Very disturbing practices are taking place at CN affecting the safety of rail cars. Carmen regularly inspect rail cars and as needed, put bad order cards on those that have maintenance problems. It has been brought to my attention that it is a common practice of management to rip bad order cards off these rail cars so that they are not repaired and so that unsafe cars continue to be used on Canada's railways, risking the safety of Canadians living near the lines.

In addition to tearing cards off these defective rail cars, management has told workers not to enter the bad orders into the computer system, thus ensuring that no record exists of the problem or of the whereabouts of defective cars.

These unsafe practices by management increase the risk of dangerous goods spills, thus endangering the safety not only of rail workers, but of those Canadians who live near CN rail lines.

It is time the government ensured that the safety of Canadians is not threatened by unsafe practices by CN management.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, on October 26, all Canadians will be asked to pronounce themselves on the constitutional agreement reached in Charlottetown.

This exercise in my view, and in the view of the Liberal Party, will effectively give the Constitution back to the Canadian people.

[Translation]

The August 28 constitutional accord is not perfect, but it reflects a broad consensus among Canada's provincial and regional representatives. This accord is the best possible under the present circumstances.

[English]

I want to take this opportunity to let my constituents in Carleton—Gloucester know that I will assist them with any concerns that they may have with this package.

From now until October 26, I urge all Canadians to set aside their regional interests and to think of our nation's higher interests.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, as of January 1, 1993, Canada Post may again raise its basic letter rate by one cent. The price of a stamp will thus rise to 43 cents, but to mail a letter in Canada, it will in fact cost 46 cents, GST included.

The Canada Post increases are a nightmare for the people of remote areas in Abitibi. These constant increases are unfair, because they are not matched by improved services in our regions.

If the Canada Post rate increases serve neither to maintain nor to improve service in a region like ours, I ask the corporation to postpone its decision to raise the cost of postage in Abitibi and in Canada.

125TH BIRTHDAY

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, in celebration of Canada's 125th birthday, the Army, Navy and Air Force Veterans, Lambton Unit 212 in the riding of York South—Weston, unanimously endorsed the following message which they asked be presented to Parliament. "Happy birthday, Canada, on achieving 125 years of great nationhood on July 1. We, the members of Lambton Unit 212, army, navy and air force veterans in Canada, love you with a passion and do solemnly swear and rededicate ourselves to your service and preservation. God bless Canada. God save the Queen."

I would like to thank the members of Lambton Unit 212 for their patriotic message. This is simply another indication of the affection which the veterans who fought for a free and united Canada have for our country, and how through their selfless contributions they continue to make Canada the finest country in the world.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, three years ago the House of Commons consumers affairs committee recommended that the federal government impose a floating cap on credit card rates. The idea was to limit the rate on bank cards to the prime plus 8 per cent. If that floating cap was in effect today the banks would be charging their customers just over 14 per cent on outstanding balances. But today the banks are charging almost 17 per cent, while department stores and others levy an incredible 28 per cent on those unpaid balances. Obviously this is costing Canadian consumers millions of dollars in extra interest. While it may be good for bank profits, it is not good for consumer confidence, consumer spending or the recovery of this fragile economy.

These interest rates cannot be justified except in the name of corporate greed. I call first on the banks to do the honourable thing, drop credit card rates to acceptable levels. If the banks fail to do that, I ask this government one more time to rein the lenders in and impose a floating cap on credit cards. Canadian consumers are being hosed, fleeced and gouged. They now need the protection of their government and they need it immediately.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to draw the attention of this House to the brave actions of Deborah Scott of Barrie, a mother whose daughter was the victim of a brutal and violent beating and rape this summer by a group of teenagers. She is putting her personal tragedy aside to work for the protection of other Canadians.

Mrs. Scott is collecting signatures on a petition to have the Young Offenders Act changed to reflect the difference between violent and non-violent offenders. Society has the right to be protected against violent offenders of any age, and this begins with amending the laws that keep the names of young violent offenders secret.

My constituents have often stressed the need and their right to have the names of violent offenders released. Mrs. Scott's daughter's attackers have been released into the community on bail and remain unidentified to the public. In the eyes of Mrs. Scott and many of my constituents, this is truly and simply not acceptable. Barrie is not the only community whose safety has been jeopardized in this way.

It is time that the act be changed to protect the victims and to stop making excuses for the offenders.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, Canada is in the midst of preparing for a referendum vote on October 26, a vote that will respond yes or no to the question: Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28.

The agreement is not perfect, however. I recognize that the first ministers have developed an agreement that contains considerable promise in terms of maintaining Canada as a single great nation. We on this side of the House have always stressed that constitutional reform must meet certain criteria: It must not make Canada more difficult to govern; it must facilitate adaptation to economic realities; it must not paralyse the role of the national government; and, it must adequately and generously reflect our fundamental values.

We are satisfied that these principles have been reflected in the accord. A Nepean constituent committee has been formed which is charged with the responsibility of ensuring that the voters are familiar with all aspects of the consensus document. Hopefully, we in Nepean will respond with a resounding yes to the question and to Canada.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, the entire developed world is in a very serious recession. Some call it a depression. This is caused by massive technological and psychological change.

The Government of Canada ought to be congratulated for its ability to handle change as it has handled change with tax reform, trade agreements, recognition of the need for industrial and commercial training and retraining, and programs designed to improve research and development.

We cannot bury our heads in the sand. We must recognize the world is changing, markets are changing, economies are changing and we must change with them. While change causes hardship and unemployment, we must recognize change and learn to cope with it. Our government is doing better in this regard than other governments throughout the world.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, this morning Canadians were shocked and horrified to learn that rather than trying to sell the Mexican–U.S.–Canada trade deal on its merits, the federal government plans to resort to a smear campaign reminiscent of Nixon's dirty tricks campaign.

Those who oppose the deal, in an effort to discredit them, will be called little people, left–wingers, small potatoes, crypto–communists, empty heads, loonies and cons. Anyone who opposes NAFTA will be targeted as the enemy. Big brother will keep computer files on those opposing NAFTA and Statistics Canada information will be altered in Orwellian style to suit the government's propaganda campaign.

How far will this government go in its free trade campaign based on manipulation and misinformation? This government has to learn that opposition is okay in a democratic society and must not only be tolerated, but encouraged.

If the government cannot sell NAFTA on its merits, it should forget it, listen to the people of Canada and scrap it.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to comment on the request of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development for the establishment of an environmental assessment review panel for a proposed incinerator in my riding of Fraser Valley East. This decision indicates his support for the principle that government rules and regulations must apply to all projects whether large or small.

Earlier this year indian affairs officials approved without public notice a lease between the Sumas Indian Band and Bennett Remediation Services to construct a special waste incinerator on band land in my riding. Adjacent municipalities have by–laws banning incinerators within their boundaries.

This was unacceptable and I made my objections known quite clearly to the minister in late July. Approvals for projects such as this should not be done in a covert manner without considering local laws and the concerns of the public in the area.

On September 1, I publicly requested that the minister establish an environmental assessment review panel under the government's EARP guidelines. On September 11, the minister listened to the concerns that I and the people in Fraser Valley East raised and formally requested a full review. Again, I applaud the minister for his decision.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TRADE

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

The minister is certainly aware of this transcript of an August 26 conference call among 12 senior ministers of the government, including the minister's own deputy chief of staff.

These advisers are co-ordinating a multimillion smear campaign to discredit people who oppose this government's policies and they are using the machinery of government to help thousands of PC Party workers get ready for the next election.

The transcript makes clear that taxpayers' dollars were used to send tens of thousands of propaganda kits, and I quote, "to party supporters, field organizers right across the country, key party associations and campaign chairs". Taxpayers' dollars are also being used to keep lists of names of crypto-communists, people like George Proud, Peter Milliken and Maude Barlow. This tactic smacks of McCarthyism.

I would like to ask why the Prime Minister has authorized the use of taxpayers' money to launch a smear campaign against thousands of legitimate Canadians and to grease the wheels of the Conservative Party effort in such a low-grade way?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think that my hon. friend is way off base when she says the range of things that she has just outlined.

• (1420)

We have simply put forward here a statement of the facts of the NAFTA. That is what is in the documentation my hon. friend refers to. Some of that documentation, she would be surprised to find out I am sure, is agreed upon between the United States and Mexico as being the elements of the agreement so that people can understand the elements and nature of the agreement and how it will affect them as individuals.

Our intent is to get these facts out to Canadians so that we can then have a rational, objective and less emotional debate on the question of the NAFTA than was the case in the 1988 election campaign.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that the minister's answer certainly does not dissociate himself personally from the McCarthy-like tactics—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member of course can put questions. Perhaps she would want to put the question directly to the minister.

Ms. Copps: Does the minister deny the statement made by his chief of staff at an organizational meeting for the smear campaign in which he said: "Nevertheless, we are seeing articles and letters starting to come out by what I will call the old, left wing crypto-communist, anti free trade Liberal-NDP con group. They are starting to write letters alleging plots, the dollar and everything else. I see where George Proud of P.E.I. has slashed it, Peter Milliken, and other great minds, Paul Dick, a Humber West Liberal legislative member"—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Copps: The minister and his colleagues may think this is funny but we take this very seriously. I would like to give the minister the opportunity now to stand to dissociate himself from the remarks of his chief of staff and to fire the man.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I know my hon. friend is quite sensitive to these things and I know the great minds she has spoken of, Mr. Milliken and Mr. Proud, are also sensitive to these matters.

Let me try to put the point in the words of one of the leading commentators on the NAFTA, Mr. Peter Cook. In The Globe and Mail this morning he said: "It has also become a fact of life in Canada that when partisans of the left reach for something to bash that something is now free trade". Indeed my friend from Etobicoke North said some two or three years ago that every sparrow that falls we will blame on the free trade agreement.

In a private conversation among political staffers one expects this type of language because these are political people talking among each other.

I am sure my hon. friend would agree that when Liberal staffers get together they use a few slang words to refer to the likes of myself and my friend from Calgary Centre, which might also offend the ears of my hon. friend.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): I think that the minister's answer is a defence of McCarthy tactics that we thought had gone out in the sixties. I will give him a chance to reply. He claims that it is only a few conversations among some assistants. In fact, we have proof here that it is the policy of the Prime Minister's Office, the office of the Minister for International Trade and the offices of twelve ministers in the Mulroney cabinet to use the agreement to try to promote their own policies and even to silence opponents of the government's policies. Does he support and endorse the use of millions and millions of Canadians' dollars to boost his own party's policies?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has talked about McCarthyist tactics. These are not McCarthyist tactics. They are efforts designed to get the facts of the NAFTA on the table so that Canadians can debate the issue in a rational, unemotional way on the facts that are presented.

I would be very pleased to sit down with my hon. friend and discuss the merits of the agreement.

The conversations referred to in the Maclean's article have registered that if there are facts misstated by opposition parties or other opponents to the NAFTA we are not going to smear, using my hon. friend's words. We are going to take those people on and fight this agreement on the basis of the facts. I think Canadians will support this as a very good agreement for them.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, I can well understand why the minister is consulting the gospels. If I were in his situation I would too. He refers to the Gospel of Matthew. I would refer him to the Gospel of Luke: "Every tree that fails to produce good fruit is cut down".

I was interested to learn as one who has occasionally criticized aspects of the North American free trade agreement that I am now presumably "an old, left wing crypto-communist, anti-free trade NDP-Liberal groupie". My wife will be surprised.

More seriously, instead of spending the taxpayers' money on the compilation of computer lists of those who have misgivings about some or all aspects of the North American free trade agreement, why does this government not spend the taxpayers' money, its scarce funds, on adjustment assistance to those who are inevitably adversely affected by freer trade?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, when I hear my hon. friend referring to quotes from the Bible, I am sure he has been waiting a long time to be able to put another quote on the table. Perhaps we might have another book from him and could get some real quotes. I am looking forward to that.

My hon. friend has asked a sensible question unlike the previous three that have been put on the table. My hon. friend asked a question about adjustment. I refer him to what we have done on adjustment following the FTA with the United States. We have increased the amount of funds for training. We have introduced the concept of the Canadian Labour Force Development Board where business and labour working together in partnership advise the government on the uses of these funds.

We were advised by the de Grandpre commission not to introduce an adjustment program that was exclusively related to the free trade agreement, but to increase the adjustment funds to help people in the economy as a whole rather than just as a result of the free trade agreement.

These programs are under review on a continuing basis and there may well be some changes we will have to make in response to changing circumstances in the economy as a whole.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the government House leader is quoted as saying: "If we have got to go out in an election we need enemies". I agree with the minister that this government will go out in an election, but I would have thought the last thing that this government needs is more enemies.

Instead of spending money on costly advertising programs such as the government has launched on the free trade agreement, can the minister say why it is this government has consistently failed to implement the broad range of recommendations of the de Grandpre commission which he so often quotes? For example, why does the government not spend its money on assisting Canadians to develop high value-added industry? Why does it not promote programs that would encourage business to help those adversely affected by freer trade? Where is this government's adjustment assistance?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the essential approach of the prosperity initiative is to bring about a broad range of change within the economy, possibly changes in programs of government but also changes in the way business and labour approach the changing nature of the economy today.

We have had an extensive consultation process under way at the community-based level with 186 communities involved and with some 28 or 30 industry sectors involved. The report on this will be coming forth some time this fall and following that the federal government will be responding.

I would also encourage strongly that provincial governments, municipal governments, business, labour, educators, everybody who will be affected by this action plan proposal, also respond because it will require not just the federal government doing things but the country as a whole responding to the huge change under way in the globalized community we live in.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade.

Today, according to a survey, nearly half of Canadians and more than half of Quebecers are afraid of losing their jobs. People are really scared. This morning, we also heard that the government's strategy for selling the three-way free trade agreement is to discredit its opponents. Why does the government not discuss this agreement and explain its benefits, instead of launching personal attacks? Is the government losing confidence in its own free trade agreement?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend has not read the information that we have been putting out. The information is based entirely on facts.

We are quite prepared and want to debate this matter, the NAFTA, on the basis of facts, on the basis of the composition of the agreement. If my hon. friend wants to do so, I would encourage her to present a motion on the NAFTA and we will have a good debate on that. Parliament will be seized with this later on this year or early next year and at that time we will be setting out in a very clear way what the agreement does provide for Canadians.

It provides in principle access to a market of 85 million people with a growing middle-income group that has been heretofore closed to Canadian manufacturers, Canadian service providers and Canadian investors.

We have an agreement that results in some significant improvements to the existing free trade agreement. We also have an agreement that continues Canada as one of the most favourable places in the world in which people both within Canada as well as international investors can invest.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, Canadians know, and particularly unemployed Canadians, that the Canada-U.S. trade deal cost this country 360,000 manufacturing jobs and that we continue to have 1.6 million people unemployed in Canada.

Again the government is trying to sell the deal by promises and, further to that, by intimidation. The government, through the article we have read today, says that it is going to use further intimidation tactics by asking multinationals to sell the deal to their employees. Yet these same multinationals are rapidly moving to Mexico and moving their jobs to Mexico. Workers are afraid of losing their jobs. They saw what happened during the Canada-U.S. trade deal. The minister has done nothing to show that there will be jobs created in Canada but only that there will be more of the same.

When will the government start having a campaign to get Canadians back working and stop a campaign of over $300 million to intimidate the workers of this country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, no one is trying to intimidate the workers or anybody else in this country. Let me again remind my hon. friend, when she starts whistling around these large numbers of job loss, of what Peter Cook said this morning: "It has also become a fact of life in Canada that when partisans of the left reach for something to bash that something is now free trade".

When my hon. friend uses the number 300,000 she forgets to mention completely the fact that we have been in a world-wide recession which has affected Canada and that we are in a period of tremendous change internationally which is affecting Canada as well as other countries. In fact 300,000 people in New Jersey lost their jobs. Is she going to blame that on free trade as well?

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I say to the Minister for International Trade that rather than citing a second party on whom the New Democratic people are partisans of, we are partisans of the working people of this country. That is why we are saying that NAFTA is a bad deal for Canada.

It is clear from the information out today by the senior strategists of the minister's department, as well as the Prime Minister's department, that the strategy to sell the trade deal is going to be calling Canadians empty-headed little Canadians, and otherwise simply entering into name calling rather than on the basis of the deal. On top of that, the senior strategists for the minister say that they will be holding back Statistics Canada data in order to wait until it is the right time for public opinion.

Will the minister, on behalf of his government, ensure that all Statistics Canada data is released now untampered with to all parties and to all Canadians?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, it is really astounding to me that my hon. friend could call the release of a secret transcription of a private conversation name calling.

No one was calling names. I am sure that if she were sitting down with Bob White or some other people in the labour movement they might not use the tenderest language in the world on myself or other members of the Conservative Party. I would not call that name calling if that is what they talked about in a private conversation.

My friend talks about the free trade agreement. If she says that the free trade agreement has been such a damaging thing, how is it that the free trade agreement has also allowed Canada greater access to the United States market so that we have been able to increase our exports to the United States market by some billions of dollars? I remind her that every billion dollar of increase in exports represents 15,000 new jobs. The free trade agreement has helped us get through this recession, not hurt us as my hon. friend would say.

The question she has asked was: Are we withholding Statistics Canada information? The simple fact is that Statistics Canada decides when it releases the information and that is not influenced in any way by the Government of Canada.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the Minister for International Trade fully understands what is at stake here.

We have a government that is prepared to spend millions of dollars on compiling computerized lists of its so-called enemies. It is prepared to spend millions of dollars to send out kits to its own party field organizers, but it has no money for adjustment programs and it has no money for impact studies to tell Canadians what jobs are going to be lost and what sectors are going to be impacted.

In all seriousness does the minister not see a clear, moral responsibility to say that this kind of smear tactic is wrong, or is the fact of the matter that he will not say it is wrong because it is his tactic they are using, not his advisers', and they are simply doing his dirty work for him?

Mr. Speaker: I have been listening very carefully to these questions and I am asking hon. members to be very careful about making personal imputations that may give us some difficulty.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, any amount of huffing and puffing is not going to change the fact that the NAFTA is going to improve the economy of Canada by giving Canadians access to a market of 85 million people, one of the fastest growing markets in Latin America, a faster growing market than either that of the United States or Canada, a market with a large middle income group that is growing larger every day, and a market that is going to provide jobs to people in Canada.

That is the essence of the messages that we have been getting out on NAFTA. No amount of huffing and puffing by my hon. friend from Winnipeg is going to stop us from getting those messages out.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, let us see if we can come at the minister another way.

In this transcript that was recorded the adviser to the minister and to several other members of the Crown admit that they are spending public money to do focus groups on so-called enemies of NAFTA. They are compiling files on people so that they can use retaliatory tactics. They are particularly targeting people for attack under this program.

• (1440)

I want to ask the minister this question. At a time when the government is supposed to be reaching out—at a time of crucial importance in this nation—to bring people on board to say yes to the renewal of Canada, does he think it is the right tactic to be trying to smear the people that he wants on board to support the yes side in this referendum? Does he not think he is simply destroying the whole fabric of this country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, if we are targeting anything, we are targeting inaccurate statements.

If anybody writes a letter or if anybody, such as my hon. friend, makes an inaccurate statement about the NAFTA or the free trade agreement, such as he has done, such as his colleague from Hamilton has done, such as his colleague from Etobicoke has done, such as the Leader of the Opposition has done today, then we are going to answer those inaccurate statements with the facts. The facts are based on a reading of the free trade agreement with the United States. The facts are based on a reading of the NAFTA agreement and based on the facts in those agreements we are going to respond to the statements that are made by my hon. friend.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the minister does not understand that the debate today is not about the substance of the trade deal. It is not about whether the deal is great or whether the deal is bad. The debate today is about the process, whether it is appropriate for the taxpayers of Canada to be paying—and I want to quote the minister's own chief of staff—to send out 30,000 kits to party supporters across the country, including kits to the campaign chairs of the Progressive Conservative Party appointed by the Prime Minister, to the field organizers in all 10 provinces, to key riding associations.

The debate is not about the substance of the deal but whether or not it is appropriate for the taxpayers to pay for PC Party propaganda.

Does the minister believe it is appropriate? Did he give his authority for that use of public money? If he did not, will he see that the taxpayers' purse is repaid, because it is not a PC Party piggy bank.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the information that has been sent out is available, and was sent out to many, many people. It was sent out to business leaders, it was sent out to union leaders, it was sent out to academics, it was sent out to—

Mr. Andre: To members of the opposition.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): —a range of people.

If my hon. friend would like some information to send out on government policy, he is perfectly free to call my office, get the information and send it out.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the minister is coming close to realizing what the discussion is about here this afternoon.

I ask him the question again. Does the minister think the action of the 10 chiefs of staff, 10 disciples of a tactic of another era, who have not realized that the cold war is over and have declared a war on truth, appropriate? I want to quote directly from the transcript. This was not in the Maclean's article; it is on page 17 of the full transcript that will be released today by this party. Does he think it appropriate that it was sent to "field organizers right across the country, as well as our key party associations, as well as our campaign chairs"? They all received the full kit. If the PC Party of Canada received the full kit, why should taxpayers pay the full cost? Answer that, minister.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend referred to a war on truth. The fact is that this is a war with the truth. It is based on a use of the facts that are in the free trade agreement. My hon. friend has singled out some people who got the kit—

Mr. Speaker: This is an interesting exchange. I do not know whether the country would be better off hearing it or not hearing it but I will let the minister complete his answer if he so wishes.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Let me just remind my hon. friend that some 40,000 or 45,000 of these documents went out to members of the business community across the country, to leaders of business associations as well as small business people.

It is an effort on our part to let people know what is in the agreement so they can respond with a sense of certainty when people such as my hon. friend make the outrageous statements that he has been making today.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister for International Trade.

What we are hearing in Question Period today is a very dark and sinister process that is being unveiled through questioning—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Riis: I want to put a very clear question to my hon. friend, the minister.

The transcript of this meeting says of those that oppose NAFTA, "we are watching all the opposition, opposition members and others across the country and we have them all on computer".

The KGB threw out its lists long ago. The secret police in east Germany threw out its lists. Is this government keeping lists now on computer of all those Canadians that are standing up in opposition to the NAFTA deal?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend makes a statement that is purporting to be fact which is factually wrong, yes, we do keep a record of that and yes, I do respond to it when I can to make sure that Canadians understand what is in the NAFTA and what my hon. friend alleges is in the NAFTA in his effort to twist the truth. Those are the things that we are ensuring.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that hon. members, in pursuing this line of questions, would want to stay within the bounds of propriety in the House.

I have to say to the minister that was a straight accusation and it was inappropriate. I do not want to have to deal with any other statements that are made, or preambles that are made in the next minute or two as being inappropriate.

I would ask the minister to withdraw, and I would ask members who are putting questions to be very careful to stay within the proper bounds.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I thought I was putting that in the subjunctive but if there is any offence, I would be happy to withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. minister.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, let it be clear that the minister has just admitted on the floor of the House of Commons that the government is keeping lists of citizens who are in opposition to the deal.

In this government's effort to misrepresent what is going on, to conduct a campaign of disinformation, what did his chief of staff mean when he said: "We are doing some minor changes to StatsCan information before we decide to send it out to Canadians"?

Can he explain what he meant when his chief of staff says that they are making some changes to StatsCan information as part of their propaganda campaign?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me again correct what the hon. member has just said.

We are keeping track of statements that we believe are incorrect and we want to make sure that the correct nature of the statement is on the record.

If my hon. friend or others make statements, maybe it is because they have not read the agreement or are misinterpreting the agreement that their statements are not accurate. We want to make sure that Canadian citizens are given access to the accurate information and not the misstatements.

As to the question my hon. friend has just put to me, I answered his leader by saying that we do not control in any way StatsCanada. StatsCanada has its own information. It has its own basis on the release of that information and that is the basis on which StatsCan operates.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I do hope the minister of trade will later confirm to me that I am on his list, but I would like to go to the Minister of Transport who last Thursday said that destructive competition between our airlines was "a main cause" of the difficulties that our transportation sector is now in.

• (1450)

I would like to ask the minister whether he will adopt the proposal put forward this weekend by the Leader of the Opposition to halt the merger proposed between Air Canada and Canadian Airlines until October 30, assist the airlines during this period with an abatement of transportation taxes and meet with the two carriers and with the competition bureau and seek a return to healthy, stable competition in Canada's skies?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, first of all, we have helped the PW airline to get through the present period by purchasing three aircraft.

We also helped the Canadian aviation industry last year by making changes to the excise fuel tax and modified the depreciation and capital cost allowance. No, we will not listen to Mr. Chrétien, because as this thing is unfolding the rest of the world is not going—

Mr. Speaker: I know that hon. members will, as I asked the other day, want to refer to each other in the appropriate way.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, the government's transportation policy used to be entitled "Freedom to Move", now it would be better known as "Failure to Move".

The government has a choice in this and if the minister will not adopt the rational, cautious approach put forward by the Leader of the Opposition, perhaps he will tell Canadians what his plan is in the face of a privately owned, unregulated monopoly of Canada's air services.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the government's position was clearly explained on several occasions. Recently, two proposals were considered by the airlines. After examining one of the options, PWA preferred to continue discussions with Air Canada, while reserving the right to revert to the other option.

As soon as a deal has been finalized and we have been informed of the deal, two entirely independent agencies will examine the provisions of the deal. The Bureau of Competition Policy will concentrate on maintaining the benefits of competition for Canadians, while the National Transportation Agency will determine whether the proposed deal is in the best interests of Canadians.

[English]

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. I too am somewhat disappointed that he would not follow the suggestion made by our leader as well as my colleague for Ottawa South.

The Minister of Transport will know that when the government introduced its deregulation package, the then Minister of Transport and the present Deputy Prime Minister said: "Canada's transportation system is the physical bond that holds together the diverse regions of this vast country".

I would like to ask the Minister of Transport what specific plan of action do he and the government have to ensure that regions like mine, Atlantic Canada, will remain linked to the rest of the country?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer is the same. No deal has been finalized so far. What we now have in the negotiations taking place between the two airlines is a proposed merger, and Air Canada has announced that if the proposal is accepted, both companies will continue to exist and operate as such.

I repeat that as soon as we have a deal, the National Transportation Agency will examine it and the Bureau of Competition Policy will examine it as well, to ensure that it will be in the best interests of Canadians and that the benefits of competition are maintained.

[English]

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. I want to remind the minister that for Canadians in parts of Quebec, Atlantic Canada, northern Ontario and western Canada, air transportation is not a luxury, it is an economic necessity.

On behalf of Canadians in Charlottetown, Sydney, Moncton and other regions of this country, I want to ask the minister what unequivocal guarantee can he give to those Canadians so that they will not have an inferior air service and monopoly prices against them as Canadian consumers?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): The best guarantee we can give, Mr. Speaker, is that since deregulation, service has improved across Canada. I repeat that the competition watch-dog will have to examine the deal as soon as it is finalized—if it is finalized—and will comment and make its recommendations at that time.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

The European Economic Community recently proposed very restrictive regulations which will effectively curtail all shipments of softwood lumber from Canada to Europe. It will interrupt a $1.4 billion industry if it is not corrected.

I know the minister made some recommendations and proposals to the community. Do we have an update and are we any closer to a solution?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend has pointed out, we are very much aware of the threat of community action on softwood lumber exports.

We made very strong representations to the community and will continue to do so. However, at this stage I do not have anything further to report. It is something we will be following very closely in the days and weeks ahead. There may be a ministerial meeting with the representatives of the community in the next week or so.

TRADE

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister for International Trade, whom I understood a moment ago to have said that his government respects the independence of Statistics Canada and its numbers are its numbers.

I wonder if the minister would explain why it is that on page 4 of the pamphlet the government claims that manufacturing employment is rebounding up to 113,000 from a March low, but if you look at the StatsCan statistics the increase was 43,000.

It would seem to me that the government is following the words of Mr. Ramsey: "We will change it before we release it". What is the minister's answer to that?

By law, Statistics Canada information is its information. It releases the information and the government has nothing to do with it.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, the minister seems to be having a great deal of intellectual difficulty today.

Nobody said that StatsCan would release the information. Mr. Ramsey says: "We have got the StatsCanada information. We will do some minor changes in it".

Would the minister consider the difference between 43,000 and 113,000 a minor change? Is that not evidence of manipulation of Statistics Canada by this government to manipulate the people?

AGRICULTURE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for agriculture.

The western grain situation has worsened again because of bad weather, yet the government has not responded to farmers' pleas for a new cash advance program.

We now know that the government has millions of dollars of taxpayers' money for a NAFTA propaganda campaign and plenty of time for its staff to work on a political smear campaign, but it has no time at all to answer farmers who have been devastated by this terrible weather.

Will the minister recognize the farm crisis today and announce an interest-free cash advance program for the new crop year?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, last week the Minister of Finance answered a question about the programs that are in place, which we have initiated together with the farmers and the provincial governments to provide help for farmers. So far there is more than $535 million under crop insurance and maybe $1.35 billion under GRIP programs.

The interest-free program that was in place before is under consideration now, but I think it is too early to make any final answer because we already have put in place programs that will trigger when the parameters are met. We should wait for the assessment that our people are doing in the field now to know what is the real damage. As we have done in the past, obviously the government will look at this closely and make the decision when the time comes.

• (1500)

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): I take it, Mr. Speaker, the farmers will have to wait. They will have to wait more. Clearly the government's priorities are out of whack.

As we now know, a member of the grains minister's own staff is busy working on a NAFTA propaganda campaign. The minister allows time for that political hanky-panky, but there is no time to answer farmers who are in desperate need of an extension to the interest-free cash advance program.

I ask this minister again if he is prepared right now to announce a new interest-free cash advance program for western farmers?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, we must at least recognize that if some members of this House and ministers are trying to open the doors to international trade for Canada, they are surely on this side and not on the other, because the opposition tends to say no to free trade, no to NAFTA and no to eliminating interprovincial barriers.

This government has acted dynamically over the years to ensure that not only farmers but all Canadians can be competitive internationally, because there lies the future. That does not seem to be the future as seen through Liberal glasses, but it is obviously how Canadians, Canadian youth, Canadian farmers and Canadian producers see the future.

I told the hon. member that this year we had implemented several programs that will provide about $2 billion for farmers. For two existing programs, that is an awful lot. We will look at the other proposed suggestions with interest when we have the actual damage figures in our hands.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw the attention of hon. members to the presence in the gallery of a parliamentary delegation from the Eastern Caribbean States.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I wish also to draw to members' attention the presence in the gallery of His Excellency Chief Emeka Anyaoku, Secretary-General of the Commonwealth.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

POINT OF ORDER

QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, some information has just been given to me. It pertains to the question that was just put to me by the member from Windsor in relation to unemployment figures.

There was an error in the tabloid. The seasonally unadjusted figures for March were compared with the seasonally adjusted figures for July. I think if one compares the unadjusted employment figures that the actual numbers show an increase of 181,000 from the lows to the period in July.

I think that the figure that is in the tabloid itself is lower than the actual increase in the unadjusted figures.

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, I have a technical problem. There is no simultaneous translation and the minister's statement could be heard only in English. Could he repeat it so that we can hear the interpretation?

Madam Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member would just be a little patient, we will check to see what happened to the simultaneous translation. The written translation will be available in the next few minutes anyway. Perhaps the hon. member could wait a few minutes.

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, if we do not have simultaneous translation, I presume that I could obtain unanimous consent from the House to suspend the proceedings until the system is working again, so that we can start over in both languages.

I do not feel that I am a second-class member and I believe that I have as much right to have the debates interpreted in my language as everyone.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am assured that the simultaneous translation is working very well now. Someone is looking after it.

If we can wait a moment, we must also move on to a special item before proceeding to the Orders of the Day and the Speaker of the House is indicating to me that he would like to occupy the Chair for that. I am sure that the other technical problems can be solved in the meantime.

WAYS AND MEANS

TABLING OF NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 83(1), I have the honour to table a Notice of Ways and Means Motion to amend the Excise Tax Act. I ask that the motion be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I should bring to the attention of the House that there have been some discussions and it would be the disposition of the House, as I hope it would be, to go immediately to tributes to a former colleague.

THE LATE HON. PAUL MARTIN

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, we were deeply saddened to learn early this morning of the passing of the Hon. Paul Joseph James Martin, surely one of the outstanding people in public life in this country in modern times.

Born in Ottawa on June 23, 1903, the son of Philip Ernest Martin and Lumina Marie Chouinard, he grew up in the Ottawa Valley in very modest circumstances. After an outstanding academic career at the University of Toronto, Osgoode Hall, Harvard, Cambridge and the Geneva School of International Studies, he came to Windsor, Ontario, to practise law and lecture at Assumption College.

Paul Martin was first elected to the House of Commons in 1935, when he was only 32, for the riding of Essex East which is now the riding of Windsor—St. Clair. The people of Essex East re-elected Paul Martin as their member of Parliament for 33 years without a break. There was an admirable friendship, a special rapport between the people of Essex East and Paul Martin. Factory workers, farmers, people of every origin and walk of life, to all of them he was simply their Paul to whom they could turn with their needs and problems, no matter what else he did as a figure of national and international renown.

Paul Martin first entered the cabinet of Mackenzie King in April 1945. He went on to develop an outstanding record of achievement as a minister in both national and international affairs. His work provided the basis for much of what we consider today to be the fabric of social policy and identity that defines the Canada we are striving to preserve.

As Secretary of State in 1945, he was responsible for the first Canadian Citizenship Act. Before that initiative, the status of Canadian citizen did not exist.

During his years as Minister of National Health and Welfare from 1946 to 1957, in the government of Louis St. Laurent, Paul Martin was responsible for national health legislation which was the forerunner, the basis, of today's medicare system. Even while serving in this capacity he often represented Canada at meetings of NATO and the United Nations. In the 1950s he was responsible for a breakthrough at the United Nations which, for the first time, enabled many of the new countries of the Third World to become members of that organization.

As Secretary of State for External Affairs in the government of Lester Pearson, from 1963 to 1968, he had many achievements, for example, the creation of the peacekeeping force on the island of Cyprus. He played a role in the negotiation of the Columbia River Treaty. But he was especially proud of his role in negotiating the Canada-United States auto pact, the agreement which did so much to build the modern industrial base of my own city and large parts of Canada.

I am sure Paul Martin could have been re-elected for the rest of his days to the House of Commons by the people of Essex East. But in 1968 he left the House and entered the Senate where he served as government leader until 1974 when he went on to represent Canada as our high commissioner to Great Britain until 1979.

Even in his subsequent years of so-called retirement, he remained remarkably active, writing three highly acclaimed books about his life and times, serving as chancellor of Wilfrid Laurier University, providing a source of advice and guidance to Liberals and to many in public life generally.

For generations of young people like myself who were interested in achieving a career in public life, especially through the Liberal Party, he served as adviser, mentor and example. He was one of the leading builders of the modern progressive liberalism which marked Canada's post-war years.

Paul Martin looked on public life as a very high and noble calling, in spite of its stresses and difficulties. His life and achievements prove the validity of this approach. He was able to combine to a remarkable degree a life of ideas with a life of electoral and constituency politics. He combined a high degree of empathy for individuals and their concerns with a national and, in fact, an international outlook.

[Translation]

He was very proud to be a Franco-Ontarian. He was very proud of his Francophone heritage, but he always fought for a Canada united from sea to sea.

[English]

To the end of his days, Paul Martin believed in and fought for a bilingual and multicultural Canada united from sea to sea to sea, with equal opportunities for its people of every origin.

He was disappointed on three occasions in his search for the leadership of the Liberal Party. However, he accepted these decisions with good grace and went on to serve the leaders who were chosen with unswerving loyalty and support.

Paul Martin was a speaker of remarkable skill and power. He had a warm outgoing personality that brought about a very friendly response from people of every walk of life. Especially proud to be a citizen of Windsor, for many years everywhere he went in Canada and abroad as minister and later as high commissioner, one of the first things he said when he ran into Canadians was: Is there anybody here from Windsor?

Windsor will miss Paul Martin. I will miss him, as will all Canadians who know of his role in building Canada as a modern country.

Along with his public life, his family was very important to him. He was devoted to his wife Nell, to his children and grandchildren. To Nell, to his son, our very distinguished colleague Paul, to his daughter Mary-Ann, to his grandchildren and to his entire family, I express on behalf of the Leader of the Opposition, on behalf of our caucus and on my own behalf our deepest sympathy.

I wish to extend our sincere condolences to his family.

[English]

Paul Martin's passing is a loss for all of us. However, we can respect his memory and pay tribute to him by the way we strive for a Canada which reflects the values of concern, compassion, generosity and unity, the values for which Paul Martin fought throughout his long and distinguished life.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, very few people leave an indelible mark on this Parliament and on this country. Paul Martin was one who did. I do not know that either one of them would welcome the comparison, but I always thought of him bracketed with the former right hon. member from Prince Albert, Mr. Diefenbaker. They were both very fierce partisans. They were both parliamentarians. They were both champions of people who were in need. They both had a sense of the history and the potential of this country. That is about where the comparisons stopped between Paul Martin and John Diefenbaker.

As I heard the news this morning of his death, it struck me that while he was a fierce partisan for the Liberal Party, he also had a very strong connection with those of us in other parties, particularly with leaders of other parties, perhaps with leaders of other parties who had lost conventions because he knew that experience.

It is not well-known that Mr. Martin's talents as a young man were recognized and encouraged particularly by R.B. Bennett. His relationship with Mr. Diefenbaker is well-known. I had the great, great privilege of knowing him when he was high commissioner for Canada. I can say that he was one of the people whose conduct in public life and in this House was very much a matter of inspiration to me personally.

Everyone has their Paul Martin stories, such as the story, as my friend from Windsor said, about "is anyone here from Windsor". When he was Secretary of State for External Affairs, I am told—I could never keep up with that—he used to take the time in every city he visited to pick up postcards and go back and write notes to people from Windsor saying: "Wish you were here".

There is really only one Paul Martin story and that is a story of a man of uncommon energy, vision and conscience who changed his country profoundly for the better. He embodied Canada's commitment to peace and development abroad and embodied its commitment to a better life at home. In many ways, as my friend from Windsor has just indicated, a country we are fighting now to keep was the country that Paul Martin did so much to define in that extraordinary and long career.

Mr. Martin served on Parliament Hill for 39 years. He held cabinet office longer than any Canadian since Mackenzie King.

[Translation]

In his capacity as a minister, first of all as Secretary of State, Mr. Martin tabled and was responsible for the adoption of the first Canadian Citizenship Act. As Minister of National Health and Welfare, he had a profound influence on the development of social programs in Canada and, in his work with the provinces, prepared the advent of universal medicare.

As Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Martin helped develop our country's peacekeeping role. He negotiated an end to the hostilities in Cyprus, sent a peacekeeping force to the island and expanded Canada's peacekeeping role in the Middle East.

[English]

Paul Martin knew the difference between convenience and conviction and he always chose the latter. He knew the status quo could always be improved and he set out to do it. He knew that the standards of the day were always standards to be made better. He did that more often than almost any other Canadian leader of his or any other generation. He demanded excellence of himself and he acted on it. He had a vision of a better Canada and he worked for decades to bring it to pass. He knew we had a special role in the world and he helped to mould it. He was convinced that to be Canadian meant something special and that we owed it to ourselves to always strive to make it better.

When he introduced the Canadian Citizenship Act in 1946 he said the following:

> One thing from which we in Canada have suffered, to the detriment of this magnificent country, is from a feeling of divisiveness—lack of that conviction that the welfare of all is the goal of their effort. It is not good enough to be a good Ontarian or a good Albertan—Citizenship means more than the right to vote; more than the right to hold property; more than the right to move freely; citizenship is the right to full partnership in the fortunes and in the future of the nation.

He was a man of really remarkable accomplishments: a minister in several portfolios through decades, leader of his government in the Senate and a very active senator, a high commissioner. All of those things together would make you think that he embodied the definition of an insider. In a sense he was but in the real sense he was not. If there was a quality to Paul Martin it was that he never became blinded by the offices he held or the honours that were bestowed upon him. He was always very much an individual who was open to people who sought and sometimes succeeded and sometimes failed, to ordinary people who had needs across the country.

I saw one of the newspaper articles today that said he finished his active political career in the Senate—not by a long shot. I could never understand the holiday schedule of high commissioners and ambassadors for Canada until it suddenly occurred to me when I was briefly Prime Minister and Paul was carrying on one of his endless public occupations as high commissioner that there was some relation between his vacations from London and Canada House and elections or by-elections in Windsor.

I am told on good authority that while he always was an active and a practising Catholic, he went to mass with particular regularity during these vacations, and at home during by-elections and just happened to be seen, usually with one or another Liberal candidate in tow, at the steps of a church or a cathedral in Windsor.

He did not finish his political career in the Senate, he finished it today when finally that great heart failed and Canada lost one of the leaders of our time, one of the people who defined and made valuable the nature of this extraordinary country.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Leader of the New Democratic Party, our caucus and our party I want to say how saddened we were this morning to hear of the passing of Paul Martin Senior.

If one were to go into the libraries of members of Parliament, I suspect that in a prominent place on their shelves would be the two volumes of A Very Public Life. Those of us who did not have the good fortune to serve with Mr. Martin had the opportunity to learn about his accomplishments and his dedication and service to Canada.

Previous commentators have mentioned a funny story attached to Paul Martin Senior. Just the other day I was in the hallway with my leader and a friend of my leader who was a Liberal and who was explaining how she first came to be a Liberal. It started when she was 15 years old and she had won an essay contest. Part of the prize was to have lunch with Paul Martin Senior, in the parliamentary dining room. At that time he talked her into becoming a Liberal and she has been a Liberal ever since. I think that story helps us understand how Paul Martin could be re-elected over a 33-year span in his constituency of Essex East. He was an outstanding parliamentarian with a long record of achievements, a dedicated public servant, an outstanding academician and a diplomat for many, many years with outstanding accomplishments.

Many people come and go from this place and I suppose all of us in some way or another—some small, some large—leave a mark. When one looks at the long lists of accomplishments of Paul Martin Senior, one begins to appreciate how much this man did to make Canada a better place.

The fact that we have progressive legislation that distinguishes Canada is in no small part because of the contribution that Paul Martin made in this place and the other place over many years.

We were sad when we heard the news this morning and today our sympathies go out to his son, who shares this place with us, to his wife, his daughter, his family and his friends. Our hearts and our prayers are with them today.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, it is with regret that we have to pay tribute to the Hon. Paul Martin on this day after a very long and distinguished public career in Canada.

He was born in Ottawa in 1903 but at five years of age his parents moved to the Pembroke area where his father worked for years in a local sawmill. As a result, Paul came from very humble beginnings up the Ottawa Valley. He came from a family with a strong faith and a strong caring attitude.

His father was a great source of encouragement to him and his mother was always there to give him some very wise advice. He always told me she played a tremendous role in moulding his life.

He attended schools in the city of Pembroke and then went on to an outstanding academic career. He moved to Windsor where he had a long and distinguished political career, as outlined so well by my colleague from Windsor West.

In 1928—this is a story that is always told with a great deal of humour in the Pembroke area—the Hon. Paul Martin was away at law school, a very bright young law student. The Liberal Party met to choose a candidate for the provincial election of that year and it ended up with no candidate. At the end of the meeting one of the good old-timers got up and nominated someone he considered to be a very bright young man from Pembroke by the name of Paul Martin who was at that moment a student at law school. Everybody agreed Paul should be their candidate.

The next morning they phoned him at university and told him he was the candidate for the provincial election. His father also learned the next morning that his son Paul had been nominated to run against none other than his own employer and that created a little bit of difficulty for a while. The Martin family in its entirety was very proud of and loyal to Paul Martin.

I want to express the condolences of all the people from the Upper Ottawa Valley today, and particularly from Pembroke where he grew up, to his son Paul, his daughter Mary-Ann, and his wife Nell.

Particularly, I want to mention three of his sisters who are still living in Pembroke: Lucille Martin, Anita Martin, and Mrs. Claire Guay. Our hearts go out to them today because they were always there, they were very proud of their brother Paul. They worked hard, particularly Lucille, to give Paul some help in his education.

We need not talk about his great career in the latter days of the League of Nations, his work in the United Nations on behalf of Canada or his work in this Parliament on the social legislation of this nation. He was a strong person, the social conscience of the Liberal Party of Canada.

I want to thank, on behalf of his three sisters who were so proud of him, the people who have risen in this House today and paid such a very fine tribute to him. We will always remember him as a great Canadian. May more Canadians of his calibre come forward to keep this nation together and make it great, as Paul Martin would want it to be.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, I first saw Paul Martin when I was 14 years of age in London, Ontario. My father had taken the family to the London arena to see the Right Hon. Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent and Paul Martin. The arena was even more filled than for the London circus. We had come to see the Prime Minister, but we had come to hear Paul Martin who time and time again brought that tremendous crowd to its feet.

I had a very personal experience with Mr. Martin. In 1968, when I was a student, I was asked to work full-time during the leadership campaign with Mr. Martin. It took me two seconds to say yes to have the opportunity to work with this lifetime student, this rare politician, one of the few anglophones in Canada who was bilingual at that time, this person who had brought national health insurance to Canada and who, as Secretary of State for External Affairs, had given us measures such as the Columbia River Treaty, the auto pact and the peacekeeping forces in Cyprus. What an honour to have worked with him.

I have two vivid memories of that four months when I worked with him, living with him night and day. The first was that Mr. Martin was incredibly demanding of all those around him, but he was even more demanding of himself. When we could not organize delegates to be with him and talk to him, he organized himself to meet with those delegates on the phone from six in the morning until after midnight every day. I can assure my colleagues that he was no respecter of Canada's time zones. Through his work, his character and his qualities, Mr. Martin inspired tremendous loyalty and friendship from all those who worked with him.

My second vivid memory of that leadership campaign in 1968 deals with Tom Hazlitt, now deceased but then a reporter with the Toronto Star. The previous year he had won the award for being the top reporter in Canada. I asked him: "Tom, why did you choose to follow Mr. Martin full-time during this campaign? You had your pick of all the Liberal candidates". He said: "Jim, if Mr. Martin wins, it is the biggest story of this year. If he loses, it is the biggest story of this year".

Mr. Martin did not win that leadership. I remember that we were at the Ottawa civic forum when the results were announced. I was walking with Mr. Martin by the seat of Tom Hazlitt. This seasoned, hardened political reporter was weeping.

Maybe Paul Martin did not win the leadership, but Paul Martin was a real leader. He made a real difference to the lives of all Canadians.

Our sympathies go out to Nell, Mary-Ann, Paul, the grandchildren and the rest of the family.

Hon. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I want to join with those who have spoken words of appreciation on the scope of the life of Paul Martin.

In the midst of the riding of Waterloo, at Wilfrid Laurier University, is the Paul Martin Centre, appropriately, a reminder of Paul Martin's association with Wilfrid Laurier University. He served as chancellor and during that period became very close not only with the administration and faculty, but with the students.

He was one who found time to regularly come down and talk with people about public life and about the life of our nation.

Shortly, we will plan an appropriate Canadian celebration for the 50th anniversary of the United Nations. Paul Martin was a part of the delegation to the founding of the United Nations. Paul Martin had a dream of Canada's role in the post-Second World War. He was one who committed Canada. That commitment and that leadership has transcended party lines to this day.

I recall, as president of the National Union of Students, Paul Martin's response to the student idealism of the early 1960s. At that time there was a Commonwealth volunteer program. There were other opportunities. It was the Kennedy period. It was the period when there was an opportunity to serve internationally.

I remember when a number of us in student political life came up with the concept which led to CUSO. We were looking for ways and means to have young Canadians serve overseas. We had no budget. We had the support of churches and non-governmental agencies. He was among those around us who persuaded the government that we should use the Canadian forces, the RCAF as it was at that time, to take young people and move them.

We moved together because of that kind of leadership. At the time when I was in Nigeria we grew from seven Canadians to 90 CUSO volunteers. Every time one of those Canadian flights arrived with more young people I thought about that particular contribution.

I join, on behalf of those of us who caught some of his dream and are grateful to him for opening doors, in paying a tribute to him and expressing sympathy from those of us who were a part of that dream to his family.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I occupy the seat that was Paul Martin's, therefore it is appropriate that I should have this opportunity to say these few words. That is not the only reason. I am also one of those whose experience of Paul Martin was chiefly as a resident of Essex county, not as a politician.

He was a man who dominated much of our area, but his was always a friendly, concerned presence. Even though I lived quite some distance from the riding during my childhood and my teenage years, hardly a significant event in my growing up was not responded to by some kind of indication in the form of a card or a call from his office that Paul Martin took note of that fact.

He was, in our area, known as Oom-Paul. As a New Democrat that had rather negative connotations as we suffered defeat after defeat. To most, and certainly that includes my family, that was a rather pleasant term of respect of the power that he expressed.

I think it is important to understand what the source of that power was at this time when there is so much discrediting of politicians and when politics is falling into disrepute. Paul Martin was what a politician should be, a man brought to office not because of ambition to occupy a space or a place, but to make things better, to change things for the benefit of people.

So he did, and he did with a sense of concern and love for his constituents that they all could recognize. It could be recognized in his unfailing ability to remember the name of virtually every family in Essex county and to indicate in the briefest of discourses that he was aware of the significant things going on with those constituents to whom he spoke.

Those of us in the New Democratic Party might have resented our constant defeats but we must respect his accomplishments in the field of social justice. We may have, in a sense, blamed him for stealing our thunder. But we could not have failed to recognize that he was motivated by what should motivate politicians, and that is the pursuit of justice, especially social justice. For that he will always be remembered, and deservedly so.

Throughout my experience in politics, while occupying Paul Martin's seat I was termed by him "his member of Parliament" and he would say: "and I want to talk to you". When I was his alderman he said with pride, at least to me, that I was his alderman and he wanted to speak to me, and he did. He was always ready to proffer advice that never indicated even to the slightest degree that we might have differed philosophically or in terms of our partisan alliances.

Paul Martin was a great Canadian, but to Windsorites he was Windsor and Essex county. We will miss him dearly. I would like to express my condolences to his family as well.

Mr. Speaker: I want to thank hon. members for their comments.

COMMENTS OF MINISTER FOR INTERNATIONAL TRADE

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, just after Question Period the Minister for International Trade, on a point of order, rose to pretend to be setting some figures right that I had quoted during Question Period. Unfortunately he was as wrong then as the government documentation I quoted from was wrong. In fact, he quoted two sets of unadjusted figures in an attempt to refute statistics which I had cited. He was wrong, dead wrong, as any statistician would know, and in fact I stand on what I understand is an appropriate point of order to point out that not only was his point of order inappropriate, but it was entirely misleading.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have listened to the hon. member very carefully. I guess, come to think of it, that neither point of order should have been allowed.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 11 petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

TABLING OF ORDER IN COUNCIL

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, in my role as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence, and pursuant to Standing Order 32(2), I would like to lay a document before the House.

I am tabling now, in both official languages, the Order in Council dated September 8, 1992, No. PC-1992-2006, which places members of the Canadian forces on active service for the United Nations operation in Somalia.

PETITIONS

PETRO-CANADA

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I have petitions today with some 700 names concerning the policy of Petro-Canada in cutting back its gas stations across the country. Some 1,000 are to be closed in the next few months.

This petition comes from a group of petitioners in communities in the Algoma district: Desbarats, Bruce Mines, Echo Bay, Hilton Beach and Richards Landing. It contains 700 signatures of people who are calling on the government to encourage a policy where if there is only one service centre in a community, arrangements would be made to maintain that service. It is especially important in remote communities where citizens have to drive some 10 or 20 miles to have service for their vehicles, especially in the cold winter months of the year.

I hope Mr. Hopper and other officials in Petro-Canada will take into account these representations and this petition.

JUSTICE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I also have a petition with some 100 names on it concerning Christine Lamont and David Spencer who were convicted in a court in Brazil and sentenced to 28 years.

The petitioners call upon the government to take action through the Secretary of State to request the Brazilian government to expel Ms. Lamont and Mr. Spencer and return them to Canada. They point out the miscarriage of justice in that case.

YOUNG OFFENDERS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I have another petition with some 150 names on it from constituents in Espanola, Little Current, Webbwood, Nairn Centre, Mindemoya and other communities throughout the eastern part of my constituency in the Sudbury district concerning the Rosalynn Dupuis case pointing out the inadequacies of the Young Offenders Act and the need for protection of people and young people.

The petitioners call upon the government to take action in the criminal justice system to protect people and provide a better parole system, a better psychological assessment system and the judicial arrangements and medical, psychiatric and psychological reports for non-partisans with regard to the Young Offenders Act.

I hope the government will take action with regard to these petitions as well.

IMMIGRATION

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions to table today. Both of them urge the minister of immigration to issue minister's permits automatically for spouses and dependent children of refugee claimants as soon as they have been granted the right to apply for landing in Canada.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions. The first petition is signed by a large number of residents from my riding of Surrey North and the adjacent ridings of Delta and Vancouver.

It points out that family-class and assisted relatives-immigrants have always been a historical and important part of Canadian immigration. The relatives are able to assist in finding employment, housing and learning Canadian language and culture. It points out the government's current proposals will downplay assisted relatives and family-class immigrants.

The petition is asking that this government set aside its proposals and make sure family-class immigrants are always given first priority in immigration in Canada.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, my second petition deals with the introduction of Bill C-91 and points out that both new and existing drug prices have been raised dramatically since the introduction of Bill C-22. It asks the government to not proceed with Bill C-91 and to roll back the patent protection that was granted under Bill C-22.

NARCOTICS CONTROL ACT

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure and honour of presenting two different sets of petitions this afternoon.

The first petition draws our attention to the continued and increasing illegal drug trade that is rampant across our country and specifically in my own city of metropolitan Toronto and specifically the Narcotics Control Act that permits the Government of Canada to seize all assets following a drug seizure.

The petitioners call upon the government to amend the Narcotics Control Act quickly so the cash and assets seized from these drug busts can be split. They should not be exclusively the domain of the Government of Canada, but could be split with the municipalities as well as local police forces and local organizations that are on the leading edge of trying to combat drugs in our communities.

DRUG ADDICTION

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): The second petition while related is somewhat different. It still deals with the proliferation of drug abuse in Canadian families and communities, but it also talks about the solution to help, care and renew the lives of individual addicts and families.

The signatures from petitioners in my riding of York West were collected by individuals who were addicts and are now rehabilitating themselves. The petitioners are asking the Government of Canada to continue to provide strong financial support to the Caritas project, a community-based volunteer organization which has a proven track record in rehabilitating individuals and families ravaged by the effects of drugs.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Al Horning (Okanagan Centre): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would like to present a petition with 62 names from my constituency of Okanagan Centre.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to enact legislation providing for a referendum of the people binding upon Parliament to accept or reject constitutional amendments proposed by the government.

The acceptance or rejection of the proposed amendments are to be determined by the majority vote of the total votes cast in the whole of Canada together with a majority vote of the majority of the provinces with the territories being given the status of one province.

CANADA POST

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, I have three petitions to present today.

The first comes from the residents of Petit de Grat, Nova Scotia, in my constituency. It concerns the Petit de Grat post office, which was placed under review by Canada Post. The post office was subsequently closed and the postal service turned over to an RPO.

This petition opposes that decision by Canada Post and reminds Parliament this post office serves 449 households and almost two-thirds have signed the petition. The petitioners remind Parliament the residents of Petit de Grat want their rural post office and do not want Canada Post to proceed with this action without their consent.

HOUSING

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): The second petition is also from my constituents and concerns the co-op housing program. It decries the federal decision to end the co-operative housing program and calls on Parliament to urge this government to reinstate the federal co-operative housing program, which has served so many in the Antigonish area from which this petition comes.

OLD AGE SECURITY

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): The final petition is on behalf of seniors and others who live below the poverty line. The petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the government to ensure Canadian Old Age Security pensions are sufficient to meet the basic needs of Canadians.

They remind the House of Commons that hundreds of Canadian citizens live below the poverty line and 80 per cent of single women over the age of 65 live in poverty. The 37-cent increase in Old Age Security pensions in 1992 is inadequate to meet the many needs of Canadian seniors, and it is the desire of all Canadians to provide senior citizens with the necessary support to live their lives as independently as possible.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I have over 10,000 signatures on a petition to present from people who, in memory of Ryan Garrioch, request that Parliament revise the laws of Canada to replace the Young Offenders Act with an updated Juvenile Delinquents Act with a lower maximum age of 13 years.

These are but a small number of the signatures so far collected.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, it is my duty and pleasure to present a petition from a number of Canadians who are concerned about Bill C-91, the proposed drug bill, which will move the period which generic drugs are prohibited from entering the market from 10 years to 20 years. The petitioners are concerned such a move will further increase the price of drugs in Canada. They call upon this government not to proceed with this legislation.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition signed by numerous residents of my constituency of Kingston and the Islands.

These residents are opposed to the goods and services tax on women's sanitary products and call for its immediate removal.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Question No. 312—Mr. MacDougall:

With respect to the CBC coverage of the 1992 Winter Olympics in Albertville, (a) what were the costs in detail (b) what were the detailed revenue generated from sponsors and advertisers?

Hon. Henry Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications):

Parliament has not, as a matter of custom since the corporation's creation in 1936, required CBC to supply, in answering parliamentary questions, certain details of its internal management and administration. Parliament has had two reasons for following this custom: first, the independence of the CBC as a Crown corporation, established for the purpose of producing and broadcasting, independently of political or commercial interference, programs for a national program service; and second, the competitive nature of many of CBC's activities.

The appropriateness of the CBC providing certain categories of information has been considered on many occasions by various parliamentary committees and when the CBC has suggested that such information should not be made a matter of public record, its views have been accepted by them. The names of employees and their functions in relation to specific programs, their salaries or expenses, the costs of individual programs, or business arrangements are examples of details which it has not been customary to require the CBC to supply. It is open to Parliament and its appropriate committees to discuss the policies it and the CBC have followed in this regard.

Question No. 351—Mr. Boudria:

Since November 21, 1988, what is the total amount of funds approved or distributed in grants, loans, contributions and otherwise by the Community Futures Committee of Charlevoix and what are the names of the recipients and the amount involved for each such grant, loan or contribution?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): This information is not held through Employment and Immigration Canada. It belongs to the Business Development Centres. To obtain this type of information, the request will have to be addressed directly to the BDC of Charlevoix.

Question No. 354—Mr. Shields:

With respect to neurological diseases, how many people have been diagnosed; what is the annual medical cost for treatment; what is the annual cost of disability pensions paid to them, how is the government involved in its medical research and in the introduction and approval of new drugs for its treatment?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): In so far as the Department of National Health and Welfare is concerned, the administration of health care services is basically a provincial and territorial responsibiilty. The federal government does not gather statistics on the number of patients or the direct costs for patient care.

There exists a number of national voluntary health organizations dealing with neurological diseases that receive funding from Health and Welfare Canada to carry out their national activities. These are: Alzheimer Society of Canada ALS Society of Canada; Canadian Association of Friedreich's Ataxia; Canadian Cystic Fibrosis Foundation; Huntington Society of Canada; Multiple Sclerosis Society of Canada; Muscular Dystrophy Association of Canada; Parkinson Foundation of Canada; Schizophrenia Society of Canada; Sleep/Wake Disorders of Canada and Tourette Syndrome Foundation of Canada.

These organizations are providing information, raising funds for research and patient services, and organizing local support groups for patients and caregivers. They also collect statistics on the number of persons affected and the costs involved.

Together, these and other groups dealing with neurological disorders have formed the Canadian Neurological Coalition, which can be reached at: c/o Banting Institute, Suite 126, 100 College Street, Toronto, Ontario. M5G 1L5.

Specific or detailed statistics on the number and amounts of Canada Pension Plan disability benefits being paid out to persons suffering from neurological diseases are not maintained by officials of the department's income security programs branch, which administers the CPP. However, fairly accurate estimates have been calculated from the available data. The results have revealed that approximately 7,600 of the persons receiving a disability benefit have a neurological disease. These persons currently receive disability benefits of approximately $4.9 million each month.

The National Health Research and Development Program of the Department of National Health and Welfare supports public health and health care research relevant to national health issues.

The NHRDP provides support for research related to neurological diseases.

Within the budget allocated to NHRDP, there is no ceiling set for any specific research area or disease.

Research expenditures on neurological diseases depend on the number of meritorious research projects received.

The government is involved in the approval of new drugs for the treatment of neurological diseases when the manufacturer submits a new drug submission.

In addition, the health protection branch, drugs directorate has announced in information letter No. 804 that priority evaluation would be accorded to a new drug submission for a new active substance for a major therapeutic gain. This policy would include breakthrough drugs for neurological diseases.

In so far as the Medical Research Council of Canada is concerned the Medical Research Council is the largest single agency supporting research in the neurological sciences. Fully 85 per cent of all Canadian support is derived from the MRC. In 1990–91, the MRC expended over $26 million, or 16.5 per cent of its grants on neurological science research. This represents the largest single category of expenditure by the council.

Question No. 362—Mr. Pickard:

With respect to the lowering of duty free and tax-free limits on postal imports effective July 1, 1992, has the Canada Post Corporation contracted out to consulting firms work such as data processing, and if so, what firms and what is the value of such contracts?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Canada Post Corporation has entered into a contract with Livingston International Inc. to provide services integral to the creation of custom's postal invoices in the customs postal screening centres across Canada. The primary service provided involves the data entry of the importer's name and address, the exporter's name and address and origin, and the transaction number. Canada Post Corporation is required to provide this service in fulfilling its agreement with Revenue Canada—Customs and Excise. However, details of the contract are considered proprietary information between the corporation and the contractor.

Question No. 365—Mr. Karygiannis:

With respect to the Canada 125 compact disc Listen to the Land/Rassemblez les coeurs, (a) what was the total cost incurred in the production, packaging and distribution of this disc (b) what is the breakdown of these costs (c) how many copies were produced (d) where were these discs distributed?

Hon. Henry Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications):

The cost of producing, packaging and distributing the recordings related to this project was $38,036.

The breakdown of the costs for was as follows:

Sound recording production	$23,945
Manufacturing	4,183
Distribution	5,689
Administration costs for FMC	4,219

Packaging costs were paid by Canada 125 Corporation.

The number of copies produced was 2,000.

Copies of the recordings were distributed to the following:

All members of Parliament and the Senate	394
Station managers of all CRTC licensed radio and television stations in Canada	951
Factor musicaction Canada (FMC)	150
Canada 125 Corporation	75
Department of Communications Headquarters and Regional offices	100

STARRED QUESTIONS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Would you be so kind, Madam Speaker, as to call starred Questions Nos. 282 and 375.

Due to the length of the answer to Question No. 282, I ask that it be printed in Hansard as if read.

*Question No. 282—Mr. Rideout:

Since April 1, 1990 to the present, with respect to the department of National Defence, for each province (a) what are the capital expenditures authorized or incurred by the department (b) what were the capital budget cuts incurred by the department?

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): a. Capital expenditures for the fiscal year 1990–91 totalled $2,764 million and are detailed by province. Capital expenditures for fiscal year 1991–92 are not available as accounting for the fiscal year is not yet complete.

The question cannot be answered because the Department does not assign capital budget by province. Instead, capital projects approved are recorded into the Defence Service Program, which covers 15 years. The total dollar value of projects recorded into the DSP that were postponed or cancelled, because of reduction in projected spending following the budget cuts, totals $2,926 million.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, I am requesting leave under Standing Order 52 for the adjournment of the House to deal with the crisis in the airline industry.

It is our view that the proposed merger between Air Canada and Canadian Airlines International which will result in an unregulated, privately owned monopoly in Canada, the possibility of many thousands of jobs lost and the prospect of a need for financial assistance from the Government of Canada in the near future constitute a crisis which is deserving of debate pursuant to the Standing Order.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is no doubt this matter is of importance, but the Speaker and I believe it would not be appropriate to put aside the debate before the House today to have this emergency debate.

INCOME TAX ACT

NOTICE OF MOTION OF ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER REPORT AND THIRD READING STAGES OF BILL C-80

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 78(3), I will be moving that in relation to Bill C-80, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, to enact the Children's Special Allowances Act, to amend certain other acts in consequence thereof and to repeal the family allowances act, not more than one further sitting day shall be allotted for the consideration of the report stage and one sitting day for the consideration of the third reading stage of the bill; and that, 15 minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government orders on the day allotted for the report stage consideration and on the day allotted for the third reading stage consideration of the bill, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order and, in turn, every question necessary to dispose of the stage of the bill then under consideration shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The minister is giving notice of this motion?

Mrs. Vézina: Yes, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Notice received.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-80, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, to enact the Children's Special Allowances Act, to amend certain other acts in consequence thereof and to repeal the Family Allowances Act, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee; and Motions Nos. 1, 3, 5, 7, 9, 11, 13, 15, 17, 19, 21, 32, 34, 39, 41, 43, 45, 47, 49, 51, 53, 55, 57, 59, 61, 63, 65, 67, 69 and 71.

Madam Deputy Speaker: As we resume debate, the hon. member for Kamloops had the floor. I will recognize the hon. member for Mount Royal.

• (1600)

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I just listened to the hon. Minister of State for Employment and Immigration deposit before this House a closure motion as a hanging motion.

I must say I have had a great deal of respect for this minister and her integrity and her interest in the society and for the constituency that she represents. I found her to be among the more sensitive and caring ministers.

I guess she must have swallowed very hard to have to bring that kind of a closure in on a bill of such importance that has such incredible impact on the life and the times of a family, particularly poor families, when she knows there are over a million children living in poverty, when she knows about the number of working poor in this society, when she is aware of the numbers and the increasing numbers on social welfare.

When she learned today of Statistic Canada's figures in Quebec, I imagine it would have been extremely painful and for her I hang her head as well as all the other members across this floor for the insensitivity they bring to the closing of a very important change in the structure and the life of this country.

Is it not ironic that we move the closure for this debate on the very day that one of the most important figures in political life and political history of this country passed away? We paid tribute to the Hon. Paul Martin, who brought a sense of humanity, a sense of concern and a sense of consideration to the well-being of all Canadians, not just the well to do, not just the upper middle class, but to the working class people and the poor of this society. It is too bad the ministers and their friends across this floor did not learn how to write a postcard or ask if you are from Windsor.

There was another man of stature. It is ironic and it is within this past year that he passed away. I am talking about Senator David Croll, the other voice that called for understanding and a sense of commitment on the part of politicians to the needs of a fair and equal society.

It is also quite ironic that it is the week we deposited before this House the Charlottetown conference results in which we called for a social policy of fairness and equity and equality for all people across this land. There is no fairness in this bill; there is no potential for equality in this bill and it is unfortunately a shell game.

I am not going to deal with the facts, the figures and the numbers per se because I have outstanding colleagues in this House, including the member from Winnipeg who has guided us and this caucus in a study and evaluation. Some members of the general public have been good enough to appear in the very short period allowed for appearance, including the director of the Council of Social Development, Patrick Johnston, and Ken Battle. Others have pointed out the fallacies and the holes and the errors in the way this bill was cobbled together to look like it was a fair and good proposition to deal with poverty and to have more effective social programs. That I will not talk about.

I will talk about what I consider to be the lack of ethics, the poor timing and the unseemly speed with which this bill is being requested to go through this House. It is not being done in the sense of political expediency so that a cheque will arrive at the doors of constituents, the single parent families, low income families, families on welfare, families earning minimum wage. They are being made to believe that they are getting a gift from this government. It is trickery and it is wrong. It is a sad comment on the ethics of this government.

I was not going to use the expression that the Prime Minister used because it has become almost trite to repeat it. When I heard that closure call, it came back. It is going to come back to haunt this government. It can send out all the documents it wants and try to change people's minds, but there are a few things that are going to remain in the minds of the people of Canada.

When the Prime Minister stood up and talked about the fact that the universality of our social programs was a sacred trust, I assumed that he understood that the people when they put trust in him trusted his word and trusted that process would help that word become a reality.

The process is wrong. The process has been wrong on most major bills that have been brought forth by this government from the time it came into office in 1984. It has not been straight and candid with the people about the clawback that it has done under old age pension.

I want to thank Mrs. Denis for what she did on behalf of the elderly.

[English]

I will say that the clawback has come into effect, whether it is the capping of CAP, whether it is on the family allowance and its clawback, whether it is on this new social program which over a period of five to 10 years will erode significantly in its worth and its purchasing power.

I remember as well when family allowance came in. Just after I had my children in the early fifties, I can remember receiving that cheque. I thought it was fun. I thought it was nice. My husband said to put it in the bank and give it to the children when they got to university. I was a very fortunate woman. Little did I know how many women did not have access to a single solitary cent they call their own from their husbands or from their partners so that they could buy an ice cream treat for their children or a pair of shoes if they wanted for themselves or for their children because they were in receipt of money that came in their name. That is one of the things that the government has removed.

When there is no state left in a policy or in a program, then it diminishes its value over time. If the government wants to tax it back because at a certain level it considers that it is not necessary to receive it, fine and dandy. Tax it back fully, but let it be universal in its delivery system and tax back.

I will never understand this government's mentality which does not understand that when it removes the universal principle it is no longer a worthy program. As the rich and the richer and those who are getting richer do not feel that they have any ownership, they do not support it. That is a very serious charge.

The irony of Senator Croll and the irony of Paul Martin that these things are happening today is really sad. The rolling together of family allowance, the refundable child tax credit and the non-refundable child tax credit is no great big bonus.

It will come as a pleasant surprise to many people starting January 1, because this government is going to have its way, and it will be foreseen as a big windfall. But wait until the end of 1993 and everyone will realize that this windfall is far from that.

I feel that when things are targeted to the Consumer Price Index, and there is a 3 per cent cap, if you are paying for bread, butter, eggs, milk, shoes or schoolbooks today, next year the same goods are worth 2 to 3 per cent more. Let us say they are not more than 3 per cent more, one still has the same $10 bill for buying. It is not going to buy $10 worth of merchandise. Take that and extend it over five years and 10 years. It is pretty obvious that one is not going to have the same kind of buying power.

The other thing this government has tried to have us forget is the fact that it removed $3.5 billion over the last five years and then put $2.1 billion back in. I think most people came out with a negative value, not a positive value.

For all those reasons, I think that one should support the amendment that has been brought forward. Drop this bill, go back to the table and come up with a design that is going to really help poor children in this country and our future.

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased today to have the opportunity to speak on Bill C-80.

I would like to start out by reviewing a little bit of the background as to why this bill has been brought in. I think it is very important for people to understand, and I think people do understand, that in the present system there is a terrible amount of confusion.

We have the family allowance which is paid out usually to the mother, often taxed back in the hands of the father, not based on family income. We have the refundable child tax credit which is distributed under different rules and the child credit. We have three different programs being delivered to the Canadian people in support of families with children.

I cannot understand how the system can work, how all these different plans delivered in different ways can have a cohesive objective. Most of the Canadian people feel exactly the same about that. We also have the equivalent to married credits and the child care deduction which support families with children.

Originally, when the Conservative caucus committee on family issues was asked to look at this issue, the thing that most concerned and really upset us was the patent unfairness of the system, particularly in terms of how common-law couples were treated under the tax system and how married couples were treated. That was one of the first things that we were determined to fix up and I am very pleased that the Minister of Finance in other actions that he has taken has now ensured that the tax system will be fair in that regard.

This leads into this program of revising the delivery of the family allowance and family support programs because a key element of this new program is that it will be delivered based on family income and that all families will be treated fairly. I think that is something Canadians will rejoice at and applaud.

The other important thing, as I have said, is the issue of simplification, the delivery of all these different programs and one program with one set of rules. I have a lot of my constituents, and I am sure the same is true for hon. members in the opposition, who want the government to be more efficient and deliver programs in more realistic and understandable ways.

This has been another driving force behind the motives for bringing this legislation in. We have heard a lot in committee about how this program does not deliver more money to people on welfare. It is important to understand that as it is designed, it does not plan to do that.

This is because of the problem that we had and still have in the constitutional negotiations and the overlap of jurisdictions there. In our recommendations to the minister we felt it was much more important to keep clear of areas where we might be accused of intruding once again on provincial jurisdiction at this time. I personally see great opportunities to use the model of the plan that we have here in this bill for future modifications and development, but this is not the time to deal with that. It is, however, important that as we consider the problem that people who are on assistance have as they try to go into the work force, the additional cost of lunches and bus fares and so on, that we signal that we want to help in this transition. I am very pleased that this new benefit does that by adding up to some $500 a year for those families who are in that position of transition between assistance and the work force to help them in an admittedly small but still significant way to make that transition.

I am particularly pleased that although the Minister of Finance when he first agreed to have us look at this project indicated to us that there would be no new money available, in fact when he brought the program forward because of the cuts in spending that our government had made in many other areas he was able to bring some $2.1 billion over five years, or approximately $400 million a year, into the program to support the funding that it requires and to ensure that most people with family incomes of around $66,000 or less will do as well or better under the present system as they did under the old system.

Just to summarize some of the key points of this program, I think it is important that instead of coming, as the present program does, in dribs and drabs and sometimes in big lumps that are difficult to manage, that the program will be delivered in a monthly payment and it will be generally delivered, as is the family allowance system, to mothers. All families with children under the age of 18 will be eligible. We will have a simpler tax form because of the elimination of calculations for the dependent child credit and the refundable child tax credit, and the elimination of taxation and recovery of the family allowance.

This is an issue which has been of some concern to the people in my constituency. They have never quite understood why the government should go to all the trouble of sending money out and then taxing it back, and not always taxing it back from the same person. So that confusion will be eliminated and we will have a much more straightforward system.

We will have higher benefits for children under seven, and benefits for larger families will be maintained. All two million families with incomes below $50,000 will receive larger monthly cheques. Increased benefits for low and modest income families with children, especially low-income working families, will be available. Federal child benefits will increase, as I said, by some $2.1 billion over the next five years.

As far as the operation of the child tax benefit is concerned, there will be two main factors which will determine the amount of monthly child tax benefit payment. The recipient of the child tax benefit will generally be the mother, as I have said. A parent will be eligible for a child tax benefit for all children who are under age 18 and are dependent on the parent. To receive the child tax benefit, a parent must generally reside in Canada and have the required legal status, that is, be a citizen, a landed immigrant or a convention refugee.

As in the case of family allowances, parents need to inform Health and Welfare Canada about a new child in the family, that is, a birth or a change in custody, in order to receive the child tax benefit for that child.

The level of the child tax benefit depends on family net income, which is the sum of net income of the recipient parent and spouse, if any. As I mentioned earlier, this is a very important change and it reflects this government's concern and recognition of the family in all its circumstances.

The annual payment cycle runs from July to June. Each July monthly payments are revised to reflect indexation of benefit levels and the updated information on family net income and earnings obtained from tax returns which have just been filed for the immediately preceding year.

At this point I would like to speak a little about indexation because the previous speaker had a good deal to say about the fact that the program is not fully indexed. If she and other hon. members will recall, this government has made a commitment to review non-fully indexed programs from time to time. If we look at the history of the last few years, the indexation which has actually occurred has kept up very well with inflation as it should in the future with this program.

In closing, I just want to say that I think this is a very positive move the government is making. For the first time in Canadian history, a major social benefit will be delivered through the tax system according to income, universally available to every one, recognizing that not every one will get it in every year. But it will be a program that is universally available. Every one who needs it will get it automatically without application or having to beg for it. This is a very progressive move on the part of our government. I fully support it.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Madam Speaker, I find some of the language used by my hon. colleague who preceded me a little bit perplexing. I say perplexing because one of the things that we hear too often is the fact that some of this legislation is designed to help those of us in our society who are greatest in need. The concept of universality that is always there, the accessibility that is always there and as well the concept of helping those in greatest need seems to be repeated over and over again.

The facts do not bear that out. As my hon. colleague from Winnipeg North has pointed out, those who require the assistance the greatest are those who are likely to receive the least. When one takes into consideration the fact that the packages in their combination will not provide for a typical Canadian family the kinds of benefits it currently relies upon—and I did not want to say benefits from but relies upon because of the economic circumstances of the day—then we are faced with the inevitable conclusion that the legislation is inappropriately directed.

One might say perversely so because of one very basic fact. Over the course of the last seven years, the government through its cutbacks of social programs has removed in excess of $3.1 billion from the social assistance programs upon which Canadians had come to rely for basic sustenances. Some of those sustenances we take for granted and we put forward as an indication of the success of the Canadian economy and the energy of the Canadian people in establishing a society that treats all with the opportunities of equality that we claim to be our own.

One cannot withdraw those kinds of funds from the typical packages of family assistance. At a time that seems to be most opportune, I hate to be a little bit sceptical or cynical in my projection, here we are already beginning to enter into an electoral period and we are going to introduce legislation that combines all of these packages. As government speakers say, it is going to put back some $2.5 billion into the hands of those in need.

Other members have already indicated that still represents a shortfall even if it were true. Those who have studied this legislation well and who have studied it objectively, not coloured by partisanship, the Caledon Social Policy Institute, for example, will show that under the old system, the old system being the current one, those families in greatest need would profit most, if profit is the word to use, today under the current system and in fact, suffer a decline in excess of $500 over the course of the next several years.

One cannot suggest that families needing this assistance most today withdraw many of their funds. For example, with the new system in 1993, while the balance seems to stay the same, over the course of the next seven years there will be a decline from $2,253 to $1,861 as a net benefit to those families greatest in need, families on a typical welfare income.

Those who seem to profit most are those whose income is highest. There is no sense of equality in that kind of a system. It makes no sense at all to reward those who can supply their own sustenance with additional revenues from consolidated general revenues, that is from the Canadian taxpayers.

What is really at stake here is the way the government is presenting this legislation. I am reminded in this of a presentation by the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs who the other day in presenting a position on the Constitution closed by saying: "The question today is"—and I think I am quoting him correctly—"either we let each other down or lift each other up". This legislation does not allow us to help each other up. In fact, it lets us all down. It is the same kind of rhetoric that the government applied in promoting a constitutional package that members like me would vote yes, with the right to reserve a series of observations that leave vacuums that an ordinary Canadian has to consider before voting yes or no to the government initiative.

What are some of those vacuums? At the table on that constitutional package were representatives from various provinces whose interests were the promotion of their provinces. That is fair. At the table were those who were interested in representing the interests of various jurisdictions and the whole Canadian context. That too is fair.

I am reminded in fairness that there are those who would probably have said as they watched the debate, what little they could glimpse of it since it was behind closed doors, that there were 17 such individuals talking about maintaining a semblance of Canada without being concerned about Canadians.

There was a very large group of Canadians that was not at the table saying, as many of the members of those jurisdictions and the premiers of those provinces appeared through the press and the media, with their hand out every single day: "Gimme, gimme, gimme. Let me take something from the system that will be good for my province".

There was a very large group of Canadians that felt ignored by those kinds of representations. I refer specifically to those Canadians of the last generation, a generation who came to this country and saw themselves only as Canadians, not as Ontarians, British Columbians or Newfoundlanders but who have a stake in this package.

I dare say they are going to be very positive in their response. However, their voice is unheard. Not once in this package did we hear of any provincial premier nor, in fact, our own Prime Minister say this country is represented in its demographics by about 40 per cent of people who are neither French nor English in origin.

They see themselves being represented not by the various provincial premiers but by the Government of Canada, a government that is there to ensure that all peoples have equality of opportunity to develop the great potential that God bestowed upon this country.

I am reminded that StatsCanada produced immigration statistics only two weeks ago which indicate that of the total Canadian population, some 12.5 million—I am using round figures—from Confederation to today are either immigrants or direct descendants of immigrants. That is better than half the population of this country and yet, in these debates, we have ignored a basic element of our society: those that do not identify themselves with hyphenation. They do not see themselves as anything but Canadian and want only to have a debate that is centred around how we best relate to each other.

As the minister for intergovernmental affairs said in French:

[Translation]

Our success depends on our ability to work together, but we did not have the ability to work together.

[English]

The fact is that all Canadians have a stake in that kind of constitutional package because all Canadians need to have a government that would produce legislation that is equitable for all Canadians. This kind of legislation unfortunately reflects the vacuum that the constitutional package would present to Canadians.

I urge not only this minister, but the government, even in accepting a positive response by the Canadian public to infuse again into the discussions on the new Constitution all of those vacuums which we will raise and at the same time to listen very carefully to the concerns of this part of the House on this kind of legislation, legislation that does not do what the government says it intends to do. Perhaps it should at the very least listen to our amendments if it wants some support.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 38, it is my duty to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Edmonton East—Westray Mine; the hon. member for Argenteuil—Papineau—Perley bridge; the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier—Official languages; the hon. member for Surrey North—Tobacco products; the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—Child poverty.

[English]

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I have come to the House this afternoon to speak in support of Bill C-80.

I do so with the belief that this is important reform legislation. I would say at the outset I regret to be holding a copy of this bill in my hand and seeing in it yet another statute that is written in algebra. The formulas that are used in this to compute the entitlements and so forth represent the state of legislative draftsmanship that now affects all tax statutes and all legislation emanating from the Department of Finance.

In an age when we are trying to find a plain expression of words to convey the meanings, it is unfortunate that a statute we are going to enact has, as I say, to be written partly in French, partly in English and very much in algebra. This is not to say anything against the mathematicians in our country, but it is an unnecessarily complex formulation of what is intended.

It is good legislation because it does six basic things that are quite important with respect to the families of our country, and their ability to support and raise their children with financial security. The first beginning point for this really is the whole question of whether we can have economic competitiveness and social justice.

All governments at all levels in Canada and elsewhere, are finding their budgets constrained, their deficits still large and the need to be more competitive economically putting a great deal of pressure on social programs that were developed in more prosperous times.

The hallmark of Canada is our commitment to social justice. It is a defining difference from the Americans who I think often tend to see issues as having economic solutions, whereas in our country we see issues very much more in political terms and quite often with political solutions.

This summer the Couchiching conference on public affairs held an excellent conference dealing exactly with this theme about economic competitiveness and social justice, whether it was possible to still have both. This legislation is a fine answer to that question. It is basically saying yes, we can streamline, we can be more efficient with programs and still see at the end of the day the dollars spent are producing better benefits than they did before and more appropriately, they are being aimed at the sectors in our society most needy and most deserving.

I wish to highlight six points that appeal to me in saying that this bill merits the support of the House of Commons. First is the one that I have already mentioned about streamlining. A patchwork of different legislative provisions has developed over the decades in Canada, in the tax act, in the family benefit, and many other provisions. Each in its own time was a breakthrough, an advance, a measure of greater social justice in our country, but cumulatively represent now a real hodgepodge of arrangements. The administrative costs are too high.

The instances where Canadians fall between the cracks of these programs are too numerous and the loss of money through such a diverse set of programs simply has been too great. That is a reason why combining this child benefit into a single monthly benefit which generally will be paid to all mothers and for which anyone under age 18 in Canada will qualify, is an important step forward in streamlining our commitment in this area.

Second, the increased funding shows that the benefits truly will be widespread. I go back to the comments made by my colleague, the member for Calgary North, who gave a very thoughtful analysis of the detailed way in which this new program will be working.

The additional funding as a result of this, some $2.1 billion over five years of Government of Canada funds, goes for the benefit of children in our country. That is a very significant development. Over 80 per cent of all the families in our country will be affected beneficially by this. In other words, the 20 per cent that are not will be those high income families that do not need to have that kind of benefit from the country.

Mr. Milliken: The rich get the rest.

Mr. Boyer: Altogether, about two-thirds of the families in our country, 2.4 million families, will be receiving higher benefits, notwithstanding the interjections from the member from Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Milliken: The lowest paid get zip.

Mr. Boyer: The third point, and this directly answers the outbursts from the member for Kingston and the Islands, is that there is a targeting here of benefits to the advantage of families who are at lower income levels in our society.

Mr. Milliken: That is false.

Mr. Boyer: If the member is going to sit in his seat and say that what I am saying is false, I would like him to—

Mr. Milliken: If it is false, it is false.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands is presuming to read my mind. This was not at all what I was about to say.

What I was about to say is that whenever comments in the House disturb someone who has been recognized by the Chair it is the Chair's duty to ask the hon. member who is speaking when not having the floor to please allow his or her colleague to complete his or her speech and then I will be happy to recognize the hon. member when his turn comes. The hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore.

Mr. Boyer: Madam Speaker, it is very clear that the member for Kingston and the Islands, very good lawyer that he is, is better at reading law than algebra. I have looked at this bill and what I see in it is that on average, families with incomes below $50,000 will receive an additional $250 a year in benefits. I also see that all families with incomes below $50,000 have either increased benefits or the same level of benefits. I also see in that bill that 80 per cent of the increase in child benefits will go to families with incomes below $40,000.

Those are three of the points that I see when I read Bill C-80, are three of the reasons why I am going to support it and three of the reasons why, what I was just saying before the member for Kingston and the Islands got into an exercised state, I support what I was saying.

The fourth of the six reasons is that I see this bill is much more responsive to people who truly need it. The monthly payments in advance will eliminate a lot of the current delays in delivery that people are experiencing. I must say that it has always bothered me in the eight years I have been a member of Parliament to see people from low-income families going to the tax discounters, the people who will discount cheques they get in advance, living off of this kind of system and causing the low-income people in our country to be strung out unnecessarily. This is an important reform at the street level where it affects people.

The monthly payments can also respond quickly to changes in family status, as the member for Calgary North very clearly demonstrated, and is also going to be a further measure of fairness. All these changes, whether through death or divorce or remarriage or custody change and so forth, require timely response and this bill provides that.

Fifth, there is something innovative in this legislation and that is the way of providing a measure of wealth for working families in Canada. Certainly in Etobicoke—Lakeshore many people are working and supporting their families by going out every day to their jobs and finding that the low income they are able to earn is almost exceeded by people who are drawing welfare benefits. This has created great consternation in the community. Here we have a measure where the earned income supplement of up to $500 provides extra help to low-income working families. In the past, this has been a group that certainly has fallen in between the cracks of the present system.

The sixth reason why I am supporting this bill has to do again with the simplicity and fairness of the processing. These monthly payments will be tax free, therefore there will not have to be any recording of this in the tax returns of these recipients. The tax return is therefore shorter and simpler because of the elimination of the existing calculations for example for family allowances and the child credit and the refundable child tax credit. All of that is going to be much simpler.

In a word, this is a formula for having better value for dollar spent by the Government of Canada. Above all, it ensures social justice and real concern for the future generations of Canada that they can be well maintained in financial security within their own homes and families.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I would have resisted the urge to participate in this debate but for the misleading effect of the hon. member's speech. I want to correct the impression immediately that this benefits the poorest in our country. It does not. The hon. member has clearly been bamboozled by the government's own publications on this issue.

If he had read any of the testimony that was given by the less biased witnesses that appeared before the parliamentary committee, which got such a short time to study this bill and got to hear so few of the people that might have made useful submissions to it, he would be aware that what he has said was false.

I maintain what I said from my seat. I will say it now. The statement is inaccurate and false because the people who are not working in this country, who have the lowest incomes, and situations in which child poverty is most severe get absolutely no increase in benefits under this bill.

The section he read, that people earning less than $50,000 will get an increase in benefits, is accurate if you are working and earning the money. However, if you are not working and are relying on social assistance or some other means of support to maintain yourself and your children you get absolutely zero under this system.

The hon. member should go to the minister and tell him to correct this little pamphlet he put out which is so false and misleading because it leaves out that very important fact which is vital to any understanding of this bill.

This government has put more people on the welfare rolls than any other government in years and years. Therefore, it has a direct responsibility for those people and it has done absolutely nothing for them in the course of this bill.

An hon. member: They are covered by other programs.

Mr. Milliken: There are no other programs with any increase which are being brought in to assist child poverty. This is the child benefit package that the government has said is to alleviate child poverty in this country and it is sorely lacking for the most needy children in Canada. It is a serious omission and the hon. member should be ashamed that he had the nerve to stand in this House and tell me that what I was saying was false when he said it was benefiting the most needy. They are left out. They are omitted from this whole program.

The most wealthy people in Canada derive the greatest benefit from this program.

Ms. Greene: Not from this program.

Mr. Milliken: Yes, they do from this program. Yes, they do because it is a package. This is a child benefit package. Under the arrangements the child care expense deduction is increased by $1,000 so that in a family in which both spouses are working and earning in excess of $60,000 a year the child care expense deduction is increased by $1,000 for those people. It is an additional benefit for the most wealthy.

This is part of the child benefit package that the Minister of Finance trumpeted about so much in his budget. That is what is being foisted on the Canadian public, and we are being told that this is fair. This is the kind of nonsense that is being spouted by the government members because they are bamboozled, completely bamboozled by the rubbish the government publishes in its white papers. It is inaccurate, it is misleading and it is false. For once, the government should come clean with Canadians and put all the facts on the table instead of selected bits, as it has tried to do throughout its efforts on this bill.

This bill is nothing but an effort to buy Canadians off in the forthcoming election. We now know why this bill is being rushed through this House of Commons. In June this was introduced in great haste. It was rammed through the committee.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was a member of the committee. He tried to have other Canadians who wanted to be heard appear before the committee. However the Tory majority in that group shut the committee down in an awful rush. They did not want to sit all summer listening to groups rail against this legislation, to social groups that know something about child poverty in this country and who might have made some useful contribution to it. This was cut and dried.

The reason it was cut and dried is because this bill is going to have cheques going out starting in January, and guess when the next election is likely to be? With a referendum campaign on we know it is not likely to be this fall but—

Mr. Boyer: There are cheques going out now.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member says that cheques are going out now. However, he knows that these cheques are going to be larger because they will combine some of the previous tax breaks with the previous payments. By lumping the two together the amount of the cheques will go up although the actual cost to the treasury of Canada will not.

What it is doing is piling money into Canadians' hands in order to convince them that what it has done is beneficial. Canadians in most cases will not be any better off, except for the most wealthy and some of the middle-income workers who I agree will get increased benefits. A large number will be no better off yet they will think they will be because the cheques will be larger than what they have been receiving hitherto.

That is what is going on in this bill. It is an attempt to buy off Canadians with their own money just before an election campaign. If this government had introduced this bill at the beginning of its term, one might have sympathized with it a little bit because we would understand that it is not really interested in helping with child poverty. However, to introduce it near the end of its term and announce that it is going to solve the problem in Canada and then bamboozle people with this kind of cheque writing exercise amounts to a complete fraud on the people of Canada.

This government knows that it could have done something to help the most poorly paid but, as stated in the testimony before the committee, the government failed to go to the provinces and negotiate any arrangements with them to ensure that any benefits paid to those on welfare would not be counted as benefits received by those persons and result in a reduction of their welfare cheques.

Again, the minister failed to do this. The government says: "We did not have time". Guess why. It wanted to rush this through in time to have those cheques go out in January 1993, just in time for the election campaign.

Finally, the manifest unfairness of this arrangement must be apparent even to the hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore. As he has finally realized, this bill does nothing, absolutely nothing, for the persons not who are earning the lowest but who are receiving the lowest amounts of money in this country.

Those are the people whose children are poorest. Those are the people who need this kind of assistance most, and they benefit in no way whatever from this bill. Even the hon. member for Don Valley North who was yelling from her seat a few minutes ago and heckling me—I am not a cry-baby, I am not objecting to this—knows that what I am saying is correct.

Those people get nothing under this bill. She should not be supporting this bill. She has some social conscience. She should be opposing this and saying: "This is not good enough". Canadians expect better from their government. Canadians expect fairness from their government. This is not fair.

It is taking away a benefit they now have and giving nothing of substance in return. This benefit should be improved for the poorest, not for the most wealthy. She says that the point I made about the deduction for the child care expenses is not in this bill.

I do not care whether it is in this bill or not. It is part of the budget package introduced by the Minister of Finance at the same time. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre knows that. The hon. member knows it, too. She should admit that it is part of the package. It is unfair. It should have been better. The whole package should have been better.

To give these kinds of benefits to the most wealthy and give nothing to the very poorest is—

Mr. Boyer: Nonsense, it is not.

Mr. Milliken: Nonsense, nothing. It is absolutely right. The most wealthy are doing the best and the poorest are getting zero. Those are the facts in this case.

The hon. member says it is not. I do not know what I need to do to convince him, but I wish he would read the transcript of the committee's proceedings. There are volumes of material from the committee before which members of the public appeared and gave their views and expressed their reservations about this bill.

I personally attended a convention, a meeting of economists at Queen's University in Kingston. It was a post-budget commentary and all the papers that were delivered there spoke of this. They spoke of how it failed to benefit the lowest paid in our society. It gave them zero and the greatest benefit was for the most wealthy.

One of the participants at the conference, himself a university professor, said that under this legislation the only thing that made sense for him was to send his wife to work. He was working and she was not, but if she worked and added her income to his they would get an extra $1,000 deduction. They could do better than the best could do under the payment system that is going out to the people between $25,000 and $50,000. That is the fact. That is what he said.

Mr. Boyer: I would like to see that.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member says that he would like to see it. I wish he had come to the meeting. I would have been delighted to have him hear all this, but that is what is going on in this country.

This government is setting out to line the pockets of its friends at the expense of the very poorest. That is what is going on.

I say that this bill is bad, and I will be pleased to rise with my colleagues to vote against it.

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to correct some of the misleading remarks that have been placed before this House of Commons by the opposition.

In order to malign this bill they are including the child expense deduction, which is not part of this bill. This bill is $2.1 billion. Eighty per cent of Canadian families gain from it and those with a high income do not benefit from this particular bill at all.

If you added the child care expense deduction, did a computer model and looked at what happened to Canadian families the fact of the matter is that with the child care expense deduction people in the $120,000 income range would be getting very little benefit on average because it is such a small amount of money.

The whole amount that is being added in a future bill for the child care expense deduction is $140 million. The child benefit is $2.1 billion. No, there is nothing in this bill for welfare but the minister is reviewing national standards for welfare with the ministers across the country.

One of the recommendations of the poverty committee was that there should be national standards for welfare. I think that is where we need to help welfare recipients. This child benefit should be discretionary income for all Canadian families, including welfare recipients, so that children have the opportunity to participate in some of the many things in society that enrich their lives. It should be for educational expenses and recreational expenses. This money should not be spent on food or basic necessities in this country. We must all work to get welfare reform in order to address that very serious problem.

There is no doubt that one of the big problems with poverty in this country is that for many families it is not worth while for them to work. In fact, they are worse off if they go out to work. That is why we recommended an earned income credit, which this puts in place through the child benefit system. That will help make it more worth while for families to go out to work.

There is still a long way to go. We need to ensure that they do not lose any of the supplementary benefits that are currently provided under welfare. We need to ensure that all families who go out to work are better off working. In the long term, in order to escape poverty in any meaningful way, that is the most obvious way and the best, and I am sure all welfare recipients agree. Certainly in my experience welfare families have the same values that all Canadians have. They want to have good jobs and they want to have the opportunities to work and so on that other Canadian families enjoy. One way is to make it worth while for them to go out to work and to help them with these supplementary benefits.

This benefit is carefully targeted toward the low-income working poor. It starts at a fairly low level of income and builds to a maximum around $6,000. It stays in place until after the poverty line for a family and then it drops off. In my experience, and I have certainly informed my constituents very much about this benefit, there is overwhelming support in this country for a program of child benefits that focuses on those who need the money most.

I come from a relatively high-income riding. I have not had a single complaint from my high-income families about this child benefit. Overwhelmingly across Canada families want their money to go where it is going to help the most. Other important areas have to be addressed with respect to poverty. Clearly, the welfare area is one of the most pressing, and so is child support. Child support should be like paying taxes, and that is really important in helping people work. If a family knows they can get child support, which is usually deductible from welfare, that is a greater incentive for them to go out and work as well.

As well, I would like to see an effort made in that area. For example, one proposal I have heard is a child support insurance scheme. We know we have tried various measures in Ontario, B.C. and in other parts of the country to improve the child support system but a lot of work has to be done there. We need a national child support system.

This is major progress. It is a good bill. It is not perfect. It can be improved. I would like to see it added onto in later years. It is certainly a very good start which Canadian families will welcome.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 1. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed of the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, we have been discussing today the merits and demerits of the government's child benefits package.

It is worth while just stepping back a little to see the government's commitment over time, at least rhetorical commitment over time, to the plight of children and to resolving that plight because this amendment basically is to strike out the new child benefits package.

We all remember the Prime Minister's commitment to social programs as a sacred trust, committing himself to ensuring the continuation of those social programs that Canadians have held so dear for so long. He mentioned that in 1984 before the election. Canadians remember that very well and are more than cognizant of how that sacred trust has been broken by the Prime Minister.

We also remember the resolution to eliminate child poverty by the year 2000 put forward by the former leader of the New Democratic Party and how that resolution was unanimously supported in this House. It was supported by every member on the government side and every member on the opposition side. It committed this House to eliminating child poverty by the year 2000.

We will also remember the Prime Minister's signing of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child just last year, committing the Government of Canada and indeed Canada as a country at the international level to working toward protecting children, improving children's position, and improving the opportunities that children have to education, to health care, to social services, to a future.

On a number of occasions this government has made sweeping commitments to eliminating child poverty, sweeping commitments to addressing the concerns of the over one million children living in poverty in Canada.

Yet recently the Minister of National Health and Welfare, whose responsibility it is to administer, to propose social programs in Canada, has announced that the elimination of child poverty by the year 2000 is an unrealizeable dream. In other words, the government has gone back on all the commitments it made to Canada's children, to Canada's families.

The reality of the matter is, as we all know, that over one million children are living in poverty in Canada. Over 1.6 million people are unemployed in Canada. Over three million people are living on social assistance in Canada. That is the reality of Canada. That is the reality of this government's economic and social programs, and these realities are getting worse. The problem is getting worse, not better.

The Minister for National Health and Welfare, by saying that the elimination of child poverty is an unrealizeable dream, has made it quite clear this government is not concerned, nor prepared to deal with child poverty in a meaningful way. This bill confirms the fact the government has reneged on those promises made earlier to Canadians and their children.

The elimination of child poverty is not an unrealistic dream. Other countries have done a much better job than Canada has done in dealing with this issue. Only the United States has done a worse job. Other countries can do it, other countries have the political will to deal effectively with the problem of child poverty. It is unfortunate that the Government of Canada does not.

Whatever money might be going into the child benefits package that we have here—and it is a very small amount, $400 million for each year over a five-year period—for over one million children living in poverty, it is not very much money. In contrast to that, billions of dollars have been taken out of social programs since the beginning of this government's term. Taking out billions and putting back a few million, although they seem like large sums of money, is not helping but rather hurting Canadian children.

It is not that difficult to see the results and to see how we might turn this whole situation around. If we were going to deal effectively with the problems of child poverty, if we really cared as a country about children, we would ensure that adequate family benefits were available, not a bill like this which will give not one penny more to those people who are the poorest of Canadians, those living on social assistance. If you happen to be a child born to a family on social assistance, you will be no better off as a result of these changes.

We need an adequate level of family benefits to ensure that Canadian children are not hungry, that Canadian children have their basic necessities met. We need a national child care program, another promise on which this government has reneged, to ensure that Canadian parents can work, to ensure that their children are well looked after while they are out earning a living. The $500 suggested here for those who work, added to the benefits for those who work over those who do not work, is not going to go any distance at all in dealing with child care, costs which could amount to $6,000 or even $12,000 a year.

We have to have in this country a commitment to full employment, as all the witnesses at the legislative committee on Bill C–80 suggested. That is the only solution that is going to solve this problem. This government has talked very much about full employment and even the constitutional document talks about full employment and yet at the same time this government has created unemployment in order to attack inflation. That is not full employment strategies; that is the old way of dealing with inflation, cranking up unemployment.

We also need to ensure that we have fair taxation in Canada so we can pay for the programs we need. As we all know, there are many wealthy Canadians and profitable corporations paying little or no taxes and we need to address that.

Instead of making a full–blown commitment to dealing with child poverty, this government has introduced a bill which will finally end universality and which will give not one penny more to the poorest of Canadians.

Perhaps the most telling point about this bill is that while it is clearly a bill about social policy, about what we are going to do to sustain our children and to provide children with their basic needs, it is not being presented as a social policy bill but as a finance bill. In other words, it is quite clear that social policy is being run out of the finance department in Canada and not out of the department which is responsible for social policy, the Department of National Health and Welfare.

In addition to that, we are seeing this bill forced through this House. We saw today that the government is prepared to go to any lengths to make sure that this bill is through this House very quickly. We had through the summer inadequate time for witnesses to present their findings on the legislation. Some witnesses could not appear because they did not have time to prepare their presentations. The government side still forced the committee along.

Why is it so urgent to pass this bill which will not give one penny more to those Canadians who need it most? In the next year we are expecting an election, which could come quite soon, and in the month of January through to the rest of 1993, the benefits available to Canadian families will be slightly larger than they are now. This is nothing more than a cynical ploy leading up to the election to persuade Canadians that they are getting more when once the election is over they will begin to see their benefits erode as the impact of the deindexation will take place.

In closing, and dealing with this aspect of the amendments suggesting that the whole child benefit package should be dispensed with, it is worth pointing out that all of the witnesses working with children and all of the academics working in social policy areas who appeared before the legislative committee advised the government to withdraw this bill and start again.

Not one change has been made. Not one change of approach, change of attitude or change of heart is indicated on the government side in spite of the fact that all those working and knowledgeable experts in the field have advised the government that this is the wrong way to go.

If this government did care about children it would have listened to those witnesses and it would have changed its mind.

Throughout the period during which this House has discussed child poverty, we have had witnesses come to committees and one in particular asked a question which was unsettling to everyone and it is a terrible indictment on this country and on this government. The question I have in mind is that one of the witnesses at the subcommittee on poverty asked why this government hates children. Why indeed?

Mr. Walker: Madam Speaker, at this point in the debate we move away from the general criticism of what is wrong with this bill. We do hope that the House accepts our motions presented earlier in the day, that is to say, to delete this bill from the legislative agenda.

I somehow doubt whether the government is willing to face the truth of the weaknesses within this bill and it will carry on in a slavish fashion to support the wrong piece of legislation and the wrong approach to dealing with child poverty.

The four motions I am presenting to the House right now, along with my colleague from Cape Breton Highlands—Canso are motions in which we have tried to deal with some of the fundamental flaws in this bad piece of legislation. In particular, in Motion No. 28 we ask that the government, in clause 12, strike out lines 32 and 33 at page 12 and substitute a different formula.

This may sound very dry, very boring and very esoteric, but the heart of what the government is doing and what it is doing wrong is found in this particular clause; namely, that it is setting in the famous 3 per cent solution every year for the recalculation on July 1, which accepts that the first 3 per cent of inflation does not apply to any change in benefits or in thresholds.

The government has a short memory. In dealing with another important client group, the opposite end of the age structure but not the opposite end of the need structure, seniors, several years ago a woman from Montreal travelled to Ottawa to tell the Prime Minister personally: "Goodbye, Charlie Brown". I am sure if the kids across Canada could get themselves equally well organized and if they understood the stealth with which they are being dealt, they would come to Ottawa to say to the Prime Minister: "Goodbye, Charlie Brown".

I was struck by the contrast today, and I must be very direct with this, that in this party and in the whole House we are thinking about the contributions of Paul Martin to the social policy fabric of this country and how over the last 47 years the framework which he developed as minister has done a service to many Canadian families, albeit small, but nevertheless a service to so many. As we can say honestly, every Canadian family since 1945 to the current year has benefited in some way from the benefits struck in that original deal of family allowances.

Also, ironically from the same city with the same commitment, a few months ago we were saddened by the passing of Senator David Croll who also committed his life to social policy and justice.

I wonder how they would have participated in the House of Commons and in the Senate and in a debate as fundamental to the structure of government and the structure of a society as this.

In this government the only contribution made by a representative of the minister of health, the minister of the government in this debate, has been time allocation. If we stop and think about it, the only time a minister of the Crown has participated in the debate was to announce that the debate is about to end.

Compare that with the lives we have honoured in the last few months in this House for what they saw as the role of government. In those two patterns we saw the differences in the approach and why Canadians do not trust the government. In this package are the elements of the good things that we need to do on behalf of the children.

In Motion No. 28 we asked that the House remove the 3 per cent solution and recognize the slow but steady erosion and value of benefits. Although this year we are very close to the 3 per cent limit in inflation, historically speaking a 3 per cent insert in the legislation compounded would cause over a 30 per cent decline in true benefits for families in the next decade. That is an enormous amount in terms of real dollars. Any economist will tell you that is a slow, steady and sure way to erode the buying power of families dealing with children.

That is one of the anomalies. Starting on January 1 next year there will be what looks like a new benefit. On July 1 it will be reduced downward before Canadians get used to it. This is one of the interesting ways the government steals from people while appearing to be giving to them. I do not think it is a misuse of language. In the social policy community and in reports done annually by Carleton University, a group of academics has made a good contribution to this debate. It talks about social policy by stealth, by the fact that a little is taken away each time.

It was interesting to hear government members defend this piece of legislation. They have not read it very carefully but they are trying to defend it. They are not recognizing the fact that $3.5 billion has already been taken out of the system. That is a phenomenal amount of money which groups, individuals and provinces are trying to replace. It is in that context that we cannot be generous in our response to this legislation because it does not acknowledge the money that has already been taken out of the system.

Motion No. 29, dealing with clause 12, as well as Motion No. 30, dealing with the same clause, extend the period in which individuals can inform the government of changes in their status, either by death or separation. It is a small point but one in which we wish the government should be more flexible in its review of the legislation. Many times people's circumstances can be very traumatic and they do not get around to making changes until later than we think they should. On the other hand, there is no doubt that once a deadline has passed, you get into a legal system and you are too late and it causes complications. Why not extend the period for 23 months? It will capture those people who for whatever personal reasons were not able to get things together at first and at the same time not cause tremendous wrangles.

Motion No. 31 deals with what I think is one of the most controversial and dangerous areas of this legislation and one which we have asked the government privately and publicly to address. As has been debated several times by all parties in the House, this legislation does not deal directly with those people on social assistance and it does not deal with federal-provincial relations in the field of social policy.

When the amounts start being delivered on a monthly basis, there will be a great deal of concern among a lot of the advocacy groups that this money will be taken into account by provinces and municipalities. Instead of moving closer to national standards, which the member quite properly referred to in a recommendation coming out of the subcommittee on poverty, we run the risk of moving away because we have not given ourselves an institutional framework for guaranteeing that there will be no cutbacks. The amendment in Motion No. 31 proposes to protect families so that the same level exists. There is more than one province in this country, I believe there are at least two, which have different mixes outside of the family allowance package right now. These provinces will be asked to guarantee that there will be no change in the status of the amount of money that people receive by the federal government because of provincial arrangements.

We have been assured by ministers that this has been opened up for discussion. On the other hand, there has been no written correspondence, nothing that has been presented to the House, nothing that has been tabled. I think for those who know the social assistance system, particularly where the media is not watching and the politicians are not watching, there is a tendency to say to people on social assistance: "Look at the whole package that you are getting and there are no guarantees for it, so this is the way we do it in this town. If you do not like it, move on". That has certainly been the case in western Canada on more than one occasion.

I would like to present to the House that it would be a much more positive approach if we had as part of this legislation a guaranteed federal-provincial arrangement whereby the government's guaranteed present and future levels of financing of families will not be changed by this way of doing things. Given that the government has not yet done it, it is one more reason for Bill C-80 to be withdrawn from the House at this time.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to reiterate what my hon. colleague from Winnipeg North Centre has brought to the attention of this House and the importance of being open as a government to constructive and well-thought-out amendments. The amendments are not capricious. They are there to enable a better set of legislative rules and laws so that the people who will be affected particularly as found under Motion No. 28 will not be as disenfranchised as is presently perceived by the government.

I do not know where this whole idea—I call it the deindexation bug—has snuck into the mentality that we have seen in all the legislation that has come down since 1985. It strikes me that in the 1984 Speech from the Throne not only were universal social programs a sacred trust, but the whole question of social justice was at play at that time.

I recall thinking that if the government is going to bring in social justice and if it will maintain and improve the way of life, so be it. The people's voice has spoken and we will see how this government which had a bad reputation—Conservative times are bad times, et cetera—may well be put to rest and we will see a new approach with a new thrust. Certainly little did we expect what we have before us.

That deindexation bug which has been implanted is hidden. It is in a sense, sneaky. I do not like to use words like that. It is very much behind the scenes. It really shows the base of conservatism in a way which I do not know it is what they really would have preferred. It does not show the caring and compassionate society that they would like.

Yes, the first blush may well show that, but in reality it may not take people much more than eight or nine months to recognize that they have been duped once again.

Starting in January at the government's will, people are going to receive monthly cheques, those on welfare and at the low income level. This monthly cheque is going to be a wrap up inclusive of the family allowance that they used to receive, the child tax credit and the refundable child tax credit. A very amazing surprise is going to come in the month of November. Many of these families expect a refundable child tax credit to come back in and they will buy the winter clothes, the needed boots and shoes.

Now that it is all rolled into one, little do they realize that they are not going to get that. It is going to be a very rude awakening, but what I think may be the nefarious planning behind this whole bill will by then be history. It has become a political act and that is playing with the saddest cases in our society.

The reality is that you are reducing, you are draining. It is social diminution of programs by stealth in a sense and it is reduction through the back door. It reminds me somewhat of the GST discussions and arguments that we had that it was not open and above board.

I guess the GST was not open and above board. The fight over the free trade agreement was not open and above board. Now this change to family policy and to social policy, and the changes that are inherent in here because of the deindexation bug has become rather a sick picture in the whole structure.

I just would like to quote what Ken Battle had to say. He is the former director of the National Council of Welfare. He said that the new benefit will be eroded by inflation, but only after the next election is over.

He said: "Welfare and working poor families will go deeper and deeper below the poverty line under the child benefit. The system will leak steadily. Partial deindexation is a fiscally powerful and politically invisible mechanism that allows the government to siphon money from social programs. The child benefit proposals are designed to pretend to fight child poverty".

I wonder, if each and every one of the members of the government recognized and did the figure crunching, in the light of the new harmony that is supposed to reign with the new Constitution, if they would not like to reconsider and go back and consult with their constituents while they are talking about this new Constitution and see if they would not like to realign so that, as I believe the hon. member for Don Valley North acknowledged, we are not dealing with people who are on welfare, the poorest in society. The government intends to do that at another time.

If we are not going to do that now as we are dealing with family allowance, child tax credit and the whole thing, why not do a whole social policy re-evaluation and put it into place at the same time rather than allowing first of all the government to be seen as being cynical and, second, being a disservice to the one million poor children who are out there?

I think that would be a fair assessment, so I would really like to go back to that motion. I hope the government side will agree to vote on the first motion that we debated earlier, that is to put the bill to sleep, to bed, to rest for a little bit and revise and review the undertaking.

With respect to Motion No. 28, which is the deindexation of anything over 3 per cent, just think about it. Your rent is going to go up, your food is going to go up and you are not going to get any money.

Mr. Boyer: What if inflation goes down?

Mrs. Finestone: If inflation goes down, yes. What happens if inflation does not go down?

Mr. Boyer: We are holding inflation down.

Mrs. Finestone: You are holding inflation down, but it can still go up to 3 per cent and you do not get any money, I would just like to remind my friend from Etobicoke over there.

For Motions Nos. 28, 29, 30 and particularly Motion No. 31, I found my colleague's research into the interprovincial disparities, the municipal disparities between the cities across this country, a very interesting and a very disturbing observation.

Think about what the government did with capping CAP with respect to education and social services in Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. We know for certain that the economic situation in Toronto and in southern Ontario has become dramatic. Because you thought you had rich cats and were going to tame them, you put a cap on CAP. You put the 3 per cent in there and now you have people who are suffering for no reason of their own.

Poverty is poverty wherever you live in this country and hunger is hunger. I think there ought to be some very serious rethinking about the discrepancies that are going to be found between people who are moving to look for work, who are trying to improve their skills and trying to get out of the poverty gap so that they can have a decent life. Do you think people like to live this way? They do not but they need a helping hand and this is no way to help them.

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have another opportunity to talk about this particular bill.

First of all, the issue of the inflation protection clause is something that we considered at the poverty committee as well and our recommendation was that the benefits should be indexed to the growth in family incomes.

If you look at it historically, inflation protection in Canada has meant the child benefits themselves have not grown with family incomes. The proportion that families receive in benefits from the federal government has dropped as a percentage of family income.

The reason the department of course has deindexed not only this but the other parts of the tax system as well is in order to give it discretion so that the minister at budget time can in fact allocate funds where he thinks they will have the greatest benefit.

In the case of poor children, since 1985 the government has increased the refundable child tax credit four times and introduced a supplement of $213 for children under seven where child care expenses are not claimed. In fact, poor children are better off as a result of our policies.

It is wrong to say that $3.5 million has been taken out of the child benefits system. That is an artificial calculation which ignores the benefits that have been put into the system and the benefits that have been put into the system have in fact been put in for low income children.

As I stated earlier, the benefits that we are getting through this bill will be directed at the working poor. In fact, the minister is speaking and is having discussions. Indeed, if you look at the recent constitutional negotiations, there seemed to be a consensus of all the ministers in this country that something has to be done to ensure that the poorest of the poor in this country have some kind of standard, a standard that meets the basic needs.

I happen to have a copy of Maclean's here. It gives the example of a woman with two children who gets $486 a month in Nova Scotia from the municipal welfare assistance program. I think that is outrageous in a country as wealthy as this. We have to look specifically across the country and establish national standards.

Clearly it is not as expensive to live in Nova Scotia as it is in Toronto, so you need a system that has sliding scales that base it on the actual costs in a particular community and what in fact is reasonable. I think that is definitely something that has to be a priority.

No society in this competitive global world that is emerging and that is in existence can afford to be directing its resources toward the rich, subsidizing the rich and increasing taxes so that the marginal rate of taxation for work rises higher and higher.

In order to be competitive we have to spend our money better and we have to spend it on those people that need it the most. We are talking about a society in which there is rapid change going on, in which people are going to have to be retrained, in which it is unacceptable to have a 30 per cent drop-out rate.

If you look at those kinds of statistics, it is the poor in this country that are not achieving, that are not participating in this society. We as a society have to direct greater resources toward these people and soon, really soon.

This is why we have the child development initiative which is targeted again toward the very needy and toward the high risk children in our society. I think these are very progressive programs.

I was shocked when I chaired that poverty committee to find the low level of contribution from the opposition. Some of the social agencies that I spoke to were equally amazed at the shallow, shallow reports that were presented, the lack of seriousness with which the opposition addressed this issue. I am not a very partisan person. I have been in politics since 1972 and I was willing to consider anything. But the number of concrete proposals that the opposition brought forward were insignificant.

We had good attendance while we had witnesses, but notice at the beginning of the report I put in the attendance. Once we started to get into the issues and examined them in any kind of detail, opposition members ran for shelter. They ran back to their parties where they could sit on the fence and criticize, instead of helping the children in this country.

I say shame on you. Shame that you have not come up with any concrete and acceptable proposals. Shame that you are relying on old programs that have not been effective, a family allowance that has given amounts of money to high income people and done nothing to address the real problems in our society. Shame.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise again to speak on this bill. I would first of all like to congratulate the member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing for his hard work and effort along with other members in the House on this legislation and the proposed changes.

I find it somewhat amazing that the member for Don Valley North, who has been quite involved in this campaign, says that the opposition parties of this House have offered nothing, and the fact that it is her government that is offering so much to the children of this country.

We have a million poor children in this country. We had something like 25 witnesses before the committee. Almost every one condemned this legislation, said it was regressive, said it was not going to help poverty in this country. Yet the member can stand there and say that her government is going to rid us of poverty.

People in this House have been bragging about how Canada has been named the number one nation in the world, and of course a lot of that is due to our social programs, our social legislation, but this government is systematically removing those programs one by one.

In the city of Moose Jaw we have a food bank, along with a lot of other cities across this country, and every day there are people going to that food bank and a lot of them are children. A high percentage of people using the food banks in Moose Jaw and other areas are children. It is heart-rending to see these things happening, to see families being forced to go to a food bank.

In a country where minimum wages are so low, in a country where the working poor are struggling to survive with many of them living below the poverty line, this government is taking a piecemeal approach to this whole area of social legislation. Other comments made in this House would suggest that we should be looking at our social programs in a broad fashion. It makes a lot of sense, and is, in fact, what we should be doing.

