effort by all in the university were to produce such a result, there could be no better tribute to these men and the ideals they stood for.

I would add that the university is circulating a petition which calls on Parliament to remove any opportunity for people to acquire hand-guns and to use them against their fellow human beings.

TRADE

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, the recent meeting of maritime cabinets in Halifax concluded several agreements eliminating or reducing trade barriers between these provinces.

Agreements were completed in the areas of transportation, community colleges and government procurement. As well, it was determined to move forward in areas of exports and tourism as well as regional agricultural strategy, tax simplification, regional energy projects and employment mobility.

As the federal government observer at these meetings, it was clear to me that the federal government can play a big part in helping to reduce barriers to trade and encourage economic unity in the Atlantic area. Many federal programs are not transferable from province to province and many programs have different criteria in each province.

All federal programs available in the maritimes should come under scrutiny to identify differences that could be eliminated in order to provide uniform rules for the region.

The provinces are going through this process now and the federal government must play its part as well.

IX SUMMER PARALYMPIC GAMES

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, the closing ceremonies of the IX Summer Paralympic Games take place today in Barcelona, Spain.

Over 3,500 athletes and officials from 94 countries were represented at these games which are a remarkable tribute to the power of human spirit in overcoming adversity.

The Paralympic Games, while given only limited media attention, are indeed very entertaining and exciting. Furthermore, the dedication and performances of our athletes provide strong encouragement for the one out of seven Canadians who have some form of disability.

Canada's contingent at the games included a total of 218 athletes and staff. In the over-all standings, Canada finished seventh with 75 medals, 25 of them gold.

I want to congratulate our athletes on their performances in Barcelona. I also want to recognize the work done by the disabled sport associations throughout Canada and especially commend the efforts made by the Canadian Federation of Sport Organizations for the Disabled in co-ordinating Canada's participation at these games.

INTERPROVINCIAL TRADE

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, if Canada is to prosper, provincial economies expand and our standard of living continue to grow, barriers to growth and opportunity must be eliminated.

A step in this direction was taken last week when the maritime premiers met in Halifax. Co-operation agreements were reached that will not only improve service, but could provide some future tax relief as well.

The three governments agreed to create a single harness racing commission, dismantle barriers to government contracts, harmonize business taxes and jointly promote exports and tourism. Could it be that the federal and provincial governments are finally beginning to sing from the same hymn-book?

THE DISABLED

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, aboriginal people with disabilities living on reserves face challenges that few of us can comprehend.

This summer, I visited a number of reserves in northwest Saskatchewan and talked with people who have eye or ear impairments as well as people with physical disabilities who are confined to wheelchairs.

One of those people was Velma Iron of Canoe Lake, Saskatchewan, a strong and articulate spokesperson who wants the off-reserve population to understand the challenges that she faces every day.

Mrs. Iron believes there must be greater attention paid to concerns in four priority areas: health care, education, housing and transportation.

I agree with Mrs. Iron. There must be greater attention paid to the needs of the physically challenged on reserves where access is limited and mobility is restricted.

I urge the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Minister of National Health and Welfare to accept the challenge put by Mrs. Iron and others to become more personally involved, and to take immediate steps to adequately address the concerns that they have raised.

CANADIAN NATIONAL

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to draw attention to a matter of great concern not only to railway workers in my riding, but to all Canadians living near CN rail lines.