For example, the federal minimum wage is $4.85, or in that vicinity. Someone working at that wage level, if he or she has any size of family at all, is going to be living well below the poverty line. The first thing this government could do is pass legislation so that people living below the poverty line do not pay income tax. Why is it that people living below the poverty line in this country are paying income tax? It is incredible.

They are contributing money to this government that they do not have, in situations where they cannot afford to live themselves. Yet government members can stand in this House and say how much they are doing for the poor in this country. We in this House who live so well, who have incomes that are way above the average, with perks and so on, can stand here and say how much we are doing for the poor.

There is no doubt that social problems in this country are growing and they are not being resolved. Until we take an approach that is going to look at all aspects of social legislation, we are not going to solve the problems.

I have to make a couple of comments because there is some hypocrisy in this debate today. The government is saying that it cannot deal with the economy until this constitutional referendum is dealt with. "Forget it. The economy is important but we cannot deal with it. We have to deal with this referendum".

We can keep the House working for a few extra days and ram through this bill which received a few days of hearings during the summer. It is going to receive a couple of days of debate with closure, yet we cannot deal with the economy. There is something hypocritical about that. Anybody watching this debate will notice the hypocrisy.

This week we are dealing with this bill and then we will deal with the drug patent legislation which will further hurt people in poverty. We are going to increase the period of time of patents from 10 years to 20 years, eliminating the ability for generic drug companies to produce drugs. That is going to hurt people on fixed incomes, seniors and others.

As I have heard often from seniors in my riding, drugs are too expensive. The House is sitting for a few extra days to deal with two pieces of legislation that are going to adversely affect poor people and those on fixed incomes. At a time when the Prime Minister says that we do not have time to deal with the economy but we can take money away from the poor people is nothing less than hypocritical. I find it quite unsettling.

The other comment I want to make on this legislation has been made before but is worth repeating. We have heard the comment about the working poor: "We are helping the working poor". In fact benefits are being given to the working poor as opposed to Canadians commonly called "those most in need", the ones that are not even working.

There are many Canadians who are not working, not by choice but because they are victims of circumstance. We are discriminating against Canadians who are most in need. We are doing it with this bill and we have done it with changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act. That is hypocritical. To encourage this division between people living in poverty is divisive to this country.

In Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, which is typical, we have working poor and people that are most in need. It is not because they do not want to work. Of course there will always be those who will take advantage of the system. Most want to work, get an education and get on with their lives. I see them in my office. Other members see people in their offices all the time who are struggling to get ahead and who simply do not have any options and what little opportunity they do have the government seems to be consistently taking away from them.

It is all very well for the member for Don Valley North and others to stand up and make glowing comments. It is the same as when the government passed the unanimous motion on eliminating poverty by the year 2000. It passed that motion and then completely ignored it. The comments about sacred trusts and helping the poor and that the only thing wrong with this country is the need for jobs, jobs, jobs and the Tory government will correct it are hypocrisy. This piece of legislation shows that hypocrisy and shows this government for what it is.

In closing, I just want to say that I wish the government would take a look at the social legislation and the social problems that exist in this country and do it in an all-encompassing fashion. When the government makes that commitment then we will be getting somewhere. We will be moving to assist people in this country who are less fortunate than ourselves and deserve more than what they are getting.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise again this afternoon to debate this second group of amendments to Bill C-80.

Where this morning I argued with other colleagues that this bill should be withdrawn and that the government set its mind to a comprehensive and thorough approach to improving the child benefit system rather than simply rearranging certain aspects of that system to make them look more attractive around election time, this afternoon I would like to concentrate my remarks on a specific motion in this group. It is Motion No. 28 which was introduced by my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and which I was pleased to second.

Motion No. 28 would amend clause 12 of the bill to replace the partial indexing of benefits under the legislation with full indexing for these benefits. It would do this by removing the minus 1.03 which follows the indexing formula.

Under the present legislation the benefits would be indexed using the ratio of the Consumer Price Index for the two preceding years. The ratio of the CPI would then be subtracted by the number 1.03 which has the effect of reducing the real value of the benefits or the income stream for these benefits over time to those targeted recipients of the child benefit.

I would like to explain a little bit about the CPI because this lack of full indexing of these benefits is one of the most sinister aspects of this legislation. It will erode these benefits over time. It also reflects a pattern which has been employed by this government in dealing with social programs in other areas in the past.

Therefore I would like to focus on this particular aspect of the deindexing that the government is using for this child benefit and which it has used in other places. To explain, the Consumer Price Index attempts to measure the amount of inflation that takes place in Canada or in different parts of Canada. It does this by taking a basket of goods which reflects the consumer pattern of most Canadians and includes such items as food, housing, clothing, transportation, health and personal care, recreation, reading and education, tobacco products and alcoholic beverages, and attempts, on a month to month basis, to estimate the prices of these goods and how these prices evolve over time.

The Consumer Price Index is a very central number which we use to measure inflation and the indexing which appears in pensions and in various other income streams. Over time it is used to attempt to correct for the decline in the real value of income which takes place as a consequence of inflation.

Indexing is very central when it is applied to social benefits in order to maintain the real value of these benefits over time. It has come to be applied in taxes. It has come to be applied in pensions, family allowances and various forms of income which are made available through the government.

This government has been adding a little negative factor to indexation on this legislation and other forms of legislation and programs which involve distributing income or benefits to various Canadians. This little negative factor has been this government's way of allowing what it is nominally making available to those people to whom it makes payments, to erode.

It began this practice very early in its mandate with old age pensions until the government was embarrassed and forced to back-pedal in shame after Madam Denis from Montreal confronted a red-faced Prime Minister on the steps of Parliament Hill. She essentially pointed out to him exactly what his government was doing and how this government was secretly and sneakily taking away the real value of their pensions. It forced the Prime Minister to turn and back-pedal and restore the real value of those pensions.

Since then the government has continued this practice and has been determined to apply it in other contexts. It has placed a cap on certain payments under the Canada Assistance Plan, partially deindexed family allowance payments and applied other clawback features.

Now the government is applying this negative factor to full indexation of child benefits destined to the poorest and most defenceless of our society.

It is doing this to guarantee those benefits will go down over time. If we have a very low rate of inflation they will go down in nominal terms and if we have a high rate of inflation, they will go down in real terms. In any case, they will steadily go down. In the future, the poor who will be receiving these payments will receive less and will be able to purchase less of the basic necessities of life from the income that will be made available to them under this program.

This will happen without any further legislation. This is buried in the legislation.

What does the government gain by insisting this simple adjustment formula be changed in order to have these benefits, which are not very great to begin with go down over time?

The government is asking the poorest members of society to bear the first burden of its efforts to reduce the size of the government and its expenditures. It is interesting to contrast this practice which has become characteristic of this government's way of doing things with another aspect of government policy, registered retirement savings plans. One of the speakers I referred to this morning, Mr. Patrick Johnston, was a witness to the legislative committee considering Bill C-80 this summer. He mentioned the contradiction between the government's stinginess with respect to child benefit payments and the way it has treated the legislation increasing the RRSP limits for those wealthy enough to put money aside to save for their retirement and at the same time receive a very generous tax consideration.

When the government increased the RRSP limits from $7,500 to $15,000 per year, Mr. Johnston reminded the members of the committee this simple change would cost the government billions of dollars in forgone tax revenues because the government provides a tax shelter for those people who make RRSP contributions, which costs the government tax revenue. Beginning in 1995, the amount is some $10.7 billion annually. The whole child benefit program is not even going to be half that, yet this government is chipping away from the beginning on the real value of those incomes.

There is an anomaly and a contradiction in these two facts which speak volumes about the philosophy inherent in this government's approach. That is why we would like this government to approve the full indexation of this formula, eliminate this tag and accept the motion that has been proposed by my colleague to allow the full indexation for these benefits at least to be made.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Madam Speaker, I believe I have about five minutes.

I would like to read into the record some comments that have been made about Bill C-80. These are comments made by so-called third parties when they appeared before the legislative committee. I think it is important to read some of the statements into the record because it is quite easy for government members to go around and say: "Do not take comments from the opposition on this side of the House seriously. After all, it is just politics and they just oppose for the sake of opposing". That is hardly the case.

Take, for example, what Patrick Johnston of the Canadian Council on Social Development said before the legislative committee:

> I believe one of the real shortcomings of the bill is that it does not recognize the insidious damage that has been done over the last several years to the range of social benefits because of our failure to index them fully to the cost of living. This is just a seepage year after year.

Here is another one from Martha Friendly of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women. She said:

> We believe this legislation and other government policy initiatives lead us away from the kinds of children's benefits and programs Europeans enjoy, toward which we think we should be moving. It moves us toward the targeted and rather mean-spirited programs of the United States—we argue that Canada's role in the development and promotion of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child should lead us as a nation in the direction opposite to that in which we are moving.

Here is one from Richard Shillington, co-author of the Canadian Fact Book on Poverty. He said:

> The white paper was written, one can only conclude, by people who thought the more you understood the program the less you would like it. I have been doing policy research for a long time, both as a civil servant and as someone who does word research for groups who appear here. This is a new low.

That is pretty devastating stuff. These are not words made by politicians who are perhaps trying to do something just to exploit legislation, to take some political advantage. These are coming from third parties who are neutral, who are objective and who are coming at this in a serious and responsible way.

This is what Trevor Williams of Family Services Canada said:

> —without indexation this program will continue to slip year after year. It may potentially in the future have no real value whatsoever to the families who are receiving it.

To me, that says volumes.

• (1800)

Here is what Michael Goldberg of the Social Planning and Research Council of British Columbia said:

> What we're disappointed in is that the bill and the contents don't meet the objectives the bill is intended to achieve—
> In 1989 the House of Commons unanimously passed a motion to achieve a goal of eliminating poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000. We are unclear how this 30 cent solution contributes to that noble goal.

This comes from Lise Corbeil of the National Anti-Poverty Organization. She said:

> We believe that Bill C-80 is flawed and dangerous—we therefore ask your committee to recommend rejection of Bill C-80. The extra $400 million is little when compared to the $3.5 billion siphoned from child benefits since 1985 when partial deindexing of benefits was first introduced.

It is important those comments be put in the parliamentary record.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

WESTRAY MINE

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, the awful truth about the Westray disaster is that we will probably never know the whole truth about the Westray disaster.

The Nova Scotia inquiry now under way will determine with clinical precision the chain of events leading up to the tragic and horrible blast that killed 26 miners. Contrary to repeated claims by the federal government, federal aspects of the Westray disaster may never be examined by that provincial inquiry.

The Nova Scotia government order establishing the provincial inquiry and the provincial statute authorizing that order specifically restrict the inquiry to matters "in relation to which the legislature may make laws". That means every aspect of the disaster beyond the jurisdiction of the Nova Scotia legislature is beyond the scope of the Nova Scotia inquiry. As a result, many matters within federal jurisdiction but nonetheless crucial to an understanding of the disaster may never get the attention they deserve.

These matters include questions like the following: What information regarding both finances and safety did the Mulroney government solicit, receive and consider before the mine was commissioned? What role did the federal government play in making the mine possible and how were the decisions leading to the investment of taxpayers' money made? What are the federal government's current fiscal responsibilities to the mine, its owners and creditors?

None of these important issues can be investigated by the provincial inquiry. Even inquiry commissioner Justice Richard said that: "I have no jurisdiction as a provincial inquiry over documents outside the province". Yet the minister of state indicated in this House people should not worry about this restriction because the government sent certain federal documents to the provincial inquiry anyway. Oh, frabjous day. The government has forwarded documents, lots of them.

Consider the government itself shows which documents to send. It may send more, it may not. It may respond to specific requests from the provincial inquiry for further specific documents, it may not. It may agree to allow members of the government and of the public service to testify before the inquiry, it may not.

In fact, what the Nova Scotia provincial inquiry may learn about the federal government's role in the Westray disaster is precisely as much or as little as the federal government itself chooses. Put another way, those of whom culpability is suspected will have absolute control over any aspect of the only accident inquiry which may confirm or refute those suspicions.

In place of the age-old doctrine of innocent until proven guilty, the government substitutes the wondrous new doctrine of innocent until guilt is admitted. This is macabre and a shameful affront to the memory of those 26 men whose families hoped for simple truth from the inquiry process.

If there was negligence, let it be divulged. If there is guilt, let it be assessed. Most of all, if there is doubt, let it be resolved. If there is confusion, let it be settled. If there are crucial facts, provincial or federal, as yet in darkness, let them be brought forth to the full and cleansing light of day.

We owe it to those who died. We owe it to the families who mourn. We owe it to the communities of workers in the dangerous industry towns that speckle our nation to discover the truth for it is only the truth that will enable us to take the measures necessary to prevent it all from happening again and again and again.

I again ask the government whether it will now stop trying to hide its own actions behind a provincial inquiry which cannot investigate them and call a federal inquiry which can?

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, the hon. member's call for a federal inquiry into this tragedy is entirely unnecessary.

Both Judge Richard and inquiry counsel have stated they are satisfied with the mandate of the provincial inquiry. Indeed, Judge Richard addressed this question directly in Halifax on June 17, 1992 when he said:

> There are no constraints on my perception of the terms of reference. To reinforce that, I had some input into the framing of the terms of reference.

It is clear that those charged with conducting the official inquiry are satisfied and that alone should address the hon. member's concerns. Since it apparently does not, I would draw to his attention the fact that there are two other parallel inquiries going on as well. The Nova Scotia Department of Labour is conducting an inquiry, as it should in circumstances where there is a loss of life in a project for which it has regulatory jurisdiction. Furthermore, the RCMP is conducting its investigation of this incident from the criminal justice perspective.

If all this is still not enough for the hon. member I would remind him that the government has repeatedly stated its intention to co-operate with both the inquiry and this House to the end. We have tabled thousands of pages of documentation outlining the federal government's role as the financial guarantor for the project.

Indeed, we will continue to review the documentation for further release and officials have been available to respond both to the public and to the media since very early on in this particular process.

This project was regulated, licensed and inspected by Nova Scotia provincial government authorities. It would be an inappropriate public policy and a wasteful duplication of effort if we were to interfere in their jurisdiction. The member's claim that the Richard inquiry cannot look into federal involvement is simply wrong. I know when he realizes that he will withdraw his call for further inquiries.

PERLEY BRIDGE

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Madam Speaker, I do not know if you ever cross Perley bridge between Hawkesbury and Grenville to go to your riding. Many people and members of this House use this bridge occasionally. I can tell you that the bridge needs to be replaced as soon as possible.

In April 1992, I asked the Minister of Public Works a question, but in his absence, the Minister of Supply and Services answered me to the effect that discussions concerning work on this bridge, which involves the governments of Ontario and Quebec and of course the federal government, were about to conclude. In June 1988, four years ago, the then minister, Hon. Stewart McInnis, said that the bridge would reach the end of its useful life around 1992. Imagine the anxiety of my constituents who are wondering whether the bridge will be closed, whether it is safe and so on.

Since then, we have worked very hard. Plans and a prior environmental review show beyond any doubt that the public need have no concern for environmental safety and that a new bridge could be built along the present route.

On May 1, 1992, not so long ago, the minister wrote to me to say that with the change of government in Ontario, in particular, the new deputy ministers had to meet to ratify an agreement in principle on cost sharing, project management and the start date so that our constituents on both sides of the river, in Hawkesbury and in Grenville, could know what to expect. It is well-known that building a new bridge of this kind involves many factors. Many business people who had shown interest in the past in coming to spend or invest in our region have put that on hold pending developments on the Perley bridge.

I hope that the minister's parliamentary secretary will be able this evening to give us specific dates on when this work will begin and everything surrounding the building of this new bridge. In closing, I would like to add that huge amounts are being spent to maintain the bridge and keep it open to traffic. In spite of that, the people who use it are always afraid of going down with it one day. This is practically impossible, because the federal government, which is a good government, ensures every day that this bridge is completely safe for users.

So I eagerly await the response from my colleague, the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, as our colleague from Argenteuil—Papineau pointed out so well, this issue is a concern for the federal Department of Public Works. The minister has mentioned how remarkably the hon. member has worked to see this issue through and we have spoken of it several times.

Of course, the bridge was built in 1931. There have been consultations and studies, in particular on its life expectancy and on the amounts that the department spends to maintain it, almost a million dollars annually. As our colleague pointed out, it is the only bridge on the Ottawa River between Ottawa and Montreal. It connects Quebec and Ontario. As the hon. member said, there have been discussions between the three governments, namely those in Quebec City, Toronto and Ottawa.

Our colleague also mentioned that meetings were held in early May. Apparently, agreements in principle were reached. I think that my colleague will be pleased that the issue is well on its way to resolution, not only on paper but in actual fact. The minister asked me to reassure the hon. member for Argenteuil—Papineau that real results should come within a time frame that will be respected.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, on May 4, 1992, I raised a very important question in this House with the Secretary of State, namely whether the federal government had finally reached agreements with the provinces on the minorities' constitutional right to manage their educational institutions.

Although these are legal, constitutional rights, the provincial governments' political will to implement them is non-existent in many cases.

According to the 1986 census, there were nearly 393,500 school-age children who had at least one parent whose mother tongue was English in Quebec, or French in the other provinces and territories of Canada. A breakdown of this figure shows that Ontario had the most with 34.5 per cent, or 135,600 students, followed by Quebec and New Brunswick. However, Ontario has still not passed legislation giving full control over educational institutions to the minority and thus assuring its young people a French education.

The Ontario Minister of Colleges and Universities, Mr. Allen, told the latest assembly of the French Canadian Association of Ontario, ACFO, in June, that a new agreement in principle between the federal and provincial governments for funding French-language colleges would be concluded. The official announcement has still not been made and I raise the question today, in response to the expectations that Ontario's minority community has already expressed.

In answer to the question that I asked him on May 4, can the Secretary of State tell us today whether he has in fact met with the Ontario Minister of Education and whether agreements on education have been concluded between Ontario and Canada? Have bilateral agreements been signed with British Columbia, for example, or Alberta, Saskatchewan or Manitoba? As we know, these agreements should have been the subject of a fairly important announcement, but they are slow in coming.

Where are we today? That is what I ask the parliamentary secretary. Are the federal government and the provinces still negotiating? Has nothing been signed yet? Has no agreement been concluded to date? Is it possible that, nearly five months after giving the minority groups hope that an agreement was imminent, we are still waiting today?

We are about to go into a referendum campaign; a constitutional agreement was initialed or actually reached in Charlottetown. The francophone communities outside Quebec and the English-speaking communities in Quebec must know the government's position on federal support for education. Is the federal government, which participated in the Charlottetown agreement, ready to say today that it promises to ensure the development of official-language communities in Canada and to help the provinces, which are always reluctant, always hesitant, always lagging behind, to set up education systems made for and managed by the minority? The question is straightforward. I would like to have an answer that is as straightforward and direct.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to answer my hon. colleague. I will try to do so as briefly and completely as possible, with the little time available to us.

We have been questioned about our commitment as a federal government to the concept and principle of two official languages in Canada. I can say categorically on this point that no other federal government has been more attached to this principle than ours, and our commitment remains as firm as in the past. Of course, the other governments also have an important role to play in this field.

In the constitutional debate of the past several months, as the hon. member said so well just now, the federal government's position has remained the same. The Canadian Constitution should contain a clear and precise clause calling on the governments to promote the official-language minorities and their development. We must all do our part, of course. We want the other governments to co-operate, but we have no intention of imposing on them essential responsibilities which are ours as the government of all Canadians.

I now come to the question of lack of teachers in some French-language schools outside Quebec. Our government is aware of the problems in this regard. We have shown our interest by ordering a study on it through the Council of Ministers of Education of Canada. The study by the firm of Pageau, Skuce and Vézina identified some areas where the problems are particularly acute. The authors concluded that an unequal distribution of teachers and not an over-all shortage accounts for the real shortages in some regions, especially in some parts of Ontario and in western Canada. There are also shortages in some specialized subjects like science and music.

The study also shows that the distribution of teachers leads to another problem. Given the local shortages, teachers were naturally brought in from other parts of the country. This can create two difficulties. First, these teachers may not want to stay away from their region of origin for very long. Second, they might be unfamiliar with the realities and cultural needs of the local francophone population.

The government is very concerned with this whole issue, and we are now considering with great interest ways to co-operate in seeking solutions with several provinces and territories, but without infringing on their jurisdiction over education.

TOBACCO PRODUCTS

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, last April I raised a number of issues with this government concerning its lack of leadership in preventing the consumption of tobacco products. Canada at one time used to be the leader in the world in its program of health education, labelling and taxation, as a three-pronged approach to reducing cigarette consumption. However, the government has abandoned its plan to raise the legal age of smoking to 18; it has forestalled its plans to insist on more effective warning labels on cigarette packages; and it has reneged on its commitment to stop the smuggling of Canadian cigarettes back into Canada by the implementation of an export tax.

• (1820)

In looking at the first two issues, we know increasingly from the documentation in other countries, the World Health Organization, and the tobacco industry that they must recruit cigarette smokers before they reach the age of 18. If they do not recruit them before they reach the age of 18, people normally will not start smoking. We are asking that the age be increased to 18.

We have also been able to document that warning labels are one effective method of reducing cigarette consumption. The government has the opportunity to ensure that warning labels are more effective, that they are colour contrasted and are sharp to the eye, but it has backed off on this. It has the power to implement it regardless of whether there has been a court challenge.

I would like to contrast this with what Australia has done. Australia has banned all advertising for tobacco. It has stopped the promotion of tobacco products by all tobacco companies so they cannot promote cultural events or sports events. It has been determined that all of these are designed to recruit youth into the tobacco smoking market.

The same information has been presented in this House by myself based on memos supplied by the tobacco companies about their advertising campaigns being directed to young people below the legal age limit.

The government's flip-flop on the export tax is very obvious. It brought in the export tax. Sales of cigarettes for export, which are basically smuggled back into this country, dropped from 730,000 to 146,000 and then to 252,000 cigarettes a month. The government removed it, saying the companies had decided they would have a way and it jumped up to 958,000 cigarettes and the next month, June, to over one million.

In fact, even in the month of July in which there was a slight reduction it was still four times the amount of cigarettes that it was in 1986 and 100 times when compared to cut tobacco. This government is going to lose $800 million in lost tax revenue because of the removal of the export tax. Provincial governments are probably going to lose a like amount. The World Health Organization has had to revise its figures on the number of Canadians who die each year from tobacco products. Each year, 38,000 to 48,000 Canadians will die from the use of tobacco products. The increase has been caused because more and more women are using tobacco products.

Why is this government abandoning this world leadership? Is it because it is under the influence of that good friend of the Prime Minister, Bill Neville?

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Madam Speaker, I thought my hon. colleague would stand up and congratulate this government on what it has done with regard to tobacco.

As a member of Parliament and a non-smoker today, I could say to my hon. colleague that a lot of people in my area lost their jobs in the tobacco industry. I feel very sorry for them, but I will not smoke for any reason.

We were the first government to do something about non-smoking on aeroplanes. World-wide after six months they all accepted our law on which we are a leader in the industry.

In response to the $8 per carton export tax that was removed on April 8, the Minister of National Revenue announced the additional measure to counteract tobacco smuggling, including the new marking and identification code on products, warning labels, sales limit for duty-free shops, enhanced government industry co-operation, deployment of additional customs and RCMP resources, and higher penalties for smugglers.

At the same time, the minister stopped collection of the export tax, convinced that these measures and the initiatives he had announced on February 12 were a better way to deal with the problem.

I believe that once these measures are fully implemented, we will have largely dealt with the smuggling problem. Of course, putting all these measures in place takes time, and it will take even more time to get concrete results.

This fall, new labels will be put on cigarette packages for the duty-free market. These changes will be implemented gradually during the next few months, starting with the major brands. The new labelling will make it much easier to deal with smuggling on the Canadian market. Tobacco companies are willing to share all information on tobacco sales with excise officials who will then be able to make sure, with the co-operation of the RCMP, that exported tobacco products are delivered only to bona fide customers in the United States.

Officials at the Department of National Revenue are working closely with their counterparts at the Department of Finance. For instance—the hon. member gave a number of figures earlier, but I want to correct them—Customs and Excise officials estimate that in 1991, up to one-third of tobacco products smuggled into this country came from ships and aircraft stores.

The changes announced by the minister in February have had the effect of tightening supervision of warehousing, distribution and sales of these products. The results have been immediate and very conclusive.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately, I will have to interrupt the parliamentary secretary to give five minutes to his colleague. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Adjournment Debate

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise today to continue a discussion started in the House in early May on the question of child poverty. At that time when I asked the Prime Minister a question I became concerned about what had happened in the area of child poverty since last December.

The child poverty issue is one that we are all committed to in this House. It dates back a few years to when all the parties endorsed a motion in a debate led by the former leader of the NDP, Mr. Broadbent, on the question of child poverty. We all made a commitment in this House that by the year 2000 we would be making a full effort to eliminate child poverty.

Subsequently, there has been an incident in which the issue of child poverty has been intertwined with the issue of public relations and partisanship and the momentum of a few years ago has been lost in this House.

I raise the question to remind the House of the commitment we all made and to make sure that the government understands the frustration made at the community level by the lack of action on child poverty.

For example, a simple indicator which is sometimes deceptive but is nevertheless an indicator we should listen to and follow is the number of children using food banks. If there has been one overwhelming shift in our cities since 1990 it is the number of children who have to rely on food banks each month.

When I visited the food banks in my constituency, particularly the one at Knox United Church in Central Park, I was struck by the number of people lining up three hours before the official opening on a Tuesday morning to get food and how many had to bring their children to help carry the food home. It is a tremendous and sad change.

I asked the government to explain why it was not consulting with the stakeholders and why it was not consulting more with the social policy groups that had concerns about Bill C-80 and why it was not discussing this more with the provincial governments. To my surprise, I found that the government could not present to the House what its consultation plan had been nor did it feel that it had to be any more extensive.

Subsequently, we find ourselves in a debate on child poverty without knowing why the stakeholders are so opposed to it and why the provincial governments have remained silent.

I hope to use this opportunity through the parliamentary secretary to get more information as to what the strategy of this government is to deal with child poverty.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I would just like to remind all members that child poverty is a major concern for this government and children are our most precious resource. Anything that affects the children of this country affects all of us.

In the recent budget the federal government proposed a new child tax benefit which is going to consolidate the existing family allowance, the child tax credit and the dependent child credit into a single monthly benefit beginning January 1994. It is targeted, it is simpler and it puts an extra $2.1 billion in the hands of Canadian families. It builds on existing federal programs which total $15 billion annually for children and families. Brighter Futures is another integral step that was recently announced, and within it the child development initiative which is going to address the needs of children at risk. This is $500 million that is going to be put forth by the government.

We will work in consultation—and I am glad my colleague brought that up—with the provinces, the territories, native groups and key community leaders on initiatives that will be specifically targeted at helping young children at risk. We will also be dealing with poor living conditions, ill health, abuse, family violence or neglect.

Canada's action plan for children was another step in Brighter Futures and it fulfils Canada's commitment from the world summit, which was co-chaired by the Prime Minister in September 1990. The action plan for children provides a framework for action for children in Canada, and indeed all around the world.

In February 1991 the federal government made a four-year commitment of $136 million to help eliminate family violence.

Therefore, while social assistance and social services are a matter of provincial jurisdiction this federal government cost-shares eligible provincial expenditures under the Canada Assistance Plan. Annual federal expenditures currently amount to $6.5 billion.

We all have to recognize our duty to find innovative and new solutions to address child poverty. No, the momentum has not been forgotten. Indeed, we are utilizing the financial resources that we have to the best advantage and targeting the children in poverty.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

20TH ANNUAL MEETING OF CANADA-EUROPE PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34(1), I have the honour to present to the House in both official languages the report of the Canada–Europe Parliamentary Association for the 20th annual meeting between the delegations of the Canadian and European Parliaments in Strasbourg, France June 8 to June 12.

I want to comment on page 15 of that report because all members of the House of Commons that attended the meeting from both sides have said that the minister of foreign affairs should look into what is happening at the European Parliament vis–à–vis Canadian trade matters in agriculture and forestry.

Clearly the message to our counterparts in the European Parliament is not being carried. They are not aware of Canada's agricultural policies and stand or its forestry policies and stand.

We urge the minister to get her delegates in Brussels to work with the European parliamentarians so they can better understand Canada's positions.

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

PRESENTATION OF 49TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour this morning to present the forty–ninth report of the Standing Committee on House Management and, pursuant to Standing Order 113(1), this report is deemed to be adopted once it is tabled.

DECADE OF THE BRAIN ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Niagara Falls) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–358, an act respecting the decade of the brain.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce an act that calls on the Parliament of Canada to declare the 1990s the decade of the brain.

This follows a request by the World Health Organization for all nations to recognize the exciting advances made in correcting brain disorders and the need for more research. The bill is designed to focus public attention on this area of medicine and I call on all members of the House to support this initiative.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois) Mr. Nicholson moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

DESTRUCTION OF RECORDS ABOUT PERSONS INTERNED DURING THE SECOND WORLD WAR

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Laval–Est) moved for leave to introduce a bill entitled an Act to provide for the destruction of records concerning persons who were interned during the Second World War.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed to be adopted.

• (1010)

[English]

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I present this bill, an act to provide for the destruction of records concerning persons who were interned during the Second World War. After 52 years, the government and the people of Canada recognize that the persons who were interned in Canada, those whose civil liberties were violated during the Second World War because of their country of origin, are entitled to the restoration of their reputation and their dignity.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present this bill because some of them are still alive, including one who is here today and I am very proud of that as a Canadian.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Della Noce moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed to be adopted.

Bill read the first time and ordered printed.

HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS ACT

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–360, an act to amend the Hazardous Products Act (hazardous displays).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, last year the 18 month old daughter of a constituent of mine was nearly blinded when she tripped and fell into a shoe display rack whose metal hooks projected six inches from the peg–board.

A search of the database of the Health Protection Branch revealed that six other children have sustained injuries to the eye due to such hooks on peg–boards in stores.

An unsatisfactory response from the store in question prompted us to seek redress to such a potentially dangerous situation. While there is legislation which deals with product safety, there is a significant gap in the legislation concerning display safety.

This bill attempts to close the gap between product and display safety by adding a section to the Hazardous Products Act which would make it an offence to display goods in a manner that is likely to be hazardous to children.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Ms. Clancy moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

REFUGEES

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by many constituents of the Ottawa–Carleton region.

The petitioners are calling on Parliament to ask the government to exercise compassion when dealing with refugees, in particular, those from Somalia and other countries around the world which have civil problems as well as suffering difficulties. They are asking the government to use as much compassion as possible.

PROUD TO BE CANADIAN TOUR

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would like to present to the House a petition circulated by the Kinsmen and Kinette Clubs of Selkirk, Manitoba, in my constituency as part of the Proud to be Canadian tour.

Quite a number of members have presented similar petitions calling upon this House to endorse the strength and pride of our country as being proud to be Canadian and to stress the importance of national unity.

On behalf of the constituents of Selkirk—Red River and in particular the Kinsmen and Kinette Clubs of Selkirk, Manitoba, I would like to present this petition.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present two petitions today on an issue that I have spoken on a number of times in this House, that is the Three Gorges Dam project on the Yangtze River in China.

The petitioners, 100 in number, have asked this House and Parliament to pass necessary legislation to prevent any further involvement by the Government of Canada in the Three Gorges Dam project.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to present a petition regarding the goods and services tax.

The petitioners point out the ludicrous situation in which the goods and services tax is applied to feminine sanitary products such as tampons and pads. They ask therefore that the Parliament of Canada consider removing the goods and services tax from these products.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36. I continue to receive petitions signed by hundreds of my constituents calling upon Parliament to accept legislation designed to eliminate violence against women and children.

They are especially asking for an emphasis on abuser rehabilitation. They want to concentrate special effort on the training of police, lawyers, court workers and judges to help them become knowledgeable about women and child abuse, and to focus public attention on this very important and long ignored problem.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have the responsibility and privilege to present a petition signed by many residents of the ridings of Sudbury and Nickel Belt.

The petitioners point out that the criminal justice system needs to be revamped in light of the violence against persons and the way in which sentencing takes place, the way in which the Parole Act is applied, and in light of the whole approach to violence against individuals.

Therefore, these petitioners call on the Government of Canada to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and the Parole Act.

REFUGEES

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition to the House of Commons in the interest of the residents of Canada, and particularly from my riding, who wish to draw the attention of the House to the social and political conditions that are so unstable in the world's countries, particularly in Bosnia-Hercegovina, Croatia and Somalia and which are causing heartache and great problems. Thousands of these refugees as well as their families waiting here for them are trapped in a processing backlog. These refugees are suffering personal and economic hardship. Their futures are undecided as they await the slow process. These families are divided and separated for far too long.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the government to step up its actions on refugee cases and exercise compassion in the interests of family reunification, particularly for those from these disturbed places around the world.

JUSTICE

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I have a large number of petitions signed by Canadians all across this country who are objecting strongly to the treatment being accorded to Christine Lamont and David Spencer. They have been sentenced to 28 years in a Brazilian prison and have suffered miscarriages of justice, cruel and unusual treatment in the Brazilian prisons, and discrimination in sentencing and parole.

They call upon the government to exercise the one thing that can bring them back to Canada and that is expulsion. They are beseeching the Secretary of State for External Affairs to request the expulsion of Christine Lamont and David Spencer from this Brazilian prison so they can return to Canada.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have two petitions to present.

The first one is signed by a large number of people, particularly seniors. They point out that under Bill C-22 the price of both new and existing drugs has increased substantially. They call upon the government to not proceed with Bill C-91 and in fact to repeal Bill C-22.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): The second petition is signed by a number of residents from within my own community of Surrey North, particularly a number of prominent people from the Sikh community.

They point out that family class and assisted relative immigrants have historically been an important part of immigration in Canada, and that family class and assisted relatives have persons in Canada who can assist them with employment, housing and the learning of Canadian languages and customs.

This petition calls upon the government to not proceed with its present proposals for the amending of the Immigration Act but to continue to give family class and assisted relatives the first priority for all immigration to Canada.

SENIOR CITIZENS

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to present a petition on behalf of seniors in Canada, but particularly seniors in the Dawson Court home in the riding of Thunder Bay—Nipigon, which I represent.

In essence, of the grants or subsidies they receive they are only allowed to keep $112 per month for the necessities of life. They are asking this government to foster a program.

As a result of the extra added cost they are now facing because of the restrictions being placed on all additional medicare plans and drugs they are asking this government to support and foster a move that will increase the subsidy that is retained by the seniors, not only in Ontario, but throughout Canada.

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition that deals with the inconsistencies and contradictions of the current Income Tax Act.

This is one example. If one has receipted child care there is a particular deduction, but if one of the two partners in a marriage decides to stay home to take care of the children then there is no deduction.

These people find that this is unfortunate and that it needs to be corrected.

They also point out that there are a number of programs that lead to some confusion. They want greater simplification.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my other petition comes from petitioners who ask that Parliament ensure that the CRTC carefully regulate the use of foul language in radio and television programs.

These petitioners believe that it is not necessary to use inappropriate language to inform or entertain, and that quite often it runs contrary to the values they have in their home and to the efforts they undertake with their children.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition from people who deplore the reductions and the cuts to the support of education from the federal government to the provinces.

They feel it is contrary to pleas to increase national productivity and to enhance competitiveness.

They point out that if we are not generous in supporting education today we will pay a big price in the future.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have four petitions to present today on behalf of my constituents of Kamloops, B.C.

The first is similar to the one my friend from Nickel Belt presented. The petitioners point out their concerns about the justice system and the problems attached to it particularly in terms of victims of violence.

They ask that Parliament consider recognizing that crimes of violence against persons are serious and abhorrent to society and that we consider amending the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and the Parole Act accordingly.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is on behalf of a number of residents of the Sikh community in Kamloops who point out that family class and assisted relative immigrants have historically been an important part of Canadian immigration.

They point out that this particular class of immigrants is important because they can be assisted in finding employment and housing and so on much more easily. Therefore they are asking the government to give applications for family class and assisted relatives top priority for immigration to Canada.

PUBLIC SERVANTS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, this petition is an interesting one. It is signed by a number of public servants who point out that the government has failed to follow its own law in terms of negotiating with its employees.

They are calling upon the House of Commons to have a free vote to express its lack of confidence in the government. This is an interesting petition.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, finally I have a petition signed by a number of veterans from Kamloops. They simply raise their concern that current levels of services provided to veterans through the Veterans Independence Program may be under some type of review.

They simply want Parliament to ensure that there is no increase in charges to veterans for board and lodging in institutions or for long-term care.

I see the minister here. I am sure that he will ensure that if there is any problem it will be rectified.

EDUCATION

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I am rising under Standing Order 36 to present a petition duly certified by the clerk.

This petition is signed by over 150 Canadians who are concerned about education standards and how they are handled.

They wish us as a country to be more internationally competitive and want us to have a better skilled and well trained labour force. They are particularly concerned about the 38 per cent rate of functional illiteracy in this country.

These petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament in support of a national education standard in consultation with provincial governments to help rectify some of these difficulties that I have mentioned.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I am proud to rise today to submit a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, signed by numerous Canadians who recognize that the government is moving Bill C-91, an act to end licensing of no-name generic drugs in Canada and an act that will allow brand name drug companies to market their drugs without competition from generics for periods up to 20 years.

The petitioners argue that the price of both new and existing drugs has already increased substantially to individuals and provincial and private drug plans since 1987 when another bill, Bill C-22, allowed up to a 10-year period for no generic competition.

The petitioners call upon Parliament not to proceed with Bill C-91 as tabled. They say that will allow Canadians to have the full benefit of lower priced generic drugs and provincial and private drug plans can better serve Canadians without being forced to charge higher fees and/or provide less coverage.

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition that was circulated by the Kinsmen in Thompson, Manitoba. It is a petition to promote pride in being Canadian and it is to the honourable House of Commons in Parliament assembled.

Whereas it is appropriate to encourage all Canadians to take pride in a united, strong and independent Canada; whereas Canadians are normally a reserved people often concealing their patriotic feelings; and whereas, Kinsmen and Kinette Clubs of Canada have created an opportunity for all Canadians to participate in the Proud To Be Canadian project during the celebration of the 125th anniversary of Confederation in 1992, we the undersigned, your petitioners, hereby support the Proud To Be Canadian project as an opportunity to nurture a positive life-long relationship with our heritage and our flag and to encourage stronger ties among all Canadians for the further advancement of Canada as a leader in world circles and to promote our tremendous pride in being Canadians.

It is very appropriate at this time that this petition be presented to Parliament.

BILL C-327

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to present four petitions to the House, and they are personally gratifying.

These petitioners from across Canada are in support of Bill C-327. It is the employee ownership bill that will be debated for the second hour of the second reading this evening at five o'clock p.m.

The operative clause is that Bill C-327, an act to assist employees to purchase a controlling shareholding in the corporation that employs them, contains amendments to the Income Tax Act which will allow worker tax credits specifically for the purpose of purchasing the companies that employ them.

I think that anyone who reads the newspapers and pays attention to the media would find out that each and every day it becomes a more and more common occurrence that employees are looking to purchase a part thereof or the entire work place in which they work.

These petitions come from Sardis and Chilliwack, British Columbia, from my home riding of Sault Ste. Marie, Thunder Bay and Toronto, Ontario; Regina, Saskatchewan; St. John's, Newfoundland; Yellowknife and Fort Smith, Northwest Territories.

I would encourage the other two parties to support the bill when it becomes votable in the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The House resumed from Monday, September 14, consideration of Bill C-80, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, to enact the Children's Special Allowance Act, to amend certain other acts in consequence thereof and to repeal the Family Allowance Act, as reported with amendments by a legislative committee; and Motions Nos. 23, 25, 26 and 27 of Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing), and Motions Nos. 28 29, 30 and 31 of Mr. Walker.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak on this amendment and on this bill, particularly, after the actions of this government which has imposed as we know time allocation on this bill at report stage.

Time allocation was also used at second reading and will be used, of course, at third reading. This government is very anxious to show Canadians that their word is not to be taken too seriously.

I want to quote the Prime Minister on August 18, 1984: "Universal social programs are a sacred trust not to be tampered with". The family allowance program, instituted by this Parliament, is going to be abolished with this Bill C–80. Liberals believe this bill is flawed and the government should do the honourable thing and withdraw it.

The stated purpose of Bill C–80 is to consolidate three existing child benefits: the family allowance, the refundable child tax credit, and the non–refundable child tax credit.

Instead Bill C–80 will replace these three programs with one single monthly benefit which will begin in January 1993 if the bill receives Royal Assent. I hope it does not. This legislation means the end, as I said, to universality of family allowances.

Canadians were not consulted by this government about ending universal access to this social benefit. One can question the integrity of this government and its word and ask what is next. What is in its mind? Pensions maybe? Medicare? Who knows. Everything in this government's right–wing agenda is up for grabs and can be taken away from Canadians.

In truth this bill is an election ploy, an attempt by the Conservative government to pass off a flawed bill as a positive step toward alleviating child poverty. I want to get to that because we have reports after reports.

I have one here adopted by the Regional Municipality of Ottawa—Carleton and addressed to the Prime Minister dated August 31, 1992. It states: "One in six Canadian children lives in poverty, poor children experience a 50 per cent higher death rate from all causes, health conditions for our aboriginal children in Canada have been compared to those of the Third World, and their average life expectancy is eight years lower than the national average".

Suicide is the second leading cause of death among Canadian adolescents. The high school dropout rate, which averages about 27 per cent across Canada, is over 90 per cent in some areas and among some groups of young people. This is disastrous record. An estimated one in four girls and one in ten boys is a victim of sexual abuse. It goes on and on and on.

There is no child policy with this government. There is absolutely no heart for the problems that are at this time striking our youth, our young people.

I do not have much time so I will just relate some of the problems with Bill C–80. For example, the government says these changes will increase assistance for children over the next five years by $2.5 billion. Nonsense. One should ask how much child benefits would have grown without these changes. Between 1986–87 and 1990–91, family allowance payments grew by $275 million and refundable child tax credits by $750 million. This is smoke and mirrors.

The new child tax benefit will be based on family income as reported in income tax. This means it could take 12 to 18 months for the amount to change to respond to possibly dramatic changes in family income. This could present a serious problem for some families.

Third, the government conveniently forgets to mention that through partial indexation the Tories already took $3.5 billion out of the child benefit system between 1986 and 1991. In five years $3.5 billion has been cut from family benefits. The benefit is indexed only for the part of inflation exceeding 3 per cent. What will the government do to ensure that the value of the child tax benefit does not erode through further inflation? Nothing. It is heartless.

For women who receive low salaries or work part time, this bill means that after paying their work expenses and day care that they will probably make more money staying home. This type of incentive is a step backward from the right of women to work and to economic independence.

These measures in Bill C–80 offer very little to middle class families. A two–earner family with an annual income of between $30,000 and $40,000 will receive additional benefits of less than $4 a month. With inflation at 3 per cent a year, this benefit will disappear within a year.

Canada's poorest families who are on social assistance will receive absolutely no benefit from this measure. There are 2.5 million Canadians now on social assistance.

Furthermore, C–80 is far from being adequate compensation for the government's callous abandonment of its promise for a national day care program. Where is that program which was promised in the last election? That is another one of those commitments that was not kept by this government.

Let me quote the reaction of various groups to the new child tax benefit act, Bill C–80. Gerard Kennedy of the Canadian Association of Food Banks called it "the most deceptive and cruel thing coming from government that we have seen in a long time. It is a tremendous blow to the hopes of low income people". Sue Wolstenholme of the Canadian Day Care Advocacy Association states: "Either the federal government still does not grasp the problems of child poverty or child care which Canadian families face or they really do believe that they can trick the public with yet another illusionary tactic".

The government is admittedly and deservedly ashamed of Bill C–80. It wants it passed through this House so quickly that it imposes limits on debate so that people will not get the benefit of understanding this bill, of studying this bill and taking it for what it is worth, absolutely nothing.

The government has forced this bill through the House at second reading, imposed closure and forced it through committee and has forced it through report stage today and tomorrow to get the bill. Why? It is because it is ashamed of this bill. It should be ashamed of this bill.

The government knows that this bill does not address the vast problem of child poverty in this country.

Tory economic mismanagement with unemployment now up to 11.6 per cent has resulted in thousands of individual Canadians being in difficult situations financially and otherwise.

At one time it seemed that the government would take the problem of child poverty seriously. In 1989, remember, the government gave its support to a motion calling for the elimination of child poverty in Canada by the year 2000. Instead, the number of children living in poverty has increased. In 1989 there were 863,000 poor children in Canada. In 1990, one year after, the figure was 1,013,000. That is a jump of 150,000 in a year. We can safely assume that these numbers increased throughout 1991 and into 1992, with layoffs continuing as they are in this country.

Mr. Speaker, you have indicated to me that my time is up. I will just read one last quote from the columnist Leonard Shifrin. This is what Mr. Shifrin had to say: "If there was a Pulitzer Prize for flim–flam, the Tory snow job masquerading as a budget white paper would win hands down. Despite what it seems to say, basic benefits are not really being raised for the poorest families".

In my riding of Ottawa—Vanier there are poor children, there are poor women, there are poor people and yet this government in this measure of Bill C–80 is showing absolutely no sensitivity. It has no heart. We will vote against this bill and fight this legislation.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, this is quite a sad day in the House of Commons as far as I am concerned. I have seen a number of sad days in this House since my election in 1988. Those sad days include many budget days when this government has dealt with programs that affect the quality of life of people in my constituency and across Canada in a very negative way. I have seen days when the government has taken steps to actually remove benefits that Canadians have come to count on to ensure that their businesses, their families and their country can survive.

This day is one that I never thought I would see either as an ordinary Canadian citizen or as a member of this House elected to represent the interests of the people of The Battlefords—Meadow Lake in northwest Saskatchewan.

Here we have a situation where this Bill C–80 will remove the family allowance benefit that has served Canadians since the mid–1940s, nearly half a century, and is now providing some $2 billion of assistance, primarily for families with children. The Canadian people are probably going to get a surprise in January because of this program.

I want to make very it very clear here today that I do not support Bill C–80. I do not support the removal of the family allowance program. I do not support the action the government is taking today to railroad the bill that eliminates the family allowance program through this House.

I know that in January my office will be receiving hundreds of phone calls from Canadians living in The Battlefords—Meadow Lake constituency, wanting to know where their family allowance cheque is for that month.

This summer the government railroaded Bill C–80 through committee stage. It ran this through so quickly that many groups that wanted to speak to it were unable to do so. Those that did speak, spoke strongly against the inclusion of many of the arguments in Bill C–80.

Today we have just gone through a motion to limit the speaking time on this bill, all in an effort to deal with this matter while the country is locked in a debate over the national referendum. If there was any way this government could have orchestrated a clean way of dealing with this bill without subjecting itself to a tremendous amount of opposition from across this country, it has found it in dealing with it this week in the House of Commons.

This is not a bill that will address child poverty, as the government says. We all recognize that one in six children in this country are living in poverty. It is a deplorable situation for young children and youth throughout Canada. It is a comment on the government's economic agenda that has been in place since this government's first election in 1984, an agenda that began with the previous government and the previous government's attack on some of the social programs.

More important, what is happening here is that we are creating a situation whereby we are sustaining the stereotype Canadians have about this place, this institution and about parliamentarians.

When governments take action such as this government is taking on the family allowance bill, railroading it through during the summer and during a period of time when Canadians' attention is diverted elsewhere, it is to sustain the public's perception that this place cannot be trusted, that politicians, Parliament and government are doing things that will jeopardize the ordinary Canadian's ability to survive the daily rigours out there in the countryside. I have known this from conversations with my constituents for most of the last couple of years. It is a process of distrust that began quite some time ago and has continued through this government's use of bringing in the GST, the goods and services tax, at a time when the Canadian people were saying they did not want these additional taxes. The Canadian public has responded by reducing spending in this country and throwing tourism, small business and manufacturing into jeopardy because consumer spending is not there.

People are not prepared to provide any more taxes to this government and they feel the whole tax system is a threat to their ability to earn income and to provide for their families. We see this fear that Canadians have about the security of their income as they respond to matters that relate to pension income, income that is earned in the workplace, the declining value of the dollar that is earned in the workplace, the increasing costs of going to school and providing education for young people, the poor response of governments to crises in the fishery, in agriculture, in the mining and processing sectors and, most recently, the determination of this government to sell the North American free trade agreement to all of us at a time when we are saying that the free trade agreement with the United States has failed us. The government is simply creating one situation after another in which the Canadian people's response is they do not like what this government is doing, they do not trust this government and therefore they do not trust the institution of Parliament or any of those people who are working within that institution.

It is a threat not only to the well–being of Canadians but to the well–being of this institution which we must rely on for generations to come because we live in a democratic system, a system in which we understand the value of representation for the well–being of Canadians. When we throw that system into jeopardy, we are throwing into jeopardy our ability to respond in times of crisis and even in good times for Canadians.

I remember back in 1944 when the Saskatchewan people radically changed the face of this country by voting for and supporting the first socialist government in North America. Tommy Douglas was elected in Saskatchewan to lead that particular government. One of the things that guided Tommy through his years as premier and much of the philosophy of this party was his belief that people do not need governments in good times but they need governments in bad times. What governments do when times are good is prepare for the bad times so that we can sustain and rebuild a breaking and deteriorating economy and programs.

What is happening here is we have a government that did not provide that safety net during the good times. We have had some good times in this country, at the beginning of this government's term in office. Nothing was put away. We built debts and now we are trying to find ways to eliminate those debts by reducing the things that this country needs so desperately during the tough times. Canadians do need government in tough times. We need it in the fishery, we need it in the farming sector. Canadian families need the government during the tough times to support them when they cannot support themselves.

The elimination of the family allowance, the elimination of the tax deduction that is part of this bill and the replacement of it with a program that does not make a whole lot of sense to me or to any of the witnesses who appeared at the committee stage are simply more indications that this government is not prepared to be there to help Canadians during the tough times.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I want to go on record with respect to this bill and some of its amendments because I believe this is a critical piece of legislation that is being rammed through at a time when we are not being given the opportunity to explain it adequately to Canadians.

Some of you will recall this quote: "Universal social programs are a sacred trust not to be tampered with". That was made by Brian Mulroney on August 18, 1984.

It is rather interesting. Clearly universality is no longer a sacred trust. I suspect the Prime Minister would be saying he is not tampering with them.

[Translation]

"I am crushing them and eliminating them altogether." So in a way, he is right.

[English]

He is not tampering with them anymore. He is eliminating them.

People are upset that roughly eight years ago that statement was made and eight years later it is a complete reversal.

There is another thing that is upsetting Canadians with respect to this.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, did you know that time allocation has been imposed 39 times since this government came to power in 1984, and closure 21 times? The government has tried to restrict debate a total of 60 times on key legislation, key issues, questions that are important to Canadians. If we look at the history of the Parliament of Canada, it seems that previously this happened a total of only 10 times, compared with 60 times under this government. These attempts to restrict the speaking time of members in this House are absolutely incredible.

[English]

The other thing that is bothering Canadians is that they see this, although the government has been able to fool some of them as an election ploy. There are time limitations imposed on the debate. We are being prevented from discussing this.

There were a few public hearings during the heat of the summer months. They were limited as well. The government is passing this legislation at a time when people are preoccupied with two major questions: the unity of this country and economic questions that we have never seen before; questions of unemployment, questions of social assistance, questions of food banks, questions of bankruptcies. During that period of time the government is trying to get this legislation through.

Hopefully, with the few minutes we have available to each and every one of us who wants to speak against this bill, we can explain to Canadians what is happening. There has been $3.5 billion taken out of support to Canadian families and $400 million put in. Clearly, that is not fair.

Families living on welfare will not get one penny more. I find that unfortunate because surely they are the families that need the most assistance. There will be one million families that will be net losers. The working poor will get, according to the estimates that were given to me, roughly $42 a month. It was the Minister of National Health and Welfare who said that is was better than nothing.

Yes, it is a little better than nothing but surely it is inadequate because it does not address the needs of children who are living in poverty. It does not recognize that if we do not meet that challenge today, we will have to come to grips with it later at a much higher cost in terms of crime, unemployment, social assistance and frustrations on the part of those Canadians who will feel that they were not given the opportunity to live and grow up in a kind of atmosphere that they could have contributed fully to Canadian society.

There is another disturbing element to this. The old family allowances program is now gone forever.

The new program will be starting at the beginning of the next year. For a period of time, a few months, there will be additional moneys made available but they are not really additional moneys.

That is made to entice Canadians, to make them believe that there is something here that there is not. Why was it done? Clearly, to try to get re-elected. I find this shocking. I find this so misleading that it angers me as it angers a number of Canadians.

I can well imagine that there was another telephone conversation on this item that went something like this:

[Translation]

"We should limit debate. We should make sure public hearings are held in the summer. We should be absolutely sure this bill is adopted when people are distracted by other priorities such as the Constitution, the referendum and economic issues".

[English]

If there was a call made, and there was, with respect to what the strategy would be with the North American free trade agreement, trying to discredit people who would oppose it, clearly there were discussions as to how this particular bill would be pushed, rushed and rammed through Parliament.

It is unfortunate that this is happening because it discredits the government in its efforts to attempt, for example, to bring about a sort of constitutional renewal and to have the question decided with some sort of finality in a positive sense with the referendum.

Some people may ask that since I am from the opposition, what could I say that is anything but negative. I applaud the fact that there are going to be fewer programs because I think there is too much complexity out there.

However, let us not lose sight of the fact that because we made that little bit of inroad on that point it does not address the major question. The major question is what are the needs of Canadian children and Canadian youth? My colleagues have given some of the statistics. I will not repeat them but let me say what third party people are saying about this agreement.

Ken Battle from the Caledon Social Policy Institute said:

> The federal government proposal to change child benefits is seriously flawed—(the proposal) does little in the short term and virtually nothing over the long term to make a dent in child poverty—Clearly this is a pre-election reform—

Sam Snobelen from the End Legislated Poverty said:

> To us it is clear the so-called "child benefit" will be a detriment to the entire country, especially to children, and eventually to seniors.

Joan Smallwood, minister of social services in B.C., said:

> The new benefit is not simple, not fair and not generous.

There is a whole lot more. Professor Shelly Phipps of Dalhousie University points out one of the major flaws that we have not talked sufficiently about:

> Suppose someone experiences a drop in income in January of a year, say 1993. Then they won't file an income tax return until April 1994. But we won't find out that they became poor in January 1993, and as I understand the proposal, they won't receive any child benefits at all until July 1994. So in this extreme case they could be waiting as much as a year and a half—

Citizens for Public Justice said:

> By withdrawing or failing to provide the kind of supports that families need to move out of poverty, the federal government's attempt to alleviate child poverty through the child tax benefit will be ineffective.

The Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto and the Child Poverty Action Group ask why fiscal restraint must come at the expense of families with children.

Lise Corbeil from the National anti-Poverty Organization says:

> We believe that Bill C-80 is flawed and dangerous—we therefore ask your committee to recommend rejection—

She points out that $3.5 billion was siphoned away from child benefit programs and $400 million is being put in.

Trevor Williams, Family Services Canada, says:

> —without indexation this program will continue to slip year after year.

Terrence Hunsley points out that it is flawed. Martha Friendly makes the same point that we are going toward the United States' system as opposed to the European system. Dr. Robert Glossop of the Vanier Institute of the Family criticizes the proposal.

Marcelle Dolment says:

> The Network finds it inconceivable that a government no longer wishes to recognize either the family responsibilities parents assume or their investment in the country, in the human capital that children constitute.

I have made it clear that this bill does not meet the needs of people who live in poverty. It is just an election ploy, and I am not quoting myself but what people who made a thorough study of these proposals have said quite clearly.

[English]

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased today to speak in favour of the motion of my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre.

I also want to commend my colleague on the leadership that he has provided in opposing this legislation. As we know Bill C-80 will create a monthly payment for our child benefit program. It is going to take the family allowance and the child tax credit and they are going to be combined into one.

My party and I have a lot of objections to this legislation. This morning, due to the limited time, I will only be able to touch on probably two or three of these.

First I want to say that this government has made a mockery of the whole legislative process with this legislation. What it has been trying to do ever since it was introduced is get this legislation through.

There has been a lot of objection to this legislation, not only from the opposition parties but from groups and individuals all across this country. Certainly, the government should have got the message when in the standing committee, every group and witness who appeared, except one, were opposed to this legislation. There were a lot of groups and individuals that the government did not even give the opportunity to appear before the committee and speak on this very important legislation, which will bring about profound changes in this area.

The Conservative government controls the committee and it, as I mentioned, allowed interest groups very little time to prepare. When they requested more time to prepare to appear before this committee they were refused. The government cut off the number of individuals in groups who could appear before the committee. After the presentations had been made they only allowed one hour of discussion on this important legislation. It really makes one wonder whether the government is really interested in hearing from groups and individuals, whether it is really interested in getting constructive and positive input into this legislation that we have before us. I know that the Canadian people expect better than this from the government, especially when it comes to an issue and a concern that is as serious and important as children's future.

Of course we have had glossy brochures that have been put out by the government on this. They say, and I want to quote: "—our future well-being and prosperity depend on our children".

Certainly, I agree with that. Unfortunately, with this program the government is really not looking after the needs of youth and children.

It took the government eight weeks from the time this program was announced to actually get it into legislation. Yet, the government only gave the committee studying this legislation eight days to hear from witnesses and groups interested in stating their views and in debating the bill. I am told that there were 10 social groups that asked the government for a little more time to prepare their briefs, and the government absolutely refused. I think that is very unfair. These social and interest groups in this particular area deserved to be heard. They have a lot to offer, a lot of constructive, good input to make on this legislation. However, obviously the government is not interested in hearing how this legislation could be improved or how this House of Commons could bring in a program that would better meet the needs of our children and our youth.

Across this country social groups—people who are involved in this area, are experienced in it and have the expertise and that know—have been very critical of this entire package and they have been critical of the government for not giving them adequate time and opportunity to study and debate this legislation. That is very unfortunate.

I served as minister of health and social services in Prince Edward Island and I always found that social groups and interest groups in this area had a lot to offer.

I believe the government has been very unfair in saying no to these people.

I want to quote the executive director of the Canadian Council on Social Development. This legislation will introduce "some of the most profound changes to Canada's income security system that have been contemplated in recent years—As a result, they require far more serious and broad debate and discussion than a surprise two-week process in Ottawa would allow".

I feel that the government has been very unfair and I have stated why. I am not the only one I just quoted the executive director of the Canadian Council on Social Development.

Another group that has not really been adequately consulted is the provinces. This is despite the fact that 11 first ministers agreed in March of this year to form a partnership to work together on income security issues.

Despite that agreement, the federal government is just charging right ahead. It is paying lip service to this arrangement, but certainly there are a number of provinces that are opposed to this legislation and the government is really not listening.

I have a lot of other points I want to make on this subject. Mr. Speaker, I know you are signalling me that my time is up. Maybe later on third reading I will be able to put my other concerns about this legislation on record.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to participate at report stage. I would like to comment on some of the amendments.

Listening to the debate I cannot help but be amazed by the perspective shared by some of my colleagues opposite who think that our society is frozen in time and that nothing is ever supposed to change, when in fact society is constantly changing. The dynamics—especially in the 1990s it is so obvious the way the world is changing. There are all kinds of things changing, yet it seems that social programs in Canada, rather than being responsive to the needs of Canadians, are supposed to be static, frozen in time and never change.

I find that rather an interesting concept because I really think that it is dissonant with reality. I just put that forward as a general observation.

I listened with great interest to my hon. friend for Malpeque who served with great distinction as minister of health in Prince Edward Island. I was waiting to hear some of her substantive points but I found she spent most of her debating time discussing the amount of debating time that was available instead of getting on with it. I would have liked to have heard more of her substantive comments on the bill.

However, that being as it is, I have to say that it is my impression from the constituents that I represent and from what people tell me in Nova Scotia that one of their greatest demands of government today is that it use whatever money it takes in taxes efficiently and wisely and in the most expeditious manner.

I find it hard to believe that my hon. friends opposite continue to be mired in the belief that people like J. D. Irving need family allowance for their grandchildren. He is one of the people who is supposedly going to be hurt by this bill because he will no longer have family allowance for his grandchildren. When Eric Lindros gets married and has children they will probably not qualify.

My friends opposite think this is a heinous, villainous and Draconian thing. With respect, I do not think that is the case. I think that the demand and the expectation of Canadians is that those dollars will be used for the benefit of those Canadians and those Canadian families who need them. That is precisely the purpose of Bill C-80 and that is precisely why this change was so positively greeted by the Canadian public when it was announced in the budget last February.

All this talk about the sacrosanct nature of universality is just so much hog-wash and is not really relevant. The important thing is that programs respond to the needs of the times and that programs exist to support the people who need that assistance.

One of the things that has amazed me during my short tenure in this place to date is the fact that one is not obligated to speak the truth but one is not permitted to call another member to account for failing to speak the truth. Of course, I will cast no aspersions, but I must make reference to the fact that a number of members have talked about $3.5 billion being allegedly taken out of the system through partial de-indexing. That is an extraordinarily misleading piece of information.

It is most regrettable that members would throw out a figure like that, which is certainly at odds with the truth and certainly ignores the fact that up to now since this government has been in it has increased the refundable child tax credit four times and has also introduced a supplement of $213 for children under seven when the child care expenses have not been claimed. Therefore, that figure is extraordinarily erroneous and would certainly mislead anybody who did not have an opportunity, as I have just provided, to become familiar with the facts of the situation.

I would also point out that Bill C-80 is going to increase child assistance by $2.1 billion over the next five years, and 80 per cent of those funds—

Mr. Samson: And not one cent for the poor.

Mr. McCreath: —and those funds will go to 80 per cent of the families, the families with the low income. With all due respect to my hon. friend, he is absolutely incorrect. The low income Canadians will be the principal beneficiaries and will end up receiving more money as a result of this measure. That is why the government has introduced it and that is why it is going to be welcomed, as it has been, by Canadians.

Similarly, Motion No. 25 calls for the elimination of the earned income supplement. That is not a complicated issue at all. The intent here is that it is the belief of this government, a belief obviously not shared by some of my friends opposite and I know not shared by the current Government of Ontario, that there should be incentives and encouragement and that nobody should be disadvantaged for trying to get out of the rut of welfare and back into employment. The intent of the earned income supplement is to ensure that there is no loss of income for somebody who does return to the work force and wishes to move ahead in life.

Indeed, my hon. friend from Ottawa-Vanier made reference to the fact that single women would be disadvantaged when returning to the work force. I believe he said they were single mothers. The point remains that the earned income supplement addresses this problem specifically and assists people to move back.

Moving back into the work force not only affects one's income, it affects one's self-esteem, sense of productivity and a lot of other things. I think our social safety net should be there to assist people but at the same time it should provide encouragement and opportunity for people to become productive members of Canadian society.

In conclusion, I think that it is important that the facts of this bill be known. It adds $2.1 billion to federal child benefits over the next five years. More than 80 per cent of Canadian families will receive these benefits. Two-thirds of all the families in Canada, 2.4 million families, will receive higher benefits. They are targeted at lower-income families. The system is going to be responsive. It has been well received by the Canadian public.

I respectfully suggest that my hon. friends opposite take their heads out of the sand and listen to what the Canadian people are saying. They will welcome this progressive measure that has been introduced by this progressive government.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, those previous comments almost leave me speechless, but they certainly beg some sort of appropriate, sensible, rational and compassionate response to that kind of nonsense.

Hard times have demonstrated how easily we sacrifice the care of the young, the old, the sick and the helpless. The fragile state of social order and tolerance cannot withstand the pressures of mass unemployment and growing economic disparity. The smug assumptions of our peaceable kingdom depend more on recent prosperity than on our long-term history.

I think this government is out there polling each and every day. It does not tell us the results but it is out there polling. I think it finds out that it is fashionable and almost popular to do this sort of thing. It can attack the watershed of social policy in this country and get away with it because times are tough. Where does one go when times are tough? One picks on those people least able to respond in any sort of organized fashion. The bill is cynical and the timing is even more cynical.

I am reminded of Christmas in 1989 when the last watershed was breached. That was the initial attack on universality in this country. It was the clawback provision. It was done for Christmas. It was a Christmas present for seniors and families that received family allowances across this country. There was a great desire to get it done quickly.

Here we are now sitting and discussing a referendum bill in Parliament that the government wants urgently to get through. Why, Mr. Speaker? It is because it is extremely unpopular despite what the polls say.

Our social safety net includes unemployment insurance, universal old age pensions, maybe someday a national day care program and also, in this hostile climate, family allowances. It is the product of many factors: our history and heritage and our need to huddle together against the cold. We are a scattered people who are thinly spread across a forbidding landscape. There are not enough of us to entice private capital to establish the institutions that in other societies define a nation and tie it together. Instead, we have used public capital.

Canadians are noted for what they have. The longer this government is in power we will be noted for what we had. If one was going to target a group, one would think that one would not target the poorest of the poor. One would think that one would not compare one level of poverty with another level of poverty. One would think that if one was going to target a group to assist the lower levels on the economic scale that one would attack the wealthiest of the people in the country to access the riches. Canada is a country that now is regarded as having one of the highest concentrations of wealth in the world. It does not seem believable, but statistics prove that in fact it is. More and more wealth is in the hands of fewer and fewer people.

We talk about priorities a great deal in Parliament. We talk about $4 billion helicopters that we may or may not be able to land, but that perhaps is not the issue at this point in time. Surely, the allocation of funds could be more appropriately allocated than with this kind of decision making.

There's the cap on CAP for the so-called wealthiest provinces: Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta. That accounts for 29 per cent of the debt accrued by the Ontario government. We are criticized for caring and for responding to the needs of those people, but we are all having to pay. The federal government is washing its hands of social programs in this country. They are eroding them.

There was a discussion or a consultation paper in January 1985. I know this government was around at that time. It said that the concept of universality is a keystone of our social safety net. Its integrity must not and will not be called into question.

I appreciate that times have changed and there are dramatic things happening around the world and in this country. However, if something is a cornerstone it is a cornerstone. It is not something to peck away at or take away from so gradually that people may not understand. That leads me to the simplicity. It says it wants to simplify the system. I defy you to read the government brochure on the child benefit and attempt to understand it. It is nearly impossible. It is not simplistic, Mr. Speaker.

The government is going to spend $500,000 to inform Canadians as to what it is doing. I suspect it would be better spent on the people who require these funds. It is spending $1.8 million on the NAFTA agreement. This is ironic at best and tragic at worst.

When one pits group against group, even though not intentionally, the middle class may look at this and say it does not have any great inclination to involve itself in this debate at this point in time. However, they shall soon be affected. It is like the clawback provision. Since it is not indexed to inflation, sooner or later we will all get caught and it will be too late to turn back.

This is a watershed and a most unfortunate one. It is most unfortunate that it is being debated at a time when the very future of the country is at stake. It would otherwise receive much more attention from everyone, especially those most affected by this particular bill.

I am fearful that the government's course is one of Thatcherism, Reagan's economics, or, worse still, similar to that of the governor of Michigan, John Engler. He made a campaign promise and he followed through. One day he said that he would cut everybody including all single parents. There would be no more social assistance.

Immediately in the city of Flint, 83,000 people were put on the streets. Governor Engler said get a job but anyone who knows anything about Flint, Bay City and Saginaw, Michigan, there are no jobs. People are living on the streets. They are dying on the streets.

Under Mr. Engler's scheme, under the guise of saving money, the people's safety net probably will not be a money saver. He pulls a study of Mr. Hollister pointing out research that shows if 5 per cent of those who are cut off end up in prison, another 5 per cent end up in mental institutions, the state will pay out more than it saves.

Cutting people off was not an economic decision, it was an ideological decision. I believe that is why this government acts in the way it does. It is more ideology than good sound economic sense, especially for those among us who can least afford this kind of backward legislation.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I rise to join in this debate and I am angry, frustrated and disgusted.

Today I listened to my hon. colleague and fellow Nova Scotian from the South Shore and earlier I listened to comments by the hon. Minister of Veterans Affairs. I realized that both of these hon. gentlemen have the wrong end of the stick in this whole debate.

They both made allusions, one in a speech and one just in a comment earlier, to wealthy people. They both used the same family which happens to be one of the wealthiest families in our region of the Atlantic. Should those people or should their children be getting the family allowance?

It first of all shows a total misunderstanding or lack of understanding of the principle of universality and why the principle of universality is a good one, but I am not going to get into that at the moment. It also shows a misunderstanding of the way the family allowance in particular has worked.

There has been so little time for this debate. One is reminded of the quote from MacBeth about the murder of Duncan: "If it were done when 'tis done, then 'twere well it were done quickly". This is the murder of the principle of universality. It obviously falls into the same category.

One of the things that has been missing in this debate is the question of the women who receive the family allowance to use for their children. I have gone to a number of meetings over the past several years with colleagues from the New Democratic Party and the Conservative Party, with women's groups representing women who stay at home. The Conservative Party in particular has always been a great champion, allegedly, of women who stay at home.

I am talking about the fact that if we are going to have universal accessible child care, for example, we must do something at the same time for women who stay at home, et cetera. Those of us who worry about the social programs affecting women in the work place, the economic programs, are somehow forgetting about women who stay at home. That has been a charge that certainly has been levelled at me and at other women on this side of the House by women and men as well on that side of the House.

It is time to turn the glass on this legislation in that context. I would ask my hon. colleague and friend from the South Shore and his other colleagues to think about this. I see the minister is no longer with us.

Some years ago a challenge to the universality of family allowances mounted in my own party. This was before I became a member of Parliament. I am happy to say that under the combined championing of the hon. Monique Begin, the hon. Céline Hervieux–Payette, the then senator Lorna Marsden and a number of women in the Liberal Party, we beat down that challenge to universality. Would that our colleagues on the other side of the House had had the same luck.

One of the things I learned in that battle some nine to ten years ago was what the family allowance cheque means to an awful lot of women in this country. It does not just mean something to single mothers or low–income women. It means something to women who live in the Rockcliffes, the Rosedales and the south ends. It means something to the women who live in Shaughnessy and British properties. It means something to the women in Westmount. In other words, it means something to women who happen to be married to men who are wealthy.

If my hon. colleagues on the other side learn nothing else from this debate, maybe they could learn for once that women who are merely married to men who are wealthy do not by any means de facto have access to that wealth.

I know of women in every one of those neighbourhoods that I cited here today who have saved the baby bonus cheques sometimes for years to get out of violent situations, miserable situations, to save their lives and protect themselves. That is just one aspect.

My colleague from South Shore is laughing. Perhaps it does not happen in his riding, although I know differently. Perhaps he does not have personal knowledge of that but I do and other women in this House on both sides have knowledge of that.

The money is not going to Mr. Irving or Mr. somebody else. The money is going for the benefit of the family and for the benefit of the women and the children in the family. How well do you know each individual? How well do you know a family that may be listed very highly in Dun & Bradstreet corporation or in a financial listing? Does the hon. minister who just made a crack, the hon. President of the Treasury Board, really know what every individual wealthy family in this country is like on the inside? Does he really know and can he stand in his place and say that women who happen to be married to wealthy men do not live lives of quiet desperation? It is merely a small point but it is one that means something to women in this country.

If this government had any commitment to a sensible and fair tax system, we would not have this kind of foolishness emanating from it. Every time it takes the wrong end of the stick or, should I say, the wrong end of the horse. That is what it is taking here.

It tries to sell this to us by telling us that there are more benefits for low income families. There are not. It is wrong. The experts will tell you there are not more benefits. It will try and tell you that there are more effective benefits to those in greatest need. That is wrong too. It tries to tell you that it will make the child benefit system simpler and more responsive.

What the government effectively wants to do is what it has effectively wanted to do to this country since the day it took office in 1984 and has been putting upon the people of Canada ever since. That is a systematic and deliberate attack on the infrastructure and the social safety net of this country.

The time has come when Canadians are standing up from St. John's to Victoria and saying they will not have it. They will not have it in South Shore. They will not have it in Moncton, New Brunswick. They will not have it in the province of Quebec. They will not have it in Wild Rose and they will not have it anywhere in this country.

When that glorious day comes when the people of Canada can tell this government what they think of these ideas with regard to the sacrosanct sacred cows that they have dealt with, the government will know.

I will mark the hon. member's words and I also know how people will be marking their ballots on the South Shore. God help us, I cannot wait for the day.

We look at the child benefit program. We look at the history of the family allowance in this country. We look at the fact that in the 1930s when these programs came into being, they were brought about because of the greatest economic depression that the North American continent had ever seen.

We are living through a period of the second greatest economic downturn that this country has ever seen, and we are living through it because of the fiscal policies of this government. That is the answer.

My colleague in the New Democratic Party talked about Thatcherism and Reaganomics. These are the same things being practised by this government and that is why this country is suffering, that along with a misnamed free trade agreement.

Government policy has caused the hardship in this country. Canada survived the Dirty Thirties because of social programs. We are surviving now because of social programs. If this government keeps it up, we will not have this safety net and Canada as we know it will not survive.

It is sad that the primary attack of this government is against the women and the children.

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, the effect of the motions being debated here today would be the outright cancellation of the child tax benefit.

In this respect, I am not quite sure if my hon. colleagues understand the implications of their motions. I am surprised that they would want to take away a $2.1 billion increase in child benefits. This is particularly perplexing since most of the money would be directed to low income families.

Are they trying to save money on the backs of low income families? If so, I fervently disagree.

I believe that if we were to adopt these motions, we would be giving up an historic opportunity to enrich child benefits and to improve the way they are delivered. Accordingly, let me take a moment to remind the House what this bill is all about.

I am a firm believer in the redistribution of scarce resources for the general benefit of all Canadians, particularly our children. It is a Canadian tradition of which we should be rightfully proud. It ranks high among the reasons why Canada is regarded by many as the best place in the world to live and to raise a family.

However, I also believe that our social programs have been strong and effective only because they have been amended and reformed over time to meet the changing needs of our society. That is why I strongly support Bill C-80. It will replace the traditional, and some may say antiquated, child benefit programs with a modern, fair, responsive and simple system.

Let me explain. For almost a century the Government of Canada has provided direct financial assistance to parents to help with the care and upbringing of their children. Over time, the benefits have evolved into a patchwork system which includes family allowance, child credit and a refundable child tax credit. This patchwork system of benefits is not sufficient to meet the needs and expenses of today's Canadian children and their parents. As identified by several national groups and scores of individual Canadians, this jumble of benefits has a number of shortcomings which must be addressed.

For example, Canadians agree that the current system does not provide enough support to lower-income families; especially lower-income working families. Many have expressed concern that targeting family allowances on the basis of individual income is unfair because families with similar incomes may receive different levels of benefits. Others have decried the delays faced by parents in receiving benefits as well the differing sets of eligibility criteria and delivery mechanisms.

The child tax benefit has been designed to rectify these and other shortcomings of the current system. For instance, support to low-income families will be increased substantially. Over the next five years the child tax benefit will provide $2.1 billion in increased child assistance and 80 per cent of that new money will go to families with annual earnings under $40,000. Moreover, the new earned income supplement of up to $500 will help low-income working families offset employment related expenses and a possible reduction in social assistance benefits upon joining the work force.

The child tax benefit will also be fairer. Benefits will be targeted on the basis of family—rather than on individual—incomes. Families earning similar incomes will receive similar benefits. This will better ensure that assistance is directed according to family needs.

The child tax benefit will be more responsive to the current needs of Canadian children and their parents. Under the system now in place parents may face up to a year or more to receive their full refundable tax credit. Under the new system benefits will be provided on an up-front, monthly basis. This will ensure that benefits arrive when they are needed. It will also mean that parents will no longer feel the need to sacrifice portions of their benefits to tax discounters to obtain badly-needed cash.

As well, a family may now have to wait for a year or more to receive a full increase in benefits arising from a change in family status. This could be the birth of a child or the breakup of a marriage. Under the child tax benefit, monthly payments will be fully adjusted following a change in family status.

Finally, the child tax benefit will be simpler. The three different eligibility criteria and delivery mechanisms of the current system will be reduced to one. Payment will be in the form of a single, tax-free monthly cheque. Moreover, payment levels will be calculated automatically and the tax return will be shorter and less confusing. Gone will be the days when parents had to complete special calculations on their tax returns to receive child support. For higher-income families, the repayment of benefits to the government at year's end will also be a thing of the past. In short, the child tax benefit will simplify the tax system and streamline and substantially enrich the government's support for families with children. It responds to the changes urged upon the government by interested groups and individuals. I am pleased to note that it has engendered world-wide support. Thank you for your support, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have a few moments to speak on this bill this morning. There are a number of reasons, the first of which concerns the content or the way it was introduced. In light of some of the comments made here today, in fact in the last few moments, there was an obvious attempt once again at circumventing parliamentary procedure and the purpose of this House.

Before I talk about the subject of the tax benefit I want to recall for the House a comment that was made by a colleague of mine last week when he spoke on the referendum. It was the member for Acadie—Bathurst. He talked about the credibility of the House and the credibility of those people who sit here. What is happening with this bill is the very reason Canadians are wondering why this is still called the highest court in the land.

We have Bill C-80 which talks about the child benefit which was introduced in the 1992 federal budget. It is overhauling, purports to overhaul or will overhaul if it is passed, a system that has been in effect for years. How has this happened? Before I address the content of whether it is right or wrong in terms of content, let me just have a look at the process.

This bill was introduced on June 1 for first reading. It had two days of debate when the government invoked closure on the second reading. It then went to committee. The committee sat, I understand, during the summer under the auspices of the finance committee. There was not even enough time to get expert witnesses to come and discuss the intricacies of this bill so that legislators, members of Parliament, of this highest court in the land could understand what was happening. As a parenthetical comment, every witness except one said that they thought this bill was wrong, unfair and unbalanced. All but one said that.

We are in the House now today for debate at report stage. The report from the government side says that it wants this to be the way it was when it was laid out in this white paper. We are proposing amendments. These amendments should take a week to go through in chapter and verse so that those people whom we serve could know and decide for themselves whether they are getting a good deal or a bad deal.

This is the modus operandi for this government. Look at the number of times that closure has been invoked in this House. My figures tell me it was 31 times since this government came to power in 1984. I am sorry. That was time allocation which essentially is the same as closure. Closure happened 19 times. That is a total of 50.

I was not able to find the records and I was not able to get the information, but I believe it has happened roughly one-tenth as much as in the history of this country since Confederation. This will give you some indication of what the process is and in how much detail this bill is being discussed.

I see the member for Wild Rose is just leaving. I really object to one of the statements she made. She gave all kinds of reasons and I guess she spouted out government-prepared memoranda and documents. One of the statements was: "How could anybody oppose a $2.1 billion increase in this program?"

What she did not say was that one has to measure this against the $3.5 billion that has already been taken out of the child benefit system in the last five years. If she thinks the Canadian public is being fooled by an additional $2.1 billion against a zero background, I want to remind the public that it is $2.1 billion for the next five years. That $2.1 billion is not as much in real terms as the $3.5 billion that was taken away five years before. If I were a bargainer and a gambler I would not call that a good deal.

I am now into the content of this bill. I am not going through what it says because there is no time and other speakers have talked on that subject. The assistance to the poorest families does not increase by anything at all.

There is the the long-awaited national child care strategy. I recall when I was campaigning four years ago that there was a great program introduced by the government that was going to come up with a child care program. As I understand it, it has been completely abandoned and it is creating additional hardship on low and middle-income families, of which I have many in my riding. It is very difficult for single-income families.

I have already spoken about the lack of consultation, but in my mind, in principle, that is the biggest difficulty with this bill. Once more we are reducing social benefits to Canadians and they are not getting the opportunity to hear the debate by chapter and verse as it used to be done before 1984. I could go on.

One of the concerns that I really have is the business of indexation. It can be a difficult thing to understand. It can be an easy thing to understand. Essentially, deindexing will amount to a clawback that in the long term will hurt Canadian families.

I am not sure that we need any more of that because we have had an effect on people in my riding, a reduction in UI benefits, a cap on the Canada Assistance Plan which, while it does not pertain to my province, has a principle involved, a reduction in health payments, a reduction in co-operative housing payments and a reduction in transfer payments to Newfoundland including Bonavista—Trinity—Conception. This means less money for those who need it.

I do not profess to be an expert in the details of this. That is one of the reasons I wanted to be here when it was discussed. I could decide one way or another how I could explain it to those people who would ask me questions. I think I have enough information for that now. I wanted them to listen to the debate.

In the time remaining I really cannot do more than make a few comments on what these few witnesses who came before the committee had a chance to offer. I think the one that describes my feeling about the bill more than anything else is this: "To us it is clear that this so-called child benefit will be a detriment to the entire country, especially to children and eventually to seniors. Therefore, Bill C-80 should be thrown in the garbage can, not passed".

I think my hon. friend from Malpeque would tell me that that is almost a maritime description of something we do not like. I could not find more eloquent words to describe it.

We are in the process of debating our amendments. Our amendments essentially would deal with the deletion of the entire bill. That is first. Second, we would ensure that there would be full indexation of the benefit and of the threshold amounts. Third, we would include possibly a child benefits adjustment board to deal with the response to this problem.

I looked at a case last night and discussed it with the critic in this area. One could go as much as 18 months before an adjustment was made. There are an awful lot of people in this country in particular economic conditions who cannot wait 18 months for this kind of thing.

Finally, our amendments would ensure that the provinces cannot decrease the amount of the proposed benefit. Critics are concerned that a province could cap welfare payments as the new, combined benefits would provide a larger monthly amount to families.

I can conclude very quickly. I am concerned as a legislator that once more I am being cut off from information and I do not have enough time to discuss this with my colleagues on all sides of the House. I am concerned about the closure, I am concerned about the principle of parliamentary debate, and I am concerned that this is a rotten bill and we are being asked to pass it.

I for one will vote against it, and I think that most of the members on this side of the House also will.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I was very quietly minding my own business over here listening to the debate, and I have been provoked into saying something about Bill C-80.

One of the things about this bill that strikes me as important, and it is something that Canadians have to think about—and we have said it time and time again—is that this bill destroys universality. The Tories come along and make this very specious argument that we do not need universality and that we need to re-focus the amounts of money we put into family allowances so that the real needy get money for the raising of their children.

What is at the root of universality? What is the root when we talk about family allowances and children? What we are saying with universality is that all Canadians are responsible for the raising of our children. These are not moneys directed to one group of children or to another group of children. It is not redistribution of wealth that we are really talking about here in this Tory package. Universality recognizes that all the children of Canada belong to all Canadians and that all of us have a responsibility to raise those children.

Bill C–80 is not new. The Tories did not dream this up. This was a Liberal machination.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rodriguez: Absolutely. The Tories are only Liberals in a hurry. I want them to keep that in mind. They are on a fast track to nowhere.

Mr. Merrithew: John, you will never change.

Mr. Rodriguez: The minister says I will never change, but the minister must remember his history. It was Judy Erola, when she was minister, who proposed the idea that we had to get rid of family allowances and destroy their universality. She got into a whole lot of trouble when she made the famous, or infamous, statement: "What contribution do women make who stay at home and look after children?". That was the day that she started going downhill.

This refocusing did not start with Bill C–80 and the Tories. It started over here with the Liberal Party. Therefore, when Liberal members stand up and parade themselves as the greatest defenders of universal family allowances they ought to hang their heads in shame.

Mr. Duhamel: The polls must be really bad.

Mr. Rodriguez: No, I am just trying to set the record straight. We have to put it right there so that Canadians remember Judy Erola, who was a Liberal minister.

Mr. Duhamel: Tell me about the polls.

Mr. Rodriguez: The same Judy Erola, and we are going to hear a lot about patent protection, is the same one who is now the lobbyist for the pharmaceutical association. We have to keep these things in focus.

If we all accept the principle that all the children of Canada belong to all of us and that we all have to contribute it is not enough to go around saying that our children are our greatest resource and that our children are our future. We use children on the back of our loonies. The Prime Minister uses children for photo ops. Children wave their little flags and sing about how much they love Canada. We use children all the time. Yet when we look at what we are doing to them and their parents in this bill and in certain other actions of the government we realize that it is all phoney, that the government really does not like children. The Tory government is anti–child. I want to say that and I want to put that on the record.

How else to describe a bill with the purpose of taking total amounts of money for family allowances and refocusing them so that the neediest get the most, when in fact the neediest do not get more? The neediest are those whose parents do not have work and are on social assistance. We call it welfare.

In this day and age there are all the cutbacks that this federal government has embarked upon, restructuring the economy, the recession that was brought on by this government, and all of the unemployment that has ensued, and the cutbacks in the unemployment insurance program that have forced people onto welfare. We hear the municipalities constantly complaining about the fact that they have to pick up the welfare costs now that all the people who have run out of UI are spinning onto it.

We have seen all of the job losses resulting from the free trade deal with the United States. The neediest of the neediest get not one penny more from this package, not one penny more.

However, those in the $125,000 a year bracket get more. Think about it. As a socialist I have often talked about class politics. It is my bread and butter to talk about working class people rather than the wealthy classes. I have always been told: "Oh, Rodriguez, you are always using the rhetoric of the 1930s. You are always going back to class politics".

Well if ever there is a bill that reinforces class politics it is Bill C–80. It puts parents and Canadians into classes. Those who are unemployed and are on welfare are the poorest of the poor and they get nothing more than they got before.

The working poor get $42 a month more per child. Those up in the next bracket, $40,000 to $60,000, get a little more. Those in the $120,000 a year bracket get more.

That is clearly dividing the community into classes. The government exploits class politics. The Tories are exploiters of classes and they trade off the rich against the poor.

This is the government that started deindexing. Talk about really stamping people down into the mud. It has kept the indexing of the family allowances at 3 per cent. Only if the inflation rate is above 3 per cent will the government reflect it in an indexation on the family allowances. If inflation is under 3 per cent there is no indexation. If it is 2.5 per cent it means that the amount that the poorest of the poor are receiving is eroded even further.

The government has totally reneged on what it had promised with respect to, for example, a child care program. What happened to the child care program of the former health minister, now the Minister of Communications? Where is it today? If Tories really cared about children that is where they would put money. We do not have adequate child care in this country.

We hear all the pious statements across the way about how they are opposed, about how Tories do not like child abuse. Where is the adequate child care program? Where was the program that was promised?

Parliament had a committee. It studied the proposals and it's report is up on a shelf somewhere. This is a government that has no commitment to full employment. If we really want to show respect for children and for people we have to guarantee them a job, not use them as fodder in the war against inflation, stagflation, deflation, rheumatism, in-grown toe-nails and ptomaine poisoning.

If we have a commitment to full employment then we recognize that a person has dignity when they work. They do not really want to get welfare cheques. They want a job. They want a paycheque, not a welfare cheque.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I thank you very much for giving me an opportunity to address the issue, especially after my hon. colleague has waxed so rhetorically and so eloquently from a partisan point of view on an issue that is very serious.

I say it is serious because he did begin on a rational level. That rational level would talk about the basic philosophy that underlies the directions of both this government and governments past.

Speaking of governments past, Mr. Speaker, I hope that you and those who are following this debate in the House will grant me the indulgence of falling into a partisan discussion for a moment because the hon. member who just preceded me has raised a question which must be addressed in order that we put this debate in its proper perspective.

From a Liberal point of view, when we were in government we initiated a series of legislative initiatives for which the member for Nickel Belt takes great pride. As a Canadian and as a member of this legislative body, the House of Commons, he should take great pride in those initiatives which we collectively as a government and as a people put forward.

They have served as a role model everywhere throughout the world and have been duplicated in many other jurisdictions. When he suggests that the government is engaging in some nefarious deed that follows fast upon the heels of a government that collapsed some 10 years ago then he is asking us to stretch our imagination just a little bit too far.

Most important, he does great injustice to the essence of this debate, which my colleagues from this side of the House, from the Liberal Party, have pinpointed with particular attention to the details both in the amendments and in the bill itself.

Those amendments, the essence of those details, address the directions of a government whose philosophy has gone sorely adrift. We have seen over the course of this last session a cap placed on CAP. The consequences of that are now seen in this legislation.

What has happened is that the government essentially said: "We will not assume the responsibility that we had accepted for the health and welfare of all Canadians everywhere in this country", initially under the guise of saying that those residents in provinces such as British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario, those three provinces that do quite well on their own, do not need the financial assistance that a federal government provides as part of its obligation to its citizens.

Nothing could be so silly. The Government of Canada does not subsidize the provinces. What it does is transfer back into the hands of its citizens the wealth which is generated by them and which is there for their benefit.

We have seen as well that the government, in order to facilitate the projects determined by deficit cutting and cost cutting, has attacked those most vulnerable, the seniors. We have seen over the course of these last several sessions the government slowly eating away, gnawing away, eroding the basis of support upon which seniors have come to rely, at a time when they are least productive from an economic point of view, at a time when they would be most dependent upon the state which they had helped to found, to develop, and to enrich, a state and a government from which they are owed at least some dignity, some respect and in the final analysis a modicum of financial support.

In the city of Toronto from where I come, a senior citizen is asked to make do on some very bare minimum monthly payments. To add insult to injury, we say that in spite of the fact that this government has been unable to put forth an economic program that would take advantage of the great resources this country offers. We are going to show that we respect our seniors and we are going to raise their monthly amount by 33 cents. It is not even enough to cover the cost of a postage stamp to send a complaint to their local member of Parliament.

This kind of legislation in Bill C-80 hides the fact that the government is very restrictive, small "c" conservative and, if I could lapse again into partisanship, almost reactionary. Were I in another country, I might say that this is right wing republicanism. I am not and I will avoid saying that.

What we have is the initiation of a philosophy that says we no longer need to support those basic social pillars that identified us as a progressive society. Do it under the guise that we are going to make the system more efficient. Listen to us, we are going to pump over the course of the next five years—my colleagues look in askance, "five years?"—$2.1 billion. This is after pillaging those systems of $3.5 billion. The phrase "smoke and mirrors" comes to mind to those who follow what the government is doing.

There is no question that the government does not want a socially progressive set of legislation or pillars for our society. It is a dog eat dog world. The marketplace must reign supreme. It must have its dictates imposed upon the way that people behave, the way that people act out their lives in this country.

There is much to be said for the workings of the marketplace. Where are those kinds of principles, I say to my colleagues opposite, applicable to everybody in our society and not just to those who are weakest from a financial point of view?

I pointed out to the minister responsible for the privatization of Petro-Canada some months ago that the Canadian government, so eager to cut the deficit and reduce the debt, to show fiscal responsibility, to help those who are in need, was more than quick to contribute to oil companies, some of them not even based in Canada. These were not tax grants but outright cash grants totalling $832 million between 1989 and 1990. Then the government has the courage to come before this House and say with the rationalization of its social programs it is going to pump in another $400-odd million dollars per year over the course of the next five years. Give us a break, as they say on the street. We cannot possibly all be that gullible or that stupid.

This is the same government that says it is making a progressive step forward when it gets out of the unemployment insurance scheme. It used to be a three-party program of government, employer and employee.

To get right out of that and to put the onus on the employer and the employee at a time of recession when neither the employer nor the employee could afford to make that contribution hurts those people who need it most.

We must keep in mind that much of what is being applied today is going to have a negative impact on those children who will be the men and women of tomorrow who will guide this country. I refer government members to the statistics they throw back at us, that if we do not pay today we will pay tomorrow through education costs and through other social costs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question.

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

GEORGETOWN GIRLS' PIPE BAND

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, at this time when we are renewing our country's Constitution and focusing on Canada's promising future, it is comforting and instructive to also remember our rich past.

In Georgetown, one of the communities I am proud to represent in Parliament, that past includes strong Scottish heritage. Perhaps most symbolic of that is the Georgetown Girls' Pipe Band which this year is celebrating its 50th anniversary.

This band has performed with distinction across Ontario, Quebec, in the United States, and even in Scotland. The anniversary will be marked by a Scottish tattoo which I am sure will be impressive and majestic and to which I invite all members of this House.

My sincere congratulations to every one associated with this outstanding band and my thanks to all those in Georgetown and across the country who keep the flame of our heritage alive.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the National Action Committee on the Status of Women said that it could not support this constitutional deal.

In the same breath it claimed to be speaking on behalf of the women of Canada. It does not speak for me.

[Translation]

The Charlottetown agreement is not perfect, but for the women of Quebec, it is a step in the right direction. We must defend our rights by ensuring that Quebecers say yes to Canada and yes to protecting women's rights that are guaranteed in Canada's Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

We must say yes because economic instability affects women particularly. We must say yes. Otherwise women will be among the first victims of economic and social problems. No, Mr. Speaker, Judy Rebick does not speak for me. I have my own voice and I will say "yes" on October 26.

HMCS PROTECTEUR

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to congratulate the Government of Canada for sending our ship Protecteur, together with engineers, Canadian Forces personnel, machinery, supplies and equipment, to Miami to assist the population of south Florida in getting life back together again.

I am sure it is not the intention to help the United States financially, but the Americans certainly need our competent, well organized and trained people to rebuild schools and public institutions so they can be working again.

I believe this is the kind of assistance that one neighbour ought to give to another.

JOB RETRAINING

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, due to this government's lack of foresight and lack of commitment to training, many Islanders are being forced to stay home and collect unemployment benefits rather than spend the time upgrading their skills through the fee payer program.

The budgets have run dry for the fee payer program and those who are victims of this government's economic policies are now falling prey to this government's lack of commitment to retraining.

This government has cut $200 million over the past two years from the Canadian Jobs Strategy program. With unemployment at 11.6 per cent across this nation and 18.6 per cent in Prince Edward Island this is absolutely unforgivable.

I call on the federal government to take action to ensure that unemployed Islanders are given access to retraining.

It is better to have an unemployed individual in a classroom upgrading his or her skills than sitting at home waiting for a job offer that may be a long time coming.

RACISM

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, Simon Israel, former head of mergers and acquisitions in ScotiaMcLeod's New York office, was fired mainly because he objected to anti-Semitic remarks from a senior officer who commented: "There's one that Hitler missed".

This comment was made in reference to a Jewish colleague who also was fired. Documents obtained by The Globe and Mail show that ScotiaMcLeod admits the Hitler comment was made and later repeated several times by ScotiaMcLeod's New York president.

We have to be constantly on guard to ensure that when racism rears its ugly head we promptly repudiate it. In our society racism starts in anodyne and anecdotal ways, then becomes part of a culture that spreads like fire.

Knowing the senior officials of Scotiabank, the parent company of ScotiaMcleod, I am convinced they do not countenance racist remarks. It is incumbent upon them to dissociate themselves from these statements and to deal effectively with the executive or executives responsible for these injurious words.

ATLANTIC EXPRESSWAY

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I urge the government to press on with negotiations with the Governments of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island to fund the Atlantic expressway. This proposed highway system, combined of course with the fixed link to P.E.I., is essential if any real improvement is to be made in the economies of Atlantic Canada.

Reduced rail services have had a negative impact on transportation while industry demands immediate and economic delivery of goods and services. The benefits of our location adjacent to the major markets of the northeastern United States can only be realized with an up-to-date highway system.

I urge that all parties re-energize their negotiations in the interest of completing this project which is in the interest of all Canadians.

CHARLOTTETOWN CONSTITUTIONAL AGREEMENT

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, on October 26 all Canadians will be asked to take a stand on the Charlottetown consensus report. It will be an important vote in our nation's history.

The August 28 constitutional agreement is not perfect but it is the best that this government could give us. I have some reservations about the weakness of provisions on economic union and the Senate. Obviously, we have an equal Senate at the expense of an effective one. Nevertheless, we think that these deficiencies can eventually be corrected.

[English]

As a member of Parliament from the only officially bilingual province in Canada, I am pleased that this new deal will at last recognize and enshrine in the Constitution the equal status of New Brunswick's two official linguistic communities.

I anticipate working together with all political parties, interested groups and individual citizens of Restigouche—Chaleur in support of this agreement despite its shortcomings.

Furthermore, I urge the citizens of my riding to examine this document and, most important, to vote and voice their opinion on October 26.

TAX SYSTEM

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, for months the Germain family of Val-d'Or, Louis and Clémence, have been trying everything to find solutions for their seven children who are all under 10 years old. They have something against Canada's tax system: they think that the Canadian government should consider the number of dependants, namely the wife and children, and the husband's salary, regardless of the income earned from all other sources.

That is a typical example of a large family in Canada that is penalized by the Canadian tax system.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have received more than 50 calls in my constituency office in Winnipeg asking for information on the constitutional proposals and the referendum. People want a copy of the consensus report. They also want a brief description in an unbiased kind of way, possibly preferably by a third party, of what these proposals are all about.

The government spends millions of dollars on advertising and trying to make itself feel better than it deserves. Surely it can address this issue which is an urgent one right now.

HMCS PROTECTEUR

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join my friend, the hon. member for Mississauga South, in bringing to the attention of the House the mission of the HMCS Protecteur which is down in Florida right now helping with the reconstruction efforts after Hurricane Andrew.

The Protecteur departed from Halifax as we all know on September 10 carrying building supplies, tools and vehicles for use in rebuilding two heavily damaged schools in Dade county. The vessel docked yesterday and our crew has already begun working on the sites. The over 300 crew and specialists on the ship will be assisted by Canadian Air Force engineers who had arrived over the past weekend.

Around the world, through humanitarian actions like this and the efforts such as the UN peacekeeping forces, Canada is noted for its willingness to assist people and countries in need.

I think Canadians should recognize the blessings that such catastrophes are very rare in our country. I extend my appreciation to the involved Canadian Forces personnel and their Commander Douglas MacLean.

I am sure that British Columbians in Esquimalt and Victoria will provide the Protecteur a warm welcome once it returns to its west coast base after this mission.

TRADE

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the House we heard the minister of trade repeatedly state that his arguments in favour of NAFTA were based on fact. At the same time he repeatedly denigrated the opposition for spreading misinformation. And yesterday was no different.

On a point of order just after Question Period the trade minister stated he wanted to clarify an error in his trade ads which the member for Windsor—St. Clair, that is myself, had clearly shown to be incorrect. However, this trade minister chose to further misstate the facts. He compared unadjusted March employment to unadjusted June employment.

Had opposition members done that, he would surely have jumped all over us for misusing statistics. Unadjusted stats are used in year–over–year comparisons or by statistical incompetents. The facts he should have used to compare the months within the same year are those that had been seasonally adjusted to remove distortions. Seasonally adjusted manufacturing jobs in July 1992 totalled 1.8 million while in March 1992 they totalled 1,760,000, a difference of only 43,000 jobs.

In fact the NAFTA propaganda distorted the facts, and that is what we pointed out here yesterday.

REFORM PARTY

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I regret the Reform Party is against the Charlottetown accord because it is not perfect. The Reform Party wants to ignore our constitutional problems, thinking they will go away.

How can a five–year moratorium solve an issue? Will aboriginal peoples have to wait five years for justice? Will Canadians be stuck with the same tired old unelected Senate for five years and maybe forever? Will Canada's international economic reputation be damaged by the uncertainty of our country's future?

Most Canadians have enough common sense not to allow the perfect to be the enemy of the good. I fear Preston Manning has contempt, utter contempt, for common sense.

CHARLOTTETOWN CONSTITUTIONAL AGREEMENT

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, last week the Prime Minister presented a proposed constitutional agreement. He said that it was the most important reform since Confederation in 1867 and that the negotiations had been an unprecedented success. Personally, like many others in Quebec and even in Canada, I have always maintained that it was not an agreement but rather a draft or a preliminary version.

Again today we see in La Presse that the Prime Minister of Canada and Mr. Bourassa are continuing to write to each other because they do not have a common understanding. That proves this is a draft and it is scandalous to ask Canadians to vote on a proposal that is only a draft. It is outrageous to spend $125 million for the pleasure of satisfying political parties.

THE LATE BRUCE HUTCHISON

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, a towering giant in the field of journalism has died. Bruce Hutchison, one of Canada's leading authorities on political and economic affairs, died yesterday at his Victoria area home where he had lived since the 1920s. He was 91. He was editor emeritus of The Vancouver Sun where he wrote a weekly column until illness struck him just a few weeks ago.

Mr. Hutchison was truly a national treasure. Besides being a working journalist for 74 years, he wrote 15 books which helped define and shape the Canadian identity.

Although known for his shrewd insight and gifted writing skills, his first love was that of the outdoors which, he said, was the source of his wisdom. He worked at a time when it was fashionable for pre–eminent commentators to hob–nob with prime ministers, and he met all of them going back more than 70 years. That era is now over.

Bruce Hutchison was honoured by Canada several times including an appointment to the federal Privy Council this past July. He was indeed a great Canadian.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

CHARLOTTETOWN CONSTITUTIONAL AGREEMENT

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec–Est): Mr. Speaker, let me first of all say that I am satisfied with the Charlottetown proposals that will serve to renew Canada's Constitution after October 26.

These proposals respect Quebecers' historic demands and enable us to close an issue which, due to its importance, had a first claim on our energies and resources. We will now be able to devote these to the social and economic development of Quebec and Canada.

The people of Québec–Est have been patient. They have waited for years for a solution to this acute problem which threatened to demolish the most beautiful and best country in the world. Now that we have found solutions, I will ask my constituents to ratify them so that we can work more on giving them a better quality of life and on preparing with them the future for the generations to come.

Mr. Speaker, I have rarely been as proud to be a Canadian and a Quebecer, thanks to this agreement.

STATISTICS

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, the government's manipulation of Statistics Canada data seems to be spreading like a virus.

The symptoms were visible in 1990 when Statistics Canada cancelled plans to produce a net price index which would have shown how much the GST contributed to inflation.

Last year the government muzzled a study on the debt which showed that the main reason for the increase in Canada's public debt was corporate tax cuts and high interest rates, not social spending.

In August, when the Minister of Agriculture addressed a rally in the Melfort area, he added exports and imports together to show a massive increase in trade even though the true figures almost balanced out. This genius at manipulating the analysis is mind–boggling.

Yesterday the Minister for International Trade tried again. He altered the trade data, even though the member for Windsor—St. Clair had the actual tables from StatsCan right in front of him and the minister was wrong.

We have seen the government try to rewrite history. Now it is trying to rewrite the statistical facts and the very essence of the truth for this place.

CHARLOTTETOWN CONSTITUTIONAL AGREEMENT

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, last weekend, the Union culturelle des Franco–Ontariennes or UCFO held a major convention. I am pleased to inform you and all members of this House that the organization has dissociated itself from the National Action Committee on the Status of Women. UCFO has said yes to the Charlottetown constitutional accord. Franco–Ontarian women realize that their rights will be better protected in a united and prosperous Canada, and I want to congratulate them for saying so.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TRADE

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Yesterday, the Minister for International Trade refused to dissociate himself from an established policy which consists of keeping lists of all so–called enemies of the state who are fighting the free trade agreement.

I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether he also agrees with this policy of keeping lists of enemies of the state or whether he agrees with the opposition parties who see this as a shameful strategy on the part of the government.

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, in the old days we used to keep information in various files, clippings of newspapers, speeches from opposition members and so on, but more recently we have come on a new gadget. It is called a computer. We use a computer to store this information as opposed to filling up filing cabinets row on row on row.

That is the basis on which the comment was made that she is referring to in the taped message or taped conversation.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

On whose authority were those Conservatives authorized to spend millions of dollars of public money getting their message across and millions of dollars of public money on an issue that has not even been debated in Parliament?

There has never been a debate on the NAFTA. There has never been a vote on the NAFTA in Parliament. I would like to know whether the Prime Minister's office in fact authorized and approved this strategy or whether it was simply the Minister for International Trade running off on his own.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is quite right. We have gone to some lengths at getting out the information on the North American Free Trade Agreement.

We have sent copies of this to all members of Parliament, to the premiers and to ministers of trade and industry in the provinces. Indeed we have sent copies of this to the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the New Democratic Party, and I am sure she has had an opportunity to review that. We have sent this to key associations, a number of chief executive officers, academics, trade and business associations, the media, foreign press, foreign embassies in Canada, as well as a large number of other people.

It is the desire of this government to meet the request that Canadians have put to us, which is: "When you do something, make sure that we understand what it is and we get the information on it so we can draw our own conclusions, make judgments and get views back to the government based on that".

• (1420)

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I asked the question of the Deputy Prime Minister because I thought he would avail himself of the chance to dissociate himself from the policies of his colleague. Since he is choosing not to do so, I will direct my supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board.

I would like to ask the President of the Treasury Board whether he authorized the expenditure of public funds for the purpose of compiling lists of persons who endorse policies that are contrary to the policies of the government. Does he agree that spending money this way on the very day his government is cutting family allowances is a serious matter? Can he justify such expenditures?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I think the spokesperson for the opposition is dangerously close to twisting the truth.

The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has a budget for promoting its policies, and it is entirely normal it should do so. The hon. member should be flattered that the department bothers to tape what other people say, in order to comment and respond accordingly.

[English]

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the government is spending millions of taxpayers' dollars on an advertising campaign which is intended "to explain how Canada stands to be a big beneficiary of free trade with Mexico". Is this broad assertion substantiated by studies of the impact on industrial sectors and workers?

The minister says that he wants to provide information about NAFTA. Will he now table all such impact studies to lend some substance to what otherwise will be seen as an expensive piece of self–puffery?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me put this into context.

There were two pieces of what might be called advertising material. One was the tabloid which my friend from Hamilton is holding up. I know she has appreciated reading it because it has provided her with information which I hope she will use. The other is a radio advertising program which sets out the impact of the free trade agreement on Canada.

My hon. friend is well aware that our exports to the United States in the early part of this year were at record levels. Our trade surplus with the United States was up at annual rates around $19 billion in the first part of the year compared to $14 billion in 1988. Clearly there has been a positive impact of the free trade agreement on the Canadian economy.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the minister refers to the newspaper insert and to media presentations of NAFTA.

He will know perfectly well that there is nothing in that document or on radio and television that analyses NAFTA. There is nothing in that document that says what is contained in NAFTA. He knows that. It is merely a piece of propaganda puffery.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacLaren: I take it from the minister's answer, which did not answer my question at all, that he will not table the impact studies which must exist on NAFTA on the Canadian economy.

He has promised to release an environmental study by the end of this month. How could he have prepared an environmental study without doing sectoral impact studies? He knows that. How can he hope to design even at this late date the adjustment assistance programs, which he continues to promise Canadians but does not deliver, if he has not done impact studies?

Will the minister now table the impact studies that must exist on NAFTA?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend received a binder, as did his leader, which sets out the impact of NAFTA on various parts of the economy: agriculture, the auto industry, textiles and apparels, financial services, telecommunications, transportation and services, energy, government procurement, rules of origin, standards, and comments on the impact on the environment, labour, wages and adjustment, the impact of NAFTA on cultural industries, health care and so on. I am sure my hon. friend has poured through all this material and finds it very useful. It explains a very important policy as it affects the Canadian economy.

I would be quite happy to table this, Mr. Speaker, if my colleagues wish it. The Leader of the Opposition, his Liberal trade critic, the leader of the New Democratic Party and her trade critic have already received it.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are becoming increasingly concerned about what they believe is a manipulative propaganda campaign of disinformation being put out over the NAFTA agreement. It started with the tabloid that was sent out by the Minister for International Trade. My question first goes to him.

In the tabloid, it says clearly that "manufacturing employment has increased between March and July by 113,000". Statistics Canada clearly points out that it increased by 43,000. Which of these two sets of statistics should Canadians believe, Statistics Canada or those put out by the minister in his propaganda pamphlet?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my friend may not have been in the House yesterday when I corrected the answer that I gave to his colleague from Windsor. I said that there was an error in the tabloid and I appreciate my friend from Windsor pointing it out.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): What happened was the seasonally unadjusted figures for March were compared with the seasonally adjusted figures. That is where the error came about. If the unadjusted employment figures are compared, the increase in jobs is 181,000, so I do not believe we are giving an incorrect picture to the Canadian public when it is looked at from that perspective.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, what the minister has forgotten to add is that during that same interval 27,000 manufacturing jobs disappeared, which he has not included in his readjusted figures.

Let me go on. I can choose from a number of pages in this tabloid. I refer to the comment on page 2 that says: "Since the NAFTA, no country has been able to take a larger share of the United States market for manufacturing goods than Canada". That is patently untrue. A review of United States government statistics between 1988 and 1991 shows that the growth of Canada's share of manufactured goods was 10 per cent, South Africa's, during that same period, grew by 11 per cent; Mexico's by 33 per cent and Australia's by 45 per cent. None of these countries had a trade deal with the United States.

When the Minister for International Trade says that Canada has the largest share of the United States market as a result of the free trade deal, would he agree that that too is inaccurate?

The facts are that Canada has increased its share of the import market of the United States. There is a very good reason for that. We have seen the U.S. tariffs against Canadian products go down while tariffs against other countries' products have stayed the same. Our exporters have taken advantage of this and it is why we have seen the significant increase in our export performance, as well as in the balance of trade with the United States.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, my last question for the minister is something I think will concern all Canadians. We are all concerned about the use of taxpayers' money to sell the free trade agreement with the United States and Mexico.

I want to remind the minister that selling the free trade deal with the United States cost federal taxpayers $31 million and the corporations spent $25 million for a total of $56 million.

We know that this is going to be significantly harder sell for the government because Canadians now know who really benefited from the Canada–U.S. trade agreement: multinational corporations, yes; Canadians, no.

My question for the Minister for International Trade is this. Having spent a combined total of $56 million to sell this Canada–U.S. trade deal, how much does the government plan to spend of taxpayers' money and that of their corporate allies in its sales job to sell NAFTA?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I indicated just a few minutes ago that the only plans we have are the tabloid and radio advertising and that amounts to $3.1 million.

• (1430)

It surprises me that my colleague does not refer to some other statistics in this tabloid which show that pharmaceutical exports are up 90 per cent, chemical products up 33 per cent, man-made fibres up 133 per cent, clothing up 89 per cent, electrical machinery up 74 per cent, railway equipment up 126 per cent and aerospace products up 77 per cent. Those are the success stories and they are the responsibility of many, many workers across this country who are working together to produce these results and generate employment back here in Canada.

This government supports them. This government brought in the free trade agreement with the United States to help them do this and they are succeeding.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, this minister just does not get it. This debate is not just about trade, it is about ethics in government.

For eight years the reputation of the government has been tarnished by lack of judgment, failing to separate the interests of Conservatives from the interests of the Canadian public.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister this question. Will he now do the right thing? Will he at least try to correct the wrong created by putting an end to this kind of propaganda campaign today?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, one of the things that Canadians have asked us time and time again, through the prosperity initiative consultations where we have been in 186 communities across the country, is to give them the facts on trade. These people hear all the wild statements from the opposition parties and want to know the facts.

This tabloid is the result. The information, drawn from Statistics Canada, shows the successes that Canadians have had because of their open access to the United States market.

The information also shows how individual provinces have done: Alberta, a 30 per cent increase in its exports; Saskatchewan, a 18 per cent increase in its exports. These are the successes that we want Canadians to understand.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, we have the facts all right. They are in the transcript that we have in hand.

[Translation]

The transcript we have of conversations between the top brass of the Conservative Party indicates there is almost one hour of conversation. These conversations were not spontaneous. Canadians want to know once and for all who authorized this propaganda campaign. Did the Minister for International Trade, the Deputy Prime Minister or the entire Cabinet do so? Who is the guilty party?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the simple answer is that my department is responsible for the trade negotiations. As minister, I am responsible for getting the information out to Canadians.

I ask my hon. friend, is it wrong to repeat Statistics Canada information and put it in a way that Canadians can understand it? In that way, they can see which industries are doing well because of free trade.

It is exactly the information that Canadians are looking for so they can judge how well we are doing in trade, so they can judge the importance of trade because it is trade that brings incremental jobs to Canada. It is trade which brings about the standard of living that we enjoy in this country and it is trade that we are going to continue to reinforce through policies like the NAFTA, the free trade agreement and other export development efforts. In that way we can help increase the standard of living of Canadians.

ATLANTIC FISHERMEN

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the minister asked if it was wrong to spend multi-millions of dollars on these kinds of propaganda campaigns at this time.

What the minister ought to be asking himself is what the effect of this kind of answer is on a public that is already cynical and sceptical about all politicians.

In my riding today 350 fishermen and plant workers, 10 weeks after the announcement of an emergency assistance program, are still trying to have their applications processed. They are not processed because of a shortage of personnel in the office of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

The member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception has just told me he has 1,500 inquiries a week from people waiting to have their applications processed. They are not processed because of insufficient staff in the Department of Fisheries.

I want to ask the minister who just asked this House and asked Canadians "is it wrong" if it is not time to end spending millions of dollars fishing for votes for the PC party and start helping the fishermen and other unemployed Canadians who need the help of this government?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that the hon. member has picked a very poor example. With respect to the northern cod disaster alone, the moratorium, so far we have looked after 19,223 fishermen and plant workers. This has all been done since July 2. They have been looked after. We now have an appeal process under way so that people who feel they should be on the program but have not been accepted can appeal.

Mr. Mazankowski: It is $865 million.

Mr. Crosbie: The Minister of Finance reminds me that $865 million is the cost of the northern cod moratorium alone. Surely the hon. gentleman should be fair and try to find some real example. I know it is difficult to find one, but try to find some other example than the one he has given.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, we on this side applaud any measure by this government that will bring any real assistance to the people of Canada who are badly hurting during this recession.

What we are saying to this government on behalf of the thousands of fishermen who are still awaiting a decision on their applications as the result of a bottleneck in administration in the department of fisheries is that this kind of propaganda campaign at this time, costing millions of dollars, this cynical gesture, does not restore public confidence in the public administration process.

Will the Minister of Finance intervene now? Will he cancel his multi-million dollar propaganda campaign? Will he put the money to work on behalf of unemployed Canadians? Will he, in the process, in the middle of a referendum campaign, restore a measure of confidence in the public policy process of Canada?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, one of the very positive advantages of the NAFTA agreement is with respect to the Canadian fishing industry because it opens up markets in Mexico to Canadian fish and removes the tariff. Cod is not the only species we produce in Canada.

I might remind the hon. gentleman that there is a species called salmon, particularly in British Columbia, and many others. The Fisheries Council of Canada and the fishery producers in Newfoundland are very strong supporters of the deal negotiated by my hon. friend who had the fishery right on the top of his list when it came to breaking into the Mexican market.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. As the minister knows by now, Dularie Boodlal has been told by the immigration department to return to Trinidad even though she has supported herself and three children without public assistance for over three years in Canada.

As the minister also knows, Mrs. Boodlal's estranged husband, after 11 convictions in Canada for assault and uttering death threats against her, has returned to Trinidad and immediately, by telephone and letter, resumed his threats to kill her when she arrives there.

Will the minister issue a permit on humanitarian and compassionate grounds and allow Mrs. Boodlal to stay in Canada and apply for landing and support her children, by her word, in peace?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, first of all I cannot, because of the Privacy Act, discuss the details of any individual person in Canada subjected to the Immigration Act.

The hon. member refers to a situation that is really bad. I have read the same report in the press that he has and I agree it is criminal that any person would be treated the way this woman has been treated. We treated it as such in this country and the justice system has worked.

Two weeks ago I intervened in a similar case in Thunder Bay. Information was brought to my attention which allowed me to intervene. If the hon. member knows of facts that ought to be brought to my attention in this specific case, I urge him to do it.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his proposal.

I have the information copied from the Legal Aid Service of Parkdale which they have already sent to the minister.

• (1440)

As well, he has them in his office, including the copy of the letter from Mr. Boodlal threatening to kill her.

The minister also knows, if he has read the file, that the department refused Mrs. Boodlal humanitarian and compassionate landing on the basis of a false accusation supplied in a letter from a Toronto policeman, even though the police department and the immigration department denied sending or receiving that letter. They used that letter as grounds. This is shown in the records of the minister's own department, obtained by the Parkdale Legal Aid Services.

While the minister is investigating this, will he investigate the improper action in his department of this sort, using a false letter, denying that they have not, and ensure that this kind of life-threatening action does not occur again in his department?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I know it is easy to bash on bureaucrats, but I think that the bureaucrats and the officials in the department of immigration do a good job with the means they have.

They have a lot of information and they make the decisions they have to make. There is a process in place to review cases, and we do that.

If the hon. member wants to lodge a complaint about officials of the department, these are civil servants and there is a process to do that. I urge him to do just that.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, last Tuesday the Minister of Transport stated that the government would take every measure to make sure that we have, and I quote, "a safe, effective and competitive airline industry". My question is this: What measures have been taken by the government to make sure we have a competitive airline industry?

[English]

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport has been clear both in his responses last week and through the press despite the opposition attempts to muddy the waters. The minister was very clear in his statements regarding deregulation and the benefits of deregulation to the transportation industry in the country.

The figures are there. The transportation agencies have confirmed that deregulation has assisted the industries. The minister and the department have been more than helpful throughout these negotiations in assisting the continuance of competition in the industry in the country.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday in the House the minister said: "There were too many people employed in the airline industry".

The Leader of the Opposition met hundreds of these people in Vancouver on Saturday. These are people who are ready, willing and able to make concession and sacrifices to save their jobs. What is the Government of Canada prepared to do to help them?

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to correct any misunderstanding that the member opposite or any members may have taken from statements attributed to the minister.

It is clear that the minister was referring to an acknowledged and accepted over-capacity in the airline industry in Canada. Clearly, the minister and all of us in this House share the member's concern about employees in the industry in Canada and we are all doing our part in trying to maintain that industry.

I have been meeting again with employees of both airlines. I am encouraged by statements from the presidents of those airlines that, in their merger discussions which are ongoing and which are as yet incomplete, both are doing what they can to ensure a minimum loss of jobs in the Canadian airline industry.

JOB TRAINING

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

With an 11.7 per cent jobless rate in Toronto, the highest since the Great Depression, I would be interested to hear the minister's response to the hundreds of complaints I am receiving about the job training programs.

Not everyone can lose her or his job at the right time in order to coincide with the deadlines for training programs. Hundreds of people in my riding are losing the opportunity of re-entering the job market simply because their UI benefits will run out before the completion of their courses.

Will the minister make job training his first priority by extending the UI benefits where necessary? Also, how will he get over 200,000 Canadians in Toronto working again since he has failed to do this through his job training program?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we will achieve that objective when Canadians fully realize that the matter of training is not an issue that concerns the federal government alone. In the last three years, for the information of the hon. member and his colleagues, we have tripled the amount of money for the training of unemployed Canadians. This year it is over $1.355 billion.

The member asks what more we must do. We must get on with the prosperity initiative and get Canadian corporations to train more of their employees. This message is now sinking in. The private sector has got to play its role in making sure that we have in this country the most skilled work force in the world.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): A supplemental to the same minister, Mr. Speaker.

The unemployed constituents who come to my office for help are coming to my office because they feel they have nowhere else to go. My unemployed constituents want to earn a living, not to get welfare, nor to take advantage of other taxpayers. They have not only lost their jobs, they have lost their confidence and will accept any job to regain their dignity.

The Canada Employment counsellors are frustrated and their frequent advice these days is "go see your MP". Is this the government's job creation strategy, "go see your MP"? What exactly is the minister doing to help the over 200,000 jobless find meaningful full employment in metropolitan Toronto?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): The hon. member refers to 200,000 people. What about the 700,000 Canadian men and women from coast to coast who benefit from the adjustment and training program of this department? This is the same member who on the floor of this House, along with his colleagues, delayed the passage of a bill that allows those unemployed Canadians to train. Bill C–21 was objected to and delayed by those members. Those people who did not have the skills are today getting them because of the tripling of the money we spend on training Canadians.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): My question is for the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

As we heard last week, some people are saying that Canadians can vote no in the October 26 constitutional referendum and the constitution will just go away for five years. Can the minister tell my constituents that they can, in fact, vote no without destructive consequences?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, anyone who says that there would be no negative consequences to voting down this package is engaging in wilful blindness.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): What would happen, for example, with aboriginal Canadians is that there would be a very strong sense of betrayal, whose consequences no one can predict.

What would happen in the province of Quebec almost certainly is that the forces of separation would gain momentum and would gain force.

What would happen with the Senate is that the Senate we have, which no one wants, is the Senate that we would keep.

I have to say, as someone who was there through all of those long negotiations, I do not believe that we could ever again, under any kind of circumstances, get the kind of unanimity on such a broad range of issues as we have achieved in the Charlottetown accord.

So there would be very negative consequences to voting no and very positive consequences to supporting this accord and letting Canada get on with the rest of our life.

SALMON FISHERY

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

The B.C. salmon industry is in trouble. American fishermen have deliberately taken 700,000 Fraser River sockeye, twice their entitlement under the Canada–U.S. treaty agreement and 1992 is the low year of the four–year cycle. According to DFO estimates, 1.2 million Fraser sockeye have disappeared after entering the Fraser River spawning system. DFO has been trying to find out what happened to these salmon. Can the minister tell us anything at all about the department's investigations to date?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, in British Colombia we have a situation where there is a major change under way in the fishery as the aboriginal people are admitted to take their place in the fishery in accordance with the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada delivered in 1990.

There are major changes under way in which we are trying to involve the aboriginal people by entering into agreements with them for conservation purposes, the healthy management of fish resources, and several experimental agreements under which certain groups are allowed to sell fish for the first time in many years this year. This results in tensions.

As a result of these tensions, a great deal has been made of a situation with respect to the alleged disappearance of salmon going up the Fraser River from the Mission Bridge to the spawning grounds.

All of the runs of salmon are not completed yet in British Columbia up the Fraser River. We do know that in the early short run some 110,000 less salmon reached the spawning grounds than we thought would make it there.

There may be several reasons for that. It might be poaching. If so, we do not know who the poaching was done by since the poachers were not caught. It may be environmental conditions because of the warmer summer in British Columbia this year.

Or it might be that the electronic equipment used at the Mission Bridge is not accurate enough. It is like a poll; it is plus or minus 20 per cent in its calculations. Next year we intend to have two pieces of equipment there to check. There are all kinds of reasons why it may be that some salmon did not reach the spawning grounds.

The significant thing is this, that this was the best year for sockeye salmon on the Fraser River at this stage of a cycle in 80 years. It was the best year in 80 years and that is the thing that should be noted.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister made an important point. It has been a good year in a 16 year attempt to rebuild the stock, particularly in Stuart Lake, but they have been wiped out. Those fish did not get back there to spawn and there will not be that kind of a return four years from now to Stuart Lake.

We have to know the whole truth before the minister enters into any plans, any deals, any agreements with any resource users between now and 1993. Our B.C. salmon must not be allowed to go the way of the Atlantic cod.

The B.C. Fisheries Commission, the fishing vessel owners, the B.C. Fishermen Survival Coalition, the Sto Lo Musqueam Tsawwassen Bands are all calling for a federal judicial inquiry to investigate the apparent disappearance of hundreds of thousands of returning 1992 Fraser salmon according to departmental estimates.

Will the minister agree to a judicial inquiry into the disappearance of these salmon, the policies of the department with reference to all user groups, and the irresponsible lack of patrolling and enforcing his own regulations?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, there is a special investigation under way in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans in the British Columbia unit with reference to the extent and cause of any sockeye shortage on the Fraser River such as I tried to outline in my previous answer.

That unit, the B.C. region of the department, will be reporting to me after a thorough investigation on what they think occurred this year and what improvements may need to be made. We have already decided on a number of improvements for next year, including new equipment at the Mission Bridge for the counting of salmon that go into the river, the use of helicopters for patrol purposes, increased enforcement, new regulations with reference to the use of sales slips. I could go on and on.

If I do not get a satisfactory explanation from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans with reference to what happened this year, I am quite willing to consider having an independent inquiry into the situation. Nothing sinister has happened. It is regrettable that some fish did disappear this way. Our B.C. salmon stocks are not in danger. Forty-five thousand salmon reached the spawning grounds in the early short run, which is the second highest number ever to reach the spawning grounds there. We had been hoping it would reach the record again this year, but it did not. It is still the second highest ever. So B.C. salmon stocks are not in danger whatsoever.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, my question is directed to the minister responsible for intergovernmental affairs.

On June 30, Judge Pierre A. Michaud of the Quebec Superior Court handed down a judgment in the Libman case after consulting with about 50 experts. In his judgment, he said it was contrary to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms to allow unlimited spending during a referendum.

My question for the minister is this: Considering that he has always claimed he respected the Canadian and Quebec legal systems, and defended the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, is the minister prepared to add the necessary amendments to bring the Referendum Act into line with Judge Michaud's judgment and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms? Yes or no?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I understood that the decision of the Quebec court was that the Quebec law was not in violation of the Charter of Rights. The decision was not that the Charter of Rights made the federal legislation invalid.

I understand that the court decision is under appeal. In any event, that is a court decision respecting Quebec law. It has nothing to do with the federal legislation which is in place which we believe to be fair, proper and certainly consistent with the Charter of Rights.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, the minister does not seem very concerned about respecting the Canadian and Quebec legal systems and appears to prefer to ignore the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Will the minister nevertheless respect Quebec's referendum legislation and, together with his colleagues, refrain from any kind of advertising during the Quebec referendum and immediately order the cancellation of extensions to three advertising campaigns costing a total of nearly $20 million, campaigns that have been discussed repeatedly during the past few days in the Quebec media? Will the minister do so, yes or no?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Given the hon. member's political affiliations, his love of the Charter of Rights is truly touching. Presumably, not wanting to lose the protections of that, he will be voting yes on the referendum.

The reality is that the referendum in Quebec will be held under Quebec law because it is a provincial referendum. The referendum in the other provinces of Canada will be held under the law which this Parliament has passed. The law is just, fair and proper.

At the end of the day I think he should have confidence in the people of Canada, including the people of Quebec, to make the right decision in spite of whatever he or any other politicians might say.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, the government made an agreement back in 1990 with Seafreez providing for the operation of the fish plant at Burgeo and assigning specific groundfish quotas for that purpose.

As the minister noted, the company now says it plans to breach that 1990 agreement by processing the Burgeo quota at other plants.

I want to ask the minister what he plans to do to see to it that Seafreez keeps its end of the bargain and failing that, would he agree to undertake to see to it that local interests are enabled to take over the operation of the fish plant at Burgeo and be assigned the appropriate quotas to do so?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, as usual there are quite a number of complicated facts with respect to this situation. The Seafreez plant at Burgeo was closed in April. The reasons given then were the absence of a labour contract, labour productivity problems, and plant infrastructure problems.

• (1500)

Several years ago, as a result of the efforts of my predecessor as the minister of fisheries, the Seafreez company was able to take over the operation of the plant at Canso, Nova Scotia and a plant at Burgeo, Newfoundland from National Sea Products with considerable assistance from the government and the allocation of quite a considerable amount of various species of fish.

There was an arrangement that 50 per cent of the fish to be transferred from National Sea was to be processed at Burgeo, 50 per cent at Canso and 60 per cent at Canso of certain other underutilized species and 40 per cent at Burgeo. That still remains the case.

The Government of Nova Scotia entered into an agreement to help Seafreez, particularly in relation to Canso. The Government of Newfoundland did not enter into any agreement to help the company with reference to operations at Burgeo, but my predecessor and I made sure that these provisions were inserted to assist the people of Burgeo.

I intend to see that these provisions are carried out, or we will have an accounting from the Seafreez company. I am by no means satisfied with the statement it recently made. It is not in accordance with the agreement.

Mr. Speaker: I am wondering if the hon. member could perhaps put a very short supplemental. Then I am turning for a single question to the hon. member for Mississauga South.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, the minister will know that the Ramea fish plant is also closed as is Burgeo.

He will know that the landings are absolutely dismal in 3Ps, 3Pn and 4R. People are suffering. The economic fallout, the closed fish plants, the job losses are every bit as bad on the south coast as they are on the northeast coast where he declared a moratorium.

Why is he discriminating? Why will he not extend that compensation package to those people in those communities who are hurting on the south coast, the southwest coast and the west coast of Newfoundland?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member refers to the fish stocks in places like 3Ps and others, and it is true that most of the fish stocks in Atlantic Canada, certainly the cod stocks, are not in good shape. The TACs recommended for next year are even lower than most of those in effect for this year. The situation is not good with reference to any of these stocks.

The difference between these stocks and the northern cod stock is that the very survival of the northern cod species was threatened, according to our scientists and to all the evidence we have seen, because of the fact that there are only two year classes of any great size, the 1986 and 1987 year classes, which if we allowed them to be caught before they spawn would mean the end of the species.

We had to close that fishery. The other stocks are not in as bad shape as that and we cannot take the same kind of measures. We cannot close the fisheries if it is not recommended that they had to be closed to save the species. That is the position I am in.

I agree that there are fishermen who need assistance in the areas my hon. friend mentions and I hope that my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and I will be able to assist them later in the year as well.

THE BAHAMAS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

I think everybody in the House applauds the government's job in assisting Americans with the hurricane damage in Florida. I was wondering what assistance and efforts the government made to assist the Government of the Bahamas in rebuilding villages like the village of Current on the Island of Eleuthera that was totally wiped out by the hurricane with its fishing dock and its school washed out to sea and every house levelled.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, clearly Canada has responded to the difficult situation in the Bahamas as it does in other places around the world under similar or difficult circumstances.

Fortunately within the Bahamas the damage was very localized and the main damage was not in the major population centres. Consequently the international appeals were smaller than one might have expected.

Canada has contributed $25,000 as part of a $400,000 relief effort by the Red Cross. We have also offered through a private Bahamian relief organization to assist with some building supplies and we have on standby further relief ready to go.

The organization was not quite in place at the receiving end, but we are quite prepared to help our Commonwealth colleague in the Caribbean in any way that we can.

Government Orders

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, earlier today I asked the Minister for International Trade to table all impact studies that the government has made on the impact of the North American Free Trade Agreement. The minister undertook to table a document today. May we assume that document represents all the impact studies that the government has made of the North American free trade agreement?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has asked if we can assume that the document the hon. minister referred to a few minutes ago contains all of the impact studies.

All the minister is required to do under the rules at the moment is to table that document from which he quoted and of course he said that he would do so. At this point I do not think I can inquire further.

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-80, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, to enact the Children's Special Allowances Act, to amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof and to repeal the Family Allowances Act, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): We shall proceed with consideration of the last group of motions tabled at the report stage of Bill C-80. In accordance with the Chair's decision, Motion No. 36 and Motion No. 38 will be grouped for the purpose of debate.

[English]

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing) moved:

Motion No. 36.

That Bill C-80 be amended by deleting Clause 15.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

Motion No. 38.

That Bill C-80 be amended in Clause 15 by adding immediately after line 3 at page 21 the following:

"(3.4) A taxpayer may request in writing that the Minister determine the amount of the child tax benefit referred to in subdivision a.1 in case of a decrease in the taxpayer's earned income.

(3.5) Within three months of receiving the request referred to in subsection (3.4), the Minister shall determine the amount of the child tax benefit and pay the adjusted amount to the taxpayer."

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise today to continue the efforts on behalf of the Liberal caucus to improve this piece of legislation or if not, to defeat it.

In this particular Motion No. 38 we would like to address the question of changing circumstances for Canadian families. However, before I go on to that, I think I would be remiss if I did not speak to the issue of the time allocation vote we had this morning. This marks an anniversary of sorts. This marks the 50th time that this government across from us has used either closure or time allocation to cut off debate. I must say with some sadness that it is one of the first times it has used it against children of this country and in the debate on one of the most important issues in social policy.

We have tried several times in the last few years in House of Commons subcommittees and in different forums across the country to bring to the public's attention the questions and issues surrounding child poverty. The fact that the government moves in quickly with time allocation within 24 hours of the beginning of the debate, when this House sets upon to debate it, is the very real sign and indicator of its commitment to children's poverty.

The fact that the government has all its rhetoric for helping out families, but when push comes to shove it does not have the time to talk about it, is something that I hope every Canadian voter will remember in the coming year.

In this legislation there is an anomaly which I think should be addressed by the House before this legislation passes. If the government fails to address it then the legislation should be defeated on this point alone.

When the government set up this piece of legislation it made the decision to base the benefits received by each family on an income year—December 31 of a particular year—then not make adjustments to that until the following July 1 or 18 months later. This means that the government has set up a bureaucratic process which has absolutely no ability to adjust to people's changing circumstances. If I can use my time in the House this way, then I would like to point out a few situations in which it could be disastrous for families.

Here is an example. Say that somebody is working in Calgary in the oil and gas industry. It would not be unusual for a professional to be making over $66,000 a year. Let us say that one professional in the family was working and making $66,000 a year with three children. Under the current system this family would not be receiving any benefits under the program. However, if on January 2 of that year the income earner was laid off, they would be immediately into UI which is a drop in income from $66,000 to $22,000. The UI would continue for one year at which point the family would have to turn to other methods of supporting themselves. There is, for example, social assistance.

Look at that evolution. A family in the lower-income levels would be receiving, for the three children, at least $270 a month plus some other benefits. Let us just round it out and say the family would be receiving $300. The family, under the way the government has set up this system, would not have access to that money for a full 18 months after their change in circumstances. For a family of five, $300 a month could represent, in very modest circumstances, a substantial portion of a food bill. However, instead of being able to respond and to be able to assist these families, the government is sitting back and leaving it up to the provinces or the municipalities to look after it.

One should stop and think about it. Look at the growth of food banks, for example, and the growth and need for nutrition programs in the schools across this country. One begins to realize that the fact that it has set in motion another piece of legislation which is inflexible and not responsive means that once again families in distress, going through absolutely wrenching experiences in trying to maintain income levels at a very difficult time, do not have access to the support which is being advertised across the country as a brave new way of assisting families. The very time one needs assistance, one cannot get access to it.

Take another example of a family working in a resource community. It could be in the mining community of northern Ontario across the Canadian Shield or in the coal mining industry in British Columbia. Those are very cyclical industries. When things are going well, families with both adults working in a community can very easily make in excess of $65,000 a year together. On the other hand, circumstances can change. Take for example what has happened in Elliot Lake. It is not only one person in the family who loses income, but it is probably both people in the family who very quickly lose their income. Again, there are circumstances where people are tied into a community. They would probably like to have the opportunity to stay but the support system which could be available to them through simple amendments to the legislation is not available to them.

We are proposing that when a family gets into difficulty, then it is able to appeal to the Government of Canada for the benefits levels to be changed after three months. We think this is a straightforward and administratively simple way of adjusting the issue of declining incomes whereby families are put under undue stress. It could be tied in to, for example, the record keeping related to the unemployment insurance system. It could parallel appeal boards in other parts of the government. Take, for example, the pension appeals board where people write to the government and appeal to the government based on their changing circumstances. There are a number of situations that could be addressed if the government would show the initiative and respond to this amendment and show some understanding of the duress that families are in.

From time to time one is struck in the House by the way that other people tell the story of poverty and what it means. Tonight the CBC television network will show a program called Voices from the Shadows. It is the voices of people in poverty talking about their lives and their difficulties.

The face of poverty has changed in this country pretty dramatically. People who a few years ago could not imagine themselves being poor, now find themselves poor. As we stand in the House and listen to each other's debates, we have to remember that we are not talking about a marginal group any more. We are talking about hundreds of thousands of families.

I was struck, as we talked about the responsiveness of this legislation, by a comment from one of the women in the program. Her name is Donna Benjamin. She said:

"It's scary when the payments stop coming and the municipality isn't giving you any more to help you out while you are not getting it. It really doesn't seem fair to me that the government is almost holding the mother responsible for the actions of her husband. They are basically punishing the mother and the children rather than the fathers".

People end up in circumstances beyond their control. They end up in transitional times which are very, very difficult for people to survive. Say there is a program that can provide cash on a monthly basis to families. Say that the most important program we had in social policy—the family allowance—is abandoned in favour of targets and targeting. Say that it says publicly that the most important objective is to reach those families who most need it and then it leaves out of the legislation the ability to adjust to changing circumstances to assist families. One is forced to wonder whether or not the government is serious about this issue or whether or not there is some window dressing here that we do not quite understand.

On that basis we introduced this amendment with the hope that the government would see that this is one small step to improving a bad piece of legislation, but it is a necessary step. The failure of the government to accept this amendment will force us to continue to oppose this legislation.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, we have been discussing over the last day or so the government's proposals to respond to the problem of children in poverty.

Today we have seen the government impose extra speed to the debate. It is not prepared to let this debate go its full course and to allow all those who want to to speak in the House about this serious issue and the serious misdirection that the government is following. It is, as always, reprehensible to cut short a debate. However, in this particular case which deals with the children of Canada and the future of Canada—our most valued resources as I think we all would agree—it is particularly reprehensible to shorten the debate to force this bill through as this government is doing.

I would like to limit my comments on this amendment to just a couple of points. First, within this section and within this proposal, the government is finally ending universality in child benefits in the so-called family allowance. The argument we have heard many times is why should the bank president and the rich get some income support from the government to raise their children? Why should that money not be taken away from those who are better off and given to those who are less well off and who really need it most?

On the surface of course it is an argument which has some merit, but it is not an argument which calls for the end of universality. With a fair and progressive taxation system we, of course, would be taxing back most of that child payment. So, in terms of the fiscal reasons or the financial reasons why the government presents itself as being concerned about this issue, it really is a much smaller issue that the government would have us believe.

There are many much larger tax benefits that the rich in Canada have, benefits that are larger than this family allowance. Why would we not look at taking those away from the richest of Canadians rather than just dealing with this little family allowance? Why in that process would we be saying to all Canadians that raising children is not as important as it once was? Surely, as we all know, the rationale behind the universal family allowance is that it costs money to raise children. Children are the future of the country and will pay the taxes in the future and will work and contribute to the economy of the country. Consequently, we need to recognize those extra costs for raising children and support, albeit in a relatively small way, the efforts of those parents, not only on behalf of the parents and their children but on behalf of the country as a whole.

We are taking away the universal family allowance, saying that it is no longer appropriate for the country to recognize that all those who are raising children are contributing to the public good in that process.

An important argument in favour of keeping universality is that it is a much cheaper program to administer. Universal programs are very efficient to administer because of low administration costs as they go to everyone and then are taxed back via the taxation system. In terms of efficiency and cheapness it is appropriate to have universality.

The most important reason is that evidence from those countries, particularly European countries with universal programs, shows that they have the lowest child poverty rate. In other words, there is a link between universal programs and effective child benefit programs. Those countries, particularly the Scandinavian and northern European countries, that have universal programs and where there is not a push to remove universality have done a much better job than countries with targeted programs in dealing with child poverty. Of the developed nations, the United States is the only country with a worse child poverty rate than Canada's. Countries such as Sweden and Norway with universal programs have child poverty rates of approximately one quarter of those in Canada.

Universality works. It makes for a better response to children's concerns and the desire to maintain them at a standard which enables them to fulfil their desires and expectations more fully than is the case if they are poor.

The other point I want to discuss in this context is with regard to the contrast between children who live in poor families that work and those who live in poor families that unfortunately cannot work. In an economy with 11.6 per cent unemployment, and officially the rate is going to be much higher than that, on average one in seven or eight households will have an unemployed person in it. We can see how difficult it is at the present time for Canadians to obtain employment. They are not unemployed because they want to be, contrary to what lies behind some of the comments from the other side. They are unemployed because they cannot find jobs. It may also be that they are unemployed because they do not have the required skills.

Children who live in poverty, whether they live in a poor family that works or a poor family that does not work, do not choose to live in poverty. It is entirely accidental that they are born to poor parents. It is entirely accidental to them that their parents work or do not work.

Under this legislation if they happen to be born to poor parents who do not work, that family will be $500 worse off than if it is fortunate enough to work.

This contrast between the deserving poor and the undeserving poor is one which troubles those of us on this side of the House. It also troubles all those who work on behalf of children because it is clear that rationale is not likely to end with this particular proposal but is likely to be considered in the context of others as well.

For example, there are very real concerns about Canadian pensions and medicare. Are we going to say that the rich should not have access to those programs as well? In that context, the same point goes for universality as it does in the context of family and child benefits.

At the risk of reiterating something that I said yesterday, it is really time that this government address the real problem and not tinker around the edges. That is what is happening here. For the poorest of Canadian children, not one extra penny will be available to them. To those who are not quite so poor, such a small amount of money available to them will really not make a huge difference, certainly not enough to those children and those families out of poverty. Lest we see that it is an unrealizable dream to raise poor Canadian children above the poverty line, as the Minister of National Health and Welfare has said, there are countries like Sweden where child benefits bring poor families up above the poverty line. It is not such an odd notion that we should not put up with one million children living in poverty.

It is time that the government address the real problem with real solutions. It is not only unfortunate but it will be a terrible future for Canadian children because this government does not address those real concerns.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to stand in the House today to speak to the amendments to Bill C–80, a bill to repeal the Family Allowances Act. I congratulate my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre who has put forward many amendments to this very regressive bill.

This bill, should it pass in the House of Commons, really means the end of universality as we have known it in Canada for a good many years. Concerning the three existing programs, some of which have been traditionally available to all families regardless of income, this new system will bring an end to them.

The government is doing it as a way to help children in low income families. This is a fallacy because those who are on welfare will not get one penny more.

The partial deindexation of the benefit and complete lack of indexation of the threshold amounts will result in the gradual erosion of the benefit amount as well as lessen the number of families eligible for the benefit.

At present there is no proper mechanism to ensure that dramatic changes in family income are reflected in the monthly benefit amount. As it stands now, it could take up to 18 months for the benefit to be adjusted.

Another major concern is the lack of a federal–provincial arrangement which could result in the provinces capping welfare payments.

This bill signifies the end of universality and the end of recognition of the higher expenses parents incur in raising children today.

The family of a woman who probably enjoys a combined income in her family and is probably above that threshold would in turn be paying back any benefits it had received through the family allowances over the years. It would be paying that back in income tax at the end of the year. This woman said to me she knew that every month she was getting a cheque for her children. She could spend it whichever way she wanted on those children. She could give it to them or she could make allowances for whatever. It was something that she looked forward to even though she realized that she had to pay it back at the end of the year. Now this government is taking it away.

The beginning of the end began long ago. While the government boasts that this legislation signifies an estimated $2.1 billion increase over five years to the child benefits system, we must remember that $3.5 billion has already been taken out of the child benefits system between 1986 and 1991.

The long awaited and promised national child care strategy, a significant deterrent to child poverty, has been completely abandoned, creating additional financial hardship on low and middle income families, especially single parent families. This government has brought forward several initiatives which have negatively affected poor families, such as the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan.

Another area of concern is over what this legislation might mean for women in our society. Some women in abusive relationships, as an example, will now be losing their only form of income, the family allowance. The statistics speak for themselves. Many women feel trapped in these relationships because the only thing that separates them from the poverty abyss is the income of their abusive male partner. Now they are losing their only independent source of income.

It has been established that one of the main reasons for spousal violence against women is the need to control. What better way to control someone than by depriving them of all financial resources? For these women family allowances has been a life–saving buoy.

There are other areas of concern regarding this legislation: the lack of consultation both before and after the release of the white paper; the manner and speed with which the Conservative government is trying to drive the legislation through Parliament unamended; the fact that the Minister of National Health and Welfare would not appear before the committee to defend his proposal which supports the disturbing trend under the Conservative government of transferring social policy to finance; the regressive nature of the increased child care deduction; the enrichment of the RRSP tax deduction which will cost the government millions of dollars in unclaimed revenue and be of assistance only to higher income groups.

The government through this legislation will be using $500 million to provide bigger monthly payments to a carefully targeted group of low income Canadians, thereby creating an illusion of wealth for thousands of low income Canadians in the months leading up to the next election.

Early in January, just as people are coping with paying holiday bills, they will get a big increase in their monthly cheques. For example, a two–child family with an annual income of $30,000 will get $153 a month instead of $70. A few months later, at income tax time, it will be able to claim the usual child tax credits. The government is hoping that most will not realize that it will be their last opportunity for claiming the usual child tax credits. The government is hoping that no one will realize when it is election time, possibly next spring, that their cheques will begin to decrease in July because they are not indexed to inflation.

The government is hoping that low income families will not realize at election time that they will not receive in November their usual $800 first instalment of their 1993 refundable child tax credit. There will be no such thing any more if this legislation goes through.

This is a government that is deceitful at its worst. The government is hoping that no one will realize when it is time to vote that their child credits have disappeared from the tax system as they have all been rolled into the bigger monthly cheques sent out in the initial months of this plan.

This is creative financing at its best. Government spin doctors have been having a field day.

This bill is flawed. It is deceitful and it is unnecessary. It will hurt every Canadian family with children, particularly those families impoverished or on the brink of poverty and also women in unfortunate situations of abuse or neglect. It is not too late for this government to listen to some reason and to have a conscience for these people and these families in situations in which they cannot afford to do without this.

I ask the government to reconsider, to take this bill back and seriously look at the flaws that are inherent in it.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but make a few comments on this legislation.

On November 24, 1989 the House of Commons adopted a resolution. I will read this resolution into the record. It states:

> That this House express its concern for the more than one million Canadian children currently living in poverty and seek to achieve the goal of eliminating poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000.

That was supported by the House of Commons.

Fairly recently, in fact I think it was last May, we approved and became a part of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. In fact, Canada co-chaired this convention. We were very proud and honoured to see our country playing such a leadership role at the international level in trying to promote the rights of children abroad. That is to be commended, but since May 1992 we have seen no national strategy and no action plan.

The only thing we have heard to date is a comment made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare on May 7, 1992 when he was asked by one of my colleagues about his plans concerning child poverty in Canada. His comment at the time was that there were no specific plans to deal with child poverty.

It led me to believe that what we have put in writing in this House and what we have voted on is not really what we are taking action on. In other words, it is the public at large that is going to look at the action of this Parliament and the vote of this House with suspicion, and rightly so because it has been deceived more than once.

I say this because we have poverty in our country. In fact, one out of every six children in Canada lives in poverty. As well, the death rate of poor children is 50 per cent higher than it is for members of the population with higher incomes. When we look at aboriginal children in Canada we find that their life expectancy is at least eight years shorter than the national average. Suicide is the second leading cause of death among Canadian adolescents. I would suggest that figure would increase for poor children.

Let us examine the illiteracy rate of high school students and the drop-out rate of over 30 per cent. All these things require an over-all national strategy to deal with this question. We require a collective effort, not only on the part of the federal government but on the part of the provincial and municipal governments.

Unfortunately, the person or the group or the government that has taken the lead so far on child poverty has abandoned it and has passed it on to other levels of government without any sense of responsibility or any sense of accountability. That is very sad. That is why we are seeing the third sector, the non-profit sector, stepping in to fill the gap. That is also why church organizations are being forced on their own, without any kind of assistance or involvement from the government, to use their own resources to try to help fight child poverty.

I have one example of those who are working tirelessly. Members of St. Andrew's Church in my riding have circulated a petition nation-wide—I assume that all members in this House will be approached to circulate this petition in their ridings—urging the government to keep its commitment when it comes to dealing with child poverty and promising to eliminate child poverty by the year 2000.

Another level of government, the Regional Municipality of Ottawa–Carleton, in our national capital region, has unanimously passed a resolution calling on the federal government to take action and keep its promise in trying to deal with child poverty in Canada.

These are not enough. It is the responsibility of the federal government to not only direct the traffic but also to send a proper signal to those other partners that we are serious about what we are doing.

It is not fair for legislation to be put in place that tries to tell the community out there that we are trying to help them if they are poor, the working poor, or of middle income when what we are doing is taking money away from them.

I am talking about the supplement that the government has decided in its own wisdom not to link to inflation or to the cost of living. Anyone, whether in the private sector or the public sector, knows that we live in a society where there is not always zero inflation.

As a matter of fact, in the 1980s the inflation rate was over 12 per cent. With a 12 per cent inflation rate and a zero per cent increase in the supplement for those poor families these people will be losing over 12 per cent on an annual basis. Inflation has eaten away at the supplement that the government is saying that it is giving them.

Second, we are putting in place legislation that gives responsibilities to other levels of government without telling people that there are any strings attached. We know too well what happens to transfer payments for education. Provinces take the money from the federal government, turn around and spend it on bridges and roads. Our institutions suffer as a result of that.

We have an incredible illiteracy rate. We have an incredible drop–out rate in our schools. We have an incredible drop–out rate in our universities. Simply put, this is because we do not have enough resources at the institutional levels. This is no different from what will happen with the new legislation.

My colleague from Nepean mentioned that this marks the end of universality. If we do not want to be so radical in our assumption, if it is not, it is half way to ending universality in our country.

We are saying this because we believe that there is a need for a national strategy to deal with child poverty. There is a need for a national strategy to attack the question of poverty, not for half measures that hurt those who need our help the most. These half measures are not helping the poor.

That is why I and my colleagues have been encouraging the government to look at and deal with some of those amendments which were put before the minister and the government.

What happened? We had closure. Tomorrow we must go to third reading and rubber stamp the bill whether we want it or not so that it will become a law in January 1993. That is not very fair. It is not very fair because we have to allow a proper consultation to take place. We have to examine it and do an impact study to determine whether this bill as it is fits into what we have already committed ourselves, which is to eliminate child poverty by the year 2000.

We also must look at this bill and determine whether it fits with what we have promised. Not only Canadians but every country all over the world must see that we are serious about dealing with the question of child poverty in our country. Frankly, what we have before us does not address the question at hand. In fact, it falls into a hole on its own.

The government is making a major error in moving very quickly without a proper assessment of this legislation.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to this debate in my offices and listened to drivel from the other side about this very important measure that was set out in the budget of February in detail. This measure was set out then and it has gone through all the stages of committee hearings and public exposure since then.

I heard my friend from Ottawa Centre say: "We need more time, we need more time, we need more time". What nonsense. Surely to goodness a change set out in the budget of February should be able to be effected on January 1 of the following year. That is surely not expeditiously cramming it through.

Surely that is ordinary common sense in the ordinary disposal of decent legislation. If anything, the government is much too slow on these tax changes. My friend from Ottawa Centre ought to be ashamed of himself for saying that they need more time, that it does not fit in with an attack on poverty, that transferring money to families on a monthly basis, on a tax-free basis, is not something that will help people to raise their children. It may not solve all the poverty problems in the world, but it goes a long way.

He attacks it on the basis that it does not do anything for people who are on welfare because they do not have earned income. The last time this House did something for people on welfare, for example the disabled, we gave them money and the provinces took it away. We cannot give them money in this bill because the provinces will just take away their entitlement. We are giving them exactly what they had before, no less and no more. There is not any change in their welfare arrangement because the moment we give them more money from the federal treasury, the provinces grab it.

That is a sensible reason why people in the welfare stream are not specifically looked after in a better fashion. There is no desire to hurt them or penalize them, but there is also no desire to make another transfer to another greedy provincial government that, the moment we give a tax break, immediately issues a new budget and raises its taxes again to grab all the tax room that the federal government in its desire to help people has made available. That is the sensible reason. The member ought to know that, say that and understand that.

Mr. Harb: You mean Ontario or British Columbia?

Mr. Blenkarn: Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia and every other province in the country.

What we have is a transfer, an amalgamation and a settlement of three confusing transfers that are already there, to which has been added another $500 million. We were transferring family allowance money out to people. That money is taken from the family allowance and put in this package. We were transferring to people allowances toward children in the Income Tax Act, a poor allowance, a rotten allowance. It was originally $65 for the first two kids and $130 for the subsequent children in a family, not much of an allowance and only good to people who had taxable income.

Mr. Volpe: I am glad you noticed.

Mr. Blenkarn: Not a heck of a lot but a complication, so we took that out. We are adding that into the till. What else? We have an existing child tax credit program, but people qualify on the basis of filing their tax returns. If they happen to owe tax money, guess what happens? The Minister of National Revenue grabs it. Yes. So the present system works out to help the taxman collect his taxes. It does not help the people who do not have any money. In this system we transfer money to the people who do not have any on the first of every month in advance, tax free. What is wrong with that?

Does the member for Ottawa Centre think there is something wrong with transferring money to people with needy families, tax free? We are taking away the family allowance, but we have already taken the family allowance away from every person with an income of $50,000 or better. Under this scheme people with $60,000 worth of income are still beneficiaries. All this scheme does is make it easier for ordinary folks to raise their kids. I do not know why members of the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party have something against people wanting to put money into the hands of people to raise their kids, but they do.

It is high time this bill was voted on and high time these foolish amendments were voted down.

• (1550)

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to again speak on this most important legislation.

I would like to point out to the hon. member who spoke before me that we do think it is haste when the government is trying to undo 50 years of social policy in this country in seven months.

The past seven months when this Parliament has been in adjournment, has been preoccupied with the Constitution, has been preoccupied with high unemployment, has been preoccupied in completing the trade deals, this government has been sweeping aside 50 years of social policy.

Yes, we are upset. Yes, we are saying that this government is acting with undue haste. Fifty years of Canadian social policy is going down the tubes. One of the things that is most striking about this whole debate is that it is taking place the same week that we are setting out on a referendum to try to keep this country together, a unity referendum some people are calling it.

If you go right across this country and ask people what identifies us as Canadians, what makes us different from the Americans, what keeps us together, they will identify social programs. Traditionally they would identify three social programs: old age pensions that everybody received; family allowance that everybody received; and medicare that everybody received without fear of financial bankruptcy.

A mother in the Gaspé peninsula or in Pouce Coupe, B.C. or in northern Alberta or New Brunswick would say that she is in receipt of the same family allowance for all of her children. It was a unifying force. It was something that identified us as distinctly Canadian.

It is like a ball game. It is three strikes and you are out. Old age pensions are gone as a universal program. Family allowance will be gone as a universal program. This bill makes it no longer a universal program.

That leaves medicare, which is under attack as a universal program because of the government's cutbacks to the provinces which lessens their ability to pay for universal health care. In fact, the medical association in British Columbia has said clearly that universal health care programs are no longer sustainable in Canada and that it is a policy of the B.C. Medical Association to no longer have universal health care.

With all of these wrapped together, the very fabric of Canada is under attack by this government at a time when we should be launching into a unity debate about keeping this country together.

This is also bad social policy. In fact, I had the opportunity to speak earlier about the whole question. This goes back to the Elizabethan poor law, the deserving poor and the undeserving poor. It is also based on another fundamental flaw in income security programs, and that is the concept of categorical assistance.

Categorical assistance was developed in conjunction with the concept of the deserving and undeserving. There were various categories, and the assistance rates varied, not based on their economic need, not based on their social conditions, not based on what it would take to ensure that they were above the poverty line, but based on their category.

Therefore, there was the blind person's allowance, handicapped person's allowance, veterans' allowance, mother's allowance. It was a long time before men who were unemployed were given any kind of assistance. They were in the lowest of categories in terms of categorical assistance. This is now perpetuating it because we are now going back to a concept of categorical assistance.

This is no longer a universal family allowance program. This is a categorical income assistance program. Certain people in one category will get a certain amount of money. Other people who happen to be working and are now deemed deserving, will get additional money, an additional $42 per month per child. The poorest of the poor, the ones who have no earned income, get less.

If you really sit and think about this, what are the case examples? A mother who has been working, trying to support her two children on $11,000 year loses her job because of the trade deal. What does the government do? It takes away from her $84 a month. It is incredible. Here is a working poor mother who loses her job and what do we do in this legislation? We say to her: "You are only half down, we will kick you down a little farther, we will take away another $84". It is an incredibly stupid social policy. The mother who is living with an abusive husband, who after a certain length of time deserts her, what do we do to her? We say to the mother: "Your husband has deserted you so we are going to take away your family allowance because there is no income coming in. He is considered a single person paying single income tax on his own. What we are going to do is take away your family allowance".

We say to the abused mother or the children who are being abused: "Do not dare leave that abusive husband. Do not dare leave that person who is abusing your children because if you do we are going to take away your $84 a month. We are going to make it as difficult and as impossible for you as we possibly can". This is bad social policy.

I wish the Conservative government had gone back and read a few books on the development of social policies and income security programs in Canada. It would have realized that what it is doing is going back to the whole concept of the deserving and the undeserving poor, the concept of categorical assistance, where assistance is provided, not based on need, not based on what it takes to live, but based on various categories. There is a category of the working mother and the category of the non-working mother.

At the same time this government is making it extremely difficult for the provinces to deal with family poverty, particularly the larger provinces, Alberta, B.C. and Ontario where it has cut back dramatically on the Canada Assistance Plan. The Canada Assistance Plan is designed to provide income assistance to the very poor, the people who have no other source of income.

A witness before the committee said it best: "I think it is critical to remember that children are not poor in themselves. They are poor because their parents do not have enough money". That is what we have.

Mr. Speaker, you are signalling that my time is up. Unfortunately for many Canadians, it may be that the time is up for family allowances. I would just remind Canadians that it is strike two on universal programs. Old Age Security is gone, family allowance is gone and the only thing left is medicare, which if this government continues its present course on social policy will also be gone.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I would have appreciated if that speech could have been given to the Legislative Assembly in British Columbia because it would be addressed to an NDP government that would be able to deal with the problems the way the member asks us to do. About 75 per cent of his speech addressed problems dealing with the province of British Columbia and not the federal government.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the member for Surrey, I often wonder if we are talking about the same bill in this House.

I do not know if it does any good to confuse the Canadian public as to what is actually happening here. He makes statements to the effect that we are eroding certain programs that we have in this country. That is totally inaccurate. He is suggesting that we are tearing up or destroying the very fabric of Canada. That is a total exaggeration.

Some of the fundamentals of this program have to be explained, and I do not think he has done a very fair job of that. What we are talking about is a bill that will replace an existing patchwork of benefits into one new package. This new package will be called the child tax benefit. We are taking three patchwork programs and replacing them with one.

I question whether the members on the other side actually read the pamphlet that the minister, who is with us today in the House, put out explaining the program. In fact, it reached many Canadians; I know it reached my constituents. They have read it and have responded well to it. This booklet called The Child Benefit outlines clearly what we want to do. It is far different from what the member has just suggested.

In very simple terms, what we want to do is replace three patchwork programs with one program that works.

What will the net result be? The net result will be that it will put more money into the hands of Canadian families that need it. It will put more money into the hands of Canadian families. That is something which the opposition ignores completely. They have ignored it all week in this debate. The fundamental truth of this program is that it puts more money into the hands of Canadian families that need it.

I will explain to my constituents quite openly that if they earn over $70,000, this program will not benefit them. I will admit that. I will admit that this program will benefit no one that makes over $70,000 in this country. But those people are not complaining about this program anyway because under the present patchwork system, the family allowance is taxed back anyway. They are saying, why give me something that will simply be taken away come tax time? So that is what we have done.

I have letters on file in my office from my constituents actually complaining "why do you send out this thing?" and the constituent explains "this thing called family allowance, only to tax it back at the end of the year?" I suggest he is absolutely right. Why would we do it?

That is what we are doing with this new program, as is so clearly explained by the minister in this pamphlet. The minister steps through what this program will do for Canadian families. If the NDP wants to argue that it is going to hurt Canadian families that need it most, that is a fallacious argument, it is not accurate at all.

The only families that will receive less under this program are families making over $70,000 a year and at the end of tax time there is virtually no difference for them anyway because the present family allowance is taxable. It is taxed back. The system that we are talking about now will be a non-taxable support package, one payment coming in monthly. It will allow families to manage their money better. There will be a flow of money coming in monthly versus getting family allowance on a monthly basis and having to wait until tax time to take advantage of the other parts of the program, whether it be the child tax credit or the refundable child tax credit. Let the Canadian people know that this program will help families.

I want to give some examples of what it will actually do. Again, this is outlined in our brochure. It uses an example here of Patricia and her children. Patricia is a single parent who works in a clothing store. It outlines exactly what this program will do for her and her children, a single parent with two children, one aged three and one aged eight, the wages of that family of one working parent of $19,000 a year with child care expenses of $1,500 a year.

Under the plan that exists now, Patricia receives a monthly family allowance cheque of $69.76 for a total of $837 a year for her two children, Andrew and Jane. She pays tax. Can you believe it? A wage earner of $19,000 pays tax on that little bit of money, although she says, which is accurate, she receives an equivalent to married credit of $915 for Jane and the regular child tax benefit of $71 for her son Andrew.

It says that in November 1992 Patricia receives a prepayment of the refundable child tax credit. The remaining $400 is paid after the tax refund is filed. Total annual benefits for Andrew and Jane are $1,925.

Under the new system, after the introduction of this in January, the single parent will receive a single monthly cheque of $211.67 versus that single monthly payment of $69.76. Under the new program the total annual benefit would reach $2,540.

Unlike the program we are presently under, the new child tax benefit will not be subject to tax. She will also retain the equivalent to married credit for that one child.

The annual assistance for this family, a single mother working with two children, will be up by $615. By my standards that is more, not less. So it is with all families in that category of under $70,000 per year.

Again, the fundamentals are correct. Do not let the opposition confuse the Canadian people as to what is happening. The new system will work. It will be much fairer for those people that need income.

The other interesting thing about this new program is that welfare recipients, for example, will not receive less than what they did under the old program. The member opposite just admitted yes, in fact they will get the same. The important thing to remember, and I stress this, is that low income families, the working poor, will receive more.

If you question why would that be, it is very simple. Giving people the initiative or an incentive to do it themselves has to do with self-esteem and respect. Most people that I speak to want that self-respect. They want to feel that they have done something to better themselves. They want governments to recognize that.

All the other safety nets will be there for people who, for whatever reason, do not work or cannot work. We have those systems, the existing federal or provincial programs. But where we have fallen down as governments, and I am talking both federally and provincially, is that we have not recognized the working poor. That is the one big advantage in this new program. For once, we are recognizing the working poor. Over all, I can support this new system and I think that all fair-minded Canadians will support this new system.

[Translation]

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I am resuming the speech that I had to interrupt for lunch. I would like to come back to the speech given by my colleague from the Progressive Conservative Party.

[English]

When he says that he can support this legislation he ignores something that we have been addressing throughout the entire debate this day and the last.

That is that it is fundamentally flawed because it shows a particular philosophical departure from those tenets which we have established as being central to a Canadian identity, a social identity, one that puts the individual citizen first and foremost as the object of all legislative initiatives.

This morning I said that we have a basic problem with this legislation. That problem is seen in the way it does not address the interest and the needs of those elements of society which are most vulnerable.

Even my colleague from the Conservative Party has noted that young children of single parent families, which by the way have the largest increase in numbers in terms of types of families we have in this country, and children from welfare families are the ones most prone to the difficulties that are imposed by the vagaries of our economy, our marketplace and our society.

We see that not only through the very short term. Immediate needs of food, shelter and clothing, needs that will not be satisfied by this legislation, needs which set the fashion, have been diminished because of the government and this minister's actions in the past when we have cut $3.5 billion from this kind of a program through a cap on CAP and other such programs.

Those children suffer in the immediate short term, but they suffer as well through some of the findings of the government which findings indicate that students from families that have been improperly nourished by financial means find themselves at a disadvantage in school. They are the children which are most likely not to succeed. They also represent the greatest portion of those who fall into that category of dropping out prior to achieving a high school diploma.

What happens? I closed off this morning's debate with the suggestion that if we do not pay now, we will pay much more later. The government does not seem to appreciate that its own findings suggest that not nourishing our society at this level today means that we will have a loss in productivity which it has identified with its studies. We will have a built-in clientele for large unemployment as we head into a highly technological advanced period in the history of mankind. Most of all, we will create a clientele of dependency among those who are going to be very ill equipped to handle the new changes that come upon us.

Yet this government says that we must accept this legislation without any of the amendments that the opposition members who have so studiously laboured over this bill are putting forward.

When I say studiously laboured over in order to arrive at such amendments, I remind the Speaker and members of this House that only one witness that appeared before the committee studying this legislation had anything positive to say about the legislation, just one, a junior professor at one of the universities. But all of the associations that deal with social policy, those that deal with the front line consequences of this type of legislation, bash the government. They were invited by the government to appear.

This kind of legislation putting forward initiatives and law does not do a heck of a lot for generating confidence in the general public. It is the same lack of confidence that I fear may be hitting us with respect to the constitutional package proposed by the government in this last week.

The Minister for Constitutional Affairs said that we have to accept this deal and that it is really the only one we could have had. I quote him: "Our goal here is agreement". Nothing else, just agreement. It is agreement based on some principles we had before us but no final, official text. I wonder sometimes whether it is possible to achieve agreement in an adversarial parliamentary system that is not designed to strike agreement very easily. I wonder if that agreement is possible when the negotiators at the table, all the first ministers and representatives of the aboriginal communities, found themselves developing a climate that perverts an old ethic that has governed legislators and civic-minded citizens the world over for the greater part of this century.

Unfortunately, I would have to quote an American president who verbalized that ethic when he said 30 years ago: "Ask not what your country can do for you, but what you can do for your country". We found the emergence of a package from negotiators who went with one basic approach: "What can I get? Gimme, gimme. Let us see what we can get for ourselves", rather than what we can do to enhance this country and to make it grow.

I wonder if Canada can be well served when we had provincial premiers at a table determining the directions of Canada and on one hand allegedly pleading for a Senate that will represent provincial and regional interests and on the other hand attempting to institutionalize an annual First Ministers Conference on the economy, not realizing, of course, that what they are doing in this process is undermining the role of members of Parliament and senators.

It is these kinds of things that erode the sense of confidence. For example, we could have had an opportunity at that moment for all members negotiating to tear down some of the things that divide us such as, on a commercial basis, things like tariffs. The minister asked us, "to stop focusing on the past and its wrongs and to focus on the future and its promise". He ignores something I would like to bring to the attention of the House. This is a Globe and Mail article dated August 17, sent to me by one of my constituents, Mr. Kohn, written by an associate professor, a former resident and citizen of Canada, now at the University of California in L.A., Professor Harry Vinters.

He says:

> On visits home I see a nation torn apart by bitter squabbling over constitutional language issues largely focused on the "founding cultures" both of which have become fossilized, intransigent and practically oblivious to the fact that much of Canada's current vigour derives from neither its French nor its British roots. It comes instead from the strength and diversity of relatively recent European, Asian and Caribbean immigrants.
> Nearing the turn of the millennium, Canada is a country whose Chief of State is a man named Hnatyshyn and whose political leadership includes people with such names as Mazankowski, Jelinek, Romanow and a collection that one could scarcely have imagined even 50 years ago.

That package and the country is asking people who come from that kind of a background for yet one more sacrifice, to face their own identity so that others can be satisfied in the fashioning of a Canadian one.

I and many others from such a community will support that package nonetheless. Once and for all we hope it will end a lot of the squabbling that has afflicted all of Canada. Second, perhaps we will finally send a signal to the international community that we have set our house in order and that we will carry on and finally solve some of the short-term issues on regional representation, questions about distinct society and the concept of aboriginal self-government.

• (1620)

Finally, I think it gives all Canadian citizens an opportunity to say Yes to Canada.

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Italian.]

I would like to say something in Italian because for one last time hopefully the ethnocultural communities of our multicultural society are being asked to make one more sacrifice on behalf of Canada. They are willing to put their own identity aside in the hope of promoting a Canadian one even though others are busily fractioning and partitioning Canada. They are destroying the wealth and resource of a Canada that the immigrant community and it's children know but which the current government scarcely recognizes.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, thank you for giving me the opportunity to say that in my own language.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I too rise to take part in this debate on Bill C-80 at the report stage. In particular, I would like to speak for a few minutes on the amendments before the House which we feel are quite important. However, before doing that I would just like to say that the Conservative government has been clever and consistent in taking from low and middle-income Canadians over the past number of years.

There is the example of the $3.5 billion that has been cut out because of the deindexation of the child benefit system, the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan and budget cuts to social housing. It cancelled the national child care program, it has reduced UI eligibility and offered no new retraining or job creation initiatives.

These are just some of the areas that in my mind this government has inflicted right across Canada on Canadians. This was done whether they were unemployed because jobs have been lost over the last few years, the working poor who have depended on housing, the poor who have lost hope and have no jobs or working mothers. This government through all its social programs has made a dedicated effort to cut back on those most in need.

As it cuts back in this particular instance, it is the children in Canada who are going to hurt. I will just quote from Dr. Robert Glossop of the Vanier Institute of the Family when he said: "The anti-poverty impact of the new system will be negligible and will provide benefits inequitably to different categories of the power." I believe that and I will explain why.

The point of this bill is that for the first time in Canada's post-war history we will have no affirmation of a commitment by this government to children universally and to the parents who care for them.

It may seem like we have to cut back because these are tough times but I cannot help but feel that it would be better to allow the family allowance benefits to continue for another year rather than rushing this bill in a very depressed time in the economy. It could allow the spending to continue out there and bring back the indexation or the $3.5 billion it has cut since 1986 to 1991 from families in the family allowance program.

Of course the minister says we need it. He needs it. It needs it. This government needs it to get re-elected next year. They need to give Canadians $1,020. This will be the same amount as what the person who receives the $1,020 in January would have received under the present system.

There will be many others who will say it is good for the government to cut the family allowance, but they do not realize that the non-refundable child tax credit will be gone as well as the refundable child tax credit as well as that which the woman or parent or person who raises the children will have no right to unless they qualify.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. With due respect, the member is stepping through a number of figures which are inaccurate. At the end of the day the very family she is talking about will have more money, not less money, and therefore I think she has to be corrected.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): You will understand that this is a matter of opinion. Therefore the Chair can only listen to the points of view of both sides.

I again recognize the hon. member for South West Nova.

[English]

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): I hope that the hon. member is not taking my time with his inane comment. He has a minister who does not even go to the committee to explain to the members what he is probably espousing.

The minister may want to counter that. I agree that the same people will receive the same amount of money. There are many more who will not receive.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. minister.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I take exception to what the member said about my presence in the committee. I have proven in the past that I can go to the committee when we believe the minister can provide the information. This is normally available to all members, including the Conservative members, who have exactly the same figures and can talk about that accordingly. I would appreciate if the member does not refer to my absence but to my presence at the committees.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for South West Nova.

Mr. Walker: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Walker: This has been a very interesting exchange and I am very happy to have the minister today participating in the debate because I think he will begin to recognize how much we would have appreciated and enjoyed his participation at an earlier stage to clarify some of these questions between other members.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I must remind members on both sides of the House that no mention must be made of a colleague's presence or absence in this Chamber. I ask the hon. member to return to the consideration of the motions in question.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, it was not a question of his absence from this House, because he was indeed here. It had to do with his absence from the committee. He can come here, to the House, at any time, but I was referring to his absence from the committee.

[English]

I want to get to the crux of it. Yes, the people who received benefits before will continue to receive them. I have no qualms at all about that. They will receive their entitlement to the child tax credit with a refundable child tax credit because they are going on the income tax year of 1992. It will not be until 1993 that that same family will realize that there is no child tax credit coming back and that there is no non-refundable tax credit or the family allowance. Three things are going for most Canadian families. It is not most Canadian families, but for any family that has a net income of $25,000 to $66,000. Their benefits will go on a decreasing scale as they get to the net total income of the family earnings of $66,000 and a bit. I think it is $66,721 for a family of two. If there was a larger family it would probably be a little higher.

There is no doubt in my mind that this is one of those programs that the government shows an inability to change in mid-stream. It brought out a February budget where it wanted to put a cap on CAP and it did. It is now doing it to the family allowance where people would be spending this money in a depressed time, keeping the economy stimulated and keeping the jobs out there because of the government spending. This side of the House is asking this government for any type of massive job creation across Canada so people will start working. They are taking money out that would keep stimulating it when most people are saying the government has got to do something. It cannot just sit there. I say this because, over all, this government will now put on an added onus—this is where the amendment comes in—because it will take anywhere up to 18 months for a couple whose income changes within a year.

Mr. Speaker, I realize you are telling me I have two minutes. I hope you are not taking the minister's time and including it in my 10 minutes. It should not be so. I just want to say that there are two fears about this program. It is geared to the lower income in the working poor. A lot of those lower-income people rely on other assistance. Let us say it is provincial welfare assistance. I have seen it in the past where, if it is a disability pension and they are receiving social service assistance, then as the Canada pension disability goes up, the province takes it back. This is what will probably happen without a commitment. This government never gets that type of commitment anyway. It would not bother. The province has every right to take it back.

What is even worse is that as it takes back paying the social service assistance, it will not have to pay the 50 cent dollar on the social service assistance that would have been paid. So it is gaining on the Canada Assistance Plan because it will not have to pay that welfare. Even if it is only $4 or $10 a month, it is something that is being taken away from the Canadian people and from people who need it such as children. The onus is going back to not giving it to the children, but making sure that if there is a gain that the province can come in and take it away. They do it under the disability pension for people in my province. You get the indexation one month and the next month the cheque goes down.

There is another thing I want to say and it is a shame. I wanted to say that our party feels there should be a child benefit adjustment board. There are those people who do suffer the loss of a job and have to wait for their next yearly income tax. There will be a transition there that is going to hurt families and children across the board.

The minister may want to rise and say that people can write in right away and do this and this. Does he know that I am getting pensions that are under the Canada disability plan that have been there for many years. They are getting $20,000 back and they have to pay the welfare back? The systems don't work any more in this government.

This government is a tired government. This government has got to go. It has lost the confidence of the Canadian people and this is just one more action to help I don't know who. It may help their election perhaps by bribing some Canadians until June next year.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before giving the floor to another speaker, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Halifax—Judges; the hon. member for Don Valley East—The Environment; the hon. member for St. Boniface—Linguistic Minorities; the hon. member for Hamilton West—Employment.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take part in the debate this afternoon. But some regrettable things are being said and I think it is important to set the record straight so as to explain why Canadians very favorably received this bill in April and are very positive towards what this government is doing for children.

[English]

At the same time we understand why the Liberal party had a problem with the provinces in the past in the way that they are mixing up the responsibilities of the province. The member from Nova Scotia said that the welfare system does not work. The federal government is involved in the social benefits for welfare, but at the same time—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the member for South West Nova.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): I never said the welfare system in Nova Scotia does not work. If I ever said that then I would be at a loss, because that is what a lot of people in my riding are on. The minister has by capping CAP tried that. I would never say that the welfare system does not work because that is the only income most people have who are not working.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please! It is a matter of differing opinion.

I again give the floor to the hon. minister.

[English]

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, it is wonderful the way that the member understood what I said. I did not say that the welfare system did not work in Nova Scotia. I said "the member from Nova Scotia". This is where I understand the member is from. I said that the welfare system, wherever you are in the country, is under the responsibility of the province, whichever province we are talking about.

I want to explain today the reasons why Canadians welcomed the announcement we made in April and June about the package for children. Canadians know very well that first we dealt with the convention for children which was signed by the Prime Minister last December in front of all the children of Canada and is highly regarded by all Canadians.

Second, we announced the package of children's benefits which represents more than $2 billion over five years for the children of Canada. We are trying to help what we called at the time the low income workers' children, those who will not receive the benefits of the social benefit system but at the same time are within the $10,000 to $20,000 bracket.

A lot of women in the $10,000, $11,000 or $12,000 bracket will receive $400 a child more than they did before. That is the category of people we are targeting.

At the same time, we announced in June—

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. The minister states that a woman will receive an extra $400, but the documents states $500. Would the minister please clarify whether it is $400 or $500.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): If the documents say $500, trust the documents, because the documents were prepared by the minister.

What I was about to say is that we also announced what we called at the time the Children at Risk: Brighter Futures with $500 million for children. It deals with the question of the promotion, the protection and the prevention of all problems that our children, particularly those who are between zero and seven years of age, face in the country. All of this represents more than $3 billion announced by this government for the children of Canada over the past six months.

I repeat what I said. It was highly applauded by Canadians. We know that 75 to 80 per cent of Canadians agreed, particularly with the children's benefit program. Canadians agreed that we should be giving more money to the poorer people, the poorer families and less to those with higher incomes who are more able to look after themselves and their children. That is the policy we are talking about.

The reason we asked the House to pass the bill today is so that we will be able to give that money to the children of Canada beginning January 1, 1993. It is a good reason. We believe that it is a good policy.

The opposition should applaud it. I do not understand why they are opposed to us giving $1 billion more to the children of Canada. It is not the way they would do it. We are doing what we can within our capacity. We have to face fiscally and economically that reality, not in the way they did it before when they had exhausted almost all the capacity that this country had to pay not only for children.

Also, I think that Canadians in general are satisfied with the way the government has acted toward Canada's children, especially with the fact that in the past six months we added $3.1 billion to the money already paid. That was quite an effort, recognized throughout the world, considering that the programs for children in Canada are now among the best in the world and still managed in a fiscally responsible way.

Again, when we look at all we are doing, of course, as we say for the constitutional agreement, it is not perfect and we are quite aware of that. But given our ability to face our actual situation today, we think that $3.1 billion, of which $2 billion will be allocated directly over five years to help low income working parents improve their revenue, is a matter of balance, whatever the New Democrats in particular think of the famous sacrosanct principle of universality whereby people earning $500,000 a year got family allowances when low-income individuals benefited less.

With that in mind, I hope and trust—

• (1640)

[English]

—the opposition will now applaud the quality of the bill, particularly because it is part of a package which has been announced over the last six months. We have, among the industrialized countries of the world, almost the best programs and we provide the best programs we can for the children of Canada.

Therefore, I would appreciate it if the opposition would recognize what this government has done. It may be the most that any Government of Canada has done for the children of Canada.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to take part in this debate and to support the amendments put forward by my hon. colleague from Winnipeg North Centre.

This amendment would permit the Minister of National Revenue to reassess the child benefit amount in the case of a loss of family income and make an adjustment within three months. This amendment would address the responsiveness problem in the bill which would result in an 18-month delay in adjusting the benefit.

Listening to the minister speak just a moment ago begs the question: If this legislation is going to be that great a benefit to the children of Canada, why did all of the groups, why did our critic in the Liberal Party and the other critics and the various groups across the country appearing before the committee have a different opinion?

I fear that the Canada we have known in the social sense is about to come to an end. The legislation being debated marks the end of universality of one of the oldest social programs and, as far as I am concerned, is replacing it with a magic show full of smoke and mirrors and sleight of hand to make the poorest of Canadians feel that they are receiving some kind of a benefit just before the next election.

We have seen some remarkable displays from this government in the past. While it gears up for the next election, our mail boxes have been flooded with tabloid style advertising sheets, as we know, singing the praises of the free trade deal and promising even better results from NAFTA. To read the propaganda being put forward, one would be hard-pressed to figure out why over 1.5 million Canadians are looking for work and why the country is in the depths of the worst economic downturn since another Prime Minister was going to blast his way into the markets of the world in the 1930s.

The legislation which is before us today is somewhat similar to the sheet being put out about how healthy our economy is. The legislation is part of a fundamental change in our social policy, designed to give the illusion of increased benefits beginning next January, reinforced at tax time by seemingly increased family benefits.

We know that the next federal election must be held before the end of November 1993, coincidentally about the same time the benefits which seem so real early in the year will start to disappear and the true nature of this legislation will become obvious. This legislation will then be seen for what it is, part of an agenda which is designed to further advance the interests of those that control the assets of this nation. The old saying "the rich get richer while the poor get poorer" has never been more true than when speaking of this legislation.

As I said before, almost every witness who appeared before the committee studying this legislation condemned it. Representatives from welfare groups and agencies, from family services groups and academics were virtually unanimous in their condemnation. It was said that the legislation would do nothing to reduce or eliminate childhood poverty, nor would it do anything to allow people to raise themselves up to a higher economic standing. As I pointed out earlier, it creates the illusion before the next election that benefits will increase.

The whole process leading up to where we are today has been flawed by the unseeming haste of the government to get this legislation through without proper debate or study. We were allowed two days of debate and then closure was invoked.

The legislation was then sent to committee where brief hearings were held revealing mostly negative impressions of the legislation. Now, today, we are at report stage and the bill will soon become law.

The government will then try to implement these changes which are exceedingly complex before January 1 next, necessitating the training of some 4,000 public servants in the new program before its implementation.

They then will be administering a program which will be so complex that most taxpayers will not be able to make their own calculations but, rather, will have to depend on the calculations of these public servants to have their entitlement determined.

There are two ways that this House could deal with the bill in a just and a fair manner. It could be thrown out and new legislation could be brought in which would reflect some of the concerns that have been expressed before the committee. The other option is for the government to listen to some of the amendments that have been proposed which, while they are not perfect we admit, would at least remove some of the most glaring inequities in this legislation.

Our party would of course like to see the entire bill done away with and a just, a fair and an equitable benefits package developed. We certainly have the resources and the expertise to do that, and to bring something before this House that would be a positive step toward eliminating poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000, which has been the stated goal of this House since 1989.

I am not naive enough to believe that the government would do this. Perhaps it will listen to some of our other suggestions which would at least make the current legislation a little more palatable. The full indexation of the benefits proposed—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. It being 4.45 p.m., pursuant to order adopted earlier today, in accordance with Standing Order 78(3) it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the report stage of the bill before the House.

[English]

The question is on Motion No. 36. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

[Translation]

The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on the report stage of the bill before the House.

Call in the members.

(And the bells having been rung:)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The first vote is on Motion No. 1, standing in the name of the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing.

The vote on this motion will also apply to Motions Nos. 3, 5, 7, 9, 11, 13, 15, 17, 19, 21, 32, 34, 39, 41, 43, 45, 47, 49, 51, 53, 55, 57, 59, 61, 63, 65, 69 and 71.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the the proposition. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the proposition?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Hicks: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am sorry I was a few seconds late coming in. I did not hear you read the question. Therefore I did not vote but I would naturally be honoured to have my name added on the subsequent votes to those of the government.

[Translation]

Mr. Chartrand: Point of order, Mr. Speaker, I was away for the vote and I would like my name to be added to the list of those who voted with the government for the following motions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried.

• (1720)

When shall the bill be read for the third time? According to the order made earlier today, at the next sitting of the House.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

EMPLOYEE SHARE PURCHASE PLAN ACT

The House resumed from Tuesday, June 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Butland that Bill C-327, an act to assist employees to purchase a controlling shareholding in the corporation that employs them and to amend the Income Tax Act in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Economics envelope.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, the House is faced with a private members' bill, Bill C-327. It stands in the name of my colleague, the member for Sault Ste. Marie. I think not only this House but all of Canada is indebted to my colleague for having put before this House a very creative and innovative proposal.

He is to be congratulated because in his own community he was faced with a very serious problem. Here is a member of Parliament representing a community in which the major industry employing some 5,000 or more people was faced with a shutdown.

This member of Parliament, along with the community, decided to work diligently to try and address that specific problem. Rather than spitting into the wind, rather than cursing the darkness, my colleague, the member for Sault Ste. Marie, decided to work diligently to find a solution to a problem that faced not only Algoma Steel but increasingly in 1992 faced many other communities.

We are in a period of recession and we have been in periods of recession before. I remember the recession of 1982 very well when plants were closing, when plants were laying people off in my own community. INCO and Falconbridge closed down for a whole year. The workers were laid off but hope sprang eternal in their breasts because they knew once the economy turned around they would be recalled and production would continue and they would earn wages and be able to pay their expenses and keep their families.

It is very different in 1992. Invariably when the plants close today, hope does not spring eternal because we are faced with a recession and a restructuring of the economy not only in Canada but world-wide. Some may not want to admit it but the fact is a lot of plants are closing here and when they close here they move somewhere else. We attribute that to the effects of the free trade agreement with the United States.

There is evidence of thousands of jobs being lost because the plants close here and relocate to the sunshine states where costs are less.

Plants do not have to worry about heating in the winter. In some cases there are no minimum wage laws in those states. The laws governing the organization of trade unions are very weak or non-existent, they are right to work states. They do not have effective legislation, not only on the books but enforced, with respect to occupational health and safety in the work place.

I was just listening to As It Happens last night. I heard about a chicken plant somewhere in Mississippi in which the conditions were most appalling. A fire took place in the plant and workers lost their lives.

As I said, in 1992 we are dealing with a different situation, not the same situation that existed in 1982. Plants are leaving now and not coming back. In some of these instances it is not that the plants are not making money, it is not that they are not making profits. In many instances it is that they are not making enough profits.

We have the case of Algoma. We have the case of Spruce Falls Pulp and Paper plant in Kapuskasing. It was going to close, not because it was not making money, but because it was not making enough money for those who owned the plant.

What my colleague has proposed is an employee ownership plan. At the moment we have no federal structure for employee ownership. It seems to me that federal governments, not only in the past but now the present government as well, deal with these situations in a knee-jerk reactionary approach. It is crisis management. As the crises arise, they try to come to a solution to the problem. Ontario and Manitoba are contemplating and have proposed legislation which sets a framework within which employee ownership can take place.

What my colleague has presented to the House of Commons is a bill, Bill C-327, which sets out the parameters and lays out the structure in which this type of ownership can take place. Why is it needed federally? As my colleague has pointed out, there is a need for the federal agencies to be involved. It means that we are thinking of a whole new concept. We are making the capital markets available to workers. Presently, capital markets are available to corporations and very wealthy individuals. What we are attempting in this plan is to make those capital markets available to workers.

To do that we need the co-operation of Revenue Canada, for example. The plan my colleague has put forward requires that the incentives extended to corporations vis-à-vis the Income Tax Act on investments should also be available to workers.

Surely this has to be a positive thing for Canada. When a worker starts taking responsibility for his work place in terms of being an owner, that has to have an effect, not only in terms of decision making, not just on the plant floor, but all the way to the board room. That input is important to the overall productivity of the plant. The sense of ownership that comes with this kind of plan is an important incentive for a worker to feel like part of the operation, thereby resulting in greater productivity.

This is the most effective way of redistributing wealth within the country and maintaining Canadian ownership in the work place and the corporations of the country.

Presently there is no federal legislation on this matter. Quebec has been light years ahead of the federal government with its co-op legislation which allows a corporation to shift from being privately owned to a co-op.

There are solidarity funds that allow for shares to be purchased in companies. That is not the plan my colleague has put forward. His plan deals with the individual workers working together as part of a collective purchasing ownership in the corporation, actually owning assets and influencing decisions on the daily operations and on the over-all strategy of the plant.

As I said before, I want to commend my colleague for this initiative. It certainly brings to our attention a very creative and innovative way to approach the problem in which we find ourselves. The example I mentioned before in Kapuskasing where the workers' jobs were saved because of an ownership plan and the Ontario government. This is probably one of the great achievements of the Ontario government. It saved the community that depended on that plant. I might point out that between December 1991 and June 1992 the plant turned a profit of $2 million.

I say to my colleague and to my colleagues in the House that Bill C-327 is the flagship of employee ownership in Canada. It is an idea whose time has come.

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Mr. Speaker, we are considering today Bill C-327 which proposes a 50 per cent tax deduction for investments to finance employee takeovers of the businesses where they work.

This deduction would be available to employees, employers or financial institutions involved in such investments.

The proposal raises a number of questions which deserve our careful consideration. One should ask whether the proposal is good for employees, whether it is good for business and finally whether it is good for taxpayers as a group.

We have been fortunate enough to have this summer to ponder these questions. I have spent considerable time studying the issues involved and have come to the conclusion that on the whole this proposal raises more problems than it resolves.

However, I welcome the opportunity to share with hon. members the reasoning which brings me to this conclusion.

I would begin by examining the proposal from the employees' standpoint. None would deny that Canadian employees put forward a great deal of effort in order to bring home their pay cheques. Their cheques must cover their bills for food, shelter, clothing and transportation. If they have special needs, these too must be met with the same pay cheques. We certainly cannot overlook the amount that must be set aside for provincial, federal and municipal taxes.

On top of all these spending pressures, Canadian employees must do their best to provide for their future financial needs. Perhaps when faced with ill health or unemployment, and almost certainly with decreased earnings during retirement, employees must try to set something aside and must decide where best to place the nest egg.

This is not an easy decision for any of us. We all have acquaintances who are willing to undertake what we would consider overly risky investments. They do so in the full knowledge that high rewards often accompany high risks. At the same time, we all know of those who invest with safety first considerations at the top of the agenda. They are prepared to take a somewhat lower return in exchange for the peace of mind that comes from safe investments.

Which is the best strategy? The answer to this apparently straightforward question is it depends. It depends on the individual making the decision. What is best is a very personal decision that is governed by a number of factors, including the individual's past experiences, current situation and outlook for the future. Should we, through the income tax system, be sending individuals signals telling them how to allocate their hard won saving? Is acquiring a controlling interest in one's employer company a desirable investment for everyone? Is it such a desirable investment that it warrants the government's seal of approval in the form of a 50 per cent tax deduction? I would be tempted to answer no to some of these questions. What concerns me particularly is the plan proposed in Bill C–327 which was designed for situations where the financial viability of the employer is in some doubt. Such turnaround situations constitute high risk investments, not bad investments necessarily, but certainly not one that everyone would make in the absence of a tax break.

It is not appropriate for the government to entice employees to place their savings in a particular investment by leaving the bait of an attractive tax break. We do not provide 50 per cent tax deductions for lottery tickets and for good reason. Many Canadians buy lottery tickets nonetheless. I wish them the best of luck. It is a lottery ticket buyer's own calculations and whims which lead to the purchase of a ticket, not the lure of tax deductions.

I am convinced that a good number of Canadians have found and will continue to find investments in their employers to be a good home for their savings. The tax system should by no means discourage such investments. My point is that the tax system should likewise avoid tipping the balance in favour of a particularly risky type of investment. Bill C–321 would do just that.

I strongly believe that our tax system will serve employees in Canada best if it plays a neutral role with respect to investment decisions.

I mentioned at the outset of my remarks that we must also assess this proposal from the point of view of the businesses which would be affected. If this proposal is good for business, some would argue that it may be worthy of our support even if it is questionable from the perspective of the employee investors.

It is timely to ask this question because some fundamental assumptions underlying the traditional relationships between the owners, managers and employees of business are in the process of being re–examined.

Increased employee participation is cited by many analysts as the key to business success. These same analysts often suggest that it is crucial for employees and employers to recognize that they have a common interest in the success of the organization. One of the key devices identified for reinforcing this appreciation of common interest is a remuneration structure which enables employees to share in the successes of the enterprise.

In these discussions, employee ownership is sometimes cited as the answer to Canada's problem of productivity and competitiveness. If employees acquire control of the business where they work, they clearly are participating in the operation of the enterprise. If they own shares, the remuneration is clearly tied to the success of the business.

But employee ownership is not the only means for achieving such ends. Much has been written of late concerning the success achieved by quality circles and other approaches to involving employees more fully in operational decisions. These techniques work and they do not involve employee ownership. Many firms offer profit–sharing plans or tie a portion of pay to the individual, department or enterprise performance. These techniques too are effective and they do not involve employee ownership.

Increasingly, firms are encouraging employees to acquire shares in the business. This technique achieves its goal without requiring employees to take a controlling position.

By citing these examples of different approaches to increasing employee involvement and thereby enterprise success, I merely wish to point out that the mechanism described in Bill C–327 is but one of many means to the same end. The fact that these other means are being used and are meeting with success and that they are doing so without tax assistance is important I believe.

Businesses and employees are re–examining their traditional relationships and are changing them. Different approaches seem to work best in different situations, but providing tax assistance for one approach and not for others may well discourage the very process we wish to promote, that is, establishing employee–employer co–operation in the fashion which best suits the particular situation and thereby achieving higher productivity and greater prosperity.

Bill C–327 might inadvertently place a strait–jacket on a dynamic, innovative search that is now going on in Canada to find a better way of doing things.

We all wish to ensure that the best business decisions are reached. When a business thrives Canadians benefit as employees, customers, suppliers, shareholders and simply by participating in a prosperous economy.

We should all agree therefore to avoid using our tax system in a manner that would lead to sub–optimal business decisions in the important field of employee–employer relations. A level tax–playing field is essential if we are interested in business success. This bill unfortunately would tilt the field.

I have talked at some length on the implications of this proposal for the employees and businesses involved. Let me now take a broader perspective and consider what is best for the taxpayers of Canada. There is no denying that a 50 per cent tax has a certain appeal if you belong to the select group that is to benefit from it. That is the employees of target companies and others who help finance the takeover. What if you are not fortunate enough to be in that group?

Most Canadians would not benefit from the provisions of this proposal. It excludes Canadians who are outside of the labour force, who are unemployed, self–employed or employed in the non–corporate sector. It excludes Canadians who lack the means of a desire to invest in their employers. It excludes most of us if those excluded would have to provide the extra taxes required to pay for this new tax deduction. Therefore, it is difficult to support the idea of asking a large majority of Canadians to pay higher taxes so that a select few can benefit from a 50 per cent tax deduction.

I hope I have made the position clear that I do not support this measure because it fails on the counts I have illustrated. It is not particularly or necessarily good for the employees. It is not necessarily good for business and it is not necessarily good for Canadian taxpayers. However, I think the member should be commended for bringing forward this proposal for discussion to be considered because at a time like this when we are going through difficult economic times, we want to look at all aspects in any proposals that may have appeal. I do not say that his proposal is without merit. I just wanted to highlight some of the things that you could take into consideration very carefully when it comes time to decide the fate of this proposal.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I, too, wish to participate in this private members' bill, Bill C–327, an act to assist employees to purchase a controlling shareholding in the corporation that employs them and to amend the Income Tax Act in consequence thereof.

I commend the member for Sault Ste. Marie for putting forward this private members' bill. I think he has shown a great deal of initiative. He has experienced the problem within his own area with regard to Algoma Steel, the problems that it faced and the procedures it had to follow.

I want to comment a little bit on what is happening in my riding of Kootenay East where Westar has gone into bankruptcy. It went into a bankruptcy situation on May 3. Not only was it going into bankruptcy, but it decided it was not going to pay the holiday pay or the severance pay, so it locked out its employees. That initially stopped the employee–workers of that mine from participating in the judge's comments, decision and procedures of the bankruptcy. The employees, 1,100 of them in a one–industry town, did not have the opportunity to participate in the bankruptcy decisions because they were locked out. They were unable to get unemployment insurance. This went on for four months.

During that bankruptcy discussion in the banks under the Creditors Arrangement Act, the creditors, the company, provincial governments and the various financial institutions had opportunities to discuss the bankruptcies. There is no mechanism in place for the employees to participate or to bring about the kind of a program such as the member for Sault Ste. Marie has put forward.

The bankruptcy took place on August 25. The court decided it had until September 26, a little over a month, at which time liquidation could start to take place. This is a profitable mine. This mine has second and third generation employees in a single-industry town. It has been profitable. It has long-lasting contracts with the Japanese markets. This is a very profitable mine. It has been admitted by the governments, the creditors and various others that it is a profitable mine. The employees wish to participate with a new buyer to try to bring about solutions, but I want to say they have until September 26. If liquidation starts to take place and some of that machinery starts to come out of that mine and is liquidated, what is the chance of that mine ever starting up again?

Here is an opportunity for a piece of legislation. The Americans have it in place.

I hate to use the American scheme as a project. The Japanese have employee contributions and employee programs in which they can participate. The United States has had legislation for 20 years that facilitates employee ownership. In fact almost one quarter of all American steel workers are involved in an employee share plan.

While I am speaking here in the House, those 11,000 workers and their representatives are meeting with a new buyer. They are pleading with me: Is there any federal help that can help us with regard to taxation benefits or some other types of benefits? I have had to tell them sadly there is not.

My colleague, the member for Sault Ste. Marie, has put forward a piece of legislation that could facilitate that kind of thing. I heard the comments and the rattle that was made by one of the members from the government side, but I would urge the government to take a serious look at this piece of legislation.

Surely to goodness if that legislation is put in place the government in power can look at the feasibility along with the provincial governments, the community involved, and the workers involved. We are talking about a one-industry town that has been in this industry for over 100 years. There are second and third generations that have paid taxes to the Canadian public provincially and federally throughout these years. They were participating.

They know it is a profitable mine. It can contribute. It can continue. The markets are even there. The will must come from the governments. These workers are even prepared to participate in an employee-share benefit with new employers or with themselves if they have to.

All they are asking for is the same type of relief, the same kind of support that business gets when it wants to get into that kind of a situation. The very part that bothers me so much about it is that less than 10 years ago, I stood in this House when the Liberals were in government. They were putting as much as $1.5 billion into the development of northeast coal in direct conflict with southeast coal.

Now we come to a situation where southeast coal is in a financial problem and needs some assistance, whether it be through this type of legislation, whether it be direct participation between the federal and provincial governments, and the municipalities, and we are told that the employees are not smart enough to be able to participate in this kind of a structure.

I want to protect these employees. The member on the government side said: "We would like to protect these employees from destroying themselves". I want to say to him that those employees do not need protection. Those United Mine Workers and their representatives have been to Japan. They have met with the steel companies in Japan.

They have looked at the operations of the mines in Russia and in Japan where the markets are. They know that this is a viable mine. This is a mine that should be working. It should not be into bankruptcy. It was a planned bankruptcy. There is no question about it. Westar went to the banks less than two years ago and tried a restructuring and a refinancing of its companies. It separated west coast terminals.

Imagine the banks with $300 million of loans into this Westar Mining company coming back for a restructuring and saying: "We are going to take the west coast terminals out of our proposal and we will put the rest up for security".

It was planned two years ago when it took its west coast terminals out and protected that portion of it. The profits from that mine, which is the Balmer Mine in Sparwood, belong to Westar. Westar was into many other types of facilities such as pulp mills, off-shore drilling, lumber mills. The profits from this very viable mine were going in all directions and not being put back into the mine.

The piece of legislation that the member from Sault Ste. Marie has put forward is one that this government should look at very, very seriously. The Japanese have allowed it and the Americans have put it in. If we are going to be into free trade agreements with other areas, let our people at least have the same kind of legislation here so they can benefit and try to bring it about. It is going to have to be in place so that workers and companies can use it.

September 26 will come along and if they have not found a solution to this situation in the Balmer Mine, then liquidation could take place and the chances of ever bringing that mine back on stream are probably going to be very, very limited.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, it is quite obvious to most of us why the member for Sault Ste. Marie brought this Bill C-327 forward. I do not think too many of us would argue on the merits of why he wanted to do that. Obviously, that part of our country which is his riding is going through a very, very difficult time and they are looking for a solution to a problem. We have to give the member full credit for attempting to do something.

I will be addressing this bill from an economic point of view and from a tax revenue point of view It is a bill that is certainly worthy of debate. It is not a frivolous bill and it is one that we take very seriously.

When this government took office in 1984 that was one of the things we looked at as a government in terms of how we tax. We wanted to bring certain things into the taxation system that we thought were missing at the time. One was, of course, the ability of individuals to pay taxes. We wanted a system that was fair. We worked to achieve that. Another thing we took a look at was the plugging of loopholes.

The members opposite me, such as the member for Sault Ste. Marie and his counterpart who just spoke, have often been on their feet in this House of Commons suggesting ways in which we can plug those loopholes. Through Standing Order 31 they are famous for delivering the corporate welfare bum award of the week. They do it on occasion with a great deal of drama attached to it. Often, although I hate to admit it, they are absolutely right in some of their presentations. We have committed ourselves to plugging some of those loopholes which have been identified by their party. In doing that we are eliminating preferred tax treatment for some Canadians. That is something we are all sensitive to in the sense that we give tax breaks to certain Canadians, whether they are rich Canadians or corporate Canadians.

We have made a great effort to reduce those preferred tax incentives. In doing some of those things we have passed on those savings to individual Canadians in the form of lower personal taxes. Obviously, when we try to change the system again and move in the direction of Bill C-327, we have to be cognizant of the fact that there is going to be some revenue foregone and given up by the Government of Canada. We are not talking about a little bit of money, we are talking about a lot of money. It is millions and millions of dollars.

If you forego that revenue the question then becomes: "From what other source can we get it?" The only other source is the Canadian taxpayer. Therefore, we want a system that does not discriminate against individual Canadians. In a sense, Bill C-327 does that and I will go through the reasons why.

Let us take a careful look at the bill itself and exactly what it does. The purpose of the bill is to use federal funds delivered through generous tax deductions to encourage employees to take over corporations that employ them. Specifically it proposes to amend the Income Tax Act to provide a 50 per cent deduction from taxable income for employee and employer investments in tax vehicles known as employee share purchase plans, or ESPPs. It also proposes to give a tax break to banks and other financial institutions that would take part in these plans.

It runs somewhat contrary to the position of the party to which the member for Sault Ste. Marie belongs. I believe that the party to which he belongs is fundamentally opposed to creating tax breaks for banks and other financial institutions. That is exactly what it does.

In a case like his—and I guess this is where politics comes in. I am not arguing against what he is saying in a personal sense because, believe me, if that situation existed in my constituency I would be doing the same thing, although in this case it philosophically flies in the face of the party that he represents. Indeed, it would give a tax break to financial institutions, obviously including banks. I think that runs against the grain of most Canadians at this time, particularly at a time when bank profits are at an all-time high. We have been reminded in this House, particularly by those on the other side, how high those profits were. So I do not think that any of us want to see tax breaks for banks and financial institutions at this point.

I have mentioned the redistribution aspect. If revenue is lost from one source it must be made up from another source, and unfortunately that other source always comes down to the individual taxpayer.

The other aspect that we should take a look at is what we do, in terms of investment, to encourage individuals to invest in Canada. We do that at present and we do it in a number of ways. One of those ways is to tax investment income differently than earned income in the work force. One of those methods I am referring to is dividend income. It is taxed differently to encourage those Canadians who desire to invest in a corporation to do so. Dividends are taxed differently than simple interest income.

In other words, it is an incentive for people like ourselves to not just place money in stale bank accounts but to invest in Canadian corporations. When we do that we are given a little bit of a tax break. I do not think the tax break at this point is as lucrative as it should be or could be. In fact we have changed that law from time to time with the sense that it was maybe too lucrative.

That is one type of investment break for Canadians. The other one is the capital gains tax. Individual Canadians are allowed $100,000 in capital gains income before they are taxed. That simply means that if an individual has a choice to make in terms of what they want to do with their money, if they take a look at investing that money in stock or in a Canadian corporation in terms of achieving some capital gains on that investment they are going to be given a break, a $100,000 break.

That has been attacked again by the NDP and by the Liberal governments. They suggest that it is perhaps too lucrative. That $100,000 exemption is extended to $500,000 for investing in small Canadian corporations, because those are the corporations that need the funding and the capital. We have done that as a government, as well.

The point of the exercise is that we have a number of instruments out there at present that allow Canadians to invest in Canadian companies for the right reasons. Through the retirement funds, Registered Retirement Savings Plans, individuals can invest in companies they work for. They then receive a 100 per cent tax break on the dollars they invest in that corporation. The belief is that we invest now when we are working and can contribute and later on when we retire we can draw that money back out at a lower rate of taxation. That instrument is also readily available for employees who presently want to do that.

We could go through a raft of other vehicles that are available at this present time without having to move in the direction of Bill C-327.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

JUDGES

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, according to the National Judicial Institute 40 per cent of all federal and provincial judges have not taken advantage of the gender sensitization courses available to them.

The report of the Law Society of British Columbia's gender bias committee has concluded that gender inequality is pervasive in the legal and justice systems in B.C.

The committee also recognized that significant steps must be taken by all the actors involved—the government, the judiciary, the legal profession, and other service providers in the justice system—in order to eliminate such bias and to uphold Canadians' perception that their justice system is and at least can be a model of fairness.

For example, the study found that while judges are becoming more aware of gender bias some nonetheless continue to exhibit a lack of sensitivity toward victims of wife assault and sexual assault. There is also evidence that suggests that women are regarded as less credible witnesses than men and that stereotypical notions about women undermine the prosecution of such assault cases.

It is obvious from the above finding that voluntary gender sensitization only preaches to the already converted. Those judges who belittle the suffering of women at the hands of their spouses are those most in need of such courses, yet they are the ones who feel that training is not necessary.

The committee concluded that the existence of direct and systemic biases in the courtroom, the legal profession, and other areas requires that each sector of the justice system critically examine its role in perpetuating gender inequality. This could be accomplished if those who work in the system were educated about gender bias in their own beliefs and in the laws and how they are applied.

The recommendations are wide-ranging and include judicial education courses in family law, addressing spousal maintenance, and accurate information about the costs of child raising. Spousal maintenance is all too often insufficient, as anyone who has practised family law knows, because the courts underestimate the economic disadvantages borne primarily by women as a result of child rearing.

The second recommendation is regular training for judges by the Canadian Justice Institute designed to make them aware of the subtle and overt manifestations of gender bias directed toward women lawyers, witnesses, and litigants. Another recommendation is training for family court counsellors that includes a gender equity component. This training program should parallel the training received by judges and masters.

The final recommendation is judicial education programs providing information on how sex-based stereotypes about women and men affect decision-making in custody cases.

I could go on but there was a commercial once that talked about what happened if you did not fix your car. The mechanic said: "You can pay me now or you can pay me later". How much more relevant is this theory when we are talking about human lives. We can pay now to make judges and the judicial system more sensitive and the ramifications for families will be far better in the long run, or we can pay later in the broken lives that such decisions will engender.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I agree that gender equality is an objective and should be sought in our justice system. No one, male or female, should be in any doubt that he or she will be treated fairly and with dignity in our courts of law and other institutions of justice.

To this end ministers of justice and attorneys general have adopted a statement of principles aimed at ensuring equality of treatment in the Canadian system of justice, with special efforts being made to accommodate the needs of indigenous people and women from multicultural communities.

The judiciary has also recognized a need to address equality issues. The National Judicial Institute and the Western Judicial Education Centre, Canada's two leading institutions for judicial education, have created programs on gender issues at the request of judges themselves. These programs have been highly effective and well received. On the basis of their experience with these programs, both institutions have decided that all future judicial education programming will include components that place gender issues in context within the treatment of substantive law subjects.

There is some concern, however, that unprecedented attacks have been made upon the fairness and integrity of persons who have a very difficult and important job and who do extremely well. Isolated incidents have been seized upon as being indicative of the attitude of all judges, whether federally or provincially appointed, male or female. Individual judges have been tried in the public press on the basis of statements which have been taken out of context or sometimes misconstrued. Respective careers have been shattered and additional pressures added to the heavy burden of responsibility on the judiciaries' already heavily-laden shoulders. A new disincentive may be added to the acceptance of judicial office.

Under these circumstances, in which the judiciary and governments are dealing effectively with gender equality issues, we should be aware of warnings issued by educators in the United States which suggest that mandatory gender sensitization training can be counter-productive and can undermine all of the good work that has been done so far. Certainly we should take an informed interest in judicial education, but equally we should trust to the good faith and good will of the men and women of the judiciary who have thus far shown themselves more than worthy of the confidence of their fellow Canadians.

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr.Speaker, my particular constituency, Don Valley East, takes its name from the Don River. When I was a kid we used to swim in the Don River but no one would swim in it today. It is polluted with raw sewage and industrial waste.

Also according to the Great Lakes Science Advisory Board's report to the International Joint Commission, the Don River is polluted with toxic materials carried through the atmosphere from Latin America. According to the board's study 70 per cent of the lead in Lake Ontario, 80 per cent of the PCBs in Lake Erie, 90 per cent of the PCBs in Lake Superior, all travel through the atmosphere from Latin America thousands of miles away to pollute our Great Lakes.

Therefore, even if we clean up our own act, the Great Lakes and the Don River are still going to be polluted. The source of the pollution, according to this study, is some 11,000 tonnes of DDT used each year in Latin America.

One of those Latin American countries is Mexico and we just initialled a free trade agreement with Mexico, NAFTA. One of the things that concerns a great many Canadians about NAFTA is the environmental standards in Mexico.

Our government has told us not to worry about that because Mexico has good environmental laws, it just does not enforce them. It also tells us not to worry about that either because we have just provided Mexico with $1 million to help it enforce those good environmental laws, even though Mexico is not one of those countries that qualifies for this sort of assistance under the Canadian International Development Agency under normal circumstances. We also should not worry because we have an environmental co-operation agreement with Mexico that we signed back in 1990 and so everything is going to be all right.

Now that Mexico is enforcing its really strict environmental laws using Canadian money, I want to ask the parliamentary secretary tonight if he will give me and all Canadians answers to the following questions. First of all, when can we expect Mexico to stop using DDT? Second, if it does not stop using it immediately, can we use the dispute settlement mechanism in NAFTA to require it to stop? And third, when can I and my constituents start swimming in the Don River again?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I cannot, in all honesty, answer the last of my hon. friend's three questions because, as he knows, the clean-up of already polluted bodies of water is an extremely difficult and costly procedure.

Having said that, the important point is to ensure that we and other residents of North and South America work together to address international pollution problems as we are doing at the present time.

The hon. friend made reference to NAFTA. One of the key points about the NAFTA agreement is that it is the first time we have had such an assessment in a trade agreement. There is an environment assessment in the agreement itself and that will be made available to the public at the same time at which the legal text is made available.

I can also inform my hon. friend that later this very week, the Minister of the Environment from Canada will be meeting with his Mexican and American counterparts in Washington to talk about the way in which the three governments, the three ministers of the environment and their officials, can work together to make sure that common environmental problems are addressed effectively. I would anticipate that what will come out of the meeting is the establishment of some sort of trilateral panel and the objective will be to address the very concerns which my hon. friend is raising.

LINGUISTIC MINORITIES

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, on April 8, 1992, I asked the Acting Prime Minister a question. It went something like this: Since the government had said that henceforth the provinces and territories would finance cases concerning language rights and equality rights, did the government consult the provinces and territories? Here is the answer that the Deputy Prime Minister gave me: This program could be funded by the private sector or by the provinces.

Of course, without meaning badly, it did not consult. It hoped that the provinces, territories and private sector would come to the defence of these groups, not only linguistic minorities but the other groups protected by this program. He did not really answer the question and that is why I am here this evening.

Mr. Speaker, I also want to point out that there is now a new constitutional reality, containing new provisions, as we very well know. I want to emphasize that this program ends on September 30. Given these new realities and that the government did not consult the provinces to see whether they were prepared to continue the work, is the government now ready to resume, restore and reinstate the Court Challenges Program?

Mr. Speaker, I feel that you must know that the Committee on Humam Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons unanimously recommended—that is, with the consent of the representatives from the three main parties—to continue it in one form or another. So it is really time to do something.

This committee said that the program was essential. It is even more essential today than it was when it was cut. I believe that it should be continued. I will give you two brief examples: the disabled are unhappy with the constitutional proposals; they will no doubt have demands to make, but who will be able to help them? Women, especially a certain women's group, are not at all happy and they too will no doubt want to challenge it.

The last example: you certainly know that the French-speaking linguistic minorities, and maybe even the English-speaking, are debating the issue of "attachment" versus "commitment". I would prefer commitment, it is so clear. Jurists recognize it as a term with legal validity. Those are some questions that will have to be answered about this new constitutional reality.

So I ask the government to face up to its responsibilities.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, my colleague from St. Boniface will certainly remember that the Court Challenges Program was set up by the federal government in 1978 to guarantee equality for linguistic minorities throughout the country.

In 1982 and again in 1985, the Court Challenges Program was extended to include the language rights and equality rights protected by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Since 1978, the Court Challenges Program has been financed solely by the federal government. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we did not consult our provincial colleagues about a decision affecting the federal budget.

The Court Challenges Program has proven useful in several important legal decisions that helped to clarify the Charter. In fact, many cases dealing with official languages and funded by the program have had a direct impact on the development and amendment of provincial legislation convering education in the official languages and linguistic minorities. The provinces were also influenced by the cases concerning equality heard by the courts. However, in a period of financial and economic difficulties and budget cuts, the government had to make some hard decisions. The Court Challenges Program was one of the programs that we had to abolish to achieve the objectives.

Mr. Speaker, in June, the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons tabled its report, "Paying Too Dearly", on the Court Challenges Program. The government is now considering this committee's report and will table its response to the recommendations in the House.

The government will continue to promote the right to equality for all citizens as it has committed itself to do. It also remains determined to promote the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms in every possible way.

Adjournment Debate

[English]

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the subject matter is employment or the lack of it in this country.

On April 29, 1992 I informed the minister of employment that a comprehensive economic review of the Hamilton labour market released at McMaster University concluded that while 36 per cent of employees felt they would be laid off this year, an astounding 52 per cent of business owners and managers said they will be laying off employees this year.

Given that alarming fact, I asked the minister what concrete action he will take to ensure that employees in Hamilton and in other great cities across this great country will not become statistics? It is called Question Period, after all, and seldom if ever do we in the loyal opposition get any answers from a government in which Canadians have lost faith.

In the city of Hamilton the unemployment rate has hovered over 10 per cent for close to two years. Last month it was again at close to 11 per cent. Hamiltonians are coming to my constituency office demanding to know why they are losing the opportunity to re-enter the job market because their unemployment insurance benefits will run out before the completion of their job retraining courses.

That very question was asked again today of the minister of employment by my colleague, the member for Parkdale—High Park. He appealed to the minister to extend UI benefits where necessary. By skirting that direct question, the minister who represents this sorry government might as well have cut his answer to the quick and simply said no, the government will not extend UI benefits to those in need.

Speaking of jobs and the lack of, the government spends literally millions of taxpayers' dollars on a propaganda paper extolling the virtues of the North American free trade deal. Who will lose their jobs because of the deal? How many will need help? What programs will those working men and women displaced by NAFTA attain?

Permit me to quote from today's editorial in a Toronto newspaper. First it speaks briefly about how U.S. Labour Secretary Lynn Martin said outright that the Canada–U.S.–Mexico deal could cost up to 150,000 American jobs and that they were prepared to spend $750 million a year for five years to help workers who lose their jobs because of this NAFTA deal.

The editorial states:

> In Canada, the Tories have refused to help the victims of free trade, despite Brian Mulroney's 1988 election promise to provide "the finest programs anywhere". Since Ottawa still refuses to help those who suffer under free trade, it continues to pretend that they don't exist. And in trying to maintain that dishonest posture, it is indulging in propaganda warfare with Canadians.

I have said it before and I will say it again: Canadian workers are not looking for a handout. Canadian workers want a helping hand. Canadian workers want jobs, not welfare.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as you know very well, a vital part of job creation is retraining of those who require it in order to find their place in the work force.

I am pleased to be able to inform you, Mr. Speaker, and through you, Canadians, that indeed we are spending record amounts on such job, training at the moment. This is a very substantial increase over moneys made available in the past, including as recently as some two years ago.

For example, we are spending this year a record $1.95 billion to train 300,000 UI claimants. That is three times what was spent in the same area in 1990. In addition, we will spend $1.6 billion in skills training and employment assistance for unemployed Canadians this year.

This brings total employment and training assistance for Canadians in 1992 to $3.55 billion. That is $3.55 billion, not million. Close to 700,000 Canadians will get some help this year from EIC training and adjustment programs.

In a slightly different vein, I would also like to note that last year 190,000 UI claimants received training under section 26 of which 39,000 were fee payers. This year, it is expected that about 300,000, a substantial increase of UI claimants, will receive training under section 96 and 85,000 of these will be fee payers.

That is an increase of some 46,000 fee payers over the last year. The need is great, but I would also point out in response to my hon. friend that a financial commitment of some $3.55 billion to provide training to 700,000 Canadians this year is also a very, very significant contribution.

WOMEN'S HISTORY MONTH

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to invite Canadians to celebrate the first annual Women's History Month this October as declared earlier this year by the Minister responsible for the Status of Women.

Throughout our history, women in Canada have shaped our society in countless ways: in the home, in the work place, as volunteers, reformers and leaders. However, all too often their contributions have been overlooked.

Coinciding with the annual commemoration of the women's rights victory know as the Persons case of October 1929, Women's History Month offers all Canadians a chance to explore women's lives and accomplishments, past and present.

This is an opportunity not to be missed, particularly for young Canadians. A knowledge of the strong and purposeful women in our lives broadens our visions of life's possibilities and inspires us to future action.

In this year of our 125th anniversary, women can continue to be nation builders. I urge women to participate in determining Canada's future by voting in the nation-wide referendum on constitutional renewal on October 26.

INTERNATIONAL HOCKEY HALL OF FAME

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I want to offer my congratulations to the International Hockey Hall of Fame located in Kingston as it has just been sanctioned as an official museum for international hockey by the International Ice Hockey Federation.

The Hall of Fame will now display items from all 40 member countries of the federation. It will also receive the rights to reproduce federation sports memorabilia for sale locally and internationally. Plans are in hand to develop world-wide tours to the museum and to create an archives and research centre.

The directors of the Hall of Fame are to be commended for their diligence and hard work over many years in achieving this distinction. I wish them every success. Their efforts will ensure that the international history of Canada's game will flourish. Canadians will always remember those immortal words of Foster Hewitt, so sweet to our ears, which were spoken 20 years ago this month: "Henderson has scored for Canada".

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to challenge the media to provide a balanced and qualified debate on the national referendum. To begin with there seems to be a trotting out before the media an onslaught of no experts. I ask the media: Are there not any yes experts?

Why are provincial premiers not forced into the spotlight of public debate with the same effort as the saviour of the Canadian women's movement, Judy Rebick? Why are members of Parliament not forced into debate with the same vigour as Deborah Coyne, whose claim to fame seems to come more from her social activities than her public achievements?

It is my opinion the media is either lazy or incompetent because I believe there are two sides to the coin of this debate. It is unfortunate that all we seem to get today is the tail side.

S. O. 31

OLDER WORKER ADJUSTMENT PROGRAM

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to praise a government program, the older worker adjustment program, better known as POWA. This program provides permanently laid off older workers 70 per cent of their UI benefits from age 55 to 65; but there are problems with the program.

The economy is sour and the unemployment rate is at historically high levels. People can wait for two years before their applications are reviewed. Many of these people put their lives on hold, anticipating a positive response which may in fact not materialize.

The backlog in Ontario alone constitutes over 700 companies, affecting thousands of individuals. Current funding provisions address only about one-third of those laid off older workers.

Finally, the criterion that must be changed is the one that states the lay-off must be large relative to the size of the community. This discriminates against the smaller firms and their employees. Whether the lay-offs are 45 at a bakery, 20 at a dairy, 100 at a veneer mill, or 1,000 at a large industrial giant, all are laid off and should be eligible for POWA.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, the Canada round of constitutional talks has been a fair and open process in which every Canadian has had the chance to speak about their vision of Canada.

The last segment of this process will end on October 26, 1992, with a national referendum where all Canadians will have the opportunity to show their support.

The constitutional proposals reached in the Charlottetown agreement on August 28 serve as a reasonable compromise and as the basis for renewed federalism. No one present at these discussions left the table with everything they wanted. There were compromises made on all sides.

I feel these proposals represent the best possible solution to a very complicated and very serious issue. I am pleased that on Friday of this week the two provincial members of Parliament, the chief of the Chippewa band and the mayors of Sarnia, Point Edwards, Moore Township, and myself will be making a joint public statement of support for these proposals and a continued united Canada.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, Canada Post is being stubborn and arrogant by refusing to co-operate and act on a request by the municipal council of Tracadie-Sheila that residents be able to address their mail so as to reflect the new municipality formed by merging the village of Sheila and the town of Tracadie.

In response to this legitimate and reasonable request, Canada Post insists that mail addressed to Tracadie-Sheila must be rejected. This attitude and this lack of sensitivity have increased the frustration and dissatisfaction of customers in my riding who see the closing of the Bas-Caraquet and Bertrand post offices as part of a strategy that is making dramatic inroads in the quality of service offered in the Acadian peninsula.

The Government of New Brunswick legislated the merger of the two municipalities of Tracadie and Sheila, and Canada Post should take steps to clear up the confusion it caused and observe the wishes of the residents of Tracadie-Sheila.

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, the first annual Women's History Month to be held this October was announced earlier this year by the Minister responsible for the Status of Women, and I now wish to pay tribute to a number of French Canadian women who helped build our country.

As nun and teacher, Marguerite Bourgeoys founded the Congrégation de Notre-Dame de Montréal in 1671, to educate young girls. She was canonized in 1982. As the owner of a sawmill and administrator of real property in the 18th century, Louise de Ramezay was one of the first business women in New France.

• (1410)

At the beginning of this century Marie-Lacoste-Gérin-Lajoie worked hard to improve the legal status of married women in Quebec. She was also a co-founder of the Fédération nationale Saint-Jean-Baptiste.

Émilie Fortin-Tremblay was the first white woman to cross the Chilcoot Pass during the Klondike gold rush.

And Thérèse Casgrain led the struggle by Quebec women to obtain the franchise, which they did in 1940.

These are only a few examples of French Canadian women whose lives are an inspiration to us all. The women of Canada, whatever their ethnic origin, have made their mark in the past and they will continue to do so in a modern and prosperous Canada that is making its influence felt throughout the world.

JIM BODDEN

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, a very difficult situation has arisen involving a Canadian citizen who plays professional hockey in Italy. Jim Bodden was playing a regular season game on January 15 of this year in which a player from the other team died. The players were in front of the net, the other player punched Jim in the head and Jim reacted by shoving him away with his stick. Shortly thereafter the player died of a heart attack. The deceased player had suffered from epilepsy.

Jim is 29 years old and has played in Italy for the past 15 years. He is known to be a real gentleman on the ice. The Italian authorities are now saying that Jim will be charged with homicide. In that Jim and his family are Canadian citizens, I call upon the Secretary of State for External Affairs to contact our embassy in Italy to make certain that Jim Bodden's rights are being protected and that he is being treated fairly.

I would like to ensure that the Government of Canada's full resources are behind him and his family.

BROADCASTING OF HOCKEY GAMES

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, the National Hockey League season begins in 23 days in Ottawa, but sports lovers on the Quebec side of the Ottawa River are very concerned about what seems to await them with the Ottawa Senators' threat to black out hockey on TVA and TQS during the week.

I have received many calls from sports fans in the Outaouais who ask me to intervene with the Minister of Fitness and Amateur Sport. In a letter that I sent him today, I ask him to intervene with Molson Breweries and the Ottawa Senators so that the people of the Outaouais are not hostage to such a decision and deprived of the television coverage of some 50 games of the Montreal Canadiens and Quebec Nordiques. While pressure is being put on Molson's and the Senators, I trust that action by the minister will bring results.

In closing, we must keep in mind that not everyone can afford hockey tickets.

SALMON FISHERY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, as the Atlantic salmon season in eastern Canada draws near a close, it is important to recognize the constructive conservation measures that have been achieved during 1992. To be sure, there will always be management challenges to face on behalf of this precious resource, but a firm foundation has now been laid for the regeneration of future salmon stocks in the years to come.

Foremost among the measures introduced this year was the minister's difficult and forthright decision to extend the closing of commercial fishing in the offshore waters of Newfoundland. This has dramatically amplified the impact of previous such closings in the maritime provinces and there was clear evidence of significantly increased salmon runs in almost all of the rivers on Canada's Atlantic seaboard in the past summer.

An equally difficult and comprehensive initiative has been the development of the aboriginal fishery strategy for Atlantic Canada which was announced just one week ago. This plan to fully involve native bands in management and guardianship of the resource as well as in the rational economic exploitation of it should prove a most constructive approach in all respects. Not only does it point to improved sharing of the salmon harvest among all user groups, it emphasizes new harvesting directions to eventually eliminate gill-nets and to replace them with methods that are consistent with the catch and release conservation practices.

Along with these two major achievements, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans deserves the genuine appreciation of all Canadians for the spirit of environmental responsibility which he has demonstrated through the over-all policy of his department for its sound salmon management in Canadian rivers.

ERNST ZUNDEL

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, Ernst Zundel is a leading Nazi apologist and propagandist. He has promoted the lie that the Holocaust is a hoax, the gas chambers a matter of the imagination. Zundel was brought before Ontario's courts and was twice convicted for his pamphlet Did Six Million Really Die. He has been fined in his native Germany for hate crimes. When the Supreme Court struck down the Criminal Code section under which he was convicted, he hailed the decision as an affirmation of freedom of expression. We must ask: What sort of freedom and for what sort of expression?

The extreme right has already been aided and abetted by the decision. This week, on a new Klan hate line operating in Toronto, B'nai Brith human rights activist Ian Kagedan was denounced for stands taken in defence of human dignity.

For this and other racist fronts, freedom includes freedom to vilify and expression includes the dissemination of lies.

The message must come through loud and clear. We will not tolerate the promotion of hatred against any identifiable groups which will fray our social fabric. The cost of racism is incalculable. We must devote all our efforts and energies to eradicate this scourge.

SALMON FISHERY

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, the B.C. salmon industry is in trouble.

Yesterday, the minister said that the disappearance of salmon from the Fraser River could have been due to the water being warmer than usual; warm but not warm enough to cook into oblivion 1.2 million sockeye salmon.

He said the count could have been wrong. His staff told me for three weeks they could have been 10 per cent or 15 per cent out, but to be 1.2 million out they would have to have been 80 per cent wrong. They denied any possibility of that.

This same minister said that B.C. salmon is not in trouble. The same person in a previous capacity three years ago said that the Atlantic cod was not in trouble. Look where we are today.

Three hundred fishing boats with hundreds of fishermen turned out yesterday to blockade B.C. harbours to prove that the minister is wrong and to draw attention to it. We need the committee to go out there and get a first-hand report. We need a judicial inquiry that will us what is wrong so that we can correct things for next year.

The B.C. salmon industry is in trouble.

CAMBODIA

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask that Canada turn its eyes to a small nation in southeast Asia, Cambodia.

In 1975 the Khmer Rouge came to power in Cambodia, and before they were ousted in 1979 by the Vietnamese they had killed one million of their own people.

The United Nations is now in the middle of a delicate negotiating dance with the four political factions which want to govern Cambodia, including the Khmer Rouge and the present Vietnamese backed government.

The UN is starting Cambodians down the long road to democracy. Nation-wide elections are supposed to take place next spring under the guidance of the United Nations Transitional Authority of Cambodia. The Khmer Rouge are once again threatening the life of this small nation by blocking the negotiations.

Canada must support the United Nations in its efforts and encourage Cambodians to resist the threats of the Khmer Rouge. The lives of seven million Cambodians hang in the balance. Canada can do no less.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I rise as a Canadian woman to voice my disagreement with the National Action Committee on the Status of Women and its constitutional stance.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Clancy: We have looked at the Canada clause. We have examined the charter and we have consulted with some of the top constitutional lawyers in the country, lawyers who are, may I add, committed feminists.

The result? We fail to see just how the gloomy scenarios for women depicted by NAC will be the product of this reform. We do not see how the Canada clause will endanger women's equality as guaranteed in sections 15 and 28 of the charter. We do not believe that women will be losers in a renewed Canada.

With the greatest of respect for the legal skills and capabilities of those advising NAC, I and many Canadian women simply cannot subscribe to this theory.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister.

On Saturday I had the occasion to meet 500 employees of Canadian Airlines in Vancouver who are willing to make some sacrifices in order to make sure that they preserve their jobs, the company and at the same time help to maintain competition in the air in Canada.

I would like to know from the Prime Minister if this government has any policy to help them to maintain their company as other employees have succeeded in doing in the United States.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, several months ago, the two airlines had already begun to consider various proposals to ensure their survival. Canadian Airlines is now holding discussions with both Air Canada and American Airlines to see which of the two options would be more profitable and more likely to give the travelling public an efficient, competitive transportation system and at the same time to keep job losses in the aviation industry to a minimum.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I will rephrase my question for the minister. I asked a question about the proposal from employees who are prepared to make sacrifices to keep their jobs.

In his reply the minister made no reference at all to the employees' proposal. Is the minister interested in the employees' proposal or is the government's policy already made, that there will no longer be two airlines in Canada but only one?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, since the proposed agreement between American and Canadian is based on the new proposal made by the employees, Canadian has stated publicly that it was still examining this position in order to keep job losses to a minimum. We have already shown our interest in this proposal by completing the purchase of three R-310 Airbuses as quickly as possible so that Canadian Airlines has the funds it needs to continue to negotiate, safe from any surprises.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the minister.

According to the employees that I met in Vancouver, the Governments of Alberta and Manitoba, were ready to put some money on the table but that the Government of British Columbia, the province where most of the jobs are, refused completely to help in the situation.

Was the minister in touch with the NDP Government of B.C. to do something for the 6,000 employees in British Columbia?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I repeat again, in case the Leader of the Opposition did not hear, that when this proposal was originally presented to the various governments, the Government of Canada was the only one that agreed to invest in the purchase of three Airbuses, precisely to give Canadian Airlines all the breathing room and time it needs to examine all these options.

[English]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Transport.

In 1991 the Conference Board of Canada produced a study entitled "The Tax Competitiveness of the Canadian Airline Industry". In that study it concluded:

> The principal reason for the uncompetitiveness of the Canadian airline system is the higher commodity sales tax on fuel.

How can the minister say that the government has done everything it can for a competitive airline industry when its own tax policies have undermined the ability of Air Canada and Canadian Airlines to compete?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is very well known that if the taxation level of Canadian corporations in Canada is at its present level, it is because of the huge deficit, the national debt that we have inherited from the previous Liberal government.

Last year we did in fact move in the taxation field by reducing the excise tax on fuel for the transportation industry from four cents to one cent on a temporary basis. We have changed the depreciation, the cost allowance configuration. This has helped the airline industry. We are continuing to examine the situation, not only for the airline but for the whole transportation industry.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, the minister is going to be examining the situation until there is no situation left to examine.

The Canadian Airline employees council has made major efforts to save its airline. It has proposed and been willing to accept sacrifices and concessions. Five of the six unions at Canadian Airlines have indicated that they are willing to help. Provincial governments have indicated that they are willing to help.

What is this minister willing to do for the thousands of Canadian Airline employees and Air Canada employees who are concerned about their jobs being lost?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to my hon. colleague that I did not say we were only studying. I said that we had already taken action to reduce the tax burden on airlines, as well as on all other transport companies, in particular by reducing the excise tax on gasoline and, among other things, by introducing the GST which has saved the airlines $250 million.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, all members of the House, and indeed all Canadians, will realize what a delicate and sensitive position our country is in at the moment.

My question is directed to the Prime Minister who will know that the three political parties of Canada have called a political cease-fire in their partisan activities in the best effort to work together for the yes campaign in an effort to keep our country together.

The Prime Minister will also know that NAFTA as a trade deal is divisive, is controversial, and has major political overtones. We already know that a major government advertising program is under way to promote NAFTA throughout the country.

In the best interest of ensuring a yes vote at this very critical time, would the Prime Minister be willing to pull the government's aggressive advertising campaign until after October 26 to allow the minimum amount of divisiveness and the minimum amount of political overtones attached to this and to allow us to get on with encouraging unity in our country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for his question.

As I understand it, the ads in regard to NAFTA are largely explanatory. They are trying to set out the advantages that might flow from the new trade agreement.

My hon. friend knows that almost 80 per cent of Mexican products presently enter Canada duty-free. If this agreement is ratified by the three Parliaments it will not have a perceptible effect, for example, on Canada's trading relationship. It will however open a new export market to us in a very considerable way. For every—

Mr. Barrett: That is propaganda and that is where the problem is. You are making it worse.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says that it is propaganda. I was just about to say that for every billion dollars of exports Canada is able to realize 15,000—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Prime Minister has the floor in answering a question. I know that hon. members would want to restrain their remarks.

Mr. Mulroney: I was going to make an observation before I was so rudely interrupted by my friend from Victoria. If my hon. friend would care to point out to me anything particularly objectionable or unacceptable, as I have not seen anything to which he refers, I would be happy to take a look at it.

Obviously, without trying to offend the great degree of unanimity that has been brought about in respect of the unity file, the operations of the Government and the Parliament of Canada continue to function within the normal constraints. However I would be happy to look at any objections my hon. friend has.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister will know that the House is planning to recess to allow all members to participate full time in selling the yes campaign, or almost all members. He will also know from the transcript that was leaked a couple of days ago that the campaign is aggressively under way, a massive advertising campaign is under way. He will also know that the other day his House leader said: "In order to win the NAFTA campaign we have got to create enemies".

I ask the Prime Minister this: Is this the time—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Riis: Perhaps there were others as well who indicated the need to create enemies in order to win the NAFTA advertising campaign and convince people of the best interest of NAFTA.

In all seriousness, and to the Prime Minister, we know that as the days progress this gets to be a more challenging issue for the yes campaign. We also know—there is no question in this House—that the more we discuss NAFTA and the more the government forces NAFTA on to the front burner and on to the agenda there will be aggressive reaction across the country from those opposing it.

Surely the Prime Minister cannot believe that at this sensitive moment this is in the best interest of the unity file, as he refers to it. But for the future of our country will the Prime Minister pull back on his aggressive campaign to allow all members to work together, shoulder to shoulder to shoulder, in the best interests of our country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I look forward to working very closely with my hon. friend—I am going to British Columbia on Sunday and Monday—with regard to this great question of national unity.

My hon. friend made a statement I found quite startling, that our House leader said we had to create enemies. That is the one thing this government does not have to go out and create. I will have to talk to the House leader after this. That would be overkill.

I see the point my hon. friend is making and it is a serious point. A few weeks ago his leader said that when she undertook her national unity campaign she planned to campaign very actively against NAFTA and other things while she was giving her national unity message. I did not complain. If she chooses to do that, that is fine by me, but I do not plan to campaign in terms of national unity in favour of NAFTA or anything else. I am just going to campaign in favour of Canada and I will look forward to doing that in British Columbia with my hon. friend who has campaigned very hard on behalf of national unity in the past.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I say to my hon. friend, the Prime Minister, that there is a world of difference between political leaders articulating their parties' views on critical trade issues and the government launching a massive, aggressive, brutal campaign and using taxpayers' money on a divisive issue.

I know the Prime Minister will be out there promoting this unity campaign. Across the street there is a whole organization that is out there now contacting companies across the country, aggressively encouraging them to support this divisive trade deal.

If the Prime Minister really believes that we must work co-operatively, if he really believes that all parties must set aside their political differences, create a political cease-fire until October 26—

Mr. Speaker: I think the question has been put.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my friend referred to a massive, aggressive and brutal campaign. I think I can give my hon. friend the assurance that there will be no brutal campaign. There will be no aggressive campaign. There will be no massive campaign. There will be a campaign designed to provide the Canadian people with some basic information regarding this deal.

STEEL INDUSTRY

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister should be aware that just this morning the Canadian steel industry had to initiate yet another anti-dumping action against the United States because this government has failed to protect Canadian steel workers.

In fact the Canadian vice-president of Dofasco said yesterday:

> If NAFTA does not improve, and in fact weakens, what we got under the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, we would be deceiving ourselves by supporting it.

Why has this government failed to protect Canadian steel workers and agreed to a deal which ignores the concerns of Canadian steel companies in anti-dumping and unfair pricing?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister of trade I will reply to the question that was posed.

First, the comments the hon. member raises are not accurate. We still have provisions in chapter nineteen to provide for a continuation of our consultations with the United States on the steel issue. More important, in addition, under the new agreement we have a new provision which will allow work to take place on the issue of replacing the anti-dumping laws with competition laws. That is exactly what the steel industry has been after for a long period of time.

We are answering their concerns. I might also say that anti-dumping charges are in fact brought by industries, not by government. It was the right of the steel industry to bring that charge.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, in fact it is the Canadian steel industry that is saying this.

Not only Dofasco has criticized the deal. Stelco said:

> NAFTA essentially abandoned the commitment that was made under the free trade agreement. We're very concerned that the negotiators have overlooked something that is very important.

I want to ask the Prime Minister again: Why has the government agreed to a deal with the U.S. and Mexico that leaves tens of thousands of Canadian steel workers out to dry?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I will repeat what I said. We have not. We have in fact responded to the steel industry's concerns in this agreement. It is there and the objectives are exactly the same as they were in the free trade agreement which it supported. It wanted change from anti-dumping law to competition law. Those clauses are contained in the NAFTA agreement.

We are doing what the steel industry has requested, exactly. I might add that we also have worked very hard in the multilateral trade negotiations in changing from an anti-dumping law to a competition law as well. We are very active in those negotiations as well.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the Minister for International Trade to table all the impact studies the government has prepared on the North American free trade agreement. What the minister tabled yesterday is certainly not that. It is little more than propaganda financed by the taxpayer.

How can the government make its blanket assertions about the North American free trade agreement, the benefits to Canada, let alone design the adjustment assistance programs that Canadians badly need if what was tabled yesterday constitutes all the impact studies this government has prepared?

My question is a simple one. Is what was tabled yesterday the full extent of the government's impact studies of the North American free trade agreement? Yes or no.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, with the hon. member's permission, I am sure he will understand that I cannot respond to that.

The Minister for International Trade is away on government business today but will be back in the House later this week and will be able to answer that question specifically.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, that answer seems to me quite unsatisfactory because the minister knows whether he is the minister of trade or not.

The minister will recall that earlier this year, as a result of the utilization of the Freedom of Information Act, copies of preliminary impact studies, prepared for example by the Department of Agriculture, Investment Canada and Energy, Mines and Resources, were obtained.

Why does the government not table its final impact studies? Is the government saying in the answer from the minister: I cannot table anything; I do not know whether there is anything?

He knows there are impact studies. He knows he can table them or, in refusing to do so, is he merely leaving the Canadian people to utilize once again the Freedom of Information Act to obtain basic information, as the Prime Minister says, about the North American free trade agreement?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is accusing me of something, I believe unfairly. The hon. member has been around here a very long period of time and understands that a question that specific should be directed to the minister responsible and not asked when he is out of the House.

CHILD BENEFITS

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my question is for whoever is answering on behalf of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Today in St. John's he said he wishes he could increase child benefits to $1,000 a month, but he said the government does not have the resources to do so.

Yesterday information obtained under the Access to Information Act shows that the government has spent $50,000 for a logo for the Brighter Futures program for children at risk. That is just one part of the $8 million budget for advertising and public relations for this program.

If the government is really serious about improving benefits for poor children, would it not be better to stop wasting taxpayers' money on logos and propaganda and start spending the $8 million on children instead? Why not stop feeding advertisers and start feeding children?

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think everybody in this House would want to have more money to spend on children.

One thing we are debating today in the House is a bill on the child benefit package which was announced last February. It puts $2.1 billion of new money into child benefit programs.

• (1440)

We are putting a monthly cheque that is non-taxable—and this is the first time that a child benefit program has been non-taxable—into the hands of parents. The money is targeted for those that really need it, and I think the hon. member should be very pleased.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, first the parliamentary secretary did not answer the question about the waste on advertising instead of putting money into government programs.

Just to put this into perspective, the $50,000 for this logo would feed 2,000 people at the Saskatoon Food Bank, 56 per cent of whom would be children, for a year. Maybe that is a priority the government should put first.

My supplementary question is for the Minister responsible for the Status of Women. The minister will know that the Canadian Child Day Care Advocacy Association was denied $23,000 under the women's program of the Secretary of State for a national child care conference, part of $300,000 of worth-while projects turned down this summer.

I wonder if the minister would not agree that Canadian women and children would be better served if funds were allocated to supporting worth-while projects instead of using taxpayers' dollars to promote the government's re-election program.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. colleague is aware, the women's program comes under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of State, who is not here today.

I would like to remind my hon. colleague that under the women's program there are many applications for excellent projects. The program, while it has had increased funding over the past several years, is not able to fund them all and decisions on priorities must be made. Priorities have been established to provide particular focus on women who are especially disadvantaged and those are the major projects that are being funded this year.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

In Quebec today more than 400,000 people are unemployed, more than 423,000 are on welfare and nearly 350,000 people who live alone are poor. It seems 53 per cent of Quebecers are afraid of losing their jobs, and meanwhile this government refuses to launch an economic recovery program.

How will the Prime Minister explain to millions of Canadians who are suffering as a result of his erroneous policies that he has no money for a program to modernize infrastructures, as proposed by the Leader of the Opposition, but can afford to spend million of dollars on selling free trade which is losing us jobs?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I might remind the hon. member that in the February budget the Minister of Finance spelled out very clearly that he was prepared to discuss with the provinces a program to improve the national highway system. Those discussions are ongoing.

The ministers of transport of the provinces and of Canada will be discussing how that might be carried out at a meeting, I believe, within the next few days.

Talks are going on to improve our national highway system and also to provide employment.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition proposed modernization of the infrastructure of the country in January. It is now the middle of September and time the government stopped discussions and started acting. People want jobs. They want to work today, not in two months.

When will the government announce a program for Canadians to work? Do we have to wait another six months?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I find it passing strange that when the Government of Canada announces programs which will create employment, such as purchasing helicopters for the armed forces, purchasing armoured cars, purchasing trucks from the west which preserve and create employment. They object to them.

Those purchases create employment in this country and it is the taxpayers' dollars being spent to create employment. It is billions of dollars. They object to that, and yet they want a make work project that will only provide jobs for a short period of time. What we are trying to do is create meaningful employment on the long term.

ATLANTIC FISHERMEN

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of fisheries. On June 2 the minister announced the northern cod moratorium response package which would look after roughly 19,000 plant workers and fishermen. Yesterday the minister said that since June 2 he has looked after 19,223 fishermen and plant workers.

I find that very strange because in the first week of September alone, my office responded to 1,000 calls and the records show that in fact on the toll free line, 10,485 calls came through. This is quite a discrepancy.

I would ask the minister to explain this discrepancy and perhaps tell the House what he plans to do about it.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I am not functioning properly today, but I fail to see where there is any discrepancy.

There are 19,200-odd persons, fishermen and plant workers, in the northern cod area in Newfoundland and Labrador who are receiving assistance at the present time under the northern cod program. I cannot remember the exact figures, but there are a number of hundreds in Quebec who will be eligible, 1,000 or thereabouts in Nova Scotia and a certain number in New Brunswick as well.

There are at least a thousand cases in a grey area that we do not think are eligible but who will probably go through an appeal process. There are two appeal boards set up. They are staffed and ready to go to hear appeals from people who feel that they are eligible and who have been refused.

I do not know where the discrepancy is. There are 19,000 and several hundred people on the program at the moment.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

The minister knows there are trucking companies and smaller fish buying companies that are directly affected by the northern cod moratorium. In addition, there are vessel owners who have invested tens and hundreds of thousands of dollars in the fishing industry this year, in the belief that there would be one, who are really out of pocket. I do believe, as most others, that they deserve special compensation.

Could the minister respond and tell me if he is giving special consideration for more compensation for the vessel owners and consideration for the fish buying plants and the trucking companies to be considered under this program?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, it should always be remembered—and sometimes it is difficult to remember it—that there is a provincial government in Newfoundland and that government has full authority to contribute to assist people who are in poor economic straits as well as the federal government.

With respect to processing plants, the responsibility for the fish processing industry is clearly with the province of Newfoundland and Labrador which licenses fish processing plants. Under the property and civil rights section of the Constitution there is just no question as to who has the responsibility for fish processing plants. The people that license them to operate do.

With respect, there are some grey areas the hon. gentleman mentioned, such as what I would call fish handlers, who are not employed in the fish processing plant. I am looking at that now as a matter of fact and I hope to have a decision in the next few days because there are some persons there who I think might well be included.

Generally speaking, we can only look after those who are directly engaged as fishermen or fish processing plant workers.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the finance minister, I will put my question to the Prime Minister.

Credit card expenditures represent over $40 billion a year in Canada. The Bank of Canada rate now stands at 5.14 per cent and the average current credit card interest rate is 17 per cent, a spread of 250 per cent.

The Minister of Finance has repeatedly stated that the fundamentals are right and that consumers will get the economy out of the recession. Today Stats Canada data show that department store sales are down by 3 per cent. Clearly consumers do not think that the fundamentals are right.

Will the Prime Minister explain how this government can expect consumers to open their wallets and rescue the economy when they are being gouged by usurious interest rates on their credit cards?

• (1450)

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised to hear the hon. member raise this matter again. The vast majority of credit card holders in Canada pay their credit card bills on time and do not pay interest. I think we should remember that.

People who are unable to pay on the due date have other options which were pointed out not long ago by the media. I remember a report on CTV, wherein they said it was important to shop around. If one buys a set of bedroom furniture, for instance, instead of using a credit card it would be better to go to a bank or credit union and borrow at rates which, as the hon. member just said, are the lowest they have been in 30 years. These are the best rates that have been available to Canadian consumers in 30 years, including personal loans and mortgages.

I think if the hon. member considers all the facts involved he will realize it does not make sense to interfere with credit card rates.

[English]

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Yes, I am back with the same question and I will keep coming back with the same question again and again as long as consumers are allowed to be gouged by banks.

The minister pointed out that 50 per cent of those that carry credit cards pay off their balances every month, but that leaves $11 billion to $12 billion a year that are carried on payments. These consumers are unable to go down to the bank and get a loan to pay off their credit card debt. These are the ones that are being gouged.

I want to point out to the minister that the Consumers Association of Canada has made exactly this point; that consumers are loaded with debt and the rates are too high.

Is the minister prepared to call in the heads of all the financial institutions in this country and explain to them that he expects some action with respect to reducing those usurious rates?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I can inform the hon. member that, as I mentioned before, I personally met the Canadian Bankers' Association and those responsible for other areas of the financial sector, and the fact remains that credit card rates have dropped to their lowest levels in years.

The hon. member knows perfectly well it is his duty and mine to tell consumers that they have various options for borrowing money. I know that the New Democratic Party makes a specialty of borrowing money. They are always after the government and everybody else to borrow. However, we must make sure that consumers are able to borrow at the best possible rates, and we owe it to consumers to inform them properly. I suggest the hon. member follow my example.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, I direct my question to the Prime Minister.

While the referendum is a vital issue in this country, the lack of jobs is dominating the lives of Canadians. There are 1.6 million Canadians looking for work. Many Canadians are losing hope. In August, 85,000 Canadians gave up even looking for a job.

Why will the government not come forward with a new economic plan, as it is obvious the present policy is not working?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for a very important question. We have a serious problem of unemployment that all governments, provincial and federal, are working on it.

In light of her interest, she would be encouraged by a report out today which says the International Monetary Fund is giving the Prime Minister's economic policies the thumbs up sign. The IMF predicts the Canadian economy will grow 4.5 per cent next year.

More important, I think it is probably worth while, given the significance of my hon. friend's question, that the International Monetary Fund, which is generally accepted as the leading international analyst, says: "For real GDP growth, of the G–7 countries, Canada will lead the G–7 in 1993". Our employment growth is scheduled to be 2.9 per cent, which again is number one in the industrialized world and inflation rates will be at 2 per cent, which is the lowest in the industrialized world.

These three factors should inspire confidence in my hon. friend so that we can work together to bring down the unemployment rate which remains unacceptably high.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister can read all kinds of statistics but the fact is that the growth in the second quarter has remained stagnant. With lower than expected growth in the United States, Canada will require a domestic push to get us out of this recession.

Why has this government not come forward with an infrastructure program that could give Canadian businesses and consumers a boost of confidence? Why does the government refuse to take effective action to get Canadians back to work?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend may have missed the comment made a few moments ago by the minister of state when he indicated that governments had been coming together to devise an impressive national highway development plan which is an important contribution to our national infrastructure.

My hon. friend should know of the very productive conversations between the premier of Prince Edward Island and myself in regard to the fixed link, which is a tremendous contribution to infrastructure development in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, in particular.

This, I think, will probably arrest her attention in a significant way. We have been doing all of these things while maintaining inflation at the lowest rate in the industrialized world. That combination is very encouraging for durable economic recovery in the future without the burden of further debts on our children and grandchildren.

AIRLINES

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

If the Canadian airline companies merge, will the federal government take the necessary steps to ensure that the cost of a ticket to fly between Val-d'Or or Rouyn-Noranda and Montreal or Quebec will not increase? Indeed the residents of our region are already paying too much for the services provided by Air Alliance and Air Canada.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I want to inform my colleague that the issue of prices and competition in the field of transport has already been referred some time ago to the Competition Bureau. If a transaction takes place between Canadian Airlines and Air Canada, the Competition Tribunal will complete its work and make sure—in fact this is one the main reasons of its existence, if not the only reason—that there exists a fair competition between the companies.

YOUTH EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

I have an article here which shows that youth summer employment in the summer of 1992 was the worst ever. It costs roughly between $9,000 and $11,000 a year for a student to have a year of post-secondary education away from home.

Given the fact that most students either had no jobs or very few low paying jobs this summer, what is this minister going to do to make sure that these young men and women can get back to and stay in school?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member looked at what Canada and the provinces do for education, to keep Canadian youth in schools, in community colleges and universities, he would find out that we are surpassed by no other country in the world except maybe by the Americans on a per capita basis.

What he is saying about the employment situation is true. It has been difficult because of the world-wide recession and the economic impact it has had. Last summer, during the usual period that these young students can work, the government spent the same amount of money it did last year, notwithstanding the fact that the over-all budget of my department was reduced by some $200 million, which shows the dedication we have to students in Canada.

• (1500)

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Secretary of State.

For several months the Secretary of State promised to bring about changes to the program to help students. He has received recommendations from a number of sources, including the Canadian Association of Students, the Canadian Association of University Teachers, as well as from myself.

Given the problems experienced by our young people in trying to find work this summer, and given the fact that very few jobs were available, and these often did not pay well, when will the government make changes to its programs, so that our young people can go back to college and university and prepare their future?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, since the Secretary of State is out of town today, I will bring the hon. member's question to his attention and I am sure that the Secretary of State will provide an answer at the earliest opportunity.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister responding for the Minister of Justice.

At midnight on October 1, just two weeks from now, the new gun legislation imposes registration requirements on many Canadian gun owners which if missed for any reason will place them in default of the law and will result in prosecution, seizure and destruction of their firearms.

It was a commitment of the Department of Justice that a comprehensive public information campaign would be conducted to inform and remind Canadians of this important legal deadline. I understand that such a household mailing has been prepared but not yet released. In the time remaining it is clear that many Canadians will not receive that mailing until after the critical date for registration.

Is it possible to provide an extended period of grace for the registration of these firearms until the public information program has been released or, alternatively, will the minister ask his colleague to consider an expeditious method of serving that public notice through other means?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the deadline of October 1 for registering converted machine guns was fixed by an act of Parliament that was passed in this House last December. It could not be changed unless we passed another amending act through Parliament to change it. The deadline date has been widely publicized since the proclamation of the gun control legislation last December. The minister has no authority to extend any deadline established in the law.

There has been widespread publicity. I think 40,000 copies of the communications materials in support of the gun control package have been distributed since July 27. This coming weekend ll million copies of a tabloid explaining the entire legislative and regulatory package are going to be delivered to every home in Canada. I should think that the information will be widespread and that those who have converted machine guns will be in a position to know just what they must do.

PRIVILEGE

RELEASE OF INFORMATION

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, as you surely know, there is an issue which yesterday in the province of Quebec brought an injunction by the Superior Court. I am referring to statements presumably made by the deputy minister for intergovernmental affairs of the province of Quebec, Mrs. Wilhelmy.

Following the threat made by a Quebec radio station to air the comments made by the deputy minister, an injunction was granted. The injunction prohibits all the media—

Mr. Speaker: I am reluctant to interrupt the hon. member but this is clearly not a question of privilege. He may raise a point of order, but this is clearly not a question of privilege.

Mr. Guérin: I was coming to my question of privilege. I realized this morning that the Library of Parliament, which comes under this Parliament's jurisdiction, published on pages 2 and 3 an article which was banned by the Quebec Superior Court.

An hon. member: We are in Ontario.

Mr. Guérin: In that case why not say that Canada is not Quebec?

Anyway this article was published—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is complaining that the Parliament of Canada has published some report. If that is, and I am not saying that it is, some breach of civil or other law it is not a question on which I can intervene.

Point of Order

Coming back to the hon. member's point of privilege, it is very difficult to see how, whether the Parliament of Canada publishes this report or not, it has made it more difficult for any single member of this House to carry on his or her duties, which is the test of privilege.

It would also seem to me that if it is pursued as a point of order I do not have any particular capacity to intervene. I have to ask the hon. member to accept the suggestion of the Chair that I cannot go further on the matter.

Mr Louis Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member on a question of privilege.

M. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, it is a question of privilege since my privileges as a member from Quebec are not—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. I made a ruling on the question of privilege raised by the member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead. After all, according to the Standing Orders, the Speaker of the House must be given due notice, which was done. I was given due notice and I made a ruling. It is obvious that the matter is closed.

POINTS OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. During Question Period I believe the Leader of the Opposition inadvertently provided information to this House that was not correct. In his question to the Minister of Transport he indicated—

Mr. Speaker: I have been receiving some assistance from members. It would seem that it is a question of debate, and perhaps it should be pursued in that respect.

Mr. Angus: Is it not the tradition in this House that if a member imparts information that is not correct—and I am not talking about opinion; I am talking about correctness of information— this House has a responsibility to ensure that it does not remain on the record?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member raises a matter of some interest. There is a great deal of exchange in this House on a continual basis, on both sides of the House, that is challenged as incorrect, not accurate, or sometimes worse by other members. That is a matter of debate and is not a matter of a question of order.

I am sure the hon. member would want to accept my response to his question. There are other ways the hon. member can pursue the matter.

PUBLICATION OF INFORMATION

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would like to know why the Library of Parliament is allowed to publish a text which the members from Quebec cannot comment on outside of this Chamber because it was banned from publication, while the other members could do so.

• (1510)

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is raising a matter that is not in the jurisdiction of the Chair to interfere with. It is maybe a question for the courts, but it is not a question that can be resolved in this Chamber.

I listened to the complaint. I will certainly pass on the intervention to the Library. It is clearly not a matter on which I have any jurisdiction to interfere.

IMMIGRATION ACT

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I gave the Chair notice of this point of order, and I also gave notice to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Subsection 65(2) of the Immigration Act imposes on the Minister of Employment and Immigration a legal duty to table in both Houses of Parliament a copy of any rules made by the chairman of the Immigration and Refugee Board within 15 sitting days after their approval by the Governor in Council.

I am informed that the minister has failed to comply with that legal obligation with respect to two items.

They are the rules approved by Order in Council 89.151 on February 5, 1989 and the immigration appeal division rules approved on October 25, 1990.

Officers of the Journals branch of this House have confirmed that there is no record of these rules having been tabled in this or the last session.

The minister's failure to table these rules means that members of this House have yet to be officially informed of their adoption. More important, it means that the committee of this House to which they would stand ordinarily referred, in accordance with Standing Order 32, has been and continues to be denied the procedural opportunity to examine these rules and to report thereon to the House.

Mr. Speaker, you will recall that I previously submitted that a failure to abide by statutory tabling requirements involves a contempt of the House. This minister has been in default for three years in one case, and almost two years in the other case. It is a default that perhaps borders on negligence.

In any event, if the minister does not promptly fulfil his obligation to table these rules, I am prepared to restate that claim in regard to the present default.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having raised this matter with me yesterday.

I have brought this to the attention of officials in my department. I can undertake to this House that either later this afternoon or tomorrow I should be able to comply with the statutory requirement that the hon. member refers to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DEDICATION OF PEACEKEEPING MONUMENT

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, it is a special honour for me to inform the House today of the plans for dedicating Canada's peacekeeping monument. It will take place in Ottawa on October 8.

As many hon. members know, Canada's servicemen and servicewomen have a distinguished record in peacekeeping, spanning 45 years. In fact, Canada has participated in every peacekeeping mission mounted by the United Nations, and in seven non-UN missions as well.

That is a record unsurpassed by any other nation. Almost 90,000 Canadians have served in these missions over the years.

[Translation]

There are now more than 2,000 members of the Canadian Armed Forces involved in peacekeeping activities in 14 regions around the world, not to mention the 750 military we promised to send to Somalia and the 1,200 peacekeepers we offered to post in Yugoslavia.

[English]

Peacekeeping efforts of the United Nations have made such a profound mark on the world that in 1988 all UN peacekeepers were honoured with the award of the prestigious Nobel Peace Prize.

From this great tribute came the inspiration for a national monument in Ottawa to honour the contributions of Canadian Forces to peacekeeping. A national design competition under the auspices of the Department of National Defence and the National Capital Commission was held, and an independent jury comprised of prominent Canadians was appointed to make the final selection.

The jury received eight excellent submissions, and I am told that any one of them would have served the cause well. It is with some pride that I note that the winning design team is from British Columbia.

"The Reconciliation" is a most appropriate name for this winning entry, which was submitted by sculptor Jack Harman, urban designer Richard Henriquez and landscape architect Cornelia Hahn Oberlander.

The monument, which is now almost completed on Confederation Boulevard in front of the National Gallery, consists of two converging limestone walls—representative of opposing factions. The debris of war lies between these walls. Three cast bronze figures, representing the peacekeepers, will stand on an elevated wall.

The first of these, a communication servicewoman, recognizes a key role that Canadians often play in peacekeeping missions. The second figure, an officer wearing the traditional blue beret, portrays a United Nations military observer. The third bronze figure is of a sentry carrying a rifle, illustrating that peacekeeping is often a precarious and difficult job.

Just beyond the walls is a grove of 12 oak trees, a reminder that our peacekeepers come from all 10 provinces and our two territories. The grove will also serve as a symbol of our future and of our hope for peace.

On October 24 the whole world celebrates United Nations Day. What better month to be unveiling this unique Canadian monument to our peacekeepers? I hope that this year all Canadians will join in celebrating our own very special national peacekeeping day when we unveil our peacekeeping monument on October 8.

Beginning on October 1 all Canadian forces members who have served on United Nations peacekeeping duties at any time will begin wearing their blue berets. They will do so up to and including National Peacekeeping Day on October 8. This will serve as a positive sign to all members of the forces, and to all Canadians, that peacekeeping is an important facet of our defence policy and of Canada's commitment to world peace.

I am sure that the peacekeeping monument, located on Confederation Boulevard with such landmarks as the Parliament Buildings, the Supreme Court, the National War Memorial and the Canadian Museum of Civilization, will soon be recognized as a national symbol of Canada's dedication to peace.

Canada is the first country to dedicate such a monument to this important cause. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that you will agree that our peacekeepers should be first in our hearts and minds not only on October 8, but every day throughout the year.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, it is a special honour for me today to rise on behalf of the Liberal Party of Canada to respond to the fine address given by my colleague, the hon. Associate Minister of National Defence, giving tribute to peacekeepers and informing the House of the details of the peacekeeping monument that will be dedicated on October 8.

In my remarks I would like to reflect a little on what peacekeeping has meant and means. Despite the end of superpower rivalry the world remains a very dangerous place, and Canadians must, and should be, ever aware of this.

One of the pillars of our way of life is that we be secure. Total security involves not just military defence, but the social, economic, environmental and other factors for a secure and stress-free life.

Today Canada's primary concerns with defence involve not just sovereignty. They include concerns with the defence of the values, the institutions and the processes that define free societies. These now more than ever demand vigorous protection.

An ideal world that abolishes famine, disease, poverty, the environmental degradation that we see every day in less fortunate countries and nuclear weapons and war can only be achieved through enforceable international co-operation and agreement.

In his Sermon on the Mount, Christ declared: "Blessed are the peacekeepers". Today the Canadian forces are among the most blessed people on earth as they prepare to undertake yet another peacekeeping operation, this time in Somalia.

Over the past 45 years more than 85,000 of our young men and women in uniform have participated in each of the peacekeeping operations under the auspices of the United Nations, Canada being the only country in the world to do so. In addition, as the hon. minister said, we have participated in seven non-UN missions.

As an aside, while traditionally our forces stationed in Europe for 40 years were not there as peacekeepers in the traditional sense, they were in reality our front line peacekeepers, unheralded and often questioned over their presence there. They helped preserve peace for 40 years until the iron curtain disintegrated and the Soviet empire vanished.

Today there are more than 2,000 Canadian peacekeepers serving in Cyprus, Syria, the Sinai, Afghanistan, Iraq, Kuwait, the western Sahara, Angola, El Salvador, Cambodia, Yugoslavia and soon Somalia. They also have other ongoing UN commitments in India, Pakistan and the Middle East.

The word peacekeeping does not appear in the United Nations charter. In the previous 45 years the UN has undertaken 25 such missions at the cost of more than 800 lives. In the past three years alone the UN has undertaken 10 new peacekeeping operations. In the previous 32 years it undertook 15; the trend is obvious.

Given world instability, ambitious nationalism, growing tribalism and a seemingly endless supply of weapons in the hands of even the most modest of nations, the likelihood for a coalition of like-minded nations to combine to use force in the interest of peace is growing, not diminishing.

Many of these new missions involve much more than simply placing the UN blue helmets between combatants. In the post-cold war world national sovereignty is no longer considered an absolute. Certainly it will not take priority over the right of the starving and the suffering people in a battle zone to food or medicine, even if there is no cease fire, even if the collapse of government authority makes it impossible to obtain clear consent.

In Cambodia the United Nations will technically run the country until elections can be held in 1993. In Iraq and Kuwait it is mopping up after Operation Desert Storm. In Somalia there is effectively no government. Its job is to ensure that food gets through. In Yugoslavia the job is to keep the peace where there is no peace to keep.

I would like to remind the House and my colleagues that it was in Yugoslavia that a young soldier who happened to be from my riding, Master Corporal Dennis Reid, lost his foot in a land mine and shortly thereafter Sergeant Michael Ralph from St. John's lost his life.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry, but time is running out. The minister spoke for four minutes and the member has spoken for six minutes. I ask for your co-operation, please.

Mr. Mifflin: I will wrap up. I appreciate your indulgence.

There are those who say that we are spreading our forces too thin. This is not the time to address that. The important thing for us to do as politicians is ensure that when we are asked to participate in a mission our men and women are properly trained and equipped to undertake it. Otherwise, we should not promise to participate.

I consider it a distinct honour and privilege today to be asked by my party to speak in tribute of Canadian peacekeepers. Peacekeeping and peacemakers are a part of Canadian history of which all Canadians can be very proud. This magnificent monument will serve as a lasting and poignant reminder.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party caucus I would like to welcome the minister's remarks and welcome the dedication of this peacekeeping monument in Ottawa on October 8. Certainly peacekeeping has always been a dimension of Canadian foreign policy and for that matter Canadian defence policy on which there has been a great deal of tripartisan and partisan agreement is something we have all taken a great deal of pride in regardless of our political persuasion.

The minister mentioned in her remarks that over 90,000 Canadian military personnel have served in these missions over the years. It is incredible when you think about how many Canadians have had this experience and the benefits and the insight that experience brings to their participation in Canadian life and the formation of Canadian policy.

I also noticed recently that Canadian peacekeepers are going to be forming an association, analogous to a veterans association and I certainly wish them well in that because I think they could also play a useful role in days to come.

I intended to mention, as the member who spoke before did, how dangerous peacekeeping can be. The member referred to the death of Sergeant Ralph and the injury of Master Corporal Reid. One of the things we might look at in the future would be in some way or another, in the way we have recognized those who have lost their lives in war, to recognize in an individual or collective way those who have lost their lives in the course of peacekeeping. Surely no less than others who lost their lives in various conflicts, these people have put their lives on the line, not only for Canada but for the peace of the world. We should find some way to acknowledge that.

By way of political comment, I want to say two things. As we get more involved in peacekeeping and as we find ourselves sending troops to Somalia and Yugoslavia, we need to find a better mechanism for involving Parliament in those decisions so that we do not get more and more into a kind of executive order regime for the dispensing of Canadian peacekeeping capabilities.

Although I do not disagree with anything the government has done in this respect, there could have been ways to involve Parliament, either by way of some kind of debate or whatever, not to hold things up but to provide an opportunity for Parliament, as a representative of the people, to reflect on just what Canadians are being asked to do.

Finally, as people who have an international reputation as peacekeepers, we have to reflect on our own responsibility to keep the peace here in Canada. God forbid that we who have been involved in all these peacekeeping operations should arrive at a point in our own political future at which we would be faced with walls and we would be faced with conflict and somebody might have to send peacekeepers here. I say that with respect to the possible division of the country which is being advocated by certain people.

• (1530)

To those who are peacekeepers everywhere else, let us keep that in mind and let us do our very best to reconcile differences among ourselves and make sure we are able to keep the peace here at home.

I welcome the announcement and I look forward to being able to look with other Canadians at the monument when it is finally dedicated.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

EIGHTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the eighth report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. This report deals with the requirement of Health and Welfare Canada to table in the House of Commons an annual report on the Canada Assistance Plan.

Pursuant to Standing Order 109, the committee requests that the government table a comprehensive response to this report. I would also give notice in order that this report be debated and concurred to in the House.

PRESENTATION OF NINTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I also have the honour to present to the House the ninth report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. The report deals with letters of intent issued by the Department of Finance.

Pursuant to Standing Order 109, the committee requests that government table a comprehensive response to that report. I will also have a notice published in order that a debate be held on that report and that it be adopted by the House.

AIR SPACE OVER NIAGARA FALLS ACT

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Niagara Falls) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-361, an act respecting the air space over Niagara Falls.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Nicholson: I am pleased to introduce an act respecting airspace over Niagara Falls. This bill is designed to make the airspace over Niagara Falls a restricted zone. It means that helicopters, planes, blimps or any other apparatus wishing to fly in the restricted zone will require a permit from the federal government. This act is to control congestion, noise pollution and to protect the aesthetic qualities of Niagara Falls.

I have had many residents of Niagara Falls recommend the Government of Canada take control of the airspace over Niagara Falls. I agree with them completely. I trust members of all parties will support me in this initiative.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Nicholson moves that the bill now be read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

CANADA BUSINESS CORPORATIONS ACT

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-362, an act to amend the Canada Business Corporations Act and the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act (approval and reporting of salaries).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to require prior approval by shareholders of salaries paid to officers of corporations and also it provides for their disclosure. This would also include the golden parachutes that officers of companies set up for themselves and in effect democratize the operation of a corporation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Rodriguez moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-363, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act (Limitation on rebate).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, as a way of explanation, when the Government of Canada in 1990 cancelled the manufacturers sales tax, provision was made that during 1991 all businesses would be eligible to apply for a rebate of that sales tax in their inventories. My bill would extend that rebate period into and including all of 1992 to make provision for those companies in Canada that for one reason or another missed the filing deadline to have another year in which to file, which is this year.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Soetens moves that the bill be now read a first time and be printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

HUMAN RIGHTS AND THE STATUS OF DISABLED PERSONS

AUTHORIZATION FOR STANDING COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons)moved:

> That, in relation to their study of the economic integration of disabled persons, eight members and nine staff persons of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons be authorized to travel to Halifax, Nova Scotia for three days in November.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. government House leader.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for that introduction as the government House leader. I think it is a little bit premature. However I appreciate the offer.

My colleague from Manitoba was wondering if there was a disposition within the House to have unanimous consent to revert to Private Members' Business because he has a bill that he would like to have introduced and read for the first time today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the suggestion of the motion tabled by the hon. opposition House leader. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Routine Proceedings

ECONOMIC CONVERSION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–364, an act to provide for the conversion to civilian uses of technologies and skills used in the defence industry.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your courtesy and the courtesy of the members of the House to give me unanimous consent.

This bill is being introduced at an appropriate time because today we tabled the report of the subcommittee on arms exports. It has been a matter of major agreement among all three parties that we have to move into the whole area of looking to convert our industries from defence purposes into peaceful civilian products and technologies.

This bill puts forward a number of proposals building upon that report, particularly the whole idea of a conversion commission that would help our private sector to develop these skills and to get some assistance in using its base of high technology to start developing civilian products and to start looking at how we can develop products that would be particularly appropriate for many of the peacekeeping, peacemaking activities that our Armed Forces are now engaged in. I recommend this bill and again I thank members for their courtesy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre) moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on behalf of the Canadian Vietnamese community to present a petition in this House concerning the situation in Vietnam.

The Canadian Vietnamese community is calling upon Parliament to use diplomatic means to demand that (1) the Vietnamese government abandon its inhumane policy and restore civil and human rights in Vietnam; (2) all Vietnamese regulations, codes and constitutional provisions prohibiting free expression or denying the freedom of association or religious worship be eliminated; (3) that the Vietnamese government make a formal commitment to permit free and fair elections under international supervision so that the citizens of the country may determine the future leadership and orientation of their government.

LAND CLAIMS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): I have two petitions to present today. The first one is from a number of petitioners in Ontario and Quebec which notes that the people of the Stoney Point Indian Reserve near Sarnia, Ontario had their homes seized under the War Measures Act back in 1942 for the efficient prosecution of the war.

Half a century after the end of the war, the Chippewas of Kettle and Stoney Point are still demanding that Parliament return their homeland to them. Their claim is supported by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development but unfortunately the Minister of National Defence still refuses to do the right thing.

The undersigned, your petitioners, therefore call on Parliament to fulfill its responsibilities to the Stoney Point First Nation by returning the land at Stoney Point to its aboriginal inhabitants and their descendants.

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): This second petition is from a number of people engaged in the automotive industry who petition that they are faced with an unjust tax system which prevents them from deducting the costs of purchasing, maintaining and insuring the tools and equipment essential to their employment.

They note that the Income Tax Act allows self-employed professionals and business people to deduct the cost of entertainment, including food, liquor and even prostitutes, as business entertainment expenses and yet these people cannot even deduct the cost of the tools they need to do their job.

The petitioners therefore call on Parliament to request that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue take action to amend the Income Tax Act to allow Canadian automotive workers deductions for purchasing, maintaining and insuring the tools and equipment required in the course of their employment.

OLD AGE SECURITY

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): I have three petitions here, all on the same subject, signed collectively by approximately 150 senior citizens of my riding. These petitions were prompted by the 37 cent increase in the Old Age Security pension in April which they found to be not only insulting but embarrassing.

The petitioners therefore pray that the government be called upon to ensure that Canadian Old Age Security pensions are sufficient to meet the basic needs of Canadian senior citizens.

THREE GORGES DAM

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): I rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by a number of Albertans, most of whom are resident in my riding, wishing to draw to the attention of the House the fact that the Three Gorges Dam on China's Yangtze River will displace over a million people from their homes, will destroy the existing river system upon which millions of people depend for subsistence, as do several rare and endangered species of animals, and will increase the risk of catastrophic floods for millions of people currently not at risk when less expensive and environmentally ruinous alternatives for electricity, navigation and flood control exist.

Therefore the petitioners call on this House to refuse to participate in or provide technical assistance, loans, grants, guarantees or subsidies in any form for any aspect to the Three Gorges Dam project from this day forward.

EDUCATION

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): I rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition, duly certified by the clerk, concerning education.

This petition is signed by 50 Canadians who are concerned that Canada should have a skilled labour force to participate internationally in competition and they are asking Parliament to urge the government to promote and encourage the institution of a national education standard in consultation with the provincial governments, education professionals, industry and labour and all those involved in education.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have two petitions to file. The first petition is from a large number of people in British Columbia who point out that family class and assisted relative immigrants have historically been an important part of Canadian immigration. They also point out that the government's present proposals for immigration will make it more difficult for family class and assisted relatives to obtain immigration visas.

The petitioners ask that this government give first priority to all immigration, to family class and to assisted relatives.

The second petition is again signed by a large number of British Columbians, mostly from my own riding.

These petitioners point out that about 75 per cent of all visitor and immigration cases in New Delhi, India come from the Punjab. They point out that the centralized services in New Delhi are increasingly overburdened and that it is difficult for people to travel from the Punjab to New Delhi.

The petitioners ask that the government immediately open a consulate service for immigration and visitor visas in the Punjab.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition signed by numerous residents of Kingston, Ontario, who are concerned about the goods and services tax. They like you, Mr. Speaker, and thousands of other Canadians are appalled that the government introduced this tax and decided in the course of it to tax books, magazines and newspapers.

Of course we in the opposition fought this tax valiantly. We objected specifically to the inclusion of the tax on these products at the time the goods and services tax measure was introduced in the House. We continue to oppose it. The government has ignored all pleas that have been filed hitherto to remove this iniquitous tax.

I know that the parliamentary secretary probably received similar petitions and probably wishes he could file them in the House to object.

I am pleased to present this petition today objecting to this tax and supporting these people who have filed this petition with me saying this tax is wrong and should be withdrawn.

Settlement made on June 4, 1992 for travel between Regina and Calgary and Edmonton for the purpose of chairing the Road to Accessibility hearings in Calgary and Edmonton, Alberta.

Settlement made on June 5, 1992 for travel between Edmonton and Whitehorse for the purpose of chairing the Road to Accessibility hearing in Whitehorse, Yukon.

Question No. 361—Mr. Angus:

With respect to the Canada 125 Gold song competition and related activities (a) what was the total cost of this program (b) what was the cost of producing and distributing the recordings related to this program (c) how many free copies of the recordings were distributed and to whom (d) what is the cost of the launch ceremony scheduled for June 18, 1992 (e) what companies or individuals received contracts in relation to this ceremony and for how much (f) what other costs were incurred regarding this competition?

Mr. James Stewart Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed by the Department of Communications and the Secretary of State of Canada as follows:

(a) DOC cost for this project to date is $164,142. Once final invoices are received projected total costs should not exceed $177,000.

(b) DOC cost for producing and distributing the recordings related to this project is $38,036.

(c) Free copies of the recordings were distributed to the following persons:

—all members of Parliament and the Senate	=394
—station managers of all CRTC licensed radio and television stations in Canada	=951
—Factor Musicaction Canada (FMC)	=150
—Canada 125 Corporation	= 75
—DOC headquarters and regional offices	=100
—Launch	=200
—Miscellaneous requests from media, et cetera	= 50

(d) The Canada 125 Corporation contributed some $8,000 toward the launch ceremony including the travel costs of the winnig artists.

(e) The sole DOC contract was to First Satellite Communications ($4,500) to broadcast the launch and music video.

(f) Other DOC costs that were incurred regarding this competition not included in (b) are as follows:

—prizes to contest winners	=$10,000
—prizes to semi-finalists (nine @ $500)	= 4,500
—production of two music videos	= 89,570
—administration and legal costs for FMC	= 22,036

Also the Canada 125 Corporation contributed $3,400 toward the artwork for the CD cover.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Edwards: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that all Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers be allowed to stand.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I have a Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers on the Order Paper asking for details of costs of a trip undertaken by the Prime Minister some time ago. This request has been outstanding since May. The parliamentary secretary has undertaken on about four occasions to look into the matter. Last week was one occasion and at least once before that in last June. It is now September and we are going to adjourn, certainly before next Wednesday, for an extended period. I fail to understand why the government cannot deal with this request in an expeditious way.

I can only say that it appears to me to smack of cover-up. The option open to me, just so it is clear, is to transfer this for debate and then it goes on a list of hundreds of items where my chances of getting drawn is likened to finding a needle in a hay stack. The parliamentary secretary knows that. He is hoping, I am sure, that I will transfer it for debate to avoid the embarrassment of having these documents produced.

I have to protest this outrage. The government is under an obligation to deal with these requests in an expeditious manner and either refuse the information or give it to the House. I think it is unfair for the parliamentary secretary to keep asking week after week that this matter stand over.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I do appreciate the hortatory and jussive nature of the rhetoric of my hon. friend, but I can assure him that, as I gave him an undertaking last Wednesday to look into these matters, I looked into these matters. I can report to him that his Notice of Motion P-17 is being acted upon and we ought to have that information shortly.

There is a second one standing in his name, and I will take the liberty of responding even though he did not ask about it. He did ask last week, I believe. That is motion P-20. I can assure him that it is within sight. It is in the process of being translated from the original and should be ready shortly. I gave an undertaking I discharged the undertaking; and I will stay with it until we satisfy the requests of my hon. friend.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall all motions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I am requesting leave under section 52 of the Standing Orders for the adjournment of the House to deal with the crisis in the airline industry.

As we have already had allusions today, it is expected I suppose by all of us that the House will not be sitting much longer with the upcoming referendum. In view of the fact that this crisis which has been ongoing through much of this year and has been coming to a point of culmination will likely arise during the adjournment during the referendum campaign, I would urge Your Honour to consider the fact that items of transportation policy, competition policy and jobs in many parts of Canada are at stake in this important industry and that members of the House of Commons should have an opportunity to debate it before we go on any extended leave.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The matter raised by the hon. member for Ottawa South is a very important one, but upon consultation and considering the particular constraints of our Standing Orders, the Chair regrets it cannot comply today with the hon. member's request.

[English]

I wish to inform the House that, pursuant to Standing Order 33(2)(b), because of the ministerial statement Government Orders will be extended by 16 minutes.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81(8)(c) the total number of allotted days in the supply period ending December 10, 1992 shall be increased by one day.

Consequently the total number of allotted days in this supply period will now be six.

Hon. John McDermid (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C–80, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, to enact the Children's Special Allowances Act, to amend certain other acts in consequence thereof and to repeal the Family Allowances Act, be read the third time and passed.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have this opportunity to speak to the members of this House about Bill C–80, legislation which I believe represents a very important step in social policy for families in Canada.

In September 1990 the Prime Minister joined with leaders of over 70 nations to sign a declaration calling for national plans of action on behalf of children. Last December, with the support of all of the provinces, the Prime Minister ratified the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. These were fundamental building blocks for this government's agenda for Canada's children, the Brighter Futures initiatives which the Minister of National Health and Welfare had the great pleasure to announce in May of this year.

Together with the ratification of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child, there are three major elements of Brighter Futures.

The first element is the proposed child tax benefit which is before us today, a new, simpler approach to children's benefits which provides additional financial support to families with very modest incomes.

The second element is a long–term action plan for Canadian children, describing where we are today and outlining the challenges that the future holds.

The third element is a child development initiative designed to address the conditions that place some Canadian children at risk, especially in their early years. This is a multi–faceted program supported by a five–year allocation of $500 million and ongoing funding after that of $170 million annually.

[Translation]

I believe, —and I am sure all members will agree— that we build the future daily through our children. We are aware of the pressures on parents, and the government believes it is important to support them.

[English]

This was one of the underlying principles in developing the proposed child tax benefit program. It increases child benefits by $2.1 billion over five years and better directs benefits according to need. Furthermore—and this is something I intend to come back to because I think its real importance has not been fully appreciated —the child tax benefit provides innovative support to low income working families.

I do not think that it is necessary at this point to reiterate the details of the proposed new child tax benefit. However, I do think it would be valuable to look, at least briefly, at the shortcomings of the current system and how this child tax benefit will overcome them.

First, the existing system provides inadequate support to lower income families, especially low income working families. Under the child tax benefit, families with incomes below $50,000 will receive an additional $250 a year in child benefits on average. Moreover, low income working families will receive up to $500 a year in additional benefits through the new earned income supplement.

Second, even though the present system directs more benefits to low income families than to high income families, more can be done to better direct child benefits where they are most needed. There are two aspects of this particular problem.

First, family allowances are directed on the basis of individual income instead of family income. As a result, families with similar total incomes may receive different levels of child benefits. There is no question that family income is a more equitable basis for directing assistance to children.

Second, high income families continue to receive child benefits even though they have relatively little need. I have been told many times in my constituency by a myriad of people: "For heaven's sake, do not send me these these family allowances cheques, we do not need them in our family. Redirect them where they are most needed". We believe it is more responsible to target benefits to low and modest income families than to continue to make payments to all families.

The child tax benefit will be based on family income. Accordingly, it will be more effectively directed on the basis of need. It will better target assistance to low and modest income families by enriching over-all benefits and redirecting existing benefits from wealthy families to more modest income families.

Delays in the delivery of child benefits under the current system has also been identified as a current problem. I remember, for a considerable amount of time, debating in this House both when we were discussing income tax matters and during Question Period, individuals who had to, in order to get their child tax credit, go to tax discounters to get their money immediately. This was causing great problems for some families. The refundable child tax credit, which I am talking about now, represents more than half of a family's federal child benefit. However, it often fails to meet the needs of the child as they occur. They have to assess the tax returns before they can pay the credit.

This delay can be difficult for many families. They have to pay for the children's needs as they arise, but have to wait for more than a year to receive a full credit.

Delays in the delivery of benefits have forced low income families, as I have mentioned, to resort to the tax discounters for earlier payments of their benefits. Tax discounter's fees average about $80, which represents a substantial amount of money for a low income family.

The child tax benefit, with up-front monthly payments, will provide assistance as it is needed to help with the care of children. Two million families with incomes below $50,000 will receive higher monthly payments and I am very pleased to say that low income families will no longer have to resort to the tax discounters.

Finally, the changes to child benefits over the years have gradually led to the present inconvenient patchwork system. Benefits are now delivered to families in different ways and with differing eligibility criteria. For example, family allowances are based on individual income, while the refundable child tax credit is based on family income. In addition, many higher income families question the cumbersome process of receiving family allowances only to have them taxed back at year's end.

The child tax benefit will simplify the current system. How often have members had people in their constituencies say: "For heaven's sake, try to simplify that tax form". This will do it. As I mentioned, three sets of eligibility criteria and delivery systems will be replaced by one benefit delivered in tax–free monthly payments. The new benefit will be calculated automatically for parents. The tax return will be shorter and simpler and high income parents will no longer have to repay benefits at year's end and figure out on the tax form what they owe.

I think we all agree that while the current child benefit system has much to recommend it, a number of problems have crept in over the years and it is time for a fundamental improvement. Too often we in Parliament create programs and let them run ad infinitum without taking a look to see if in fact they are truly effective, if they are doing the job that we intended them to do, or should they be changed. It is time for this major change to come because a number of problems have crepted in over the years and the child tax benefit is that fundamental improvement which we are debating today at third reading.

I want to take a few minutes now to address some of the myths which have developed during the debate and the discussion of the child tax benefit. I read with some dismay some of the headlines in the papers and some of the stories that give part of the story but not the entire story. Today, with my colleagues' permission, I would like to present some facts as they stand to dispel some of these myths.

Some critics have suggested or hinted that the child tax benefit is cutting back on our assistance to children. There is some vague suggestion that benefits for most families are reduced or eliminated in order to provide credits to a few working families. This is absolutely wrong. The child tax benefit will increase assistance for our children by $2.1 billion. That is with a b and a lot of zeros behind.

While the new benefit is better targeted, 3.1 million families in Canada will receive benefits. That is 85 per cent of all families in Canada with children. Furthermore, all families with incomes below $50,000 will receive either increased benefits or the same level of benefits as under current programs. On average, these families will receive an additional $250 a year in child benefits. It is absolutely clear that this new program is a major enrichment of child benefits for Canadian families.

My colleague over there smiles when I talk about $2.1 billion. I want to emphasize again that it is new money. We talk about old money and new money around here. I am not quite sure that the people who watch us on television are quite sure what we are talking about but they know it is their money and their tax dollars that we are talking about. However, this is new money being injected into this program to help the children of Canada. The increase will be over and above the benefits that would be provided if the current programs were to remain in place. Furthermore, as it has done with the child tax credit, the government is committed to reviewing the level of payments over time and to increase them as fiscal conditions permit.

I would like to remind hon. members that this government has a strong record of increasing child benefits. It is one that I am very proud of and I will stand up on any platform on this country and talk about it. Since 1985 this government has increased the refundable child tax credit four times. We have also introduced a supplement of $213 for children under seven where child care expenses are not claimed. These enrichments have ensured that the average level of federal child benefits paid to low income families has more than kept up with inflation.

Another myth I am hearing is that the child tax benefit leaves social assistance recipients worse off. As a matter of fact, I spoke to a young woman yesterday at the Owen Sound campus of Georgian College. She is a single parent who is receiving social assistance and is back at Georgian College taking courses and trying to get herself off the social assistance roll and back into the work force. She had heard the rumour that because she was receiving social assistance that this new system was going to make her worse off. The suggestion is false. I explained to her that social assistance recipients will be better off under the child tax benefit in three very important ways.

First, since their child benefits will be consolidated and paid on a monthly basis, families on social assistance will see their monthly payments increase from $35 per child to at least $85 starting January 1993.

Second, those families on social assistance with three or more children and more than $3,750 in earnings will also receive extra benefits.

[Translation]

Third, welfare recipients will no longer have to resort to tax discounters to receive their benefits in advance. They will no longer have to wait a whole year to get all their child benefits, as was the case under the present system. These long waits will now be history.

[English]

Also important is the fact that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has met with his provincial counterparts and has urged them to ensure that no social assistance recipients are worse off as a result of the new child tax benefit program. All governments recognize the importance of providing for children. All the provincial governments together with the federal government, as I mentioned earlier, signed the United Nations agreement for children. I am confident that the provinces will not take any action which might be harmful to social assistance recipients.

Some people have erroneously viewed the earned income supplement as unfair by providing benefits to those in low wage jobs that are unavailable to those on social assistance. Low income workers often support their families while receiving thousands of dollars less in total government assistance than families on social assistance. How many times have you heard that it is more beneficial for people to be on social assistance than to be out working. They can get more money that way. There is no incentive really to get them off the social welfare roll and into the work force.

In fact families now moving from social assistance to the work force in many instances end up worse off because of employment related expenses and of course the loss of the social assistance.

That is why we brought in the earned income supplement because that helps offset some of these losses that are incurred on moving from social assistance into the work force. By helping these low income working families that often fall through the cracks of existing social programs, this earned income supplement is a first step. I do not say it is the only answer and I admit that. It is not the entire answer but it is the first step in dismantling the welfare trap that so many people find themselves in.

There has also been some suggestion that the new benefit system will not respond to sudden or unexpected changes in family needs as well as the current system does. First let me say that other government programs, such as unemployment insurance and provincial social assistance, respond immediately to changes in family income which occur during a year.

The fact is that the proposed child tax benefit is more responsive than the current system. This is again another advantage for these changes. For example, with the new monthly child tax benefit, payments will respond immediately to the birth of a child, a change in custody and a permanent drop in family income due marriage breakdown or the death of a spouse.

I would like to remind hon. members that in spite of these misunderstandings about the child tax benefit there has been support for it. There has been very good support. There are a lot of questions about it out there, but when those questions are answered, the support is there. I am finding that people are generally supporting these changes because they like to see governments assess programs, streamline them and bring them into the modern day. It makes it more of a rifle approach than a shotgun approach to these benefits.

Some witnesses before the legislative committee pointed out advantages to the new system. First, it is fair since it is based on family income as opposed to individual income. Second, the earned income supplement is a significant advance in social policy. Third, consolidating three benefits into one makes it a simpler system.

Fourth, it concentrates benefits on low and modest-income families.

Over all what we are looking at today is a better child benefit system because of those advantages and also because it will provide benefits on a timely basis and the assistance will be more on target. It also enriches the child benefit system by $2.1 billion over five years with 80 per cent of this new money going to families with incomes below $40,000.

As members know, the proposed date of implementation is January 1, 1993, which is just a few months away. It does not seem possible that 1993 is just a few months away. In the interim, as I am sure you can appreciate, Mr. Speaker, we must prepare for the substantial task of switching over to the new program. We must also ensure that Canadians know what the new child tax benefit entails for them. To that end we will need the co-operation of my colleagues on all sides of this House.

In closing, I am confident that this is a program which will benefit Canadian families with children. It is a program which will be supported by Canadians. Over the past several years, Canadians have indicated that they are increasingly in favour of targeting social spending and they have clearly stated that increased family income supplementation is one of the most important social policy issues facing the government.

This program will put money where it is needed most, which is in the hands of families to support them in caring for their children.

The new child tax benefit is one of the four key elements of the Brighter Futures initiative for children. It represents new resources delivered in a new way to meet the changing conditions of Canada and Canadian families. It is a significant investment in the future, our children, their parents and our country. I recommend this bill to all in this House.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before I begin my remarks let me through you express to the minister first my appreciation for the help given by his officials at any time they are asked by the opposition. The briefings provided to us are greatly appreciated.

Second, we appreciate his participation in this debate in which he has again clearly outlined a reasoned response to the criticisms made on this side of the House. Although we share different perspectives, we certainly share the same purpose of doing more for children in this country.

I would like to use this opportunity to summarize the criticisms made by this caucus on this piece of legislation. This has been a hastily held debate and in many cases many members in the national Liberal caucus have not had an opportunity to speak. The list of speakers is long and many people have expressed concern about not being able to speak.

On behalf of the House, I would again like to register my complaint to the government for not allowing a full debate. Though it has a deadline it would like to meet, Canadians have an objective to make sure children are helped in the best possible way. We are not at all convinced that the use of time allocation at each stage of the debate was of any help to Canadians in understanding the fundamental changes taking place.

As is so often the case when one is faced with a major debate and a major shift in public policy, one goes back to the roots in trying to understand what it is that has been attempted in the past and where we should be going from here.

As you well know, the Liberal Party of Canada is very proud of its tradition in social policy that began in the 1930s and carried right through almost uninterrupted to 1984. There were several stages of progressive legislation that did more and more for the average Canadian.

I would like to speak of the late and wonderful Senator Croll. He used to admonish us in caucus by saying: "Never forget the working man. Never forget why you were elected. Speak out for those who are paying the bills of this country". Surely Senator Croll's last comments in caucus, before he passed away, were exactly along those lines.

As I stand here today I am reminded of the lives given to this country by people who felt this commitment.

In many ways, the basis of the modern state for social policy can be traced back to 1943, almost 50 years ago. As the minister said, 1993 is just around the corner. That will mark 50 years since a royal commission was chaired by Professor Leonard Marsh from the University of British Columbia on social security for Canadians and the requirement for post-war planning.

It is very interesting that at the very time the Liberal government of Mackenzie King was fighting the Second World War it also had to plan exactly what should be done during the reconstruction period.

Marsh set out the conditions which drove many of the programs that came after the war in the reconstruction. He concluded his royal commission with the following statement that I think should be read into the record and serve as a benchmark as to what we try to do as Canadians to this day. Some things we do have to be reminded of.

He concluded:

> Finally, the obvious but vital point must be made that social security payments are not money lost. The social insurances, and even some straightforward disbursements like children's allowances, are investments in morale and health, in greater family stability and from both material and psychological viewpoints, in human productive efficiency. They demand personal and community responsibilities; but in the eyes of most of the people who are beneficiaries, give a more evident meaning to the ideas of common effort and national solidarity. It has yet to be proved that any democracy which underwrites the social minimum for its citizens is any the weaker or less wealthy for doing so.

• (1620)

It was research such as this and thoughtfulness such as this that led to the establishment of universality and the treatment of every Canadian as being equal, whether they became unemployed, sick, or needy. It led to dozens of programs which, I agree with the minister, have become very confusing in some Canadians' minds but nevertheless have fundamental principles that have to be plucked out, defended, and reinforced.

This week is not only a time to think of Senator Croll as we go through changes in social policy but also the Hon. Paul Martin, whose funeral is tomorrow. It will be attended by many people on all sides of this House who have a fond memory of him.

I was reading through his autobiography, A Very Public Life, in which he discussed what it was like to be involved with these programs. His reference point was the Marsh commission:

> Marsh called for planning to reconvert industry, to maintain jobs and to retrain the work force. Public employment schemes and a well-financed works program would counteract the expected post-war recession. The report went on to recommend a national health program based on universal health insurance and with levels of assistance that depended on individual income—the Marsh report also recommended both children's allowances and a universal, contributory old age pension of $45 a month for married couples—as a clear part of the policy of providing a national minimum standard of living.

Mr. Speaker, if you think that we are broke today can you imagine the reaction of a cabinet coming out of the Second World War. I will continue reading what the hon. Paul Martin wrote:

> The cost of these changes disturbed some in the cabinet, including C. D. Howe and the conscientious keeper of the public purse, Jim Ilsley. Ilsley's objection was that the report, having been released prematurely, did not carry the official sanction of government and therefore could not be accepted as the basis for legislation. While Ilsley might have based his official objections to the proposals on these grounds, I knew that philosophically he did not favour spending the government's money in this manner. One night he and I talked long into the wee hours arguing the pros and cons of state measures for social security. He honestly felt that the government could not afford these measures and that some of them should be undertaken by the family, the church or the provinces. Ilsley kept asking me: "Why do you want to saddle us with these things?" My answer was: "Because of my liberalism".

That is the benchmark from that side of the House to this side of the House. Governments are always without money. Governments are always concerned about deficits. We share those concerns. It is also the responsibility of governments, one generation after another, to move ahead and provide for a more secure society.

Last night I was watching television and there was a discussion about rising crime rates in the Ottawa region. An academic from the University of Ottawa was on. He said: "What do you expect? You have done absolutely everything possible on the public side to increase crime rates. Why are you surprised? If people do not think you care about them, as a government, why should they care about their neighbours, why should they care about their communities? Why should they not be crime ridden? What is there in the way you are treating them that would cause them in return to feel part of a state system that was looking after them?"

The situation is obviously more complicated than that but within those words he had the truth of our responsibility as a government to people in our society. From the time of Paul Martin in the mid-forties straight through to 1984 there was a series of measures that reinforced universality and reinforced the commitment of the national government to all regions of the country whether they be individuals or families and whether they be young or old. I count among the accomplishments of these years the Canada Assistance Plan, regional development and medicare.

Since 1984 there have been a number of measures that have begun to achieve just the opposite effect and have undermined the foundations that we set out to put together in this country. There are many examples, but I include here as highlights of these measures: Bills C-20, C-32 and C-69.

During his remarks the minister looked at me when I had a bemused look on my face as he was talking about the accomplishment of finding $2.1 billion in the system. What he failed to mention in the course of those remarks was that the government had taken $3.5 billion out of the system previous to that. As responsible politicians and members of Parliament we must take that $2.1 billion into account.

However, it is obvious to everyone that the undermining of the system has been so fundamental and I would say —I do not use this word frivolously —terrorizing to people that they need to see the government make a greater and greater commitment to the children.

We come now, after these negative changes in the system of Canada from 1984 to 1991-92, to the budget of 1992 in which the government presented us with Bill C-80, an act to amend the family allowances and related legislation dealing with payments to children.

Our caucus has opposed this at every opportunity it has had, which as I mentioned has not been very many. The purpose of this legislation is to move away from the concept of universality and look at the children of the country with a more targeted approach. The defence of this has been at various times: "The poorest of the poor are now looked after and that there is sufficient support now for middle income families that the payments will look after their children better than they were before".

As the minister has pointed out, there has been some cutting of corners in this debate and I would suggest to him that the cutting of corners has been as much on the government's side as on the opposition side. The gains, where they are, are minimal. Most families earning between $30,000 to $50,000 a year will make perhaps as little as $4 a month more for their children.

At first the sums will appear to be very generous because of the wide-ranging tax changes not fully understood by Canadians. Many families do not realize the impact of reporting family income, and I agree with the government that this is a fair system. The impact of changing the reporting of income from as an individual to as a family and the fact that the average Canadian income is slightly less than $53,000 means that many people will receive fewer benefits than they are anticipating.

In other words, the defence of the legislation is that the poorest of the poor will be better off, but the government has not yet explained how the absence of increases for social assistance families will in any way help the poorest of the poor.

Second, by defining families between $30,000 and $50,000 as being not in need of much extra money how does the government explain, particularly to families in urban Canada, how they should be able to look after their children just fine in these economic times, leaving aside the more than 30 tax increases that have taken place since this government was formed?

The average Canadian in this income level has been taxed again and again and again in small ways and big ways. Suddenly, at the end of this whole taxation process they are offered an extra $4 a month for their family, and the government describes this as a major step forward.

I beg to differ and I think that the average Canadian family would beg to differ that they will see major improvements in their way.

I would like to go into more detail about our criticisms on two fronts. First, I would like to deal with process. Today we finish up the debate in third reading in the House under time allocation. The government has done all it can to fast-track the bill and limit public debate.

Bill C-80 was debated for the first time on June 1. The government forced a closure motion on the bill on the second day of debate on June 9. The bill was then referred to a legislative committee under the Finance envelope. Few witnesses were able to appear due to time constraints imposed by government members.

Of the witnesses who did appear, all but one presenter, a junior academic brought in from British Columbia, expressed serious concerns over the many shortcomings of the bill. Most witnesses were also critical of the process used by the government to try to force the bill through Parliament.

I want to read a letter into the public record that was sent by one of the witnesses, Barbara Blouin from Halifax. She wrote: "The whole experience was most disheartening. I am beginning to understand increasingly that democratic process under the Mulroney government is nothing but a sham, a charade, when virtually all the witnesses called for Bill C-80 criticized it. I had already read about it in The Globe and Mail. Nevertheless the bill was rammed through the committee process by the majority of its Tory members.

There can be no other conclusion than this. They do not listen, they do not respond, they are not answerable to the people. They will do what they want because they have the power to do so.

I have not felt so powerless in all my life. To actually have an opportunity to speak to some of Canada's leaders, to have worked very hard to write a brief and then to realize that it meant nothing and even that I and others were being used to uphold the propaganda that this is a democratic process, is hard to swallow".

This is a very severe criticism. I must tell the House that it is from someone I only met at the committee and I have no idea of her background or whether she is involved with politics or not. It is simply that she is a very serious researcher.

In the meantime, the government is busy on its so-called communications strategy. The minister alluded to the fact it was to make Canadians more aware. One of my associates in Manitoba wrote to me. He has a letter that he received from a F. D. Kealey, program manager, child tax benefit, dated August 27 so he received it before the House came back.

"Dear respondent, due to a very high response we have not yet processed all the coupons we have received for information on the proposed child tax benefit. In the meantime, please find enclosed two brochures which will give you some background on these issues".

The interesting thing is that this friend never sent in a coupon. This letter came to his law office and he has no children under the age of 21.

We should ask ourselves: "What is the mailing list? What are you doing? How much money do you have to waste? Did you write to every lawyer in the country, every law firm? Did you write to every business on Broadway Avenue in Winnipeg? What is it that you have to communicate seriously when you use form letters, mail that has no relationship to the people receiving it". It also has nothing to do with the child benefits program but in fact Brighter Futures which is another propaganda program.

The government may argue its need to communicate but it must do it more honestly, with less waste of government funds and more directly to the point of what the real, modest benefits to any family will be under this program.

I do hope the House leaders for the government will instruct the leaders of the Senate to have full and open hearings and that the January 1 deadline is manufactured. We learned through the constitutional process that manufactured deadlines are deadly. There is nothing magical about January 1. People want a real program and they want their money spent wisely.

All those witnesses which had no opportunity to appear before the House of Commons committee should be given every opportunity to appear before the Senate committee.

In addition to objections about process, we have several objections to the substance of this legislation. I would like to outline them quickly.

First, assistance to the poorest families, namely those on social assistance, will not increase.

Second, the partial deindexation of a benefit and complete lack of indexation of the threshold amounts will result in the gradual erosion of the benefit amount as well as lessen the number of families eligible for the benefit. This is a crucial fact. The 3 per cent solution this government has stuck into the legislation and after defeating the motions moved yesterday, means an erosion of up to 30 per cent in the next decade. With the threshold not being properly indexed, people will also lose real income opportunities.

Third, the lack of a proper mechanism to ensure that dramatic changes in family income are reflected in the monthly benefit amount. As it now stands, it could take up to 18 months for the benefit to be adjusted.

Fourth, the lack of a federal-provincial arrangement could result in the provinces capping welfare payments.

Fifth, the estimated $2.1 billion increase over five years to the child benefits system must be measured against the $3.5 billion already taken out of the child benefit system between 1986 and 1991. On that point, several witnesses were incensed about the reality of how little new money was actually going to be put into this program. When I was willing to concede with a couple of witnesses that perhaps the government's $2.1 million was the correct figure, they were even willing to challenge me on that and in fact presented documents to the committee that were ignored by the government members showing that the $2.1 million figure was not real.

The long-awaited and promised child care strategy, which is a significant deterrent to child poverty, has been completely abandoned, creating additional financial hardship on low and middle income families, especially single parent families.

In addition, this government has brought forward several initiatives which negatively affect poor families, such as cutbacks in funding for social housing, the cancellation of funding for co-op housing, the cap on the Canadian Assistance Plan and changes to UI. There has been no increase in the federal minimum wage since 1986, one of the fundamentals for guaranteeing family income.

The bill signifies the end of universality and the recognition of the higher expenses parents incur. Some women in abusive relationships will lose their only form of income, however modest it is, the family allowance. This was mentioned explicitly by witnesses, including a woman from New Brunswick who was very eloquent on the need to protect women in abusive relationships by giving them at least a monthly allowance.

There was lack of consultation both before and after the release of the white paper. The Conservative government is trying to drive this legislation through Parliament totally unamended. As a matter of fact the Minister of National Health and Welfare, with the exception of his brief intervention yesterday, did not appear before the committee to defend this proposal which supports a disturbing trend by the Conservative government of transferring social policy to the financial envelope.

The question we have is: who is making social policy for this government? Is it the Finance department or is it the health and welfare department?

I go back to the commentary of Paul Martin, remembering his life, when he said that it is the role of the Minister of National Health and Welfare to promote the need of the average person. It was the role of the Minister of Finance to protect the public budget. That was a necessary and natural conflict in a cabinet, but you do not blend the two roles together because you need an advocate for people.

During this whole debate, the silence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who is supposed to be an advocate on behalf of people in need, is absolutely amazing. The government is treating this bill as one of its major initiatives, yet we have not heard from the department which is most responsible for seeing it through.

There is also the regressive nature of the increased child care deduction. In the same bill there is the emergence of the RRSP tax deduction which will cost the government millions in unclaimed revenue and could be of assistance to people in need for programs such as this.

We also have other problems. It is not only ourselves who have raised these concerns, but people as diverse as Ken Battle from the Caledon Institute of Social Policy, a representative from the End Legislated Poverty group, the Minister of Social Services from British Columbia, Professor Shelley Phipps from Dalhousie University, the Citizens for Public Justice, the Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto and the Child Poverty Action group, Lise Corbeil from National Anti-Poverty Organization, Trevor Williams from the Family Services Canada, Michael Goldberg from the Social Planning and Research Council of British Columbia, Terrence Hunsley from Queen's University, Martha Friendly from the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, Dr. Robert Glossop from the Vanier Institute of the Family, Richard Shillington, co-author of The Canadian Fact Book on Poverty, Marcelle Dolment a Réseau d'action et information pour les femmes and Patrick Johnson from the Canadian Council on Social Development. These are some of the witnesses who came forward and consistently pointed out the problems of this legislation and this government, in return, consistently refused to acknowledge them.

Earlier this year Queen's University hosted a conference in its public policy forum on the February 1992 budget at the John Deutsch Institute for the Study of Economic Policy. I would like to thank the member for Kingston and the Islands who mentioned this report in the House in the middle of the debate on the report stage and asked me to bring it to the attention of the House in more detail.

• (1640)

During that conference Martin Browning of McMaster University presented a paper on the child benefit package. He asked the question: "Do the new proposals move us significantly closer to the goal of eliminating child poverty?" His answer: "The above analysis suggests not; indeed, taking into account the fact that the benefits are only partially indexed, it is probable that unless there is some new initiative in the next eight years, poverty among families with children will be even higher in the year 2000".

This government is not only presenting us with a new initiative, but in fact it is presenting us with the foundations of worse conditions in the future.

Mr. Browning also addressed directly the question of the earned income supplement. Again he asked the question: "What, then, are the likely incentive effects? First, I am sceptical that most unemployment is a matter of choice so that policies that make full pay work even more attractive are likely to lead to increased frustration rather than higher participation rates. In knowing this, my guess is that the new EIS will not make much difference".

There is one academic interpretation of the much touted $500 earned income supplement in this program.

As a result of our criticism of this program, the Liberal caucus introduced four amendments earlier this week as part of our package of 72 ways that the government could have changed this legislation and made it better. We first asked for the deletion of the entire bill. Second, we asked for the full indexation of the benefit and of the threshold amounts.

The government should always remember what happened in the fight with the pensioners when they tried to index the pensions, with the famous scene on television across this country of the pensioner from Montreal saying "Goodbye, Charlie Brown". If the children of this country could have the same understanding of their rights and of the obligations of this government as the elderly have, we would see a children's crusade coming into this Chamber saying, "Do you not understand how fundamentally you are moving away from a program of helping all children?"

Children do not make the distinction as to whether they are rich or poor, or whether their dad is working or their mum is working; children only know whether or not people care for them. When legislation is passed saying that we in this House only have to care about certain types of children because the family will look after the rest, or the church will look after the rest, or the province will look after them, or somebody will feed them at the schools, as soon as that is said as a principle, as soon as that is recognized, as soon as it is stated in public that some people who are two years old should be able to look after themselves because their mum or dad makes a lot of money, then there is a fundamental misunderstanding of what happens in family life in this country.

I think this government is going to pay a price for that. I know that I cannot wait to stand up on any platform with anybody from this government who thinks that you can make the distinction between rich kids and ordinary kids, and say: "You have to look after yourself as soon as you are born and if your family makes a mistake, so be it, we are not concerned".

Once you move away from the principle of universality it does not matter where the lines are. It does not matter where the margins are at first. It does not matter whether you are looking after 85 per cent at first. The point is that you have made a decision that 15 per cent does not count. Therefore, someone else like your buddies in the Reform Party can come along and say: "It should not be 15 per cent, maybe it should be 30 per cent", and someone else says: "Maybe it should be 35 per cent" and then someone else in 10 years says: "Maybe we cannot help any of them because we do not have any money".

What happens when you go home to your family and you say: "I am really sorry we do not have enough money; we are going to skip on the kids this month". Can you imagine a conversation like that? That is what this government has just said through the minister: "We do not have the money; we are going to skip on 15 per cent of the kids next month". Nice.

Will the next Minister of Finance stand up and say that he is going to skip on 30 per cent? You did not mind the first 15 per cent? Do you mind the next 15 per cent?

That is why this party has fought this measure every single step of the way. We will continue the struggle in the Senate and we will make sure that Canadians understand that the principle behind this legislation is terrible, is destructive and is contrary to every principle of fairness that we have here.

We also asked in our third amendment for the inclusion of a mechanism, possibly a child benefits adjustment board, to deal with a responsiveness problem. As the bill now stands, if you have a significant loss of income, it can be up to 18 months before the government will change the amount of money you receive for your children.

I used the example earlier in debate which I think is a worth-while one. It is entirely possible in some of our industries for an engineer in the petrochemical industry earning $70,000 a year, for example, to be part of a wide spread lay-off of 2,000 or 3,000 people, which is happening in Calgary, and find himself on UI receiving $22,000 and then on to social assistance. It is not until July of the next year that he can pick up money for his children.

In the meantime, instead of making it available for, say, three children, $273 a month which they parade out here as being so responsive and so fundamental, that which would provide food for these children, they turn around and say: "It is too difficult to make these adjustments. This is so flexible already. We cannot possibly consider this".

If you are serious about poverty, you must know the literature on poverty. You must know the reality is thousands and thousands of people pass through temporary poverty. It is at that moment in which their family is facing a crisis that you have to help. It is not 18 months later. Most families come and go in this cycle. We are in a terrible terrible cycle in this recession and it is time we designed programs and helped people adjust to it.

The Minister for International Trade totally denies the reality that he has no adjustment programs, the government has no adjustment programs, for free trade. On social policy they are committing the same error. There are no adjustment policies for people who need help when they get laid off and when they have to provide food.

Your mortgage payments do not stop for 18 months. You still have to maintain a house. There are stories, for example, in Calgary of people having to re mortgage their house upward to get cash to buy food for their children. Yet this government says under this new program it can provide lots of cash for families in need. That is substantially wrong. The way the government designed this legislation it should be embarrassed for (a) introducing it (b) not amending it and (c) standing up here at third reading and denying it. It is not responsive and for that reason alone it should be defeated.

Last, we are very anxious that this government in a more public fashion commit the provinces to not changing the levels of social assistance if this program is enhanced. Several speakers have stood up and shared the view that with the new monthly payments many social assistance families in poorer provinces are going to be made vulnerable as to what their total income is, based on these calculations.

We have been assured privately and informally by the ministers of the Crown that this is nothing to worry about. They have assurances from the provinces. Put it in writing. Make sure we have agreements on this new program to ensure that nobody will be hurt from social assistance.

There are thousands and thousands of Canadians who never thought before they would be on social assistance. It is a very tough life. It is a very cruel relationship with government. Do not make it any worse by people sitting there and staring at you and saying I know you have more money. You have this child benefits package and let us take a look at your total income package. Those who know the social assistance program understand this very clearly.

By way of conclusion, I would like to draw the attention of the House to a former Canadian still proud of being a Canadian originally, John Kenneth Galbraith, who in his Culture of Contentment wants us to understand just how dangerous this situation is across North America.

Let me read a couple of paragraphs: "The present and devastated position of the socially assisted under-class has been identified as the most serious social problem of the time as it is also the greatest threat to long run peace and civility. Life in the great cities in general could be improved and only will be improved by public action, by better schools with better paid teachers, by strong well financed welfare services, by counselling on drug addiction, by employment training, by public investment in the housing that no industrial country has provided for the poor, by private enterprise, by adequately supporting health care recreation facilities, libraries and police. The question once again, much accommodating rhetoric to the contrary is not what can be done but what will be paid".

Although Mr. Galbraith is writing more directly about the United States, his comments apply to this country and we wait and we wait at great risk.

It is not just one program. A whole number of things have to be set in motion again. If this government does not understand it, it will be replaced by a government that does.

On a very final note, there is a relationship between what we do for children and the Constitution. In the rhetoric associated with the Constitution and this Charlottetown agreement, there is a social and economic union. The Constitution would contain a statement of key social and economic policy objectives shared by all the governments in the federation.

The social policy objectives would include comprehensive, universal, portable, accessible, publicly administered health care, adequate social services and benefits, education, and so forth. I want to stop there.

Adequate social services and benefits: Does this legislation stand the test of being the first piece of legislation introduced in the country under the new Constitution? Is it adequate? Does it provide for the well-being of all Canadians? Does it provide for the well-being of all families? Does it provide for the well-being of all children?

By the very tests that this government has agreed to in this accord, the first step forward is maintenance, contrary to all the principles that it has been boasting about. I would suggest to the government in good will that this piece of legislation be removed, that this House recommit itself to fighting child poverty by the year 2000, our original recommendation and agreed upon by all parties of the House two years ago, that we stake out the turf and honestly admit to each other that this is not sufficient, that we begin again and produce a better piece of legislation for all of Canada's children.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): As indicated in the Order Paper, the first two speakers have 40 minutes maximum. There are no questions or comments. There are after the third speaker.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, there has been a lot of discussion in our country lately on family values and family issues.

The right wing in this country has attempted to hijack the word family and give it an elitist and twisted definition. New Democrats do not try to exclude people from the definition of family. Families come in all shapes and sizes. People will always define their own family groupings: Dual career families, what is considered by some the traditional family with a male breadwinner and a mother at home, single-parent families, same sex couples with or without children, or middle-aged people looking after elderly parents.

Who is to declare that a middle-aged woman or man caring for aging parents cannot define themselves as a family? The Conservatives have a family caucus which believes that the family is deteriorating, and they set themselves up as the judge of Canadian families.

They want to decide who is in a family and who is not, who is deserving of family benefits and who is not. This so-called family caucus is made up of mainly middle-aged men and, not surprisingly, the idea of family that they have come up with fits them exactly.

I will quote a family caucus member, the hon. member for Mississauga South. This is a direct quote:

It—

Meaning all federal legislation.

—should define a family as a male and a female living together to raise children and that is the only kind of family that ought to be defined.

Therefore, widows with children, orphans, children of divorced parents, children who live with parents of the same sex, these children according to that family caucus model are to be excluded from family benefits and have no rights to family services under Canadian law.

This is a horrifying and unacceptable view of Canadian families. Canadians in fact will be shocked to know that we have our own Dan Quayle in Parliament. They have elected people who do not understand what Canadian families are about today and who want to reach into a past that in fact never really existed.

The proportion of single-parent families has not risen significantly over the last 50 years although the cause of single parenthood has changed. In the past widowhood, primarily after each war, was the primary cause of single parenthood. Today it is divorce. Thirteen per cent of Canadian families are single parent families. A happy life for children with one parent can often be better than an unhappy or an abused life with two parents.

One in ten Canadian families is headed by a common law couple. Sixty-two per cent of all husband and wife families are dual earner families. In fact, only a minority of Canadian families are comprised of a husband bread-winner, wife at home, and children.

These families deserve to be protected, but so do other families. A discussion of the family caucus is, in fact, very relevant here because its chair has taken credit for the bill that we are discussing today, the elimination of the family allowance.

I want to point out how anti-family that family caucus is, and how it is made up mainly of people who are catering to their own special interest group. Although I will be talking about family policy, I also want to remind members of this House that 23 per cent of all households in Canada are made up of people who live alone, and they are important too.

NDP policy on families is geared to helping all families survive economically and emotionally. It involves measures to fight poverty. One in six Canadian children is living in poverty, while government policies on social assistance and child support exacerbate the situation.

For example, the bill before us today, Bill C-80, eliminates the universality of family allowance. This bill will give family benefits only to the eligible poor. It will set up two classes of poor. This bill is an attempt by this government to identify the deserving poor and the undeserving poor, and in fact is a back to the future kind of bill, back to the Victorian times when people were classed according to whether they were deserving of help or not deserving of help.

The new family benefit will give more money to those already earning an income in the paid work force than it will give to families in which the adults have been laid off during this recession, whose jobs have disappeared because of the trade deal, and who are not trained for any industry where there are jobs available now; people who are having problems finding a job with an unemployment rate in this country of 11 per cent; homemakers who are finding it necessary but difficult to reintegrate themselves into the paid work force; all of those who are on unemployment insurance, social assistance or are receiving no help at all.

The people who are made to suffer the most through this bill are the children in those families. The children who need the money most will get less of it. The children who are going to school hungry and relying on food banks will get less money for food and clothing than children of those parents who are in the paid work force.

The government is saying that some children deserve food and clothing more than other children. I think that is a horrible legacy of poverty and disrespect to put on to the backs of children.

Children who go to school hungry do less well at school. They are hyperactive and they cannot concentrate. There are long-term physical, emotional and intellectual consequences to growing up without adequate nutrition. These problems start in pregnancy with poor women who do not have enough nutritious food. When one child suffers from poverty and abuse, all of society suffers in the long run with a work force that is uneducated and ill-equipped for the types of employment available, with health problems and with an increase in crime.

Child poverty and abuse is a problem for all Canadians, and this bill does nothing to solve it. In fact, it may even exacerbate it. Bill C-80 was discredited by almost every witness who came to speak before the committee that examined the bill. One witness to the committee, Professor Phipps, compared Canada's treatment of poor families with that of other countries and he said, and I will quote from his testimony: "Canadian public transfers leave families with poor kids still 15 per cent below the poverty line, whereas in lots of other countries such as Norway, Germany, the U.K., public transfers raise them to at least the poverty line". Actually in Sweden, they were raised to substantially higher than poverty income levels.

Witnesses to the committee pointed out that the proposed child benefits available to low-income families are exactly the same as those available in the current system. They are just juggled about so that it appears that one is getting more in the mail but one also pays more in taxes. What is eliminated is the family allowance which had been given to everyone regardless of family income. If the family income was high, the family allowance was taxed back. However, at least the family allowance came and it was in mother's name.

In some families, even high income families, this was the only money that some women received in their own name. This is particularly important to the women who are battered both physically and emotionally by the men with whom they live. That income, as small as it was, could make the difference between being able to get out of an abusive relationship and having to endure it because there is nowhere to go and no funds with which to leave.

This proposed child benefit is not indexed to inflation so it is going to be worth less and less and less every year. The bill also enhances the deduction for child care expenses which puts far more money into the hands of upper income families than middle and low income families. In other words, those who are well off get a tax break because of this bill and this tax approach to child care is really ludicrous and ineffective.

We live in a country now where 1.3 million Canadian children need child care because both parents, or their only parent, are in the paid work force. Perhaps they are at university and are studying full time. Licensed care is only available for one quarter of these children.

This government has already limited funding for child care through its spending limits on the Canada Assistance Plan for British Columbia, Ontario and for Alberta. If the federal government was serious about child care it would have brought in a national child care program which it has been promising, promising and promising for almost a decade now. Tax measures do not create child care spaces.

Contrary to the twisted justifications of the family caucus of the Conservative party, this bill provides no choice to parents in terms of raising their children. The benefit is so little that it does not allow women or men to stay home to raise the kids. It cuts off all help to middle-income women who do wish to be full-time homemakers. It does not create the necessary child care spaces for those who wish to use child care outside the home.

There is no choice in this bill for parents or for Canadians who, despite the protestations against the bill, are being forced to swallow bad legislation. The bill proposes a complex child benefit system to replace what was the simple and straightforward family allowance program. Under this new system, parents must almost be accountants to figure out how much the government owes them. It increases the likelihood that mistakes and underpayments will go unnoticed.

The proposed benefit means more bureaucracy because each individual family will have to be looked at every year in order to determine its eligibility. More bureaucrats will be hired to deal with this at a time when this government talks on and on and on about downsizing government. It increases the chances of delays in getting cheques because it is individualized and not automatic.

The child benefit does not even come close to the actual cost of raising a child and it is about time that the government recognized how much Canadian families are subsidizing tax breaks to profit making corporations through their own personal taxes. Canadian families are overtaxed and the work of mothers in raising children is neither respected nor recognized.

The family allowance was a recognition of the contribution that all Canadian parents make to Canadian society by raising children. That recognition will now be gone. It is replaced by a benefit which amounts to an ever decreasing scrap to the poor. A witness from the social planning council of metro Toronto pointed out that evidence from European countries shows that the countries with universal programs have the lowest child poverty rate. Services and benefits directed to the poor become poorer programs because the middle class no longer sees itself as having a stake in the program and in defending it. How long will middle income earners continue to pay taxes to support benefits which they will no longer receive?

The Conservative government has invoked closure on this bill to eliminate the family allowance which means that it has undemocratically limited debate on it. This is in order to pass it as soon as possible and according to its own agenda and not that of the Canadian people.

This bill is a major shift in Canadian social policy. It is an Americanization, if you will, of Canadian social policy. The Tories wanted to pass it in one day but we did not co-operate and we have stretched out the debate as long as possible to give groups and concerned Canadians an opportunity to talk sense to this government.

Another shift is that social policy has been commandeered now by the Department of Finance which obviously does not understand anything about children or their needs. Social policy should be developed in consultation with Canadians and community groups and be handled by those with a deep understanding and commitment to the well-being of children and Canadian families.

Thanks to successive Liberal and Conservative governments, the Canadian record on family and child poverty is dismal. In Canada, 75 per cent of men default on their child support payments. This leaves single parent families with the worst poverty rate of any Canadian family. Of all single mother families, 57 per cent live in poverty and this figure has not changed since 1974. In Austria, Denmark, Finland, France, Israel, the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden and Germany there are guaranteed minimum child support payments.

Families need financial and emotional support in order to be strong. New Democrat policies include effective anti-poverty measures such as fair taxation, raising the minimum wage and adequate pensions. Our policy includes family support measures such as child care and parental leave, the valuing of women's work in the home and the valuing of women's work in the paid work force through pay equity and employment equity.

Our policy is to establish a national program of non-profit child care which is accessible, affordable, flexible, of high quality, culturally sensitive and developed with community input. We believe that aboriginal child care should be run by aboriginal communities.

There are other policies that could be put into place. Maternity and parental leave must be part of a comprehensive child care system. Our parental leave system lags far behind that of most European countries. They have grasped that most workers are also parents and have personal needs as parents. In the short term, parental leave should be extended to 26 weeks. In the long term, we should be aiming for a system of 9 months for paid parental leave. Ten days of paid leave should be available to workers to tend to their family responsibilities.

There are examples in Canada of governments that, even in this recessionary time, have put an emphasis on these kinds of policies. The Ontario New Democratic government has refined its pay equity system and it is now the most advanced in North America. My British Columbia New Democratic colleagues are also introducing pay equity in my province. Pay equity is an important family issue because many women must work outside the home in order to support their families. Unattached older women are more likely than their male counterparts to live in poverty. This situation will continue as long as women are not paid their worth on the job and have less of an opportunity than men to build up a pension in their own name. Employment equity is also necessary to ensure that women and their families are getting a fair deal.

Women do paid work outside the home in 71 per cent of families in which there are children under the age of six. It is an absolute crime that we have no child care program in this country. Policies should include family support services to help families and the individuals who comprise them when faced with problems of abuse, alcoholism or ill health.

What this government is not telling us is that programs to eliminate violence in the family and to heal those who have survived it is an essential part of any family policy. An accessible, high quality health care system is also an essential party of family policy to ensure the health of families and future generations.

All families are deserving of respect and support regardless of race, religion, sexual orientation or class. White, middle class families deserve to be healthy and happy and to have every chance in life as do aboriginal families, black families, mixed families, same sex couple families, poor families and all of the families that make up our country. Human rights protection is an important part of family policy.

We need a Court Challenges Program to ensure that the rights of all Canadians are defined and enforced.

I went on the radio with a family caucus member the other day on CBC to talk about family values. He said that some families should be favoured over others because: "It is a matter of priorities". I agree, family issues are a matter of priorities. His government priorities include spending $4.5 billion on 50 submarine-hunting helicopters, more than $1 billion on a low-level defence system to protect troops in Europe against a Soviet attack now that the Soviet Union no longer exists, $250 million to purchase anti-tank guns and $1 billion in tax breaks to the rich through an expected trust legislation. It goes on and on.

There was a $25 million cut in affordable housing and a $200 million cut in training for workers who need to train for jobs to support their families. Support for families and child care through the Canada Assistance Plan has been cut. There is the scrapping of plans for a national child care program and now the elimination of family allowance. Obviously these people do not have their priorities straight.

Family policy is more than the narrow and restrictive vision that this government presents. It attempts to glorify the family while cutting almost every service that helps our families to stay strong.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I am appalled after listening to the opposition members talking in this House for the last couple of days about how dreadful this piece of legislation is. They make it sound as if we are cutting money out of the budget. This is totally false. There is more money going into families from this piece of legislation than is provided now.

We are consolidating three different programs. We are adding $2.1 billion over the next five years in additional moneys to go into these various programs. We know that over 80 per cent of all families receive these benefits. Eighty per cent of the increase will go to families below the $40,000 mark in their income. All families with incomes below $50,000 have either increased benefits or will be at the same level. On average, families with incomes below $50,000 will receive an additional $250 in benefits.

I have never heard any of the opposition members ever giving out this factual information. I can tell you that the people will have to judge for themselves in the new year when the benefits start going to them when they see just how beneficial this will be for them. It is a simpler form of getting the money to the people who need it. This is not something that we are trying save money from.

The earned income supplement of up to $500 provides extra help to low income working families. This is a group, by the way, that has often fallen between the cracks. The monthly payments are tax free. They no longer have to report this income on their tax returns. I did not hear the hon. member opposite telling people this. She was doing nothing but condemning this.

The tax return in the future will be shorter and simpler because of this very important ingredient that has been put in this. This is money that goes to individuals and they do not have to report it.

I would ask the hon. member opposite if she does not think that this is a benefit for the people of Canada and for the families that we want to target money to.

Ms. Black As I said in my remarks, this legislation is creating two classes of poor. This is not a new and forward looking type of legislation. This is an old Victorian idea of there being the deserving poor and the undeserving poor.

What I said very clearly today is that the children who live in those families should not be penalized because folks on that side of the House figure that the children of the working poor deserve a bit more, but those children whose parents are on assistance or on no kind of government support are not deserving of assistance.

This program is not indexed to the cost of living. It is the beginning of the end because you have broken faith. You have broken faith with the Canadian people on the universality of the family allowance.

The Prime Minister said in 1984 that universal social programs were a sacred trust not to be touched by his government. I would ask the Prime Minister to live up to that pledge he made to the Canadian people and stand up with the members on this side of the House and vote no to Bill C-80.

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment that I was quite simply appalled, in a sense insulted, by the attempt of the hon. member from the New Democratic Party who tried to mischaracterize in her opening remarks the family caucus in our party.

I want to make a few comments about the family caucus, how it is composed and how it works. In the House we do not usually hear or speak about the workings of caucus. It is very important for all members and the public to understand that this is not a group in any way designing against the interests of families.

The members of this caucus committee consist of men and women, individual members of Parliament, mothers, wives, grandmothers, single mothers, widows, men who are fathers and husbands, divorced parents, widowers and single parents; people with complex personal interest in families, who sit together at a table and try to look at laws that are in existence in this country or are being proposed. They try to develop better ways of supporting and helping families.

An hon. member: Men and women.

Mr. Johnson: I am particularly incensed that the hon. member would suggest that because the majority of the members of this committee are men, it somehow denigrates the work of this committee. It is as if to suggest that because the majority of members of this House are men, it denigrates all the work of this House.

I am appalled and insulted by those remarks.

Mr. Milliken: She says that too.

Mr. Johnson: Yes, she may say that too and I would not be the least surprised.

I would also like to comment on some of the remarks she has made about this bill's setting up two classes of poor, the deserving poor and the undeserving poor. This is totally wrong. What the bill does is say that those people who are on assistance and are trying to get off assistance should be given some additional support. Those families need that kind of support. They are the ones losing their medicare. For example, when they are off welfare they are losing their dental care, their bus passes for the children. These are significant losses as they try to move into the work force.

This bill has in it a small effort. I am sorry that it is so small but we all know the problem of the availability of money right now. Up to $500 a year is given to those families to assist in that transition. This is certainly not the creation of two classes of poor.

Ms. Black: Obviously my comments hit home. I can quote the MP for Calgary North who said "as for national day care we did not kill it. It was done in by a $420 billion debt that resulted from rampant overspending previous to 1984".

This government has set out its priorities very clearly for all Canadians to see. Its priorities continue to be $4.5 billion for 50 Soviet sub-hunting helicopters. Does it not know its geography and recent history? The Soviet Union no longer exists.

It is a matter of priorities. On that I think the member and I agree. It is a matter of priorities and a national child care program which was flaunted as one of the government's major promises to Canadian families for almost a decade now has been scrapped in favour of 50 helicopters. That says it all quite clearly.

In terms of the other comments that he made, there is a lot of evidence on the record of exactly what the family caucus of the Conservative caucus has had to say about women and families. I will quote the member from Delta, British Columbia: "With the rise of special interest groups and their influence in Ottawa, the last people being considered were the families. You have the feminists, the gays and lesbians and all the alternate lifestyles that are demanding attention. We feel that the family is a basic cornerstone of Canadian life".

There are a lot of feminists in this country who will be surprised to know that they are not considered part of their own families. There are a lot of gay people who will be surprised to know that according to the Conservative family caucus, they are not part of their own families. My children will be surprised to know that somehow I am not part of my own family because I am a feminist and proud to be one.

Mr. Allan Koury (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have this opportunity to speak in the House on Bill C-80. In particular, I wish to reaffirm the advantages of the integrated child tax benefit over our present family support system. I also wish to refute some erroneous criticism made by opposition members and statements circulating in this Chamber and in the media.

Canada's social programs are something our country and its people are very proud of. They are one of the things that put Canada ahead of other countries and are envied throughout the world. Nevertheless, we cannot avoid the fact that the present family benefits system has serious problems that can and must be solved.

As was pointed out to us in this debate on Bill C-80, the integrated child tax benefit will significantly increase the aid given to families and improve the mechanism for delivering this assistance. The new benefit will strengthen the existing programs, better meet the needs of Canadian families and better respond to changes in their situation. That is why we must ensure that this bill passes. Given the difficulties with the present regime, our constituents, especially low income families, would suffer if we did not pass it.

Let me present these problems succinctly. Clearly, the present benefits do not provide enough support for low-income families to raise their children properly. Furthermore, these benefits are provided separately through three different mechanisms and at different times of the year. Each of these programs has different eligibility criteria, which are confusing to many Canadians.

In addition, the benefits are not well targeted. Families with similar incomes can receive different levels of support, since the benefits are taxable and reclaimed on the basis of individual income.

Furthermore, the system fails to provide adequate support for families who get off welfare to join the ranks of the labour force. These families are often penalized financially when they decide to go back to work, because of unforeseen job-related expenses and the loss of welfare payments.

Benefit mechanisms may also be a source of problems for many low-income families. As my colleagues have pointed out, the refundable tax credit always comes after the fact, which means the cheque does not reach recipients at a time when they really need it. As a result, money that was supposed to help families goes to tax discounters who are prepared to pay these benefits in advance in return for a certain percentage of the cheque when it is cashed.

The government is not making this up to justify introducing the integrated tax child benefit. Hon. members opposite preferred to ignore these problems in this debate, but they are a major part of the concerns raised by a large number of Canadians and national interest groups. These Canadians want solutions and the integrated child tax benefit is the solution.

During the next five years, the integrated child tax benefit will provide an additional $2.1 billion in support, as well as the current benefits enjoyed by families in Canada. Opposition members should welcome this development.

The integrated child tax benefit will also ensure that these improved benefits are paid to the families who need them most. For instance, 80 per cent of this new money will be paid to families with an annual income of less than $40,000. The new benefit will include an earned income supplement of up to $500.

This new supplement will help ease the transition for low income families who are getting off welfare to enter the labour market. At the present time many families that enter the labour market are often faced with financial problems caused by job related expenses and a potential reduction in their welfare payments.

Furthermore, there will be no more delays in child benefit payments. The integrated child tax benefit will take the form of a monthly payment, thus providing a more practical response to the needs of Canadian children and their parents, and tax discounters will no longer pocket a percentage of these benefits because parents are desperate for cash.

Furthermore, the integrated child tax credit will better reflect changes that occur within the family. Monthly payments will take into consideration any changes in the family such as the birth of a child or permanent loss of income as a result of marriage break-up.

• (1730)

The integrated child tax benefit will treat all families equally. Benefits will be targeted on the basis of family income rather than individual income. Accordingly, families with similar incomes will receive similar benefits.

Finally, the confusion caused by the present system will be eliminated. The integrated child tax benefit will be delivered by a single mechanism, instead of by three as for the previous one, and only one eligibility criterion will apply, compared to three before. The benefit will be paid in a single monthly non-taxable cheque. The government will automatically calculate the amount of benefits on the basis of income and family situation. To receive benefits, parents will no longer have to do special calculations on their income tax return. And parents with higher income will no longer receive benefits that they will have to pay back when they complete their income tax return. As a result, the income tax return will be shorter and less confusing.

In summary, the integrated child tax benefit is the answer to the changes that interest groups and individuals have been demanding from the government. For example, Canadians have been calling for a simpler tax system, and that is just what the integrated child tax benefit does. They have also been asking for a streamlining of government aid for families and a substantial increase in the amount of this assistance; the integrated child tax benefit meets these objectives.

That is why I have trouble understanding why my hon. colleagues on the other side of the House do not give this bill unanimous support. It makes me think that some of their criticisms are more politically motivated than real objections to the bill.

On universality, in particular, I cannot see how they can object to redirecting benefits from higher income families to those with low and modest incomes, since these families are in greater need. Is that not the real purpose of redistributing wealth? We must keep in mind that 3.1 million families, or 84 per cent of all families with children, will continue to receive benefits. All families with incomes under $50,000 will receive the same level of benefits or more than they do now. On average, these families will receive $250 more a year per child.

Opposition members were also quick to criticize the indexing of the integrated child tax benefit, because like all other components of the tax system, indexing will be limited to price increases above 3 per cent. They claim that for this reason families will receive less and less aid from year to year.

In making such statements my colleagues on the other side of the House have decided to ignore the facts. In particular, they say that this government has cut $3.5 billion from the Canadian family support system since 1986 as a result of partial deindexation. That is incorrect and misleading. They deliberately fail to mention that this government increased the refundable child tax credit on four occasions since 1985. Such tax breaks have ensured that the benefits intended for all low income families increased at the same rate as inflation. Add to that the $213 supplement for children under seven years of age for whom no child care expense deduction is claimed, and the rate of increase of low income families' benefits actually was higher than that of inflation.

In closing, I urge all the members of this House to support this bill. We should not allow political considerations to foil any plan to try and ensure that every child in Canada can lead a healthy, productive and satisfying life.

[English]

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve for the many positive comments he made about this important piece of legislation.

I want the House and those who are watching us to know that our government has great concern about the whole area of human resource development in our country. This ranges from the health condition of the pregnant mother to children to education that is carried on through to retraining and that whole area. Children are of great concern and are greatly studied by our government.

Reflecting on the patchwork of child allowances and tax credits and so on, we have great concern with all of that. This is certainly so with lower income people who had to fill out tax forms to receive those moneys. Some were subjected to tax discounters. That is sad and inappropriate. They should not have had to resort to that. It was a result of needing those moneys on a monthly basis and not some time later after filling out complicated forms. Again, they went for this to the tax discounters.

People have come to me, as they probably have to my colleague who is the member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve who just spoke. They asked: "Why are we receiving child allowances when they should go to people who are more in need".

I want to make those comments and ask him if he would relate some of the conversations he had with his constituents. I know that that is where it is coming from. I feel very confident, as I know he does, with this legislation. It is something Canadians want.

I guess the opposition will always take exception to whatever legislation is brought in. That is the adversarial political system we have in Canada and it is something that has always been there and will continue.

I know we are all here today to make sure that accurate statements and information about this bill is brought forward.

I just make those comments to my honoured colleague and ask for his thoughts.

[Translation]

Mr. Koury: Mr. Speaker, I have a comment to make. I have been working with the public for a number of years and discussions were reported to me on several occasions by industrials, lawyers, solicitors, all that crowd. I keep in touch with them and recently they were telling me how insane it would be for people of their standing to receive that kind of money. They would rather that it went to the low and middle income families.

• (1740)

This confirms what people have been telling me all along. The main thing is for Bill C-80 to go through as quickly as possible.

[English]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I want to indicate at the outset that I shall be sharing my time with my colleague who is the member for Davenport.

I want to make a couple of corrections, though. I know my colleague had no intention of not recognizing this. There is co-operation on occasion in the House. It just so happens that when we feel there is legislation that has not been presented in a forthright kind of way, we feel an obligation to correct the facts. The most recent event, of course, is the co-operation that was displayed with the constitutional proposals.

My colleague also mentions human resources development. I want to talk about that during the few minutes that I have at my disposal. Let us look at the financial facts of this particular bill.

The government continues to refuse to admit that it has reduced child care benefits by $3.5 billion over time. It is now returning, it is true, $400 million. However, that is roughly 12 per cent of what it has removed.

Look at it this way. Supposing I hired you for $100 a day and for a number of reasons I reduced that to $50. You would probably be somewhat unhappy as are some of the people here. Lo and behold, three months, six months or perhaps a year later I come back and say: "I want to give you a 12 per cent raise". Using the figures that I have just utilized that would be $6.

I could claim that I am really a great guy, a great employer and generous. I have just given you a 12 per cent raise. I forgot to remind myself that I had already cut your salary by a substantial amount.

This is the kind of game that is going on over here and that is why some of us are upset. Let us look at the process as well. There were a few hearings. When were they held? During the summer. When is the legislation being presented to the House? It is at this particular point in time and with time allocation. We are being limited in terms of time today.

It is being pushed through at a time when Canadians are really quite concerned about the economic health of this nation, about keeping a job, about the future for themselves and their children and about our great constitutional crisis. The propaganda machine has much more opportunity to function.

The government has had some success in making people believe that there is more money. That is what really angers me a great deal. It is also an election strategy. Anyone who does not see it that way should really go to an optometrist or some other person to check out their insides. This is an election strategy.

The government is pretending that there is a lot more than there really is. There is a lot more. It is stacking the money at roughly election time because the system currently in place will continue and then the new system will come in. It will give the illusion that all of a sudden you have a lot more money than you had.

By the time one realizes the reality. Zap. It will be a little bit like the Canada–U.S. agreement. Hey, everybody was going to be better off and richer. It was going to be great. One can talk to those 1.6 million Canadians and ask them how great that was.

There is the goods and services tax. It was going to make us more competitive. It was going to do wonderful things for us. One can talk to Canadians and ask them what kinds of wonderful things it has done for them.

The government is creating an impression of more when there is not any more. There is actually less. It is trying to create an impression that it cares. I have no doubt that there are members who care. I do not want to suggest that that is not so.

I have no doubt that most care. In fact, I have no doubt that most of my colleagues on the government side do not understand this legislation. That is why they are getting up there with so much enthusiasm and being so upset when we criticise it.

If one doubts what I am saying, let me just remind my colleagues about a few broken promises. Child care was promised. It is no longer promised. It is gone. There are cuts to education. It was the Prime Minister himself who said he would not tamper with the transfer formula. He did not tamper with it. He smashed it with a 2 per cent reduction, a 1 per cent reduction, and a freeze. In over 10 years that will mean 10 billion fewer dollars for education. By the way, that same tampering with that formula will produce 20 billion fewer dollars for health during that period of time. It seems to me that health and education are a couple of crucial, critical, fundamental programs of our country.

Not only has the government reduced these benefits that we are talking about in Bill C–80. It has reduced the funding for education by $10 billion over 10 years and reduced the funding for health by $20 billion over 10 years.

What about youth employment? I have talked about youth employment today. This summer was the worst summer we ever had with 17.9 per cent of youth unemployed. There were few jobs. Those who got jobs, and there were many who did not get any, got short–term jobs and they poorly remunerated jobs.

Turning to the GST on books and reading materials, most of the people I know who are paying GST on books for educational purposes are children and youth, young men and women. What does that say about the government's sensitivity toward young people, toward human resource and development?

What about student aid? I have not talked about student aid yet, have I? There is a 3 per cent tax on the people who need to borrow because they are poor. That is quite a record, is it not, and another six months' interest? We were promised that with the six months' interest the 3 per cent tax would be removed, but lo and behold the 3 per cent tax is still there.

The government became a little nervous and thought it had better not start fooling around with six months more of interest until it had removed that 3 per cent tax. It also forgot to tell us—and that is my own estimates and of course no one would deny them when I raised them—that six months more of interest would produce roughly twice as much money as the 3 per cent tax did. What a game.

I can see all those colleagues who are business people on the other side really coming forward and appreciating the significance of their business acumen when they start giving us those kinds of things.

The government says it is attempting to control the deficit and the debt. The deficit this year is over $30 billion and the debt is roughly $425 billion. The government loves to say that it was the Liberals who did it. A former finance minister, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre, told me—I have a letter in writing—that it was $167.8 billion at the end of 1984. Now if we take the interest from that time to now we find there is no way that it becomes $425 billion. Another smoke and mirror scheme. It offloads to provinces and tries to tell us that it controls its expenditures.

Let us look at this. I have $100,000 worth of debt. I walk into my family and say to my wife that I have $10,000 for her and $10,000 each for my three daughters. I am now down to $60,000. I give my brothers each $10,000 and all of a sudden I have $10,000 worth of debt and I say: "I am a great manager. What business acumen I have. What tremendous insight I possess".

This is what is happening here. The government talks about controlling expenditures. It has controlled them, but off the backs of whom? The children, the students, the health care system and the educational system. That is what has happened.

We talk about the deficit and the debt that are out of control. I have many other things I wanted to mention.

[Translation]

I wanted to talk about the Canadian tax system which penalizes the poor. I wanted to talk about how the rich benefit from it. There are still quite a few profitable corporations that do. That is most unfortunate. I did not get to talk about the unemployed, the social assistance recipients and the food bank users.

[English]

I want to close with a plea. It is in a letter from the Canadian Federation of Students. It refers to Bill C–80 and reads as follows:

> This legislation will seriously affect student parents, especially those who are also users of the Canada Student Loans Program.
> Under the current situation, student parents receive family allowance which counts as income when they apply for a Canada student loan. They also receive child tax credits, either in the form of a prepayment in November, or in the spring after submitting their income tax form. The proposed new program will hurt student parents in two ways.
> First, instead of receiving the two types of assistance described above, student parents will receive one monthly cheque only.

It continues:

> For student parents, the timing of the prepayment provided necessary funds for the period of time between the end of the first term and the beginning of the second term, and very necessary funds for the Christmas season. Timing is also a serious concern for those student parents who currently receive their child tax benefits during the summer.
> This time of the year is also one in which many students find themselves crucially short of funds. This situation is especially problematic in times such as these when student unemployment rates are at record highs.

They make a plea for a full examination of this program because they realize, as I do, that it will hurt many Canadians in spite of claims to the contrary from government. In spite of the claims to the contrary, it will hurt many individuals.

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a rather simple question but I think it is important to get some clarification. The opposition has said many times that because of deindexation $3.5 billion has been cut from child benefits. However it ignores all the enrichments to the child tax credit over the last seven years.

Since 1985 the government has increased the refundable child tax credit four times and has introduced a supplement of $213 for children under seven years where child care expenses are not claimed. These enrichments have ensured that the average level of federal child benefits paid to low income families has more than kept pace with inflation.

The child tax credit will increase child assistance by $2.1 billion over five years. This increase will be over and above the benefits that would have been provided if the current programs had remained in place.

In addition to this $2.1 billion increase in benefits, the government is committed to review the level of payments over time and increase them as fiscal conditions permit as it has done with the refundable child tax credit.

I wonder if the hon. member would not be a little more forthcoming and honest with the Canadian public and not compare apples to oranges. He is taking numbers spread over many years and comparing with one year and shuffling the deck on people. If he wants to criticize what the government has been doing, would he give a clear and precise accounting of what he is saying?

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for the question. I believe that I am forthright and honest. Actually I do not believe that anything I have said here was misleading.

I would like Canadians to decide whose figures they trust more. I indicated that not only was $3.5 billion taken out and $400 million reinstated. I talked about their supposed reformed tax system that is not helping the poor. I also talked about the reductions to health and education. It will be $30 billion.

If my colleague wants to talk numbers, let us look at the totality of it. Let us look at what has been added and what has been taken out. I assure my colleague that if I am wrong I will apologize publicly in his home town before the largest audience he can find for me. At the most critical time possible for him, even if it was on his nomination night or his election night I shall displace myself to be with him.

I wanted to make another point. Let us look at the totality of what has been removed in health, education and other programs and let us look at what has been put in because I know there has been a serious reduction. Let us also look at the need today.

Depending upon whose figures, and they vary, from four million to five million Canadians are at the level of poverty or below. That is what we have currently today. I will go with four million; frankly it makes me feel better. There are one million among those four million or five million who are children.

We have to look at the need. The need is greater today than it has ever been. We cannot simply look at resourcing in a vacuum. We need to look at it from a need perspective.

If we look at food banks today, as I mentioned before over two million Canadians will be fed at food banks this year. I believe and I stand to be corrected, and I want to be corrected if I am wrong, that 40 per cent of those are young people and children.

Just to summarize, I know my colleague is well intentioned and I know that he believes a lot in what is being done here. The reduction in the number of the programs is a positive one. The targeting has some merits. I acknowledge that. Where we have some difficulties and some differences of opinion is in the amount of funding that has been removed for health, education and child benefits over time. I did not even talk about the capping on social assistance and the impact it would have.

If my colleague wants to challenge me to a public debate I will go to his riding and I will talk about these reductions. I will do so with a great deal of enthusiasm.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, let me at the outset thank my colleague from St. Boniface for his generosity and congratulate him on his impassioned speech. I also congratulate our critic, the member for Winnipeg North Centre, on his very fine intervention earlier this afternoon.

We as Liberals have a very long and fine tradition of focusing our attention and speaking up for the cause of the poor, of the unemployed and of the defenceless. We have done that over the decades under several prime ministers and in opposition.

Therefore the House will understand why in this debate in the last three days we have focused particularly on that part of the bill which abandons and overlooks the situation of poverty as experienced by children and their parents. There is no doubt that is the weak point of this particular legislation.

This is not just a partisan consideration. May I draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the view expressed by Dr. Ken Battle of the Caledon Institute of Social Policy when he said: "The federal government's proposal to change child benefits is seriously flawed. It does little in the short term and virtually nothing over the long term to make a dent in child poverty. Clearly this is pre-election reform since the larger monthly payments will come onstream during the election year. The new child benefit and earned income supplement will be paid monthly and so will look much bigger than the present system since the current refundable child credit is paid annually or for poor families twice a year".

This is a statement from someone who has no particular axe to grind, so to speak.

In addition to Dr. Battle, at committee stage the minister of social services for British Columbia, Joan Smallwood, spoke in a very critical manner of this bill. So did the Citizens for Public Justice from my own city of Toronto, the Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto, the Child Poverty Action Group, and Trevor Williams from Family Services Canada.

We definitely have here a serious shortcoming which we in the Liberal Party, with our tradition, must and will continue to address.

What strikes a listener to this debate is the fact that the present emerging phenomenon of child poverty in this country is attributable to two major factors. One is unemployment among youth and the other one is the fact that wealth is not redistributed the way it should be distributed in our society. Therefore there is a need to look at tax reform that would better achieve distribution of wealth among the Canadian population.

At the present time it is extremely disturbing to learn that in metro Toronto, Ontario, and I suspect in other parts of the country, youth unemployment is around 19 per cent to 20 per cent. This is an historical high, unfortunately, and it is a figure that ought to send a shiver down the collective spine of this government in terms of a profound preoccupation with a phenomenon that ought to be dealt with on the basis of an urgent matter that requires urgent action. Instead, we have seen a reduction in job creation programs for youth over the last two summers. We have seen a sense of indifference to various demands being made from the opposition benches to improve the employment situation, particularly in the summer months for the unemployed youth from coast to coast.

Bill C–80 somehow inevitably prods us to raise these factors or these questions because in a way child poverty is related, as I mentioned a moment ago, both to the fact that employment is so hard to be found and that we have reached a point, through tax measures introduced over the last eight years by the Progressive Conservative government, in which the taxation system considerably favours high income earners and disfavours the lower income earners. In that respect we find the plight of those who are struggling with poverty, and particularly our younger people.

It is interesting to note that in this House of Commons, and the member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso reminded us of that two days ago, a resolution was passed in 1989 calling for the elimination of child poverty by the year 2000. Therefore it is understandable that we should be asking the government why it did not take advantage of this measure, Bill C–80 before us, to introduce or include the elements that would permit moving toward the elimination of child poverty. Obviously this would have been and is the natural vehicle to tackle that particular social issue.

The goal of the elimination of child poverty cannot be resolved only by way of benefits. We are the first ones to recognize it. However, certainly it is a very important instrument in the arsenal of measures and programs that the federal government can develop to tackle this particular problem.

In reviewing the way that this measure was received one might also want to add, as some of my colleagues have already done, the fact that of the witnesses who appeared before the committee in studying this legislation only 1 out of 25 was in a position to speak in support, and in favourable terms, of the measure itself. Does that not say something? Is that not indicative of something that does not meet the requirements of Canadians at large who are preoccupied with the problem of child poverty? Obviously it is an indicator that something is missing from this particular legislation.

I believe very profoundly that the absence of measures that would address child poverty is a reflection of a lack of political will. This measure has been drafted by civil servants, but on instructions from their political masters. If the political masters had indicated very clearly from the outset that the question of child poverty in Canada ought to be addressed through Bill C–80 we would not be today debating its shortcomings in this respect.

We are now heading for a winter. We are heading for not only seasonal high unemployment but by all forecasts for high unemployment that will unfortunately last for a year or two. This bill offers us, once again, the opportunity to raise in this House the damage caused to the social fibre by high youth unemployment and by the fact that we are in a way borrowing from the future at their expense, and the necessity to once again and further press the government to introduce the necessary measures to specifically deal with youth unemployment if it wants to gets to the roots of the question of child poverty.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): I listened with interest to my friend from Davenport, who I have a great deal of respect for, and I was wondering why he would support avoiding this bill. After all, the bill eliminates the family allowance, which is $36 a month, and the small $65 deduction people get off their income tax toward supporting a child and amalgamates it all in a new child tax credit system in one payment that comes to people every month. It gives them spending money every month, and it is not the kind of spending money that can be taken away by a tax discounter.

This is obviously a far better bill than the current present system. Is he saying that he and his party want to defend the current system, or are they not prepared to look at a new system that puts more money in the hands of people with kiddies? This bill puts $400 million next year and $2.1 billion over five years into the hands of people with kids in Canada. Why would they not want to do that? Why would they object to that?

I agree that there is child poverty and we should possibly do more. Why would the member criticize what we are doing? Why would he not vote for what we are doing and say do more? Why would he want to throw it all away? Would he rather have the existing system and forget it all?

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, the member for Mississauga South is usually very incisive and provocative in his interventions, and I welcome them.

Time did not permit me to deal with the second reason that we find this bill objectionable. That reason is that this bill begins to erode, if not eliminate, the concept of universality. The concept of universality is one which the Liberal Party of Canada introduced and still cherishes today because it is the better approach. It treats everybody in the same manner at the moment of distribution of wealth but it then retrieves the funds that have been given to those who are more fortunate in society through the income tax system.

The income tax system, as the member for Mississauga South would confirm, because he knows it probably better than most in this House, has over the recent years lost its capacity to redistribute wealth as it used to. As a result of that, people who have continued to do well and improve their standing in society and people who are at the lower end of the income scale find their positions slipping and losing ground at the rate which is the source of profound preoccupation. Therefore, if we want social stability I would be inclined to think that any party worth its salt should raise a very strong voice in this Chamber to say that a measure for child benefit that leaves out Canadians at the low end of the income scale is not a good measure. A measure which does away with universality is also not a good measure.

As the member for Winnipeg North Centre outlined earlier, we have in society these days unexpected lay-offs, sudden economic changes where people find themselves from one year to the next in dire economic straits. Under this bill, they would have to wait a considerable length of time before they can be covered under the new system in a manner that protects the income of their children.

I am grateful to the member for Mississauga South for having allowed me, in a sense, to outline the second line of reasoning as to why we find this bill lacking and not deserving support.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on the Children's Special Allowances Act. I did have the opportunity a little earlier to make some observations and I will attempt to make some more.

What we have today with the family allowances, the child credits and the refundable child tax credit has been a response from governments past and present to address assistance to the children of our country.

Through the years it has become somewhat complicated because of all the different programs. It has ended up being, as I said earlier, a patchwork of benefits and has certain complexities to it, especially when you are addressing lower middle income and low income families where income tax forms and calculations and so on need to be done to receive the benefits.

As I mentioned earlier, they become subject to tax discounters. That is very unfortunate in the situation we have today. It certainly shows all the reasons to change the system, but it is one that does have some problems.

What we want to do is increase the amount of money that can be directed to those in need. We are now giving children's allowances to high income people. It is something that I have been constantly receiving representation on. It is wrong and improper for persons making $250,000 a year to be receiving children's allowances and then going through the process of taxing it back.

Certainly individual income versus family income is one that needed to be changed. It has been done with this change to the Children's Special Allowances Act.

Under the Children's Special Allowances Act we want those earning $50,000 a year and less in family income to receive more. On average, families will receive $250 a year more than they receive currently under the system we have today.

As I said earlier, those up-front monthly payments are really important so that people can set their budgets and know the amount of money that is coming in with this new regime. The opportunity to receive those moneys and not be taxed is also an important part of this legislation.

I have to say that I think our government has long been committed to human resource development in totality and certainly the area of children who are under the custody and care of their parents. We need to do everything we can to direct moneys so that they have adequate clothing, food and so on. That is an important part of the study that has gone on for some period of time by this government to look at modernizing children's benefits.

I would like to take the opportunity to address one specific and very positive aspect of the bill. I believe it has not received the attention of the press or the opposition that it truly deserves, and that is the children's special allowances portion. I may have missed some of the speeches. I do not think it has been mentioned although a lot of people have spoken.

Too often we forget in talking about the need of families that there are some children in Canada who may not have a family and they must look to foster parents and institutions to provide their care. The existing legislation under the Family Allowances Act does provide some support for these children by paying a benefit of $52.03 a month. That is a bit more than the family allowance, but it is actually less than the support provided to children in low income families when the value of the tax credits is taken into account and these children are not eligible for these credits.

I do not know if it was noted, but I am delighted to see that under this legislation the benefits for these children will be raised to $85 a month, an increase of some 60 per cent or so. This is giving them the same support that is available under the basic child tax credit for a family with one child.

This will materially improve the lives of more than 30,000 children in foster homes and institutions. It also demonstrates that the government meant what it said in talking about fairer and more generous payments and benefits being the intent of this legislation. If it has not been talked of before, it is important that this be brought to the attention of all Canadians who are watching and to the House.

Some members in speaking have criticized the way the child tax benefit adjusts to fluctuations in family income. I would like to comment on this issue because it seems to me that these criticisms appear to be based on a misunderstanding of the child tax benefit and how it works.

Some members have suggested that the child tax benefit is flawed because it does not adjust to fluctuations in family income. It is very important to remember that dealing with sudden income fluctuations is really the role of other social programs, not child benefits. For example, unemployment insurance and social assistance are major social programs that have been explicitly designed to provide support to families who experience sudden changes and declines in income. I think when people have talked about trying to include it all into this they are forgetting that there are other programs.

The new child tax benefit is not designed and should not take over the role of using unemployment insurance or social assistance in buffering families from income fluctuations. However, hon. members should note that the new benefit is significantly more responsive to changing family circumstances than the current system.

The current system also forces parents to deal with delays up to one year or more, as I mentioned before, to receive their full refundable child tax credit. When they must still meet the day-to-day needs of their families, then this is particularly difficult for low income families. I think it is probably one of the most significant and important parts of this bill because they need it now. They do not need it some time in the future and so they need it on a monthly basis.

Since the child tax credit is more than half of their entire federal child benefits, it is important that it be delivered in another way. As a result, many low income parents are forced to forfeit their child benefits by resorting to tax discounters for that often needed cash because they are strapped and they need it. Tax discounters charge a fairly exorbitant fee for advancing moneys and this will hopefully cut a lot of that out.

A similar problem exists when there is a new child, either from birth or from adoption or a change in custody. Under the current system a family could wait for up to a year before it receives full child benefits. The child tax benefit will eliminate these current delays in the delivery of child benefits and markedly improve the responsiveness of federal child benefits.

With the up-front monthly payments, parents will receive benefits as they are needed to help with daily needs. With this timely response of delivery of benefits, low income families are going to benefit and we cannot but emphasize that more and more and we should be emphasizing that more and more.

Finally, the child tax benefit is also more responsive to the needs of new single parents after a spouse dies and/or there is a marriage breakdown. For example, after a marriage breakdown the mother often finds that she has much less income to support her children and that is a real problem. Under the current system she may have to wait more than a year before she receives increased child benefits because of her lower income.

In contrast, under the child tax benefit this mother can receive a full increase in her child tax benefit payments as a result of her lower income shortly after separation, much quicker. The child tax benefit can respond to her more difficult financial situation in a much quicker and responsive way.

It is important to bring out some of these facts that maybe had not been discussed at length before or at all. They are important pluses and improvements to the delivery of moneys to low and lower middle and lower income families. We should be directing our financial help to these people, making it more responsive to their needs. There has been a lot of direction in having the kind of payments that should be directed to lower income families where they are properly needed.

This government spends somewhere in the area of over $42 billion a year in human resource development which covers a broad base from the area of health and welfare and the unborn to anti-drug and smoking programs to children's benefits and education and retraining and so on.

The direction toward the children of our country is a very important part of that total dollar spending of the billions of dollars that this government directs to the social side of our social agenda. I am pleased that we have been able to modernize the direction of funding to the children of our country who are most in need. This legislation goes a long way toward doing that.

I thank the House and my colleagues for the opportunity to speak today on this very important piece of legislation.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would like to use my comments time during the debate this evening to pay tribute to a very esteemed constituent of mine, Mr. Bruce Hutchison who died on Monday. What he stood for is pertinent to this debate. He was a journalist with an international reputation. He was an eloquent writer. Pertinent to this debate, he had analytical skills that called on governments and politicians to live up to what they said. He believed that it was not just what a politician or a government says, but more important what that politician or government does in support of what they say.

I quote from a 1984 newswire when the Prime Minister said: "Our position is simple and straight forward. We are in favour of universality of social programs and it shall not be touched". One wonders what Bruce Hutchison would have said today when we are here debating the end of universality of social programs. I do not have to wonder very deeply. He was an insightful, eloquent man. He believed his duties as a journalist were not just to criticize but to make a positive contribution to this country. He was not just throwing darts at those of us in public life. He was making a contribution, showing us the way. I think that the fifth estate today may have lost the way.

Bruce Hutchison died on Monday at the age of 91. Even 91 long and fruitful years do not seem long enough for those of us who admired him.

Since he was my constituent, I want to say in this debate tonight how proud I am to have been his member of Parliament and how much he will be missed.

[Translation]

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening to this debate on Bill C-80 and some pretty sensible points were made. I can only imagine how much better we could have made the system if an agreement could have been reached between the governments of Quebec and Canada, for instance. As we know, Quebec has its own system that it administers by itself. Now Ottawa will have, and we may not find the level of commonality, this osmosis we would have hoped for. Families in both Quebec and Canada will not receive as much as they could have had an agreement been reached. This leads me to the constitutional debate. We in the Bloc Quebecois, were hoping for an agreement which would have eliminated these double jurisdictions. Unfortunately we ended up with one that does not, neither in this area nor in others.

The Bloc Quebecois members, also referred to as Pequists and Separatists, are not the only ones criticizing this deal, but that does not address the substance of the debate. I have here a statement from a person who was deputy minister of governmental affairs in Quebec until today as far as I know. She said:

[English]

> It is a national disgrace, we should have left. Mr. Bourassa should have taken a plane home right away. What a humiliation to arrive at such a point.
> As premier of Quebec, with all of Quebec's historical demands, and with all the pressure he had on him here at home, he could have said: "All right, no way".

She described how Mr. Bourassa, among others, came to agree to this constitutional deal, this draft deal, as follows:

[English]

> We are walking on our knees, you know. I think they have holes in them.

Some hon. members: Order, order.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am having a hard time seeing the connection between what the hon. member is saying and the bill presently being debated, Bill C-80. I would therefore appreciate that the hon. member speak to the point, especially as I have to allow the previous speaker to respond to this.

• (1830)

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, I simply want to tell you that the comments I just told you about were those of the deputy minister of the Intergovernmental Affairs of Quebec, Mrs. Wilhelmy, as they appear in today's edition of the Globe and Mail, as well as other excerpts that give us an idea of what took place at the negotiating table between Mr. Bourassa, the Prime Minister and the others.

[English]

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I certainly will keep my comments and questions on the subject of Bill C-80, the child benefit package, which most of know was introduced in the budget this past February. I have to say it simplifies, streamlines and targets those families most in need.

One thing that has obviously become quite apparent during the last few weeks is many people claim that we are doing away with family allowance and I wonder if that could be one of my questions to my colleague.

The other area has to do with the fact we are cutting back. As I recall, this is new money, $2.1 billion over the next five years. I would like my colleague to comment. Is it new money? Is it $2.1 billion over five years?

The most important thing in streamlining and putting these three child benefit proposals together in one package is the fact that we are hitting the people who need it. We are streamlining and targeting it.

What happens to the upper income? Should people over $75,000 or $85,000 a year be getting this? I really wonder. I think if you look at the true purpose with regard to the bill, and my colleague from Sarnia—Lambton could explain, who does it target, is it new money and is it more responsive? What we want to do is get money out to the people who need it in time.

Mr. James: Mr. Speaker, I certainly could not dispute the member from Calgary Southwest. She asks if it is more responsive. It is and it is more money directed to children who need it and that is what is so very important.

Our government took the children's allowance, the patchwork that was going on, the direction of moneys to the families of the children that needed it, and said this needs to be updated.

There was reference made earlier by my colleague opposite to one of our great authors and writers, alluding to the fact that maybe he would not have agreed. I think certainly Hutchison was also a futurist and looked at how we should look to the future and change things and modernize them. I think we have to constantly and continually do that. To keep on funnelling money to those making $70,000 and $200,000 for children's allowances is archaic in the best of terms.

Certainly now this legislation directs more efficiently, more timely and with more money, over an average of $250, for families of $50,000 and under. It does all those things.

Someone else mentioned earlier it was a campaign plank. It must be pretty positive stuff out there if the Conservatives are using it as some lead up to an election. You do not want to come up with things that are negative. This one must be very positive in the minds of Canadians. In my mind it is and certainly any input I have received from the people I have talked to indicates it is a very positive piece of legislation.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have a chance to speak on this bill today because it calls to attention the entire social structure the government is putting upon Canadian people. I will be sharing my time on a 10 minute and 5 minute basis with the member for Burin—St. George's.

What we have to look at in the implementation of this Bill C-80, the child benefit legislation, is not so much the streamlining of the system as is being proposed here or the fact that there will be some additional money provided over the next five years, but the over-all context in which most Canadians find themselves today. Although there will be some additional payments made over the next five years under this revised child assistance program, if you look back over the last five years you see that almost $2 has been removed from benefits for low income families for every additional $1 that is going to be paid over the next five years. Therefore families today are suffering because of the cutbacks that have been made.

These cutbacks have taken place in many ways. The capping of the Canada Assistance Plan was one way. I know in my own district of Algoma that municipalities are in a desperate situation. They are meeting with their municipal associations and are calling on the provincial government for assistance. At one stage the Canada Assistance Plan was dollar for dollar with the federal government. I have heard reports in the media that in fact today the federal share in many instances has dropped to 25 per cent of those benefits. The Ontario government, of course, loaned some 20 per cent of the charges on local municipalities. Therefore, with the cutbacks on unemployment insurance and the benefits there and the massive welfare load because of the 1.6 million who are unemployed, and probably another 400,000 who have given up and have stopped looking for work, those are all loaded on to the local taxpayers. The provinces are also suffering because the government has capped the assistance under the Canada Assistance Plan.

A major item in the constitutional agreement that the provincial premiers wrung out of the Prime Minister was that there would be no unilateral cutbacks in the assistance of statutory programs like the Canada Assistance Plan.

Other programs which have caused the reduction of $3.5 billion assistance for families in low income include the cancelling of the government's commitment to national child care, the reduced UIC benefits, cuts in retraining and job creation programs. This is clearly not a government that is concerned about families with the cutbacks in all of these programs.

In my own constituency, in the communities of Elliot Lake and the north shore, we have lost some 3,400 jobs in the last two and a half years. Last year the government provided a $2.5 million commitment for training, retraining, upgrading and so on. This year it has chopped that to about one-quarter, $600,000. For a community where you had people in upgrading programs and pre-vocational training and now wanting to get skill courses, the well is dry. The funding available for training has been cut dramatically.

At the same time we have some 1,000 people who were laid off last spring at Denison Mines coming on to UI this fall and wanting to take the training programs, but the training support and assistance has been chopped back dramatically this year and the assistance is simply not there. This is portrayed as an anti-poverty program. Yet if we read the comments of various experts in the field of social development, they clearly give it a thumbs down on the range of benefits that are being provided. For instance, Ken Battle of the Caledon Social Policy Institute said: "The federal government proposal to change child benefits is seriously flawed. The proposal does little in the short term and virtually nothing over the long term to make a dent in child poverty. We cannot support this particular proposal".

Sam Snoblelen of the End Legislative Poverty group said this to the committee: "To us it is clear the so-called 'child benefit' will be a detriment to the entire country, especially to children, and eventually to seniors. Therefore Bill C-80 should be thrown in the garbage can, not passed".

I was very interested in the comments of the president of the Canada Council on Social Development because we have heard members across the way saying how this proposal will be beneficial to low income families and families facing poverty. The president of the Canadian Council on Social Development went on to say that the proposal would have very little benefit for single parent families who are generally the group in the lowest income brackets. He said that 62.9 per cent of single parents will receive nothing under the program. Imagine, this is the lowest income group in the country; 62.9 per cent of them will receive nothing under the program.

He went on to say that the income supplement is so modest that it will not make a dent in child poverty. An average family of four will receive something like 34 cents per day under the income supplement proposal. He went on to say that the new program will lift only .7, that is seven-tenths of 1 per cent, of those below the poverty line in single parent families above the poverty line. He went on to say that only 1.6 per cent of low income couples with children will be lifted above the poverty line.

This proposal is designed to have an overlap January 1 so that there will be a special cheque coming out under the old system and a special payment under the new system in January and a tax credit from the income tax for the previous year. It is designed to look quite good to the recipients in January or February when they are filing their income tax and so on. If we look back at the cutbacks that have taken place of $3.5 billion over the last five years and the benefits that are going to flow over the next five years, we see that the average family, if we compare those two five-year periods, has lost practically $2 for every $1 that it will gain under this program.

It certainly is not a very generous program when we combine it will all of the other cutbacks in the capping of the welfare system, which is putting a tremendous load on every province but certainly Ontario with its $10 billion deficit. If we combine it with the cutbacks in training at a time when literally 1.6 million Canadians are out of work and looking for work, who are drawing UIC benefits but there are no training funds available, it does not make a very happy picture either for those people who are laid off or for those family units, those single-parent families, often a woman with one or two young children. These benefits are not very significant and certainly do not make a very large dent in the problem of poverty which faces so many Canadians today. For these reasons our party has called on the government to come forward with better, more effective programs that provide benefits to Canadians, especially those in the extremely low income sector.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the member for Algoma as he criticized the government's child support bill. I wonder if the hon. member would admit that the program and the arguments in favour of it, as we heard for example represented by the member from Sarnia—Lambton, have a certain simplistic appeal.

First of all, those commercial tax people will not be able to exploit the poor. They will receive the money quickly. There are some nice things there, among which is a little bit more money. I wonder if it is not possible at this juncture to perhaps enlighten the other side about the significant impact of abandonment of universality. I wonder if the hon. member might want to refer to the United States where universality for its social programs has not been the characteristic of their delivery and that has had a certain impact. I wonder if the hon. member might want to address that.

I wonder if the hon. member might want to address the fact that those of the very poorest are hardly going to benefit at all. I wonder if the hon. member would like to address the fact that because the program is only partially indexed, the benefits will slide away. I am not so sure that those watching this debate are going to be altogether familiar with that fact. I wonder if the hon. member might make reference that he did slightly but a little more abundantly to the fact that those people who are going to benefit the least, that is the non-working poor, have been multiplied by this government.

There are more on welfare, not working, than there were before. Surely that has to be taken into account in analysing this program as well as the fact that as a result of income tax changes since this government has come into power, those who are very wealthy and the upper levels of income are doing very well, while those who are supposed to benefit from this program have experienced it in some instances as much as $3,000 in increases in taxes over that period of time as a result of the regressive GST. The cost of everything has gone up for them.

I just want to know from the hon. member whether all taken there is any net benefit at all to the very poor to be achieved by the abandonment of universality the night before the funeral of that man from my town who originated it in this house.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I must congratulate the hon. member from Windsor. I think he did an excellent job of capsulizing practically all the flaws of this agreement in a two or three minute address to the House.

Clearly this scheme, as Ken Battle said in his statement to the group, is designed for maximum political advantage. It sends out money early in January 1993 and still the bang for the buck is there. What low income Canadians are losing in this they have been losing for the last five years with cutbacks in programs, the capping of the Canada Assistance Plan which is one of those programs that was supported by the hon. member whose funeral was held today, Paul Martin, Senior, and all of those social programs that he either was instrumental in putting in place or supported dramatically. Those programs are being abandoned this year. In the past five years the government has cut out some $3.5 billion of social assistance to low income families.

The hon. member has talked about the poorest of the poor getting practically nothing out of this legislation and he is right.

• (1850)

I quoted the president of the Canadian Council on Social Development. He pointed out that 62.9 per cent of single parent families will receive nothing from this proposal. Less than 1 per cent will be lifted above the poverty line.

The hon. member clearly has spelled out many—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The time for questions and comments has now expired.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, this bill about which I spoke a few days ago is, as my friend from Mississauga South has just said, a great bill if you have his kind of paycheque. I will demonstrate that in a moment.

This bill is the big lie. The Tories as they stand in the House say in some words or others: "We are going to help the poor". Until you scrutinize the provisions of the bill, you find there is not one red cent of additional money there for people on welfare.

These are not only my words. This is not just my discovery. The gentleman from Calgary North discovered that one day last February just after he had put out his press release lauding all the provisions to help the poor in this bill. Then somebody in the press got to him and he muttered, unwittingly perhaps, out loud for the press to hear and quote him: "I would have thought there would be an increased benefit for welfare families".

Even a Tory can hear the truth sometimes, I say to the Minister of Supply and Services. The Minister of Supply and Services does not like this particular debate because he knows that we are exposing him and his colleagues for the big lie that the government is trying to spread across this country.

I have in my riding many communities, 158 of them altogether. There are 158. I want to direct your attention to just a very small group of communities within that riding and apply the litmus test of this bill to those communities. I am thinking of what is known locally as the Bay d'Espoir area. It has seven communities: St. Alban's, St. Joseph's, St. Veronica's, Head of Bay d'Espoir, Milltown, Morrisville and Conne River.

Conne River is geographically somewhat apart, and it is also a native reserve. In that respect, it accesses certain funding but all the communities including Conne River, all seven that I have mentioned form what is known locally as the Bay d'Espoir area.

When this government came to power in 1984, that part of Newfoundland, that part of Canada was on its knees economically then. It had many years before lost what had been its mainstay, the logging operation, exporting wood to England for use as pit props in the mine. It lost this industry long before this government came to office and I do not lay the blame for that event on the shoulders of this government.

This government came to power in 1984, and its candidate in that area made promises on behalf of the government commitments as to what would be done to provide some economic uplift for the Bay d'Espoir area, for those seven communities.

What has happened in the eight years since? Only yesterday I talked to one of the community leaders in that particular area. He was lamenting how terribly bad the situation is, how it has degenerated, how the unemployment rate now is fully 60 per cent in that area and how they have not been able to avail themselves of the normal programs that had been in place until a few years ago.

For example, there was a very aggressive silviculture program that had been co-sponsored by the federal and provincial governments which was wiped out by this administration. It had provided many hundreds of jobs drawing on the local skills in that particular area.

The government changed the job creation program guidelines which this area had come to rely on somewhat as a bridge to get it to better economic opportunities. Therefore, the unemployment rate which was 25 per cent when this government took over is now twice that and then some.

How does this bill help those people? Some of them, because they have run out of other options, are actually on welfare, not because they are lazy, not because they will not go to work, but because there is no work to go to in Bay d'Espoir.

What does this bill do for those people? What it tries is to hoodwink them. It tries to be cynical with that. But what does it put in their pockets? Many of them are on welfare through no fault of their own.

The bill is very explicit. It says in effect not one additional red cent for those persons who are on welfare. Whatever reason they may be on welfare is beside the point. There is not one additional red cent.

How does this bill help the people of Bay d'Espoir, of St. Alban's, St. Joseph's, St. Veronica's, the head of Bay d'Espoir, Milltow and Morrisville and Conne River? How does it help them insofar as another provision is concerned?

This bill has a provision for child care expenses. To be fair, this bill increases the amount for child care expenses from $5,000 to $6,000. I put it to you, Sir. There are 6,000 or 7,000 people in Bay d'Espoir. Given what I just told the House, how many would you guess of those people would have a sufficient level of income which would allow them to qualify for that increased exemption from $5,000 to $6,000? Of course the answer is nobody or, if any, very precious few. Who does that benefit? Does that increased benefit help the poor who this government has said repeatedly they are trying to help with this bill? No. The same old story. This government has a two-step approach to almost every initiative it takes.

One, it says: "Here is what we are going to do". Then it rushes out and does the complete opposite, hoping it has distracted the people by what it said it was going to do.

In this bill, it says: "We are going to help the poor". Then it rushes out to do what it does very well and it helps the rich. It gives an increased child care benefit for who? People who do not need it.

I have no doubt there is somebody out there behind the curtains being coached to come in and being taught how to read an appropriate question to put to me when I finish my few remarks here. I will deal with that if time permits. Why does the government not answer this question? Why is it that there is not one single red cent for people on welfare? Why?

Keep in mind that because of the patchwork arrangement we have in this country, because of the way welfare and social assistance is paid out, we have 10 systems, one for each of the provinces. In an area where national standards are important, the government is passing the buck to the provinces, so they can pay really whatever amount of welfare they like. The government is saying one thing here. Whatever amount you pay Newfoundland, whatever amount you pay Ontario, whatever amount you pay P.E.I., whatever amount you pay Quebec, we the government in Ottawa will not up the ante one cent on account of this legislation for people on welfare. Let the Tories answer that question when they get up.

Second, let them answer this question for the people of Bay d'Espoir that I have mentioned or for the people of Burin—St. George's generally, for the people of Newfoundland and for the people of Canada. Why is it that the government, in its pretence to be helping poor people, has gone out of its way to help the well-to-do, even in this particular bill with its increased child care benefits? Why? We all know that even under the old clawback system of family allowances that the well-to-do did not really benefit from family allowances because they were not there for those people anyway. Nothing is really changed here.

There is a mechanism that is different. Instead of giving family allowances to people with $100,000 and then clawing it back on income tax, we are not going to give it to them. It is just another mechanism to see that in the end they did not get any family allowance. So there is nothing really changed right there.

One of the things that has changed is that the people who could most afford their own child care expenses are going to get the increased benefit of $5,000 to $6,000. I said in my earlier speech a couple of days ago that it is also an attack on universality. I believe that strongly, and had I the time I would pursue that, because that also is a nefarious, disgusting, despicable part of this particular legislation.

The most despicable part is the deceit, the big lie that says we are going to help the poor, when we all know very well that this bill does not help the people on welfare, this bill sneaks in a little bit for the rich. Every time they can get that little bit for the rich. That is the shameful thing about this, and that is why the people of Bay d'Espoir and of Burin—St. George's are not very happy with this bill, I will tell you that, sir.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to congratulate my colleague on an excellent intervention. I wonder in the time that is remaining, if my colleague would avail himself of the opportunity to try to explain to the House if, in fact, this present administration, through the auspices of either Bill C-80 and/or any other legislation in consequence thereof, has been able to provide additional benefits to the good people of his province as well as to the good people of the province of Nova Scotia.

I am thinking in particular of those provinces that have traditionally been known as have not provinces. Has this administration, through the auspices of Bill C-80 and/or acts which are a consequence thereof, been of any help or assistance to those have not provinces?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. It being 7.01 o'clock p.m., pursuant to order made Tuesday, September 15, 1992, in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 78(3), it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the third reading stage of the bill now before the House.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

AN ACT TO INCORPORATE THE ROYAL SOCIETY OF CANADA

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford) moved that Bill S–7, an act to amend an act to incorporate the Royal Society of Canada, be now read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think you will find that there is unanimous consent for the following motion:

• (1930)

That, notwithstanding any Standing Order and the usual practices of the House, Bill S–7, an act to amend an act to incorporate the Royal Society of Canada, be referred, after second reading, to a Committee of the Whole instead of to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope, and

That, unless otherwise disposed of, at the end of the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business this day, any proceedings then before the House shall be interrupted and every question necessary to dispose of the said bill at all stages shall be put forthwith and successively without further debate or amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to receive the motion tabled by the hon. member?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, we are quite prepared to accommodate and try to pass the bill through all stages, but I am not prepared to have a limit on debate at eight o'clock, which is what that motion implied.

We are quite prepared to spend the time in private members' hour today and extend the time of the sitting of the House if necessary in order to accommodate the hon. member, but if his speech goes 20 minutes and then there is a 10-minute speech from one member of the opposition and other members do not get an opportunity to speak before the bill is put through all stages, we are not prepared to agree to that. I do not think that was the agreement that was discussed.

We are prepared to extend the time of private members' hour until 8.30 p.m. if necessary and seek to see that the bill is approved in all stages during that time. I suggest the hon. member make his speech. If at eight o'clock it has not gone through all stages we will then give our unanimous consent to extend the sitting for the purpose of completing the bill and we will consent to have it go to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I certainly want to indicate that we support the general thrust of the motion by my hon. friend. It is our intention that this bill be completed through all stages as expeditiously as possible.

I believe that the caution that my hon. friend from Kingston and the Islands suggests is good. We also want to allow ample time for members to make comments if they so wish.

As far as the New Democratic Party is concerned we support the bill. We support it enthusiastically and want to see it pass through all stages before we recess today.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the spirit of this discussion. I think that there would be an inclination on all sides to let the bill have a thorough examination tonight.

I just wanted to ascertain whether my colleagues opposite were privy to the discussion, I believe they may have been privy to the discussion, from which there was an understanding to have two items dealt with tonight, the other being the change in name of my friend's constituency of Timiskaming.

If that is in order then I think you would find that there would be consent for private members' hour to deal with those two items in all stages without there being an absolute and final limit on it. We will see how the debate progresses without it terminating at 8 p.m.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): May I suggest to the parliamentary secretary that he draft a proper motion.

Mr. Edwards: It will not be necessary.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Then the sponsor of the bill, the hon. member for Oxford, has the floor. If during this debate, some developments should occur, the Chair will welcome any suggestion to speed up the review of the legislation, if the hon. members so wish.

[English]

Mr. Halliday: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank colleagues opposite for their willingness to co-operate in this and I can assure them my remarks will be fairly brief.

The proposed act under consideration concerns certain modifications to the act of incorporation of the Royal Society of Canada found in Victoria, chapter 46. The Royal Society of Canada was founded in 1882 by the Governor General of Canada the Right Hon. the Marquess of Lorne and was incorporated by the Parliament of Canada in May 1883. Its object is to promote learning and research in the arts and sciences in all parts of Canada.

The founding members were led by Sir William Dawson, principal of McGill University and first president of the society and the Hon. P. J. O. Chauveau, former premier of Quebec and the society's second president. Despite sentiments that the formation of such a body was premature, these men saw the need for a body devoted to encouraging the growth of scholarship and research in the newly formed nation. At that time, active scholars and researchers were few in number and widely scattered largely across central and eastern Canada. The new society provided a venue for the presentation of their work and an opportunity for contacting others with similar professional interests.

In considering the scope of the body, the Marquess of Lorne was the decisive influence in ensuring that it represented the full range of existing scholarship including literature, history and the scholarly arts as well as the natural sciences. In this it followed the model of l'Institut de France which incorporates five academies rather than that of the exclusively scientific membership of the Royal Society of London. One of the founders, Mr. Joseph Tassé, remarked that it was a federation of the intellect completing the still young political federation of the provinces.

The society today has been true to the vision of its founders. It now comprises three academies, l'Académie des lettres et des sciences humaines, the Academy of Humanities and Social Science and the Academy of Science, which includes divisions for the applied sciences and engineering as well as the life sciences, physical sciences and earth and space sciences. It continues to be guided by Dawson's original aim of building an organization characterized by: "productiveness exclusive in its membership, but inclusive in that it offers its benefits to all".

Through its 110 years of service to Canada it has elected to membership leading scholars and scientists from all parts of our country representing an ever widening array of fields of learning and research. An unbroken succession of annual meetings has been recorded in its publications which provide a rich source of information about the intellectual growth of Canada. The society now gives 17 medals and awards in various fields of endeavour. Some are given for distinguished lifetime achievements, while others are awarded to younger researchers for outstanding work early in their careers. It has expanded its activities in recent decades by holding conferences in many parts of Canada on topics of the day and frequently in co–operation with other organizations. It launches studies into matters of national or global importance and provides advice to government and the public at large on current issues.

It has increasingly sought to bridge academic disciplines and address complex topics by bringing together specialists with different experience and expertise. This approach has distinguished its comprehensive studies of AIDS in Canada, of the safety of nuclear power and of the challenge of global change. This is the hallmark of the society's approach to its ongoing responsibilities for fostering research on the environment in its natural and human dimensions, for raising public awareness of science, for advancing the position of women in academic and professional life and for evaluating the research accomplishments and capabilities of the country.

By these and other demonstrations of its capacity to mobilize its members and call upon the commitment to service that they make upon election, the society has received increasing recognition of its emerging role as a national academy.

Since 1989 it has received growing support from its members, from government and increasingly from the private sector toward the goal of realizing its full potential.

Compared to national academies and the equivalents in other advanced and even some developing countries, the Royal Society of Canada still has far to go in increasing the scope of its responsibilities and activities. In its efforts to achieve further growth, it is found that the act by which it was incorporated in 1883 imposes certain restrictions. The petition now before the House seeks to remove these constraints.

The society requests that the provision in section 1 of the original act which limits the value of the real estate that the society may hold to no more than $4,000 be deleted. This would permit the society to obtain property for its purposes without restriction as to value.

Clause 2 of the amendment requests that sections 5 and 6 of the original act which concern the continuation of the original bylaws and offices of the society also be deleted as having served their purpose and being no longer relevant. Similarly, it is proposed in clause 3 that section 8 of the original act concerning the competence of members of the society as witnesses in any legal actions undertaken by the society also be removed as being no longer necessary in present day law.

I would like to add that it is my privilege to co-sponsor this bill along with the recently retired and highly respected former senator representing Quebec, the Hon. Arthur Tremblay.

I am therefore honoured to present this bill to the House and I wish to thank all of my colleagues for graciously agreeing to this expeditious process which, I believe, is appropriate in light of the consideration given by the other place.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to make a few very brief comments in respect of this bill. I want to say at the outset that the hon. member for Kamloops who has been called out of the House for a few moments wished me to indicate to the House his regret at being unable to be here to make a brief speech as well at this point. He fully supports this bill and the intent of it.

I am also pleased to indicate the support of our party of the procedures the Royal Society of Canada has adopted here to make minor amendments to the law that established it. I am pleased to say that the president of the Royal Society of Canada this year is Mr. John Meisle, a professor of mine at Queen's University and a member of the department of political studies there. He was head of the department when I was a student at Queen's and I enjoyed very much the courses with him that took us to various parts of Canada, particularly the trip to Quebec City and to your own constituency, Mr. Speaker, where we learned something of French Canadian government and politics as the course was called at that time.

This bill seeks to make quite minor amendments to the act as outlined by the hon. member who has just spoken. We concur in them and are pleased to assist in the bill's passage and I trust the bill will receive speedy approval from all sides of the House.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, concurred in, read the third time and passed.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think you will find unanimous consent for the following motion:

> That, notwithstanding any Standing Order and the usual practices of the House, Bill C-351, an act to change the name of the electoral district of Timiskaming, be now called for second reading and that the House proceed to dispose of the said bill at all stages.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. Milliken: No, Mr. Speaker, but we would be willing to let the bill be called for second reading. It may be passed in all stages but only by unanimous consent at each stage.

ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF TIMISKAMING

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming) moved that Bill C-351, an act to change the name of the electoral district of Timiskaming, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I think you will find there is unanimous agreement to refer the bill to Committee of the Whole, but I dare say the hon. member will want to give us an explanation of the purpose of the bill at second reading.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Speaker, yes I would like to take a few minutes to inform all colleagues here tonight the reason why I have asked for consent to have the riding of Timiskaming changed to the riding of Timiskaming—French River.

By proclamation on July 13, 1987 during redistribution, the riding of Timiskaming took a very new face. For many years Timiskaming was a north-south riding which included the corridor of Highway 11.

The unfortunate part about it, with population changes in our area and redistribution taking place, is that there had to be a change and an adjustment in the style and the population of Timiskaming. In that manner, the riding of Timiskaming changed from a north-south riding to an east-west, north-south with communication taking part in not only just in a central part in the north-south but also with communication in the east-west.

We took part of what was then Nickel Belt riding into the riding of Timiskaming. One of the greatest problems that we faced at the time was that individuals from that part of Nickel Belt that had become part of Timiskaming could not identify with the fact that all of a sudden they had become part of a different riding.

They asked at that time if there was any possibility that we could look at changing or identifying that part of the new riding of Timiskaming. In doing so they have a lot in common with the north-south part of Timiskaming with regard to tourism, forestry and agriculture. We wanted to make certain that they were part of Timiskaming.

In doing so, we have asked here tonight if we could have the riding of Timiskaming identified as Timiskaming—French River, which would then encompass the entire part of the new riding and welcome the new constituents who became part of Timiskaming in 1988 to be fully an enjoyable part of the entire riding of Timiskaming—French River.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, concurred in, read the third time and passed.

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS

REFERRAL TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Pursuant to Standing Order 110(1), the appointments are deemed to have been referred to the standing committees indicated in appendix.

[English]

I think there is consent for the following motion:

1. That, during the consideration of Government Business No. 12,

a) not more than one amendment to the main motion from the Official Opposition and not more than one amendment to the main motion from the government may be moved;

b) after a representative of each recognized party has spoken in debate, the question necessary to dispose of any amendment moved by the Official Opposition shall be put forthwith without further debate and any recorded division demanded shall be taken forthwith;

c) at no later than 5 p.m., all questions necessary to dispose of any amendment moved by the government and the main motion shall be put forthwith without further debate and any recorded division demanded shall be taken forthwith;

2. That, not withstanding the provisions of government business No. 12, the Standing Orders and the usual practices of this House, following the disposal of government business No. 12, Members be allowed to debate the subject matter of government business No. 12, provided that,

a) during such debate, the Speaker shall not entertain any dilatory motion or quorum called and the House may sit beyond the ordinary hour of daily adjournment;

b) when no member rises to speak, the Speaker shall adjourn the House; and

3. That Private Members' Business be cancelled on Thursday, September 17, 1992 and the item which was scheduled to be considered on that day be permitted to retain its position on the Order of Precedence.

• (1010)

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the parties with regard to this particular motion. What is not contained in the motion is reference to the bill that we will be beginning shortly, Bill C-91. I take it that our understanding is the correct one, that the government will lead with a spokesperson and that the Official Opposition will have a spokesperson. The New Democratic Party will have a spokesperson as well. Thereafter the completion of that debate, which may take place prior to twelve o'clock noon, we would then commence the debate on Motion No. 12.

Mr. Edwards: That is understood. I would hesitate to put a time limit on it because the times for the first two speeches are open-ended. I would anticipate that what my hon. friend says is quite correct.

Mr. Dingwall: Having heard from the parliamentary secretary, I take it that we will just commence the debate at second reading of Bill C-91 and we will not complete it today and it will be adjourned for another day. On that basis, I would give the consent of the Official Opposition to the motion as read by the parliamentary secretary.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

CANADIAN NATO PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

Mr. Bob Hicks (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the honour to present to the House, in both official languages, the 14th report of the Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association.

This report concerns meetings of the subcommittee on the CSCE of the Civilian Affairs Committee of the North Atlantic Assembly which was held in Bonn, Germany, from June 14 to June 17, 1992.

PETITIONS

KILLER CARDS

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Mr. Speaker, I have two sets of petitions.

Under Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present the first group of 142 petitions, duly certified and containing approximately 5,200 signatures of citizens from Burlington, Hamilton, Ancaster, Dundas and Stoney Creek. The petitioners support Mrs. Debbie Mahaffy in her efforts to have the importation of killer cards into Canada stopped.

They applaud the efforts of the Minister of National Revenue for his statement in support of his action that has halted killer cards at the Canada–U.S. border.

The petitioners request that Parliament amend the laws to prohibit the importation, distribution, sale and manufacture of killer cards in Canada.

JUSTICE

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): The second group contains 22 petitions with approximately 2,200 signatures. These petitioners urge the government to stiffen the penalties for violent crimes and point in particular to Miss Nina de Villiers who was brutally murdered on August 9, 1991.

The petitioners ask the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General to continue to review all legislation that deals with public safety and negotiate, where necessary, with the provincial authorities to ensure that the laws are amended to reflect the concerns expressed by the petitioners on public safety.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present two petitions, pursuant to Standing Order 36. The first one is signed by a large number of people within my own community, particularly people from the Indo–Canadian community.

The petitioners point out that family class and assisted relatives have always been an historical part of Canadian immigration. They also point out that family class and assisted relative persons have relatives to assist them in finding employment, housing and learning Canadian language and custom, thus speeding their integration into the Canadian society.

They also point out that the government's present proposal is going to downgrade and make it more difficult for family class and assisted relatives to obtain immigration visas.

They call upon this government to forgo its bill and make family class and assisted relatives its first priority for all immigration.

PHARMACEUTICALS

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is signed by a large number of people from British Columbia, particularly seniors, who are frightened about the dramatic escalation of drug costs in this country.

They call upon the government to withdraw Bill C–91 and to rescind Bill C–22, the Patent Protection Act, so that we may have a truly generic drug industry in this country with true competition in order to keep drug prices down.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, the petition I wish to present to the House today is with regard to section 745 of the Criminal Code.

Section 745 allows those convicted of first and second degree murder to make applications to the court for a review of their parole eligibility date.

Section 745 is a vehicle to allow convicted killers to be released prior to serving their full sentences; after 15 years this application can be made.

The petitioners call on the Parliament of Canada to remove section 745 from the Canadian Criminal Code.

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, the Kinsmen and Kinette Clubs of Canada launched a very important and very significant proud to be Canadian tour earlier this year.

I am pleased to have the opportunity to submit to the House of Commons a petition which has been signed by many residents of Brandon—Souris and other parts of Manitoba.

The petitioners are pleased to participate and to take this opportunity to nurture a positive lifelong relationship with our heritage and our flag, to encourage stronger ties among all Canadians for the further advancement of Canada as a leader in world circles and to promote our tremendous pride in being Canadians.

[Translation]

THREE GORGES DAM

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and the privilege to present two petitions on behalf of the residents of the beautiful riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

[English]

The first petition is a petition by my constituents calling upon the Parliament of Canada to make it such that the Government of Canada refuse to participate in the Three Gorges Dam project in China.

The citizens of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell are very concerned about this issue and have asked me to table this petition before the House.

It is my honour, privilege and pleasure to do so.

JUSTICE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have a second petition which I would also like to table in the House of Commons at this time.

This petition concerns the case of Christine Lamont and David Spencer who have each been sentenced to 28 years in prison in Brazil.

We certainly hope that the minister of external affairs and the Brazilian authorities, who I hope are watching television right now, ensure that justice is done for Mr. David Spencer and Christine Lamont to expel them from their country and to return them to Canada.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my first petition is from petitioners from my riding of St. Boniface which is the geographic east-west centre of Canada.

They want to ensure that the use of foul language on radio and television, in English and French or other languages, is carefully watched by Parliament in terms of the functions performed by the CRTC.

• (1020)

They point out that unfortunately there is derogatory and foul language used on television and radio, including the use of the name of God in vain. They feel that this is contrary to the basic principles that they are trying to utilize in raising their families.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition with respect to the GST on books and other reading materials. These Canadian petitioners ask that this tax be removed immediately.

They point out that there has never been such a tax in Canada and that in most countries in the world with a value added tax there is no such tax. They believe that it is contrary to our democratic principles and to certain objectives such as the increasing of literacy rates in Canada.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have a final petition with regard to petitioners who seek to ensure that the government review not only the promise that the Prime Minister has made to remove the goods and services tax on books and reading materials, but also its reductions and cuts in transfer payments to provinces for education.

Here again the petitioners believe that it is contrary to government statements to assist young people in preparing for their future and the creation of jobs. It is contrary as well to enhancing the productivity and competitiveness of our nation.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 248 and 335.

[Text]

Question No. 248—Mr. Taylor:

Since April 1, 1991, what is the total amount of fees demanded by government departments and agencies under the Access to Information Act and (a) how much was paid in fees over the same period (b) What is the average and median demand for fees (c) What is the percentage of requests for which fees are demanded in relation to the total number of requests?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): The following data relates to the Access to Information Act and fees for the period of April 1, 1991 to March 31, 1992.

Total fees collected	$125,155.40
Total fees waived	$35,348.60
Total fees	$160,504.00
Total requests completed	$10,175
Average fee collected	$12.30
Median fee collected	$70.00
Median requests completed	27
Average median fee collected	$2.59
Total times fees waived	2,712
Total times fees requested	7,463
Total requests completed	10,175
Percentage of requests for which fees were collected	73.5

Question No. 335—Mr. Breaugh:

Why is the Department of National Defence spending $200 million on a contract to purchase 2,750 Italian designed light military trucks instead of purchasing Canadian-made ones?

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): While the winning bid is based on a truck of Italian design, the vehicle will be produced in Canada at the Western Star plant in Kelowna, British Columbia. Western Star Truck Inc. was the successful bidder since its proposal best met criteria regarding operational needs, overall cost, industrial and regional benefits, support, system engineering, and delivery.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)) moved that Bill C-91, an act to amend the Patent act, to amend another act in consequence thereof and to provide for other related matters, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, thank you for giving me the floor. Today I welcome this opportunity to introduce the second reading of Bill C-91, the Patent Act Amendment Act, 1992, a bill that strikes a balance between the needs of a dynamic Canadian economy and the needs of consumers.

This legislation will help create new jobs, attract new investment in research and development and provide new export opportunities for our many manufacturers of patented drugs. It is also a guarantee that Canadians can continue to buy patented drugs at a price that is and will remain reasonable.

I think we should look at the two aspects of this balance. As far as economic benefits are concerned, Bill C-91 is another step in the government's program to modernize and rationalize Canadian patent legislation. In a global economy that draws its strength mainly from Canadian and international know-how, ideas and innovation are essential to be able to compete on international markets.

Any nation that wants to maintain a high standard of living must remain at the forefront of scientific development and technology. To maintain its status as the country with the best quality of life in the world, according to the UN, Canada must have patent legislation that rewards creativity and attracts investment.

Under Bill C-91, pharmaceutical products will be allowed the same 20-year protection as tools, communications systems and medical products. This legislation will reward innovative research and medical discoveries that enhance the quality of life of Canadians.

This legislation will help bring the Canadian patent system more into line with the systems of our main trading partners. In a global economy, businesses will prefer to invest in countries that offer the best possible environment for their investments. Without effective patent legislation, Canada will not be able to attract investments in manufacturing, research and development that create specialized, well-paid jobs in rapid growth industries.

[English]

I would like to say a few words about things that will change as a result of bringing our patent laws more in line with those of other industrialized countries.

Since Bill C-91 was tabled some erroneous reports have appeared. I know that members on both sides of this House will want to clear up some misunderstandings during the debate on this bill.

Currently a drug typically enters the market 10 years after its patent is filed. The generic can enter on average seven years later, or around seventeen years after patent application.

The new proposals would add, on average, about another three years to this period. This means that generic products would come on the market 20 years rather than 17 years after patent application.

Once the patent expires generic drug companies can compete openly with the company that invented the medicine. This is more consistent with other industrialized countries with whom we are competing for investment.

I believe that members of this House will agree that an added three years of market exclusivity is reasonable, in particular when one considers the benefits of the policy which moves Canada in the direction of a dynamic, world-class pharmaceutical industry.

At the same time this government will ensure that these benefits do not come at the expense of Canadian consumers. This is the other side of the balance, and I know that all members will applaud the measures of this bill to ensure that drug prices remain reasonable.

[Translation]

The Patented Medicine Prices Review Board will be given new powers to monitor the prices of both existing and new patented medicines. Its new powers will allow the board to order price reductions, impose fines and, depending on the circumstances, impose jail sentences on offenders who refuse to abide by the orders of the board.

I know many opposition members will support these measures.

Members on both sides of the House will recall the stormy debate around the patent legislation reform in 1987. A number of opposition members protested vigorously when the government implemented the first stage of this reform. The other place blocked government business for weeks in a vain attempt to reverse the decisions of this House.

Consider what hon. members of the opposition said when the amendments to the Patent Act were introduced in 1987, they maintained these amendments would raise the price of drugs. They said the changes would stimulate research by multinational pharmaceutical companies at the expense of Canadians who would have to pay more for drugs.

We must recognize that they were proven wrong. From January 1987 to December 1991 the price of existing patented drugs increased by an average of 2.9 per cent annually. Those are the latest figures available for this four-year period. This rate is well below the Consumer Price Index which stood at 4.4 per cent during that period; in fact it is about half as much.

The opposition was wrong about price increases, and I will show how it was also wrong on other issues.

[English]

We will recall that critics did not believe that the pharmaceutical companies would live up to their commitments for increased R and D spending. The innovative industry promised at that time to double R and D spending as a per cent of sales by 1996, from 5 per cent to 10 per cent.

They have done it and, moreover, they have done it in five years ahead of schedule. By 1991 R and D spending as a per cent of sales in Canada had reached 9.7 per cent to a point where the industry is investing over $375 million per year in R and D in Canada. The cumulative total is $1.1 billion since 1987 with basic science research comprising the fastest growing component of that total.

Hundreds of millions of dollars in new pharmaceutical investment has poured into Canada. Canadian universities and hospitals have benefited from research and development funding by pharmaceutical companies. In fact the innovative sector has become the single largest funder of medical research in the country. This industrial sector employs more than 18,000 Canadians and through its contribution to medical research institutions, hospitals and universities, helps to maintain and create many more jobs in this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote some comments received from university research centers across Canada.

I have here a letter from the Dean of the Faculty of Medicine at the University of Ottawa, Mr. Seely, who wrote:

[English]

> I am writing to add my support to that of many others in the biomedical community for the recently announced intent of the government to introduce new legislation regarding protection of intellectual property. This would bring us into line with the other G-7 countries in the world and I think do much to facilitate pharmaceutical based research in Canada.

[Translation]

I have also received a letter from the Acting Dean of the Faculty of Medicine at the University of Western Ontario, Mr. Chodirker:

[English]

> —extended patent protection for the brand name pharmaceutical industry has created a significant opportunity to attract additional research revenues into Canada.

[Translation]

I also want to quote Dr Cameron, of the Department of Medicine at Vancouver General Hospital:

[English]

> The brand name pharmaceutical industry has certainly been involved in a very major way both in continuing medical education activities, and in research and development both through their own company and support extended university based research.

[Translation]

I could refer to other letters because I have received dozens of them, but I will end by quoting a statement made by the President of the Chamber of Commerce of Metropolitan Montreal, Mr. Jean Guibault:

> We absolutely must grant the Canadian pharmaceutical industry a protection comparable to that which is granted to its foreign competitors, or else we stand to lose the massive investments made in Canada by these companies, as well as thousands of very high-quality jobs generated by the research done here.

[English]

This growth of the pharmaceutical sector and its massive investments in R and D have not been detrimental to consumer interests. The balance we created in 1987 with the creation of the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board has worked to benefit consumers. In 1987 the Liberals and the NDP argued that the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board would be ineffective in maintaining reasonable drug prices. They maintained that the board had no teeth.

What has happened since then? We have seen that the board has been an effective guardian of the interests of Canadian consumers. The proof of that is in the pudding. Price increases for patented drugs, well below the rate of inflation since the creation of the review board in 1987, are a testimonial to the board's effectiveness. People said in 1987 that it would not work but it has.

[Translation]

In fact Canada's drug companies have complied with the board's directives to such an extent that until recently, the need to hold public hearings to review allegations of overpricing did not even arise. That is proof that the board has muscle and the opposition members' fears have proven unfounded, all in all.

The board's powers fitted well with the regulatory regime established in 1987. They have proven to be effective. In 1987, our opponents claimed that the generic drug industry, which had grown considerably between 1970 and 1987 thanks to its ability to reproduce patented medicine as a result of the inadequate patent protection that existed then, would die and that this would be bad for consumers.

The generic drug industry is not dead, far from it. Since 1987 it has grown 180 per cent. That is a long way from a dying industry. The generic drug industry benefited from Bill C-22 passed in 1987 and it will also benefit from this one. More than half the sales of the generic drug industry come from drugs the patents of which have expired. The law will change nothing as far as that is concerned.

Furthermore, in the next few years, the patents on many drugs will expire and generic drug companies will be able to produce them.

In summary, the generic drug sector will continue to grow. Consumers will continue to benefit from the resulting savings. The actual effect of the policy will be to extend by about three years on average, from 17 years to 20 years, the period that generic drug companies must wait from the date of the patent application until they can reproduce a brand name drug.

This bill will only create conditions that are more like those under which generic drug companies operate in the other industrialized countries.

We have succeeded in achieving a balance between consumer protection and industrial development. That drug price increases have been kept at an average annual rate below 3 per cent, which is much less than inflation, is striking evidence of it.

The provisions of Bill C-22 have worked. We have proven the skeptics wrong—one might even say that they have been confounded—and we will now continue what we were doing.

Nevertheless, with this bill we are certainly not going back on our commitment to protect consumers. We are abolishing the mandatory licensing regime, but we are giving new powers to the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board. All hon. members who demanded a stronger board in the 1987 debate should support these measures.

• (1040)

The bill strengthens the mechanisms for monitoring the price of patented drugs, both existing and new, by giving the board new price rollback powers. The structure of fines and penalties outlined in this bill empowers the board to recover up to twice the amount of excess revenues generated by excessive pricing.

Through the bill, businesses that refuse to comply with board orders or refuse to provide pricing or sales and expense information will be subject to fines of up to $100,000 per day. Individuals could face fines up to $25,000 dollars and the possibility of jail sentences of up to a year. The board's orders will have the same effect as a court order and failure to comply could be considered as contempt.

These provisions will give the board very sharp teeth and strong jaws. Members of this House can be assured that the prices of patented medicines will remain reasonable as a result.

I have heard claims from some of the hon. members opposite that new patent protection will increase the health care costs by $1 billion. To say that such a figure is exaggerated would be a drastic understatement.

In fact, the cumulative increased costs of drug purchases by pharmacies and hospitals as a result of the elimination of compulsory licensing will amount to about one-eighth of what the opposition alleges.

From 1992 to 1996, it is estimated that the cumulative increased costs as a result of increasing the protection for the innovators in the pharmaceutical industry will amount to $25 million per year.

Let me put that into context. In 1990, patented drugs at the retail level accounted for about 3 per cent of total expenditures of health care in Canada. The increase in costs that will result from the elimination of compulsory licensing will add to this, it is true. The increase represents $1 per Canadian per year or less than one-twentieth of 1 per cent. It is one-twentieth of 1 per cent of the total health costs in Canada.

It is reasonable to start us on the road to a dynamic, globally competitive pharmaceutical industry in Canada. It is reasonable in order to obtain highly skilled, highly paid jobs in a growing high-tech industry.

Above all, it is reasonable in order to see the development of new medicines that will increase the health and quality of life of Canadians. New medicines will in fact lower health care costs in the longer term.

This legislation is about reasonableness and balance. It is a vital component of the government's agenda to help Canada enjoy prosperity in the years to come.

[Translation]

We must consider this measure in the context of the government's overall economic program. This program was revealed shortly after our government was elected in 1984 and was part of the economic renewal program proposed by the then Minister of Finance who is now Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. Government stuck to this program, and it paid off.

The agenda for economic renewal is meant to prepare the Canadian economy for the future. The global economy has already entered the 21st century and it will be based on know-how.

The standard of living in Canada will no longer depend on traditional sources of wealth such as our plentiful natural resources and inexpensive energy. Neither will it depend on our production capacity. It will depend on our capacity as Canadians and Quebecers to compete in this global economy and to innovate in order to add value to products, services and manufactured goods and carve a niche for ourselves in the world markets.

The prosperity of a nation and its capacity to improve its standard of living in the global economy will be determined by such factors as innovation, flexibility and search for excellence.

These cannot be harvested or created from scratch like our sources of prosperity have been for the past few decades. They have to become a part of people's lives. They must be imprinted on the future generations. They are the fruit of consensus and commitment.

To prosper in an economy based on know-how requires adjustments in labour skills. The new economic environment demands constant product and technology innovation. It requires using and adapting the very best ideas and the very best technology from whatever part of the world they originate.

It also requires commitment to research and development to promote new ideas and technologies that Canadians could then sell or export to other parts of the world.

No country in the world, including Canada, will achieve prosperity based on these factors by closing the door or putting up barriers to international trade and investment.

Change has a global reach on the economic scene and it affects all nations. The conditions for wealth and prosperity have changed drastically and forever for all nations.

[English]

Around the world countries are exploring new ways to create industries to cater to demands that did not exist even a decade ago. They are looking for new methods of training people in scientific disciplines and providing work skills to meet those new demands. They are changing some of the basic institutions of their countries in order to make them more flexible and ready to adapt to technological change.

In order to prosper in the global economy, Canada must promote high quality, improve value, apply best-practice technology and sharpen managerial skills. Above all, Canadians must become very good at fostering excellence in science and technology.

[Translation]

As part of the Canadian government's economic agenda, Bill C-91 will enable us to achieve this goal.

To conclude, what we have here is a well balanced legislation which enables us to bring about the necessary changes to prepare Canada for entering the global market and provides us at the same time with the necessary provisions to ensure the protection of the consumers.

I call upon all hon. members of this House to set aside the somewhat petty attitude that prevailed during the 1987 debate and be more open-minded now. We are at the crossroads of the global economy and we do need tools such as this one to promote economic development, high technology, job security and well paying jobs to make sure that we will be able, together with the pharmaceutical companies, to make major investments across the country that will total billions of dollars in a matter of a few years. We cannot do it on our own and neither can they. However together we can.

I urge my colleagues in this House to support this bill to allow such investment to be made in Canada as soon as possible.

• (1050)

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to enter into debate on a very important piece of legislation that has just been put before Parliament.

The piece of legislation I refer to is going to change the rules of the game forever. It will affect every single Canadian consumer, affect research and development in Canada and the very survival of a two-sided drug industry in Canada, that being the patent of the pharmaceutical manufacturers and the generic industry in this country.

Before I start, I want to make it extremely clear that this debate is not about taking one side over the other, about swallowing the package of facts as they see it from the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association or indeed on the other side of it, going over to the generic drug manufacturers and taking as gospel truth every fact that they purport when they come out in support of their industry.

This debate first and foremost has to be about Canadian policy development that must, as its underlying foundation, be made in the best interest of Canadian consumers.

I would like to premise my remarks by indicating that the pressures have been great on many members of Parliament, from both sides, in this very vibrant and important industry in Canada. The Liberal Party's position, which I will enunciate today, is a position that has been agreed to after careful consideration of the facts, independent facts; after a careful review of past Liberal Party policy in this area; and, most important, after consultation with all the stakeholders and that includes the pharmaceutical manufacturers industry in Canada, the generic manufacturers industry as well as consumers, research and development and health care institutions across this country.

Before we start this great debate it is important that Canadians who are watching have some understanding about how we arrived here today. Back in the 1960s there were three parliamentary committees which reported that the average cost to Canadian consumers for pharmaceuticals in Canada was much higher than comparable economically developed countries around the world, the countries that we do our trade with.

As a result of those three reports, the then Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, introduced a piece of legislation in this House. Effectively that piece of legislation spawned and saw the birth of the generic drug industry in Canada.

At that point in time they tried to moderate prices by legislating competition. What they tried to do was to say, from this point on, for drugs that are under monopolistic patent protection in Canada, we are going to try to moderate those prices because we believe they are too high for Canadian consumers. We are going to allow for those patented drugs to have a compulsory licence issue. If another company comes in and makes an application to produce a generic form of the drug it would be able to do it and in return it would give a percentage of 4 per cent of the sales back to the holder of that particular patent.

I have read the debates. The large companies and primarily the multinationals complained bitterly that they believed that that particular bill would lead to a flight of capital in research and development dollars from the large and very important pharmaceutical manufacturers in Canada.

In addition to that, they said that there would be a slippage in their percentage of market share and that these companies which must make a profit so that they can reinvest it into research and development of new products would be greatly diminished. That was the debate at the time.

What happened is that years later in the early 1980s, when there was still this cry that the compulsory licensing was abhorrent to a free market system and that it was not doing the job that it was intended to do, is the Liberal government—the member for Papineau—Saint-Michel was the consumers and corporate affairs minister at the time—commissioned a study to try to find out whether or not the system of compulsory licensing in Canada was indeed detrimental to the pharmaceutical industry in Canada.

They went to a very respected Canadian, Mr. Eastman, and asked him to compile a report and to put that report to the minister and to Parliament. Something happened in the intervening years and unfortunately the Canadian population found itself governed by the Tory horde opposite after the 1984 election campaign. I will tell you what happened when the Eastman report was delivered in 1985 it had some shocking facts in it. In 1983 alone a system of compulsory licensing was put in place by the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra. The system of compulsory licensing has saved Canadian consumers about $211 million over what they probably would have paid if there was not generic competition. In addition, they had a good look to find out whether or not the legislation as claimed had a detrimental effect on the profitability of the large multinational drug companies that do nearly all of the research and development.

The Eastman report clearly found out that that was simply not the case. It found that the drug companies operating in Canada were able to maintain and indeed increase their profitability more than they were increasing its profitability in other countries where there was no generic competition. The report also pointed out that the pharmaceutical industry in Canada had lost a percentage of its market share.

At the very time that it was losing a percentage of its market share, and it was a small percentage, it also found out that its profits had increased. Therefore, it seemed that we had found the proper balance and that with the introduction of compulsory licensing back in 1967 that we had indeed created a uniquely Canadian solution to the lack of competition in the drug industry in Canada.

Not only that, as an aside, as a plus, as a bonus, we had spurred not a multinational generic drug industry in Canada, we had caused the creation of a Canadian generic drug industry, an industry that, as I said earlier, not only saved Canadian consumers in excess of $200 million in 1983 alone, but has grown to now represent about $400 million in sales and employ over 2,500 Canadians.

The experience seemed to be a positive one. If there was any question at that point in time that the system should be changed to wholesale for the sake of change, it simply was not borne out by the facts contained in the Eastman report which was tabled in 1985.

The world was changing in 1985. We had right wing governments right across the world. We had Maggie Thatcher and her Tories in England dismantling that economy. We had Ronald Reagan in the United States.

An hon. member: Who?

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Ronald Reagan, the guy who increased the food lines by about 300 per cent in every American centre, who set about to disenfranchise the poor and the downtrodden in American society and who had a free market dream that you support success and that you damn failure.

In the early 1980s there was a real change in what was going on in the United States trade department. Indeed, in 1981 the Reagan government appointed Mr. Ed Pratt to head the United States top private sector trade advisory panel. This individual is past president of Pfizer Incorporated which is a very large and very important pharmaceutical manufacturing company.

In the next few years it became very clear, when Clayton Yower was appointed as chief U.S. trade negotiator, that the number one trade irritant that the United States was raising with the Prime Minister and his Tory ministers opposite was, above all things, our compulsory licensing. It was not whether or not our steel products were going in at a subsidized rate. It was not on softwood lumber. It was not any of those things. It was on our system of compulsory licensing in Canada.

When Ronald Reagan was in Quebec City for that awful shamrock summit where we saw the spectacle of the Prime Minister of Canada not only embarrassing himself by hugging up to the President of the United States, but singing with him. It was the most embarrassing moment in Canadian history. He bellied up to the president. There was a report in the paper at that point in time that the number one issue that was raised by the VP at that point in time, who is now President Bush, was the current Tory government's slowness in getting rid of this demon called compulsory licensing.

It was pretty clear that it was way up on the agenda in the United States. What we did not know at the time and which we have subsequently found out is that this government's agenda is not driven by what is in the best interest of Canada, but is driven by this country's Prime Minister's absolute mania with being a friend of who ever is the President of the United States. Whatever is the priority of the President of the United States then becomes the priority for public policy-making in Canada. Good luck to the 27 million consumers in Canada.

The shamrock summit took place. They had not yet started to fish down at Kennebunkport. That was yet to come. However, the interests of Canadians in having a unique situation where we could have a patent medicine industry investing in Canada and producing new products for Canadians and a generic industry that moderated prices is going to change forever.

I want to refer back to 1986–1987, to the bill which was brought in, Bill C–22. It was a precondition for the Americans to enter into that awful free trade agreement from which we all now suffer.

A couple of the members opposite are shaking their heads. I want to quote from a document called Pharmaceuticals, Patents and Politics—Canada and Bill C–22. Bill C–22 was the bill that effectively changed compulsory licensing in Canada and laid the groundwork for Bill C–91, which will kill compulsory licensing in Canada.

I want to quote from this document: "During this period of time, 1986, the Conservatives continually and vigorously denied that there was any connection between the free trade agreement with the United States and changes in compulsory licensing, but the facts made their denials hard to credit".

The U.S. deputy chief negotiator in the free talks said that Ottawa did not want intellectual property to be in the free trade negotiations. They did not want to appear to be negotiating that away as part of the free trade agreement. Whatever changes they were going to make they wanted them to be viewed as being in Canada's interests. That was a high priority issue for us. We are not above flagging the importance of resolving the issue to the Canadian negotiator for the success of over–all negotiations.

I want to further quote: "The Americans gave the final proof of the linkage between the two issues the day after the successful conclusion of the negotiations" for the free trade deal, the FTA. A U.S. summary of the agreement said the accord contained a clause, "to make progress towards establishing adequate and effective protection of pharmaceuticals in Canada by liberalizing compulsory licensing provisions. It was only after Conservative politicians"—these guys opposite—"demanded the removal of that section that it was dropped from the final text". The proof is clear.

Bill C–22 back in 1987 was more about pleasing our American neighbours than it was about its stated intentions, which was to increase research and development in Canada. The government persisted. When a government has a majority, it can pretty well do what it pleases. It introduced Bill C–22 and that is the legislation we operate under currently.

What did Bill C–22 do? Bill C–22 effectively extended patent protection in Canada. It increased the level of monopolistic patent protection and allowed for compulsory licensing for about 17 years, in most cases. Do not forget that as a nation we are always trying to increase our research and development, a noble and worthy goal to set and a cause to pursue.

The pharmaceutical industry in Canada at that time said: "If we get the extended patent protection which is in Bill C–22, we know that it will extend the period of monopolistic patent protection. If that is done, we are prepared to increase the level of research and development as a percentage of the gross revenues that we are putting into Canada".

At the time of Bill C–22 these companies were only putting in about 5 per cent. They had agreed in public that they would go up to 8 per cent by 1991 and 10 per cent by 1995. The timeframe for Bill C–22 was to be from 1988 to 1995 with a cabinet review to see whether or not the stated goals were being achieved in 1991 and then a full parliamentary review in 1995.

One of the most difficult, heated, boisterous debates in this House during that time was over this drug patent legislation. The Liberal Party stood on its principles and said that before we started charging Canadian consumers for increased profits with large drug companies we wanted to make sure the seniors in this country, the provincial pharmacare programs and each and every consumer was not being unduly gouged. We believe that the system put in place by the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra back in 1967 should not have been thrown out. The Eastman report, which this government likes to quote a lot, showed that it actually was working in this country, that we had done something differently and most of all it was working.

The Liberal opposition led by our current House leader said no to the government. This was before the government ripped the guts out of Parliament so that we could not hold up legislation any more and it could do whatever it wanted. We held up that legislation for nine months, for nine solid months.

We made sure that the government had a public commitment by the pharmaceutical manufacturers for increased research and development in Canada in exchange for the extension of patent protection. We were concerned about the impact of extended patent protection in Canada on Canadian drug prices.

At that point in time we forced the government to come in with a monitoring agency called the Patent Medicine Prices Review Board. The pharmaceutical industry said: "If you give us this extended protection, we will guarantee that we will keep the increase in the price of drugs below the cost of inflation. We will guarantee that we will increase our level of R and D", that is to the levels I have previously mentioned. The government agreed that there had to be a mechanism in a more monopolistic environment to protect Canadian consumers, and it formed the PMPRB.

The Liberal Party insured that if the majority opposite forced through a bill there were some protections and clearly stated goals and objectives in Bill C-22.

One of the other things pharmaceutical manufacturers indicated was that if the bill went through and they were given this extra period of monopolistic protection, not only would they increase R and D, not only would they keep our drug costs down, but they would create up to 3,000 new jobs over the period this legislation was to be in force. That was about 3,000 new jobs at that point in time.

The results and the success of these companies in meeting those targets are highly questionable. In the fourth report of the Patent Medicine Prices Review Board, a government owned agency, clearly indicated that the pharmaceutical industry in Canada was at about 9.6 per cent or 9.7 per cent. Clearly it is getting very close and will meet that target of 10 per cent of R and D to revenue, but the problem we have and a lot of professionals out there have is the very definition of research and development.

The scientific community, is desperately in need of investment so that it can create new products, so that it can create new drugs and so that it is viable and competitive. It found that it was not getting the new money that was coming into the system. The PMPRB, in its fourth report, clearly indicated in 1991 that there was a tremendous amount of money put back into what was defined as R and D by the pharmaceutical manufacturers industry, but in actual fact basic research, the stuff that creates new drugs, new pharmaceuticals in our Canadian laboratories, was only at 26.5 per cent of all the money spent. The rest of the money it was spending in actual fact was going to a lot of clinical research and a lot of marketing. I do not think that is really high-tech R and D. The universities I have talked to said: "We have received a few bucks but not what we thought". Maybe the definition of R and D was wrong.

I want to quote today from the paper, and I cannot believe the minister did not quote it himself. There is a report today in The Montreal Gazette: "Few benefits from the 1987 drug patent changes, study shows". This is a report from the government's own department that was prepared—it is now in national papers across Canada—in advance of the Minister for International Trade going down to sell us out in Mexico in the North American free trade talks.

I quote specifically what it says on research and development: "There has been some improvement since 1988 in basic research, work to discover new drugs. In 1990 it accounted for 26 per cent of research spending, compared with 19 per cent two years earlier. The study suggests that Canada is unlikely to become a centre for basic drug research". To quote a government document: "In general R and D is conducted in the corporate headquarter's home country to foster closer linkages with over-all corporate policies, the study says".

I do not know if we got the types of jobs we were supposed to get as a result of these research and development dollars being spent. Most of them are going into other things. Most of them are going into product development. The universities have not benefited to the extent that Liberals want those universities to benefit from the dollars that are made, the revenues that are generated, by multinational and foreign drug companies.

I said that I would quote wherever possible documents that are not from either side in the industry. The PMPRB's fourth annual report stated: "The location of significant research in the pharmaceutical industry is principally determined by the location of the parent firm's headquarters".

An OECD report entitled "Multinational Enterprise Governments and Technology" stated: "Whenever governments have tried to encourage pharmaceutical innovation in countries where it only exists at lower levels, the results have been disappointing".

Indeed and article in The Montreal Gazette on this very issue stated that the situation was very clearly not as it seemed. It said: "High quality jobs promised by the drug industry include cleaners".

What about the 3,000 jobs we were promised? A new report out clearly indicates that 3,000 jobs have not been created, that in actual fact to date it is slightly over 1,300 jobs and that in some parts of the industry across Canada there has been a slippage of jobs.

I want to quote again from this article. It is in today's paper. It is not something that we have dredged up. We read it in this morning's paper. It is quoting the government report about the investment in new jobs in Canada and the type of jobs that the pharmaceutical industry has actually created. It states: "In 1987 the brand name drug producers and the government predicted the new law would create 3,000 jobs by 1996. The study's authors, using figures provided by the brand name and generic drug makers, concluded that only 1,386 jobs were created between 1987 and 1990 and nearly half of those jobs were in marketing and sales with only a third in research and development", the very sector that was targeted for growth back in 1987. It did not happen. It is not there. The facts are the facts and the facts speak for themselves.

It is fairly clear that the experience with Bill C–22 has not been what it should have been. We have had the government and the PMPRB which is mandated to do three things. The Patent Medicine Prices Review Board is supposed to do three things. First, it is supposed to monitor the increase in the price of drugs that Canadians pay year over year, because the commitment given by the industry in 1987 was that it would stay below the rate of inflation.

Second, it was to do was to monitor the entry level price of drugs to ensure that consumers were not gouged by the large companies, generic or otherwise, that were to be introducing products into the marketplace at a higher entry level price than was justifiable.

Third, it was supposed to do was monitor the rate of research and development investment that had been promised by the industry.

The government and the PMPRB have come out and said that they have done their job. There is only a 3.2 per cent or 3.3 per cent actual increase in the price of pharmaceuticals in Canada, but some other compelling reports have said that the PMPRB simply has not done its job and that either it is comparing apples to bananas, there is something vastly wrong with its methodology or it just cannot do the job of protecting Canadian consumers.

The following Canadian insurance plans have reported substantial increases in the price of drugs since the passage of Bill C–22. The Ontario government pharmacare plan reports that in reality consumers are paying 13.2 per cent more for drugs in Canada, not the 3.4 per cent that the PMPRB likes to quote and that the minister opposite quoted.

Since 1988 the Green Shield health insurance company, one of the largest insurance payers in Canada for pharmaceuticals, has kept a computer record of every prescription it has paid through its insurance program. It has been well over $1 billion in claims. It says there is something wrong because the real cost is going up at 11.4 per cent per year.

The Manitoba Health Insurance Plan reports a 12.3 per cent increase per year. The fourth annual report of the government's own board, the PMPRB, says that even though price increases on existing drugs have been below inflation, which I contend is not the case, costs to consumers, third party insurers and provincial drug plans have increased at a faster rate chiefly because of the substitution of new drugs for those previously prescribed.

If the Canadian public thought it was going to get moderated increases in the price of drugs as a result of Bill C–22, we have been conned. I do not know how many times this government can say that everybody else is wrong and its board is right.

Government members should talk to the provincial health ministers. They will tell them that the actual cost of provincial pharmacare programs has gone through the roof. The New Democratic government in Ontario that claims to be first and foremost the government that wants to look after people just de-listed a number of pharmaceuticals. If people on fixed incomes or seniors get sick, they are not going to be allowed to get those drugs. This is an erosion of the universality of health care. Health care means having available to them regimes, pharmaceuticals and drugs to make them well again. That is what it means. The people on low incomes are being denied that by provincial pharmacare programs because the government's PMPRB has turned out to be a toothless tiger. It has not worked. It is clear that it has not worked.

Here we go today. We have a drug industry in Canada that was supposed to be operating under a regime. That regime of compulsory licensing was given seven years of extended patent protection under Bill C-22. The government is going to change it now. It might have done a cabinet review. They should have come to Parliament and told us if there was something wrong with the enforcement mechanisms or if their goals were no longer attainable.

All Canadians were supposed to be operating under that regime until 1995, but government members had a surprise up their sleeve. Guess what happened? They were back at the negotiating table for the North American free trade deal with their buddies in Washington and Kennebunkport. They were out fishing and the only fish that was hooked was the Canadian consumer, and it was by the American president in Kennebunkport.

All of a sudden the government decided to change the rules of the game without any substantive evidence that Bill C-22 had been effective in controlling prices or increasing the level of real research and development to what it should be in Canada. It came in with a new bill and what a bill it is.

The minister of health did not want this bill up this week. The reason it is up today is that the minister was embarrassed. He did not want it debated on Tuesday and Wednesday because he was meeting with provincial heath care ministers, the very provincial health care ministers mentioned in section B of The Gazette today: "Provincial health ministers join to fight drug costs". He is meeting with provincial health care ministers. The reason this bill was not up on Monday and Tuesday of this week was that it would have been an embarrassment to the national minister of health because he could not have explained away the rising drug costs to provincial governments. They put it off until the end of the session: hopefully that there would be a couple of speakers and everybody would forget what they were trying to do.

The negotiations started again with NAFTA. The government made a decision. In speaking to a group of pharmaceutical manufacturers' employees in early December the minister of health indicated clearly that they were going to harmonize with the United States and that they were going to kill that awful little beast called compulsory licensing, that beast that was saving Canadian consumers perhaps a quarter billion dollars a year in drug costs. If they did not do it then all of a sudden the multinational companies that had kept the 1987 commitment in terms of R and D would leave Canada. They were going to run off again. Where were they going? Would it be to Mexico? I do not know what they were going to do. That is what they said. They said they were going to effectively eliminate compulsory licensing altogether in Canada. They said they were going to increase effective patent protection.

An hon. member: What did GATT say?

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): That is an interesting point. My colleague over there from the consumer and corporate affairs committee says: "What did GATT say?" This is a point of contention.

The GATT negotiations have not been concluded yet. They are still hung up. There is no GATT agreement. There is a draft report which has not been accepted called the Dunkel document. That is what it is. If they are starting to put Canadian policy forward based on some foreign document with some fuzzy dates that they pulled out of their navel, the guys opposite will deserve to get kicked out sooner than later. They are supposed to be governing in the best interest of Canadians, not for their friends on the multinational cocktail circuit, which is exactly what they have done here.

What has happened here? They said that they were going to do away with compulsory licensing in Canada.

• (1120)

Not only are we going to do away with compulsory licensing in Canada, but guess what, folks? We are going to do away with it retroactively. We are going to change the rules of the game retroactively.

For generic companies that would make applications for generic licences, products currently in patent, we are going to turn the clock back. The government did not bring the legislation forward until June but made it retroactive to last December 22. The Minister for International Trade got up and said: "That is the date on the Dunkel document".

What in the name of God is the Dunkel document? It is not a document of this Parliament. It is a piece of paper that will be changed 50 times before it gets signed, if it ever gets signed. Let us not fall for that ploy.

This is what it has effectively done. This is the crux of the issue here today. Not only is it going to do away with compulsory licensing but it effectively is going to give those patent drug companies in Canada three additional years of patent protection, that is three additional years for drugs that are currently in the marketplace.

I want consumers to understand what this means. It means under the old legislation that when a company entered a product into the marketplace, drug B, they entered it knowing that quite likely if it was a leading edge drug, at the end of seven years in the marketplace there would be a compulsory licence issue. The facts are the facts, independent, both sides of the industry, wherever you look: Whenever a generic licence is issued on average, the cost to consumers for the drug drops by about 25 per cent.

We have all these drugs currently in the marketplace. They went into the marketplace expecting that after seven years they could be faced with generic competition, which would mean probably that the price would go down by 25 per cent in the last three years.

The government says: "No, no, no, no, no. For all the drugs currently in the marketplace you are not allowed to get a generic licence, and we are going to give a windfall window of profitability of three additional years to those companies". This amounts to a minimum of about $600 million in possible additional profits to foreign based multinational drug companies in Canada.

Each and every consumer in Canada who will be purchasing those drugs during the last three years when they should have been subjected to competition are going to pay through their pockets. Each and every provincial Pharmacare program is going to pay from taxpayers' pockets as well.

Increasingly, over and over again, provincial Pharmacare programs are going to have to do what Ontario did and start delisting the most expensive products.

An hon. member: It is going into someone's pocket.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): There is a lot of money in somebody's pocket and it certainly is not going to be in the pockets of Canadian consumers.

We have said that this bill is the billion dollar bonus bill for those companies, and we think it is wrong. The Liberal Party consistently has fought retroactive legislation because it is wrong. It is close to contempt of the parliamentary process.

This piece of legislation is wrong. It seeks to change the rules of the game in the middle of the script. This bill is wrong because it does not provide adequate protection to Canadian consumers, if indeed it does go through. These companies effectively have killed generic compulsory licensing in Canada.

The minister came forward today and said: "We are going to give this new and improved PMPRB", the same PMPRB that he has got up time after time in the House to defend its figures. During the press conference, he and the Minister for International Trade on June 23, when they introduced this piece of terrible legislation, admitted by their comments that the PMPRB maybe had not done its job, so they are going to have to strengthen it.

How are they going to strengthen it? They put the powers of roll back. They stripped it of its ability to issue a generic licence to keep prices down, but they were going to have the powers of roll back. I have here and I would like to table it at the end of my speech a legal opinion that was prepared for the CDMA, one of the sides in the industry, so you can take it for what it is worth.

The individual who it was prepared by is a respected lawyer in this company, James MacPherson, Dean of Osgoode Hall Law School in Toronto. He clearly puts out arguments on both sides as to a constitutional challenge against section 81 of this new bill, which is the section that would allow the PMPRB instead of issuing a compulsory licence to make sure there was no price gouging and could roll back. It is highly questionable in this report as to whether or not a court of law would deem that clause to be unconstitutional. If it did deem it to be unconstitutional, guess what would happen? We would have an industry in Canada which effectively could not be controlled on price increases by generic competition and the very new mechanisms, the guts of the new bill to protect Canadian consumers, could be ruled unconstitutional.

What you would have is an unregulated longer monopoly period for drugs in Canada. Who is going to benefit from that? I do not think the Canadian consumer is going to benefit and the minister's people should have known this.

There have been other cases before the courts about whose jurisdiction this properly falls into. This did not fall out of the sky. People should read it and I want this tabled in Parliament today because it is an important document. If the minister is not aware of it he should very quickly make himself aware of it. He may make a decision that he is not going to proceed with the bill at this point in time.

In addition, the Liberal Party is concerned that we have a minister of health that just yesterday, before we even started debate on this bill, agreed with provincial governments at this conference in St. John's, Newfoundland, saying that they were so concerned about the possibility of this new bill raising prices for consumers in Canada that the provincial health ministers have formed a task force to suggest amendments to a bill that had not even been introduced at second reading for approval in principle in the Parliament of Canada.

For goodness' sake we have respected lawyers coming out and questioning the wisdom. We have provincial health ministers that have already established a task force before the bill was ever debated in the House of Commons. If there was ever a piece of legislation introduced that should be withdrawn and looked at again in greater consultation this is it, but the government will go ahead.

The other thing I have mentioned is that it could be $400 million or $600 million in windfall profits for these companies. The companies have come back and said if the bill passes—and I want to be fair to them—we will invest $400 million in new investment in Canada. I do not know how we make policy in this country. I thought we made policy for the greater good of Canadians.

I do not like the approach of any industry in this country that comes and says you pass this legislation for me and I will do this. If you do not, I will not. I do not like that type of pressure being put on me as a parliamentarian because I do not think it is right.

Further, there is absolutely nothing in this bill that would compel the PMAC drug companies that do great work in this country to increase their level of research and development. If this bill does go through, and the government has the majority, we will be proposing amendments to the bill to ensure that if there are extended periods of patent protection that a higher percentage of R and D dollars to revenue is spent in Canada.

We want a more rigorous definition of what R and D is and we want some of that money put over to private sector bodies representing the universities and health care teaching institutions so that money can be invested in those facilities and so there is a net benefit to the educational system in Canada. That is what we want.

It is clear as well that this government is probably trying to kill any aspect of compulsory licensing in this country because south of the border there have been some congressmen who have said: "Gee, what are they doing in Canada? " There was a Senate committee on aging that just reported the other day. The Senate committee on aging said this the other day. They looked at the average cost of drugs in this extended monopolistic system in the United States to consumers and in some cases found the same drug in the United States where there is no generic competition before the expiration of patent.

Do you know what they found? They found that some drugs in the United States, some of the most current drugs, are up to 64 per cent higher than what they are in Canada. In the United States they are now looking at the system of compulsory licensing as a way to moderate prices for American consumers. Once again before this government goes to the polls and gets its you know what wiped by the Canadian electorate, it wants to push through this bill to please people not in Canada, but in the United States.

The Liberal Party will oppose the bill in its present form and the Liberal Party will oppose the complete elimination of compulsory licensing. The Liberal Party will oppose any piece of legislation that effectively increases the level of patent protection in Canada without dictating and mandating that there be a greater percentage of research and development dollars in this country.

In conclusion, I want to say this debate has not been an easy one. I want to put this on the record if you will just bear with me for a second.

• (1130)

In the last 72 hours I have received more calls from lobbyists and former lobbyists in this industry who have indicated things like if we would moderate our opposition to this bill for Canadian consumers, maybe we can get some investment in Atlantic Canada.

I find that approach absolutely abhorrent. If anyone out there watching thinks that is the way the Liberal Party dictates and makes its policy, they are sadly mistaken.

In conclusion, this bill is not a good bill for Canadian consumers. It is a bill that cannot be allowed to pass as it is. The Liberal Party will continue to be vigorous in its opposition in debate in this House to protect Canadian consumers and the viability of both sides of the drug industry in Canada.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to be able to rise and speak on this bill. It is a very significant piece of legislation and most Canadians already are aware that it is detrimental.

Unfortunately I have limited time so I cannot deal with all of the points within this bill. I want to talk about three or four significant things such as why the government is proceeding at this time, the whole question of cost, and job creation.

It is very peculiar that the government would proceed with the bill at this point. Let us take a look at how this bill was introduced. It was introduced in the dying days of Parliament in June. It was set over and is now being introduced this week when the country's focus is on the Constitution. The government was originally going to bring it in and force it through closure. It backed off because of the uproar that has already started in the country, particularly among provincial governments.

The government is pushing it forward for a number of reasons. It wants to see if it can get the jump on those opposed to this. All we have to do is pick up any paper or talk to any consumer group in this country and we will find opposition. Seniors are frightened because they know their drug costs are going up.

I will read what the Canadian Health Coalition states: "It will mean increased drug prices for consumers and even greater stress on the health care system. If hospitals and other institutions have to pay more for drugs, they will have fewer dollars for other services. The squeeze on the system will become even greater".

Other people like Walter MacKinnon, president of the Cape Breton Health Coalition, states: "The bill is a gross betrayal of the government's primary role of looking after the best interests of Canadian people".

It is not yesterday, contrary to what the previous speaker said, that the provinces' health ministers formed a task force looking at the whole question of drug pricing. They did it in their meeting in March. They had people working on this program for a number of months with a view to reporting back to the health ministers in December.

One of the reasons that this bill is being pushed forward right now is that this government wants to rush it through before the provincial deputy ministers of health could bring back their report on a national drug services formula.

Yesterday in the federal health minister's meeting with the provincial ministers, the issue came up. The provincial ministers made it very clear that they are unhappy with this bill. Lo and behold, guess who agrees with them? The person who agrees with them is the hon. minister of health for the federal government. He said yesterday: "Their concerns have a good chance of being addressed. We hope that it will be possible that it can be put in the bill". Already the minister is admitting that this bill does not address the concerns of the provincial ministers of health.

It would be much more of a proper procedure for the government, when it knows that these concerns are not being addressed, to simply withdraw the bill and then reintroduce the bill once those concerns have been addressed.

We have had private drug plans expressing concerns about this bill. We have had labour unions expressing concerns about this bill. We have had a major legal opinion that says the guts of this bill, the very reason this government is saying that it is bringing this bill forward, which is to give the prices review board some power to do something, some powers to roll back prices, is probably unconstitutional.

Instead of doing the honourable thing and holding back this bill and referring that matter to the Supreme Court, the government has decided to push ahead. I am left wondering why. The only conclusion one can come to again is that there is a parallel between this bill and Bill C-22.

Bill C-22 was brought in prior to the introduction of the United States free trade agreement. It was a precursor that the government had made a promise to the American government that it would deal with this matter of licensing so that it would not have to be specifically dealt with in the free trade agreement.

Now we are in the middle of NAFTA negotiations, a North American free trade agreement with the United States and Mexico, and here we have the government again putting through legislation to harmonize its legislation with what the United States wants. Again, it is simply because the government has made a commitment to George Bush as part of the North American free trade deal to get this matter taken up.

The minister said this bill was a balance. If he and the Conservatives think the balance is to increase cost to the consumer, loss of jobs in the industry, threatening the 2,500 jobs in the generic drug industry on the one side and on the other side increased profits for the multinational corporations, they are right on.

What I think the Canadian public has to do is go back and look at what this government promised in terms of the drug industry when it introduced Bill C-22, which extended the patent protection for the multinational drug corporations. It made a number of promises and again it is repeating these promises.

One of the things it promised was that there would be no increase in the price of drugs. It would make sure that there would be a moderation.

First of all, let us take a look at what the Prices Review Board said. It said that 40 per cent of all new drugs coming on to the market exceeded the guidelines. All the multinational companies did was bring the prices on excessively high and then increase them 3 or 4 per cent. Is that really great for the consumers? We would have been better to let them bring them on at a low price and then increase them at 8 per cent. There has been no containment of the prices.

Green Shield has documented clearly that the increase in drug prices is not the 3 and 4 per cent that the government talks about but rather 11.4 per cent.

• (1140)

Under competition, which the government normally espouses, with the introduction of generic drugs there has been a containment of costs. There is documentation showing that when there is competition for one generic drug against the patent drug, the price is reduced by 20 per cent. If there are five competitors in the generic area, the price is reduced by an average of 45 per cent. If there are 10 versions the price is reduced by 72.5 per cent.

The government, on behalf of the multinational corporations, wants to ensure that there is an extension of the patent protection so that this type of competition is not forcing the multinational drug companies to bring their prices under control.

One of the things the government talks about is making sure that the drug industry is profitable. I guess that is true. No corporation is going to stay in business very long if there is no profit. However, if you take a look at the profits of the multinational drug corporations, even in a time of downturn in the economy, they have made excessive profits.

In 1990 an inquiry into the pharmaceutical industry in Ontario found that profits after tax on equity of the pharmaceutical companies were almost 25 per cent, compared with the best in the manufacturing area of about 11 per cent. What we have here is a pharmaceutical industry that is making dramatic profits compared to any other type of investment in this country. This government is saying that it needs more protection so it can drive its profits up even farther.

Returning to the Green Shield study on this question of the introduction of drugs on to the market, which the prices review board has documented, 40 per cent of the cases in 1990 and 1991 are in excess of the prices review board guidelines. Green Shield was able to document that since 1988 costs of new drugs coming on to the market have doubled since the introduction of the patent legislation.

What you really had was the government saying it would set up a review board but that it really had no method of controlling or monitoring the entry price. The companies have simply entered their price in a high manner and then have carried on. It has doubled since the legislation was introduced and will continue to double.

Before the introduction of compulsory licensing, Canada had the highest cost of drugs in the world. What we have here is a potential that this bill will go through, patent protection will be extended for another 10 years, the court will strike down totally section 81, saying that it is not constitutional for the prices review board to have the power to roll back prices, and what we will get is an unregulated, extended monopoly which continues to gouge Canadians, to gouge health care and to gouge old age pensioners.

When we were studying health care costs in Canada, it was documented that the fastest growing proportion of health care costs in Canada was in the drug area; not acute care hospitals, not physician services, not community services, but drugs.

We had another study looking at hepatitis B and the bringing in of a vaccine. We had a spokesperson for the drug industry appear. We asked him to explain why the vaccine for hepatitis B in Canada costs $30 a dose and you have to have three doses. It is mostly bought in bulk for $90. In New Zealand, because of a government program and because New Zealand will not accept the price the multinationals are manipulating, it is $7 a dose. We asked why there was the discrepancy, and how its drug prices were brought onto the market in Canada. He said: "It is basically what the traffic will bear, what we can get away with". This is a spokesman for the drug industry. He said: "That is how we price the drugs. We can't get away with $30 in New Zealand, but we can in Canada".

I want to turn my attention to one of the other hollow promises made in Bill C-22, and that is the creation of jobs. The government said repeatedly that there would be 3,000 research jobs, not maintenance jobs or cleaning jobs but research jobs. I want to quote a couple of statements by the then Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The then minister said: "Increased research spending will generate a minimum of 3,000 high quality jobs for Canadian scientists and biochemists". That was said in December 1986. The same minister made a similar statement in November 1986, as reported in Hansard: "I know that 3,000 young scientists are anxious to have a research opportunity in Canada".

What do we have? What is the record of jobs under this bill? One of the reasons I am sure they are trying to rush this through is that they hoped their own report would not become a public document. However, unfortunately, like many things that the government is finding out, most things eventually surface to public light.

The report says that there are few benefits from the 1987 drug patent changes. Dealing specifically with the area of jobs, there were supposed to be 3,000 new research jobs but the report points out that there were only 1,386 jobs created and over half of those jobs were in marketing and sales. All a doctor needs is another drug salesman to come around knocking on his door with another drug sample. That is where the jobs were, in marketing, in making more television ads to convince the Canadian public of what good corporate citizens they are. That is where the jobs were created. Only one-third of those jobs were in research and development. That means that about 450 jobs were created in research and development, not 3,000 as this government talked about.

At the same time, what has happened to jobs in other parts of the drug industry? There has been a dramatic loss of jobs in drug manufacturing. Basically what has happened was that the pharmaceutical companies got the patent protection. Canada is such a small market they did their manufacturing offshore. We have become a warehouse and we then distribute the drugs.

An hon. member: That's not true.

Mr. Karpoff: The minister says it is not true but I have a list here giving specific job losses over the last two years by the multinational pharmaceutical companies. It gives them specifically: Allergan, 62 jobs in Montreal; Alcon Canada, 48 jobs; Bristol-Myers, 124 jobs lost. It goes on.

These are not the mythical jobs that the government talks about—3,000 jobs.

An hon. member: Not true.

Mr. Karpoff: The member says "not true". Not true? There is documentation listing the specific firms and the specific losses of jobs. The total is over 700, and that does not count some of the ones in which there were losses of jobs but they could not put a figure to it. For example, when American Home Products was acquired by A. H. Robins there was a loss of jobs. They were not able to document how many so they did not count them. Even without counting there was a loss of jobs.

Their own documents cannot document 3,000 jobs. Show us the 3,000 jobs in research and development. Show us where they are specifically. They cannot because they are not there. What we have is a bill that is going to protect the drug industry and is not going to create jobs.

I just want to turn my attention to one other thing, and that is the duplicity of the Liberal Party that stands up in this House and says that it is opposing this bill. Yet the Liberal critic for science and technology has clearly said that he and other Liberals support this bill.

Who is the chief spokesperson for the multinational drug companies? It is none other than Judy Erola, a former Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs for the Liberal government. She was the shepherd who was supposed to be watching the sheep, she was the shepherd on behalf of consumers. The shepherd has not only become the chief spokesperson for the wolves but she has become the chief architect of the attack plan of the wolves. That is the duplicity of the Liberals with regard to this bill.

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member and it concerns the Green Shield plan and the prices review board. Is he not comparing apples and oranges? Does not the Green Shield plan cover all consumer drugs, both patented and non-patented? In fact, the Green Shield covers things like billing fees from pharmacists and so on. Does he not think it is unfair for him to compare apples and oranges by comparing the Green Shield plan? In fact, the Green Shield plan could deal with the increase in the price of medicinal brandy prescribed by a doctor because that is an item that goes through the pharmacy, while the prices review board refers only to patented medicine.

As a further question, I want to ask him what the Liberal candidates' chances might be in Montreal, given their stand and the split in their party. The Liberal science critic, who realizes the importance of intellectual property, not only in patented medicines but in other areas, has written a letter to each member of the Liberal caucus saying: "Opposition would be a serious mistake". I further quote: "In order to maintain existing jobs and obtain additional investment in today's global market we need to provide patent protection comparable to that which exists in other industrialized countries". This was reported in The Toronto Star this morning. That was a letter written by the member for Saint-Henri—Westmount. What does he think the chances of nominated Liberal candidates are in that area?

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, the member has asked two very interesting questions. I cannot really speculate on the last one. However, I know the chances for nominated Liberal candidates in my province of British Columbia, particularly in ridings in which there are a large number of seniors, goes down dramatically when they begin to realize that the Liberals are playing their traditional game of speaking out of both sides of their mouths.

In order to protect their seats in Montreal they are allowing their critic to issue statements so they can have something to show them in Montreal, but they will speak out of the other side of their mouths in B.C.

I do not know about their chances in Montreal, but I know that their chances in the rest of Canada certainly are not going to be enhanced by this kind of discussion.

I also think that the Liberals should speak to their former consumer affairs minister, the person who is really the architect of the publicity campaign behind the multinational corporations.

Going on to your first question, which is also very important, it is not just the Green Shield study but other studies. Various provincial pharmaceutical plans have documented the price coming on. Green Shield has documented prescription drugs coming on. It has documented the new drugs that came on at double the price and then increased.

As for this whole business of the prices review board, there is another thing that is happening around it that the public should be aware of. The multinational drug companies have found another loophole in this prices review board. Genentech was the first one to do it. It is a major heart pill that is quite difficult to manufacture. The volume in Canada is so small, in terms of a world-wide program, that it is probably really not economical for a generic drug company to start manufacturing it in Canada for a Canadian market.

It had its application in for patents. The prices review board started looking at its price and, my gosh, discovered that the price for the product was so excessive that it was going to say it was above the guidelines. The minister of health for the province of Ontario intervened. What did it do? It said: "That's fine. We will simply withdraw it from the patent review process. We'll say it is a public product. Then you cannot have any control over the price".

This bill is a long way from being passed. This bill is going to be fought by the New Democratic Party right to the end.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the hon. member for Surrey North that I know that, and I can appreciate it, this is his first tenure as a member of Parliament representing that great constituency.

My colleague, the hon. member for Dartmouth, and my colleague from Saint-Henri—Westmount had an opportunity just last week to be in British Columbia and visit that particular area of the province. The hon. member should take very serious note of the polls which reflect the high support that the Liberal Party of Canada has in that particular province, as well as in that riding.

Before the hon. member stands in his place and uses such terms as duplicity he might want to examine the full meaning of the word hypocrisy, which he has practised in this House of Commons since he has come to it.

On each and every occasion that he has had an opportunity to speak he has tacked onto the end of his speech different challenges to different political parties, knowing full well that very little time remains in order to debate that particular assertion.

Perhaps the hon. member, in his great eloquence, would stand in his place and give a clear and unequivocal undertaking to all members of this House that his friends, Ontario Premier Bob Rae, Premier Roy Romanow and British Columbia Premier Michael Harcourt will come to Ottawa and make substantive presentations before the legislative committee that is studying this particular bill.

Furthermore, the hon. member should know that the policy as enunciated by the hon. member for Dartmouth is the consistent policy that we have taken since we introduced legislation over 20 years ago with regard to this particular subject matter. If there is any hypocrisy or duplicity it is in the mind of the hon. member opposite.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The opposition House leader has been around this place a long time. He knows that it is unparliamentary and out of order to accuse individuals of hypocrisy. It is one thing to accuse political parties of hypocrisy or duplicity or a variety of other things, but it is quite unparliamentary and out of order to accuse individuals of hypocrisy. That is stated clearly within the rules of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to ask the hon. opposition House leader to withdraw the personal accusation of hypocrisy that he made to the hon. member for Surrey North.

• (1200)

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I will check with Hansard, but I thought that the hon. member was talking not about someone in particular but in general.

Therefore I hesitate to grant the request made by the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona until I have checked the transcript of what was said in this House.

I recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona.

[English]

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to check the "blues" and tapes because I think you will find, at least on two occasions, the opposition House leader referred to the hypocrisy of the member for Surrey North. He used the expression "the hypocrisy in the member's own mind", I believe.

If you check the tapes and find this to be true, I would ask you at some subsequent point to ask the opposition House leader to respect the rules of the House and withdraw those personal allegations.

Mr. Karpoff: It is interesting that the hon. House leader talked about my riding of Surrey North. As everybody knows it is one of the fastest growing ridings in Canada. I have spent the last four years working very hard to represent all aspects of that community. I am sure the House is quite interested that the Liberals have had a nominated candidate for the last two years running against me. She is a woman with quite impeccable credentials, who is very well known in the community and has lived there for 25 years. Of course the Liberals support gender equality, so what did they do? They just dumped her. They unceremoniously organized a meeting in which people from outside my riding of Surrey North came into the riding and dumped her, pushed her aside. That is what is happening with the Liberals in my riding.

If the hon. House leader for the Liberals wants to stand up and debate what is going on in Surrey North, I think he should have some more information. The previous candidate for the Liberals and many, many Liberals in the riding who have worked very hard for the Liberal Party for the last 20 years have come to me in the last two months and said they will be supporting and working for me. They cannot understand why the Leader of the Official Opposition engineered the dumping of a community person in my riding of Surrey North. Why would they allow the long arm of the bureaucracy of the Liberal Party in Canada to reach from Ottawa down to Surrey and dump a community leader?

[Translation]

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege because, of course, many people have just referred to comments that I might have made and that are reported in the media today. I raise a question of privilege in order to briefly set the record straight, as I see it. If you allow me, I will be very brief.

[English]

I would like to respond to what the member for Surrey North said. It is incorrect to suggest I support this bill without reservation. I believe amendments are called for in a number of areas.

I also believe it is wrong on his part and certainly unhelpful to try to win points in this debate by scaring senior citizens. Clearly, added sales revenue can only come from consumers or taxpayers. I would point out to the member many senior citizens are covered by provincial health care plans. I believe we have to strike a balance between the needs for investment and the needs of consumers. That is the approach I am taking.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, with respect, that was not a question of personal privilege or anything like it. If the member wants to enter into debate on the merits of the bill or on what has been alleged he said about the bill, that is one thing. He should not be allowed by the Chair to get up on a spurious question of privilege like that and be heard.

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, we always smile when we see our opposition colleagues argue among themselves. Apart from that, it would be very interesting and I would really appreciate it if the hon. member for Saint-Henri—Westmount later in this debate could tell us exactly what he thinks of this bill in order to clear it up for all Canadians. It would be interesting. I hope that he will take advantage of the opportunity given him in this debate to speak out on it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I hope that that puts an end to these exchanges. Hon. members will understand that until he knows whether it really is a question of privilege, the Chair must let the member concerned express himself. Messages on this have been exchanged on both sides and I consider the incident closed.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: I do not know if there has been a communication breakdown or not. I thought I had explained and had consent from all three parties in the House and members who were present here when the parliamentary secretary rose to read the motion with regard to an adjournment motion, that after each speaker from the recognized parties had intervened in the debate this morning, we would proceed with the debate of the adjournment motion.

There seems to be some confusion with regard to members on the opposite side. I know my colleague may wish to say a few words on Bill C-91. If that is the case, perhaps we could hear him while they are waiting for the parliamentary secretary. Perhaps you can explain, Mr. Speaker, why we are not proceeding with the adjournment motion.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for being out of the Chamber when this matter arose.

The opposition House leader and I had an exchange earlier this morning. I hope we do not have to resort to the "blues" to find out, although we may need to.

My understanding of that exchange, based on my response to the question raised by the opposition House leader was there would be one speaker each at the outset on the adjournment motion. I understand second hand the opposition House leader understood we agreed there would be one speaker each on Bill C-91. That was not my understanding. That is the source of the difficulty before us.

I have not had an opportunity to make consultations on this side to see what our best course of action is, but I can assure my friend opposite there is no intention to mislead or be difficult about the arrangement. If he misunderstood me I did not intend to mislead him. The understanding I thought we had among the parties was there would be one speaker each at the outset of the debate on the adjournment motion when we got to it after Question Period this afternoon.

Mr. Dingwall: I know my friend across the way knows I know he would not mislead me intentionally, but just for the record, the parliamentary secretary is correct.

He did state in the motion, for the purposes of the adjournment and the amendment, which would be forthcoming from the official opposition, we would be one speaker per party. That is written in the motion as tabled and as spoken by the parliamentary secretary.

I thereafter interrupted the proceedings and indicated to the parliamentary secretary opposite, for the purposes of Bill C-91, there would be one speaker per party and then we would proceed with the adjournment motion.

I believe my colleagues in the New Democratic Party gave consent to that, as well as the government.

• (1210)

It was on that basis I gave consent from the Official Opposition to the motion which was so eloquently read by the parliamentary secretary.

I do not wish to make this any more difficult than it is. If the parliamentary secretary wishes, we could perhaps hear the hon. gentlemen behind him for a few moments. We might go behind the curtain and try to resolve this difficulty.

I was clearly of the understanding we would begin debate on Bill C-91 with representatives of the official parties speaking and then move immediately to the adjournment motion.

I would like to hear from my colleague from the NDP.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, if it is any help, we in the New Democratic caucus were under the same impression as our Liberal colleagues that there was an understanding there would be one speaker from each party on Bill C-91 and we would then proceed to the debate on the adjournment motion.

As the opposition House leader has suggested, I am open to hearing the member, who just left the Chamber for a few minutes, in order to have discussions, if that would be helpful, to check the "blues" or whatever. Certainly that was the understanding we had here as well.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I think we have the solution at hand.

It is not a major issue with us whether we proceed with the adjournment debate now or later. We may be prepared to move a motion as soon as we have the appropriate individual in the Chamber. Then we can commence the debate.

I think those of us Canadians who have observed the constitutional discussions have seen that when human beings communicate there is an opportunity for misunderstanding. I think we are now prepared to proceed.

Mr. Blais: I move:

That the motion be amended by adding after the word "Chair" in both paragraphs, the following:

but no later than November 16, 1992.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but we are not yet on this motion. We were still on Bill C-91, the Patent Act, when there was an exchange between the parties on how we should proceed for the rest of the morning.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. These kinds of accidents do occur.

Pursuant to our understanding on the floor of the House of Commons earlier this day, we have now adjourned the debate with regard to Bill C-91 and we will proceed to Motion No. 12. Perhaps the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs might wish to stand in his place and read Motion No. 12.

Thereafter a debate could follow and members could intervene to make their views known with regard to the subject matter at hand.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Do I understand the wishes of the House correctly? Is there unanimous consent to adjourn the debate on Bill C-91?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION TO ADJOURN

Hon. Pierre Blais (for the Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) moved:

> That, upon the adoption of this Order, this House shall adjourn to the call of the Chair; and
> That, at any time during such adjournment of the House, the Speaker may, after consultation with the Government, cause the House to sit for the sole purpose of giving Royal Assent to a bill or bills, and following each Royal Assent, the Speaker shall, each time, further adjourn the House forthwith to the call of the Chair.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, finally we have come to Motion No. 12, which has been placed on the Order Paper by the government House leader and fortunately or unfortunately we have been able to get to this motion today.

I have to say that in proposing this motion to adjourn the House without a date of return by the Government of Canada, it is making history. It is the first government since Confederation to admit on the floor of the House of Commons that it is politically and morally bankrupt. It is clear that the Latin phrase sine die, without a date for return, is unacceptable to those of us in the Official Opposition, as I am sure it is unacceptable to Canadians across this country.

I want members to know that I have offered, both privately and publicly, that during the duration of the debate with regard to the referendum that some accommodations could be made to keep the House of Commons and the proceedings before the House opened in order that individuals have an opportunity to express their views and for the government to take positive action to provide economic, social and other forms of assistance to Canadians.

The chief government Whip and I participated on a nationalized television program on which I offered at that time, as well as in private, that perhaps we could sit three days a week and perhaps we could undertake that there would be no surprises with regard to motions of confidence. We also agreed that we would be able to pair with members of the government opposite so long as the House would sit. The opportunity for the government to account for its policies and an opportunity for us in the opposition to provide alternatives to that policy could then take place.

That has fallen, I say quite sadly, on deaf ears.

I agree that it is essential that hon. members be given time away from parliamentary duties in order to attend the unity referendum campaign. I am not convinced that it is necessary for the House to adjourn this early in the campaign. If members of other parties tell me that their communications with their constituents have deteriorated so badly that they need so much time to re-establish them for the sake of national unity, I am willing to set aside my contrary inclination.

What I cannot understand is that the government has allowed itself to decline to a level at which it admits that it is overwhelmed by the difficulties into which it has led Canadians and that it cannot find it within itself to recommend any solutions.

As an example, we have in Canada today a major economic crisis which has gripped the country. We have 1.6 million Canadians out of work, we have an equal number plus who are on welfare rolls, we have students who have not had meaningful work this summer, denying them an opportunity to return to post-secondary education. We have single women who cannot afford child care and are therefore unable to enter the work force. We have fishermen without fish, we have farmers without the proper compensation for their hard labours and we have an unbelievably high incidence of urban crime in our country.

The Government of Canada has sat idly by and perhaps the best demonstrable example of sitting by and doing nothing has been the proposed airline merger between Air Canada and Canadian Pacific. We and other members of opposition parties have questioned the government continuously as to what its policy is or is likely to be. So far we have heard from the minister responsible for transport who has taken a laissez-faire attitude toward the situation.

We find in the west, particularly in British Columbia and Alberta, in the Atlantic, in my province as well as in New Brunswick, Newfoundland, P.E.I., many parts of Ontario and certainly many parts of Quebec that if this airline merger takes place the result will be the dislocation of thousands and thousands of jobs directly as well as thousands of jobs associated with the airline industry.

I think of the travel industry and rural communities in various airports. I will give one example, rather personal and somewhat subjective in my own constituency of Cape Breton—East Richmond. At the airport, what will happen to the employees of Air Atlantic and Air Nova?

Obviously there will be a substantive reduction. When you lose 50 per cent in an area which has unprecedented high unemployment, as in parts of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, British Columbia, Ontario and Quebec, the blow is triply devastating.

I find it inexcusable that the Minister of Transport would waltz into this Chamber, provide no course of action, no leadership, other than to say it is a private matter and his hands are tied, he cannot do anything. The House will now adjourn and we will not have an opportunity to make that minister accountable to the thousands of employees, the numerous communities and industries associated with the airline. We will not have an opportunity to force this minister into being accountable and to show some leadership with regard to that dossier.

Mr. Speaker, you come from an area of the great province of Quebec and you have a history in your province, a great history, but you have had a history of individuals who have served in federal cabinets as ministers of transport who have taken significant leadership when it comes to transportation in this country.

What has the present minister done with regard to the airline issue and the proposed merger? He has gone to sleep. Every analyst in this country, every worker in the airline industry knows the two major airlines were going at it like two bulls in an arena. He sat idly by. He did not call them in and say there is a public interest here and we must attempt to try to resolve this in the best interest of Canadians, the best interests of the employees, the corporations and the shareholders involved and have a meeting of minds.

That is what Jean Marchand would do if he were here today in that capacity. However, this minister has done nothing. It is not his responsibility, obviously. He is saying to this Parliament and thereby to all Canadians that he, as the Minister of Transport, has no obligation to act in the public interest.

In the city of Toronto, in the city of Montreal and elsewhere across this country we are going to find that there will be countless numbers of individuals without work who have been involved in the airline. This minister and this government will not be in the House to account for the government's inaction with regard to the proposed merger. I find that to be totally unacceptable and a demonstrable act by the government opposite of its laissez-faire attitude as it relates to the Canadian economy.

I take little satisfaction in the fact that in shutting down Parliament the government is reducing the amount of time available to deal further with the largely destructive list of legislation that is presently on the Order Paper. The state of the nation is such that that Parliament's being in session would constitute pressure on the government to address these problems.

If the House were sitting for its regularly scheduled autumn sittings there would be 50 daily Question Periods in which the opposition could push and probe the government hopefully into positive action. There would be, in addition, five opposition days during which we could suggest suitable courses of action. That opportunity will not be with us. For every day that the House does not sit, there is one less Question Period for calling the government to account. For every five days the House does not sit under our rules, there will be one less opposition day. If the House does not sit until after the middle of November the rules delete all of the autumn opposition days.

When the government forced the present rule changes on the House in the spring of 1991, I and my colleagues from Ottawa—Vanier and Saint-Leonard warned the Canadian people and this government that the government would find it difficult to fit its legislative timetable into the reduced number of sittings in each year. We could not foresee how remorseless its use of its streamlined closure rules would be.

The example of the demonstrable act that will live for many, many years against members opposite was just last evening when the Conservative Party, not just the Prime Minister of the day and the Minister of National Health and Welfare, killed forever universal family allowances in this country. I know the news media has given it a bit of attention. There are some out there who will say they will benefit to a certain extent. The question will be in January and February when thousands and thousands of mothers across this country will no longer have a family allowance cheque for their children. If one does not think it is important, think of the sneakers that have been purchased with family allowance cheques.

Mr. Edwards: They are getting more money.

Mr. Dingwall: The hon. member opposite will have an opportunity to participate in the debate.

Mr. McDermid: Be fair.

Mr. Dingwall: I will be fair and accurate. There are thousands and thousands of Canadians in this country who need that family allowance. The government says it is going to top up some and take it away from others.

• (1230)

The reality is there are a good number of individuals who do not just want to have family allowances coming into their household each and every day. They need it to purchase the sneakers, sweat shirts, and jeans. They need it to pay for the dentist and get their hair cut. That is something I have never had to worry about like my hon. friend opposite, but that is the reality. They need the $4.50 to take a taxi to the dentist or the doctor, despite the claims from the government opposite.

An hon. member: The people who need it are getting it.

Mr. Dingwall: The hon. member says that the people who need it are getting it. The hon. member's subjective interpretation of what is needed is quite different from mine.

We also could not foresee they would become so bankrupt of policy opposite they would not want to use the time available to them. We objected to the reduction of opposition days and we object now to their further reduction by doing it through the back door. If they could not do it through the front door, they are now doing it through the back door.

Once again we in the Official Opposition oppose and oppose vigorously that method of governing this great country.

No wonder Canadians are so cynical about politicians at the national level when a government, voted in by the people of Canada, acts in such an uncaring and insensitive way. If national unity were the only difficulty facing Canada one might understand the terms of this adjournment, but it is unfortunately only one of the problems.

Unemployment reached 11.6 per cent in June. It is the highest since this government took office and has remained at this unacceptably high level for three consecutive months. Since June the number of unemployed Canadians has increased by 71,000. The outlook for the future looks grim. The help wanted index declined five points in August.

Gross Domestic Product growth slowed in the second quarter of this year, posting a mere .7 per cent gain on an annualized basis. This followed a 1.7 per cent annualized rate of increase in the first quarter, making it highly unlikely the Government of Canada will come anywhere close to its forecast of 2.3 per cent growth for 1992.

On the basis of the composite leading indicator, it is doubtful economic activity will pick up significantly in the near term. The indicator continues to inch upward at the rate of .2 per cent per month. This is not a sign of robust recovery.

Bankruptcy figures are, to say the least, an absolute unequivocal national disgrace. There have been 2,156 more bankruptcies in the first seven months of 1992 than in the corresponding period in 1991.

I practised law. I did some insolvency work. Do you know what a bankruptcy does to an individual and a family? Do you know the potential it can have to cause havoc? It can have a lasting, lasting, lasting effect.

The retail and construction industries, which are employee intensive, were particularly hard hit. Housing starts plunged 14 per cent in the month of August, almost certainly a direct result of the uncertainty in the labour market. Retail sales and manufacturing shipments have been flat and if there is an improvement one month there is inevitably a disappointment the next. There have been few, if any, visible benefits from the Canada–U.S. trade agreement and I am sad to say what we predicted did, in fact, happen. Gordon Ritchie, the number two negotiator of the free trade agreement and a government appointee has said the macro economic policies of the government "—have been highly perverse, cancelling out temporarily and perhaps permanently many of the benefits of the free trade agreement."

The government protests that the free trade agreement was one of the greatest things that ever happened to this nation. I say to them, let us run an election and let the people decide.

The government has negotiated a badly flawed North American Free Trade Agreement without a subsidies or anti-dumping code that will lead to continued harassment of Canadian exporters. The government broke its promises to provide adjustment programs for workers in industry adversely affected by the Canada–U.S. deal. It is doing nothing to prepare business and workers for the North American free trade agreement, except to spend millions of taxpayers' dollars on phony propaganda to sell the deal, which looks increasingly unlikely to pass in the United States.

Sometimes one has to get very personal to get one's message across. We have the likes of the Minister of International Trade spending millions of dollars on an orchestrated propaganda campaign to sell the North American free trade agreement, when fishermen in Newfoundland have to wait in line to get a number in order to get unemployment insurance. At the same time, farmers in western Canada worry about their compensation because of crop failures and students cannot return to university or find a job or any prospect of a job. What does this government do? It spends millions of the taxpayers' dollars to sell the flaws of the North American free trade agreement.

On any objective, national, regional or international test, one would have to conclude that kind of public policy is absolutely idiotic for Canada at this time.

Even if the North American free trade agreement does pass in the United States, that country is preparing programs to offset any dislocations. President Bush wants to expand federal job training by $10 billion, and his opponent Governor Clinton has made the expansion of job training programs a centrepiece of his platform. Despite its promises, the Canadian government produced no such programs following the Canada–U.S. deal, and it has publicly stated it will bring forward no new adjustment assistance programs in response to the North American free trade agreement.

The minister responsible for employment and immigration had the audacity to stand in this House last week and this week and try to sell to this Parliament, and thereby to Canadians across this land, that somehow the existing programs were what the government meant to be in terms of the adjustment programs. That is not what it said in the debate of 1988 prior to the federal election. That is not what it said post–1988. That is not what it said with regard to entering the negotiations in the North American free trade with Mexico round. That is not what it said then, but, again, what can one expect from this administration? Can you expect candid, honest, forthright responses to questions which are of great concern to Canadians? I think the answer is obvious to all those in this Chamber who watch our proceedings and have seen and felt the nasty hand of this negative administration.

Canadians in every region are suffering and no more so than in my own region of this great country. I think of my fellow citizens in Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and in my own region of Cape Breton in Nova Scotia. Government policies have created unemployment, while making unemployment insurance benefits less accessible and at the same time failing to provide adequate training and retraining opportunities.

Programs for the victims of the Atlantic fisheries closures, as we all know, are insufficiently funded and hopelessly, inadequately staffed. Victims of western crop failures are denied emergency assistance. Federal policies have caused the cost of education to skyrocket, while decreasing temporary employment opportunities and student assistance, thus throwing even more young Canadians into the ranks of the unemployed.

I have never in my entire adult life witnessed such a grave summer for students as I did this year. There have been more calls and representations from parents, students, their friends and relatives with regard to the lack of employment opportunities, not only to pursue post-secondary education but any type of training. What is there? We have the Minister of Employment and Immigration saying the government thinks it is important to spend millions of dollars in advertising on a prosperity agenda. We have the Minister for International Trade saying to those very same students we have to spend millions and millions of taxpayers money promoting the North American free trade agreement.

In the face of all this, what does the government propose? It proposes to do nothing. It proposes to send Parliament away for an indeterminate period so it can continue to do nothing. For the time being, the unity issue may well predominate. I do not vigorously oppose that sentiment, but to suggest you can carve it out and place it over there as one dossier having no consequential effects, that is, the economy having no consequential effects on the national unity debate, is just not in the cards.

It may well be that Parliament should be adjourned for the duration of the campaign. As I have said in my opening remarks, we could have made some arrangements with members opposite to allow members in all of the regions. I sat through a debate and a referendum in 1980. I sat on the government side. The difference is this is a national referendum and that was the provincial referendum. What we did in 1980 could have been duplicated in 1992.

As a backbencher on the government side, I had to remain here for most of that time while my colleagues from Quebec, each and every one of the 74, went into the province of Quebec and sold the yes side to keep national unity in Canada. Arrangements were made. Numerous members from the hon. minister's party were in opposition, and I make reference to the hon. member for Yellowhead. They participated vigorously and actively in the province of Quebec in that referendum. I salute him for his efforts and contributions.

As a national institution, we cannot bury our heads in the sand and say the economy can sit on the sidelines until we resolve this little file over here.

Mr. McDermid: This has everything to do with the economy.

Mr. Dingwall: The hon. member will have an opportunity to participate. The fact of the matter is that they are inter-related. Therefore the hon. member does agree with my thesis. Therefore the House should sit. The government should put forward a positive program to try to address the evils that are in the Canadian economy instead of running away from its responsibilities.

We have heard it all including the arrogance of the hon. minister opposite and, more important, the arrogance of the administration opposite: only the government has the solutions to the Canadian economy. Let us find out if the Canadian people, for instance in British Columbia, agree that the Tories have the solutions to the Canadian economy. They are at 12 per cent in British Columbia and they are doing very well in their bastion of support in western Canada on the prairies, at 20 per cent.

Their national support is overwhelming. They have all the solutions. No one else has any solutions. Their standing is at 21 per cent in the polls. Such arrogance and insensitivity by the administration has a destiny with failure during the next federal election in this country.

There is no justification for this House to agree to an open-ended adjournment. The motion as read by the Clerk of the House says that the House will adjourn to the call of the Speaker.

Canadians and those who view these proceedings must understand what is being suggested here. They are suggesting that the right hon. Prime Minister and all of those members opposite will call Parliament back whenever they feel like it, not when they should, but when they feel like it.

The Constitution says that they have to call it within 364 days. Technically, we could be adjourned for 364 days while they make Orders in Council to appoint their friends to boards and commissions. We could be adjourned for 364 days while unemployment soars. We could be adjourned for 364 days while the welfare rolls double, while Canadians who are in need of medicare are suffering, while students are without work.

It is absolutely incredible to suggest, imply, and then state on the floor of the House of Commons that we will be adjourned until the call of the Chair, until those who occupy the senior positions in the cabinet of the right hon. Prime Minister have an inkling that perhaps Parliament ought to be called back.

I do not think that is what Canadians want. I think Canadians want to know now when we are coming back. What are the proposals that the government will put forward? What will the opposition say to those proposals? What will be the alternatives suggested by opposition parties or other interest groups in the country? They want to know. This government does not care.

This government does not care about this institution. It just cares about the keys. It cares about the keys to the limousines in which the minister gets driven around each and every day. That is what he cares about. That is the only thing that the minister opposite cares about.

Mr. McDermid: We care about Canada.

• (1250)

Mr. Dingwall: The hon. member opposite says he cares about Canada. That is a good statement, because I agree with him.

I think in his heart he does care about Canada. Equally so, I think there are millions of Canadians across this country who care about Canada. However, it is the responsibility of a duly elected national government to not only use its heart with regard to national unity, but it must use its head.

I suggest to the minister that he is not using his head. If he used his head he would realize once and for all that national unity is directly linked to the Canadian economy. To suggest that members on this side are not concerned about one or the other is totally absurd.

The minister finally agrees with my thesis that both are very important. You cannot say to a fisherman who cannot get enough to feed his family, you cannot say to a coal miner who cannot get unemployment insurance, you cannot say to a student who cannot find work or enroll in a post-secondary education that national unity has nothing to do with the Canadian economy.

That is reality. That is not arrogance. That is not insensitivity. That is not playing down the national unity card. That is telling it like it is.

I stood in this House not many days ago and supported the government motion with regard to the referendum. I will go to my riding and I will fight on the yes side. I will join with ministers opposite with regard to national unity, but I will not lie. I will not mislead the Canadian people.

The economy is very, very important in this debate. If ministers opposite do not realize how important it is they run the risk of upsetting the apple cart in different jurisdictions in this country.

There should at least be an early date for Parliament to resume its activities. I have offered, privately and publicly, some suggestions. I have offered an opportunity to negotiate, to try to set in motion with the government opposite a way in which we could work this out, but everything has fallen on a deaf ear.

I believe strongly in this great country and I believe that the economy is an important fundamental to the national referendum. I do not say it is the only one, but it is fundamental. Therefore, I urge members opposite not to dismiss it.

I urge members opposite to realize, as I am sure many of them do, that it is hard to sell national unity to those who are hungry. It is hard to sell national unity to the homeless. It is hard to sell it to students, as I said earlier, without work and opportunities to improve themselves.

It is hard to sell it to regions, that for years have been labelled by those in the media and by some in this Chamber as the have not regions of the country.

My province is a great province. At one time, in early Confederation, we enjoyed great prosperity. Today, in many quarters of that great province the dream of prosperity is a dream that they read about in a textbook. I think of the historic capital city of my province, Halifax. It has high welfare rolls and high unemployment. I think of my own area of Cape Breton, where the figure is beyond the national average in some quarters by three and four times—that is 33 per cent to 44 per cent.

I make this intervention highlighting the difficulties that those of us in other regions of the country—not only in the province of Quebec or in the province of British Columbia but in provinces like mine and elsewhere in this country—have ahead of us on this particular issue. I hope the House would come back at an early time to debate those concerns, hear the policy initiatives of a government, respond to the opposition and get on with the job of building a great country.

Canadians want to have a reason to vote yes, and voting yes takes in more than economic reasons. Let us be candid. The government is right on that aspect but it is so wrong if it intends to dismiss that as a major issue in this referendum campaign.

Therefore I move the following amendment:

That the motion be amended by inserting between the word "Chair" and the semicolon, the following:

, which shall be for a date no later than October 28, 1992.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion in order.

[English]

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether you might find that disposition to call it one o'clock.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon, pursuant to Standing Order 24(2).

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, when Canada built the national railroad from coast to coast, it was a structural way of linking each region of the country with other regions. Symbolically the Canadian railroad has accomplished much more than this. It joined the country and unified it as one nation.

The Student Unity Train will travel across Ontario, picking up students at each stop along the line. That is why it is only fitting that during these difficult times the Canadian railway system is being used as a symbol of continuing and strengthening Canadian unity.

Symbolically, the Canadian railroad is much more than this. That is why it is important that Canada's future, the students, be recognized for their efforts to join and unite this country.

Thanks to the University of Western Ontario and the University of Toronto, young Canadian students from universities across Ontario will be boarding the train in October to promote Canadian unity.

In addition, I want to congratulate the Canadian Ethnocultural Council which this morning announced it will support the Charlottetown accord but would propose some improvements to the Canada clause to meet some of their concerns.

Multiculturalism is what Canada is all about.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, many Canadians have invested a great deal of time and energy to arrive at a proposal for constitutional reform.

As we prepare for a referendum on the proposal, many of us feel that a resolution of this crucial issue is essential now. I am amazed that anyone would suggest that we place this fundamental issue aside. To suggest that we turn our attention from the Constitution to the economy is even more baffling. Political stability in any country is crucial for economic security.

The strongest action we can take to improve our economy is to vote yes in support of the proposal for constitutional reform on October 26.

CHARLOTTETOWN ACCORD

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I support the unity agreement that was reached at Charlottetown, although Canada's largest women's organization has come out against it. Everyone has the right and the responsibility to look at the accord and make their own decisions free of intimidation and threats of loss of funding.

I am confident that the accord is not in any way a threat to either equality rights or social programs. In fact, women have made some gains in this accord and social programs are guaranteed in the Constitution for the first time.

NAC has the right to voice its concerns and to have them taken seriously and discussed. I want to ask the government to refer NAC's concerns about equality rights in the Canada clause to the Supreme Court. That would go a long way to relieve the worries that some women may have about this accord.

CANADIAN VETERANS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, earlier this year the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the National Film Board demonstrated their total insensitivity to the veterans of Canada with production and distribution of The Valour and the Horror. They denigrated the contributions to Canada and to world peace by Canadians who served our country in Europe and Asia.

Veterans have protested. Veterans are even in the process of taking action on the basis that the material is essentially hate literature and that it inflames people against veterans. Notwithstanding this, the National Film Board is carrying on its program of distribution of The Valour and the Horror to all who want to rent the material from the NFB.

I call on the Minister of Communications to forthwith stop the National Film Board in this distribution.

CANADA POST

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I want to talk about post offices in my constituency.

Just recently the St. Vital post office was virtually totally closed and the post office brought about changes to St. Germain, a little community in the southern end of the constituency, changes for the worse, I might add. What has this government done with its postal policy? Marion Grocery, Drake Pharmacy, Metro Drugs, McCullough Drugs, Tache Pharmacy, closed, reduced or cut.

First, there were the supermailboxes, then there were increases in postal stamps with the GST on top of the postage stamps. Now, there are reductions, cuts and what have you.

Who is being inconvenienced with this kind of policy? Everyone is, but clearly people with disabilities, particularly physical disabilities, are finding it extremely difficult to go further, seniors as well and business people too. These people will remember them.

[Translation]

Yes, they will remember their policy.

HOUSING

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation for their decision last February to allow first-time home buyers to purchase a home with a 5 per cent rather than a 10 per cent down payment.

During the seven months that have passed since the program was initiated, it has been used by some 42,600 home buyers and 73 per cent of those purchasers would not have been able to buy a home without this program. It has been used most by couples in their late twenties who have an average household income of between $30,000 and $60,000. Almost 60 per cent of the buyers to date have been renters for more than five years, and 18 per cent have been renting for more than 10 years. Clearly this program has been a success, not only because it has increased home ownership, not only because it has increased the supply of available rental accommodation, but also because it has increased consumer spending and helped to create badly needed jobs.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Amid the hustle of the October 26 referendum date lurks another looming deadline, the renegotiations of the Montreal protocol. I would like to remind this government that we cannot afford to put life on hold for the next six weeks and lose sight of other important issues facing this country and our world.

Canadians have had ample evidence of the disappearing ozone layer this summer. Sunburns and sore eyes were common complaints for most of us. As I have frequently warned, Canada's location in the northern hemisphere means we feel the effects of ozone loss more than most peoples of the world.

In spite of this, the Canadian government will not support the U.S. proposal to phase out methyl bromide. This highly toxic chemical is estimated to break down the ozone at 30 to 60 times the rate of CFCs. The Americans know this must be banned, but our government is wimping out and supporting only stabilization.

Without firm phase-out dates, no alternatives or substitutes will emerge. We will continue to fiddle while the ozone burns.

FOETAL ALCOHOL SYNDROME

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, foetal alcohol syndrome is a matter of great concern. I have risen often in the House to address the major and often tragic problems that are involved.

The health issues committee released the FAS report in June of this year calling for government action to help battle this devastating condition. I am pleased the government shares this concern as it mounts the first national symposium on foetal alcohol syndrome to take place in Vancouver from September 30 to October 2.

I personally congratulate the minister of health for his efforts to take one of the recommendations of the committee's report and make it a reality. I believe that the symposium will be a positive step toward the goal of eliminating this national tragedy affecting so many Canadian children and families. The workshops, speeches and panel discussions will assist in educating the medical community as well as provide support to those who are fighting on the front lines against the foetal alcohol syndrome.

There is more that must be done, and I hope the other recommendations of the report will be implemented as soon as possible.

NATIONAL ACTION COMMITTEE

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, here in this House out of 295 seats, only 40 are held by women. While that indicates a steady improvement, clearly we have a long way to go. I support efforts to encourage the participation of women in politics, but I have concerns with a system whereby seats are designated for women.

The National Action Committee on the Status of Women has decided to oppose the Charlottetown constitutional agreement, in part due to the lack of a quota for women in the Senate. I disagree with their position. While we should look at ways to encourage more women to run for politics, I believe that in a democratic process women should get elected like everyone else, based on their merits and their abilities. I believe that many women have an important contribution to make to this country, but in my view there are better ways to improve the participation of women in politics than instilling a quota system.

CO-OPERATIVE EDUCATION PROGRAM

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to praise our government's decision to invest once again in the potential of young people in our society. The plan is to inject $24.6 million into the Co-operative Education Program.

In addition to being given an opportunity to use the knowledge acquired in school, students will also be able to acquire job experience. These young high school students will have a chance to give the private and public sector the benefit of their dynamic approach, while the latter will be able to give students the benefit of their experience and know-how.

• (1410)

It is imperative to invest in tomorrow's generation. Our government realized long ago that in an increasingly competitive world, we must give our young people all the tools they need to maintain the level of excellence of this country.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, on October 26, Canadians face an important test with a single question. It is a test which will challenge their vision, their understanding and their hopes for this great country.

Like many others in this Parliament I will be saying yes on October 26, not because the Charlottetown agreement is perfect. It is not. It is, however, an agreement forged from a Canadian tradition of compromise, tolerance and generosity which is recognized and respected around the world.

It is an agreement which allows all Canadians to say yes, yes to a new constitution recognizing our diversity and addressing historic grievances, yes to a new social contract which is an example of people from disparate backgrounds living and working together in harmony, and yes to a constitution which allows us to move forward with confidence to confront the challenges of a global economy.

I would encourage my fellow Canadians to reflect deeply on how they will meet the challenge on October 26. I will be saying yes to Canada.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, it is welcome news for communities along the Canada-U.S. border, including my riding of Sarnia—Lambton, to see figures indicating fewer same-day trips to the U.S. compared with the same period last year.

In spite of the news, I remain adamant that it is far too early to claim victory over the cross-border shopping war. Progress has been made, but governments and other stakeholders must not lose sight of the fact that our retailers in border communities are still losing billions of dollars in sales across the border.

One area for continued action must be the elimination of third party tariffs. Those already removed by the federal government were indeed well received by our local retailers, especially on electronics. This has led to lower prices in Sarnia—Lambton.

The Retail Council of Canada has submitted an extensive list of further products for tariff removal to the Department of Finance. I urge the finance minister to give serious and immediate consideration to these proposals. I am convinced that this is the type of ammunition which our retailers need and require to help them to do battle on the cross-border front.

RAILWAYS

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, it is happening again. First, there were three airlines, then two, now one. At one time in this country, there was a multiplicity of railroads, then there were two. Now CN and CP are beginning the process to make it one.

CP has announced that the two carriers are close to a merger of their Ottawa Valley lines. They are going to set up a new company to maintain this line, while each carrier would pay to use it. Is this the beginning of the ultimate merger of the two companies? I believe the answer is yes.

This merger, like that in the air, is a direct result of government policies, deregulation and taxation. Will this government ever learn that the population of Canada can only sustain one of each of the modes? I hope they learn before it is too late.

Oral Questions

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, this government has a responsibility to Canadians to reregulate Canada's airline industry. The proposal to merge Canada's two airlines is to deny Canadians access to a safe, affordable and serviceable air industry. The present proposal will affect not only the flying public but also the thousands of Canadians who stand to lose their jobs.

When deregulation was introduced in 1987, it promised increased competition which would bring lower prices, better service and a stable industry. Instead, Canada has lost several of its established carriers, almost 9,000 highly skilled jobs and has two airlines facing huge operating losses and a massive combined debt load of $4 billion, thanks to destructive, predatory policies of this government.

We, on this side of the House, have been warning the government that an airlines crisis was imminent, given the effects of deregulation and high operating costs and taxes. Yet the government has tried to portray this merger as a private matter.

This government must reregulate to ensure the industry operates in a Canadian-controlled, competitive market environment, maximizing affordable, accessible and safe air travel for Canadians.

PERSONS CASE

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, the annual Governor General's awards in commemoration of the persons case will be presented on October 20, 1992. The awards commemorate the lengthy political and legal battle that culminated in October 1929 with women winning the constitutional right to be recognized as persons.

The persons case was an historic milestone in women's efforts to achieve equality of opportunity in all of society's endeavours.

In 1979, on the 50th anniversary of the persons case, the Governor General's awards in commemoration of the persons case were created to recognize the outstanding contributions toward promoting the equality of women in Canada.

To date there have been 71 recipients of the award. This year's recipients are of equally impressive calibre. The awards publicly recognize the history of women's advancement in Canada. I am sure I am joined by all members of this House in saluting the efforts of the awards recipients past and present.

YOUTH EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, on a day when Parliament is about to adjourn for so many weeks, it is incumbent on the Official Opposition to raise once again the plight of youth unemployment, running at about 20 per cent across this country and in my home town even higher than that.

It is unacceptable and unthinkable that the Government of Canada would allow unemployment to run so high and not take any remedial measures. This country has had a series of youth programs to meet high unemployment in the youth in past decades and in more recent times through Katimavik, the Company of Young Canadians, and various other summer and winter employment for young people.

From the benches of this side of the House, once again we raise our voice to ask the government to take remedial action to deal with this social problem that is so acute and so impending on everybody. Take the necessary action and reduce youth unemployment in Canada.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Canadians have watched with great concern developments in the international currency markets over the past 48 hours. Now the Bank of Canada has responded by increasing interest rates for the second week in a row.

Is it the view of this government that this crisis marks the end of declining interest rates in Canada? What plans does the government have while we are still in a recession? We still have 1.6 million Canadians unemployed and interest rates appear to be on the upswing.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to note that the opposition did not stand up for the last 19 weeks when bank rates were dropping each and every week.

The interest rate increase today of 20 basis points is a reflection of the interaction between the exchange markets and the money markets here in North America.

We do not expect with the settling of the situation in Europe interest rates to rise significantly. I might say to my hon. friend that with the rise in the bank rate, we do not think this will precipitate a rise in the prime rate or the mortgage rates that are being loaned to the public today.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I remind the minister that unlike the government, this party has been standing up for the unemployed for a long time.

Yesterday in the House of Commons the Prime Minister took great delight in quoting International Monetary Fund projections for Canada's economic growth and inflation rates. One IMF forecast he neglected to quote was the forecast for unemployment in Canada.

The IMF says that next year Canada is going to have the highest unemployment rate of all G–7 countries. In light of this fact, will the Acting Prime Minister and the government introduce a major job creation program in Canada, as has been requested by the Leader of the Opposition for the last number of months, to get this economy working again?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, artificially priming the economy is not the answer. That has been tried before and it has not worked. I might remind the hon. member, since he is talking about the IMF and about employment, that he neglected to mention to the House and to the people watching today that the IMF projects that the largest employment growth taking place in Canada will be dramatically much larger than in all the other G–7 countries in the report.

I might also draw to my friend's attention the quote from the IMF report yesterday. "Canada's economy should rebound more rapidly in 1993 than any of the other major industrialized nations". It goes on to say: "A solid foundation for a strong economic expansion seems to be in place", the report said about Canadians, citing "a wide margin of unused resources, substantial progress in reducing the structural budget deficit, an inflation rate that is the lowest among the major industrialized countries and sharply lower interest rates".

That is good news. We believe in good news, not pessimism.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. minister has availed himself of the opportunity to refer to international reports.

I am sure this minister and this government are aware of a report released this week by the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development which advised industrial countries to increase spending on public works to help get the world economy moving again.

In light of this report and in light of the thousands of jobs it would create, why is the Government of Canada dragging its feet on creating a national infrastructure program for this country which would put thousands of Canadians back to work? Why is it dragging its feet?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Transport and the Prime Minister have made it very clear that in co-operation with the provinces there is a plan now to work on the national highway system.

The ministers of transport are meeting today in Quebec City to discuss this issue and to work on those plans that the federal government is committed to. I am sure that announcements will be made at the appropriate time.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Acting Prime Minister.

While the government is spending millions of dollars on a subjective advertising campaign touting the benefits of free trade with Mexico, Statistics Canada informs us that manufacturing shipments dropped over 2 per cent in July alone.

Why does the government not include in its advertising campaign—the brochure that it sent to everyone across the country—the fact that we had a $2.1 billion trade surplus in 1983 and that today we have a deficit of nearly $30 billion? Why would it not tell the truth once and for all?

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend's question gives me the opportunity to report to him Statistics Canada revelation this morning that we have had our sixth straight month of increased exports for Canada.

Two further statistics emerged. This sixth straight month means that we are running about a $19 billion surplus this year. We will be having the highest surplus that we have ever had because of it.

Finally, when one looks at numbers more carefully and when one looks at the manufacturing sector, what happened in 1991 since the trade agreement, compared with 1988, is that manufacturing as a proportion of our over-all exports has increased from 24 per cent to 26 per cent.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, the minister would have everyone believe that things are going well by giving us positive statistics, but I would like to give him one so that he can explain it to us.

If the statistics that he is giving us are true, why have 27,000 manufacturing jobs been lost since the free trade agreement was implemented? A quarter of these jobs have been lost in Quebec in the last three months.

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member of something he may not have noticed. There is a world-wide recession going on which has reduced the manufacturing output of virtually every country in the world including Canada.

I should have taken my hon. friend with me this past summer because every week for 19 weeks I opened a different plant across Canada that was expanding or increasing its capacity. These plants had two characteristics. First, they were manufacturing plants. Second, they were high-tech plants and, third, they were all exporting about 80 per cent of their production.

This part of our economy is growing. It is helping to lead us out of what has been a very difficult economic period.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, my questions are related to the North American free trade agreement and I would like to direct them to the Minister for International Trade or a spokesperson today.

Recently Carla Hills admitted to the Senate finance committee in the United States that some industries in the United States would lose jobs because of the North American free trade agreement.

Yesterday another high ranking U.S. official told the Senate that 11 industries including the steel, chemical and refining industries would find substantial incentives for relocating facilities to Mexico.

With the Americans being this candid, will the minister stand and inform the House whether or not his government has done these same kinds of studies and notify all Canadians if the same industries will be affected in Canada?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Hockin, I wish I did not have to do the hon. member's homework for him.

We have published market development studies on NAFTA. All of them indicate very significant opportunities. This market is only 1 per cent of our exports so it is not going to make a tremendous difference overnight.

Let me just tell him that the market development studies are there for him to read: telecommunications equipment, electronic components, tourism, hotel and restaurant equipment, shipping documents, customs regulations, oil and petroleum industry, machine tools, forestry, harvesting, automobile industry and agricultural equipment. I think there are 22 different reports here.

Every one foresees increased export opportunities for Canada.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I hate to upset the minister on a nice, quiet Thursday, but he did not answer my question regarding my research and I am shocked. The minister speaks about one page in the report. I want to address another specific question to the minister and I hope he answers it.

The North American free trade agreement has called for a 62.5 per cent content for all manufacturing of automobiles sold in North America without tariff restrictions to be built in North America under this agreement. There is nothing in this agreement to stop the flow of capital for a new capital investment in the North American agreement to be attracted to Mexico because of low wages.

What has the government decided to do as policy to guarantee that the existing jobs here in Canada in the auto industry are not shifted to Mexico because there is nothing in this agreement to stop that from happening?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I have told my hon. friend this before in the House and outside the House, but currently 86 per cent of all our imports from Mexico in the automobile parts sector have no tariffs against them whatsoever. If the Mexicans were going to put us out of business on the automotive sector, they could have done it last year, the year before, or this year.

The other 14 per cent of the tariffs are minimal. The problem we have with Mexico is that it has tariffs against us. It has quotas against us. This agreement over 10 years gets rid of those tariffs and almost immediately gets rid of most of the quotas.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, the only documented authoritative research production that I have seen was done by Professor Harley Shaiken at the University of San Diego in California. He points out a simple fact at the end of his research. All in costs for automobile production and parts production in Canada are $32 U.S. per hour. All in costs for the United States are $36 U.S. per hour. All in costs for Mexico are $4.80.

Have the government and the minister insisted on a fair and level playing field and, to maintain the investment in this country on that basis, have the government and the minister insisted that Mexican wages come up to ours rather than ours going down to theirs?

• (1430)

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I am going to see if I can find the article of last May. The chairman of Siemens in Canada, a large auto parts and electronics producing company, gave a very interesting interview in which he said that he was going to concentrate most of his expansion in Canada rather than in the southern United States or Mexico. He said the reason he was going to do it was that labour was only about 13 per cent of the cost of the production of his product.

What makes his product competitive is technology, skills and labour turnover. He finds that his labour turnover rate is about one-tenth in Canada of what it is in Mexico or the southern United States.

As a result of that he has confidence in this country. He projected 9,000 jobs for his firm alone in Ontario. Instead of expanding in Mexico or the U.S., he has chosen Canada.

EDUCATION

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my question is for whoever is acting for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

A new school year has just begun but for many young Canadians rather than lining up to pay tuition fees they will be lining up for welfare or to register for UIC. Thousands of students lack the funds to continue their education.

What does the government plan to do to help these students continue their post-secondary education?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I believe that a similar question was asked of the minister of employment yesterday. The minister did underline the fact that Canada is probably the second country in the world that invests the most in education with respect to the many students we have in Canada. Therefore I do not think we should have any shame.

With respect to whether or not there is more to be done, obviously we have the training programs in place to which my hon. colleague seemed to allude when he said they would be waiting in line, a program that was delayed for more than a year by that party.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, later this afternoon the House of Commons will be adjourning for the referendum campaign.

I would like to know from the minister what the government's agenda will be to deal with the unemployment problem over the next six weeks. Specifically what does this government plan to do to help the 1.5 million Canadians who are unemployed?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the government did not wait for a referendum campaign to put the programs in place in order to deal with that situation.

The hon. member should take the time to look at the programs and to look at the increase in the funding of those programs that was put in place by my colleague, the minister of employment, over the year, notwithstanding the obstruction of that side of the House.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Employment and Immigration.

In Cape Breton the unemployment rate is over 22 per cent. Many would say it is much higher. A great number of people are going to face a very bleak winter. The government has had appeals to increase the amount of job creation funding. If they do not have an increase the money is going to be exhausted before the end of the fiscal year.

Will the government recognize the difficult situation that exists and increase job creation funding today?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated to another college on the other side of the House, the minister has already increased the funding in the last budget, notwithstanding the fiscal situation that Canada faces in a world recession. I am sure the funding that was provided, again notwithstanding the obstruction for over a year in putting the program in place, will deal with those situations.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, the government has done nothing. I am going to suggest something the government can do without it costing anything.

Those who are receiving unemployment insurance cannot attend university or training programs because they would not be available for work, but there is no work. Will the government, at least during this period of high unemployment, and particularly in areas of very high unemployment, allow those who are on unemployment insurance to attend training programs and university so they can at least have the training to make them available for the work when it does occur? It will not cost the government anything. Will the government do that?

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I inform my hon. friend that program is already in place under the fee payer program. I suggest that he contact his constituents and ask them to go to the Canada Employment Centre and apply under the fee payer program. He will be surprised how successful that can be.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism who I believe is acting today for the Minister for International Trade.

Water is clearly a good as that term is used in the NAFTA. It appears as item 2201.90 in the draft tariff phasing schedule. In the absence of any specific exemption for water from those sections of the NAFTA which limit or prohibit government restrictions on the exports of goods, such as those in article 309, Canada's policy of preventing large volume fresh water exports will run afoul of Canada's commitments under the NAFTA.

Can the minister identify any provision in the NAFTA, not in Canadian policy but in the NAFTA, which would exempt a government restriction on fresh water exports of any kind from those sections of the deal limiting governments' rights to control exports of goods?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his very academic and somewhat convoluted exposition. I assure him very briefly that under NAFTA large scale exports of water will be the following: zero.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, as water is clearly included in the tariff schedule as a good, and since the minister seems unable to point to any provision in the NAFTA exempting Canada's policy of prohibiting bulk fresh water export, in light of the NAFTA what steps can the minister take to ensure that Canada's no-bulk exports policy will always prevail over American thirsts?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and his party raised this issue over and over against the FTA when the FTA came forward. It was phoney then and it is phoney today.

Here are the provisions under NAFTA: as in the FTA, only water packaged as a beverage or in tanks is covered in NAFTA and water itself was not discussed during the NAFTA negotiations with the United States and Mexico.

GIANT GOLD MINE

Mrs. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Labour.

It has been four months since the strike began at the Giant Gold Mine in Yellowknife, Northwest Territories. The federal mediator has long since flown the coop. Negotiations have been halted. All this government's efforts have clearly failed to resolve the crisis.

The government has obviously taken a holiday on resolving this crisis. Will the minister or the acting minister act responsibly and meet with the union members who are anxious to get back to the bargaining table now?

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in response mediators have met with both sides, but they have not been able to come to a resolve. We all know that the length of this work stoppage is certainly causing concern to the community.

I would also like to advise the member that a request from the union has been received re appointment of an industrial inquiry commissioner. That is one of the latest developments in this situation.

Mrs. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same acting minister.

This has been recorded as one of the most violent strikes in Canadian history. Replacement workers continue to be flown in while striking workers and their families continue to struggle. The strike is taking a devastating toll, as my hon. colleague has indicated, on the community and the economy.

These people are asking for the minister's help. Will the minister act on the request, finally take the necessary action and call for an industrial disputes inquiry now?

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated, the minister has received a request from the union for the appointment of an industrial inquiry commissioner. The appointment of an industrial inquiry commissioner under section 108 of the Canada Labour Code, Part I, is rarely if ever done in protracted collective bargaining disputes.

• (1440)

I want to tell the hon. member, who is greatly concerned and interested in this dispute, that it is being looked at in great detail to see if that can be a consideration to hopefully help with this problem.

CANADIAN COAST GUARD

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Transport or the parliamentary secretary.

On June 12 the Minister of State for Transport told this House categorically that no jobs would be lost in the town of Prescott due to restructuring in the coast guard. Since then it has been announced that 20 per cent of the coast guard workforce in Prescott will be eliminated.

The minister also announced that she would write to all coast guard employees in Prescott to reassure them that their jobs would continue in Prescott.

What is the minister going to say now that these jobs will no longer exist in Prescott, after I and the public were given assurance to the contrary?

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I do not have full details of the situation. I will refer the hon. member's question to the minister and she will get back to him in due course.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, these confused messages we are getting are little comfort to those who are seeing their lives in such uncertain terms in the town of Prescott. Living with this uncertainty has gone on plenty long enough.

I want to ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport this question. Could I get some assurance today that the restructuring of the coast guard in Prescott will be reviewed, based on the assurance I was given on June 12 in the House that no jobs would disappear. It has now been announced that 20 per cent of the coast guard employees' positions in that town will disappear early in 1993.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to give the hon. member my assurance that I will direct his worthy concern to the minister for her consideration.

RAILWAYS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Members of the House will recall that this summer I released an internal CN document which pointed to a great many of the troubles it is experiencing as a result of deregulation and free trade.

The document spoke about the possibility of further consolidation with Canadian Pacific. It talked about selling off the CN Tower as one of the ways of solving CN's financial problems and hinted at things having to do with privatization, et cetera.

Will the Acting Prime Minister make a commitment in the House today that the government will not do as it has just recently done with the troubles in the airline industry, and that is simply take a hands–off approach and allow the two Canadian railways to disappear or to merge, or in some other way to become other than what they are.

Will it take a hands–on approach, finally see the error of its ways, re–regulate and strengthen the Canadian transportation industry, and particularly rail?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member continually wants to rush backward into the past. The government is permitting the airline industry, the two companies involved which are privately owned, to work out their problems. We are assisting them where we can reasonably do that.

In the case of Canadian Airlines we agreed to purchase three aircraft from it, which will help it with its cash flow problems very considerably. After that it has to work out its own problems the best way it can. It is responsible for doing that itself.

With respect to other elements of the transportation industry, and the two railways in question, the government will observe its public obligations. The National Transportation Agency will carry out its duties and I know of no emergency that is affecting the two national railway lines at the moment.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, a past in which a great many people, in fact tens of thousands of people, had jobs on the railway when it was regulated, and when the government had a commitment to maintain it, does not look so bad to me or to a great many of my constituents, I can tell you.

It is not just a question of the past, so–called, so caricatured by the minister, it is also a question of the future and the fact of rail as the environmental choice when it comes to moving goods across long distances. This government is allowing that mode to deteriorate by virtue of its lack of action.

When will the minister make a commitment to the future? Instead of sitting on its hands, when is the government going to do something about revitalizing the rail industry in this country by regulating it so that it can be the preferred mode?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is a real example of a modern day Luddite. The main energy source for the railways used to be coal. At that time you had to have people shovelling coal to keep the coal in the engines. Fewer people work for the railways today because they are no longer powered by coal. They use diesel oil. You do not need people handling shovels to put coal into the engine.

The hon. gentleman wants to blame the government because the world economy changed, its energy sources changed from coal to oil. That is what the hon. gentleman is asking us to do.

I remember the cries that came from the opposition when the car shops closed in Moncton. As a result of our government policies and regional economic development, Moncton today is booming with new energy, new opportunities seized, because of the help given to them by ACOA. The car shops are long gone, but Moncton is doing better than ever.

PRODUCT LABELLING

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, my question today is addressed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In the United States when a person buys cosmetics, skin care products, sun tan lotion, et cetera, they know exactly what they are getting because the ingredients are listed on the labels. This is important for a person who is allergic to certain ingredients.

What is being done in Canada to ensure that Canadians will have the same information?

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, that is a very good question. Many Canadians suffer profound, untoward side effects from cosmetics.

A cosmetic is neither a drug nor a food. Therefore, there is no legislation to force companies to list the ingredients. However, I have to say that over the past five or six years there have been many concerns brought before the Department of National Health and Welfare's health protection branch with regard to specific labelling of cosmetics.

In the United States it was enforced in 1977. We issued an information brochure in 1989. The minister does have it under review and is consulting the industry, the consumers' advocates and the people of Canada.

JOB TRAINING

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Last spring over 1,000 workers were laid off at Denison Mines in Elliot Lake. At the same time that these workers were being laid off, the government was slashing its local employment training programs by some 75 per cent.

Why is the government willing to spend millions of dollars to provide income support through the unemployment insurance program, but flatly refusing to provide any training? These men and women are coming into UI benefits now, but there are absolutely no funds. Why is the government refusing to provide training dollars for this community which has suffered so much?

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows in the last budget that funds for training and retraining initiatives under the Canada manpower act have been expanding on a continuous basis. We have been increasingly finding the money with the help of the Minister of Finance to do this.

It is really unfair for that member to say that unemployed people are not given the opportunity to take further training for new jobs. That is happening and it is happening right across the country.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, that is absolutely, categorically wrong. The training dollars in the Elliot Lake manpower office have been slashed from $2.5 million to $600,000, a 75 per cent cut.

• (1450)

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. Foster: At the same time, 1,000 more people have been laid off at the uranium mines alone.

I want to ask the parliamentary secretary, speaking on behalf of the minister, when new moneys are going to be put in? Will it be January 1, when the UI training dollars become available?

I want a commitment from him that he will provide at least $1 million more additional training dollars to that CEIC office January 1. Can he give that commitment this afternoon and give these unemployed workers some hope? Can he do that?

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind my hon. friend, and I would like to reiterate what I just said, that this government is committed to helping as many Canadians as possible to get the training they need.

This commitment is shown in the $3.5 billion available this year. This is a $450 million increase over last year. More than 190,000 UI claimants received training under section 26 during 1991, of which 39,000 were fee payers. In 1992 it is expected that about 300,000 UI claimants will receive training under section 26, of which 85,000 will be fee payers.

There has been an increase of some 46,000 fee payers over last year. Demand on the government is extremely high this year. We know that. We cannot help train everyone, but we are attempting with the dollars that we have and with the increases we have put in place to do the very best we can possibly do.

We are doing that right across the country, not only in Elliot Lake.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, yesterday Conservative MPs on the House consumer committee put an end to what was left of accountability by killing hearings on the proposed CP–Air Canada merger.

I want to ask the consumer and corporate affairs minister if he has figured out what he intends to do to defend air travellers against monopoly pricing and whether he will share his thoughts with this House.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): I think that at this stage the Bureau of Competition Policy and its director have all the necessary resources to examine the issue of competition in the airline industry, Mr. Speaker.

Canada's two major airlines have announced they are planning a merger. So far, no formal request has been submitted to the Bureau of Competition Policy and this was confirmed by the bureau's director. One cannot examine something that is not yet on the table. The Bureau of Competition Policy will take all necessary steps to ensure that competition is maintained in this country, but the proposed agreement must first be finalized and submitted to the bureau.

In the past, we have always acted very prudently because the Bureau of Competition Policy is a quasi–judicial body that acts independently from the government. I do not intend, and I hope my colleague does not intend to suggest the government should interfere with the bureau's work.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): What I intend to do is to ask the minister about his government's policy for defending Canadian consumers. Canadians want to know.

The minister keeps hiding behind the Bureau of Competition Policy, but Canadians want to know what the government's policy will be on maintaining competition. Or has the minister not had enough time to think about it yet?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): I do not think that rhetoric of any kind is helpful to debate. I imagine the hon. member knows the Competition Act, so he also ought to know that the director of the Bureau of Competition Policy acts independently of the government.

I do not intend to interfere with the work of the bureau's director. I said, and so did my colleague, the Minister of Transport, that as soon as a definitive merger plan is submitted by the airlines, it is our responsibility to let the National Transportation Agency and the Bureau of Competition Policy make a complete and exhaustive study of the merger plan and ensure that Canadian consumers are protected and competition is maintained.

We intend to do just that, and we do not intend to interfere with any of the duties of these two bodies.

VETERANS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Communications.

The minister will know that veterans' organizations right across the country are incensed about the CBC production The Valour and the Horror, co-produced with the National Film Board.

Veterans' organizations have caused a hearing on this matter in the other place. There have been objections right across the country but the film and the material are now being distributed to all comers by the National Film Board; to every school and every library. Whoever wants it can rent it, can get it.

I was wondering if the minister would stand up and announce in this House he is going to interfere with that distribution, certainly at the present time.

[Translation]

Mrs. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, as with all National Film Board productions, The Valour and the Horror is also available for purchase and rental in thirteen NFB public distribution centres across the country.

As producer and public distributor of films and videos, the National Film Board has complete autonomy in its creative decisions. I think that since it was created, the board has made a name for itself on the basis of quality and Canadians are very proud of the National Film Board's production.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

The Secretary of State's chief of staff is on record as having threatened a women's organization by withholding its funds unless it shuts up about the referendum. All Canadians have a right to express themselves on this very important issue in our free and democratic society.

Will this government state clearly that this kind of intimidation by senior government staff will not be tolerated? Will it guarantee to put a stop to this intimidation immediately?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Secretary of State I would like to assure my colleague that he in fact is meeting at this very time with the Fédération des femmes du Québec to clear up any misunderstanding which may have come about as a result of that conversation.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, the tape we heard last night did not leave any room at all for any kind of misunderstanding.

We know that many groups which receive government funding will be campaigning on the yes side, which is the side that I will be supporting. There is a democratic principle at stake here, a very important democratic principle about freedom of expression and the right to state your position.

I would like to hear that the government will immediately put a stop to the kind of intimidation that was clearly stated for the public to hear.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I can assure my colleague that there will be no intimidation.

As parliamentarians and ministers, we have a responsibility to the taxpayers of Canada that moneys voted by Parliament are in fact used for the specific purposes within the criteria that is required.

That is what the minister is going to assure himself of and I am sure will clear up any misunderstandings on this matter.

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Employment and Immigration whom I have advised that my constituent, Nuru Haider, has been told by immigration officials to leave Canada early next month with or without her Canadian born 15-month old daughter and to return to Kenya where in the past she has been assaulted and gang raped by the police.

Is the minister prepared to allow Ms. Haider's husband, who is a landed immigrant and who has a job here, to renew the sponsorship of his wife that he temporarily withdrew or alternatively, will he issue a minister's permit on humanitarian and compassionate grounds? This is much more than just a refugee issue. This is a women's issue.

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I will take notice of the question of my hon. colleague and transmit the information to the minister of immigration who I am sure will get back to the hon. member as quickly as possible.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Finance.

The House and Parliament are adjourning later today until late this year. The Constitution is on the front burner of Ottawa and the country. Winter is approaching and we have an economic recession that is painful for all Canadians. It is merely going along its way without any sensitive and substantive response from this government.

Now that Canada enjoys the highest unemployment record along with another country of the G–7 and next year that award will be solely ours, how can this government be indifferent to the economic pain of Canadians and when will it begin to stimulate and kick-start Canadians on putting them back to work so that this country can once again resume its rightful position in terms of economic prowess?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I guess the hon. member came a little late to Question Period because that was the same question which was asked by his colleague who is sitting right in front of him in the House.

Let me repeat what I said to his hon. colleague. What he fails to mention is that Canada is going to experience growth next year. It has been projected to have by a very wide margin over the other countries in the G–7 the largest employment growth.

We have been commended by all those who have watched the activities of this government of getting interest rates down in mortgage terms, some figures we have not seen since the early 1950s. The hon. member says results have not happened. Housing starts are up, resales are up rather dramatically, so there is activity in the marketplace.

Jobs have been created. Jobs in the manufacturing sector have been created in the last few months which are very important. There is activity in the country. This fall, we expect to have a modest growth and into next year, very substantial growth, the largest in the G–7.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Indian Affairs.

Mr. André Tremblay, one of the Quebec government's top constitutional advisers, revealed at a Quebec Chamber of Commerce committee meeting that the minutes of the first ministers' meetings held in Ottawa and Charlottetown contain secret agreements on the aboriginal question.

Can the minister confirm or deny the existence of such agreements?

If she confirms their existence, can she tell us whether the government intends to make these agreements public so that Canadians, Quebecers and native people can make a fully informed decision in the referendum on October 26?

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think that in the coming referendum campaign, we will have more and more of this kind of rumour or public statement from either side of the issue.

Members of this House should have enough experience and maturity to believe those who are worth believing. The coming referendum in Quebec is a great victory for Quebec and a great victory for Mr. Bourassa. I think we should go on that basis and stop believing what anyone might say about anything.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION TO ADJOURN

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre (p. 13284); and the amendment of Mr. Dingwall (p. 13278).

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, as the House knows, this is a motion for the adjournment of the House so that members can return to their ridings to participate in the referendum campaign.

It is an opportunity to reflect on the situation that we find ourselves in and on what has happened this last week as we prepared ourselves to go back to our ridings for the referendum campaign. What happened this week is a good example of what is wrong with the situation in which we find ourselves. At the same time as the three leading political parties in the country have managed to come together to co-operate with respect to the yes side in the referendum, in the same week, we see legislation before the House which in my view is part of the problem.

The problem is that at the same time that we have been talking about building up Canada through the pursuit of national unity and new constitutional agreements, renewed federalism, all that sort of thing, the policies of this government have been leaning on the other hand to the destruction of Canada as we have known it and have therefore reduced the resolve of Canadians with respect to the future of Canada. In other words, the Canada that people might once have been stimulated to save, the Canada that people might once have been excited about, felt good about, is a Canada that hardly exists anymore as the result of the policies of this government.

I think this is one of the reasons why initially we find a general lack of enthusiasm for the yes side in the referendum, because people do not feel good about the country. One of the reasons they do not feel good about the country is that the country has been so transformed negatively as a result of the policies of this government over the last eight years.

You cannot ask people to respond as if they are a community when all the while with the other hand you are tearing down those things which have tended to build up community in Canada. You cannot ask people to act as a community when with the other hand as the government has it has been damaging national institutions, in some cases getting rid of them altogether, damaging national symbols and in some cases getting rid of them altogether.

It is in effect saying to people that we are not a community. There are no borders. As a result of free trade, deregulation and things like that notions of community, notions of acting for the common good are antiquated, are romantic notions.

The government over the last eight years has really acted to discredit the very instincts, the very notions that it would now like to have there as a resource in the yes campaign.

Take for example earlier today when I rose in the House to ask the government a question about Canadian National on an issue I raised this summer about the document I received which called into question the survival of CN. I asked the minister a question about that and I was hardly taken seriously. In fact the minister called me a Luddite, as if I had some inappropriate preoccupation with the past when I talked about the need to reregulate transportation and to strengthen Canadian National and for that matter to strengthen the entire railway system.

I think this is part of the problem. The fact is that particular question of mine and others like it are not even understood any longer by the government. They are not even understood by members opposite.

This last week, for instance, we saw the final vote on the bill which brought an end to the first universal social program in this country, the family allowance, ironically the night before the funeral of Paul Martin Senior, one of the architects of that particular program.

We saw today the introduction but not the end of the debate concerning an extension of the drug patent laws for 20 years so that the multinational drug companies will be able to make more money as a result of their inventions. In so doing it will bring an end to the kind of drug laws we have had in this country for so many years whereby generic drug makers were able to much more quickly get on the market and produce cheaper imitations of the same drug. This has been a characteristic of Canada.

It is one of the things that people have taken pride in; their health care system both in terms of medicare and our generic drug laws and various things like this. No matter where we turn, whether with respect to our health care system, our transportation system, our education system—and the list goes on and on—people feel that somehow the Canada they were attached to is disappearing. Yet while that is happening they are being asked by the government to save Canada, allegedly by voting yes in the referendum campaign.

I intend to vote yes in the referendum, but I do it only in the sense that I want there to still be a Canada to rebuild when that happy day finally arrives and the government on the other side is defeated. Then we can begin to put together the pieces that have been scattered all over the floor by the government opposite. That is, unfortunately, the context in which we find ourselves.

One of the other things that has been at issue this week as we adjourn has been the government's strategy and position with respect to the North American free trade agreement. Tapes have been released which show that the government in its private conversations does not intend to sell the deal on its merits, but rather it intends to malign and attack the enemies of the deal in an ad hominem way. Ad hominem is one of the first fallacies you learn in first year philosophy. An ad hominem argument is the resort of scoundrels. Instead of attacking the person's position on something you attack the person rather than the argument.

Obviously the government has adopted an ad hominem strategy when it comes to the NAFTA. Rather than defending the agreement on its alleged merits, instead it intends to attack the opponents by referring to them variously as crypto-communist, NDP, Liberal, pinko or whatever other names it might have for people who are opposed to the agreement.

Actually this kind of rhetoric and name calling points up a dimension of the debate about the free trade agreements that is neglected, in my judgment, and the fact is that these agreements and the debates surrounding them are philosophical arguments. They are ideological arguments. It is a mistake to try to sort them out in terms of whether it is a good deal or a bad deal or whether this tariff has disappeared or access will be had to this or that market on whatever terms and conditions.

What we are debating is the appropriateness of the entire philosophy which underlies the world view of the free traders. The world view of the free traders is basically that there is no such thing as community and that there should not be in place the capacity of communities, whether those communities are understood as provinces, countries or whatever, to act in the interests of the community against the workings of the marketplace.

That is really the crux of the matter and that is why we in the NDP, unlike our Liberal colleagues, are so committed to the abrogation of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement and to not carrying through with the North American free trade agreement because the philosophy which these agreements assume and reinforce are so contrary to our view of the role of the marketplace in society.

We believe that the marketplace has a role, but it is a role which should be constrained, regulated and controlled for the common good. That is completely foreign to the kind of one dimensional ideological world view that is taking over the world, or at least North America, with the passage of these various free trade agreements.

The timing could not have been worse for the North American free trade agreement in terms of this other task we have before us, that is of trying to get people to see the wisdom of saying yes to the Charlottetown accord. There are so many Canadians who are so angry about the North American free trade agreement and what it represents as the next stage in this destructive process I have talked about, that they are finding it very difficult indeed to separate their anger about that and make what I think is the wise decision about the Charlottetown accord.

Yesterday our House leader, the hon. member for Kamloops, asked the Prime Minister if he would stop this massive advertising campaign on the North American free trade agreement. If there is going to be an advertising campaign in support of the Charlottetown accord, if those ads are accompanied or complemented in the same hour or in the same day by ads in favour of the North American free trade agreement and all this pomposity with respect to prosperity that we get on the radio and TV, et cetera, people are going to be so angry that they are not going to be able to hear that other message.

All we asked for was a cease-fire so to speak. Obviously we are going to continue to talk about the North American free trade agreement and the government will continue to think about it in its own way, but what we asked for was a temporary end to that advertising so that while we are trying to get people to think about the Constitution we are not going around poking them in the eye with respect to the North American free trade agreement.

I thought that maybe just once, just this once, the Prime Minister would see the wisdom of that and agree to call an end to that advertising campaign. As we said, it would only be on a temporary basis. Though I would like to see it ended forever because I think this kind of advocacy advertising, before Parliament has passed something, is politically wrong. It is an affront to democracy. I feel like the Soviet Union disappeared on the other side of the world and reappeared here with respect to propaganda.

There was a time when this kind of advocacy advertising, when it was first tried by the Liberals during the constitutional debate in 1981, was thought to be terrible by everyone. The really scary thing is the way in which we have become kind of resigned to this. We have become kind of resigned to the fact that the government will spend millions of our own money trying to persuade us of things that have not even been passed by Parliament.

People fuss for a day. The media pays attention for a day and then it is over. It is really no big deal. What are we sliding into here when all of us seem to be resigned to the fact that this is the way governments work now, that their advertising budget continues to grow and grow while Canadians find themselves unemployed and families find themselves unable to make ends meet? Just think how those millions of dollars could be alternately and more wisely and more compassionately used.

As I say, we have raised the matter but it does not seem to go anywhere. The Prime Minister gets up and says that this advertising is purely explanatory in nature and does not take sides, it is just to provide information. There is a big yawn and the matter goes no further. This is truly mystifying and I think truly scary in the long run.

A number of members here today have mentioned, in a variety of ways, the plight which a great many young Canadians find themselves in. They are either unable to find jobs or, having gone back to school, are unable to find the part-time employment that they need in order to carry on. Certainly the kind of summer jobs that existed when I was a student are no more. I have had an opportunity to meet with representatives of the student union at the University of Manitoba and University of Winnipeg. They have had conveyed to me their concern about the declining ability of students, particularly students from middle to working class backgrounds, to make a go of it at university.

I raise this because when we are talking about the referendum and the future of Canada, the people who have the greatest stake in it are young people.

They are the ones who are going to have to live a long, long time with whatever the consequences are of whatever Canadians choose on October 26.

One of the things that might motivate them on that day will be whether they feel the country and the leaders who are asking the young people to have confidence in them, the leaders who put the agreement together, have enough confidence in the young people to truly invest in their future, in the quality of their education, in their accessibility to that education. It is one thing to have a lot of high-falutin phrases in the Canada clause and in the social and economic union about quality post-secondary education but it is another thing to put your money where your mouth is and make sure that young Canadians, regardless of their circumstances, have access to that high quality education.

In that respect, I cannot think of anything that struck me more strangely and more offensively than learning this week—and maybe I should have known this before, maybe others know it—that the Prime Minister has his teenage son in an American private school. I do not make any apologies for this. I cannot think of a symbol that is worse for Canada than for people to know—better it should have been kept a deep, dark secret, one we never knew—that their Prime Minister sends his child to an American private school. For one thing it is enough that it is private. Second, it is even more offensive that it is American.

Every once in a while I am tempted, like a lot of other people, to think that maybe I am just old-fashioned to think about the class society and that maybe divisions are disappearing and we are all just one big happy family. Every once in a while I get smacked in the face with reality. This story about the Prime Minister's educational strategies for his children reminds me of where I come from, where a lot of my constituents come from, how great the gap is, and I guess how great the gap will always be between us and them.

There are ways that the government could proceed if it were serious about trying to allay a lot of the fears that Canadians have which are preventing them from thinking clearly about the referendum.

The final suggestion I would make, and I put it on the record here, is that the Prime Minister should consider, privately for now, that if in the course of the referendum campaign it becomes obvious that his personal unpopularity is standing in the way of Canadians voting yes for the constitutional package, he should do the right thing and promise to resign if people would vote for the package. If he would put the country ahead of his own personal political ambitions, it would go a long way toward alleviating a lot of the fears that Canadians have and some of the calls that I have had that the Prime Minister is getting in the way of people feeling good about what they otherwise should feel good about.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to an order made earlier this day, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put every question necessary to dispose of the amendment moved by the Official Opposition.

The question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment, which was negatived on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, we have had an interesting round of debate on the earlier motion and we are now engaged in a debate on the adjournment of the House through to the call of the Chair.

We have the opportunity to debate, among other things, the linkage of the economy to the constitutional issue. We have heard a number of points made on that and I just very briefly wish to comment on them. The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond suggested the rules of the House of Commons had been changed last year so all of the opposition days for the autumn would be lost. That is not consonant with the facts. One opposition day has already been added to the schedule and others will be added in proportion to the number of days we sit.

He also referred to what he called the remorseless use of streamlined closure rules to muzzle debate in this Parliament. I would point out to him and to the public listening that no closure rule has been used for well over a year in this House. Time allocation motions have been used, but even they were not used for a 14-month period from the time of the change of the rules until June of this year.

I wonder if this hardened stance on the part of the Liberal House leader relates to a rejection of the further reforms contemplated by the House of Commons. He said we had killed family allowances in Canada. In fact, $2.1 billion is being added to family benefits. That amounts to $500 per family for the working poor. Those family benefits will be received by 85 per cent of all families.

He commented adversely on the economy and ignored the international monetary fund figures for 1993, which show Canada leading the G-7 countries with 4.5 per cent growth next year and 2.2 per cent employment growth, the highest in the G-7. Canada has the lowest interest rate among those countries and the lowest inflation rate. The government has been congratulated by the IMF for holding firm in difficult times.

This motion does not propose to send Parliament away for an indeterminate period. The opposition House leader suggested that Parliament would not sit for 364 days. I suggest, with great respect, that is misleading the House and the Canadian public. What is contemplated in the resolution is the flexibility to have Parliament called back when it needs to be called back, including sufficient eventualities during the referendum campaign itself. I suspect if my friend opposite were to poll members of his own caucus, he would find they want to get out and campaign on the yes side. I suspect he does too, as he stayed here in 1980 as a matter of duty.

The Leader of the New Democratic Party wishes to campaign and does not wish the House to be in session during the referendum campaign. Of course the referendum, has everything to do with the economy. Premier Getty of Alberta commented yesterday if Canada disintegrates we would be moving from G-7 to G-77.

I do believe my friend opposite was contradicting himself and defeating his own argument in his earnest but hapless attempt to emulate his mentor.

I think none of us would ever forgive ourselves, nor would our electors who care about Canada, if we did not do all we could to promote the positive result on October 26. I am sure most colleagues would agree with that.

Therefore I would move:

That the motion be amended by adding after the word "Chair" in both paragraphs, the following:

"but no later than November 16, 1992".

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I therefore declare the motion in order.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, this is a small gain. It is a change of attitude on the part of the government. The date of November 16 is better than maybe, we will see the Chair will decide. Let us say we are not unhappy that the government finally agreed on a date. November is better than no date at all.

• (1610)

The Liberal caucus was concerned whether the government had really given some thought to the problems experienced by Canadians, and whether it was not recognizing its inability to act and to try to find solutions to the national problems regarding the economy and the national unity. The inability of this government to submit concrete proposals to alleviate the problem of poverty in this country is nevertheless obvious. Indeed the government has demonstrated its inability to propose aggressive economic measures to correct the mistakes caused by its administrative incompetence.

The economy is something important because it is an integral part of this element in our country which wants it to work, to prosper and to be united. At a time when our country is experiencing serious economic problems the government says: "We will wait before talking about these issues, before implementing concrete solutions".

This is why Liberals proposed coming back immediately after the referendum, on October 28. Our motion was rejected. I say as I said earlier that it is not great to come back on November 16, but it is nevertheless better than coming back God knows when.

I want to remind the hon. members that the Liberal caucus had made an offer to the effect that the House would come back every week during the referendum campaign as we have done in the past. We could have sat perhaps three days, with the guarantee—at least from the party representing the Official Opposition—that no delaying tactics would have been used to try to embarrass the government. This would have given the government the opportunity to propose useful economic measures to help Canadians find jobs and, in some regions of the country, improve economic conditions.

It is difficult to talk about unity to a hungry person. It is extremely difficult to talk about national unity to an unemployed person. It is impossible to talk about national unity to people who live in a region where the unemployment rate is somewhere between 30 and 40 per cent. Perhaps it is time to reflect on that and realize that a dynamic and strong economy is what Canada needs right now.

[English]

We agreed that we should be in the field with the troops to win the referendum. We must win this referendum. It must be a yes win. What we have to lose is too important. The real issue before Canadians is not whether there are in the agreement legal terms, commas and all kinds of concepts that most of us fail to understand, the issue before the Canadian public is whether we have a future together in this country. That is the issue in this referendum.

We agree that we want to be in the field with the troops to win this referendum. The future of the country is too important to most of us, not the shape or the form of the future but the future together. That is what we are talking about. That is why we say we have to be out there supporting the yes side. As far as I am concerned, in Ottawa—Vanier and in the national capital there will be an active committee that will be felt, will be seen, will be heard and I hope will be understood. The question is very simple: Do we have a future together? The answer is yes.

Let us look at the record of this government in this session.

Mr. Milliken: We will get depressed.

Mr. Gauthier: It will be very depressing, but that is reality. My friend from Kingston and the Islands is right. It is depressing. One must look back and see what happened so that one can move forward, correct and possibly improve things.

An hon. member: Let's go back to the Trudeau years.

Mr. Gauthier: I heard a comment, "Let us go back to the Trudeau years". I was here during those years. I do not apologize for that at all.

Mr. Mills: It would be a lot better than what we have. He would win every seat in the country.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I will pass over that remark because that would open up a beautiful debate which I do not want to have at this time because it deals with national unity and the sentiments expressed by people against a personality.

[Translation]

From May 1991 until today we have passed 72 government bills on third reading, 2 government bills from the Senate, and 4 private members' public bills.

During this same session 60 per cent of the House's time has been spent on government orders, while less than 8 per cent of the time has been spent on Private Members' Business.

On behalf of the people of Ottawa—Vanier, my constituents, I have debated such contentious matters as the fiscal arrangements between the federal government, the provinces and federal contributions for post-secondary education and health.

I have opposed the harmful changes to the Canada Assistance Plan and the lamentable budget presented by the Conservative government, which as we know resulted in the closure of the Science Council of Canada located in my riding. I have opposed the abolition of the Court Challenges Program and the end to universal social programs that the government imposed yesterday with closure.

They are so ashamed of their policies that they must impose limits on debate, for fear that Canadians will see that they are intellectually bankrupt.

The Conservatives' favourite target, public servants, was not spared in this session. Besides closing many Crown corporations, resulting in many layoffs, the government forced public servants back to work and initiated an unfair pension bill that is still before the Senate and being discussed.

The advent of free trade with the United States and Mexico, the worsening Canadian economic situation, the growing number of unemployed, welfare recipients and homeless have made Canadians lose confidence in their system of government.

There is high price of gasoline, the closing of postal stations, the cuts in funding for the housing program and the abolition of the co-operative housing program. Last Saturday I inaugurated a housing co-op, the last one in my riding, because this government has abolished the co-op program. This program first began in Ottawa—Vanier, in 1971. I have had the honour to preside at the opening of a dozen affordably priced housing co-ops. Now the Conservative government has abolished this program, which was a good one.

There is the privatization of Telesat, the lack of attention to pollution problems in the national capital region. The Rideau River in my riding is polluted and the government has done nothing. We have petitioned and urged it to take concrete action with the province of Ontario, but nothing has been done.

If there was something more positive in this session, it is the constitutional consensus among the federal government, the provincial and territorial governments and native peoples. We have debated it in this House and I have given my opinion on it. I think I have taken a fairly clear position in the debate. I am for the referendum.

All Canadians agree that we are quite fed up talking about the Constitution. That is true, I admit. I know what I am talking about because it happened to me again yesterday. Someone told me that he would vote no in the referendum. I asked him if he had read the package. He said no. I told him that was too bad.

• (1620)

Uninformed decisions do not make good decisions. Therefore I urge Canadians to contact their members of Parliament or the committee to request information on what we are dealing with here. There is no need to pay too much attention to the wording, to the form of the agreement. Let us look at what it is intended to achieve. Its purpose is simple: to determine whether or not we want to remain united. Do we or do we not have a future together? That is the question. The wording is not that important. I am not familiar with constitutional drafting. What can I say? Not every one is excited to the point of spending their days and their nights drafting constitutions. We are sick and tired of talking about the constitution. Let us move. That is a good idea. On October 26 we will decide our collective future. I hope it will be a positive decision. At any rate I pray to God that it will be, for our sake, because we stand to lose too much.

[English]

I want to talk about the economy because I really believe we cannot talk unity to Canadians who are hungry, who are badly housed and who are unemployed.

Those on the government side, and I heard them today in Question Period, say that the recovery from our prolonged recession is on the way, but I am not convinced yet. I wish it was but look at the facts.

Growth has been very low; 1.7 per cent in the first quarter of this year and even less in the second quarter. These are not the kinds of figures that are going to provide us with a strong recovery and the government knows that. Our growth is fuelled chiefly by our exports to the United States.

This means our economy is still extremely vulnerable, with continued growth dependent on the uncertain stability of the American economy as well as those of other major training partners such as Japan and Europe which are—just listen to the news today—having their own economic problems these days.

Yet our exports are the only hope at this time for growth. If there is no growth, there is no expansion. If the philosophy of the private sector is that we must cut expenditures because we have to make some profits and by cutting expenditures they cut staff, that does not create jobs. They must expand. We must give them that confidence. They must acquire this renewed confidence in this country. Once this referendum is over we must see some renewed investments, some stimulants.

In late July of this year the Bank of Nova Scotia presented its depressing outlook for our economy and said that the Canadian economy is going through the worst four years since World War II and we will probably have to wait until 1994 to regain the jobs lost since the recession began in April 1990. It is not me saying that; it is a respected bank, the Bank of Nova Scotia. What has the government done toward new job creation I ask? Nothing.

Another sign of weakness in the economy is that pre-tax corporate profits have fallen 50 per cent since 1988, which is much greater than the 30 per cent they fell during the recession of the 1981-82 period. Tory times are tough times, as I hear one of my colleagues reminding me.

The fall in profit means that job creation will continue to be slow for some time and the government still sits on its hands. Furthermore, debts are at a record level relative to disposable income, with the average household using nearly 10 per cent of take home pay to pay off debts. Consumers are taking their time to pay off their debts before they are willing to spend more. It is unlikely they will ever return to the spending levels of the 1980s.

There has been no relief, and none is in sight, for the jobless with the Tories at the helm. Unemployment is at an eight-year high of 11.6 per cent; 1.6 million Canadians are unemployed, and that does not count those who have abandoned all hope of ever finding a job. Nineteen per cent of students who have graduated from our universities and our post-secondary schools cannot find jobs. Those are alarming statistics.

During July, full-time jobs decreased by 129,000 while part-time jobs increased by 100,000. This decline in full-time employment was the eighth decrease in the previous nine months. Last month, the economic forecasting firm Informetrica recommended that Canadians should complain more loudly to the federal government so that it will do something about the disgraceful level of unemployment. Informetrica believes that the jobless rate will not improve before 1996. That is three and a half years from now.

Are Canadians supposed to give up working for three and a half years? We all know that the longer one is out of the labour market the more difficult it usually is to re-enter it. As unemployment benefits run out people are forced to turn to welfare, since there are few jobs available.

In 1991, 8.5 per cent of the Canadian population, that is two to three million people, were on welfare. Does this government not believe that this is totally unacceptable in this country?

The National Council on Welfare recently pointed out that the number of Canadians on welfare is rising, partly as a result of changes that the Conservative government has or has not made in job strategy. Unemployment legislation is not encouraging at this time.

In my riding of Ottawa—Vanier there are many poor children and many families receiving social assistance. Tax statistics for 1990 show that the lowest income earners are both single parents and couples of Ottawa—Carleton. The over-all area of the national capital. It is discouraging. The demand for welfare in Ottawa—Carleton grew by 42 per cent last year. This is supposed to be fat cat city. This is supposed to be Ottawa, the national capital, the fat cat city. There was a 42 per cent increase last year in welfare cases. As of March there was a case-load of 29,428 individuals or families on welfare in this area. This year the increase is expected to be about 24 per cent. All together about 12.8 per cent of the population will receive some sort of social assistance. It is depressing.

These living standards are particularly damaging to the future of children. I know that the members care for children. A report published by the Social Planning Council of Ottawa—Carleton in September 1990 found that 14 per cent of children in this region were living in poverty, based on the 1986 census. That amounts to more than 19,000 children in this area. We can imagine that the situation has only worsened given the length of this recession.

In the city of Vanier in my riding the rate soars to 31 per cent of children living in poverty. That is truly unacceptable by any standards, by any Canadian standards.

However, all the government offers to these people is legislation like Bill C-80 which was passed last night, with time limitations imposed by the government so that we would not have time to explain to Canadians what it was all about.

Bill C-80 will change absolutely nothing for the poorest families. Single mothers on social assistance will receive no additional benefits from Bill C-80. In Ottawa—Carleton 33 per cent of single mothers with children live in poverty. In my riding 20 per cent of my families are single parent families, mostly run by women. They have a hard time making ends meet.

I beg this government to come up with policies that will help the poor, that will help the badly housed, that will help the unemployed, and to do it quickly.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my colleague said it would be important to be in the field during the referendum campaign. I could not agree more, and that is exactly what the members of the Bloc Quebecois will do. We have to be given the chance to speak freely even so.

No later than yesterday the Fédération des femmes du Québec denounced a decision by the Secretary of State of Canada about the delay in the annual grant payment to the federation—

• (1630)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I shall remind the hon. members that the questions and comments must relate to the speech made by the previous speaker. In this case the motion before us deals with the adjournment of the House. Therefore I ask the hon. member to speak to the point.

Mr. Duceppe: Mr. Speaker, we talked about how important it is for all Canadians to vote on this issue. My colleague said in his speech: "Read the documents before voting". I figure I am on the right track.

Yesterday some people were told they would not get their grant unless they formally agreed not to take an official stand in the debate. They were told: "If you are being fed by those who champion a cause, it is just too bad. You have to make choices in life".

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has the floor is waxing eloquently on something that is not very relevant to the subject matter at hand or is in response to the numerous very thoughtful comments that have been made by my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier.

I am wondering if the Chair would take under advisement, not in any way to prejudice the hon. member from making interventions, the rule of relevancy and would adhere to it.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I shall once again call for the co-operation of the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie in speaking strictly to the point.

Mr. Duceppe: Let me repeat word for word what my hon. colleague said. Of one of my constituents who wanted to vote no he asked: "Did you take the time to read the documents?" I guess there are people who have and who want to make themselves heard. Some did, like Alliance Québec, and they get grants from the Secretary of State. Others would like to, but they are told they are threatened about loosing their grants."

I would like my colleague to explain how he expects us to be able to go into the field. He did talk about going into the field to discuss the national unity issue with all Canadians. How can this be done? Are we committing ourselves, as Canadian parliamentarians, to abide by the Quebec referendum act?

Mr. Tremblay (Québec-Est): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

As I read over government orders, it occurs to me that what is being debated is the adjournment motion. However, I fail to see how the hon. member's remarks fit in with the present adjournment debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am willing to show some flexibility in this case because the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie did refer to comments made by the previous speaker. I would ask him to conclude.

Mr. Duceppe: Mr. Speaker, I will finish what I had to say. The hon. member talked about unemployment and a number of government bills that were not necessarily relevant to the adjournment motion. I imagine his comments did not bother members opposite, although mine may be less palatable.

Since the Secretary of State said today it was «to respect Quebec's referendum bill". I would like to ask the hon. member whether he agrees this legislation should be observed by the government and in fact by all Canadian parliamentarians who intend to speak in Quebec and should therefore comply in every respect with the guidelines of Quebec's Chief Electoral Officer, Mr. Pierre-F. Côté.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, it will be a pleasure to answer this question, and I welcome the opportunity to do so.

If I understood the adjournment motion correctly, this is supposed to be an open debate in which members may raise a variety of subjects or issues. That is what I did during my speech. I talked about the economy and national unity. I think the question is relevant because it concerns a matter I raised in my speech, namely whether the Charlottetown agreement should be supported by all Canadians. I think it should. I know the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie does not agree, but in a democratic society he has that right. I do not agree with him either, but in any case the Charlottetown agreement is a compromise. If we look at the definition of the word compromise in the dictionary, we will see it means an arrangement in which mutual concessions are made.

Mutual concessions were made, and I think that should be sufficient. As I said several times in my speech, the issue is not whether these are the proper legal or constitutional terms but whether we really want to live together and have a future as Canadians, and that is what I say when people ask whether the answer to the referendum question should be affirmative or negative. My answer is affirmative. We should have a future as Canadians.

To answer the hon. member's specific question, I think he is speaking on behalf of a group in Quebec that complained when an assistant to the Secretary of State called to say that he expected the group to remain neutral in the referendum campaign. I do not know exactly what terms were used by this person, but I heard the story today on the national news.

I would not like to see anyone gagged in this debate, a democratic debate in which I expect my colleague and I will often disagree. I often disagree with him, but we respect each other as individuals, and I think that is democracy.

I am not worried about the fact that some members do not like the question. I am not surprised since they are bent on destroying my country, but I cannot help that. They will try to convince Canadians they are right, and I hope they do it democratically. However, I think the hon. member will be very disappointed in the results, because the yes group will win.

As for his specific question, I am a member of the opposition, so I cannot speak for the government. As far as I am concerned, I do not think anyone should be gagged. Just because they are receiving government grants is no reason why they should not speak out. The minister might have more information, but this is not my province. I am from Ontario, and I would be concerned if this happened in my own riding. I realize he has the right to ask the question, but I think he realizes it is not up to me to provide the answer.

[English]

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity to listen to the excellent presentation made by my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier.

I wanted to ask him something in addition. There was something he left out, and I am sure he left it out because of time constraints. I have a question, well I will not be greedy.

How does he feel about the timing of the GST on top of all these things that he mentioned? How are his constituents reacting to that?

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, they hate it, they hate it, they hate it in every language, official or unofficial. They would love to have an election on the issue.

All I can say to my colleague from Newfoundland, as chairman of the public accounts committee, is that I wish the government would have the guts to do an evaluation of the GST program as a financing tool of government. I think it would find out that it would be rejected by 90 per cent of Canadians and it would find other means of maybe getting the revenues, but not the GST. It is a bad tax and we know it.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to stand in the House today to address this motion of adjournment.

There is a basic question that I want to begin with. Why is it that my party wanted to stay longer, wanted to return during the referendum, and wanted to come back sooner? There is a very simple answer, and my colleagues would agree, which is that there is work to do. There is a great deal of work to do.

[Translation]

There is a lot of work to do, but I will concentrate on the economy and then go on to the Constitution and the referendum.

[English]

Let us talk of the country today. By all standards, by all evaluations, people would agree that we are in serious difficulties. Unemployment exceeds 1.6 million. Student unemployment this summer was 17.7 percent. It was the worst summer that students have ever experienced. I know that things are tough everywhere but that does not make it easier for Canada.

There are now 2.2 million people on social assistance programs.

• (1640)

It is over two million Canadians who need to take advantage of those to find the basic benefits of living. We have food banks which will nourish over two million Canadians this year. There will be two million Canadians who go to those food banks.

There may be some who go more than once, obviously, but that is an astronomical figure. It is much, much too high. It is totally unacceptable. What is worse is that roughly 40 per cent of the people who will have to go to those food banks are young people, 18 years of age and younger.

If you look at the poor in this country, it depends upon whose statistics you use, you have between four million and five million poor. They are people who are living at the level of poverty or below the level of poverty. That is really, really unacceptable.

The majority of those particular individuals are women. More than one million of those people are children. There is work to do. There is a great deal of work to do.

In my province of Manitoba we have one of the worst problems in Canada with respect to poverty for children. We have thousands of homeless people in this country, and they need to be attended to.

I come from a background of education and I take a great deal of interest in what is happening in our country.

[Translation]

About 30 per cent of young people have dropped out of school now. They do not know exactly where to go and what to do with their life. That is another challenge for the government. I know that there have been many initiatives and many efforts have been made to correct the problem, but we know very well that there has not been much success.

[English]

I wish my colleagues would come to my office in Winnipeg at 238 St. Mary's Road and examine some of the files of people who have come in with concerns. I have some people with double degrees, masters degrees, young men and women who are extremely competent, highly motivated and who are skilled but cannot find a job.

Some can find very short-term jobs at extremely poor remuneration. I had a student of roughly 30 years of age with a masters degree in economics who had a six-week contract working at $6 an hour during the summer. That is all that could be found in the city of Winnipeg.

I have a number of other cases like that which are just as painful for me. It is extremely difficult to try to assist. I cannot create jobs. I cannot create the conditions under which jobs in fact happen. Therefore, I ask the government to look at this and to come back, hopefully in this session, with some new ideas, a bit of enthusiasm, energy and creativity so that we can get the country back to work.

I have talked about the unemployed. I could talk about the people who are on social assistance, who feel badly because they want to work, but they need the profit from those programs. They feel as if they have been forgotten. They feel as if they have been stigmatized, as if they can no longer make a useful contribution to our country.

When citizens start to feel that way it is a very difficult process to reverse.

[Translation]

There are men and women in that group who are really very committed, who would like to work and want to work and want a better future for their children and their families, but there are very few opportunities and very few jobs out there.

[English]

When we talk about work to do, there are a number of things that we could do co-operatively over the next few weeks if we wanted to. We could not only examine the unemployment insurance programs, the unemployed, the training and retraining programs that are perhaps needed, the creation of jobs for those who want to work, the social assistance programs, how we deal with the provinces and whether or not the caps that we have imposed on the social assistance transfers to provinces such as British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario are fair, we could examine our veterans' programs to ensure that they too are getting the very best of what they ought to be getting.

One of the things that we have forgotten about our veterans as they grow older, some of the difficulties that they have experienced during the wars are becoming increasingly acute and troublesome. There are some adjustments that need to be made there.

We could at the same time look at people who have disabilities, quite apart from the fact that they are very unhappy about having been left out of the current constitutional proposals. They were initially in the government proposals. They are among the poorest of the poor in Canada.

If my memory serves me correct, they were talking about three million-plus people. What are some of the things that we ought to be doing, could be doing, should be doing in order to assist these individuals?

What about our seniors, those who have worked to make this country what it is, to permit you and me and many others to enjoy the benefits of a great nation, one of the finest if not the finest in the whole world? Are we treating them as well as we could, as well as we should, as well as we ought to be doing?

I have in my office at the present time a number of cases with respect to immigration. There are some very unfortunate things that are happening. I had a particular instance where a gentleman was being married. He wanted his brother-in-law to come to the wedding and he could not. I had another situation where there was going to be a religious ceremony for a child in the family, the grandparents wanted to come to participate and they could not come. Why could they not come? I guess there was a fear that these people would want to stay in Canada. They had property, they had family and they had all kinds of commitments at home.

We could be reviewing some of those particular laws and procedures to see what could be improved. We could also be seeing, examining and reviewing what is happening to our young people today, our students. I mentioned initially the summer of 1992.

[Translation]

I talked about it in the House of Commons yesterday. There was an extremely high unemployment rate of nearly 18 per cent. It was the worst summer ever. What could we do for those young people who wanted to take training or retraining courses, who wanted to return to college or university, who want to prepare for a more promising future in which they would be able to contribute fully to the country's development and to develop not only their talents but also this majestic country of ours?

[English]

We could look at what is happening to our young people, why they are feeling as they do and what it is that they need in order to grow and to contribute fully to develop not only their talents but this great country. We could have stayed longer. We could have come back a bit earlier. During the period between now and when we do return we could have spent more time discussing the child benefits act. We could have spent much more time doing that. Perhaps the results would not have been different, but at least people would have felt that they would have been heard. We also could have done so much more with respect to the bill that came forward today, Bill C-91, with regard to drugs and medication and we did not. We did not because we are limited in time.

We really need to address all of those problems and many more. I also believe that we need an economic blueprint. If nothing else, it would be a symbol that government is really trying to respond to the needs of Canadians from an economic perspective.

I want to talk briefly about the Constitution, the Constitution proposals and the referendum. I will be voting yes on October 26.

[I will be at the yes side with great enthusiasm even though I have realized that there are some serious difficulties with the proposals. If we look at it over all, it is a deal that needs to be endorsed by Canadians. I will be speaking as clearly, as loudly and as insightfully as I can about that. However, there are a number of things that we might have done if we had been here. I am really quite concerned that there are a number of unanswered questions. I am not talking about the proposals themselves, but let me ask a question: Can students who are studying in another city vote during the referendum and, if so, do they know that they can and do they know what the process is? What about, for example, these young people who are pages here, many of whom I suspect are from other provinces, will they be able to vote? Will they vote here? Will they vote at home?

What about students who have gone to universities in other countries? A young woman came into my office roughly three weeks ago who said: "I am going to graduate school from one of the American universities, but I want desperately to vote on referendum day. Will I be able to?" I am trying to follow that up.

While I am quite concerned about the groups that I have mentioned, there is another group of people who may be forgotten. There are possibly thousands of Canadians living and working abroad. Will they get the opportunity to vote for their country on referendum day? What about people who are living in other countries but are still citizens of Canada or visiting other countries and still citizens of Canada?

These are some of the questions that I would have liked to address during this period of time, and perhaps I can do so through other means, but clearly the House would have been an appropriate one.

I just want to raise a couple of other points. There is information out there that is required. I talked to a number of individuals about these constitutional proposals and the referendum bill. They heard from a fair number who would be supporting them. They indicated so and told me why. There were a fair number who said no and told me they could not because they did not understand them. They had no material and that is a real problem. I know there are efforts being made. I know it is easy to criticize, but at the same time it is so absolutely essential for something that is simple, readable and objective to be distributed to Canadian citizens.

• (1650)

I have no real fear. If they get the information, if they feel it is from a credible source, they will say the right thing on October 26.

Another thing we could have done if we had been in the House of Commons during that time and if there had been exaggerated claims on either the oui or the non side, we would have been here to bring about a bit of check and balance. We could have said: "Whoa, just a minute. That is not quite correct", and we could have played that kind of mediator, arbitrator, judgmental role and I say it in a positive sense. Because we will be gone, we will not be able to do that.

I would like to complete my remarks by simply saying the following. I congratulate the students and the universities who will be involved with the Unity Train with regard to the constitutional proposals and with respect to referendum day. I think it is a wonderful initiative and I am particularly delighted that it is the young people who are meeting this head on. I call upon the young people of Canada to make sure that those who are older than they are do not let them down. I want them to stand up and to speak out for this great country.

We of a certain age tend to see the world perhaps somewhat differently than the young people do. I hope they will stand up and tell us what they think. I hope they will do so with a generosity, a spirit and an openness of heart and mind that will motivate their parents and those older than them to see the world a bit more from their perspective. I think very often they see much more clearly than we do.

I also want to commend the Ethnocultural Council of Canada for having said yes. I recognize that they have certain concerns. I hope we will make a genuine attempt to respond to those.

I want to point out how delighted I was to have received a fax message from a little organization qui s'appelle réseau. Translated I think it would be network.

[Translation]

It is a Manitoba women's group that speaks for women who are ready to say yes to these constitutional proposals, knowing that there are always weaknesses, with this accord or any other. They are looking at the whole thing and thinking of Canada's future. They told me and the others that they would support the agreement.

I will conclude with a wish.

[English]

My wish is that when the Government of Canada returns, when the House of Commons reconvenes that the government will have an economic blueprint, a developmental plan that will give hope to Canadiansm, and hopefully that will be done subsequent to a yes vote on October 26, un vote pour le oui, and we can start rebuilding this great nation and ensuring that it remains number one in the world.

[Translation]

I am now ready to answer questions.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I compliment my colleague from St. Boniface on his remarks. I believe that he has touched upon something that many Canadians are talking about right across the country, not just our youth. I know in my riding I am experiencing a lot of difficulty because of how many people feel about all the elements of the entente or the accord, whatever you want to call it, the consensus report. It is not an accord obviously because none of the premiers really signed it.

I am beginning to sense a real backlash in the city of Toronto. I make no apologies for having my own doubts about it.

I noticed I was not recorded as abstaining the night of the vote. I did not quite understand that. If we do not explain all elements of the accord, and if all of a sudden a sense of distrust builds in the community, then the vote the Prime Minister wants is not going to be achieved.

At this time I am not sure if I agree with the Prime Minister's proposal. I am concerned about something and would like to ask my colleague a question. I agree with the idea of the referendum. I agree with the sovereignty of the people, but do you not think the accord will be in danger unless we explain all elements of the accord and what they mean, and stop branding Canadians as anti–Canadian if they decide they do not agree with the accord.

Mr. Duhamel: I thank my colleague for his comments and his question.

Yes, we must explain the accord. The great challenge is to explain it so that Canadians believe whoever happens to be explaining it is telling the truth.

That is a real problem because politicians from all political parties are really quite suspect at all levels of government. I said a few days ago I hoped somehow we might have a third party say, this is what it is all about. That is not as easy as it sounds either, because there are third parties who think rather differently.

There has to be a sincere attempt to explain it the way it is, not oversimplified and yet not overcomplicated. It is essential for people to realize there has been a sincere attempt by the first ministers of this country with the four aboriginal leaders and the leaders of the two largest opposition parties, to come forward with a set of proposals that have a reasonable chance of responding to the grievances of Canadians. There is no guarantee. That is the message I personally want to get across. I will try to explain it as objectively as I can. I will try to say I am not sure I could have a better deal. I would love to say with honesty that I could have, but I do not believe I necessarily could have under the circumstances. This is a fair attempt to bring the country together.

I called upon the young people of Canada to stand up and make sure their views were heard, because they tend to see the world perhaps a bit more clearly with fewer biases. I recall an elderly person who called me and said she hoped we politicians were not about to start destroying what Canadians have worked so long to build. I asked this person to stand up as well and contact her friends so the seniors could remind us what we have.

Perhaps it would be a coalition of as many people as possible. The young and those who are older could get together and try to build a bridge to ensure this country continues.

If we do not get the information out clearly, quickly and in a way that is understood, and if people just lay back and say it does not matter, then I really fear for our country because it does matter.

I am going to vote yes. I pray it will never happen, but if this country does not stay together, I want to be able to go to bed every night and say I did what I could. I said yes, to try to keep my country together.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my colleague a question related to the economy.

The Prime Minister of Canada said in this House two days ago the Constitution and the economy are co–mingled. I agree with the Prime Minister. I think that was factually correct.

• (1700)

The problem I have is that right now the economy of this country is in the intensive care room from coast to coast. It seems to me when the economy is in this shape, to shut down the nation's boardroom is totally irresponsible. There are situations evolving week to week and day to day. Never mind the low interest rates because there is not a bank in Canada right now that is helping small and medium sized businesses. The minister does not have to listen to me. He can go out and talk to small businesses across this country. We can have 5 per cent interest rates, but if the banks will not lend it out what good is it?

The Conservatives look at the interest rates but they do not see what is going on in the country. In my city where there are 600,000 people out of work they wonder why we are shutting this place down.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 5 p.m., pursuant to an order made earlier this day, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put all questions necessary to dispose of the amendment moved by the government and the motion.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the yeas have it.

An hon. member: On division.

Amendment agreed to.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The next vote is on the main motion.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Some hon. members: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried on division.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to an order made earlier this day, the House shall now proceed to debate the subject matter of Government Business No. 12. There are three minutes remaining in the questions and comments.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for my colleague from St. Boniface. It has to do with the economy and is very specific.

We are asking the people of Canada to trust this government over the next 30 days. We are asking them to trust that this document is great.

Do you think it is right to ask the people of Canada to trust this government when it is shutting this place down and our economy is in such disastrous shape?

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I certainly could not say I have been asked to trust the government over the next 30 days, and I do not say that in a partisan way.

The Prime Minister, the first ministers of this nation, the two leaders of the opposition, and the four aboriginal leaders have asked us to trust that this is a reasonable option.

With all due respect to my colleagues, and I have great admiration for some of them, I could not trust the government if it was their document. The document has been endorsed by all the other parties and therefore I am willing to say it has a reasonable chance.

I do not like the idea we are leaving. I hope we can come back if we need to. I agree there are two sides to this coin, the Constitution and the economy, and I use the following analogy.

If my wife and children were in a situation where they thought they might want to leave me, I would have a lot of difficulty worrying about my job. On the other hand, just because I have a good job does not mean to say they are going to stay with me.

There are two sides to this coin and I think we have to deal with this referendum, but we need to deal with the economic situation the moment we get back. It is critical we do so because whatever we gain on October 26 will be lost, assuming we get a yes vote.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak on this adjournment debate as well. I want to state a number of concerns on behalf of my constituents.

Last week in New Westminster I attended a memorial service honouring Pauline Jewett, who was my predecessor here in the House of Commons for my riding. She represented her constituency before me with pride, commitment to this country and honour. Sadly she passed away this summer.

At that memorial service I reflected on Pauline's career and her tremendous accomplishments serving the people of Canada and the constituents of our riding. Many of those accomplishments originated right here in this Chamber.

I also reflected on Pauline Jewett's vision of our country. Pauline was first and foremost a committed Canadian. She loved and believed in the potential of this country. She believed in the potential of our people. She believed in the Canadian gift of understanding and, as some say, the Canadian gift of tolerance. Yet today the constituents from the riding Pauline represented, the constituents of New Westminster—Burnaby, like those in every other riding in Canada have grown increasingly disillusioned about this country and our federal government.

I find the vision of hope and tolerance Pauline Jewett identified as the Canadian way has now been pushed to its limits. At the very time this country should be stepping forward, it threatens to step back and I ask why. What has happened?

The answer lies in the sad legacy of this federal government and the harmful policies it has been pursuing in our country. The fact is that Canadians feel deserted by their federal government. But when I look back on the federal government policies I have seen implemented in this House in the last four years, I understand why Canadians feel this way. I understand why my constituents are so concerned, because I see the effects of the Conservative government policy and the residue of past Liberal administrations right in my own community, at home in New Westminster—Burnaby.

I am concerned for my constituents when I see the federal government sign the North American free trade deal. Without any debate in this House of Commons, a tripartite agreement has been signed. For my constituents in New Westminster—Burnaby this means productive working people who form the very foundation of our economy could now be competing with Mexican workers who earn less than a dollar an hour.

I am concerned for my constituents when I watch the federal government make Canadian jobs our number one export, thanks to the trade deal they negotiated with the United States.

For the constituents of New Westminster—Burnaby, many of whom work in the forest industry, this deal has meant they have had to witness the Tory government stand by while the U.S. slaps restrictive countervailing duties on our wood products. Yet when we tried to rectify this disastrous mistake, when we on this side of the House put forth a motion to end this loss in the workforce, what happened? Both the Liberals and the Conservatives voted against us. The trade deal continues and the job losses continue.

I am concerned for my constituents when I note that thanks to federal government policy we have record unemployment. Food banks have been our only growth industry. My constituents in British Columbia look to the government for help in retraining and for job creation programs. To these people who want to work this government says its fight is with inflation, it has no money to create jobs or it cannot do anything to stimulate the economy.

I am also concerned this federal government has made huge cuts in transfer payments to the province of British Columbia. The federal government has produced propaganda documents like Learning well, living well and Prosperity through competitiveness, which encourage Canadians to seek further education. At the same time these documents are produced, our children are being turned away from universities, from colleges and from vocational schools right across this country.

When the need for post-secondary education has never been higher, Douglas College in my riding has had to turn away record numbers of potential students, students who qualified, because the federal government is not backing up its competitive rhetoric with competitive dollars.

I am very concerned that this federal government has also cut the federal co-op housing program and cut back drastically on social housing programs. In my riding many residents of Burnaby and New Westminster will now remain on waiting lists for affordable housing. This decision means the loss of thousands of jobs building new units and renovating housing. It comes at a time when housing has never been more expensive for the average resident.

The residents and the workers of New Westminster—Burnaby are concerned for the Fraser River which flows right through our community. We have learned recently that the changes made in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans policy, mismanagement, and the lack of enforcement have contributed to the disappearance of 1 million salmon from our salmon stocks in the Fraser River.

I was pleased to hear, just as I entered the Chamber, that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has named Peter Pearce and Peter Larkin to head an investigation on these missing sockeye salmon. We must resolve the discrepancies in the numbers of fish entering the river, reported catches and the number of fish that made it to the spawning grounds. Those numbers are so much lower than expected. We must ascertain why these sockeye runs did not meet the projections that we were told about.

This is one of B.C.'s major industries. We cannot afford in British Columbia to have happen to the salmon fishery what has happened to the cod fishery in Newfoundland.

What about taxes? My constituents, like all constituents in Canada, are upset about their increasing tax burden. Unfortunately I must tell them some simple truths about this government and its priorities. The sad reality is that instead of lessening the tax burden of hard working individuals, this government has chosen to help others.

This federal government allows business entertainment deductions costing taxpayers $1 billion a year. This federal government continues a Liberal loophole which allows Canada's wealthiest families to hide assets from taxation in private trusts. This federal government continues to shift the tax burden away from profitable corporations on to the backs of hard working individual taxpayers. This is a shameful record.

Finally, the constituents of New Westminster—Burnaby do not understand how this federal government can spend $4.5 billion on 50 submarine hunting helicopters and yet at the same time tell us that there is no money to build our crumbling infrastructures right across this country.

I received a letter from the mayor and councillors in Burnaby expressing their concern for our community's aging infrastructure and pointing out exactly that $4.5 billion for helicopters could be much better spent on building up Canada's infrastructures.

There is also no money, we are told, to help the unemployed retrain and find work, no money to help the disadvantaged have access, no money for single parents to have child care and no money for women to have equality. We are told there is no money to put food in the mouths of the hungry. Yesterday we saw the end of Canada's first universal social program. We saw the end of the family allowance program in this country. Again the reason was no money.

At the very time that Canada needs to step forward, at the very time Canada really wants to step forward, at the very time we need modern solutions to complex problems, this country's modern needs are being remedied by Conservative witch doctor economic theories that already have failed with previous Liberal administrations and have already failed in other countries in the world under Thatcher and Reagan.

Is it any wonder that my constituents in New Westminister—Burnaby are concerned? What this government must understand is that the Canadian people are an investment. They have worth. They have value. Yet some here with the power to make a difference choose not to.

I am appalled when I hear this federal government say it can do nothing more to help Canadians. I am appalled that this government does not invest in our most precious resource, our people, our children. I am appalled that other party leaders choose to say nothing and offer no solutions merely because they are ahead in some polls.

When they choose to do nothing, they do not deserve to be our federal government. We do not want governments that choose to simply shrug their shoulders or leaders who keep their heads ducked low. We do not want governments that choose to turn their backs on all but a few. We do not want governments that choose to sell our sovereignty.

The constituents of New Westminster—Burnaby want to see a society that is the sum of all its parts, not just a few big cogs. They believe a society is judged by how it treats all its people, not just the privileged few and they believe the federal government has a moral obligation to help to empower Canadians and to help those who are unable to empower themselves.

To do so, we ask that the tax burden be shifted off the backs of those who work the hardest, suffer the most and are the hardest hit. We want to protect those social policies which are the foundation of our national identity, like medicare, pensions and the universality of all of our programs.

We want a federal government that will fight each and every day for women's equality, for eliminating violence, for ensuring pay equity, for breast cancer research, for reproductive choice and for electing more women here to the House of Commons.

The federal government cannot be detached from its policies. The government cannot be ignorant of the human face to the numbers that it crunches. There are essential issues in our society which must be addressed. These are issues such as jobs, social programs and the environment which require immediate attention.

These are the key issues that, when we return to this House of Commons, we must all address.

We are adjourning tonight. Many of us are going back to our communities in order to work on the referendum. The majority of us in this House will be working on the yes side of the referendum. I sincerely hope that when we return in November we are still talking about the national dream that is Canada, the national dream that we hope to leave for our children who follow us.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great care to my hon. friend's intervention in this debate.

I appreciated first of all her reference to her distinguished predecessor whom we will all miss. I had the privilege of serving in one Parliament with the late Pauline Jewett and developed an immense respect for her and for her respect for the truth even when the truth hurt her own cause.

I wanted to ask my hon. friend a couple of questions about some points that she made in her speech, the first with reference to the North American free trade agreement which she suggested had been signed without debate in the House. That is substantially true but it is the normal pattern of treaties which the Government of Canada enters into.

My hon. friend was here in December 1988 when we debated the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement. We had extensive debate prior to the November 21 election and we could say that was the free trade election.

I can forecast for my hon. friend that there will be a very extensive debate on that subject once the treaty comes for ratification to our Parliament and to those of the other two participating countries.

I do hear from parliamentary colleagues in Mexico and they are puzzled. They ask why a social democratic party in Canada would be opposed to the idea of a partnership with a country such as theirs which is seeking to bring itself closer to the economic level of Canada and the United States. Would that not be good for all of us and would this treaty not provide for it?

• (1720)

I believe the treaty would provide it, but that social democratic party, being my friend opposite's party, seems to take the view that immediately there would be something of an unlimited labour pool among the three countries and that we would be competing with Mexican wage rates. My hon. friend made that very point. She said that we would be competing with Mexican workers who are being paid $1 an hour. My understanding of the treaty is that would not be the case at all. It would be a partnership.

My second point is that my hon. friend said there had been huge cuts in transfer payments to British Columbia. I do not believe that to be the case. I believe what has happened is that the rate of increase of the transfer payments to British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario is being held at 5 per cent.

Does my friend, being a good social democrat, not agree with the principle that the wealthier provinces, her province, mine and the province of Ontario, have a responsibility to accept a slightly lower rate of increase—and 5 per cent is not bad in these times—so that more can be allocated to the poorer provinces, which is the case?

My final point is with reference to Bill C–80, which passed the House yesterday. The reason for the changes in those family benefits is not that there is no more money. In fact, $2.1 billion more in family benefits is being allocated under these changes so that there will be $500 more per family per year for the working poor in Canada. In the spirit of the late Pauline Jewett, I am sure that my hon. friend would see it as her duty to convey those truths to her constituents.

Ms. Black: Mr. Speaker, my friend opposite raised a number of points that he listened to when I was speaking and took issue with. I would say in terms of the trade deal with the United States there was debate in this country and in this Chamber before this free trade deal was signed with the United States. There was an election, he is right, fought on mainly that one issue. There was debate in every region of this country. There was discussion in town halls, at political meetings and everywhere across the land. It captured the national news every night.

In the case of the North American free trade deal, there has not been any of that discussion. There has not been an opportunity in the House to debate this issue. There has not been an opportunity for the people of Canada to debate this issue. I am confident that having had the experience in Canada, the last four years of the trade deal with the United States, Canadians do not want the North American free trade agreement. That is why this government is spending so much money now on propaganda on this deal, advertising on radio and television. It knows Canadians have experienced first hand the effects of the trade de al that this government signed with the U.S. They have experienced huge job losses. Up to a half a million manufacturing jobs have disappeared from this country, some of which have been replaced with jobs in the service sector; McJobs, flipping McHamburgers. Canadians know they do not want to continue on that course.

I would agree with the member in terms of working in the underdeveloped world to raise the standards of living there. I would agree with him if this deal had anything at all to do with that but it does not. The European model, in which are shared common standards and common wages, is altogether different than this North American free trade agreement. The European model does have something to go for in that venue. It will set minimum wages and minimum standards in the environment. The North American free trade deal includes none of that.

The member spoke about the transfer payments to my province of British Columbia, the cutbacks. There have been cutbacks; $166 million less has gone to the province of British Columbia for health care alone by the changes that this government made in the Canada Assistance Plan. I want to tell the member opposite when he talks about sharing with Canadians, British Columbians have shared with the rest of Canada since we entered Confederation and British Columbians are committed to the principle of sharing across this land.

However, the poor in British Columbia are just as poor as the poor in any other section of this country and the battered women in British Columbia are just as black and blue and beaten as the battered women in other parts of this country. They are deserving of the support of this government in terms of transfer payments. It is a very weak argument that he presents.

Family allowance is our oldest universal social program. In 1984 the Prime Minister of this country said that universal social programs were a sacred trust, not to be tampered with. This is tampering with a capital T. It is eliminating the universality of the family allowance program. The new child benefit program is not indexed to the cost of inflation and will be worth less and less every year with fewer and fewer families being able to benefit from it in future years.

It is the Machiavellian plan of this government to cover fewer and fewer families as the years go by. At the beginning of the new year, 1993, suddenly some families will receive a bit more in monthly support payments. However, what those families do not understand is that at the end of the year when they probably would be expecting the child tax credits and other credits through the income tax system, those will no longer exist.

I would bet right now with the hon. member that he will have had his election before the folks find out the truth of this program.

Mrs. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to speak in the House before it is adjourned.

This has been a short session of Parliament, but perhaps may have been one of the most important. With the debate of the referendum question and the approval it received in both Houses, Canadians from coast to coast to coast must now do some soul-searching in preparation for the October 26 referendum.

We must look deep into the soul of our nation, see its true value and see it for what it truly is. It is a gift that we cannot afford to lose.

I have voiced my support for the referendum question and my acceptance of the Charlottetown accord reached on August 28. I stand firm in my belief that the constitutional deal reached by federal, provincial and territorial governments and the representatives of aboriginal Canadians is not a perfect deal, but it is a deal that will allow us, as Canadians, the opportunity to reorder our constitutional priorities in a way that will reflect better who and what we are as a nation and, most important, what we will become.

I am committed to return to my riding to campaign for the referendum, urging my constituents to vote yes. As a member of the Western Arctic, I am satisfied that the aspirations of northerners and aboriginal peoples will be met through this agreement as it has not been done before.

We now have the inherent right to self-government and the pre-1982 conditions for the creation of new provinces. I am very proud to say that northerners and aboriginal peoples have made a significant contribution to what will become the renewal of Canada. The great white north is a unique place and is truly Canadian. Canada is a northern country.

A young friend of mine named John Bethel from Edmonton once told me that the very first time he ever went to the north was when he truly felt Canadian. He was on his first trip to the north. I have travelled from coast to coast to coast in this country and I am always reminded of how very few Canadians have ever experienced the north, and conversely, how very few northerners have ever experienced other parts of Canada. If you leave it to Canadians to discover one another, a lot of comradeship and a lot of loyalty to the country is expressed.

The north, in and of itself, is untouched and its overwhelming beauty is something we want to share. Its rugged geography is something that challenges the physical ability of any Canadian that ventures into the north. The pure, clean air and the respectful relationships that northerners have with the land and nature is something to be shared with this country.

• (1730)

While there is a possibility that the constitutional crisis may be over, this is not true of the economic crisis. For people living in the north, where is the road to economic recovery? Where is the road to resources that Diefenbaker started? Not one mile has been added since we have had this new government.

This does not seem to be the government that has the answers for our country or for our part of the country. Highway infrastructures remain to be put in place and the impending airline merger will deliver but another devastating blow to an already fragile economy.

Northerners remain isolated from the rest of Canada, from the mainstream transportation routes and economy. Northerners do not have the luxury of choosing between the bus, the train and even travel on the highway by car from one community to another as most other Canadians do. Many times we are solely dependant on the airlines.

We cannot afford to isolate our communities, cut off our economic business and tourism ties and decrease our standard of living. The government must ensure Canadians, especially northerners, that air travel will remain accessible and affordable. It is and should be for Canadians living in the remote regions of this country a very basic guarantee.

Because the House is adjourning, I would also like to focus on another critical issue that affects my riding, I would like to take the opportunity to urge the government to take the necessary and responsible action to bring about an end to the Giant gold mine strike in Yellowknife. The strike is now reaching into its fourth month. There has been violence and extensive vandalism. People are losing their homes and their families are suffering. There is many a sad story to tell of homes that are now vacant, of the lost dreams of those people who wanted to make the north their home. Those people are no longer in the north. They have gone elsewhere to look for other opportunities because they had no choice. This unhealthy atmosphere is affecting the whole community of Yellowknife and its local economy.

The union wants to get back to the bargaining table and the workers want to get back to work. There is no mediator. The mediator flew the coop. Management refuses to move on the dispute. These people need assistance and federal government intervention.

At one point I asked for anti–replacement worker legislation. The most provocative thing to do in a strike is to bring in replacement workers. It undercuts the morality and the ethics of a good workplace regime. We asked for a meeting with the minister and were refused. We have now asked for an industrial disputes inquiry. A resolution is urgently needed. We cannot afford in our already fragile economy another situation that will affect individuals, their families and their children.

As this House adjourns, the First Nations people have made great progress in this constitutional round of talks but there are many outstanding issues that have to be dealt with. The government continues to overlook a very critical aboriginal issue.

If members remember, in the summer of 1990 we had the Oka crisis. Many Canadians thought we had closed the door on the Oka crisis but they should know that it has not been resolved. This government continues to stall in its efforts to expedite a solution to the long–standing issue of purchasing property south of Route 344 in the village of Oka in exchange for the Pines.

The inability of this government to settle the issue contradicts and reneges on the Prime Minister's promise to consult with aboriginal peoples and respect for the fiduciary responsibilities of the Crown toward them will be built in the process from the start. This the Prime Minister outlined in his four main pillars. This is not a real estate deal as may be the intention of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Minister of State for Indian Affairs and Northern Development. This is a land settlement and the federal government must uphold its fiduciary responsibilities and resume a fair negotiation process as had been agreed to in the framework agenda.

The conflict between all parties involved must be resolved so that the relationship may be re-established to discuss issues that are so important to the community of Kanesatake, such as the issues of justice and policing, and much needed and promised funding to establish a healing program. The crisis was such that the community needs this healing program urgently. The department has yet to deliver on its commitment for funding.

I want to deal with another issue that has a direct reference to the Canada clause. The Canada clause states:

> the aboriginal peoples of Canada, being the first peoples to govern this land, have the right to promote their languages, cultures and traditions and to ensure the integrity of their societies, and their governments constitute one of three orders of government in Canada;

In effect, this statement renders the requirement of the extinguishment clause outdated.

The extinguishment clause is extremely divisive and should be abolished, if not for its contradiction to the Canada clause then for the moral and legal travesty that it is.

In my community and in my riding there was a major comprehensive claim that failed. One of the reasons the claim failed was that people were asked to cede, release and surrender their aboriginal rights and claims to their land, in fact all of their rights. This is totally unacceptable. What has happened now is that we have a very fragmented process in which smaller groups are going for regional claims within which there are further divisions, in some of them not in all of them.

The human rights commissioner said two years ago: "It is not an exchange. Whichever way you cut it, it is extinguishment. It is the release, the surrendering and ceding of rights".

It is an outdated, colonialist method of governing and it is unacceptable in light of the intent of the Canada clause, as well as the over-all agreement.

The federal government, specifically the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs and the Department of the Environment, must also uphold its responsibility to support the hunters and trappers of Canada. The government has done nothing to support the Indigenous Survival International group, which has put forward a proposal to the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs that has not been responded to. It has asked for money to train trappers on humane ways of trapping. The British Parliament, which is in another country, has a lot of impact on what happens to our hunters and trappers.

The British Parliament has identified 13 species to go on the endangered species list. Twelve of them are Canadian and have a direct reference to how aboriginal and northern Canadian trappers will maintain their livelihood.

There is a need to educate and inform aboriginal trappers and others of the potential implications for all trappers that may result from the European ban.

Aboriginal trappers need an opportunity to make informed decisions about their future involvement in the fur trade. If not, they may be placed at a disadvantage in comparison to their non-native counterparts, who are better organized and better informed. Both DIAND and the Department of the Environment must play a key role in the education process.

I believe that we have reached a critical juncture in Canada, a point at which we will never be again if a no vote prevails. We have reached the point at which we are now by consensus. The chemistry of individual leaders and heads of governments will never be at the same point it was at in Charlottetown.

We have gone beyond the point of debate. I know in my heart and in my mind as a Canadian and as a responsible politician that it is time for the question to be put forward to the Canadian people. Thus we have the referendum.

The referendum is about choice. People will have the opportunity to take possession of the future of their country. I know this in my heart because there have been a number of times throughout the constitutional process that I have stood alone on a number of issues. I stood alone when we discussed the issue of the Triple-E Senate, because there was not always unanimous consent.

I stood alone on the creation of new provinces because not everybody believed in a bilateral process. I stood alone in questioning the issue of distinct society because even months ago, six to seven months ago, people thought the debate was over. I felt as one individual that I fought hard during that opportunity given to me to make the appropriate changes. I feel the time for debate is over, because this country now needs a yes.

• (1740)

I also stood alone when we talked about massive decentralization of powers to the provinces because I felt, as a strong federalist, that I could not see the emasculation of government and the gutting of the core of our government. I am a believer in a strong central government, but I believe the time for debate has lapsed. The time to fight was during all those conferences, the first ministers' meetings, committee meetings, and high-level negotiations. Now is not the time for debate, now is the time for decision making.

We have gone through numerous rounds on the Constitution. Now is not the time to question the details, because I believe the minor deficiencies of this deal do not outweigh the total good that it will do for this country. I believe that we will not ever again reach a point at which as many people who are responsible for negotiating and making those decisions will come to the same mind on these issues. I believe that we can do a lot worse, and we may if a no vote prevails.

I believe that because I have been there. I believe that because I have taken a stand on principle, because I believed in a strong central government, because I was willing to hold tight to the belief that a Triple-E Senate spelled fairness and equality for all provinces in this country and in all parts of this country.

That time has gone. This is not a debate about the past, this is a debate about the future. Now is when our country needs a yes, when the north needs a yes, when the future generations of Canadian men and women depend on a yes, and when aboriginal peoples in Canada need a yes. I believe in my heart that a no vote is a no to all the things that I have aspired to since I became an elected politician.

I have worked hard because, inasmuch as I fundamentally disagreed with the Meech Lake accord, I felt that politics is the art of the possible. If it were possible to amend Meech Lake I was willing to accept Meech and amend it. It was never amended, the amendments did not pass. We had failure during Meech Lake.

I look at this deal and I see Meech plus, I see Meech amended. It has the criteria for me and for what I was given and mandated to do when I was sent to Parliament to achieve constitutionally. It has done that for me I believe, in terms of how I fit into Canada as a politician, how the people in my riding fit into this. We have achieved something far greater than we were able to achieve in previous rounds. I do not believe that I as an aboriginal woman, for instance, can put my own individual rights ahead of the collective rights of my people.

There is a no committee of aboriginal women. I believe that no and that injunction they seek flies in the face of everything that I have worked for, along with aboriginal men in leadership, along with other men, along with other leaders, along with all the people who have struggled to reach this critical point. We are at a juncture at which we cannot go backward, we must go forward.

If we say no to Canada, if we say no to this deal, we say no to the opportunity for our people to better themselves, for our people to become autonomous, for our people to have the dignity, the respect and the equality to make their own mistakes after 125 years. We say no to the Northwest Territories that has gained a concession it wanted. It has gained something. It has gained the opportunity to become a province if it so desires on a fair and equal basis.

This country is a great country, but the instruments of governing are not perfect. People who run governments, leaders who head governments, are not perfect. We as a conglomerate of individuals who constitute Parliament are not perfect. We try to find the highest level of consensus. We try to find common ground.

This is one time when I appeal to the people of Canada. If they vote no they vote no to many of the things that we have achieved. We have not achieved everything and we may have lost some things, but I think the gain is far greater than the loss.

I appeal to people in the north, because not coming out to vote is like a no vote. It delegitimizes the right to speak out afterward. They feel their rights have been sold out. They should come out and express that because a referendum is about choice.

I think it is equally devastating when people do not vote. So Canada, I appeal to you to vote, come out and vote. Remember that this question is bigger than one individual. It is bigger than one group. It is all of the components of what constitutes Canada. I ask you on October 26 to come out and vote yes.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

FORESTRY AND FISHERIES

AUTHORIZATION FOR COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I know you are a good navigator, you have just demonstrated it.

I think you would find there is unanimous consent for the following motion:

> That, five members and two staff persons of the Standing Committee on Forestry and Fisheries be authorized to travel to British Columbia for three days in November or December in relation to a study on west coast fisheries issues.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I want to indicate that we on this side of the House in the Official Opposition, the Liberal Party, give consent to the motion in a magnanimous way.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I would confirm that we support the motion, in particular because one of our colleagues, in fact, called for the trip during Question Period earlier this week.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Mifflin): Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Mifflin): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION TO ADJOURN

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre (p. 13284); and the amendment of Mr. Edwards (p. 13278).

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I feel it is important to speak on this debate.

Frankly I feel the Canadian people are being severely short-changed by their government and by their Parliament. We in the opposition feel that the duty to Canadians is not being adhered to at a time when this country is experiencing difficulties greater than any difficulties it has experienced since the Second World War.

We have sat for the better part of two weeks. It is the government's intention to resume the sitting of the House on November 16, which will mean that we will be sitting for one month prior to the Christmas break and House rules state that we will not be coming back until after February 1.

It means that in the past seven months of this time of trouble and uncertainty for this country, this House will have sat six weeks. I cannot condone that. As a parliamentarian I feel we are making a terrible, terrible mistake.

Canada's attitude to politicians is bad enough now. I would venture to say in the minds of Canadians that politicians have now slipped behind loan sharks in their estimation. We are going to sit for six weeks in seven months at a time when this country is looking for direction, is looking for answers, and is looking for cohesion and leadership to deal with the serious—and I cannot stress that too much—problems of this country. We are abandoning, we are jettisoning our responsibility. Our House leader stated, and I agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond completely, that we recognize the importance of the referendum debate. We must win this referendum debate. We must keep this country together. If we do not win the referendum debate, and to anyone who feels he or she wants to vote no, then I say to that person, conceptualize in your mind where you see your province after the referendum because certainly it is going to mean the break-up of Canada.

• (1750)

That is not defeatist. I do not feel I am defeatist. I did not support Meech Lake because I did not think it was a complete analysis and consideration of what we needed in this country. Not having supported Meech Lake, I want to say right now that we are on a precipice. We must decide whether we want to keep this country together.

I say that as an Atlantic Canadian. I defy anybody to see in that proposal anything for Atlantic Canada. Atlantic Canadians are great Canadians. They are true Canadians. They have fought in two world wars, the Korean conflict and have continued to support this great country. They will continue to do so.

Atlantic Canadians recognize that the time has come not to say to this government that we support your thinking because Canadians do not support this government's thinking. The time has not come to say to the premiers that we think they are doing a great job because we do not think they are doing a great job.

The time has come when Canadians want to say we believe that this once again can be the country we know it can be. Even with this government's attempt to suppress its greatness, it is still the greatest country in the world. The potential for further greatness lies only in leadership and caring by its elected government. This can come with a change of government.

Most of all, what Canadians are now saying is that we need, each one of us in our hearts and together, to recognize that we need to save this country, that unless we together can support this country, it is going to split apart.

This is not something mechanical, a piece of paper, a little piece of inventory. Watch the national news concerning Yugoslavia and what is happening to that once great country. I am not saying Canada is going to be another Yugoslavia, but I am saying that the greatest sickness in this world is not AIDS, it is not heart problems, it is not cancer. It is prejudice. It is prejudice and sometimes fear.

When we combine the fear of the unknown, the fear of uncertainty with the baser instincts of humanity, we are going to have an ugly situation and we are going to go from something that is sublime to something that is ridiculous. We are going to go from the greatest country in the world to something that is not going to be even a reasonable facsimile of what this country is at the present time.

I say to people who have watched the news and who have seen the dead eyes of the children in Somalia, who have seen the parents of these children not being able to move because they are too weak, who now cannot live even with nourishment. They have done this so that all the food that they have possessed will go to their children. Their children are walking orphaned.

There is a story of a young boy, 8 years old, and his sister, 12, who left their parents because their parents could not even move. They walked toward the camp in Kenya. Somewhere along the way the boy and the sister became separated. Two weeks later that eight year old boy walked into the camp in Kenya.

We can mount a sophisticated, complete and utter devastating war such as the one we waged in Iraq and yet we cannot get food to starving people in Somalia because we say the government is on our side; we have to be careful of the warring factions and people are stealing it.

I say those excuses are not good enough. We in the Canadian Parliament are showing our concern for our country, for the economy and for the world picture. We are adjourning. We are going to sit for six weeks and seven months. Boy that is dedication, that is really getting involved in what is happening in this country and what is happening in our world. It is a disgrace.

We would agree to pair with the government. We would even agree to there being only 10 people on each side of the House. If members feel they have to be in their ridings—and we all have to be at some point to negotiate and to win this referendum—then for heaven's sake we encourage them to go there. We encourage them to become involved in this tremendously important debate, but we say keep the House going. There are other concerns.

We now have an international monetary crisis. Because of the problems in Germany and because of the cost and the inflation resulting from incorporating 17 million additional Germans into the whole German Republic, there is now inflation in Germany. It has raised its bank rate. Money is flowing from the other European countries into Germany because the investors get a higher return on the money they are investing. There is a tremendous drain of capital from Britain, Italy, France and the other countries in the European Common Market. They are in a state of financial chaos. Hopefully it will be resolved very shortly, but it will hurt Canada and the United States because money is international. It transcends borders; it transcends governments. It is a very touchy thing.

Our interest rates were at their lowest point two weeks ago and were really no stimulation to our economy. Manufacturers are just hanging by their fingertips, hoping this recession will soon end. They are hoping they can withstand the recession, and when the economy starts to go up they can start planning for the future. They are worried. They were worried even when we had our lowest interest rates. Now that the interest rates are going up, it is going to discourage a great many of these people.

It is going to worry those who have to renew mortgages, although our mortgage rates now are lower than they have been for some time. These are concerns that we have to address because we are the Government of Canada. We are the people representing Canadians. We have to be able to address these concerns. Things come up so quickly and they have to be addressed.

Canadians do not even feel comfortable in our large cities in being able to walk the streets. Yet what are we doing? The Minister of Justice promised us new legislation concerning young offenders. Are we going to be able to deal with it in the six weeks we have before February 1? Are we going to be able to do this or is it once again going to be another stall? Is it going to be another pronouncement that is going to try to entice the Canadian people into thinking the government is doing something when in effect it is doing absolutely nothing at all. It cannot do anything if it is not here.

What about urban crime? What about the prevention of crime? What are we going to do? We hope that the Standing Committee on Justice will pursue this in November. The minister has planned a symposium for March at which he wants to hear feedback. We have child pornography in Canada, we have prostitution, we have 10 and 11 year olds taking guns to school and we are going to want to get some feedback in March on these problems. Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that is not performance. That is not serving the needs of the Canadian public. How can we serve these needs when we are only going to be here for six weeks out of a total of seven months? This is incredible. We want to deal with the referendum, but we do not want to jettison our responsibility for every other concern that the Canadian people have. Is this government saying that it can only deal with the referendum, that it cannot walk and chew gum at the same time? This is incredible, absolutely incredible.

The people in Atlantic Canada are not going to be satisfied with this. We are going to have the worst winter in Atlantic Canada that we have had in my memory. We have had, even with this House sitting, the government turning its back on us. We have had the fisheries collapse. We have had the tourist industry drastically, drastically reduced. We had the government take away our passenger rail service in eastern Nova Scotia and now it wants to sell the rail line to the private sector in eastern Nova Scotia. It has cut back our airline service drastically.

Mr. Milliken: It is selling Canada down the drain.

Mr. MacLellan: It has allowed the container boats to leave Halifax in large numbers. It has completely ignored the needs of our post-secondary education and our health care when dealing with transfer payments and equalization payments.

Mr. O'Kurley: That is not true. That is just not true.

Mr. MacLellan: It has. The reason is that it is convenient. We have only 32 seats in Atlantic Canada. The government can say: "We do not have to worry about Atlantic Canada because it does not have that many seats". I am telling you that the people in Atlantic Canada are first-class Canadians. There is only one level of Canadian in this country and that is first-class Canadian.

As soon as we recognize and we dictate a group of our Canadian public to be second-class Canadian citizens, we are abandoning the principle role of Canada that all people are equal. People who have been here for four or five generations, people who have just arrived in this country, people who live on the east or west coast, the northern territories and central Canada, all Canadians are equal. That is not the way it is becoming. That is not the way this country is being run at the present time.

Mr. Milliken: We should have an election.

Mr. MacLellan: There is an elitism that just permeates the establishment in this country and the greater number of Canadians are gradually, gradually falling away from the prime level of importance in the eyes of this government. Oh, sure there are overtures made for instance that there are going to be things done in our justice system: We are going to deal with urban crime; we are going to deal with the Young Offenders Act; and we are going to deal with poverty and unemployment. But we cannot deal with those if we are only going to be here for six weeks out of seven months. We cannot deal with them if the House is not sitting even if this government wanted to.

We cannot afford it. There is more than one way of a country completely decaying. Constitutionally is only one. Neglect for those in need is another. There is neglect for the regions which depend and want the assistance of their federal government and the people who cannot help themselves. The people of this country are now being told that their needs are listened to but because of the debt we cannot help them. I am telling you that it was not the poor and the disadvantaged in this country who caused the debt. It was politicians. I will be absolutely clear that the poor and disadvantaged in this country should not pay the price for the mistakes of the politicians in Canada. However, these mistakes and these needs cannot be addressed if this House is not sitting to deal with them. How are we going to deal with them if we are not here?

I wish the government and all parties well in the referendum. I just hope and pray that we will be successful. It is vital, but there are other things too. They may not be coming to a head, they may not be coming to a focus in the next five or six weeks, but they too are vital. Although they may not have the immediacy, they are vital because they represent the needs of Canadians. If these needs are allowed to slip and if they are put off, Canadians suffer and Canada suffers. The fibre of the country, our belief in ourselves and what we as Canadians want for ourselves and for children suffer.

I would ask the government to reconsider its motion.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I have immense respect for my hon. friend who has just spoken. He is well known in Parliament and elsewhere as a fair and just man, so I was startled by some of the things he said.

The first point that I would like to make by way of commentary is that there was an implication—I know my hon. friend did not say it explicitly—in his remarks that the government ceases to function if Parliament is not sitting. That of course is not the case because the administration of government goes on, initiatives can be followed through, policies can be executed and indeed they will.

My hon. friend has a genuine concern for the poor and disadvantaged. He has demonstrated that in a distinguished parliamentary career. That is why it troubles me a bit that he seems to suggest that such elements as urban crime, which is a real problem, and prostitution, which again is a real problem, are not being recognized by the government. In his fairness, I think he will acknowledge that there have been more justice and Solicitor General initiatives by this government in the last 18 months or so than in the past number of years, including into the previous administration, and each one of them is a step in a progressive direction. At least I think most of those initiatives have had the general support of my friend.

The hon. member mentioned cutbacks in transfer and equalization payments. We had an exchange earlier with the member for New Westminster—Burnaby in which I pointed out that her province of British Columbia, rather than having been cut back in transfer payments, has been limited to a 5 per cent annual increase, as has my province and as has Ontario in order that more can be freed up to benefit provinces such as Nova Scotia.

Before I conclude, there is one other point. I think I heard my friend say that the government had cut back airline service to Atlantic Canada. If that is true, I would like to hear how the government cuts back airline service since the government has been accused of the sin of deregulation. I do not know how a government can cut back if it is not in the regulating business and it has got itself out of the ownership business as well.

My fundamental question to my friend, and I will conclude with this, is if the no side wins will we have a country, with or without all the ills that my friend points to and which genuinely do need to be addressed? The final point arising out of that question is would he or would I be able to look ourselves in the face if we neglected to do everything within our power to persuade our voters to vote yes in the referendum?

• (1810)

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Speaker, I hope that I can deal with all of the points brought up by the hon. parliamentary secretary, who is an excellent member of Parliament and I know is concerned about the future of this country.

I want to address the first point he made wherein he said that the government is still going to be here, is going to be sitting even though Parliament will not be. That, as the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has said, is not a relief to Canadians. Also, it is not representative government in that the people who elect their representatives expect their representatives to be present. If the point of view of their representative is defeated in the House of Commons, then so be it, that is the way the parliamentary system works. But the point of view is put forward. I think that is very important.

Also, the government sitting is not going to help get criminal justice legislation through. It is not going to be able to put the legislation before the House so that it can be dealt with, because you need to have the consideration of the House of Commons in order to put this legislation through, to deal with it. The government may conceive in its own mind what it wants to present, although I do not know of it having done so, but it can. It is not going to be presented if the House of Commons is not sitting.

The other feature, of course, is that a lot of what was done in some of the better legislation of the Minister of Justice—and I talk about the gun control bill and the replacement of the rape shield provision—was done in conjunction with groups and with all members of the House of Commons. Our committees met and they went over it and as far as gun control, before there was a bill that the minister withdrew. Then there was a special committee to consider the subject. They submitted their report and then a new bill was presented. They were pleased to do it. It does not matter to me. The minister can take full credit for it. That is not important. The fact is there is good legislation there.

There are parts of the criminal justice and solutions to our problem, they are there. However there are holes that have to be filled, and some of these holes I have mentioned on some of the subjects I have talked about.

I agree, the government per se—and this is one thing I will agree with it on—did not specifically cut back airline service. It did, however, privatize Air Canada. By privatizing Air Canada, Air Canada ceased to be an airline that had to be represented in all parts of the country, that had an obligation to service in Canada. Air Canada was formed because this is a vast country with a small population, and the population is centralized. If we are going to offer Canadians first-class service, if we are going to have Canadians feel that they are not second-class citizens, they must have a service that warrants that. The privatization of Air Canada has had an effect.

If this country votes no, certainly it will be devastating. If even one province votes no it is a setback. I would say to anybody that if they feel their place is in their riding to do this, fine. I want to say to a member of Parliament who feels that they are doing what they can through their yes committee or through whatever else they have to do, and still has extra time, that there is a place here in Ottawa where they can get together and deal with the other concerns of the Canadian public. I do not think the two are mutually exclusive. I would have hoped that the government would have done this. However, it chose not to. Maybe in its interest it really believes that we have to give it full flight and that this cannot be done, we cannot meet here. I do not understand that, frankly, and that is the reason for my concern.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask my colleague from Cape Breton—The Sydneys a short question because I support him when he talks about the frustration of having the House of Commons in a six month period only open for seven weeks. I do not think most Canadians will buy that. We are talking about going out and discussing a constitutional agreement which is inextricably intertwined with the economy.

Does my colleague think that because the House is not sitting and because this government has so little trust, as he stated in his speech, knowing that this document is just loaded with economic meaning, there is some danger that good parts of this document might end up suffering a backlash because of the low trust of this government?

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his question. Certainly the record of the government is a direct factor in the referendum debate. I think all of us, certainly on this side of the House, have a duty to ask Canadians to please not confuse their feelings toward this government with the greatness of this country and what we share as Canadians and what we can make of this country.

I say to Canadians that this is important. I also say that Canadians know the difference and there will be an understanding but it is going to take a moment of reflection not to connect the two.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, first I want to congratulate my colleague from Cape Breton—The Sydneys. He always delivers a very thoughtful presentation. This evening without notes and with great feeling he delivered an excellent presentation and I am sure we are all proud of him on this side of the House.

An hon. member: Absolutely. Right on.

An hon. member: I think we should extend the hours a little longer.

An hon. member: Unanimous consent to extend the hours.

Mr. Mifflin: This is encroaching on my time. I will quickly move on to the subject at hand which is essentially on the same note as the previous speaker.

I will be going to my riding. I have voted yes for the referendum and for the question and I will be doing as much as is required to ensure that those who want to vote yes will have the opportunity and those who are thinking no will certainly have the choice to speak with me, discuss the issue and discuss the fallout for this country as a result of a no vote. This is not the time or the place to spend time talking about that because I really do have other issues.

Running a country is a question of priorities. You cannot do everything so you have to do something and you have to do something in order of priority. I would say this is probably the highest that we have ever had. If you equate yes and no to keeping the country together, as I do, it is the highest priority.

We are all fairly educated, experienced people of an age when we know the difference, more or less, between right and wrong. We can do more than one thing at a time. I believe that we can campaign for the referendum and still run the business of the House of Commons at the same time. It may require that we operate with 20 members rotating from time to time or 10 members or 15. I do not know what the formula should be but I do believe that the Canadian public is going to be dismayed if it finds that its House is shut down until a month before Christmas and then is not going to open for another month after that. There are too many things going on in the country right now that are left hanging.

It reminds me a little bit of a ship in a storm. The navigation has gone somewhat berserk. It is foggy. The engines are not working properly and it is almost apparent, not inevitable, that the ship is going to founder on the rocks.

What does the ship's company do? What does the captain do? He does a lot of things, but one thing he does not do is abandon ship. He tries to do what he can. He tries to repair the engines. He tries to have a seaman's guess at where he is and take his ship out of harm's way.

I would say with a certain degree of agreement in this House that we as a country are very much standing in harm's way right now. I believe we have to come to the rescue of the country to prevent it from going further into harm's way and by putting the constitutional debate behind us and getting on and running the country.

That is very important but I believe it is also important to run the government other than administratively to have the opposition have the government accountable for the things that it is doing. I want to give one example and it is an example that I am very familiar with. I do not need to read any notes and I do not need to quote any figures.

For eight years the government has been running the fishery in this country. It is not an easy job. I am not going to stand here and say that it is an easy job. There are a lot of variables and a lot of uncertainties. However, bad decisions have been made and mismanagement has been there.

From the early part of February when the northern cod cut-backs and the moratorium that would eventually come were announced by the government, this opposition day after day questioned the government, caused it to go back to the drawing board, asked it to think of compensation, suggested some ideas of compensation, wrote letters to the government and spoke with its constituents. Eventually on July 2 a compensation package was put forward.

I can guarantee that the opposition's role in that particular issue was very important. It was important enough that a compensation package was delivered. It was not perfect but that is not the issue here now. The compensation package was delivered.

There are a lot of people who still concern themselves with whether they are eligible and if they are eligible why they have not been compensated. There are certain areas of concern in the fishing industry such as vessel owners, who I am very concerned about, who have to maintain their vessels alongside. I am not talking about very small boats, I am talking about 65-footers costing upwards of $1 million.

They had to pay the loan. They had to pay the light and they had to pay the power and all the other bits and pieces to maintain their vessels alongside. They need special compensation. They have not been looked after.

Those involved in the trucking industry related to the fishery cannot change their system to do trucking for other sectors. For one thing, the other sectors are not there because of the economy of my province right now. However, they are not geared that way so they as well are out of work because of the northern cod moratorium. They should be looked after.

There are the small fish handlers and the smaller processing plants that buy fish or take on fish. The larger plants that depend on the northern cod to keep going take fish from these smaller plants to make sure that the peaks and the valleys are looked after. They are as related to the northern cod as those who have been compensated.

I know the minister is looking at that. My point is that it is the opposition that calls the government to account that helps the government run the country. It might not like it that way, but that is our system of parliamentary democracy.

There are a number of things that Canadians are concerned about right now and I am going to list them. I will not have time to speak about all of them. When I go back to my riding I can tell you I will not be faced with a number of people standing on the border of my constituency asking about the referendum,. I will create interest in the referendum, but my constituents are interested in the economy. They are interested in jobs. They are interested in what is happening to our social programs, particularly with what has gone on in the House this week with the demise of the family allowance program. They are interested in investing in people and in what the government is doing for them. They are interested in who cares for the underprivileged and poor; the people who do not have jobs or money and have children to look after and no place to go. They will ask me: Who cares for me?

There is concern for the youth. I have said many times the future of our country depends on our youth. I can tell you they are disillusioned. I will come back to that.

I mentioned the question of trust in this House two days ago. There are a lot of constituents out there who have problems with politicians, not just on the government side but on all sides of the House. I think there are reasons for that and I think we can rectify them. There is education and the whole business of parliamentary debate.

As I have said, I will not have a chance to talk about all of these, but let me just say a couple of things about the economy. God knows there have been enough speeches about the goods and services tax in the House. I do not intend to make another one this evening, but the goods and services tax was described by a number of people as the most unpopular tax in any country at any time. It did not take a Ph. D. in economics to figure out that whether or not the government needed the GST when it was causing the country to be in a recession, it went ahead and not only allowed the GST to happen, but pushed it through. Extra senators were brought in at a cost to the government of $30 million, to say nothing of the other aspects of it. It was so intentional at a time when all the red flags were hoisted saying: "Don't do it. For God's sake don't do it now. Wait until the economy changes".

What happened? The government went ahead and did it. What does it mean? It means every single person has to pay $787 more a year to live. It means a couple with the average 1.2 children spends $2,375 a year more to live. That is a lot of money when you have no discretionary income, no job and no money coming in. Where do you find the money? What a time to introduce the goods and services tax.

I am not going to speak about the free trade agreement tonight, but last election we were speaking hypothetically because we did not know what the free trade agreement was going to do. We now have some evidence of it, four years later, and I do not like what I see. I have no problem with free trade, but this agreement has not been a good one. I have heard all kinds of figures mentioned about the number of jobs we have lost because of free trade. It is upwards of 1.2 million. Now if even half of those people are related to free trade that is too many.

I could go on to other aspects of the economy, but I want to move on to the business of jobs. I have the terrible distinction of having a riding that has the second highest unemployment rate of the 62 unemployment regions in Canada. I think northern Manitoba has the highest. I am not proud of that distinction and am trying to rid myself of it, but I cannot seem to do it. It used to be when people in my riding did not have jobs they went to Toronto, but now there are 600,000 people unemployed in Toronto and looking for jobs. They cannot go to Newfoundland because they will not find any jobs there. There are over 1.5 million people in this country without jobs.

Is there a better prospect for tomorrow? A very credible organization says next year, of all the G-7 countries, Canada will have the highest unemployment rate. That does not warm my heart at all.

• (1830)

I recall the Prime Minister saying social programs were not going to be touched. It was a sacred trust. In the space of four years we have seen changes in old age security and the family allowance. We have seen a great change in the unemployment insurance rules, which has certainly not been beneficial to my riding. We have seen the beginning of what could be the end of medicare.

I do not want to scare people but I do not like what I see. Payments are being cut to the provinces; the Canada Assistance Program is being capped; people are having to pay for things they cannot afford; we start to think about legislation that would put an end to medicare and those things worry me. I think they worry everybody here in the House.

There is the subject of investing in people. There is a level of anxiety in this country now that is bothersome. It used to be when you went to foreign countries the people would tell you Canada was a lovely country and if they had been here they would say this in spades. They would say they could not wait to go back to Canada. We have people who come to live in Canada. Why do they come to Canada? They come because we have a great reputation. In the last couple of years, in the rare times I have been out of the country, it is not quite the same. People say they do not understand what is happening to our country and wonder what we are doing to ourselves.

We used to think Canada was a great place to live. I submit it is still a great place to live. I am hoping, like all of us here in this House, we will continue to make it a great place to live. I am not suggesting otherwise. I am suggesting there is a very big red warning flag, and people are anxious about it from Bona Vista to Vancouver, and I have been in both places in the last week. It is a level of anxiety experienced politicians tell me they have never seen before.

I do not like using trite expressions, but if you look at the over-all record of this government since 1984, it has not really followed, initiated or encouraged policies that really help the underprivileged. I am going to leave it at that.

I have to say, on the positive side, if you want to see what youth can do, have a look at the 1,200 young Canadians who participated in the unity hockey tournament in Toronto. I was lucky enough to have a team from Conception Bay North in my riding and it represented eight or nine communities. When I was there recently for the summer games, which again was another positive youth-run organization, those who participated and their parents came up to me and said "Mr. Mifflin, we need more of that in this country". That warms the heart.

I give this example to show how positive youth are. Their minds are uncluttered with some of the things we bother ourselves with here in this House. I am not saying they do not have the experience or are not educated about these things, but they are optimistic by nature. I want to see us doing things to keep them optimistic, but it is very hard for me to tell the youth I speak to that we in the government are optimistic for them when the government cuts back on youth training programs that provide work in the summertime to ensure they have money to go back to university.

An organization that represents 450,000 youth, the Canadian Federation of Students, says it is very disappointed because since 1985 $65 million has been cut from the summer employment program. It might be said that $3 million was put in last year but with the round figure is $65 million. It is very hard for me to say to the youth of this country that the government supports them when this kind of thing happens.

I can give a number of examples on trust, but this is the one I am going to cite. On August 24, 1988, four years ago plus, the Solicitor General came to my riding and gave fantastic reasons why there should be a prison in Harbour Grace. He said: "There are 201 Newfoundlanders who are inmates and we can only put 60 of them in Newfoundland. Therefore we must have a prison in Newfoundland for Newfoundlanders so they can be close to their families and be rehabilitated in the proper manner".

He gave a very stirring speech on that. There are 160. Less than a year later, on April 27, that prison was scuttled, finished. Now that is a lack of trust. I would not trust anybody who did that to me.

The government's record on education speaks for itself. Last year there was a reduction of 2.4 per cent in education at a time when the percentage should be going up.

In terms of parliamentary debate, on every major issue in this House we have been muzzled. We get two days to speak on it and that is it. We are muzzled. On Bill C-80, the demise of the family allowance, we were muzzled. On many other things we were muzzled.

Yes, I will go to my riding. Yes, I will do what is required to assist the yes answer. However, I would prefer that this House continue to sit and that while I am there some of my colleagues would be sharing their time to continue to drive home these points that show that, yes we are our doing our thing with everybody to get a yes vote but after that is over we are going to hold the government accountable for those issues on which I have spoken.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have immense respect for my colleague and I actually have immense respect for many members on the government side.

I was happy to hear in the member's speech his remarks about youth and the unity tournament, because he was right on. We can learn a lot from the youth of this country on how to galvanize and work together. I agree with the member, I wish we had more projects like that with which we could pull the country together.

However, there is something the government side is totally misunderstanding. We on this side of the House are Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition. Yes, there are many people in our country today who are doing better with the lower interest rates. There are many people doing well because of lower inflation. I think the ratchet on inflation was a little too aggressive but I am not knocking zero inflation. How could anyone do that?

It seems to me that the government does not realize we are not on this side of the House to speak for the advantaged Canadians. We are here to speak for those people in our country who are disadvantaged: the fishery that is in trouble right now, the many unemployed people, the people in my community who have no freedom because they do not have a weekly pay cheque, they do not have a job.

We are here to speak for the small or medium sized businessman who has this expectation in his mind that because interest rates on a poster are 5 or 5.5 per cent he can go in and get a loan, but then he goes in and gets shot down because there is very little money being rented out these days. He practically has to exchange money to get money.

• (1840)

Does the member not think that this government is totally misunderstanding what the constructive role of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition is all about and in fact is showing great disrespect for our legal right to be the watch-dog, to help make this government accountable?

Does the member not think that is one of the reasons that the people of Canada have such little trust today, because the government is not allowing us to do our job?

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague from Broadview—Greenwood.

His question is a pensive one in the sense that it concerns what causes people to put politicians, as my friend from Cape Breton—The Sydneys said, a little bit below loan sharks. I do not think we are quite that bad, but the point is made.

I am barely old enough to remember with any sort of knowledge and intensity of the pipeline debate. However, I do remember the flag debate. At a certain point in time the flag debate had to be closed, but it went on for weeks and weeks and weeks.

Mr. Milliken: Months.

Mr. Mifflin: It went on for months. At that time, when closure was announced the whole country was up in arms. People said: "Why are we stopping this debate?"

In response to my hon. friend's question, since 1984 this government has invoked closure or time allocation 50 times. That is 50 times in eight years.

Mr. Milliken: Shame.

Mr. Mifflin: Do I believe that this is one of the causes for the anxiety that I talked about, and lack of trust that my friend talks about? Of course it is.

Canadians elect parliamentarians to come to debate the issues. They do not elect us to be muzzled.

Mr. Mills: Right on.

Mr. Mifflin: We spend two days talking about a bill like Bill C–80 in which the government says that it is going to give the people $2.1 billion in five years, but it does not tell them that it took $3.5 billion away from them the five years before. That is bound to cause a lack of trust in any organization. We are part of that organization and we cannot do our jobs as the Official Opposition because we are not permitted to do so by the government.

If the government wanted more trust as a government it would allow us to debate the issues, and perhaps the Canadian people would understand better why some of these measures are being discussed and why some of these measures have to be introduced.

There are few in my mind that we would change our minds on, but at least we should have the opportunity to debate.

Mr. Mills: Maybe even change the government's mind.

Mr. Mifflin: Not allowing debate is not allowing democracy.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I find that I am among quite a coterie of members whom I respect immensely tonight, none more than the gentleman from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception.

Twillingate has gone? I wanted to congratulate him on his thoughtful speech, but I did want to take issue with just one point, and that is the question of muzzling.

I want to point out to the House and to those who are watching this very serious debate that this debate now going on is the result of an all-party agreement that it would be totally open-ended. There is no question of muzzling here. This debate will continue until there is no member who wishes to speak, who wishes to intervene.

It is not terribly unusual for that kind of thing to happen, again through agreement among the parties. I do wish to make a small correction to what my hon. friend said about Bill C–80. I think we had three days debate, rather than two days debate, at report stage and third reading this week.

There was considerable debate at second reading earlier this year. On the question of debate being closed off, my friend from Kingston and the Islands says it was closed off. There has been a fairly loose use of words, not by my friend from Newfoundland, but by others about the word closure. I think the record will show that during 14 or 15 months beginning in the spring of 1991 and ending in June of this year, not once did this government use either closure or time allocation to compress a debate and bring it to a conclusion.

Since then there has been some use of time allocation, which is a parliamentary rule which allocates a particular amount of time to the conclusion of a debate. There has been no use of closure. The parliamentary device of closure, to my knowledge, and I stand to be corrected on this, I do not believe has been used since the early spring of 1991.

Time allocation is used in the House only when consent and agreement on time allocation cannot be arrived at among the parties. That is when it becomes a unilateral initiative of the government. There is a tremendous amount of consultation that does go on. As parliamentary secretary to the government House leader, I spend a good deal of my time consulting with my colleagues from the opposition and trying to accommodate them. I can tell my friends opposite that even today I made a personal error which resulted in an extra 45 minutes of debate for the opposition.

Mr. Milliken: What beneficence.

Mr. Edwards: That is more than had been agreed upon among the parties.

Mr. Mills: Come on, you are talking about Canada.

Mr. Edwards: That is just one example. Just to conclude two points, many pieces of legislation, much of the work of this House, are done in committee, as all members will concede. A great bulk of the work of Parliament is done in committee. Just to use two examples, a good deal of legislation that comes out of this place has had many amendments from all sides that have succeeded. My friend from Davenport is here and I think of the environmental bill of the last year or so. I do not know whether it was 100 amendments, but there were scores of amendments that were accepted and they originated from him and from other members of the opposition as well as from government members.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but the time has now expired.

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could make a short response to the hon. member's question to me.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The time for questions and comments has now expired. If there is unanimous consent I have no problem.

Is there unanimous consent to give the floor to the hon. member?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleagues. I do not really want to be long. I equally have a great deal of respect for my hon. friend from Edmonton Southwest. He knows as well as I do regarding closure that the rules for time allocation, the way it is right now, give an advantage to the government over the rules of closure. He also knows closure can only be used on third reading.

The other point is that in 15 months, by golly, we have not sat very much. That is probably one of the reasons why it has not been used. Here are the statistics and I think I need them for the record.

In the 70 years prior to this government's taking over, closure was invoked 13 times. Since this government has taken over it has been used 13 times as well; 13 times in 70 years and 13 times in 8 years.

Mr. Edwards: When was the last time?

An hon. member: You have not used it since you changed the rules.

Mr. Mifflin: The rules for time allocation have changed so the statistics, since they are being derived from a different set of rules and different time frames, really mean nothing.

Those were the main points. Let me finish by saying that when I speak in this House on an issue that is important to my constituents and I am told that I cannot speak because I have no time, the government will not allow it, I think I am being muzzled.

• (1850)

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would love to continue with the debate that was going on between my learned and gallant colleague from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception and my very distinguished colleague, the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader, but I will not except to say that the government House leader knows perfectly well that since the government fiddled the rules of this House, a year ago May I believe was the date that these changes took place—

Mr. Mills: It is fiddling the country.

Mr. Milliken: —it has made it possible for the government to use time allocation instead of closure which is far faster, and he knows this perfectly well. He also knows why closure is not being used.

Just so that the public understands, in order for closure to be used the debate must have commenced, so there has to be a day of debate and then notice of the closure motion is given and the closure allows for the debate to go until eleven o'clock at night. The government moved it from one o'clock in the morning to eleven o'clock at night. Once closure is moved you have an extended day of debate. Therefore, you must have at least part of a day and a full day of debate, and by full I mean from the time the House starts until eleven o'clock at night.

Under the time allocation rule, you must have started the debate all right, but then once you have moved the motion the full day is allocated to it. Therefore, the day of the vote is all that is taken up. Yesterday was a perfect example. We had time allocation at third reading stage on the bill, the vote was put on the time allocation motion right after the Routine Proceedings were over at 3.30 p.m. or so and then the debate went on until the normal completion hour for government business at seven o'clock. The vote was put and the matter disposed of. Therefore, it would be much faster. If the government had used closure on third reading we would have been here until eleven o'clock last night debating that wretched legislation and the government would have been even more embarrassed than it was.

There is a good reason why closure has not been used. The government can also use time allocation on two stages at once and that is exactly what it did on that bill. It can use it on report stage and third reading. Closure is not available in report stage unless there is only one amendment because the debate would be prolonged in any event.

The parliamentary secretary, in saying that it has not been used, is playing a cat and mouse game and that is typical of the games that the government plays with the country and with this House by giving some of the facts and concealing the damaging facts.

Mr. Edwards: We are going to hear everything now.

Mr. Milliken: Yes, we are going to hear a little more. As the parliamentary secretary says, we are going to get more of the facts.

I want to go back to 1984 to talk about the government's economic record. It was elected on the promise of jobs, jobs, jobs. We all remember how the Prime Minister paraded around the country, boasting about his capacity for creating jobs and also remember that he was going to eliminate the deficit. That was the highest priority, to get rid of the deficit that the government keeps harping about as the cause of all its current evils. Every time a minister answers a question about the economy it is all because of that awful Liberal debt the Conservatives inherited eight years ago for heaven's sake. They still have not got over that pill and yet they knew about it and they were talking about it throughout the election campaign in 1984.

We have had 32 tax increases since this government took office. Government revenues have increased by over 50 per cent, I believe it is now the case, since it took office and we still have a $30 billion a year deficit. The government says that it has our finances in order. In every budget we hear how the government has things on course. Remember how the former Minister of Finance, now the super minister, used to say he was steering the course, holding the course, and he had this great course. The course has been repeated deficits and a repeated inability to get control over the country's finances, all because of the free-wheeling, spend-thrift ways of the government in times of economic success when the economy was booming.

Now we have an economic mess created by the government's own disastrous policies. It now says the cupboard is bare and instead of having Parliament sit here and introduce new programs which will help the unemployed, which will help fill the training programs that are now empty because there is no money to keep them going, we are left doing nothing and going off to deal with the Constitution yet again. I will deal with the government's bungling on that issue in a few moments.

In addition to the government's inability to get any control, we have had a disastrous financial policy pursued by the Bank of Canada. The government, in conjunction with its friends at the bank, the governor, has decided that a zero inflation target is appropriate for Canada. Today we witnessed what happened in the United Kingdom when a zero inflation target was finally abandoned by the government. It could not continue with it because it was bringing the economy to its knees. International money markets finally brought about the end of that policy. Yesterday we read that the British government lost something like $3 billion on the foreign exchange markets trying to prop up the pound and raise its interest rates by 5 per cent in one day. It lost control. Finally it lowered the interest rate at the end of the day and let the pound go down. They finally realized that this policy was in error. It has taken a long time. This government still has not realized the policy is in error.

What this policy has done is put Canadians out of work. Interest rates have been held artificially high in Canada for too long and Canadians have lost jobs as a very direct result of that.

The additional thing that has done is it has kept the Canadian dollar artificially high so that Canadian exports to the United States are more expensive for Americans to buy. We accordingly have suffered a loss of manufacturing jobs in this country. It has made cross-border shopping more attractive, which has only fueled the recession in Canada as Canadians go south of the border to spend their relatively valuable dollars on American goods.

Had the interest rate been lowered, had the Canadian dollar been allowed to drop, we would not have had the recession that we have suffered through in Canada for the last two and a half years. Indeed, the blame for this whole financial mess rests right on the government side. It has mishandled this from the beginning. It has botched this policy, and it has done it at the very worst time for our country because it negotiated a free trade agreement with the United States and it should have been adopting policies that expanded our trade, not reduced it. Instead of that, we have had the government pursue this high interest rate, high dollar policy, which has curtailed Canadian success in the American market and damaged our future prospects because we do not have the manufacturing industries being established here at a time when they should be to get those exports going.

It has cost us, it has cost us dearly, and it is no surprise that Ontario has lost a great number of jobs.

I will not go into the fact that we have an NDP government in Ontario which is driving investment out of the province willy-nilly, that is only exacerbating the problem. I could go into that at some length, but there is not much point. The people of Ontario know it and they are suffering badly as a result of having that government. Its policies, although not intended to be, are complementary to the policies of the federal government which seem to be to close the province. When my friend from Broadview—Greenwood, speaks of the 600,000 unemployed in Toronto, he knows whereof he speaks and whereof I speak when I talk about the disastrous effect of these policies on the economy of Ontario.

I would like to turn to the Constitution, having done what I could with the government's muddle-headed policies on the economy. I can only say that what it has done on the Constitution has been an even greater disservice for Canada.

The Prime Minister decided early on in his term that he was going to be the great champion of constitutional reform. He wanted to be another Pierre Trudeau or someone along those lines. He felt that he had the ability and somehow the trust of Canadians to come up with something new that would solve all our constitutional problems. No one has created a worse mess in Canada in terms of national unity and our Constitution than this government headed by this Prime Minister.

I regret profoundly, as do most Canadians, that he ever touched this field, that he ever thought that he ought to meddle in this field. If he had kept his mouth shut and done nothing, if this government had let the issue alone and done nothing, we would not be facing the constitutional crisis that seems to have enveloped us for the last three or four years.

We now have a deal cobbled together that the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs, to his credit, managed to work out with a group of premiers of greatly varying political views. As I said the other night in the debate on this, I do not think the agreement is a great one. It is the best we can get, given the situation in which we find ourselves today, thanks very largely to this government's own blundering, stumbling and fooling around with this issue.

I want to say that I am prepared to support this agreement, as I said the other day, and in fact in my own riding of Kingston and the Islands I have invited the other three parties to participate in a joint yes committee and all have agreed. We have established in Kingston a yes committee for the referendum, composed of the three main political parties—my Party, the Progressive Conservative Party and the New Democratic Party. The presidents of all three parties were with me recently and I announced at a press conference with them that we were working together. They made statements in support. Clearly we disagree; they know full well my views with respect to the fact that the government got us into this mess and the blame I attach to the government for it. But we have all agreed we have to put Canada first in this case and set aside our partisan differences with respect to the question of voting yes. We will have our partisan reasons for doing so, but at least we can agree that a yes vote is essential for our country and we are working toward that goal.

I am pleased that has been the case and I hope the public realizes the reason for our willingness to co-operate in this way. It is not because a great affection exists for the government or because we believe the government handled the case properly. We do believe the future of the country requires a yes vote and in order to minimize the difficulties with respect to that, we have agreed to work together for that purpose.

This week a great Canadian nationalist died. I refer to Bruce Hutchison who wrote for many years about this country. I think there will be many of my own age who in their high school career may have come across some readings by this ardent nationalist for Canada. He spoke about our country and I would like to read a quotation from his book The Unknown Country.

This particular short piece was in a high school textbook, I recall. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary remembers it. I am glad he is back. It is nice to have at least one member here to hear on the other side the speech. The quotation is this:

> My country has not found itself nor felt its power nor learned its true place. It is all visions and doubts and hopes and dreams. It is strength and weakness, despair and joy, and the wild confusions and restless strivings of a boy who has past his boyhood but is not yet a man.

This quotation, although out of date—it was published in 1942—nevertheless reflects his ardent feelings for Canada and certainly reflects the present turmoil I think in which many Canadians find themselves as they cast about what their country means to them and what vision they have for its future and worries and concerns about that future.

I think there are some very important changes that have taken place in Canada and I would like to refer to them for a few minutes because I think it indicates considerable hope for the future.

[Translation]

If we can win this referendum, we will have to recognize the changes that have taken place in past years, especially the changes concerning language problems. In this country, we have often remained two solitudes, as my colleague, the hon. member for Saint-Léonard, said in his speech a few days ago during the debate on the referendum question.

I looked at the figures prepared by the Commissioner of Official Languages in his annual report for 1991. The figures that interest me are those on second-language and minority language education programs. It is quite obvious from these figures, that many Canadians, especially young people, have started to study the other official language in school. That is very important for the future of this country. I believe that the interest in languages, and in the other official language in several provinces, is a sign of reconciliation between our country's language groups.

The figures are very interesting. I am especially looking at the figures for the province of Ontario, for example. It is hard for me to read figures in French, but I will try and if I make mistakes, forgive me.

For example, in 1977-78, there were 1,950,000 students in school. This year in Ontario, 883,000 students, or less than 50 per cent of the school population, are studying a second language.

In 1977-78 the French immersion program had 12,000 students in 160 schools. Last year the French immersion program had 140,000 students in 1,180 schools. That is an incredible increase. Moreover, 67 per cent of the primary school population was studying a second language. That is a real increase in the past 15 years since 1977.

These figures indicate an achievement in Ontario, but the same thing has happened in several other provinces where studying and speaking the other language has become very important.

[English]

This importance is something that cannot be stressed too strongly because if there are two solitudes in this country, it is the direct result of our unwillingness to work and study in the other language.

I may have mentioned in the House, I am not sure, that during a trip to South Africa last year I was confronted with a group of South African politicians who were fairly bilingual. These politicians spoke English and Afrikaans, which are two of the principal languages of South Africa. There are also others. It was commonplace for many South African citizens to speak both those languages. In fact, I found it extremely common throughout my visit.

The remark was made to me: "Of course we have to study two languages in school and that is why many of us speak this. Do you not have the same rule in Canada?" I said: "No, we do not. You are not required to take two languages in school. You can but you do not have to". They were surprised at that because they thought of us as a bilingual country.

We have things to learn about what goes on in other places and certainly the effective use of the two languages there made communication much easier. It broke down the divisions that existed in their society, at least in so far as those two language groups were concerned and it allowed them to interact with one another, an interaction that happens all too rarely in our country, exacerbated by the geographical limits of the various provinces where changes occur in terms of provincial policy on education and so on. Those problems are going to be with us for a while. I am not saying they will be over.

In this constitutional discussion we had to try to work out a way of keeping our language groups together, our provinces together with their very divergent interests and aspirations and economic situations, and then try, as the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs said, to cobble together some arrangement that would make the country work.

[Translation]

As my colleague from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception said, our country's future depends on young people. I am sure that the figures I quoted indicate a change in our young people's attitude which is very important for our country's future.

• (1910)

[English]

I hope that with time we will grow to appreciate one another as linguistic groups, as different cultures, and expose ourselves to the other culture in a way that we have not been able to do because of the language barriers that exist between us.

That aside, we have to try to also cobble together a country that can work economically. The new package that has been put together, while far from perfect and one that could be criticized on numerous fronts, at least leaves relatively intact the economic structure of the country.

Some will say it needed repair worse than some of the other areas, and maybe it did. However, I do not think we are going to get that kind of repair, given the policy approaches of the current government which have done so much to damage the economic fabric of Canada.

The breaking down of our national institutions—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I forgot to look at the time, you were so eloquent, sir. We must now move to the period for questions and comments.

[English]

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate my hon. friend for his contribution to this debate in both of our languages.

Even though he and I disagree on the vast majority of issues, I know he loves his country. He has demonstrated that on many occasions.

I want to ask my friend two questions. One is related to the fact that a leader of an aspirant new political party has suggested that Canadians vote no in this coming referendum and that it will be possible, as he advocates, to put constitutional discussions to one side during the life of the next Parliament.

We do not know what the life of the next Parliament is going to be, but let us assume it is four or five years, which is the customary life of a Parliament. I wish to ask my hon. friend from Kingston and the Islands what he believes would be the fate of Canada if such a course were followed.

The second question relates to my friend's comments about South Africa. I did not know that South Africa has, in effect, compulsory bilingualism, compulsory in the sense of instruction at least. I would like to ask my friend whether he considers that Canada has in any facet of its life compulsory bilingualism. I think voters in Alberta would be interested in his response.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the question of the Reform Party to which my hon. friend refers, I know that he has particular problems with that party in his own province.

The rumours are rife that Reform may win some seats in Alberta the next time round. They already have one. The hon. member for Beaver River is—

Mr. Edwards: I notice you are looking over your shoulder, too.

Mr. Milliken: Not in the least. I am encouraging the Reform Party in my own constituency. I invited it to join the yes committee, but I have not received an answer. In time it may yet. I do not know what its approach is. I have not heard. The members of that party may or may not call me, I do not know what they are going to do, but that does not worry me.

I think the leader of the Reform Party is wrong when he makes the statement that this issue will simply be closed for five years. It will not close for five years. I do not think the provinces would agree to allow it to be closed for five years because the constitutional discussions that have gone on have raised Canadians' expectations too much.

That is the problem when you start discussing the Constitution. That is part of the reason why the Prime Minister should never have touched the issue, if he had any sense. Once you start meddling with it, especially when you are not very good at it as we have seen he is not—

An hon. member: It is over his head.

Mr. Milliken: He is away over his head.

Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I rise a point of order. The member knows full well that the constitutional problem was something that we inherited as a government. It was an incomplete constitutional package in 1982. We had no choice but to deal with it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is a matter of opinion. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Milliken: The fact is that the Prime Minister got in over his head. The whole government got in over its head. Now we are drowning in constitutional soup. If an issue is not raised, people's expectations do not soar. If my hon. friend has any doubts about people's expectations, have them call the head of the National Action Committee for the Status of Women.

It is clear. Her expectations are much greater than his perhaps on this issue or even some of my colleagues who disagree with her. The fact is that the opportunity was there to do something and if it was not done, people feel they have been disappointed.

The expectations in the country are that something will be done, however little. For the leader of the Reform Party to suggest that this issue is just going to be closed off for five years and that nobody will talk about it, is hopeful pie in the sky. It will not happen and it cannot happen.

Indeed I suspect that after this deal is approved, there may be further discussion on this issue. I do not think it will be dominating the national agenda. I think it will be done—

Mr. Mifflin: I hope not.

Mr. Milliken: I hope not too. I am sick and tired of it. As the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception says, it is not something we want to continue with.

The second question that my colleague asked was about compulsory bilingualism. I said that in South Africa there was a requirement that two languages be studied in school. It was not those two. You could take any two. There was quite a choice of languages that one could take.

Were there a second language instruction or requirement in Canada it would not necessarily, if you follow the South African example, be English and French. It might be English and some other language.

I am not an expert in education by any means. I would have thought that a requirement that one study two languages in school for some period of time would not be a bad idea. Then I am not sure that I should, not being an expert in the area, express my view particularly on that. I would prefer to do that. When I was in school, I can tell the hon. member that I studied four languages. I studied Latin, German, French and English and I enjoyed every minute of it. I would do it again. I must say I have forgotten most of my German and a good deal of the Latin.

Perhaps with help from the hon. member, he can assist me and we can have a speech here in Latin some night.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I was happy to hear that when my colleague for Kingston and the Islands goes to his riding over the next few weeks, he will be constantly reminding people of the flaws in this particular package and the fact that this government's economic record is something we on this side of the House do not support. A great concern I have is that people might perceive that the Liberal Party is endorsing this government's entire package. That is something that really bothers me.

One of the things that I have experienced in my city, Toronto, is that about 99 per cent of the businessmen I have talked to in the last four or five days have not read a single line of this document. It is in my riding office and I beg the business community of Toronto for once to try and take some time to get involved in this. For me, the people of this country are supreme. If the people of this country want to vote for this package, then I am not going to get in their way.

I resent the governments—

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, the member started out by mentioning that the Liberal Party did not endorse this particular package. I am somewhat confused. Is he talking about an economic package or he is talking about the referendum constitutional package?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Your attention please. I will be pleased to give the floor to the hon. member for a question or comment or for a speech but it is a matter of opinion.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I will repeat for the hon. member exactly what I said. I said that there are some Liberals in Canada—the Liberal Party of Canada because there are some of us in the Liberal Party—who have real problems with this package and I am one of them. I am undecided because there are many things in this package that I cannot get the answer for yet. I have talked to some of the best constitutional lawyers in this country and I think I have a right to ask questions about certain aspects of this deal. For the government to say that I am anti-Canadian or anti-Canada because I am asking questions about this package—you have insinuated that many times in this House today. If you want to clarify it, that is great.

• (1920)

There are going to be a lot of Canadians who vote against this package in every province of this country. If they vote against this package, we should not call them anti-Canadian or anti-Canada. We should stop saying they are going to be responsible for the break-up of Canada. We are not a bunch of mobile homes here that are going to be moved off.

My question, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry, the time for question and comments has now expired.

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, we in the opposition on this side of the House think that tonight's debate is very important. We believe that the House of Commons should not adjourn, because issues like unemployment, the economy, personal security and many others affecting the national welfare require this House to continue working in September and October. It is really too bad that the government has decided to adjourn for more than six weeks.

[English]

This motion reveals one thing very clearly: the government is out of touch with Canadians. In a survey published just 10 days ago in The Toronto Star, 55 per cent of Canadians surveyed called the economy and the recession their major preoccupations. Employment was also very high. It came at a very high level of 24 per cent. National unity and the Constitution came at a level of 11 per cent.

This is a clear indication that the mind and the heart of Canadians is focused on matters other than constitutional. It very difficult to understand why, in light of this poll, the government would decide to close down the House of Commons for six weeks.

It seems to me that the government is not really so much out of touch with Canadians, but that it is adopting a tactic to divert the attention of the public from pressing economic and social issues and to focus instead on one and only one matter, namely the Constitution, as if we did not have one. Canadians have had a Constitution since 1982. It is a new Constitution by any normal international standards. It has worked well and it has served Canada well in every part and region of this country.

At the same time, if we look at the picture of Canada, we notice, as other speakers and other colleagues of mine have indicated, that the country is in a mess. Why the government would want to divert the attention of the House of Commons and of the public away from its urgent and pressing economic and social measures is really very difficult to understand. Unless it has a particular scheme in mind, namely that it does not really want to focus on these economic and social matters it is highly regrettable.

This motion to close down the House until November is a real disgrace because it is, in essence, an abdication of responsibility in an attempt on the part of the government to say to Canadians: "We want you to focus on the Constitution and the rest must wait". This is the wrong approach.

There are important matters in this country that require attention. Where will the government be in the next six weeks? Not answering questions in the House that get reported by the media, and which in turn allow Canadians to know the answers to current issues as raised in this place, the House of Commons. The government will be able to issue press releases and engage in a monologue. There will not be a dialogue across the aisle in this House for the benefit of the public, to help them learn what the measures introduced or announced by the government are really all about.

This House will be mute, this House will be silent and the public will be denied the opportunity to have access to valuable information, as is the case when this House is sitting. This is a very serious measure that the government is bringing down tonight.

On this side of the House we should scream bloody murder in the middle of the night because this measure is really unacceptable considering the gravity of the economic and social situation in this country.

The government is closing down the House at a time when the nation is in turmoil on the Constitution, which the public does not understand in its implications and its complexity, for which there is no legal text, on which no study has been conducted to reveal how the proposals will work out in reality and in practice, on which every day in the last few days we learn about revelations, denials, contestations, and rejections at the provincial level, in parts of the country.

It is becoming controversial. Therefore, it would be in the public interest if the House were to sit to allow clarification on some of these disturbing developments that are now surrounding the integrity of the process leading to the referendum date.

The government is closing down the House. Thus, it is virtually cutting off the public from information about what is happening in a variety of sectors. Take the economy, and what is happening there. It is cutting off the public from knowing about what is happening in terms of unemployment and what is being done about it.

It is cutting off information about what is being done regarding the North American free trade agreement, how it would affect our working population and the measures that could be put in place to protect those who will be affected. It is cutting off information and dialogue about the environmental effects resulting from the North American free trade agreement.

• (1930)

It is keeping the public in the dark about the measures, if any, that would be taken in order to reduce the very high youth unemployment.

It is leaving the public in the dark about the long-term intentions of this government with regard to the universality of our social security system, in the light of what happened yesterday when the government muscled through the child benefit bill.

It is leaving the public in the dark about the training of the unemployed, and the shortcomings in that very important sector. It is leaving the public in the dark about measures the government may want to take in order to protect the Canadian dollar in case it may be in danger in the weeks ahead.

It is bringing to a halt any intervention in this House on behalf of the fishing communities on the east and west coasts. It does not permit any interested members, on behalf of the forestry industry and workers, to pursue the issue of our dwindling forest resources.

It does not permit members to pursue our seriously backward energy policies that are being adopted by the federal government at the present time. It is leaving us in the dark about the intention of this government to introduce measures related to water quality.

It is leaving us unable to raise the important question of the galloping increases in foreign control of Canadian business and industry. It does not permit the opposition, on behalf of the public, to raise questions about the lack of adequate protection for those whose jobs are rapidly disappearing, about questions on insufficient social housing, about the increasing costs of drugs and medicines for people on fixed incomes, about violence in the cities, about violence in the streets, about the individuals who are abducted despite efforts on the part of the police, about drug education, about the slump in the construction industry, you name it.

From this list, and I will elaborate on some of these points, one cannot help but conclude that it is the height of irresponsibility on the part of this government to close down this House over the next six weeks.

I am looking forward to the questions by the parliamentary secretary, to hear from him how he justifies that particular fact. It is the height of irresponsibility for this government to say to the nation that unemployment is not going to be on our agenda during the next six weeks.

Youth unemployment is at 20 per cent in Toronto, where the member from Broadview—who also has raised this issue on several occasions—and I come from. At 20 per cent it is an issue that now has got to be put to sleep. The repercussions of the North American so-called free trade agreement are going to be so severe on thousands of workers, and their future cannot be discussed and raised in this Chamber for a month and a half because the government has decided that this country does not have a Constitution, because this government has decided that Canadians are unhappy about the Constitution.

Have you received a letter from one Canadian saying he or she is unhappy with the present Constitution? Has anyone stopped you on the street imploring that we need an amendment to the Constitution because there is something profoundly wrong with it and we need a redesigned Senate? Show me one Canadian who goes to bed at night worrying about the composition of the Senate. Show me one and I will give you a special diploma for finding that person. It has become ridiculous.

Let me elaborate a little bit on some of the topics I just raised. When it comes to fisheries, we know there are hundreds of communities on the east coast in particular, but also increasingly on the west coast, which are facing a very serious winter because of the lack of cod or salmon, because we have overfished. What measures are going to be put into place? There are some we need to examine to see whether they are working. We want to know what we are doing for the long term to bring back the missing stocks, to bring back the means to make a living for the communities on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. We will not be able to say a word on that matter for the next six weeks.

We know there is violence and uncertainty in the streets. There are abductions. We want to raise this matter in the House of Commons with the Minister of Justice to ensure appropriate measures are taken. We will not be able to do that.

We have learned that between June 1985 and June 1992 some $115 billion of foreign investment has come into Canada and 93 per cent of this went to take over existing businesses. Only 6 per cent was invested to launch new enterprises. This is a devastating statistic. It is a very serious matter. We want to investigate it.

We learned the merchandise trade surplus with the United States was $48 billion in the three years preceding the free trade deal. In the first three years after the free trade deal was signed, it has slumped by $6 billion to $42 billion. In other words, we have lost $6 billion worth of trade in three years. During the same years, Canada went from a surplus of $11.5 billion in the current account to a deficit of $11 billion. There are a number of items which require the examination of parliamentarians and must be raised in this House.

We have an 11.8 per cent rate of unemployment in Canada in the adult population, which is by far the highest of the G–7 group.

In terms of foreign ownership, some 30 per cent of Canada's top 65,000 corporations are foreign owned. These are vital statistics that make the question of the Constitution appear almost irrelevant because we have to come to grips with them. In light of the issues surrounding us from coast to coast, from the economy to social matters, from trade to the environment, we are going to witness a situation whereby the Government of Canada is going to operate without the scrutiny of the public made possible through the daily operations of the House of Commons.

• (1940)

This is an unacceptable decision, which we on this side of the House reject in the name of the Canadian public.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I listened again with interest to my friend from Davenport who always makes a reasoned contribution to any debate.

I just wish to focus on one point he made. He challenged us to name one Canadian who went to bed at night worried about the Constitution.

I will try to describe which Canadians do that: there are Quebecers shut out by the Trudeau Constitution; 2.5 million Albertans and millions of others across the country who are heart-sick about the disgraceful anachronism that is our present Senate; 790,000 Canadians of aboriginal origin who will at last be reconciled to ordering their own affairs; Francophones outside Quebec and Anglophones in Quebec; Canadians who care about social goals and objectives; and finally, and this may surprise my friend, students of Canada, the unemployed of Canada, the under employed of Canada; people whose economic lives are impacted by things my friend will say are the errors, omissions and commissions of the government, but which are contributed to in large measure by the constitutional uncertainty that besets us.

Now I think my friend will say we brought it on ourselves because we initiated it or mismanaged it. The fact of the matter is, not only was Quebec left out of the Constitution, these other aspects of our Constitution that have truly been dealt with in this Canada round, imperfectly as they may have been dealt with, have been dealt with by the 17 participants as effectively as possible at this time.

I would challenge my hon. friend with the same proposition I put to the member for Kingston and the Islands. If we were to tell Mr. or Ms. Canada to go to sleep and not worry about the Constitution, does he honestly believe we could live through the life of another Parliament not dealing with the Constitution and still keep the country together?

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the parliamentary secretary for his question because it gives me the opportunity to reply. The unemployed, the people he referred to who are having a difficult time and those who cannot make ends meet are not the victims of the existing Constitution. They are the victims of the wrong economic policies adopted by this government over the last few years. They are the victims of the decision of this government to focus all its energies, attention and time on the Constitution at the expense of economic issues. The fixation with the Constitution has brought about the current problems, not the fact that we have a Constitution that is not working.

The hon. member likes to engage in accusing the former Prime Minister of Canada, Pierre Elliott Trudeau, of constitutional shortcomings. It was a Constitution which his party supported. He was not in the House at that time and therefore he may not recall it, but it received the support of his party and of his current Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs. It must have been a pretty good Constitution, if it generated the support of the Progressive Conservative Party at that time, I submit respectfully.

The question that worries Canadians today is related to their ability to make ends meet, not to how many senators will represent them in the upper chamber. That is the question that preoccupies Canadians. Those who have jobs are worried about whether they will have jobs under the North American free trade agreement. Those who do not have jobs are worried about the fact that they may never again get jobs. Those are the issues that are preoccupying Canadians today.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, there is no question that Canada is hurting and that we would like to see the economy much better than it is, but I think we have to put in perspective where we are internationally in relation to the rest of the world.

Obviously, if anyone has watched the television screen, listened to the radio or read a newspaper in the last 24 hours, he or she would realize that we are in pretty good shape in this country in relation to what is happening in Europe. In fact we are in pretty good shape in relation to what is happening in the United States.

I will cite a number of those statistics when I rise on debate, but I have a question for the member. A headline in The Financial Post of today, the September 17 edition, read: "IMF sees Canada leading rebound". For those folks at home, the IMF is the International Monetary Fund.

It simply states that of all the nations in the world Canada is best positioned to lead the world next year in economic performance. In fact we will come pretty close to leading the world this year in economic performance. That is not rhetoric. It is fact that every one of us in this House, regardless of political stripe, should be proud of.

We are not alone in this recession, but the member would have to admit that we have the fundamentals in their proper perspective. We are in a position from which we can indeed lead the world. The member should recognize that and accept the fact that we have done a pretty good job through some very difficult international times.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I am extremely grateful to the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte for his question.

He may draw comfort from reading The Financial Post headline on the International Monetary Fund, but that headline is of very little comfort for a mother who is trying to raise two children alone, for someone whose meal depends on the food bank around the corner, for someone who has just lost his or her job, or for someone who knows that his or her job may be lost in the near future because of global competition.

They will not be impressed by the headline the hon. member saw in The Financial Post: "IMF sees Canada leading rebound".

It is a good headline for those who have good jobs with good salaries, but it is not comforting reading for the 11 per cent of adult Canadians who are unemployed or the 20 per cent Canadian youth who are unemployed. To them, the IMF, the International Monetary Fund, is an abstract notion. If it is known to them, they also know how many of these predictions have not turned out true. That is another aspect that has to be kept in mind.

I urge the hon. member to come down to earth and put himself in the position of those who are suffering because of the wrong economic policy of this government obsessed with inflation, a policy which has managed to bring down inflation and at the same time to kill the economy. This economy is not rebounding despite the low levels of inflation, which tells me that the government put its foot on the brake so hard to stop inflation that it killed the economy in the process. That is why I say the economic policy of the government is wrong.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The time for question and comments has now expired.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, as we all know, we will be leaving this House for the next eight weeks. That is the subject of debate tonight, as we shut down the House. This has to be the most important eight weeks in the history of this country. Each and every member will leave this House and go back to their individual constituencies to take part in the referendum vote on October 26.

I know there is disagreement on whether or not we should be here or back in our constituencies. There will always be disagreement on that. I guess even those of us on this side of the House can debate whether we should be here or back home.

When I am back home I will be holding meetings throughout my riding. Most members on both sides of the House will be doing that, but obviously some will not. In fact today we put the final touches on the dates of those meetings in what is a very rural riding. We will have 15 public meetings in total which will be very much non-political. We will invite all the community leaders and citizens of the individual communities within Carleton—Charlotte to partake.

In those meetings we are going to step through the referendum and the constitutional agreement reached in Charlottetown on August 28 and discuss their merits so that when we go out to vote on October 26 we will understand what is in that package.

The only way we can do that is to be back in our constituencies and work as hard as we can to get the message out, to explain that package. As I stated in this House on Tuesday of this week, although the question is quite simple the proposals or the agreement itself is somewhat complex. It is incumbent upon all of us in this House to do our best to explain those proposals, to explain the agreement that was reached by the first ministers, the aboriginal leaders, the territorial leaders and the Prime Minister on August 28. We are going to do our very best to explain that package. However, there will be questions and there will be debate on whether we should be here or back home.

I want to put what is happening in this country this very day in context or to explain it the best I can. The member who just spoke, I guess being as generous as I can, pointed out some of the flaws in our country. Indeed we have a number of them and we will admit to those, but I think we have to use real facts and real statistics when we are on our feet in this House. We cannot depend entirely on emotion to get our points across.

Some things have been mentioned in the House this evening with regard to what is wrong with Canada. They have stepped through the environment, fisheries, energy programs, unemployment insurance programs, and the child benefit package that we just debated in the House this week. We can step through each and every one of those and argue that we should be back in the House in the next eight weeks talking about those types of things, talking about the unemployment rate and talking about the fisheries.

However, we have dealt with those matters. We have packages, programs and legislation in place today dealing with those matters. They are not perfect. They will be refined from time to time. When we come back in November we will probably be taking another look at some of them in the House.

We have not forgotten those issues. We have not forgotten the fishermen in Newfoundland. We have not forgotten the cod fishery and the devastation that the lack of that resource has brought about in Newfoundland.

The minister of fisheries announced in the House the most generous package ever announced by the Government of Canada to deal with that very problem. We could agree that it is not enough and it will probably never be enough, but we have dealt with it.

In terms of the environment, Canada leads the world internationally with our green plan. It is the best in the universe. In terms of energy, I cannot speak with much authority in that area, although we do have the parliamentary secretary to the House leader with us this evening who can speak with authority in that area. We have an energy program, a package and a vision for this country that will work in future years.

We have an unemployment insurance program that was overhauled by this government in attempts to deal with the realities of the work place in Canada. We are doing those things. We have not forgotten those things.

The member talks about single parents, mothers and the jobless in Canada. We have not forgotten those people. We debated the child benefit package or that child benefit legislation that will replace the old family system, the child tax benefit system and the other accompanying tax benefit programs in a very constructive way. The package that was supposed to deal with certain realities out there was a very confusing mess.

When we talk about that we have to focus on what we did in this House as a government. We brought in a package that addressed reality. It addressed the people who need assistance from the Government of Canada, those lower and middle income working families, those poor families who need assistance. We have looked at that legislation and we have a package of which we can be very proud.

If there are other glaring realities that we have to deal with when we return to the House, we will deal with them. However, let us not be confused by some of the rhetoric that has been evident here this evening.

I mentioned earlier that Canada is positioned to lead the world next year in terms of economic growth. That fact is recognized by just about everyone outside the country. Every country in the world recognizes that this country called Canada has done the things that were necessary to move it along the way in terms of economic growth in future years. We have done that and we can be very proud of that.

When I cite those statistics I am not doing it in an abstract way. The member can criticize me for using that in a very abstract fashion, but it is not abstract. It is talking about the very thing that creates jobs in this country, the jobs we want to see. We have gone through some difficult periods and we will probably go through more of them.

When you form the government you have to do the things that you feel are necessary, and we have done them. Now we are being recognized internationally for having done those things.

If we want to get into comparing our record with the record that the previous government had in this country, I will stand up any day to compare. That is not what it is all about here this evening.

This evening we are going to be leaving this place. We are going to be leaving this place for eight weeks to discuss the very future of this country and whether we have a future. I think it is time that we left the politics of this issue behind us and leave here tonight in a spirit of generosity to go out and do the thing that is incumbent upon us to do; namely, talk about the good will of this country, the future of this country, what we have achieved in the mere 125 years that we have had as a country. We must go out and do our best to encourage Canadians to take a very serious look at the proposals we have before us, at the agreement that was reached in Charlottetown on August 28. I think it is incumbent upon us to go out in a very serious and dedicated way, explain those proposals and hope that Canadians reflect on them in a very genuine way between now and October 26 and be prepared to go out and support a renewed Canada on October 26.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): I want to start off by saying that I had the opportunity this morning to attend the funeral of Paul Martin Sr. in Windsor at Our Lady of Assumption parish church. As I listened to the eulogy that was delivered by my colleague from LaSalle—Émard, I was struck by many qualities of Paul Martin Sr., particularly by my colleague's description of how committed his father was to his riding. He said that in the last few days he came to a new realization that looking after his riding was more important than anything else he ever did. That was one of the reasons why Paul Martin Sr. throughout his entire life basically lived in his riding.

The respect that his community had for that dedication, for that service, was certainly exhibited today because there were literally thousands and thousands of people there who participated in this very, very special moment.

As I was listening to my colleagues this evening and as I was trying to figure a way to communicate to the government, I want to remind it of what Paul Martin Sr. was all about.

He was all about looking after his constituents. That is precisely why we are standing here on this side of the House tonight saying to the government that we really wish it would not close this House down for the next eight weeks. It is not just the next eight weeks. We have hardly been here since the third week in June. We have been away all but a couple of weeks. We are talking not sitting nearly five months of the year.

I know that I have been emotional tonight. I am emotional because I have been listening to my constituents all through the summer. I have many constituents who are doing well. I want to say to the member for Carleton—Charlotte that I had a barbecue in my backyard this summer and I had one of the most positive economists in all of Canada, Tom McCormack, give a speech saying how Canada was going to be better in the 1990s than it was in the 1980s.

I am not speaking tonight as someone who is negative. I am not speaking tonight as someone who is trying to put a sting on the government. I am here tonight to say to the Government of Canada that I have many people in my riding, in my city, and I know this condition exists right across the country, who are like patients in the intensive care room of a hospital.

There are men and women, single parents with children who do not have a job. Without a job you have no freedom; when your son or your daughter comes to you and asks you for money to buy a new pair of shoes for school or to buy a new blouse or whatever it may be, you do not have any money. In my city, in my riding, there are many people like that.

They are counting on me to be in this Chamber, trying to move the government, stimulate the government, to come up with some hopeful bridge until we get to the point the IMF talks about. We are not there yet. Until we get there we should be in this Chamber dealing and working for those people in our ridings who are disadvantaged.

I have listened to people in the last two months from the business community when this Chamber was not sitting. I do not want to sound emotional. I want to sound reasoned. Believe me, there are thousands of small businessmen in this country right now who are not sure if they can meet the payroll this Friday.

In my riding, and I am sure they say this to the members opposite, they say: "Please, get into that House of Commons and shake up the financial institutions of this country to help us over this period". That is what they are saying to me.

• (2010)

It is a pretty frustrating feeling to think that I have lost the last 60 days in trying to represent them in this House and now I will lose the next 60 days. It makes you wonder, what does an MP do? What I am doing here? At times it makes you feel totally useless.

From 1980 to 1984, I had the opportunity to work for Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau. I never agreed with everything that Mr. Trudeau said. He let this place debate. We used to have debates in this place three nights out of five until ten o'clock in the evening. It was a forum where members of Parliament could come, represent and call on the government, to say listen, I have constituents who need attention. I have patients in the intensive care room and they do not want you to say; "hey, sorry, we are not working tonight. We are going off duty". Hey, I am dying. I am about to lose my home, maybe it is my business, and we are going to say; "sorry, we are shutting down".

It is not right. I really, really believe that it is not right. In 1980, when we had a referendum here, we did not shut the House down completely. We debated. All through the referendum, we listened to the opposition when we were in power. Quite frankly, I am concerned. This debate has not reached the debating point yet because it has really been a yes hustle at this moment. I am not a constitutional lawyer. I for one have a lot of unanswered questions on this document. The member said to go back to your constituency and explain the agreement.

I can tell you right now, and I have talked to some of the best constitutional lawyers in this country including the former Prime Minister, this document is full of ambiguities. It is full of contradictions. If it is true that the people of Canada do not trust their politicians, in other words if the central issue is trust, then before I give an answer I am going to try and find out what it means and that is fair ball.

I would like with your permission to deposit with the table tonight a set of questions that I have on the document which hopefully, seeing as the place is closing down, I could present to the government. Hopefully, it could get them answered for me in the next 72 hours so it could help me do my job. With your permission I would like to deposit my unanswered questions on the floor of this House of Commons on this matter.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is necessary to have the unanimous consent of the House to table a report or a paper in the House of Commons.

Is there unanimous consent to table the paper of the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I thank the acting government House leader. I will give him an undertaking that if I get the answers to the questions I have put forward here, some of which I asked at four o'clock in the morning last week, and if I can satisfy myself that I am doing the right thing, I will campaign alongside him without any difficulty.

I say to the government that I am having great difficulty with this accord, this entente. That is another reason why I really feel that it is wrong to shut this House of Commons down, this nation's boardroom, when there is so much going on in this country.

This morning went I went to my front porch to get my Toronto Star the heading said: "11 per cent unemployment".

An hon. member: That was your first mistake.

Mr. Mills: The member is right, it was my first mistake. I should stop reading newspapers. However, this was the simple fact, 11 per cent unemployment. These are Statistics Canada numbers.

I am having a real problem with this idea that we are only going to be here for seven weeks in six months when I see so many people who are in economic pain. Governments should understand that part of our responsibility is to make the government accountable. By the government organizing this Parliament of Canada in a way that it has effectively shut down the operation for almost six months of the year by the time the Christmas period is included, I think the people of Canada are going to get very suspect about what is going on. The people of Canada are lying in the weeds right now. You can do all the polling you want but I am not sure that these polls are accurately reflecting what is going on.

In my community there is a deep, deep sense of mistrust about the way the government is managing the economy of this country. Failing to stand up to defend its agenda, to promote its agenda in a forum of debate, makes the people of Canada suspect and I think it is going to make it very difficult to sell this package.

It was four years ago that I was given the trust of the people of Broadview—Greenwood. Quite frankly, I do not know why we are not having an election. The four years are up. I really admire the skill of the people who surround this Prime Minister. I have said many times in this House that the machine of communications around this Prime Minister is superior. We are not even talking about an election when the four years are up. This government has no mandate to be doing what it is doing right now. Maybe the government's plan is to somehow orchestrate an election in the next three or four months. For all I know, this could be my last speech in the Parliament of Canada. It might be and it could be, I do not know, but I do know this: I can look at every one of my constituents in the eye and say that the four years you gave me I did my best to fight for you when you were in a disadvantaged state.

• (2020)

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, the member covered a lot of territory. I hope I can touch on some of it with your indulgence.

The member finished by mentioning something in the sense that it could be his last speech in the House and whether or not we would be facing an election. Nobody knows what we will be facing in the next three or four months. Perhaps we could be. I do not know either.

One of the things that we do agree on is that in spite of our differences, we will work the very best we can for our constituents. Whether or not we will be returned to this House, who would know?

I do want to touch upon the comment in regard to when elections are held. He referred to four years as being the tradition, but it is not always. Constitutionally, it is five years between elections in this country, as we all well know. It could in fact be a five-year mandate this time. Only the Prime Minister knows the answer to that one, but I believe that it will be.

Constitutional agreement is very hard to achieve in this country. The member mentioned that in his speech. What is included in this agreement that was reached in Charlottetown on August 18? I am not a constitutional lawyer either, and on that we agree. Neither one of us is. It is almost a shame that it has to be so legalistic, if you wish, and so complicated. I think it would be much better if we all understood exactly what any Constitution meant.

Obviously Constitution-making is like an economist. As one fellow told me many years ago in my teaching days: if you get two economists in the same room, you will come up with three different points of view because one of them will disagree with himself before the meeting is over. I guess that is the same in constitution making. We have as many interpretations as we do constitutional experts, so there will always be that question as to what does it actually say.

I do want to end on this, in all seriousness. I think we would all agree that in 1867 the constitutional-makers of the day did not have it all right, did they? They did not have it all right. I am sure if they had to do it over again, if they could, they would have done a few things differently. We all agree on that. I think we will also agree this time too when it is over that if we could have done some things differently, no matter what we agree on, we would have done some things differently.

This House is made up of imperfect human beings and Constitutions are carved out by those imperfect human beings. I will be the first to admit that there are parts of the Constitution, even as a lay person, as an ordinary Canadian, that I do not completely understand and never will understand. We must have an abiding faith in the sense that the Canadian people have come up with the best possible package that they could come up with. We will have to leave it to those constitutional experts to determine whether it was good or bad.

We owe the Canadian people the benefit of the doubt. We set out for perfection in 1867 and we did not achieve it. What we did achieve in that 125 years is the best country in the world.

That is what we will do this time, given the opportunity, given the chance.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I will make my response short.

I would agree that the Constitution has been serving us well for the last 125 years. Many people have said today that it is regrettable that we even got into it.

In 1981 when Premier Levesque did not sign on we should never forget the fact that 72 or 73 out of 75 federal members of Parliament for Quebec did sign on. We should never ever mislead Canadians about that very important fact. That is point one.

Second, the problem that I am having with this particular agreement is that in less than 30 days we have to absorb it and get expert advice. I am not anti-Canada. I am not anti-Canadian. I do not want to see the breakup of Canada. I really wish that we could go through the process of determining whether it is a good package or not and fleshing it out before we sign in a way that gives the Prime Minister and the premiers a blank cheque.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut]

[English]

Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to be here. Once again, I wish that we could do more of this in the next 36 days that we are going to be out campaigning. I am looking forward to the campaign to try to get people to understand the need for a yes vote on October 26.

However, the fact remains that the problems that plague us today are still going to be here. The Government of Canada would like to put them on the back burner while we campaign for the referendum, as well my colleagues from the New Democratic Party do not really want to have any debate in the next 36 days so they can be out in their ridings campaigning for the next election.

We have no problem with campaigning for the next election while campaigning for the referendum. However, the problems that plague us today are still going to be around, such as the 1.6 million unemployed, world problems such as Somalia and Yugoslavia, the fisheries in the Atlantic, or the bill that was just passed by the House of Commons, Bill C-80 which does away with the concept of universality.

Today, we are presently faced with a possible airline merger between the two biggest airlines in Canada, which will no longer have any competition and therefore will not be subject to the limitations in terms of air fares and other things that they presently must deal with as two competing airlines.

• (2030)

As I said, I look forward to the debates, to the campaign on the referendum while at the same time admitting that there should be an opportunity for the members of the House of Commons to debate the issues of today while talking about the referendum.

I would like to start off with the airline merger. My riding is called Nunatsiaq and to travel anywhere in my riding, if you are an Inuit unable to use a snowmobile quite adequately, all travel must be by air. There is not one community connected to another by road, with the exception of one community which has a road in the winter which is from Inuvik to Tuktoyaktuk, part of my riding.

The area that I represent you can only get to by air. Therefore, it is really a big deal for the people of the north when the two major airlines decide that they are going to merge and do away with the competition. We have another airline, owned by the Inuit of northern Quebec called First Air.

I have to smile. The transport minister, when he was asked about this particular company and said that it was Inuit owned, referred to the Inuit as the Cree. I would like him to have better information on who owns which airline. The Cree own Creebec Air and the Inuit own First Air. That is so the minister does not make the mistake again.

First Air, which is in partnership with Air Canada at this point, being a fairly independent airline, is free to compete with Canadian Airlines which also services parts of my riding such as Iqaluit, Hall Beach, Resolute Bay and Cambridge Bay. There is competition in some of those communities. However, Air Canada by association with First Air competes with Canadian Airlines for those communities in terms of air service in passengers and freight.

Just imagine if the two airlines merge, Air Canada and Canadian Airlines. There would be no need to compete with the airline that you competed previously with. Air

Canada would not have to compete any more with Canadian Airlines because they would be one airline.

What happens is the association with First Air would not be needed any more because there would be no competition any more. Therefore, Canadian Airlines or Air Canadian or whatever it may be called under the new merger would suddenly have no need for our major airline that services Iqaluit, Rankin Inlet, Hall Beach, Cambridge Bay, Resolute Bay as well as all the Baffin Island communities through smaller engine airplanes.

What happens if Air Canada decides it does not need First Air any more? First Air will not have the means to compete with one big airline in some of those selected communities and therefore will have to cut back on services. If it does, we northerners will all suffer. As I mentioned in the beginning of my speech, the only way to get to those communities is by air.

We could have been debating all this in the next 36 days if we were just able to keep the House sitting while we are campaigning for the referendum.

I hope that if the merger does go through, which, barring divine intervention, it will, I hope that there will be enough safeguards put in place to ensure that the service to the north does not suffer. There is always room for improvement, there is always room to move around, but the air service to the north is pretty good. I hope that if the merger happens there will be some safeguards put in place. We will be trying to ensure that our concerns are addressed by this government as well as by the airlines that are looking at the merger.

I would also like to touch on another area that is plaguing the north and will be very much in the next number of years, the reduction in federal funding for cost-shared social housing in the Northwest Territories. The federal Cabinet has just turned down a request by the government of the Northwest Territories to the Minister of Public Works to keep up the amount of money coming into the Northwest Territories for social housing in the future. As a result, we who were supposed to get 375 units in 1993, SeaLift, will now be getting only 153. There was a housing need survey done just recently. It was established that there is a need for 3,584 affordable, adequate and suitable housing units. This is an increase from 3,136 in 1990. In two years there was an increase of 14 per cent in the need for housing.

Again, all our housing has to be brought in. There is not one tree in my riding that we could cut down to make a house. In the winter we can build igloos but they have a limited life span. As soon as the weather warms up, they are gone. This government should take a very serious look at what it has done to the people in the Northwest Territories by slashing the budget for the NWT in terms of social housing, in terms of public housing.

Just to ensure that the people understand how reflective this is of the north, out of the 17 odd thousand households, 14,536 were visited and interviewed, which is roughly 90.2 per cent of all the households in the north. Only a mere 4.9 per cent refused to be interviewed at all, to talk about a lack of housing.

I think the government would be well advised to take a second look at what they have put through. You have to remember in the north the majority of people need public housing. There is not a very big demand for private housing because of the cost of building a house. It is beyond the means of most northerners to finance the building of a house in the north. Only a few do so, although there is starting to be more. There will always be a need for that type of public housing.

I think you have to also remember it is a very expensive proposition to build a house. Not only do you have to import the building materials, you have to import everything else that goes into the house, such as the plumbing, kitchen, and furniture. You still have to build it. The only thing you do not have to import is the gravel for the foundation and even then we have to import the pipes the house will sit on because that is the norm today.

There are all these items we can debate and here we are adjourning for the next one and a half months because this government and our friends in the New Democratic Party do not want to debate the important issues facing us today.

I would now like to go on to what is happening in the Northwest Territories or the Eastern Arctic in terms of the Inuit. On April 14, 1981, the Inuit voted to create Nunavut which means 'our land'. On May 4, 1992, 11 years later, the Inuit voted on the boundary to create Nunavut. On November 2, 3 and 4, the Inuit will vote to decide whether to ratify the agreement, in principle, that has been reached by the negotiators between the Federation of Nunavut and the government of Canada.

I believe in Nunavut. I have a pin here that says 'Nunavut and Inukjuak' depicting Nunavut. I know for a fact we are going to get Nunavut sooner or later. However, the negotiators of the federal government, the territorial government and the Inuit have decided Nunavut cannot be without the agreement in principle for negotiated claims being part of it. For better or worse, that agreement was reached some time ago. As a result, the government told us today if we want Nunavut, we have to ratify the claims even if we do not necessarily like what is in the claims. I maintain that all it would take for Nunavut to be created is political will by this government or by the government of the day and the Inuit. I am sure that if the ratification vote on November 2, 3 and 4 does not go through the Inuit, even if they go back to the drawing board to negotiate the agreement, would still be in favour of going ahead with the creation of a Nunavut territory which would not be an Inuit territory but which would be a public government concept.

I would like to quote the federal negotiator, Mr. Tom Molloy, who said that if the Inuit do not like the way the government is following the terms of the agreement they can always take it to court. If the government is not living up to the Inuit's expectations under the terms of the agreement in principle, the Inuit can take them to court. It is not that simple. If we get an agreement we know that the government will do its best to slow down the process of implementation. But I must also say that this agreement is for our children and the future.

I would like to quote a couple of people. One is a Joseph Aglukark, who is a young man living in Gjoa Haven who says: "The federal government shouldn't be telling us what we can have". He is absolutely right. We should be able to understand what we can have and what we would like to have. The government as well as other people keep saying: "We are paying you. We are giving you $580 million. This young man says: "Within three or four years, they're going to triple what they paid through mining and big game hunters". That is pretty accurate, I think.

Qitsualik says: "The Inuit, who will receive title to 18.3 per cent of Nunavut land, should have received more for ceding their aboriginal claim". What we are doing and what this government has done is made a precondition to extinguish our claim before we even sit down to negotiate.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, this adjournment debate tonight really caps off one of the longest periods that the House of Commons and Parliament will not be sitting in years. In fact, during the period from June 19 to November 16, the House will have only sat eight days. Most of that time, debate has been concerned really with the constitutional agreement which was reached in Charlottetown last month.

The people of this country are extremely concerned with the economic mess the country is in. It is interesting to hear the members of the treasury benches talk about how things will look good in a year or so, according to estimates in the OECD reviews. In fact, over the last four years of the 34th Parliament, and we are almost to the end of a typical four-year term, we have been through an extremely bad time. The economic recession we are in now, which has been going on for some 30 months, is the worst since the 1930s. The impact of the free trade agreement with the United States has been devastating to say the least. It is not just a case of the cyclical downturns we faced in the 1981-82 recession, we are seeing whole sectors of the Canadian economy being destroyed. People have no confidence that the manufacturing sectors will ever return.

We do not see much encouragement in the GATT negotiations. We hope there will be a new agreement in 1993 but clearly agriculture, in particular the supply management sectors, believes it was sold out in the free trade deal and that it will be further reduced in the GATT negotiations.

The whole western grain economy is in a shambles because of the trade wars that are going on between the European Economic Community and the United States. There is the uncertainty of depending on government payments to supplement income when the price simply is not at a level to maintain farming.

The Government of Canada day after day supports the President of the United States, saying it is all the fault of the European Economic Community, while the President, in order to buy a few more votes in the presidential election, spends a billion dollars to subsidize exports of grain.

When the Canadian negotiators came back from the North American free trade deal, we saw the same kinds of problems they agreed to in the FTA, they agreed to in the NAFTA. There was no resolution of the problems of countervail and subsidy. They did not agree to a subsidy code so the problems of countervail will continue whether it is on steel, softwood lumber of other commodities.

There was no agreement on an anti-dumping code. Every other major international trading agreement, whether it is the European Economic Community, the Australian-New Zealand agreement, all have arrangements there for a subsidy code, for anti-dumping code arrangements so that those irritants do not go on year after year and yet our government comes home empty-handed.

The impact of the uncertainty of the GATT negotiations and the impact of hundreds of thousands of jobs being lost in the free trade deal with the United States, combined with a massive doubling of the debt of the country during the eight year tenure of this government has been devastating. Add to that the uncertainty and the adverse impact of problems for the tourist industry and problems for all small business because of the GST, the economy and the private sector is just weltering under the impact of the government's trade policy, taxation policy and fiscal policy. Perhaps the most devastating has been its monetary policy.

In the period leading up to the recession in 1990 we were following a policy of having interest rates at least 5 per cent higher than the United States. The Governor of the Bank of Canada went on day after day, month after month, bludgeoning the Canadian economy. He wanted to lick inflation. He certainly has achieved that but the anguish, the turmoil and the economic carnage of the Canadian economy, nobody has seen anything like it since the 1930s.

When the Government of Canada signs a free trade deal with the United States and then the Governor of the Bank of Canada imposes an interest rate policy that is 5 percentage points above the United States, which in turn escalates the value of the Canadian dollar by some 15 per cent or 20 per cent between 1986 and 1990, there could be nothing but turmoil and hardship and that is what we are in now.

It is not the Governor of the Bank of Canada earning a couple of hundred thousand dollars a year who pays the price. It is the forestry worker in northern Ontario. It is the person involved in manufacturing in southern Ontario. It is the person who tends a small business. It is those individuals, such as the farmers in the west, who have paid the price of this government's monetary policy.

In the 25 years I have been a member, I cannot remember as difficult a time in my district. We have literally lost thousands of jobs. In Elliott Lake, a city of 13,000, we have lost about 3,400 of the 4,000 mining jobs and perhaps another 1,500 or 2,000 in the service sector. That is in a community with very little support at this stage. The government will probably spend $12 to $15 million in UIC payments in that community, and yet there is no money for training. It defies intelligence that the government will not provide training for people receiving quite large UIC payments as income support.

A person in his early 30s who has been earning quite good wages as a production uranium miner may have very few other skills or abilities to get another job. He will be provided with a year's UIC benefits but no training allowance. We had 1,000 uranium miners laid off in Denison mine this past spring. Most of them are coming into UIC benefits now. They had severance pay benefits during the late spring and summer months. Now they are coming into UIC benefits. They should be taking upgrading courses. They should be taking retraining, and yet there is absolutely no money.

I asked the Minister of Employment and Immigration about that today and there was simply no answer. Why would the government provide all of this money for income support and no training? At the end of the year, the individual will use up his training or income support and will have no additional training or skills to attract jobs.

This adjournment debate tonight is taking place when we are facing the prospect of a national referendum on the Charlottetown accord on constitutional arrangements. I am sure as we go out to the hustings and work on the referendum, people will want to know why we have done so little for the economy during the five-month period between mid-June and mid-November. Clearly, that is the priority of all Canadians and should be the priority of this government, but the government is slithering away.

I want to make a couple of points about the Charlottetown agreement. It really is a very important historic agreement. It is an agreement that has been reached between the Prime Minister, the ten premiers and the aboriginal peoples. It covers quite a large range of issues. It covers a new Canada Clause, which sets out the broad scope of our nation: our Parliamentary democracy; our equality of peoples; our recognition of the distinctive character of Quebec with its French language and culture and civil law. It sets out the basics of our nation.

This agreement also, for the first time since the 1982 agreement, brings Quebec into the Canadian Constitution. In my view that is absolutely essential, because we know the pressures from the separatists and the nationalists in that province. Therefore, that adhesion to the Canadian Constitution is absolutely essential.

It recognizes the desire of the aboriginal people for a new arrangement, aboriginal self-government. We know that the bands across this country are really held in trust by the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs. This agreement, although it only sets it out in a broad framework, makes provision for aboriginal self-government.

The Constitution makes an arrangement with regard to an elected Senate. The western provinces and many of the eastern provinces, like those of us in northern Ontario, feel that their views are not always heard. Therefore, this agreement provides for an elected Senate that has equal representation from each province. Although some of us would like to have seen it have stronger powers, because we think that makes it more responsible and more desirable, it is the agreement that was reached between the provinces, the vast majority of which are in the regions outside the two central provinces. It does provide a trade-off in which some 34 new members of Parliament would shift from the Senate, essentially in the central provinces.

Those of us in northern Ontario who saw the loss of one seat back in 1976 welcome the opportunity that perhaps we will continue to have the same representation from northern Ontario, some 11 seats, and perhaps even more with the new provision for some 18 additional members of Parliament from Ontario.

The regime sets out an arrangement for a division of powers that would essentially give a stronger voice for the provinces in areas that have traditionally been theirs anyway: urban affairs, tourism, mining and forestry. That is not to say that there would not still be a federal role but it makes provision for agreements and clarifies those divisions of powers.

I do not personally like to see decentralization of a power because I think that the federal government must have the power and strength to equalize opportunities across the country. However, either we have an honourable compromise between those who would rather see a more decentralized federation and those who want a more centralized one, as this agreement tries to do, or perhaps we will not have a country, at least not one that is unified.

The section with regard to economic union does not provide as strong an economic union as those on our side of the House would like to see. It is my understanding that the NDP premiers opposed this negotiation and so it was not possible to provide for it, but the NDP in some of those provinces will not be in power forever. It is an arrangement that can be changed with the support of seven provinces out of ten, with 50 per cent of the population. It can be amended at some time in the future.

Likewise, I think the Senate arrangement could be strengthened simply by the rules of the House. Perhaps there could be an arrangement so that instead of having a joint session whenever the Senate opposed a bill coming through the House there could be a suspensive veto simply by rule of the House for a three or six-month period, whatever was felt to be necessary to perhaps strengthen the effectiveness of the Senate.

I do not think that this referendum campaign that we are leaving tonight to join will be that pleasant an experience because it could well bring out great divisions in the country.

A referendum was necessary. Three provinces, Quebec, British Columbia and Alberta, had it in their rules that there had to be a referendum, so I think that a national referendum was desirable in those circumstances.

I believe that we have to move on. We have to turn the page. We have to settle the constitutional problems. No constitutional arrangement will ever be perfect when you have 10 divergent provinces negotiating with one central government. This covers many concerns such as the concern of a Canada clause to set out the broad scope and the directions of our country.

It puts forward a proposal with regard to aboriginal self-government. It deals with the desire of many provinces for an elected Senate. Clearly the Senate is bound to be elected some day. It deals with the question of the division of powers. It deals to some extent with the economic union.

I would hope that this would pass. It seems to me that we are celebrating our 125th anniversary this year and clearly we have made progress in many things since 1967, in the last 25 years. We are 30 per cent larger. Our life expectancy is five years longer. One thing that we lack is that tremendous esprit de corps, that enthusiasm, that confidence we had in 1967.

I hope that this referendum will bring back some of that confidence, that we will succeed in making arrangements for a new Constitution for this country, that we will reach out and form a new relationship across the country so that we can go on to reaching the opportunity that is there for Canada to provide for its people. We have the resources, we have the people. It is simply a case of putting it together in a constructive way.

I hope that will be the result of this referendum. I hope the country will not be broken by it. That would be the greatest tragedy for this country that could ever happen.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment my hon. colleague from Algoma on his usual very common sense type of speech in this House and for his great in-depth interest in our country.

He mentioned the Constitution and some of the divisions of powers that are in the new deal. I am wondering how this will help situations such as he mentioned at Elliot Lake.

One thing that we are faced with today is a very slow process in looking after the older workers' adjustment programs and applications that are submitted. I do not know why we cannot move people into those areas to speed them up and help people out.

There is certainly a lack of training funds. Now the employer and the employees have to contribute the full amount to the Unemployment Insurance Commission of Canada.

Does the hon. member not believe that if we had a more direct responsibility from the national government in this country and more solid leadership from the national government of this country we could do a lot more in training those people he is talking about? What we need is some direct action to make sure that the funds are there to do it.

I know that in his area and in my area if we took even half the unemployment insurance payments that are paid out every year we could probably train those people and create jobs for them and have them better employed.

• (2110)

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member from Renfrew has really hit the nail on the head.

The problem is that we do not seem to have the flexibility in the way that the Unemployment Insurance Act is operated. Clearly, if you are going to have an unemployment insurance scheme in which essentially the employers and the employees put the funds into it, companion to that have to be the necessary training arrangements.

We have uranium production miners who earn very good wages and they are very skilled at what they do. However, when a mine shuts down as we have seen at Denison and Quirk 1 and Panel Mine in Elliot Lake and there are no other mining jobs available, then their skills are totally inadequate.

We had the situation this summer, I think we have it cleared up now, in which the local manpower office was forcing people who were on unemployment insurance to take only 10 hours of training a week. This is prevocational training at a high school. It was not costing anything but it said it has to be limited to 10 hours.

We got in touch with the director in Sault Ste. Marie and he said as long as they are willing to be available to take any job that comes along, they can go to school. Therefore, we were able to get that clarified, but there simply are not the funds.

Last year at this time we had something like 2,400 uranium miners laid off out of the 4,000 who were there two years ago. We got $2.5 million of funding for that. This year in April and May we had another 1,000 miners laid off but the budget for this fiscal year was $600,000.

Imagine one training course in heavy equipment operation or some of those types of courses in which 12 or 15 people for training are taken. The cost of $600,000 for 1,000 employees being laid off is simply, totally inadequate.

Unless the government is willing to take it seriously, UI is going to run out and then these people are going to go on welfare because they have not the skills and there are no funds being provided. That is why I put the question to the minister today in the House, to demand that the money be put in.

Much of the training dollars now come out of the UIC fund, which I think is wrong to start with but that is where they come from now, some $800 million or so every year. That works on a calendar year, whereas the training from the departmental estimates comes on the fiscal year.

I am hoping that additional funds will be made available January 1 so that some of these people who were just going on to UI will be able to be eligible for training funds and to get out of this trap of UI with no training.

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to raise the question about the GATT negotiations.

I know the hon. member's agricultural critic has been following this very closely, as have the rest of us who have large farm communities. I must compliment the members in our party who do not have any farmers in the community but who are still taking a great interest in the agricultural difficulties today.

I am wondering, does the hon. member for Algoma think that these negotiations are ever going to come to an end? Where is Canada going to sit when this is all finished? I would like to have his comments on that because I know we have a lot of farmers out there tonight who are very concerned about these issues. Since the government is closing down the House tonight, at least it should have one last word from a good agricultural critic to let it know what is happening out there before we leave tonight.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, the question of the GATT negotiations are closely tied to the politics of the European Economic Community and to the politics of the United States, since essentially they make a deal and everybody else either accepts it or does not.

The referendum on the Maastricht treaty that is taking place in France this weekend will have some effect on those negotiations. There could be no negotiations during this past couple of months because of the uncertainty of the French government as to exactly what was going to happen in the Europe '92 integration proposal, and it is having a referendum on it this weekend. That has called all of the monetary and fiscal negotiations into question these past few days, with the decision by Germany not to lower its interest rates.

The other uncertainty, of course, is the United States and what is going to happen there. I believe that many of the Europeans will try to negotiate, assuming that the Maastricht treaty is agreed to this fall. It is hard to believe that things will really get settled until after the presidential election which is taking place in early November. Depending on who wins that election, the negotiations will be consummated one way or another.

There is sort of a window between the 20th of January when the president will be inaugurated or re-inaugurated, and March of next year. If there is going to be a new GATT arrangement, the negotiations and the final decision will have to be made during that period in order to meet the fast track arrangement of the United States Congress. An agreement would have to be reached during that period if it was to be agreed to by both the United States Congress and the Senate. Clearly, this is causing great uncertainty.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. friend from Algoma for that reply on the farm question.

Tonight I have a number of items that I want to raise. Since we must deal with the economy and the problems of the people of this country, the first is the problem of older workers being laid off. I have a number of applications and interested applicants in my particular part of the country, in my riding and throughout the Ottawa Valley.

When one gets the reply that applications will probably not be looked at until next spring, it is pretty devastating news to pass on to constituents, particularly those who have worked at a job all their lives. We want training money and we learn that there is no training money for them, yet the government is making a big issue of re-training people. We all know that we have to train and re-train people from now on, maybe two or three times during the course of their lifetimes.

We are really in a sad plight in this country, and I think it is just horrendous that this House is being closed down tonight with these issues facing the nation.

The training funds that I mentioned, and which my hon. friend from Algoma mentioned, largely come from the Unemployment Insurance Commission funds. We have that famous Bill C-21 on the Unemployment Insurance Act that the government made such a big to-do about and blamed the Senate for holding it up when the Senate was really holding it up for a good reason.

It virtually took the federal government of this nation off the hook by putting them in the position of not having to pay money into the Unemployment Insurance Commission. It has raised and raised again the UIC contributions that employers and employees must pay into that fund to keep it active. This money is also not just used to pay the unemployed as I said before, but also to retrain people.

These are just some of the issues. Sectors of the economy are really hurting. People out there are unemployed who never thought they were ever going to be unemployed in their life. They are in a state of depression and this government decides to adjourn the House for the referendum.

The referendum vote is very important because the Constitution of this country does belong to the people of Canada and they must know what they are voting for when that day comes. There is a big selling job out there to do in telling people what is in that package; good and bad.

Just recently in this country, and in this Parliament, we have paid tribute to two very senior and long-time solid politicians and statesmen, the Hon. George McIlraith from the Ottawa area and the Hon. Paul Martin who represented a constituency in the Windsor area in this House for 33 consecutive years. Mr. McIlraith was here for 32 consecutive years.

They would be appalled to see the government closing down this House tonight. Others have mentioned the short time that we have sitting here in the last number of months. This Parliament belongs to the people of Canada and they expect us to be here tackling the problems of the day. Yes it does add a greater burden on everybody but that is our job.

One thing that is wrong with this place, this Parliament and the House of Commons, is that members do not know one another. We are certainly not going to get to know one another any better if we are not sitting in session.

When I first came here and for a number of years afterwards we had night sittings and the members got to know one another because their offices were closed at night and they were here in the House of Commons. The House of Commons was a place of great importance and the members paid attention to what was going on.

We look at it today and it is a matter of making speeches and sometimes you wonder who is listening in the government and, indeed, within Parliament itself.

I think we should revamp this House. We have had rules revamped before but a system has got to come about whereby the members in this House mix more, the partisanship that we have seen in the House must be toned down, there must be more constructive work done. The leadership must come from the government.

It is not enough to say hello in the hallways and talk across committee tables on Parliament Hill. As you well know, it takes awhile to make good solid friends but when you make friends in the House of Commons you can bridge gaps back and forth across this floor and you can get much more done. Today there is not enough attention paid to the public relations among members here on Parliament Hill.

This House of Commons has to become more meaningful and it is not going to become more meaningful if you are going to close it down, go away for several weeks at a time then come back for a few days, then adjourn for Christmas. When are we coming back in the new year?

Debates and exchanges must take place on the issues facing this country. This is the people's Parliament. People talk about how great Canada has become in the last 125 years, but Canada did not become great in the last 125 years by closing down Parliament in the way that the government is doing tonight.

People talk about serious national issues that arise. Certainly there comes a time of crisis when these finally pile up and they suddenly have to be solved. That is really the position we are in today. These situations quite often come about because of a lack of clear-cut leadership in the country.

In the 12 years between 1848 and 1860 in American history there were a total of four presidents in that 12 year period. They were called the dough-head presidents. They went down in American history as the four dough-head presidents. They were called that because they and their parties would not make a serious decision on any great issue of the day. As a result, they drifted into a civil war in the United States. It was that civil war that had a great deal to do with joining the colonies of this part of North America under the British Empire for self-protection under the Confederation of 1867.

Then we started in earnest to develop links between and among the various regions of the country. I am using this example because the issues of this nation have to be taken absolutely seriously, and we cannot deal with them seriously if the House is not sitting.

We drifted into World War II because none of the great powers would support the League of Nations in those days. Canada was the leading country in the league when it finally folded, and I think that we have always played more than our role in international affairs. We have done so with the trust of other nations of the world. There is a lot that we can do abroad, but there is certainly a lot that has got to be done right here at home.

When things are allowed to drift, as the world drifted into World War II, we lost 45,000 young Canadians who could have been great leaders in this country over the past number of years and into the future. We lost another 66,000 in World War I. A lot of these things happen because of lack of leadership.

I am saying this in an historical sense tonight because, and I do not want to necessarily cast reflections here, I get very impatient when I see Parliament not being taken seriously. We will pay for it and the people of Canada will pay for it. It is not fair to them that this Parliament is not sitting to deal with the things that are really bothering them today.

Blame is always being placed on people in the past. Yesterday, in this House, I was amazed to hear a minister of the Crown still blaming the Liberal government back in 1984 for the problems the Conservatives have had with the finances of this country. That is incredible. It was over eight years ago and they are still blaming the previous government.

During the election campaign of 1984 we all heard from the Tories right across this country how easy it was to handle the finances of this country, how easy it was to solve economic problems, how easy it was to handle the farm problems of this country; all the great ideas that were passed around in 1984. Eight years later they are well on their way to tripling the national debt of this country. These were going to be the wizards of finance of the day.

I mentioned a while ago that the GATT talks are going on and on and on and they are creating a great deal of uncertainty for the farm community of this country. The hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex is in my riding speaking to a number of my farmers tonight. I know there is going to be a lot of concern expressed to him about this difficulty.

I said before and I will say again that farming in this country, fisheries and forestry, from pre-Confederation days, going back to real pioneer days, have been the three main staple crops and underpinnings of the economy of Canada. Even today it is the case but all three of these major sectors of our economy have been in trouble and are in trouble and look as if they are going to have some time yet to come to grips with it. There is no vision in this government today.

I like others want to see the constitutional debate brought to a close for the moment and get on with other economic factors of this nation. However, that is not to say that I agree with everything in it because I do not and I would be totally dishonest if I did not say so.

I think that training programs in this country have to have some national direction if we are going to use those great terms we here from the government quite a bit, competitive with the rest of the world. We must have some uniformity of training in the country and it must be made equal to all people right across the country to receive that kind of training.

We do not want to ever again see the horrendous days that people went through during the depression years of this country when Saskatchewan was almost a broken province. Other provinces of this country were the next thing to being broke. Municipalities were broke.

That is when we brought in the Rowell–Sirois Commission report that I mention quite often in this House. It was the most qualified in–depth study that has ever been done on constitutional issues in this country and on the division of finances within this country.

We are well ready for another real in–depth look at this nation in that regard. If we look back to the situations that brought about that very well qualified, intelligent commission, those people were extremely well picked and they did one of the most in–depth jobs of any commission ever appointed in the history of Canada.

I want to give an idea of some of the things that they actually did. The Royal Commission on Dominion–Provincial Relations, very much related to the constitutional issues that are going on today and the financial issues that are happening today, the Rowell–Sirois Commission as it was best known, had a mandate to examine the distribution of constitutional powers and the financial arrangements of the federal system.

Judicial decision since the 1920s had left the provinces with heavy responsibilities in social fields and the federal government with access to the largest sources of revenue.

The commission's task was to find a new constitutional equilibrium that would distribute revenues and responsibilities in conformity with the needs of an industrial society. Its work was not welcomed everywhere. Premiers Hepburn, Duplessis and Aberhart were loud in their opposition while other provincial premiers worried about the potential centralist thrust of the commission.

In 1940 its major recommendations, which included federal responsibility for unemployment insurance and the establishment of a system of federal adjustment grants to the provinces, were rejected by the largest provinces led by Ontario. But by that date the outbreak of another world war made a rearrangement of federal–provincial revenue sharing a necessity, at least on an ad hoc basis. Moreover, by then King had won the approval of the provinces for a constitutional amendment giving Ottawa the power to enact unemployment insurance legislation.

What has happened today? That great bill known as Bill C–21 took the federal government off the hook on its constitutional responsibility for looking after the unemployed in this country in the sense that it gave it a free hand of not contributing to the Unemployment Insurance Commission fund.

What happens when it does that? It simply throws back the responsibilities for the unemployed, and indeed for the training of the unemployed, on to provincial governments where it was before this whole problem happened. That is why governments went broke in the 1930s.

If the economy does not improve the provinces of this country are going to see greater and greater debt thrust on them. Municipalities are going to have greater and greater debt thrust on them. They are at the bottom. They take it when nobody else does it. It is not fair for the municipalities across this country to face that. It is not fair for the provinces to face that. If we are to have a national government in this country, if we are to talk about the Constitution and if we are going to go out and campaign for our Constitution, then it is time the national government of this country, a government of this country, took the national responsibility to do it.

I have difficulty all the way in not supporting this constitutional arrangement to a degree because it does not provide that over–all national leadership we need in this country. I am going to go out and campaign for it, because I hope that in the future a good Liberal government and others in this country will come forward with good amendments to that Constitution, revamp it, and once again make the Parliament of Canada important and let Canadians know that there is a national government in this country, a Liberal government that will accept its responsibilities and live up to not only the 1867 Confederation Act, the British North American Act, but the one we have today.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I always listen with respect and attention to my hon. friend from Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke, and tonight was no exception. The hon. member covered a wide range of topics, and I am going to comment on just two or three of them.

He said that he would like to see more friendship among members in the House. He also spoke favourably of the idea of improving the rules. I hope he will work with me and my friend from Kingston and the Islands in the latest phase of parliamentary reform, which I think the country and certainly parliamentarians would welcome.

On the issue of a friendship among members, he advocated better public relations among members. Of course the committee system helps with that. He indicated that it does not go all the way. Perhaps we ought to have an ice-breaking get-together when we reassemble on November 16 or whenever we do assemble.

The motion that was approved earlier today provided for the House to return no later than November 16.

I agree with my hon. friend from Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke that we would all like to see the constitutional debate concluded. Of course, Canadians share that feeling. The phrase constitutional fatigue has arisen.

On the subject of Bill C-21 and the reform of the unemployment insurance system, I wonder if my hon. friend would not agree that in a way the chief effect of that reform was to return it to what it was originally intended to be, which is an insurance scheme in which employees and employers pay the premiums for insurance against becoming unemployed?

Would he not also agree that hundreds of millions of dollars have flowed through Bill C-21 into training and retraining schemes, and that is an appropriate source for such funds?

I do wish to correct with great respect an impression that my hon. friend may have left with the House and with the country, and that is that Parliament is being closed down. What is happening is that members of Parliament are being freed to campaign on the side of their choice in the referendum campaign. It was suggested by an earlier speaker that members of Parliament would not have an opportunity to deal with immigration issues and that sort of thing. I for one will be in my constituency office dealing with those matters as well as doing the campaigning.

Finally, my friend mentioned the dough-head presidents of 1848 to 1860. I wanted to ask him whether he was alluding to a particular government, to this government. If he was suggesting that this government has not made, in his words, "a serious decision", I would ask him what it is we have been castigated about tonight by his colleagues.

Privatization, sales tax reform, deregulation, free trade, inflation fighting, the abolition of FIRA and the NEP, national reconciliation through constitutional renewal, GRIP and NISA, all have been done through Parliament. Those were all serious decisions and all taken by this government.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest for his comments. I would say that he is certainly one who makes an attempt to build friendships in this place. I have known him quite well and I have a great respect for him.

He talked about the unemployment insurance fund as being a real insurance scheme, in which people pay their fees. However, it is not just the people who receive unemployment insurance who are paying these insurance fees. It is also the employer who pays the increased fees, but the employer does not benefit from that scheme. It is really part of his expenses in salaries and wages.

In that sense, it is not a true insurance scheme and I do not know how it could be. If it was in the sense that he is talking about, the whole onus would have to be put on the worker to pay the total amount of insurance.

Also, in times that are very difficult such as these, I meant that small businesses are having a very difficult time today. They are a big employer and it is really notfair to load them down with greater overhead at a time when they are doing their level best to keep their businesses open and keep their people employed and off the unemployment rolls. In that sense I listed the constitutional responsibility of the federal government to put money into that fund as well and certainly into training Canadians. You are going to have to train Canadians in the years to come. You cannot throw this burden on the lower levels of government, employers and the workers, day in and day out in the future. There has to be some leadership in the financial management of these programs.

In his comments about closing Parliament down, that is what is taking place. He said members are being allowed to leave to campaign. What is wrong with giving a number of members time off to campaign? This has happened many times before in this House. You can still keep the House of Commons going. All Canadians will understand that all members cannot be here, but we are dealing with the issues of the country.

In my own case, and I am sure in the case of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, we have some good leaders in our constituencies. Just because we are here in Parliament representing them, the whole campaign is not going to fall flat. There are some very good people out there who we will be on our teams. Some of them have come to me already and they will do a good job. I think it will create a great rapport when we get people from other parties helping out with the campaign and explaining to people what it is all about. One member of Parliament is not going to have a chance to talk to everybody and explain this. You need a committee and a program. You need your committee out there telling people what it is about.

Just because the member is in the House two or three days of the week and out campaigning the rest does not mean the whole campaign on the constitutional package is going to cease because the member has suddenly left to go to Ottawa. I have faith in the people I will have on my committee to do that kind of work. I am sure every member in the House can set it up that way.

On the term 'castigation', he maintained I said the government was not making decisions. There are some decisions the government has not made. There are decisions it has made that are absolutely wrong. Just because legislation is passed through the House of Commons does not mean it made a good decision. Canadians have to live with those decisions all the time this government is in power.

I do not think just because a bill passes the House of Commons makes it suddenly correct. There are problems with it and people know there have been bills that have gone through this House of Commons that are going to cause them difficulties. Instead of castigating, I think it is being a reasonable critic of the fact some of your legislation is bad. Many people out there think it is very bad indeed, as the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands says.

Mr. Milliken: They want to give the government the boot.

Mr. Hopkins: I would not want the hon. member to feel badly that I am castigating him just because I am telling him there are many things this government has done that are absolutely wrong, and it does not seem to us they are improving a great deal these days either.

INFRASTRUCTURE IMPROVEMENTS

ESTABLISHMENT OF TRI-LEVEL FUNDING PROGRAM

The House resumed from Friday, May 15 consideration of the motion of Mr. Benjamin (p. 10825).

Ms. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the motion concerns the inability of municipal infrastructures to meet the current needs of Canadians with respect to water treatment and supply and to respond to their concerns about the environment and about threats to public health.

Infrastructures must be improved, expanded and modernized. This is indeed a tall order. To do so, it will be necessary to invest billions of dollars and to determine where the money should come from, which will not be easy, considering the economic situation all governments are facing today.

One point that should be made is the fact that water demand in municipalities is unlimited because there is no appropriate control system and no commensurate billing for this resource. Even if we did have commensurate rates without meters the many people who are connected to municipal water systems have no idea of the level of their water consumption.

Installing meters is essential for water conservation and to ensure this resource does not run out. All homes have meters for hydro and gas and most of the services we purchase are measured by weight and volume. A supplier wants to know how much of his product is consumed and users should be able to check their consumption.

The federal government's responsibility for conservation and sustainable development of our water supply is limited to encouraging proper management of the resource and an appreciation of its value. Providing water meters or financing their purchase and installation is not a federal responsibility.

As was pointed out by my colleague, the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden, only 50 per cent of connections to public water mains in Canada have meters. Installing meters across the country would be the first essential step of any nation-wide program to renew Canadian municipal infrastructures. Without the ability to measure water consumption one cannot think of implementing a realistic rate structure to recover the full cost from the user.

Can we think of another multi-billion dollar industry that does not measure the usage of its main product? Can we imagine stopping at a filling station and paying the same price no matter the amount of gasoline desired? It is unthinkable.

Since measuring water consumption is of the utmost importance for recovering the full cost and setting a realistic rate structure and therefore is very important for municipal infrastructure, the minister will look carefully into the measurement of water consumption in order to see whether water meters should be installed in all Canadian municipalities and what benefits would flow from such action. The minister will first consider the current situation in Canada as far as water measurement is concerned and then discuss the costs and benefits.

In Canada only about half the public water service connections are metered. Furthermore, the smaller the community, the less likely it is to measure consumption, although consumption is not measured in large areas of some of the biggest cities, such as Calgary Toronto and Vancouver.

In cities where some connections are metered, 72 per cent of industrial use, 67 per cent of commercial use and only 31 per cent of domestic use are measured. This situation clearly works against any attempt to set prices for municipal water services that reflect their true value. It just cannot be done under such conditions.

Theoretically, consumers are as free to waste water when consumption is measured as when it is not. However, actual experience shows that the opposite happens. Volumes vary greatly between regions where consumption is measured and those where it is not. Households consume between 0.5 and 0.7 cubic metres per day where it is measured and 1.3 cubic metres per day where it is not. This is a universal phenomenon. This difference is due to the drop in consumption, often as much as 25 per cent, after meters are installed and users are charged on the basis of volume consumed.

We should understand that this drop in consumption does not follow an increase in unit cost but is because customers pay for each unit consumed. In Canada the prairies are far ahead of the other provinces in metering consumption. More than 70 per cent of prairie municipalities measure the consumption of all users and only 12 per cent do not measure it at all. By contrast less than 18 per cent of the cities and towns in British Columbia, Quebec, New Brunswick and Newfoundland and from 25 to 50 per cent of those in the other provinces measure what they consume.

We can thus conclude that much remains to be done before all Canadian municipalities adopt the principle of measuring water consumption. At $200 per connection it would cost nearly $800 million for equipment and installation to have water meters throughout the country. This is a small one-time expense to control the demand of an industry that brings in $3 billion a year.

Given the debate on water metering in many regions of the country and the size of the expenses involved, we must look into the costs and benefits. Several economic principles underlie the evaluation of water metering. As a general rule when the costs and benefits are thoroughly analyzed to judge the impact of metering on all water systems, including sewage treatment, municipalities find that the benefits far outweigh the costs, which are quickly recovered.

Many cities throughout the world have studied this issue and many very diverse studies are available. These give us a general idea of the economic costs and benefits of metering.

The Science Council of Canada examined the costs and benefits of water metering as part of the water guidelines it is considering for the future. According to one of these basic studies metering is cost-effective if water costs more than 21 cents a cubic metre and installing a meter costs less than $500. These two preconditions are met in most Canadian municipalities.

A 1984 report from the State of California shows that it costs only $80 to install a meter when a house is built.

A 1972 study in the Toronto area reported the results of a simulation of the costs and benefits of metering for the municipality of Etobicoke. Data taken from the simulation show a cost-benefit ratio of 1:1, indicating that metering is economically viable.

A 1980 Alberta environment study dealt with measuring water consumption in cities where water collection, treatment and distribution are centralized. The net benefit, after including all costs, was $29.47 per capita which means that metering is economically advantageous.

A study done in Perth, Australia, on ways to restrict access to water resources calculated the benefits each month instead of at the end of the year as is usually the case. The study produced a cost benefit ratio of 1:62, which again shows that metering makes good economic sense. We can therefore say with almost complete certainty that water metering saves money, not to mention the operational savings for the industry that supplies and treats water.

As well as being cost effective, water metering, combined with an effective rate structure, leads to a sharp drop in consumption. This drop is partly due to the psychological impact of metering, since consumers know that they can reduce their water bills. However, the reduction is also due to an economic factor, namely the rationalization of water consumption since users pay more the more they consume once the meters are installed.

Therefore, installing meters nationwide is an essential first step to restructuring the water industry in Canada in order to make it financially and environmentally viable. The studies done on metering have shown that it pays off. Water meters and realistic rates to recover the full operating cost can lead to a 30 per cent drop in demand and eliminate the need to increase system capacity.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to support the motion relating to the infrastructure program.

It is important to note that all municipalities and provincial governments have tried to impress upon this government a number of things. First, the state of the infrastructure in this country demands immediate attention. Second, all three levels of government are prepared to work co-operatively and in concert with one another. All levels of government want to put the taxpayers' dollars into a combined effort and pool to invest in our infrastructure. This kind of a program is absolutely essential.

If one looks at the unemployment rate, especially in the construction industry throughout the country, one sees that this infrastructure program is not a frill, is not something we can postpone and do 10 or 15 years down the road. It needs to be done now.

There are good reasons to do it now. Interest rate costs and competitive opportunities now exist and municipalities could get good competitive bids to do water works, sewers, sidewalks, water plants, all the kinds of things we have acknowledged are very important to the quality of our lives.

If we truly believe in the environment, if we truly believe infrastructure is an investment in our people, in our neighbourhoods, in our communities, in people in terms of jobs, then there is no reason for us not to proceed.

I know the government is considering an infrastructure program. In its discussions with the provinces it has talked about highways. The provincial governments as well as the municipalities through their federation of Canadian municipalities have tried to convince the government of these priorities. It is not as if Canada and former governments have not participated in municipal infrastructure programs. In fact they were in place until 1984 when this present government came in and decided that it wanted to have absolutely nothing to do with investing in municipal and urban programs.

The precedent for a federal government to be involved in such a program is there. Canada has always done it. The federal government has always done it. All provincial premiers are prepared to put their taxpayers' dollars on the table. Every municipality is prepared to put every taxpayer's dollar on the table.

The Liberal Party has suggested this program for a great many years and we even had an all-party committee look at the infrastructure programs. I am happy to say that the former minister of housing, the member for Don Valley East and the member for Oshawa from the NDP have supported calling on this government for municipal infrastructure programs.

For some members of the government to suggest it is probably not their business to get involved in infrastructure programs and municipal programs is a bunch of hog-wash. For the member opposite to suggest that the way to do these infrastructure programs is to increase the price to the consumer for water is absolutely shirking the responsibility government has to this whole country. That seems to be this government's tack all the time: Let us look to someone else to solve the unemployment problem. Let us look to someone else to solve the environment problem. Let us look to someone else to solve the infrastructure problem.

We have a unique opportunity here. It needs to be pursued. Even the American infrastructure is in a state of absolute disrepair and the new president-elect recognizes that they have to invest in the infrastructure. Investing in infrastructure will produce jobs.

For those who say it is easy to stand up here and talk about spending because the deficit will be increased, in study after study, the OECD study, the FCM study, economists have all indicated that for every dollar put into infrastructure not only will it cause employment, but it will also have a ripple effect. In fact the impact on the deficit, if any, will be negligible.

If governments at all levels decide to put up money the private sector will also put up money. So you are going to leverage private sector investment in the program and hence do even more.

I want to reiterate that the government has a responsibility and the responsibility is to put our people back to work. There is no reason for people in the construction industry and other people who have skills to be sitting at home collecting unemployment and for those who have exhausted their unemployment benefits to now be receiving social assistance when in fact these programs are ready to be implemented tomorrow. FCM says there are municipalities prepared to start building those bridges, to start building those sewers, to start building those water plants, to start building those water lines tomorrow. That is how quickly it can happen.

It is not something we have to study over and over again. People are getting absolutely fed up with inaction. We need to put people back to work. This is a unique opportunity and a unique program which will bring us all together, municipalities, provincial governments, the federal government, the private sector, labour, all working together to solve an infrastructure problem in this country, an environmental problem in this country, and a jobs problem in this country.

This is a unique opportunity and if this government had the guts and the vision to want to solve our problems in terms of joblessness and was serious about solving our problems with respect to the environment, this opportunity would not be missed.

Again I call on this government finally to show the people of Canada that it is prepared to move in a very positive way with the economy by bringing forward this program which I think has the approval and the consensus of most members of this House, the municipalities, the provinces, labour, and the private sector.

There is no reason to study it further. We can do it in a fiscally responsible way and get on with building and rebuilding this country from the infrastructure up and investing in people. That is what we have to do.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, it is an important time, as other members have commented on, to talk about this particular motion before us today.

I want to congratulate the member of our caucus from Regina—Lumsden who has been pursuing this question of municipal infrastructure, planning and development for some time now. He is to be congratulated for having the foresight to have this motion brought before Parliament. It might be a bit of lucky timing on his part for this motion to be the first item of business to be dealt with by this House upon our return.

It is important because there is a clear sense in the minds of Canadians right now that this government is adrift, that its conservative trickle-down policies, which were followed and were rejected by the American people in the last presidential election, pursued by the Conservative government are not working and it is clearly time for a change to seek new choices and to go in a new direction.

It is also very clear that this week, starting today, Canadians are expecting this House, and in particular the Prime Minister and the government, to say to Canadians exactly what it is that it is going to do to address the needs of the economy. The message that has been repeated perhaps ad nauseam following the referendum on October 26 is that now the referendum is out of the way at least for a short time that this government will turn its attention to the needs of the economy.

That has left a clear anticipation by Canadians that this week, perhaps starting today, we will hear from the government an economic outline of the plan that it is going to present to this House and to Canadians so that we can turn the economy around and get us out of the ditch the government has driven us into.

This motion gives the government an opportunity to do just that. It is a motion that calls on the House to join with provincial, municipal and regional governments to develop an infrastructure program that can help rebuild Canada.

One does not have to go very far to find out just how important it is to help rebuild our infrastructure. Just go to the front door of this building and see all of the work being done on the infrastructure for the House of Commons. The bus driver today said that they are digging up the water lines and the sewer lines. Yes, we probably need a big sewer line coming out of this place. If they can work on the infrastructure on Parliament Hill, certainly they can work on the infrastructure across Canada from coast to coast to coast.

What does infrastructure mean? Well it is clear to all of us who drive, who fly, who take our passenger rail service everywhere, that if we continue to ignore the work that must be done, the investment in our infrastructure, we will then pay the price in ever greater amounts in the future.

To date this government has rejected out of hand any of those proposals though as of late we have heard hints from the Minister of Finance that he may consider an infrastructure program to try to kick-start the economy. I say one of the best infrastructure programs would be to scrap the GST. That would kick-start the economy.

What we need this government to do is to pay attention to those very details, the nitty-gritty parts of people's everyday lives. When they leave their houses in the morning, when they drive or take the bus to work, they know that their car or that bus is not going to be rattled to pieces because of holes in the pavement, that the bridges they drive across in this country are safe.

One of the best ways to address this infrastructure problem—and it is one that I have been working on myself in my riding and it is an issue that I share with my colleagues from Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba—is the whole matter of highway upgrading and the question of the Yellowhead highway. Most people in western Canada are familiar with that particular highway, the northern Trans-Canada, as it is known to us in western Canada.

Sometimes it is just not fair. I wrote to the Minister of Transport recently. He wrote back telling me what this government is doing to help with highway construction in Atlantic Canada. I have nothing against the need to improve the roads in Atlantic Canada. This government is spending about $1.1 billion to help some of the provincial governments in Atlantic Canada rebuild some of the roads. Of course, there is much more work that needs to be done, but what about the Yellowhead highway?

Let us take a look at that. We used to have a program. The government says it cannot do this, that it has never done it before. Well in fact it was done before. We had a joint federal-provincial program called the Yellowhead Highway Improvement Program. It was a program between the federal and provincial governments in B.C. of $36 million and expired at the end of March 1990.

The new government, the Harcourt government in British Columbia and the transport minister there, Mr. Charbonneau, the member from Kamloops, fully support renewing that infrastructure program, the Yellowhead Highway Improvement Program. We have yet to get a signal or a message from this government that it will in fact endorse that program.

As the previous speaker mentioned, this is not something we have to study. We do not have to wait six months for a report to come in to tell us what we have to do. Those reports have been done. They are right and ready. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that if we called the village clerks in my riding and said that there was an infrastructure program ready to go and could they consider some projects that we could do, they would have those projects ready. They would be on the fax machine within minutes. We can do it.

The investment put into that will return to the public treasury in two ways. It is an investment we will eventually have to make in any event. If we do it now, it will save money. It will be cheaper to do now than to wait for years when it will cost considerably more. As well, estimates range. It has been said by some for example that for every $100 million we might invest in infrastructure the return to the public treasury in terms of taxation, money that we do not have to spend on UI and welfare that there is actually a net gain to the public treasury. That has been shown in a number of reports.

Unless it is keeping this as a big secret to be announced in a couple of weeks or so before an election campaign, why this government cannot seem to see that, is beyond me. I think most Canadians cannot understand this government's inaction on this issue as well.

In the short time I have left I appeal to this government to support this motion. I appeal to the Prime Minister to tell us today what this government is going to do when it comes to some economic direction. I ask for a little fairness. I ask that this government take a look at the kind of programs that can help communities, like the Yellowhead highway program that I am encouraging this government to sign because it is that kind of day-to-day bread and butter help that this government can provide to put Canadians to work. The government has a choice and that choice is for this infrastructure program. I encourage the government to support it.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I really wish it were that easy.

I am going to refer to my notes because I have a number of points I want to make, particularly with regard to the question of rail grade separations and its logical extension to rail safety.

As of January 1989 with the proclamation of the Railway Safety Act, the railways of this country have had their primary responsibility for safe rail practices clearly established and brought up to date. The federal Department of Transport monitors railway operations and it is empowered to take action to correct any threat to safety of the public or railway personnel.

Our two major railways, CN and CP Rail, had the best and the third-best safety records respectively, of all major North American railway companies in 1990.

However, this does not mean to say that there will be any reduction in the monitoring of their operations. The department has every intention of completely fulfilling its obligation to ensure that safe procedures are followed.

Despite the commendable goal put forth by the hon. member opposite, I feel that we can make the taxpayers' money go a lot further with a well thought out and balanced program of grade crossing improvements and public education than we can by assigning huge amounts of money to a comparatively few grade separation projects.

The reality is that Transport Canada's grade crossing improvement program provides an immediate safety dividend at a relatively low cost at many locations across Canada. For example, it takes approximately $80,000 to install an automated light and bell warning system at a level crossing. Installation costs for flashing lights, gates and bells are about $150,000. The total cost to eliminate grade crossings by contrast is positively immense.

To use an illustration, CN Rail's 534 kilometre, high density main line between Montreal and Toronto has 135 grade crossings with active warning systems as well as a large number of crossings with passive systems including public, private or farm grade crossings. The total cost of building grade separations on this line alone at an average cost of $8 million each would be in the order of $1 billion. This figure does not include pedestrian crossings.

There are more than 24,000 public grade crossings in Canada, 8,000 of which are equipped with automatic protection devices such as flashing light signals, bells or gates. The balance is protected by standard cross-buck grade crossing warning signals. In addition, there are some 33,000 private or farm crossings which are for the most part unprotected.

Prevention of accidents at grade crossings requires action by motorists, railways, road authorities and the federal government. Therefore, an example of where responsibilities must be accepted is the establishment and maintenance of clear sight lines to enable drivers to see approaching trains. Although this measure is cost effective, it is sometimes difficult to get the responsible party to carry out line-of-sight clearance. While the railway responds relatively quickly to orders to clear brush along the rights of way, municipalities may resist a similar request to clear railway lines in their jurisdiction.

Under the Railway Safety Act, the Minister of Transport has extensive powers to improve grade crossing safety to help prevent accidents and to initiate remedial measures after an accident. Railway safety inspectors also have considerable discretionary powers to act in the interests of safety. It has used these powers to impose speed restrictions on both the railway and the road authority where it feels it is necessary to limit risk.

It has also required road and/or railway traffic to stop before proceeding through a crossing and, where a severe threat to safety exists, it has actually closed crossings. An exceedingly important component for safety at railway crossings rests with education.

Transport Canada contributes $150,000 a year to the Railway Association of Canada's Operation Lifesaver, a public education program that promotes safety at railway crossings. A recent survey done for Transport Canada has shown that the public is generally unaware of the inherent dangers at railway crossings. Much of Operation Lifesaver's public education campaign, therefore, will be directed at the areas targeted by the survey in coming years.

Transport Canada does not just talk about safety, it spends a fair amount of money. There is an $8.5 million program in place to improve grade crossing warning systems. The department pays up to 80 per cent of the total cost of railway crossing improvements and the balance is provided by the railways, municipalities or provinces.

These improvements include the installation of automatic warning devices such as flashing lights and bells, the interconnection of devices to highway traffic signals, lighting, improvements to the road approaches, to track layout, clearing of line-of-sight and construction of a road or rail detour. There have to be choices made every year as to which projects proceed and which must wait.

The criteria used to assess these projects try to address this frankly tough process as fairly as possible. They consider the rail and road traffic densities and speed, school, public bus and truck traffic, dangerous commodities carried by road and rail, the angle and the view of the crossing. Tragically, they also have to consider the accident history as well as the number of train tracks and the type of train operation and all of the physical road factors such as lanes and grades.

Despite what might be implied by the motion before us, it is not as if there is not concrete action every year to improve crossing safety. The money spent annually through the Railway Crossing Improvement Program, namely $8.5 million, would pay for only two modest grade separations each year. Contrast that, if you will, with the more than 100 at-grade crossings that are actually improved each year with these resources.

The existing programs have contributed significantly to increased levels of safety at our railway crossings. During the last 10 years crossing accidents have been reduced significantly. In 1990 there were 386 railway crossing accidents. While one would want that figure to be even lower, it is down sharply from the 826 accidents which occurred in 1980.

Transport Canada's grade crossing improvement fund certainly appears to be the most effective means available to us at the moment to improve railway safety. Safety has been improved at thousands of crossings through this program. Funds are allocated on a priority basis to try as much as humanly possible to see that railway crossings are as safe as we can make them.

The sentiments expressed by my hon. friend opposite are laudable, but grade separation projects must be looked at in the context of delivering the best and safest possible service to the widest population. For no other reason, I cannot support my hon. friend's motion as presented.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might put a question to the hon. member and ask if she realizes that the grade crossing fund has been cancelled.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. According to the rules, it is not possible to raise a question on this matter.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, I am rather concerned. I understand the government House leader has been on television this morning saying that spending for infrastructure will do no good whatsoever. Nothing could be further from the truth. There are certainly several studies to show, in the United States context anyway, that spending in the public sector increases enormously the benefits to the private sector. If you think about it, it is rather obvious.

Whether it is railroads, bridges, highways, sewage treatment plants, hydroelectric generating capabilities, or whatever carried on through the public domain, it is rather obvious that if those things were not in place certainly the private sector would suffer enormously.

Imagine if the trucking industry was not able to transport the goods which it carries so well on our road system and had to transport over roads which were still gravel, for example. Saskatchewan is actually a pretty good example. Under the Conservative government in Saskatchewan, the roads deteriorated to an enormous extent. I can certainly understand why the municipalities and the trucking industry are saying that there has to be an improvement to the highways.

The point is that regardless of what segment of our society you look at, the private sector benefits enormously from the public expenditures in the whole realm of the infrastructure, whether it be municipal or on a national basis, or whether you are talking about sewer and water. This means that industries taking water from our rivers and streams for use in their plants may have to go to enormous lengths to treat the water so that it is pure enough for their use. This extra expenditure is certainly something which they have to take into account when they balance the bottom line. It is rather obvious that there is a benefit to the general public as well. When water is taken from the inlets to our public water systems, the cleaner it is, the less expenditure we have to put forth as taxpayers in order to make it drinkable.

The Canadian Federation of Municipalities has done a tremendous amount of work on this. It should be commended for its efforts to raise the consciousness of the nation and hopefully draw the attention of the provincial and federal governments to the enormity of the problem facing the country. What we could term the situation we find ourselves in is a need for home improvement. It is rather obvious: If we never make any improvements to our homes, there comes a point where they deteriorate beyond a point where they are even habitable.

I would suggest that in the context of Canada being our home and the need for improvements, we have in many instances digressed, regressed and fallen to a point where some of our home is almost uninhabitable. That certainly would apply in so far as our rivers and streams are concerned. The South Saskatchewan River flows through the city of Saskatoon. There certainly is a tremendous amount of pollution getting into that river before it ever gets to the city.

I would like to add that in spite of the fact that the city of Saskatoon does have treatment plants for its sewage, there is certainly room for further treatment of that sewage before it goes back into the river for those who will be using it down stream from us. There is just no way that it is not obvious that if such action were to be taken that all citizens along our rivers and streams would certainly benefit from that expenditure.

The House is now back. We have been through a referendum where Canadians told us that the problem we are facing in this country for the most part is not some kind of a resolution to the esoteric way in which we view ourselves as a nation, but rather it is the nuts and bolts problem which we face and of course that is the economy. I do not think there is a member in this House who did not experience during the referendum the plea from the constituents to get on with what is really ailing this country and this economy and to do something about it.

It is just inconceivable how the government could say that there is no benefit from these kinds of expenditures. If we spend our resources on something which actually goes to create and put a better foundation under the wealth of this nation, like an assessment of a city or a town, the more houses and things you have that are taxable within the jurisdiction, the broader the tax base is.

I assume the government is really saying that it is far better for the nation to spend money on paying off the interest on the debt, which seems to be rather unproductive, than it is to build roads and bridges which are productive and add enormously to the wealth of the nation.

I cannot for the life of me understand how it can possibly conceive that expending tremendous amounts of money on paying interest on the debt is adding to the wealth of the nation. It seems to me to be the opposite case. Most likely what is happening is that it is adding to the wealth of individuals in other nations because very few people to whom we pay that interest are in this country, and even those who are here are certainly doing the best they can to avoid contributing to the wealth of the nation.

The Canadian Federation of Municipalities is saying that we need access to clean water, as I have already alluded to, for a number of reasons, certainly not the least of which is the health of our citizens. That includes to no small degree the absolute necessity of water and sewage treatment plants on many Indian reserves which have been shown to be so lacking in those amenities, things we take for granted. As well, I have already alluded to the fact that they are saying we need better sewage treatment systems.

I cannot help but make a plea for the government to get away from the idea that it seems to be better to pay interest on money borrowed than it is to spend money on the infrastructure of this nation, which will put people to work. The money which is expended will go into the hands of people. In turn it will be spent in local communities and, to no small extent, will come back to the government in the form of taxation rather than out of the federal Treasury in the form of interest paid to banks and lending institutions that certainly will not return any. History shows that they have not returned any.

I congratulate the member from Regina who brought forward this wonderful motion.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I could not start without commenting on the remarks of the previous speaker. I hope his remarks were in humour when he urged the government not to pay interest on the national debt, not to pay interest on the money it borrows. I am sure those of us who invest in our country and buy Canada Savings Bonds would be somewhat discouraged if the NDP came into office and we found that it was not going to pay interest on Canada Savings Bonds as the member has just suggested.

Do not pay interest on the national debt, do not pay your bills; I guess that is NDP policy. We know from the last session of Parliament that the NDP's policy for the debt is simply to print more money. This is what its financial critic said in the last session: "Just print more money", as if it would not cost the taxpayer any money.

The NDP policy of not paying interest on the debt is somewhat amusing to those of us who buy Canada Savings Bonds or have pension plans, whether it be the teachers' pension plan, the nurses' pension plan or even the old railway workers' pension plan, those of us who buy government bonds or government monetary issues expecting to receive a return on that investment to reinvest in pension plans. The NDP now says we should not pay interest on the money the government borrows.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Richardson: That is exactly what the member said, that we should not pay interest on the money borrowed, that we should spend it on something else.

An hon. member: Just write it off.

Mr. Richardson: "Just write it off; do not pay interest" is what the NDP says. The member said 10 times in his speech: "Do not pay interest". It is unbelievable but true. We will look at the "blues".

Mr. Benjamin: Who said that? Where and when?

Mr. Richardson: Old fog-horn is bellowing down there, but the fact is the NDP member said seven or eight times during his remarks that we should not pay interest on the national debt.

Getting back to the subject at hand, I would agree that building up the national infrastructure is a laudable goal and one we can all support. My objective today is to convince members of the House that the motion of the hon. member, the proposal he has made, is not a practical way or even a proper way of tackling this most important subject.

Let us look at the list of items that he proposes for our attention. He proposes improvements to the sewer and water treatment systems, road and bridge repair, and construction of grade separations at level railway crossings. I realize this is just a representative list but, even given that, the first thing that strikes me about it is that one of the items is clearly outside federal jurisdiction, a second is under active development, and a third, grade separations at railway level crossings, is already covered in a federal program.

Let me say I am not opposed to federal aid to other levels of government. I am as aware as the next person that all governments today are cash strapped. I am certainly not opposed to the use of scarce federal resources to achieve national goals that would otherwise be beyond the means of the responsible jurisdiction.

However, given that our means are limited, it surely is our duty as federal members to ensure that any such expenditure meets some recognized national goal. Otherwise we are just wasting valuable taxpayers' money.

Let us take a closer look at two of the hon. member's items. Sewer and water infrastructure is entirely a local matter. It is the most distant from federal jurisdiction of the items on the hon. member's list. Our first problem is deciding whether it is a matter for the federal government at all.

I do not for a moment deny that sewers and water treatment facilities are important, nor do I deny that they represent significant cost items for many Canadian municipalities. My objections are strictly practical. In today's tight economic climate the federal government must target its assistance to areas where it can make a difference nationally, and the federal government is committed to doing just that.

The hon. member proposes to build grade separations in place of level rail crossings. To put it in a nutshell grade separations are very expensive. They cost in the range of $3 million to $10 million each.

There is another kind of crossing, namely a protected level crossing with automated gates or lights, bells, or both. These projects cost in the range of $80,000 to $150,000. Quite clearly money will stretch further for protected level crossings than for grade separations. This is not to say that grade separations are not worth it, but rather we have a responsibility to bring the best safety systems available to the greatest number of crossings.

Finally there is the hon. member's suggestion for a federal contribution to repairs to the nation's roads and bridges. As a matter of fact on this issue we are not entirely in disagreement. Indeed I am also of the opinion that highway upgrading and reconstruction is one area where the federal government could perhaps invest some money, but I am equally certain that if we are going to invest our resources at all it should be toward a national highway system.

I want to stress the importance of lasting economic value as a criterion for federal funding of infrastructure projects. Highways are an example of an area where carefully considered strategic application of federal money will pay lasting dividends for the country as a whole.

What are some of those dividends? How do better roads help the economy? There are gains in fuel efficiency, highway safety and travel times. Most important there would be greater efficiency in our distribution system in our domestic market. As is well known, highway policy is an area where federal government has been working in collaboration with the provinces toward a national policy.

As the House will recall, earlier this year first ministers directed their ministers of transport to consult with their ministers of finance and explore ways of proceeding with this work, remaining consistent with fiscal restraints. Considerable progress has been made in the discussions between transport ministers and finance ministers across the country with a notion of looking at a national infrastructure system, improvement of highways and reconstruction in Canada today.

To conclude, I support deliberate, carefully thought out, long-term national policies on specific infrastructure issues like highways.

• (1200)

Unfortunately this is not what the hon. member is asking us to support today and therefore I am unable to support the hon. member's resolution as it has been presented.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION (FISCAL MEASURES) ACT, 1992

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. John McDermid (for the Minister of Finance): moved that Bill C–76, an act to amend certain statutes to implement certain fiscal provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 25, 1992, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Riis: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was looking forward this morning to see what the first order of business would be and I wonder if I could briefly raise two points.

One relates to the important economic statement that the Prime Minister or Minister of Finance will be making forthwith. I wonder if I could ask my friend who is with us in the House at the moment, the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader, if he could indicate as specifically as possible when that statement may be made and whether it would be made in Parliament.

Second, we are getting a lot of calls this morning in the lobbies and in our offices, I am told, from people who are anxious to get copies of the NAFTA, either on floppy disk or hard copy. Since I understand we are now likely to begin holding hearings this week on NAFTA, it is not unreasonable that people would want to get a copy of it before they appear at the hearings.

I wonder if my hon. friend could assist or, if he does not know the answer in terms of where the material is available immediately, perhaps later in the day we could have someone report back so the people of Canada would know where to get copies of the NAFTA.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether it is Thursday or Question Period.

I will strive to be obliging to my hon. friend because I know he has emerged from several weeks, if not months, in lotus-land and is having reality immersion.

The reality is that there will indeed be a statement on economic matters and it will be soon. My hon. friend can count on that sort of exchange taking place in the House of Commons. In addition, I do not know the specific answer to his NAFTA question but I will endeavour to get it for him.

Mr. Riis: I simply want to acknowledge the fact that perhaps my point of order was slightly out of order at this point. But I thought, since it was the first time we had a chance to rise in the House of Commons, that it would be a reasonable point to put to my hon. friend. As he has indicated, he will get back later in the day with information as to where the floppy disk or the hard copy is available.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I want to welcome all members back to the House of Commons. I know they all worked extremely hard on the constitutional matter. We now have that behind us. The people of Canada have spoken; we have listened and we are getting on with the business of Canada.

Mr. Milliken: Let's get on with an election. They want to throw you out.

Mr. McDermid: There are the Liberals calling for an election. That is all they talk about. The last thing the people I talk to want is an election. They want us to get on with the business of Parliament, and that is what we are doing.

I am pleased today to lead off second reading debate on Bill C-76 which implements certain provisions from the 1992 budget. The Minister of Finance, in the lead up to the budget of 1992, held consultations across Canada with people from all walks of life; labour, special interest groups such as the handicapped, the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, many of the trade associations, the financial institutions and so on. I participated with the Minister of Finance. These were tremendous consultation programs.

At the consultations where we had these groups together, a consensus was formed from these consultations. The concerns were responded to by the Minister of Finance in his budget of 1992.

Canadians told the minister that the government should take action to help get the recovery back on track and to help Canadian firms and workers become more competitive. They also told him they were concerned about the tax burden, about government spending and about the deficit.

The budget contained measures to boost the competitiveness of Canadian firms and workers. We announced tax support for the manufacturing and processing sector worth almost $2.3 billion over five years. The capital cost allowance rate was increased for manufacturing and processing machinery from 25 to 30 per cent.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands laughs at that. He thinks it is funny. I suggest that he talk to the manufacturers in Kingston to see if they appreciate this. It is exactly what they asked for in the pre-budget consultation. He sits there and makes fun of it. I cannot believe it.

This will help make Canada's manufacturing and processing sector, which directly accounts for about one-fifth of Canada's economy and jobs, more competitive. He does not understand that. Liberals do not understand competitiveness.

We also indicated that we are prepared to reduce the withholding tax on direct dividends paid to non-residents. This step, combined with the drop in the manufacturing and processing tax rate, will end the competitive disadvantage we face in attracting and keeping business in Canada.

The budget also announced further actions to reduce government expenditures in order to reduce federal taxes. We believe that cutting spending to cut taxes is economically productive. It reflects our confidence in the judgment of individual Canadians about how best to put their money to work in building a stronger, more competitive economy. Moreover, cutting spending will reinforce the government's deficit reduction effort, while at the same time allowing us to direct scarce resources to important national priorities.

The budget also provides tax relief through a number of measures to help Canadian families, students and students with disabilities.

In summary, the budget was fiscally prudent, socially responsive and economically sound. It reflects a realistic, balanced approach that will help pave the way for a return to sustained economic growth.

Bill C–76 will implement four measures contained in the budget. In order to help the government promote economic recovery, strengthen Canada's international competitiveness and further control its expenditures, the Small Businesses Loans Act, the Canada Student Loans Act, the Lobbyists Registration Act and the Salaries Act are all being amended.

First, I want to discuss the amendments to the Small Businesses Loans Act. Small businesses are a key to the healthy growth of Canada's economy. Reflecting their importance, our federal tax system offers significant support for small business. These recommendations came from the consultations with the small business sector leading up to the budget.

Small businesses enjoy a special reduced income tax rate of 12.8 per cent and that includes the 3 per cent surtax on the first $200,000 of business income. Canada's lifetime capital gains exemption provides an added incentive for individuals to invest in small business. Small businesses qualify for the most generous incentives for research and development in the G–7 countries, including a 35 per cent refundable federal tax credit instead of the general rate of 20 per cent. Over–all, Canada's federal tax system for small business is one of the most beneficial in the industrialized world. These measures provide Canadian small businesses with over $3 billion in support annually.

However, the government is aware that weathering the recession has drained the financial resources of many small businesses. As the economy moves into recovery, small businesses will need affordable financing to take advantage of the emerging opportunities for growth and help generate productive economic activity.

In order to provide greater assistance to small businesses and to help stimulate the process of recovery in the economy, the Minister of Finance announced two measures in the budget to help small businesses.

A small business financing program, effective budget day, will help small businesses in financial difficulty, including farmers, to obtain loans at lower interest rates. Tax preferred small business financing bonds may be issued up until the end of this year and may have a maturity of up to five years. Therefore it can provide assistance well beyond the current year.

A complementary measure is contained in Bill C–76. The ceiling for loans to individual small businesses under the Small Businesses Loans Act will be double from $100,000 to $200,000. This change is in response to the increased financing needs of small business.

The Small Businesses Loans Act, first passed in 1961 by another Conservative administration, assists the private sector to obtain loans to establish, expand or modernize small businesses. The most recent amendment to the loan limit in 1980 established the ceiling at $100,000. As we all know, there have been considerable changes since that time, both in the purchasing power of the dollar and in the financing needs of small businesses.

The over–all consumer price index has roughly doubled since 1980. Doubling the Small Businesses Loans Act ceiling to $200,000 responds again to representations from the small business community and recognizes changes which have occurred over the past decade.

The current legislation authorizing the small business loans program will expire on March 31, 1993. The government will be introducing new legislation to extend the program. As part of this legislation, consideration is being given to modifying other program terms and conditions to take account of the concerns and needs expressed by smaller firms and the banking community.

Let me move now to a second important component of Bill C–76, the amendments to the Canada Student Loans Act.

The Canada student loan program was introduced in 1964 and makes financial help available to needy students pursuing studies at the post–secondary level. The program helps eligible students to meet the many costs involved in gaining a higher education. This is vitally important if Canada is to maintain and enhance its competitive position in a global economy. It is increasingly clear that an educated and skilled workforce is a prerequisite for improved productivity and prosperity in today's competitive world. I think we all agree with that.

To help support an educated and competitive workforce, the program's current structure must be modernized. Left unattended, it may very well cease to be an effective tool for access to post-secondary education. Accordingly, to preserve this important national program and to ease its administration, the Canada Student Loans Act will be amended.

The Secretary of State, who administers the program, is negotiating new arrangements for student loans with financial institutions. The aim of the negotiation is to reduce the growing cost of the program and to improve its efficiency by asking the lenders to share in the risks and the cost of defaults. Saving are expected to provide scope for the needed improvements to the program, including the elimination of the 3 per cent fee, which is an administrative fee, and an increase in the weekly loan ceilings.

These important measures will be implemented following successful completion of the negotiations and passage of any necessary amendments to the Canada Student Loans Act. In the meantime there are some measures that we can take now.

As currently structured, the federal government guarantees loans made to full-time students by lending institutions. The government pays the interest costs while the students are at school and for six months after graduation. After completing their studies, the students must enter into a consolidated repayment agreement with their lending institutions. If a student fails to enter into a repayment agreement or fails to maintain payments, the federal guarantee is honoured. In other words, the federal government pays off the loan and the borrower's debt becomes due to the taxpayers of Canada.

The estimated interest cost the federal government will pay under the program in 1991-92 is almost $190 million. Payments in 1991-92 to lenders for loans that have gone into default are estimated at $175 million. Collection costs will total over $24 million.

Moreover, total defaults outstanding as of March 31, 1992 were $980 million—almost a billion dollars—owed to the taxpayers of this country.

Over the five-year period from 1985-86 to 1990-91, total program expenditures increased at a rate of over 9 per cent a year. It is essential that action be taken to ensure the continued financial viability of the Canada Student Loans Program.

Bill C-76 proposes to eliminate the six-month interest free period currently granted to full-time students upon their graduation. The budget had proposed this for the 1992-93 loan year, but following consultations with the financial institutions, this measure will now be effective for the loan year beginning August 1, 1993. This will coincide with planned improvements to the program and will give financial institutions the time required to implement the necessary adjustments to their systems.

It is important to remember that students can continue to benefit from Canada student loans, interest free, for the entire time they are in school. They will also continue to have up to six months after leaving school to make repayment arrangements with their lenders. However, during this period, interest on their loans will accrue. Borrowers in repayment will continue to be eligible for up to 18 months of interest relief in the event that they are encountering financial hardship in repaying their loans.

Through Bill C-76, the government is also moving to ease the administration of the Canada Student Loans Program. In future the necessary forms used in the program will be determined by the Secretary of State rather than the Governor in Council, as is the present practice. Making the forms an administrative matter and not part of regulations will provide better scope for planning and implementing administrative changes and co-ordinating these changes with the lenders and the provinces.

Bill C-76 also proposes to update the alternative payment formula which is designed to compensate provinces choosing to establish their own student loan programs as an alternative to participating in the Canada Student Loans Program.

The changes in Bill C-76 will ensure that the alternative payments to provinces that might opt out of the program reflect more accurately spending in the province on outstanding Canada student loans. In addition, a province will be required to give written notice 12 months before opting out of the program.

These proposed changes to the formula would have no impact on a province as long as it participates in the program. At the present time Quebec and the Northwest Territories do not participate in the program. They administer their own student aid programs and receive compensatory payments from Canada determined by a formula in the Canada Student Loans Act.

The federal government wants the Canada Student Loans Program to remain as widely available across the country as humanly possible. It is a national program and we want to keep it that way. The changes we are debating today will help to ensure that the program continues to provide assistance to needy students in participating provinces and territories, and to compensate jurisdictions offering their own alternative program.

• (1220)

Some hon. members may not be aware of just how much support the federal government does provide, either directly or indirectly, to post-secondary students. Support through the personal income tax system includes a tax credit in respect of tuition fees and a tax credit for each month of full-time study.

Also, if the post-secondary student does not have sufficient income to take advantage of the tuition and education credits his or her spouse, parent or grandparent may claim them up to a specified limit.

This measure recognizes that some students are in a non-tax paying position and are supported by the family. In addition, post-secondary students may earn tax free up to $500 of scholarship, bursary or fellowship income.

Let me point out that the Minister of Finance also announced in the budget an increase in tax assistance to post-secondary students. The dollar limit on which the education credit is calculated will be increased by one-third, from $60 to $80 per month of full-time study.

In addition, the limit on the total amount of tuition fee and education credits that may be claimed by another taxpayer will be increased from $600 to $680. These changes will benefit 600,000 post-secondary students claiming the education credit and 400,000 supporting taxpayers claiming the transfer.

The federal government also transfers funds each year to the provinces and territories under the Established Programs Financing arrangements. The EPF transfers provide almost $6 billion annually in cash and tax transfers in respect of post-secondary education. Education, as I indicated earlier, is a vital element in ensuring continued prosperity for Canadians.

Consistent with our policies of fiscal restraint and responsible management, the Minister of Finance indicated in the budget that the government would strengthen its cost recovery performance. To this end, Bill C-76 proposes to amend the Lobbyists Registration Act. It is our view that the lobbyists registration program should be operated on a cost recovery basis.

Specifically the government proposes to amend the fee-setting regulation to allow the Governor-in-Council to charge lobbyists a registration fee when registering under the act. The fee will be determined in consultation with the private sector.

Fees owing will also be made a debt to the Crown so that the Crown may sue in the civil courts to recover unpaid fees. To further encourage compliance, the current penalty avoidance incentives which exist to encourage compliance with the act will be extended to the registration fees.

Finally, Bill C-76 amends the Salaries Act. Last year the government froze ministerial, parliamentary and Public Service pay. We believe that in a period of national economic hardship, ministers of the Crown, including the Prime Minister, should further contribute to the restraint effort by cutting back their ministerial salaries. To meet this commitment, and to further assist the government to reduce its expenditures, the ministerial salaries of the Prime Minister and all ministers will be reduced by 5 per cent effective this past April 1.

In closing, I want to reiterate that the February budget was designed in response to what the government heard from Canadians in all parts of the country. The measures contained in this bill are an integral part of that response. They will help the government to live within the taxpayers' means and to create the conditions for recovery, strong growth and a more competitive economy.

With this in mind, I encourage my hon. colleagues to give speedy passage to this legislation.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I stand today to speak to Bill C–76 which is a budget implementation measure of the budget which was tabled last February.

Canadians all know that this government's fiscal measures are not working. There is a total lack of trust. We are into a major recession. We can even call it a depression. We are still implementing measures that were brought forward in the budget of February 1992. We know today that the finance minister is preparing to bring forward either an economic statement or a mini budget shortly. We also know that the Prime Minister has said that his government has made mistakes. We asked the government when it was going to bring forward some new measures that would do something for the Canadian economy. Yes, the government has made mistakes and we can all feel it. Just go out on the streets and everyone will tell you that there are no jobs. From small business to big business to students, every Canadian is worried as to where we are going next.

This government does not know where it wants to go and it does not know how to get there. I ask the government to please do whatever it can to start making some concrete investments in Canadians. That is what we need. Canadians need to be able to constructively contribute to this country. It is absolutely impossible to do this under what this government has done.

The government has tried to tell people that it was responsible when it has done nothing. It had a prosperity initiative that cost $24 million which told us things we already knew. The government has told us that it has done polling. It spends millions of dollars every week on polling. It should know by now that it is not the polling that is going to do things for Canadians. It is what it is going to do about the results that it is hearing. It is impossible for us to continue in the same light that we have been continuing for the last eight years.

When the Prime Minister was first elected and first became the Prime Minister he said: "Watch me. You will not recognize this country when I am through with it". Boy, was he right. The problem is that we do not want to see our country the way it is right now. We want some massive changes. We want some investment in people, not some niggardly cutbacks.

Bill C–76 purports to do many things. I listened to the ministers and I know they mean well, but they do not know what they are doing.

Let us talk about Canada student loans. Yes, it is important that students be able to get loans. It is essential because right now, most students were not able to get a summer job to help pay their way. Most of them are not able to get a large enough loan to keep on going. The problems that the students have right now are horrendous. However we go on preaching that we have to invest in our young people. Yes, we have to invest in our young people, but we have to help them along and we have to do more to help them.

When a student gets a Canada student loan it is not because he is rich or because he has the money. It is because he needs the help. There is no interest on the loan while he is a full–time student in school, but this government now says that as soon as he finishes his course there is no more interest–free period. From that day on the interest starts accumulating. That is fine if the student is able to get a job, but how many students have been able to get a job the day after they graduate? Very, very few. Those who do have part–time work which does not pay very much and have a great deal of difficulty of coping with what is happening to them.

This government in the last budget said: "Well, we have to do something about the defaults on Canada's student loans". That sounds like a good reason to collect from those who are not paying, especially from those who were able to get good jobs because of their education. They should pay for their loans. I agree with that. However, one of the things that has been happening is that we have been terrorizing young people who have not been able to get jobs.

I have been in my riding and I cannot begin to tell you the number of people who have come to see me, crying, because some collection agency has been terrorizing them in their homes. I had one woman come to my office a week ago. She is the mother of a 26–year old who is on welfare. The collection agency found out where she lived, telephoned her and verbally abused this lady, laughed at her and told her: "Get a mortgage on your house. Pay off your son's loan". This is a 26-year old who is on welfare and who cannot get a job.

The mother does not own her own home. She came to me crying and asking: "Why are they doing this to me?" The collection agency said: "We can call you three times a day if we want to". When she came to see me I called the collection agency and asked: "Why are you terrorizing the mother of a 26-year old? She does not have any money. The son does not have any money. What are you doing? You have no right to terrorize the parent of a 26-year old".

First of all, I had a hard time getting the person at the collection agency to identify what company they were working for. They were demanding that the parents pay off the loan in full for the student. The parents did not have the money. The way these collection people treated me when I simply asked what company they worked for is unbelievable. Finally, after I spoke to them for a while, they agreed that they should not be terrorizing the parent of the 26-year old, that they should speak to him directly. However, what do you do when a young man is living on welfare? How can he make payments on a loan? I do not know. I know how little they get on welfare.

A young woman came to see me, again the same thing. She wanted to make payments but the collection agency was not giving her any option. They said: "You have to pay the balance in full". But when I called they said: "Well, no". These are just collection tactics.

Do we do the same thing with the Reichmann brothers when they default on a loan? Do we terrorize them? Are we telling them that their credit is finished?

On Friday another young man came to see me. He was very frightened. He said: "I do not have a job. I do not mind making payments but they do not want payments. They want the full amount. They told me that if I did not pay off the full amount, and I do not have the money to do that, they would garnishee my wages and I would never get another job because what employer would hire me if I owed this amount of money". I am shocked at the kind of treatment our young people are getting. This is disastrous. There is no need to go after the poorest of the poor that way. If they have jobs, by all means make sure they pay. However, if they do not have jobs, what can you do? How discouraging it must be for these young people.

A lot of the reasons they do not have jobs is because of this government's policies. It is frightening to think that this government has lost total control, absolute total control of the economy. It is absolutely shameful.

It talks about investing in our future and investing in our young people. It has cut back on transfer payments for education, therefore tuition fees are increasing. How do you expect the poorest of the poor to cope with increased tuition fees and GST on books? They have to pay it. They do not have any choice. How do you expect them to cope with these kinds of things?

This particular bill does not even tell us whether they will be able to apply for interest relief. In the past, if after the first six months after graduation they did not have a job, they could apply for interest relief. I would like to find out if they can continue to apply for interest relief. Already we have passed the 3 per cent surcharge. Do people out there realize that students have to pay the 3 per cent in cash before they actually get the loan? If you need a loan to go to school where are you going to get the 3 per cent to pay for it in advance? You will have to borrow somewhere else so that when you get your loan you can pay it back. What kind of nonsense is that?

We talk about tax relief. I am pleased that during the last budget the government did bring in some measures that would offer tax relief. That is great if you have parents who can afford to pay for you and they can get the tax relief. What about the thousands of young people who do not have parents that can afford to pay for them? What about them? What good is giving them tax relief if they do not have any income? Any kind of measure that saves you income tax money does not work if you do not pay income tax already.

Right now I am very worried about what this is going to do. I know it is a minor thing to say that we are going to start charging interest from the day they graduate. In the scheme of things the Conservatives can say: After all, the government has lent them the money. What can we tell those young people about a job?

If a person has a job and gets laid off under unemployment insurance he or she has been able to get training funds. Yes, that has been good. It means that not only is their tuition fee covered but also they get unemployment insurance while they are in training, although I am told that those funds have run out also.

In a sense these people have a greater advantage than other young people who have chosen to get their education before going out into the workforce. They have no retraining advantage. They do not even have any kind of a hope, most of them, of getting a job. I cannot tell the House the numbers of students that have been to my office with masters degrees, with economics degrees, with all kinds of education degrees that have been unable to find jobs.

It is a signal of a country in crisis when our young people have so little hope. Then we do something to change our policy. I know that this government is thinking about doing that, but it needs to do it today, not three weeks from now, not four weeks from now. The government needed to do it two years ago, but better late than never.

The first thing the government should do is admit that it has failed. It has already admitted that. It has failed. As soon as it realizes that, it should not wait two or three weeks. It should not wait one week. It should come out right away with some measure to invest in people.

I know that my Conservative friends across the way are going to say: "That is just the Liberals and their policy of spend, spend, spend". I tell them that investing in people is not a waste of money. A person who sits at home on welfare and is discouraged consumes as much money as the one who goes out and works at something and leaves something behind, be it in municipal infrastructure, sewer, water projects, whatever.

Would it not be better to have brought forward something in this budget concerning students to say that those students who have graduated, who have been unable to get jobs in order to start paying back their student loans, could do some community work and perhaps get credits against the interest or against their loans?

I believe that the president-elect of the United States has actually proposed something like this. Perhaps this government that has in the past always followed what the Americans do might consider this. Do members opposite not think it would be a good idea?

Think of a young person who is without work and living on welfare. How much better would such people feel about themselves if they were actually contributing something and at the same time keeping the collector on their student loans off their backs while they are waiting to find a job. Then they would be investing their time and would actually be doing something more constructive than sitting at home, living on welfare and worrying about where they are going to go next.

These are positive things that we can do for our students. They are very positive. We have to consider doing things for our students. We have to offer them the opportunity to gain some kind of experience, be it community work and perhaps some relief from their student loans or again just working physically at some infrastructure programs where there will actually be something left after they finish, such as a sewer built. All these things are going to have to be done. If they are not done this year they will have to be done next year.

It is important we consider the kinds of things that can be done and the way we direct our money. Perhaps we can redirect the money this government has been spending on polling. Every department does its own polling constantly. Can you imagine the millions of dollars that have gone into all of these polls? If the government redirected some of the advertising money or other misspent money, it would go a very long way toward creating the kinds of jobs that will leave something behind next year and the year after. I think it is very important.

We must remember there are very few dollars but we must use them in concrete ways that will help the people in the long term, not just in the short term. Doing nothing means the unemployed go from unemployment insurance to welfare. On welfare they get money, and it costs the government money, but there is nothing left. They can eat and sit at home, but imagine how much better it will be when they are able to go out and actually do something. They will feel much better and it will be much better for the country. They get money to live at that point because they are paid for work they have done.

There are many things having to do with students that are shameful in a country that values education, that values the future as we are purported to do. The fact that so many of our people are unemployed is absolutely the most shameful thing that we face every day as parliamentarians. That is the first thing we should concentrate on, getting those young people to be productive members of our society. We should be giving them the best education possible, making it easier for them to go to school and get that education rather than making it harder. We should be making it better for them so they do not have to worry about where their next meal is coming from.

One of the most shameful things I have learned is that there are food banks at every major school in the country pretty well and there is a tremendous demand at the food banks at the universities. Does that not tell you that many of our students are the poorest of the poor? They have to have food banks because these young people do not know where they are going to get their next meal. Is that not shameful in a country that wants its young people to be the best educated? How can they learn if they have empty bellies? There are a few jobs but they are few and far between. We must do something far more productive and far more decisive than these kinds of measures. Obviously that is why the finance minister is planning to bring out an economic statement and a mini budget.

There are four major parts to this particular bill, and one of them is the increase in the small business development loan ceiling. There will be an amendment to the Small Businesses Loans Act which increases the individual loan amount from $100,000 to $200,000. That is a good measure.

However, many small businesses have asked that the ceiling be made higher because not all financial institutions will deal with an amount of $200,000. They would prefer to have more institutions involved, but obviously that is something we can ask the government to consider while we are studying this bill in committee. I do not know if it would be agreeable to this kind of an amendment. Small businesses are the backbone of our economy and they have been extremely hard hit.

We talked about the students. We might as well talk about the small business people in the same way. They have borne the brunt of a lot of the costs of the GST. The smaller they are, the more difficult it has been for them to survive, to do the work associated with many of the changes that have come about due to this government's economic and fiscal policies. It is extremely important that we allow this kind of a ceiling because obviously if you are in big trouble the odds of getting a larger loan are not very good.

We also have to talk to bankers. The Federal Business Development Bank has perhaps to reconsider its mandate. It has now become just an ordinary bank. It will lend money the same way an ordinary bank will lend money. If the business is slightly risky it does not look at it.

Where does a small business person go when he or she is in financial trouble or when he or she needs some kind of bridge financing? It is not easy because these are tough times. People have not been making profits. They do not have a lot of collateral to offer for loans.

When there is no collateral more often than not banks will not look at you. They will not offer you a loan if you say you are going to work hard and make this happen. They are going to offer you a loan if you have something with which you can back up your loan, your personal home, or whatever investments you may have.

If you are in trouble as a small business person, you have already given your house and any other investments you might have had are long gone and your house is up as collateral. How do you increase the amounts you have?

It is especially important that this government come up with some policy to help small businesses in trouble, that the tightening up not occur. I know the banks are trying their best but as financial institutions they have to show a profit to their shareholders. It very important that some scheme be worked out between the government and the banking institutions in order to allow the kinds of loans, the kinds of incentives for small businesses because they are the ones that create the jobs. They are the only way at this point that we have of really pulling ourselves out of this recession.

If we encourage our small business sector then we will be better off. We know that. Hopefully the small business people in our country, in our cities and in our towns will continue to work on. They work extremely long hours. If you have ever been in any kind of a small business usually it is owner operated. In hard times the owner works longer and longer hours under more stressful conditions. He cannot afford to hire people. Often they suffer from burnout.

Would it not be so much better if the owners could afford to hire a few people to help them, if there were some way that they could feel secure enough in their business to hire these young people who are without work. Then we have a chance.

I am asking this government to make sure that these kinds of policies are put in place so that our small business sector can grow and create jobs the way they have done in the past and the way they must continue to help us.

One of the other parts of this bill is the amendments to the Lobbyists Registration Act. The government is saying that if it wants anything having to do with these lobbyists, it is that the whole cost be recovered. At first glance that sounds like a very good idea. However, one of the things that worries me is whether this will deny access to those people who need to lobby the government but have no money.

Let us make sure that we do not cut out all of the poorer people from getting through to government. The rich people and the rich lobbyists can always find a way around it, but in these hard times we must always be very much in touch with the poorer people so that the policies that are brought forward by this government can be talked about by these lobbyists who represent groups that do not have the kinds of dollars that perhaps some of the other ones have. Under the terms of the Lobbyists Registration Act, passed by Parliament in 1988, the statute would have to be reviewed on the third anniversary of the enactment. The third anniversary of the enactment was September 30, and as the House was adjourned for the referendum campaign the government put off the resumption of Parliament and the requirement to strike a committee.

This committee, which should be struck now, would have one year to report back to the House to present its findings and any recommendations for amendments to the Lobbyists Registration Act. This would be an opportunity to begin dealing constructively with the central issues in Canadian democracy: the relationship of the government to its people and how public policy is formed.

Will the mandate of this parliamentary committee be broadened to include the examination of how public policy advocacy is conducted generally in Canada including the use of advocacy advertising, coalition building, grassroots campaigns, public opinion polling, paid lobbyists, and the relative inequities between those few elements of society that can afford to hire highly skilled advocates and those many who cannot?

These are things that must be studied. We know that this piece of legislation will be passed, as this government does have a majority, but we ask that it consider these requests when it strikes the committee. It is extremely important for all Canadians.

The last one is an amendment to the Salaries Act which, effective April 1, 1992, cut the salaries of the Prime Minister, ministers and ministers of state by 5 per cent. That is good. Obviously when you freeze everybody else's salaries you must somehow lead the way and show that you are also prepared to tighten your belt. The only question is whether 5 per cent was enough. That can be debated. I was pleased to see the government do this.

On the other hand, we hear that the Prime Minister is thinking of reducing his cabinet. Let us remind all Canadians that since the Conservatives took office they have had the biggest cabinet ever. When the Liberals were in office the cabinet was not as large as it is now. Perhaps if back in 1984 the Conservatives had done a little bit more thinking rather than just talking they might have saved us millions of dollars by keeping it on the slimmer side, even slimmer than that of the Liberals. I have no objections to that.

That is a question that must be asked.

I know that this government is planning to bring forward some new initiatives. I look forward to hearing them because I, as well as most Canadians, do not believe that this government knows where it is going or has any idea what to do. This government is in total disarray. Canadians no longer trust this government. For all Canadians the sooner it resigns the better.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): It is my pleasure today to speak on the matter of Bill C-76, the omnibus tax or budget bill that is before the House today.

This bill is one that tags a number of different loose ends. It introduces some things that are probably a step in the right direction, and some things that are perhaps questionable.

The bill itself is essentially divided into four parts. The first deals with the Canada Student Loans Act and makes some necessary changes and some changes that are perhaps questionable. The second deals with the Lobbyists Registration Act and is once again a dichotomy. Some parts are essential and some parts are perhaps questionable with respect to some of the fine tuning of the bill. The third part reduces salaries of ministers and the Prime Minister by 5 per cent. I will have some comment on that a little bit later. The fourth part increases the Small Businesses Loans Act limit from $100,000 to $200,000.

First, allow me to give an overview before I speak specifically about these parts of the bill. If we examined the budget overall—and I am not going to speak at great length about the budget because I have had my kick at the cat as many others in the House have had. However, since this is set up in the budget it is relevant to examine the direction that this government has taken over the last few years and where we are at the present time.

Part of the reason I am bringing this up is because I read a recent statement by the Prime Minister in which he spoke about the recession and the depth of the recession. He said, essentially, that he did not realize how deep the recession would go, that some of the economists of the finance department had not recognized the difficulties and that possibly he would have changed some of the government's direction.

Mr. McDermid: Nobody did.

Mr. Whittaker: It is interesting that the junior minister of finance says that nobody did. I would refer him specifically to the GST hearings of 1989-90 at which questions were constantly being asked of the witnesses and the economists—the economists of the Department of Finance—that were before the committee. The number one question was: "Is there a prediction that there will be a recession commencing?" Of course the answer was yes.

Next they were asked: "Will the GST if it is brought in when it is planned to be brought in lengthen and increase the depth of that depression?" The answer was yes. If the member looks through them he will find it in there.

Mr. McDermid: Nobody did.

Mr. Whittaker: I am telling the member to do his homework. I am telling him that it is there. I was on those committees. I heard it. I asked the questions and I got the responses.

Mr. McDermid: Who said that?

Mr. Whittaker: I want to tell the hon. member that if he does his research he will see that those predictions were made and that the Prime Minister should have been aware of them, as should the Minister of Finance, the junior minister of finance and their economists. It was predicted that this recession would be a deep recession and that their monetary policies would increase that problem. The minister closes his eyes to those facts. He does not want to hear that it was their monetary and fiscal policies that caused the problem. I want to remind them of that because they are going to hear from now until the election, and through the election, that the direction they have taken has been wrong. It has been pointed out to them time and time again.

I digress, but I felt that it was important to put it on record that this government has been misleading the people of Canada by telling them that, first of all, there was not a recession and then by saying that the recession was just a little bump and that its monetary and fiscal policies would solve the problems. They have not. I would suggest that they have caused the problems.

Now to examine the legislation before us. I would like to turn to the section dealing with Canada student loans and point out to the government that as a member of the public accounts committee I along with the members of that committee pointed out the difficulties with the collection of Canada student loans and the massive defaults on Canada student loans. There were problems in the collection and the government had to tighten that up.

What we have witnessed over the last little period of time is that in the over exuberance in the collection procedure the collectors who have been hired have hounded those in arrears. In many cases there is no apology for those people. They are clearly in the wrong. They owe the money and should have paid it.

What we are now finding is that some of the people that the collection agencies are going after and some of the people from whom the government has withheld income tax returns, GST credits, et cetera are now without work.

• (1300)

There are some who have become disabled. I recall one case in my riding in which the person had become disabled as a result of a motor vehicle accident since the time of borrowing the money and now it was collection time. Yes, there are provisions within the act and policies within the student loan department to make exceptions, exemptions and reasonable collection procedures.

Unfortunately when those people come into our offices they have already either lost the money or they are being hounded to death by a collection agency. That must stop.

The main thrust of this bill is a serious one that we must examine on behalf of students. It will require students to begin paying interest on loans from the time of graduation.

If you look at the other side, the government is saying: "We will increase the amount of money per week that you can get". However over the course of the time it is saying: "We are going to give you more money over the period that you need it. The interest rates may be increased because of the new administrative problems for which we will be paying and ultimately for which you will be paying but you will now have to pay interest from the time you graduate as opposed to six months later".

The accumulated principal and interest now owing increases. The student comes out of university owing $5,000, $10,000 or $20,000 under the Canada Student Loans Act as well as the other loans that the student has had to get in order to get the education, and he or she has no guarantee of a job.

At the time that I finished high school I was able to go directly from high school into a job and then later go back to university. I was able to pay my own way through but that is not the case with many people. There are no jobs out there.

The jobs that were available in industry have collapsed. They are simply not there. They are not available any more. Therefore, it is very unfair to these students at this stage to say, particularly in these hard economic times: "You are going to have to pay interest for that period of time".

It is one thing to try to get the deficit and the debt under control, but it is another to put the onus, not just for paying off the debt but for paying off their own personal debts, onto the next generation coming up. It is shirking our responsibilities as members of Parliament and of our present generation to hoist that onto the younger generation. It will make it that much more difficult for them to become viable within the business community as they get out of universities and colleges. I have some problem with that.

I would like to turn to the Small Businesses Loans Act. While it appears to be laudable to increase from $100,000 to $200,000 the amount of money available to be loaned we must examine the many other things within that with regard to where we are going with small business.

We all know that small business, and we have said it before, is the backbone of Canadian employment and that 85 per cent of the increased employment throughout the last 10 years has been created by the small business community. We also know that the majority of profits from small businesses are put back into the Canadian economy, but on the other hand it seems that we do not make it that easy for the small business community.

If we examine the bankruptcy results for the last couple of years we see enormous increases in small business bankruptcies. There was an increase in bankruptcies just last month from September to October of something like 35 per cent compared to the same period last year.

We also have to examine what these small business people face when they are starting up, the capitalization, the money that they need in order to get going. They go to the banks. First I would suggest that the banks do not often look at the Small Businesses Loans Act in deciding whether or not they should finance.

Often we talk to small business people from within the communities about what funds are available. If you ask them if they have ever looked at the Small Businesses Loans Act they say they have been in to see the bankers and their bankers have never told them about that particular act. I think that this is reflected in some of the loans under the Small Businesses Loans Act. If we look at the period from 1985 through to 1991, we see a decrease under the Small Businesses Loans Act of 69 per cent in loans, from 34,741 small businesses using that act in 1985 down to 10,640. I think that is a reflection of the difficulty of what the small business community calls triple dipping and the fact that the bankers are not telling the small business community that the Small Businesses Loans Act is available to them.

The triple dipping I referred to is the wish of the banks to ensure their loans are looked after. They are guaranteed under the Small Businesses Loans Act. They are then given business collateral as well as personal collateral so that there is essentially triple collateral available to the banks. On collections, they often do not bother to pay attention as to whether they get the best value for their money when they are collecting on defaulted loans.

Also, if we look at the amount of money lent under the Small Businesses Loans Act for that same period of time, there is a decrease of 59 per cent of loans, from $1 billion approximately in 1985 down to $413,000 in 1991, a substantial drop. While the increased limit seems to be a good idea, I suggest that there is not much use to it if in fact the banks are not making the small businesses aware that this is available.

I should say at this point that I was pleased to see considered one of the suggestions that I have made to this House and a number of other members have made over the last two or three years, that of a one-stop shop. I understand that the government, under the Minister of State for Small Businesses and others, has set up a pilot project in Edmonton where there will be under one roof a one-stop shop for the small business community. I am hoping that that pilot project will work out well within Edmonton and will be able to be expanded throughout Canada to ensure that the small business community can go to one stop under one roof and find out from that area all of what is available from the federal government and perhaps also the provincial governments. I think that would be of great help to the small business community.

I think it is also interesting to note that as we look at money that is provided or loan guarantees provided by the federal government through the Small Businesses Loans Act and the Federal Business Development Bank, we see the loans getting larger and larger. If we speak to the banking community they tell us that there is as much paperwork to make a $20,000 loan as there is to make a $2 million or $10 million loan and they would much rather make the larger loans. I think that is the way the situation has gone in the banking community. There is a tendency to flow toward larger loans to larger corporations as opposed to assisting smaller businesses with smaller loans, the small capital loans.

I do not think that moving the floor up from $100,000 to $200,000 is going to help those smaller businesses. While I support the floor for those who need that increase, and I think that increase is needed, I suggest that we have got to do other things to make sure that the small business community is in fact getting the money it needs.

It is interesting to note also that there is a report card done on banking by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business each year. It is also interesting to note that the five major chartered banks are the bottom of the satisfaction scale. There has been some shifting over the years. I will say that the Bank of Montreal has made an effort. It appears to increase the availability of loans to small businesses. That is reflected in this report card, where they have come from the bottom last year up to somewhere in the middle, approximately a 56 per cent satisfaction rate. It is interesting to note that caisses populaires and credit unions have the top ranking as far as satisfaction percentage with the small business community goes in this report card. It goes out to other institutions, down to trust companies, national banks and other chartered banks. Then you get into the big five. I think that is a tell-tale figure and a tell-tale report card in looking at the availability of funding through our chartered banks and through our banking community.

We as parliamentarians have to look at where we are going and what we have done in the past in ensuring that our small business community is in fact a viable community and that we make things somewhat easier on them in order to secure their loans while still protecting the profits, which can be somewhat less, of the lending institutions.

I would like to move on briefly to touch on the amendments to the lobby area and just flag one problem that I foresee in this. It is a good idea to ensure that the user pays to some extent in this particular case, but there are two parts of the lobbyist registrations. There are tier one lobbyists who lobby on behalf of several different firms or organizations and tier two lobbyists who are employees of a firm or organization and lobby exclusively for their employer.

I would suggest that while there is now a cost of some $500,000 for the registration per year of lobbyists, and there should be some way of getting that back from the larger firms, there is a potential problem here for those groups which lobby on behalf of women, minorities, native people, the disabled, the homeless, the poor. Many of these groups would fall under tier one. Many of these groups may perhaps be hard pressed to pay some of the lobbyist fees that may be required. It is not set out in this bill exactly what those lobbyist fees will be and how extensive, but I would suggest that in order to get back what it costs for the registration that they may have to be fairly substantial. I flag that as a potential problem in this particular area.

The final part of this bill of course is that of reducing the salaries of ministers and the Prime Minister by 5 per cent. While I do not think that anybody can criticize the government for cutting back and recognizing that, we should also recognize that these cutbacks mean approximately $100,000 in the over-all picture, if added up. I think that each minister gave up a matter of something like $2,400 and the Prime Minister slightly over $3,000. All this added together is $100,000. This is not a lot when we consider a budget of over $160 billion in expenditures, but I think this was a correct idea to show that there are problems out there and to lead the way. Capping the salaries of the members with a 0 per cent increase last year and taking a cut in the cabinet and prime ministerial salaries of 5 per cent shows that things are tight and things are tough and that our cabinet is willing to make that step. However, it is in fact tokenism and I think the government has to look deeper into some of the areas that it wants to go into.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pick up on the remarks that the member from the New Democratic Party made in regard to the Small Businesses Loans Act.

I would corroborate the member's remarks in the sense that small businesses are the engine of growth and new job opportunity and the fact that most banking institutions in this country are not promoting and not working with small and medium sized businesses in providing this service of the $200,000 Government of Canada loan insurance. For many months now I have been asking the minister to try to promote this, and even to buy a bit of advertising space in some newspapers. This is a useful tax expenditure when promoting a service to the 1,700,000 small businesses and when most of the banking institutions are not aware of it.

I have just been handed the minister's press release wherein the banks are being urged to be more progressive in their attitude toward small business. I salute the minister for that.

If we could get something going in this House this week with that sector of the economy with the point person for the government then we can get some confidence going. We are not going to get a lot of confidence as we look to Royal Trust and the bigger guys. If we could somehow figure out a strategy this week where we could pump up the morale, pump up the entrepreneurial spirit with small and medium sized operators, I think Canadians would feel that maybe we are finally doing something constructive in this place.

I would like to ask the member a question related to student loans. I too have had the experience of young people who are being harassed by credit agencies coming to my office. Some of these stories are very harsh and very hard to believe. I think the government is making a mistake in the way it is handling the student loan situation. We know there is a major problem in terms of job opportunities for people coming out of university today. Maybe we should apply the same principles to student loans that we are applying to some of the restructuring going on with some of the loans to major corporations and the development industry.

Would the member give me his comments on using the same formula for students that we use for major corporations?

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the member has hit on something that we often overlook, that the larger the loan the more willing the financial institutions are to work around and make exceptions and exemptions for them.

The investment we have in our young people through the student loans program is an investment in the future of Canada. By restructuring those loans to make it easier for those students to pay off their loans and get back in as an active member, and generating some funds and employment for Canada, we will be better off.

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I want to make just a couple of comments on the problems with post-secondary education created by the federal government. It has been acknowledged by the Canadian Federation of Students and others that there were a couple of positive proposals put forward. One was to increase the weekly rate and the other was to remove the 3 per cent tax. Then it reneged on it, as it has done with virtually everything else.

The cumulative negative effect on students will be that in addition to now being charged the 3 per cent tax, they will be charged additional interest payments. The second thing is they have changed the mission statement. The program used to be aimed at access to education. Now it is some mealy-mouthed statement about a need for a productive work force. There needs to be fair and decent access to the education system.

An hon. member: Accessibility.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Accessibility is the comment and the need. What we do not need is discrimination with regard to accessibility. The Conservative government is turning access to universities and post-secondary education into an élitist opportunity for people who live in urban areas and a profound discrimination against the rural areas. Affordability diminishes while tuition costs are going up like a rocket.

• (1320)

The federal government has made major unilateral cuts to provincial partnership funding. The room and board and transportation loans are harder to get. Economic recession is in full tilt and yet the federal government makes it harder and harder for students to afford post-secondary education.

Defaults, in an economic recession, are a fact of life. That is why the guarantees are there. The primary principle of Canada student loans, which has been strangled by this federal government, is to provide Canadian young people—Canadians in general—accessibility to post-secondary education. This has been a complete miserable failure.

I wonder if the hon. member would agree with that.

Mr. Whittaker: I think my friend makes some excellent points and I cannot argue with the points he made. I will throw it over to the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism. I know that he has made an important announcement. I would have liked him perhaps to go further in his announcement when he stated that the economic recovery will also hinge on the banks committing additional dollars for new small business loans and generally being more receptive to the clear requirements of small and medium sized firms.

I would also have liked to have seen his negotiations try to ensure that there is no double and triple-dipping as far as collateral means go. I think he is well aware of the difficulties involved in that.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, for just over 30 years the Small Businesses Loans Act or the SBLA has played a key role in the development of the small business community in Canada. One of the four items in this piece of legislation is the raising of the ceiling for the Small Businesses Loans Act to $200,000.

That is the part of this act I would like to make my references to today, although I would be glad to answer questions on other matters as well.

[Translation]

It is a fact that outside financing is essential for small businesses when initial financial resources, provided by a family member or a friend, are exhausted. These precious funds lent by relatives, the foundation of many small businesses, are usually soon spent especially when a business is expanding. That is when the SBLA program has proved to be useful and indeed very successful.

[English]

Obtaining financing for small business is always a challenging task. I have expressed my concerns in the House this past year about the limit to credit that has been perceived for small business in this country.

This morning I met again with the Canadian Bankers' Association to press the point home to them about how important it is in this period when interest rates are low to do everything we can to extend credit to small businesses, and to as many of them as possible.

This particular piece of legislation helps us do that because it is a government guarantee bill that helps small businesses obtain much needed capital. The SBLA program makes debt financing more readily available for the purposes of establishment, expansion, modernization, or improvement.

In practical terms this program provides loans for the acquisition of fixed assets such as land or buildings, machinery and equipment, leasehold improvements, and even some computer software.

Thirty years ago at the inception of this program which was put into place by the previous Conservative government under John Diefenbaker, the maximum loan size was set at $25,000, a large amount at that time.

While this amount was appropriate at the time inflation over the years eroded the dollar's purchasing power and so amendments to the act raised the loan ceiling to its present maximum of $100,000.

Now, as part of the government's continuing commitment to the small business sector, the Minister of Finance, through Bill C-76, is recommending to this House that the SBLA be amended to further increase the loan ceiling to $200,000.

This is an important change and one that has been requested by the small business community and by financial institutions.

As a result of Bill C-76 financial institutions will have the flexibility they need to meet the credit requirements of the small business sector in general and in particular growth companies, that segment of the small business community that presents the most challenge to financiers.

The present ceiling contained in the act, which is $100,000, is generally sufficient to respond to credit needs of new small businesses. With smaller operations, owner equity and family or friends investing in the business, start ups generally require loans in the $30,000 or $40,000 range. Indeed the average loan under the program is $38,000, with a significant number of them under $20,000.

Nonetheless, a significant number of start-up operations do require more capital and this bill will make it available to them. Even more important, the change we are proposing recognizes the risks inherent in expanding a business operation, risks well known to financial institutions which tend to reduce their willingness to lend. Purchasing technology, expanding plant operations or exploring export opportunities all cost money. This puts pressure on the balance sheet that the small, early stage business is not equipped to deal with.

Without an immediate growth in sales to offset the capital expenditure cash flow suffers and the growth phase can stall. Here is where this program steps in and helps meet that problem. With this program amended to guarantee loans up to $200,000 the short-term impact on the financial operations is reduced and the business can then concentrate on taking advantage of the expansion to service the additional debt. In this way the SBLA can act as a bridge between business phases ensuring a smooth growth period for small and medium-sized enterprises.

As is presently the case, the financial institutions will be required to impose a normal business regime with respect to the granting of credit under the program. This process, combined with a normal monitoring of the program by ISTC officials in Ottawa, will ensure there is no change to the normal government liabilities associated with the SBLA.

Members who have heard me speak on the issue of small business financing will have heard me focus not so much on debt, which the SBLA addresses itself to, but on equity as the key capital concern of small business. I have focused on the need for equity.

I would not want members to get the impression that by focusing today on this particular debt instrument I have changed my views. I have not. I continue to hold the view that access to equity is the most important issue for small business. We are working on a number of fronts in that regard.

Notwithstanding this, the small business community requires access to loans. We are committed to meeting that requirement because we recognize the important role that small and medium sized enterprises play in the Canadian economy. It is important to note that the SBLA program is a program for small business, not big business and not medium business but small business.

Only companies with revenues of $2 million or less are currently eligible to participate in the program. This means the assistance implicit in the program is being directed to the small end of the business spectrum in terms of size, but I might add that it is the big end of the spectrum in terms of contribution to Canada's economic well-being and growth.

In fact, I think most Canadians know that 81 per cent of all the new jobs in the last 10 years in the Canadian economy were created not by big business but by small businesses, those with less than 100 employees.

As members are also no doubt aware, small business is a major engine of growth in this country. For example, almost 99 per cent of the approximately 900,000 incorporated businesses are small—they have fewer than 100 employees—and 36 per cent of total business employment is represented by the small business community. Since 1984 small business has created, as I already said, over 81 per cent of net new jobs.

Small businesses also play a significant role in the creation and use of innovation, which is so vital in the increasingly competitive world in which we live. For example, more than one-half of the Canadian companies carrying out research and development have fewer than 50 employees. These facts and figures state simply and powerfully the key role that Canada's entrepreneurs play, in many cases with the help of the SBLA.

When I ran for public office the first time in 1981 I was concerned about the increased dependence of Canadians on big government, big institutions, big business, as shown in the seventies. I saw other countries with a tremendous amount of entrepreneurial dynamism. I was worried that Canada did not have that.

Since the early eighties this country has become much more entrepreneurial, and the SBLA program has played an important part in helping to make that happen. Since its inception some $7.6 billion in more than 280,000 loans have been disbursed under the program. In recent years almost 40 per cent of all loans have been to start ups, with 60 per cent to clients that were less than three years old. This program helps companies get going, especially in the early stages.

It also means jobs, and this is very instructive. Based on figures reported by the borrowers, in the range of 24,000 jobs were created by the program's clients last year alone. With the net cost of the program for that year of just $27 million this amounts to an average cost per job of just over a thousand dollars—a very cost effective performance.

This is why members of the House of Commons from all parties are fans of the SBLA and why they support it. There were some very constructive comments made by the Liberal member and the NDP member on this particular part of the bill with regard to the Small Businesses Loans Act.

In a nutshell the program provides banks and many other smaller financial institutions such as caisses populaires, with an 85 per cent guarantee against loan losses for eligible loans. That is how it works. Private sector lenders are the sole delivery agents. There are no government bureaucrats delivering them. People just go to their financial institutions and apply there. We set the rules and the lenders make credit decisions within those rules. We do not have an array of officials administering the program. Only 22 government employees do all the work.

The loan guarantee enables lenders to make loans to businesses which they would not otherwise undertake without the guarantee, for example viable companies with a limited track record or with inadequate or inappropriate collateral. In particular risky types of businesses or perhaps those outside the major metropolitan areas are generally clients of the program.

This bill will allow us the opportunity to further improve what is already a successful and necessary program for Canada's small business sector. The change we are proposing is supported by the small business community and its representatives, as well as by the lending community. It is an important tool in the government's over-all effort to create an economic environment conducive to small business growth, which includes low and simplified taxes, price stability, low inflation and low interest rates. This bill can be made more dynamic in the months and years ahead.

While my friends opposite may not agree with everything I have said I do believe that they agree that everything possible must be done to help our small business sector lead the recovery. Bill C-76 will help them do that. I urge all party support quickly for this very important bill.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the minister. I know that he has avoided the particular subject of ministers' salaries which I believe is dealt with in this bill. He mentioned the Salaries Act which pertained to his and his colleagues' salaries. I know they are being reduced and I sympathize with the minister because frankly I do not feel that the minister is over paid. For the moment we will let that pass.

Would he not agree that the government could have saved a lot more money than the rather modest decrease in ministers' salaries proposed in this bill if it had chopped the size of the cabinet from the overweening, over sized, and grossly inefficient group of 39 cabinet ministers that we have in office now? It is the largest cabinet in history, and Canadians have been saddled with it and have been paying for it through the nose since 1984.

Would it not have been better, in his view, if the Prime Minister had reduced the cabinet by cutting out the dead wood and reducing it to a smaller number with a little less dead wood?

An hon. member: There would be nothing left.

Mr. Milliken: My friend is unduly harsh. He said there would be nothing left. That is unfair. There are a few members of the cabinet who are not dead wood.

Mr. Riis: Name them.

Mr. Milliken: The member for Kamloops wants me to name them, but I would not want to embarrass the others. It is better and safer, as he knows, to refer to a lot of dead wood and let the public and the press decide who they think is dead wood.

Would the hon. minister enlighten us on whether he thinks we could have saved a lot more money by chopping the cabinet instead of proposing this modest reduction in ministers' salaries? Would it not have been better for the Canadian public if we had done that?

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to hear from my hon. friend on this subject. I am astonished to hear that he is against the cutting of ministerial pay.

Mr. Milliken: I did not say that.

Mr. Hockin: He expressed that he did not think this was a particularly good reform. He was very complimentary but he said that we did not save very much money with it. However it is important symbolically. When we are asking Canadians to tighten their belts, it is important that ministers do so as well.

His next question about the size of cabinet was a more interesting one. Let me say that I think he is taking the position of Preston Manning who said last week that all ministers of state represent nothing but narrow specialized interests and all must go.

I do not believe that small business is a narrow specialized interest. I do not believe that small business which creates over 80 per cent of all the new jobs in Canada is a narrow specialized interest. I do not agree with Preston Manning.

Small business is the engine that will take us out of the restraints of the present economy. Small business needs support, and that is what this bill is for.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I want to add that indeed small business is driving the recovery. We should do everything we can to support that sector.

I listened to the hon. minister's speech carefully. The other day a group of students from Cariboo College approached me regarding the six-month grace period that is now being removed. Needless to say it is a real struggle for students coming out of colleges, universities and so on. Their ability to repay their loans is being further challenged by the economic downturn.

The question put to me was the following one: Why would the government be making life more difficult for students entering the work force at this critical point when it has agreed to spend over $4 billion on attack helicopters? A lot of these students did not see this as necessarily a priority. Important, yes, but is it more of a priority than providing assistance and encouragement to our young people entering the job market?

I wonder if I could put a question on their behalf to the hon. minister to help explain to them why $4 billion—actually it is more than that—on attack helicopters is a greater priority than helping young students after they graduate in those critical few years as they try to get back on their feet.

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for his question. The changes that are being made here to the Canada Student Loans Act are precisely to help the student by removing the administration fee while they are in university, while they are in college. That is when they need the help.

We have removed the 3 per cent fee in an attempt to capture them at student age so that they would not be burdened with the fee when attending an institution. The philosophy of the bill is to make sure that students are not burdened with that 3 per cent fee while they are in college.

I know the hon. member agrees with that change. We have done this in order to underline the importance of young people in our economy and the importance of education.

As for attack helicopters, I think the hon. member believes in search and rescue. He believes in policing our fishery zones to make sure that foreign fleets are not catching fish there, to make sure that international agreements with respect to fish are complied with, and to look after that now that over eight countries have nuclear submarines.

The hon. member is an intelligent member of Parliament. We have these frigates but they cannot do anything without helicopters. He knows that. If we do not have helicopters we might as well not build the frigates. Once we have these helicopters we will have the greatest range of any country in terms of policing the seas. We will have the safest vehicles to make sure that search and rescue can happen properly.

All of this builds a greater country. It builds jobs and helps the young people to whom he refers.

• (1340)

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am referring to the minister's media release of either today or yesterday, wherein he urged the banks to loosen their purse strings toward small business.

My concern is that this may be put to the Canadian Bankers' Association but I am not convinced financial institutions will follow through. As the minister knows, a lot of the branch offices of these financial institutions are working on memos from head office. Right now credit for small business has been very tough. This media release is a total about-face in terms of the direction the minister is giving to the banks. They have not been supplying credit generously to small business and he is giving them an instrument to make it a lot easier.

What type of accountability will the minister put in place to make sure that what is in this press release actually happens?

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, that is a very responsible question. I met this morning with the Canadian Bankers' Association to put in place the mechanism to which the member refers.

It is fine to have a Small Businesses Loans Act. Hopefully we will pass this bill and will have a higher ceiling in place. After that we will want the banks to pick it up and use it by giving people loans.

They confirmed to me this morning that they are to do a major advertising campaign on this issue. They are also to get head office to instruct the account managers in every branch to take it seriously. They have also told me today—and the member can discuss it with them directly if he wants—that they are to have a major advertising campaign to try to heighten the awareness of small business in all major chartered banks.

They also told me that there has not been much take-up of these possibilities by the credit unions, the trust companies and the insurance companies. They can use them too and I would like to see it happen.

Every few months I meet with the banks and tell them to report to me on the performance of small business financing. This morning they told me there has been an increase in the past quarter of loans to small business. Frankly I am not too impressed with the amounts, but at least it is up 2 per cent in one bank, 4 per cent in another and 9 per cent in another. There has been a slight improvement in credit availability in the last quarter. The FBDB, the bank for which I am responsible to Parliament, has increased its loans 13 per cent in the last year.

I am starting to see a sign of improved credit availability. It is still not good enough, and I agree with the hon. member we should monitor it closely.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I found it a bit intriguing to listen to the minister for small businesses and to notice that while he was talking about matters within his portfolio he had to read fairly slavishly the speech in front of him in both languages. However, when it came time to quote Preston Manning he had it down by heart, word for word.

I thought that was fairly instructive. Members over there are experts at quoting Preston Manning. If only they were as adept, as skilled and as familiar with the concerns including some of the graphic quotes about this government from ordinary Canadians, we would be a lot better off.

The following appeared in The Ottawa Citizen a couple of days ago:

> The Prime Minister has admitted that he failed to realize the scope of the recession and he may have mistimed some important economic initiatives.

That is like my standing here and saying that Christmas this year is coming on December 25. If he failed to realize that, he must be about the only Canadian, let alone the only leader out there. If he only now realizes that he mistimed some of his initiatives, again he must be the only one out there.

Who knows? Maybe there are a few more things he did not know until now that he is prepared to own up to. Does he not know yet, for example, that because of the kind of legislation we have before us today we are losing some of our best minds in the area of research and development to other countries?

I heard an agonizing story this morning. I had in my office a lady professor from the Ontario Institute for Studies and Education. I asked her for examples and she gave me two specific examples, both of eminent researchers from a couple of universities in Montreal who have gone in one case to Harvard and in another case to UCLA in California. In the first case the person has a research budget four times what he could have at a Canadian university. This relates directly to the way the government has treated research and development.

Is the Prime Minister now prepared to do a mea culpa on this one too? Is he now prepared to say: "I did not know that my policies were causing such havoc in the university community?" Does he want to do a mea culpa now by saying: "I did not realize that I was keeping so many students out of university because since 1984 I have not adjusted the floor amount that a person can access under Canada Student Loans?"

That is a fact. In eight years this government, despite increasing costs, inflation and so on, has not adjusted the amount that students can apply for. Even when they qualify for a student loan, they do not have enough in their hands to get through university.

Does he want to do a mea culpa on that one and say: "I did not know about the recession; I did not know I was driving all the best minds out of the country; and I did not know I was standing in the way of thousands of would-be university students getting into university?"

On other matters, does he now know what his policy has done in terms of foreign overfishing on the south coast of Newfoundland and the fish plants that have closed? Does he now know about the thousands and tens of thousands of people who are put out of work? Does he want to do a mea culpa on that one right now?

Does he want to admit and apologize for the devastation, the unfairness of the fisheries programs being implemented by his minister of fisheries as they relate to people on the south coast and the southwest coast of Newfoundland? Does he want to admit and apologize for the blatant unfairness as it relates to the people of Ramea who handled northern cod before the minister knew what a northern cod or a southern cod looked like?

Those people are being hung out to dry. Does the Prime Minister want to do a mea culpa on that particular issue while he is in a fessing up mood?

Deathbed repentances, whether to do with recession, the depths of it, the devastation caused by his policy on foreigners fishing off the Grand Banks, Canada Student Loans or the brain drain from Canada to other countries, particularly the United States, ought to be seen for what they are.

Someone has said that nothing concentrates a man's thinking as much as the certain knowledge that he is to be hanged in the morning. Maybe the Prime Minister has had more than one touch of reality. Maybe he is beginning, a couple of weeks after the event, to absorb what the public said to him on October 26. I say to him that what the public said to the Prime Minister on referendum day had very little to do with the Constitution.

None is so blind as he who will not see. If the Prime Minister does not see clearly or graphically and does not hear what the message was—

• (1350)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I think it may be useful to remind the hon. member that the debate is on Bill C–76, an act to amend certain statutes to implement certain fiscal provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 25, 1992.

Mr. Simmons: I wondered what we were debating here.

I realize full well, but I ask this House, before it rushes to a judgment on this one, to keep in mind very clearly who are making the commitments here. All the talk from the Minister of Small Businesses and Tourism about how there will be a new millennium beginning tomorrow morning and that things will be all different if we up it from $100,000 to $200,000. We have no difficulty with that particular detail, none whatsoever. But this is the crowd that told us before how they were going to double research and development and how we ought to believe them on their measures with respect to the recession.

Admittedly I was taking a little licence to make an important point that if we are going to judge this piece of legislation we ought to keep in mind who leads the gang that brings this legislation before us. It is the same gang that has botched every measure they have tried with respect to getting us out of this recession. It is the same gang that has made life miserable for university students. It is the same gang that is driving some of our best minds out of this country. They want to be here doing research we can benefit from but instead, they are being driven across the border by the policies and negativeness of this particular government. Mr. Speaker, if you find that not to be relevant I will get even more relevant.

Let us look at the question of post–secondary education addressed in the bill. One will realize that the government wants to eliminate the six–month interest–free period for student loans for example. It wants to put a 3 per cent administrative fee on student loans. In short, the government wants to make it even more costly and difficult for people to go to university. Who wants to do that? The same crowd that since 1986 has introduced a number of measures that together represent a cut in federal support of $1.6 billion in the last six years. All together it was a cut of $4.9 million in revenues flowing to the provinces for post–secondary education and health care.

Let us look at those Canada student loans for a moment. I heard in the last little while a couple of absolutely mind–boggling examples. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that not only is the government going to remove the six–month interest holiday, not only does it want to put on a 3 per cent administration fee, but it has also set loose some of the most unprincipled collection agencies. I say to my friend from St. John's East, that we missed him yesterday at the forum in Gander. They were asking about him.

Mr. Reid: I was at Bonavista last time.

Mr. Simmons: I hope my colleague was in Bonavista. It is his riding the member will realize, not mine. I was charitable. We missed the member yesterday.

I wanted to say to him that the crowd he supports over there have unleashed some of the most unprincipled collection agencies on little old ladies. I will give him a specific example that has come to my attention in the last hour or so. Does he realize there is a fellow who has a student loan of $3,000 or $4,000 and has been out of university for two or three years? The loan is due, no question about that. He is 26 years of age. The loan is in his name and in the last few days a collection agency at the behest of the government the hon. member supports was not calling that 26–year old man but the mother of that 26–year old man. The mother is of very limited means.

An hon. member: Bravo.

Mr. Simmons: There is a stranger in the House.

An hon. member: Parce que je parle français?

Mr. Simmons: In any language, there is a stranger in the House.

The collection agent made a suggestion to this mother who, by the way, has no responsibility for the loan. She signed no piece of paper. She happens to be the biological mother of this individual but he is a person quite well of age. One of the suggestions the collection agent made to this mother was: "Sell your house if you have to", when she asked where she would get the money. Except he did not realize she did not have a house to sell.

I see by the nods of my compassionate friends on the other side they see nothing wrong with that particular example. The less compassionate of my compassionate friends on the other side see nothing wrong with that particular tactic.

Let me be even more specific so as not to indict the innocent. I think that was the point my friend from St. John's East was making and I absolutely agree with him. I was referring particularly to the compassionate soul from Abitibi. I got from his signals, his always very communicative body language, that he saw nothing wrong with a collection agent, on behalf of the federal government, going out and harassing little old ladies for repayment of student loans that their adult offspring happen to owe the government. Well, I say to him that I do have a lot of difficulty with that particular example.

There was another case where the government found somebody after 20 years. It found him through his social insurance number. When he called to find out why he did not receive his $5,000 GST refund he was informed it had been applied to his $6,000 loan which he did not realize he owed. His parents had passed on seven or eight years before and this was the first he had heard of it. Not only did the government collect the $5,000 that way, in the meantime he got a call from a collection agency and when the language was printable these people said some pretty nasty things to him.

Stop the pretence about what this government is doing for students and people who want to improve their education. I hear all the quotes from our Prime Minister about our brightest and best but he does not put his money where his mouth is. The regime he leads is socking it to students. This legislation is a good example of that with the 3 per cent administration fee which should not be there and which we oppose and the taking away of the six-month holiday on interest on loans that have been acquired by those students. This does not give those people a fair break.

I have talked in the last few minutes about what is happening in terms of collections. If those people owe these amounts, let us use legitimate means to collect them. I say that having collection agents calling and threatening people and the mothers of those people is not a legitimate, fair way a government should be going about its business. I appeal to the minister responsible to call off the hounds now that he has been made aware of those instances by what I have said in the last few minutes. Call off those unprincipled collection agents and allow those students whose only sin was to go out and get some money to get an education a fair opportunity to repay. Let us stop treating them like a bunch of criminals and sending those unprincipled people after them.

I see that my time is up for now.

Mr. Speaker: It being two o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[Translation]

CHURCH OF ENGLAND

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in the House to congratulate the Church of England for allowing women to become priests after an historic vote by the synod. In so doing the Anglican Church has consecrated the equality of men and women.

I hope that other religions especially the Catholic Church of which I am a member will follow this example because only then will the gap between men and women and its attendant inequities diminish.

THE LATE DR. PETER

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, early yesterday morning Dr. Peter died of AIDS at the age of 35. Dr. Peter was known to hundreds of thousands of Canadians, particularly those of us in British Columbia, as a courageous and eloquent spokesperson for people living with AIDS.

Through his weekly CBC television programs and specials he put a human face on AIDS and exemplified the remarkable caring, compassion and true family values of the gay community in fighting this epidemic.

For many viewers Dr. Peter was the only person they knew who lived with AIDS. His work, even as he lost his vision and his mobility, did much to dispel the stereotypes and misunderstandings both about AIDS and about gay men.

I last saw Dr. Peter at the annual walk for AIDS in Vancouver a few weeks ago when he spoke out, urging the government to extend and increase federal funding for AIDS which runs out on March 31 of next year.

The finest tribute all of us could make to the memory of this truly outstanding Canadian would be to act on this plea now.

STEVE MACLEAN

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of all Canadians it is indeed my pleasure to rise today to congratulate Steve Maclean for becoming Nepean's first astronaut in space.

It would be impossible to fathom the magnitude of Steve's excitement spending nine days in orbit as a member of a crack flight team. It is not so difficult, however, to imagine how fulfilling it is to realize a childhood dream and even easier for all of us to feel proud of his accomplishment.

Steve quickly emerged as a star on board the space shuttle Columbia testing materials designed by his father, Paul, reviving a failing experiment from Queen's University, and demonstrating his gymnastic ability with a few flips and rolls.

Steve's work on the Canex-2 project is not only contributing to the success of Canada's robotic arm but also enhancing a Canadian reputation for ingenuity and efficiency in the field of aerospace.

Just as the Space Vision System gives eyes to the Canadarm, Steve has shown all Canadians that with devotion, vision and plenty of hard work we too can endeavour to reach for the stars.

CONTAMINATED BLOOD

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, for some time people in Abitibi and across Canada have been following the news about possible cases of contaminated blood in this country.

According to an estimate by the Canadian Hemophilia Society, about 1,000 patients contracted the AIDS virus from blood or blood products imported from the United States. Tragically many of the victims could have been spared this fate if governments and the Red Cross had been more vigilant and more effective.

On November 6, 1992 I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare to order a public inquiry in order to find out how such a tragedy could have occurred and how it could be prevented in the future.

SERIAL KILLER CARDS

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, in recent months a new inducement to violence has entered our community. Serial killer cards glamourizing individuals who have wounded, raped and killed many people are being imported into Canada.

I have been approached by many of my constituents who are rightfully horrified, disgusted and appalled that these materials are being allowed into Canada.

They spread a dangerous message, particularly to our young people, that murder, torture, masochism, sadism and sexual assault are somehow glamorous or acceptable.

Canada cannot hope to progress in its fight against violence, particularly against women and children, if such materials are readily available to our children.

I ask the government to act immediately to stop the import of serial killer cards into Canada.

THE LATE COLONEL FRED TILSTON

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, during our recess Colonel Fred Tilston, one of Canada's greatest war heroes, died.

People who never met Fred Tilston knew he had done something exceptional. The letters VC following his name needed no explanation. He was one of the bravest of the brave. He held the Victoria Cross.

Colonel Tilston won his VC in the Hochwald Forest of Germany in 1945, leading an attack on enemy positions. He was wounded three times while repeatedly running through heavy fire for fresh supplies. Canada now has only two living Victoria Cross winners: Cec Merritt and Ernest "Smokey" Smith.

The Canadian Armed Forces are still composed of men and women from the same mould as these, yet we no longer recognize the Victoria Cross in our honours and awards system.

Canada must retain the right to honour others who in the future may exhibit great courage. The finest tribute we could make to Fred Tilston would be to restore the Victoria Cross to its rightful place as Canada's premier decoration for valour.

RUSSIAN FEDERATION

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I ask the government to continue its patient handling of debt arrears with the Russian Federation. The worst case scenario would be for Canada to pull the plug on the $1.5 billion line of credit. The Russian shortage of hard currency does not preclude its desire to receive Canadian exports and ultimately to pay for them.

The $20 million payment made last week on Canadian grain shows good faith on the part of the Russians, even though they remain well in arrears on the payment schedule.

I urge the government to be clear about the status of the loan guarantees for the sake of Canadian workers. Thousands of Canadian jobs hang in the balance on whether or not these commitments are fulfilled.

Commodities such as grain and other agricultural products are a required staple, and steel tubular products will allow the development of the oil and gas fields so necessary for a vital economy.

I believe our support of the federation will not only behove Canadian exporters but also demonstrate our support for economic and political reform in the Russian Federation.

A meeting last week with Russian Ambassador Belonogov confirmed to me that continued dialogue and patience are necessary on our part.

CLASS OF 72

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, October 30 marked the 20th anniversary of the election of the Class of 72. On October 30, 1972, 59 Conservatives, 23 Liberals, 11 New Democrats and 3 members of the Social Credit Party were elected to the House of Commons for the first time. Of those members, only 11 Conservative members and 2 Liberal members remain in the House today with unbroken electoral records.

In the Conservative caucus there is the right hon. Joe Clark, the hon. Harvie Andre, the hon. Perrin Beatty, the hon. Paul Dick, the hon. Jake Epp, the hon. Otto Jelinek, the hon. Frank Oberle, Bill Kempling, Gus Mitges, myself and, by no means the least, yourself, Mr. Speaker.

In the Liberal caucus there is the hon. Bill Rompkey and the hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier.

Given the fact that the political life expectancy of an individual in public life these days is quite short, those who count themselves among the Class of 72 are to be commended for their tenacity in bucking the electoral trends over the past 20 years.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGE COMMUNITIES IN NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada should proceed bilaterally with the Government of New Brunswick to enshrine the principles of Bill 88 in the Constitution.

The Government of Canada, the Liberal Party of Canada, the New Democratic Party of Canada, the first ministers of the 10 Canadian provinces and the leaders of the Northwest Territories and Yukon, aboriginal people, the Government of New Brunswick, the Conservative Party of New Brunswick, the New Democratic Party of New Brunswick and the majority of the citizens of my province agree with guaranteeing the equality of my province's two official language communities.

Will the Government of Canada in co-operation with the Government of New Brunswick confirm today that it will enshrine Bill 88, the best Christmas present we could give the Acadians of New Brunswick since 1755?

VIOLENCE

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, five research centres on family violence and violence against women were announced on November 12 and November 13 by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Minister responsible for the Status of Women and several of my colleagues, along with the president of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council.

This innovative network of centres, funded equally by Health and Welfare Canada and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council, will see the creation of new partnerships among front-line workers, community groups and researchers.

The successful centres chosen by an arm's length committee will be based at the University of New Brunswick, the University of Western Ontario, the University of British Columbia, the University of Manitoba and l'Université de Montréal in conjunction with Laval University in Quebec City.

• (1410)

The practical research into the grass-root causes of family violence and violence against women will help all Canadians find the solution to these pervasive and troubling problems in our society.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, each day the economic forecasts of this government are proven wrong. Each day the pace of plant closures quickens, the line of unemployed grows and the despair of ordinary Canadians deepens.

Yet, in the face of a fierce recession, government policies are driven by accountants intent on spending cuts and by politicians relying on the marketplace and the goodwill of corporations. This government forgets that unemployment statistics are about human beings increasingly left out in the cold.

Nowhere is the crisis more desperate than with Canada's youth. For young people who look forward to a productive life, the unemployment line is their prospect; the vicious circle of no experience blocking experience, their reality; welfare, their alternative.

Young people must be offered hope, a fair shot at a decent job. Urgent priority must be given to job creation, to improved education and apprenticeship, to substantial job opportunities for youth.

While 1.5 million Canadians are waiting, we simply do not have one person to waste.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, the airline industry world-wide is facing difficult times. This is also true in Canada.

The employees of Canadian Airlines International have committed between 5 per cent to 9 per cent of their salaries for the next three years in an effort to save their jobs and their company in a competitive industry.

This innovative commitment is remarkable. I encourage cabinet to back the employees of Canadian Airlines International with loan guarantees. Canada needs a competitive airline industry.

I also encourage both Air Canada and Canadian Airlines International to get on with business, build those international partnerships, and continue to serve the travelling Canadian public as well as we know they can.

DEREGULATION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago the Tory Minister of Transport in Manitoba declared that deregulation had made a mess of Canada's airline industry. After years of supporting deregulation he finally made the connection. Not that this new-found awareness stopped one of his colleagues from announcing deregulation in the phone industry on the same day. We would not want to make too many connections in one day.

The most important connection Canadians need to make when it comes to deregulation is the historical connection between deregulation and the Liberal Party of Canada.

Deregulation started under the Liberals, under the then Minister of Transport, now the member for Winnipeg South Centre. Indeed I refer Canadians to Hansard for April 6, 1984 where they can find an argument between the then Minister of Transport and the current Minister of Finance about who got on whose deregulation band wagon first, both claiming the honour of being the champion of deregulation.

Before the transport committee on April 10, 1984, the member for Winnipeg South Centre defended himself by saying that he had 400 letters calling for U.S. style deregulation. I bet he had as many calling on him not to deregulate, but he chose deregulation and now we have the chaos and the airline bankruptcies that he said would never happen.

Like free trade, privatization and a host of other destructive policies, deregulation can be traced to a time when the corporate agenda was being implemented by the Liberals. The only escape from that agenda is through the NDP.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, in the riding of Elk Island as in many other parts of our country, Canadians have expressed concern about criminal activity by young people. The constituents are angry and frustrated that the Young Offenders Act is not working.

S.O. 31

Constituents in my riding want Parliament to toughen up the Young Offenders Act and more preferably replace it with a law that makes young criminals accountable for their actions.

Robert Romanchuk, an insurance man in Bruderheim writes:

> The Young Offenders Act is a joke. In one case a young offender stole a vehicle and scratched in the hood: Young Offenders Act, ha, ha.

Rick and Laura Rumohr of Fort Saskatchewan write:

> We live in fear and this is wrong. People who commit crimes must be punished and there must be stricter penalties.

Doug and Marie Bodeux of Beaumont suggest work camps. James Brandick of Sherwood wants the names of young offenders made public. Many people suggest that parents should be made accountable for the crimes of their children.

Let us work together to strengthen or replace the Young Offenders Act. Let us all work together for safer communities and a better Canada.

CORNWALL, ONTARIO

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, on November 6 the Courtaulds fibres plant in Cornwall announced that it will be closing at the end of this month. The closure will eliminate 360 jobs.

Since June 1989, 20 manufacturing plants have ceased operation in Cornwall. Over 2,500 jobs have been lost and the city's unemployment rate is over 20 per cent. More than half of the eligible UI recipients in Cornwall have exhausted their benefits. The city ranks third in Ontario in terms of percentage of population on general welfare. Thirty-seven per cent of the population, 17,638 men, women and children rely on social assistance.

For two years I have called upon the government to bring forward an economic development program for eastern Ontario. Yet, while the recession continues to take its toll and unemployment climbs, the government has done nothing to stimulate the local economy.

The time has come for this government to act and assist the people of Cornwall and eastern Ontario by immediately implementing an economic development program.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister.

This House adjourned almost five months ago. During the time we were not here all members of Parliament went to their ridings. I visited probably 150 different ridings, and I have never seen the situation so bad in the country. I met with fishermen, farmers, blue collar workers and office workers who are completely desperate, small business people who are 45 to 55 years of age who have lost their businesses, not finding jobs and completely desperate because they see their daughters and sons coming out with higher education who have no hope of finding a job either.

I would like to know from the Prime Minister when this government will take the situation seriously, bring down a budget and tell Canadians that they can have hope in Canada because it is absolutely desperate out there today?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, obviously all of us are preoccupied by the economic situation, both here and elsewhere, because as a trading nation our prosperity depends a great deal on economic strength with our trading partners and that has not been the case for some extended period of time. I share some of the concerns mentioned by my hon. friend.

Some of the encouraging points to register for all of us are that both the OECD and the IMF have recently indicated that Canada will have the strongest rate of economic growth in 1993.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Canadians.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says Canadians. With inflation at 1.3 per cent, this is now the lowest in the industrialized world and that is a very important contributor for economic growth. Real GDP grew at an annual rate of 1.1 per cent in the first quarter and .7 per cent in the second quarter. Employment rose by 64,000 in the last six months. I think that there are beginning to be some important and promising signs of economic renewal.

Where I have to disagree with my hon. friend is where he said that he had never seen the situation so bad in the country. He was a minister in the government in 1981 when interest rates were 22.75, inflation was 12.9 and unemployment was 11.7. That was the worst economic record in the history of Canada.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): It is unbelievable that the Prime Minister sees no problems.

There are 1.6 million Canadians who want some action from this government. He tells us today that we are doing well. We were the first to go into a recession and we will be the last to get out of the recession. He gave us some good news. The Minister of Finance was completely wrong in his analysis of the future economy of Canada. All his predictions have been wrong.

When will we have a budget so that Canadians can have hope again and have the real facts, not dreaming in Technicolor like the Prime Minister?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend says that the Prime Minister said that he sees no problems. Quite the contrary.

• (1420)

I just said moments ago that indeed there are troubling signs that we are all working to correct. There are also encouraging signs that my hon. friend will want to factor very much into his statements.

For example, trade with the United States is increasing. Our productivity gains are substantial, up to 3.5 per cent. Productivity gains are the only way that we can establish real and new genuine wealth. Our unit costs are down, making Canada more competitive. We are having greater access to international trading markets.

These are encouraging signs. They are not a panacea, but they are encouraging signs. We are following an economic program which the IMF and the OECD indicate will structurally reform Canada's economy to make it more competitive, thereby creating more jobs. That is the program we are pursuing, and we would be happy to hear from my hon. friend if he has any specific ideas that we can entertain without—

Mr. Speaker: We are going to have to move on.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we have an idea. Call an election and we will fix it.

[Translation]

The Prime Minister rises in the House and refuses to propose any solutions. He has no solutions to offer at all.

Today there are 1.6 million unemployed in Canada, each costing this government $14,000. We made some suggestions to the government in January, but the government refused to act on them.

Today there are rumours the government may embark on a joint program with the municipalities and the provincial governments. Why did the government not act in January, as we suggested? If it had, we would not have 1.6 million unemployed in Canada, each costing the Canadian Treasury $14,000. We are in this mess because the government does not know what to do and refuses to do anything at all.

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, what the hon. Leader of the Opposition should recognize is that there are 12,240,000 Canadians who are working.

In 1984 there was something like 11 million Canadians working. Yes, indeed unemployment levels are too high, but yes, indeed we have had five consecutive quarters of growth. They are not robust, but they are certainly consistent with the growth in the global economy.

For those who suggest that we do not live in a globally interdependent economy, you better look again. The Canadian economy is weak in many respects because the global economy is weak. Notwithstanding that, we are making progress. We have made progress on inflation, we are making progress on unemployment, we are making progress on retail sales and our exports are achieving an all-time record.

Therefore, there is a turnaround. It is slow but sure. However we are making progress.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the words of the Minister of Finance will be cold comfort to the 1.5 million Canadians who are out of work and to their families who he claims do not even exist.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

In his recent press interview he in effect admitted that he had made mistakes in his government's economic policies and their timing. For the millions of Canadians damaged by these policies, those who are hit by the trade deal, hit by the GST, hit by higher taxes, hit by loss of jobs, this admission of guilt even as part of a plea for mercy simply is not good enough.

I ask the Prime Minister: Why will he not also move away from these policies he now admits are mistakes and bring in a new economic plan, a new budget, today to create more jobs and real growth right now? If not, what is the point of that admission of guilt?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know it will probably offend a Liberal for a politician to admit that he is not always right, but from time to time that is the reality in Canada.

What I acknowledged readily in an interview with the Canadian Press was that I, along with all other leaders of the industrialized world, including all of the leading economists whose work we had the opportunity to examine, had not anticipated with as much accuracy as we would have liked the duration of the economic recession and/or economic downturn, depending on the country. I do not think there is anything wrong with that. No one, not even my hon. friend who offered to resign in 1980 if interest rates went up and they went up 17 points or thereabouts—

An hon. member: And he is still there.

Mr. Mulroney: He hung right in there for the government pension. It never crossed his mind to resign.

An hon. member: That's principle.

Mr. Mulroney: I would point out to the member a statement by the Leader of the Official Opposition who in 1978 when he was finance minister said—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: They do not want to hear it, Mr. Speaker, and I can understand that.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, millions of Canadians and their families who are out of work would like this government to realize that it is in 1992 not 1978.

My supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. This House has barely sat for the past five months even though the economy continues in crisis. When this House last sat briefly I asked the Minister of Finance why, when it came to the economy and the Constitution, his government could not both walk and chew gum at the same time.

We are now back, the House is in session and listening to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, it is clear that when it comes to walking and chewing gum at the same time with regard to the economy, this government cannot even do those things separately.

My question to the Prime Minister is this: Why else are we here now if not to deal with this crisis in the economy? The Liberals are ready to deal with these problems, but they involve measures that only a government can take.

I ask the Prime Minister: Why does he not answer the Leader of the Opposition's question and say when he is going to bring in a new budget to deal with jobs and the economy? What is he stalling for?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not stalling. I certainly take very seriously any reference to unemployment which in Canada is too high and has been too high now for some 10 or 12 years. I think my hon. friend would agree with that, even though we managed to get it down to 7.3 per cent in 1988–89.

My hon. friend objected to a comment that the Leader of the Opposition made in 1978 when he was Minister of Finance. I mentioned it simply because I think it is relevant. The Leader of the Opposition said then: "I don't believe I can be a Santa Claus. I am not a maker of illusions. There is not some magic solution to get rid of unemployment". The Leader of the Opposition was accurate. There is no magic solution to get rid of unemployment. If you get the fundamentals right you have a much better chance of doing that and this is exactly what we are in the process of doing.

My hon. friend concludes his remarks by asking about walking and chewing gum. I urge him: Herb, just take them one at a time and you will learn.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, there is no question that this country is seeing one of the greatest job crises that we have seen in the history of Canada. In the first nine months of this year, 750,000 Canadians went from unemployment insurance to welfare, joining almost three million Canadians who are on either unemployment or welfare.

I want to say to the Prime Minister that the responses from his government seem to be like retired generals fighting the last war: more of the same, stay the course.

Clearly the economic policies of this government have failed and the victims of these failed economic policies continue to grow and suffer every day. What new policies will the Prime Minister bring in now to turn the economy around and get Canadians back working?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I share the hon. member's concern. We recognize that there are some serious difficulties and there are people who are hurting out there. However, I ask her to consider the fact that employment has risen in five of the last six months. Employment is up by 64,000 in the last six months. Full-time employment increased by 83,000 in the months of September and October.

• (1430)

The unemployment rate has come down from 11.6 to 11.3 per cent, so unemployment is going down, not going up.

We have other positive indicators. Housing starts have had a second consecutive quarter increase. Housing resales are up by 38 per cent. Retail trade has had a third consecutive monthly increase. Motor vehicle sales are up by 4.5 per cent. Export trade—

An hon. member: Go for a walk in the real world.

Mr. Mazankowski: The member's party continues to denigrate the free trade agreement with the United States. Trade with the United States has increased by 16 per cent since the free trade agreement was signed. Merchandise export trade has increased by 9.5 per cent in the first six months of this year. That is where the jobs are created. That is from where the long-term prosperity will emerge and that is the policy course that we are going to continue to follow.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister.

The Minister of Finance fails to recognize the pain in this country, the loss of hope by young people who have an unemployment rate of almost 20 per cent. The government owes it to the Canadian people to say what it is prepared to do to turn around this situation rather than simply ignore the plight of so many Canadians.

[Translation]

For instance, one third of the people on unemployment live in Quebec, and 700,000 Quebecers are on welfare. All these people are the victims of Tory economic policies, victims of the failure of those policies. That is why I wish to direct the following question to the Prime Minister. Does he agree with his Minister of Finance when he says that the government has no reason to change its economic policies?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance just stressed a number of important positive elements in the development of Canada's economy. He admitted that unemployment was a major problem. All members of all political parties deplore, and rightly so, the employment rate in this country which is very high, too high, although this is a situation that has endured since the early eighties. However, I think the Leader of the New Democratic Party should be encouraged by the opinions expressed by the IMF and the OECD, two major international agencies which think that the changes introduced by the Canadian government are likely to promote productivity and improve our competitive position, thus creating a substantial number of jobs in this country.

This will not happen overnight, but I think we have every reason to be confident about the future, considering the policies that were and will be announced by the Minister of Finance.

[English]

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

This party is not asking the government to produce miracles. We are just asking it to produce some ideas and to put forward a plan to address the severe job shortages in the country.

We promised Canadians that we would come back to Parliament and it would not be business as usual. We would all turn our attention to the economy. What we have heard from the government today is that it is going to do more of the same. If that is turning its attention to the economy, please do not.

I want to ask the Prime Minister this specifically. We will put aside the rhetoric and get down to the bottom line. The government has an opportunity to save tens of thousands of jobs in the airline industry but it must act within the next few days. Does the government have a plan? Is it going to act and what exactly is it prepared to do?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, of course the members of this government, and all members on the opposition side, are concerned with the potential loss of 16,000 jobs at Canadian Airlines.

Over the past couple of days we have had extensive and very productive meetings with the three groups that are involved, namely the Council of Employees, PWA and AMR, to determine how we can arrive at a plan that would ensure the survival of Canadian Airlines without hurting the whole Canadian airline industry.

In other words we need to find a solution that would be profitable to all the people of Canada and at the same time ensuring that we have a profitable and safe airline industry in Canada.

We were extremely impressed by the commitment of all employees. All unionized employees have come together, accepted some wage concessions and have also agreed to invest their own money in their employer. This is a demonstration of their dedication. We are meeting with them to try to arrive at a viable solution.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, it is a shame that this minister was not so impressed months ago because for months this grossly negligent Minister of Transport has stood idly by and ignored all the warning signs.

Canada's airline industry is now on the verge of collapse and he is finally quoted as saying the clock is ticking on the survival of Canadian Airlines.

Will the minister inform the House now, today, that his government is prepared to join the other partners he so eloquently spoke of in preparing and providing the necessary loan guarantees to Canadian Airlines so that we will not see thousands, and tens of thousands possibly, of people going on to the unemployment rolls in this country.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member for the opposition could explain how far his party is prepared to go with investing taxpayers' money in a plan without making sure about guarantees that the interests of Canadian taxpayers will be protected.

[English]

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, it is much more than that. The minister is still on autopilot on this entire issue. He has refused to act on the federal aid package. He has refused to end the destructive competition that is tearing two airlines apart. He has refused to deal with the restructuring of the airline industry in this country.

What then is the minister prepared to do?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have indicated that we are prepared to work with all the players now that all employees have indicated their intention to help their employer survive.

I put the question again to the hon. member: To what extent, to what amount, is his party prepared to commit the taxpayers' money without any guarantee that this will assure the survival of that carrier in the airline industry?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, even the friends of the government are bailing out over this problem because the government does not have a plan. We realize there has to be major reorganizing and restructuring in order to make the airline industry viable, protect the jobs, and to ensure that the Canadian based reservation system is intact.

We want to ask the minister, not what other people are doing, but what is the government going to put forward as a plan for the reorganizing, restructuring, and saving of this vital industry for Canada?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have said all along that we are prepared to ensure there is a viable Canadian airline industry and that we have competition in this country. It is through these measures that we will ensure the survival of the carrier.

I put my question again to that party: To what extent, to what amount, are they prepared to put the money of the Canadian taxpayer at risk without guarantees on the future survival of that particular airline and the whole Canadian airline industry?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I recognize that the hon. minister is very anxious to ask questions. He will have the opportunity of being on this side of the House soon enough but for now, unfortunately, he has to govern.

In this proposal for the airlines one of the casualties is the Canadian based reservation system that is the underpinning for the entire tourist industry of Canada. We want to know what guarantee will the government provide that in any restructuring, the Gemini system which underlines and underpins the entire reservation computer technology system in this country will be preserved and maintained.

• (1440)

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this is precisely why I have been asking the question. Either the hon. member and his party are suggesting there is government intervention in the judicial system concerning the Gemini question or they are saying we should invest some money, no matter what amount it is, in order to save the airline on a band-aid basis without guarantees for the taxpayers of Canada. We are trying to find a viable, fiscally responsible answer to this question.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, this morning in Montreal the Minister of Transport told the Air Transport Association of Canada: "The marketplace is not a polite place". He went on to say that competition is not enough by itself and regulatory bodies may need to protect the marketplace.

Is the minister and this government now prepared to admit that on the transport side the economic policies of this government have failed miserably and that the only long-term solution to the crisis in the airline industry is strong government intervention, including financial assistance? Or, is this government still prepared to leave those 36,000 employees and their families hanging out to dry in this impolite, yet vicious marketplace?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I dare say that if the hon. member only learned this morning that the marketplace is not a polite place he should have been alive for a longer period. Everybody knows that the marketplace is a very tough place where everybody is trying to outdo the other.

We have indicated that we are working with the employees because of their very enlightened dedication and preparedness to invest their own money. We are working with all the players to arrive at a viable solution that will be fiscally responsible to the taxpayers of Canada and will make sure that it is in the best over-all interest of the nation.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I want to remind the Minister of Transport that it was his government that turned the airline industry over to that marketplace and set it up for the crisis it is in today.

It is not a question of whether or not the government will have to provide some financial assistance. It is a question of how and when. The government has a choice. It can say yes to the requests that are being made by Canadian and perhaps those that will follow by Air Canada or it can put up with the cost to unemployment insurance which will reach approximately $150 million. The choice is the government's.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the fact that we held these very constructive and effective meetings over the weekend with the three interveners is a clear indication that we are interested in looking at what the possibilities are for a viable solution that will be fiscally responsible and also in the interests of the nation.

There are different obstacles in the present proposal. We have discussed them with all concerned and it is only when we have eliminated these very serious problems that we will be in a position to evaluate the risks to the Canadian taxpayers and also whether we can ensure the viability of the industry on a long-term basis. We are not looking for a band-aid that will cost taxpayers money and not be a viable solution.

TRADE

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, President-elect Clinton has stated that he will not seek ratification of the North American free trade agreement until environmental and labour standards are improved.

Is this now also the position of the Canadian government or is it standing by its initial assertion that the agreement is more than adequate as it currently stands?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think what President-elect Clinton has said is that he supports the NAFTA as an agreement. He is also looking for elements outside of the NAFTA to support some positions he is taking in support of the environment, labour, labour adjustment, health and safety standards, things that can be accomplished outside of the NAFTA.

I would expect that the process for legislation will continue. The legislation does not have to be completed until the implementation date of January 1, 1994. We will be proceeding with hearings in the committee tomorrow and the process will continue then. I would not expect that the Canadian legislation will be dealt with until the early part of next year.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Let me understand the government's position, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister recognize that President-elect Clinton has said that he will not proceed with ratification of the NAFTA until there are parallel agreements on labour standards and the environment? Is that the position also of the Canadian government, or does it intend now to proceed with ratification of the agreement whatever the position of the United States is?

Will the minister also recognize that the government has progressed through three different stages in this? It said that the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement was flawless. Then it said that the NAFTA negotiations gave the opportunity to improve the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement. Now it takes a third position, which is presumably that it will not proceed with ratification until such time as the U.S. demand for parallel agreements on labour standards and on the environment are met.

What is its position today?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, our position is completely unchanged. We have a North American free trade agreement and we will seek ratification of that appropriately in the House of Commons just as soon as we possibly can. The minister has just indicated our time frames in regard to that.

President–elect Clinton indicated to me his very strong support of the free trade agreement that we concluded with the United States in 1988 and he confirmed to President Salinas his strong support of the North American free trade agreement as it exists.

He may indeed want to bring about some parallel agreements that do not impact on the principal one, but that has not been conveyed to us. Our information from President–elect Clinton and his officials is that he is very much a free trader along those lines and will be very supportive of initiatives such as the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States and the North American free trade agreement with Canada, the United States and Mexico. We are delighted to have that kind of leadership in the United States to pursue these common objectives.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Prime Minister.

Let me say that given the Prime Minister's earlier statements in the House today about acknowledged economic mistakes of the past, we on this side of the House are, to say the least, surprised to hear the Prime Minister say that this government, in its final months in office will seek—and I think I am quoting the Prime Minister properly—ratification of the NAFTA at the earliest possible opportunity. The Prime Minister said this, notwithstanding the fact that a new U.S. president has said he wants to study this agreement closely, and the U.S. Congress, and that a new U.S. presidential administration has said it will seek agreements on environmental and labour standards.

I want to ask the Prime Minister, given his admission of economic mistakes of the past, will he now not do the prudent thing, will he set aside the ratification process in Canada until such time as we know what the final draft of the NAFTA will look like after consideration by a new U.S. administration and president and by Congress?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Given my hon. friend's reputation for accuracy in this House, I reluctantly point out that he has just inadvertently made a substantially inaccurate statement in regard to any acknowledgement that I made about economic mistakes. He should read the transcript that is there and I am sure he will want to correct what he has just said on the floor of the House of Commons.

I was interested in his second point where he was conveying to the House President–elect Clinton's point of view. This was interesting to hear, because in my conversations with President–elect Clinton he conveyed no such views to me.

• (1450)

An hon. member: Maybe you didn't ask the right questions.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has had most of his conversations with the current U.S. President who is about to become the ex–president. Indeed he will be able to join him fishing in Maine full time very soon.

I want to again put the question to the Prime Minister. The incoming U.S. administration has made clear that it will seek parallel agreements both with respect to environmental standards and labour standards. The current U.S. Congress has made clear it will closely examine NAFTA and may propose amendments to it.

Given that the government's projections on employment were wrong, on GST were wrong, on free trade were wrong, on deficit were wrong, would it not be prudent to wait until the new U.S. administration has examined it and proposed changes and until Congress has examined it before we blindly proceed in this country once again?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition would do well to allow the critic for international trade to ask questions on international trade. Our friend is really out of touch both with reality and with all of the facts in contrast to the official critic, the hon. member from Toronto, who on matters of international trade is always well informed. His questions are direct.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the right hon. Prime Minister would like to move to the answer to the question.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the member for Etobicoke—North for any damage I have done to his career. It was indeed inadvertent and I withdraw those comments. I should say in fairness that he is as inaccurate and ineffective—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we should move on. The hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, far be it from me to interrupt a lover's quarrel when they both support NAFTA and the free trade agreement.

I would like to ask this very simple question. Over the past two years, I have asked the minister to provide to this Chamber and the Canadian public detailed information about the negotiations of the North American free trade agreement. Specifically, I asked for the sector-by-sector studies that should be made and, I assume, were made by this government going into the negotiations. I was told that they would not be made available because it would expose our negotiating hand.

The deal is now initialled. Will the minister now table in this House the sector-by-sector studies that surely must have been done before this trade deal was initialled by this government?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I know it is very hard for the hon. member to talk accurately about the NAFTA because he has never come to briefings that have been offered to him on half a dozen occasions. We quite understand the difficulty he has in understanding the issue.

My hon. friend I am sure is well aware there are NAFTA hearings starting tomorrow. I will be very happy to respond to any specific questions he has on elements of the agreement.

He is also aware that the Department of Finance released a document last week which sets out in very clear terms drawing on work done within the department as well as on work done by respected organizations outside of the government which support the government's position that the NAFTA is a very positive policy initiative supportive of the economy of Canada. I expect that the hon. member will read that agreement and come to the same conclusion.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, it is true that I did not go to the secret briefings because as a member of Parliament I would never sign the Official Secrets Act to find out information that should be made public to every Canadian.

My question is very clear and very precise. If there are any studies at all sector by sector, will the government release them? Not tomorrow, not next week, but will the minister admit in this House now that no sector-by-sector studies were ever done at all by this government? That is why they are not being released.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member has just inadvertently left a very misleading statement on the record which I want to correct for him now.

He referred to all of the meetings being secret when he knows full well that there was a request for the first meeting for such an undertaking on behalf of members who participated. After that there were no requests. That was made known to the hon. member many times, yet he continues to leave this misleading statement on the—

MINING

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Is the Government of Canada prepared to sign a mineral development agreement with the Government of Quebec? If so, will it be signed before December 25, 1992?

[English]

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for the question.

My colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and his counterparts in the province of Quebec worked very hard on this agreement. I am pleased that the agreement is at the point where I believe final plans can be made for its ratification and for its announcement.

MANUFACTURING SECTOR

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. Since the recession began Canadian manufacturing has lost three times as many jobs proportionately as American manufacturing. My question is: Why this crushing gap between us and the United States?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me just point out to my hon. friend that in the first eight months of this year Canadian exports to the United States, which were about 55 per cent manufactured exports, were up 9.8 per cent. That was 9.8 per cent in a period when the U.S. economy was not in a very robust position, but 9.8 per cent because of the advantages that my hon. friend well knows are there from the free trade agreement. That is one of the things that has helped the performance of the manufacturing sector in Canada.

My hon. friend would do well if he looked at other reasons the manufacturing sector is in some difficulty today. It is partly because of the fact that we are going through a period of enormous change which my friend, the Minister of Finance, has been talking about.

The hon. member talks about adjustment. If he would compare adjustment in the United States with adjustment in Canada, he will see that the adjustment programs in Canada for both individuals and industry, including the manufacturing sector are many, many times greater than those in the United States on a per capita basis.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, we are talking about job loss. The fact is the United States is going through adjustment as are we yet we have lost three times as many manufacturing jobs as it has.

The reason is very clear. Despite the two years of tremendous human suffering, this government has pursued a course of action which has done nothing to relieve the pain Canadians feel, nothing to prepare the country for what lies ahead. While we on this side called for economic stimulus, they on that side countered with uncompetitive interest rates. While we called for increased training, increased research and development, they said wait for the prosperity agenda. The prosperity agenda is in. What is the government's excuse for doing nothing? When is the government going to give us a budget? Does it really think that the financial deficit can be solved if the human deficit is ignored?

• (1500)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me be quite clear that the human element of this has not been ignored. It has not been ignored at all because the amount of training that has been brought in by this government to address the problems of the people who have lost their jobs because of the difficulties in the manufacturing sector has increased substantially. It numbers now some $3.5 billion which I believe is greater than the total amount that the United States has for the whole of an economy that is 10 times greater than the Canadian economy.

The simple facts are that the reasons for the difficulties in the manufacturing sector go directly to the fact that manufacturing, unit labour costs, increased something like 50 per cent in comparison to the United States. It is for that reason and not reasons caused by—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

THE LATE RIGHT HON. PAUL MARTIN

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, this is the first sitting of this House since all here paid tribute to my father. I would like to express my gratitude.

[Translation]

My father loved this House so much. He had so much respect for all those who serve and served in this great institution. On behalf of my mother and our family, I want to thank each and every one of you in this big parliamentary family for the moving message of sympathy you extended to us in this trying period.

[English]

There is a small room off the kitchen in my parents' house with a TV set that is permanently frozen on the House of Commons channel. It was there over the last five years that my father used to sit and pass judgment on the debates in this House.

On September 14 my dad was not in that room, but my mother was. On her behalf, indeed on behalf of our whole family, I would like to thank all of the members of this House for their words, for their understanding, and for their compassion.

I said my father was not in that room, but that does not mean he did not hear what was said. I am sure he did. I am also sure that looking down from his new vantage point that had you asked him, Mr. Speaker, he would have given you his full consent to extending the debate.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, very briefly, the right hon. Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs had the occasion on behalf of the government and members of Parliament to extend our deepest sympathies to the Martin family on the occasion of the loss of one of Canada's most distinguished sons.

Paul Martin was indeed a great Liberal. He was a great member of Parliament, an outstanding minister of the Crown, and a most impressive representative of Canada abroad. I came to know him through his son—something the son may or may not acknowledge today—years ago and found in the Martin family one of Canada's finest in every way.

I had the privilege as Prime Minister of Canada to recommend to the Governor General and Her Majesty the Queen the elevation of Paul Martin to the position and to the title of Right Honourable on July 1 past. I had many conversations with Paul Martin Sr. in advance of this important event. I can just say, on behalf of all parliamentarians that no one, certainly in recent Canadian history, deserves this honour more. No one loved this House more and no one contributed more to Canada and her unity than the Right Hon. Paul Martin from, as he would say, Windsor, Ontario.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I also would like to thank the member for his remarks. I have a special memory of Mr. Martin Sr. When I was 15 years old, Mr. Martin was the member of Parliament for the area where I lived and I came to the House of Commons for the first time at that time. I came to the House of Commons for only the second time when I was elected as a member of Parliament. I have many warm memories of his warmth, of his friendship and of his interest in young people.

I want to say that all of the greetings from this party to the Right Hon. Paul Martin were indeed sincerely felt. He was a great man and a great Canadian.

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the Legislative Committee on Bill C-86, an act to amend the Immigration Act and other acts in consequence thereof, with amendments.

[English]

Might I just say that members will know that this is an important bill. The committee received 186 letters and 116 briefs. We listened to 110 witnesses, 48 groups, 35 officials from the department, the RCMP, CSIS, the Department of Justice.

The committee adopted 102 amendments. I say that this reflects the very best of Parliament where all three parties worked hard all summer and that this in fact is good public law.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-365, an act to amend the Canadian Criminal Code.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to prohibit crossbows as we know them. It does not take away from archery or the other types of crossbows which are used for sporting.

• (1510)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Harb moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-366, an act to amend the Criminal Code (replica firearms).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, this again has to do with an amendment to the Criminal Code, replica firearms. The purpose of this bill is to prohibit the sales of replicas of guns that might reasonably be mistaken for real guns in the commission of a crime.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Harb moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-367, an act to amend the Income Tax Act (donors to food banks).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend the Income Tax Act immediately after section 259. The purpose of it is to permit donations of food to a food bank to be treated as a charitable gift, notwithstanding that the value of the food has already been deducted as a business expense of the donor. The objective of it is to encourage people to give more to food banks.

Just for the record I want to thank Mr. Norm Rebin who helped in the evolution of this proposal as well as our legal staff.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Harb moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

BILL C-330

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and duty to present to the House petitions certified correct by the clerk of petitions that contain the signatures of yet another 10,000 Canadians who support Bill C-330.

The petitioners want Canadians to have a greater say in the disposition of offenders in the judicial process and call upon Parliament to support victims' rights and the protection of the public from violent offenders.

There will be tens of thousands of signatures to present to this House before Bill C-330 is presented this Thursday.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of presenting before this House petitions that were circulated as a result of the death of young Rosalynn Dupuis in the Regional Municipality of Sudbury. A young offender has been charged with her death.

The people who have signed these petitions—there are many indeed—ask that the government bring forth changes to the Young Offenders Act in order that those who commit violent crimes be sentenced in a way that would represent the severity of their crimes. The petitioners ask that violent young offenders be psychologically assessed and that psychiatric treatment of these young offenders who have committed murder be mandatory and immediate upon sentencing.

[Translation]

REQUEST FOR ELIMINATION OF VIOLENCE IN OUR SOCIETY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I am tabling a petition from Charles-René-Lalande School in Rivière-Héva, Abitibi. The petitioners say that violent movies on television are dangerous and therefore unacceptable because they incite more violence and that all toys that incite violent games are unacceptable and should not be made.

Information on violent acts that is repeated too often on all television stations and on radio can lead to other acts of violence.

Therefore the petitioners humbly ask Parliament to legislate on the above-mentioned points to eliminate violence in our society and thus better protect our children and give all our fellow citizens a better quality of life.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and pleasure to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 on behalf of a number of constituents from Chase, British Columbia, Kamloops, British Columbia and from a number of other western Canadian cities.

Their concern is having read the NAFTA, the North American free trade agreement, it would appear that fresh water was not made an exemption to the deal. They are asking the government to explicitly say that fresh water is exempt from NAFTA because they are concerned that this government is agreeing to sell water in terms of inter-basin transfers to the United States and Mexico.

As a comfort they are asking the government, for goodness sake, to exempt fresh water from this particular trade deal.

BILL C-91

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition from hundreds of Canadians across the country who ask this government to end Bill C-91 which seeks to licence further no name generic drugs in Canada and will allow brand name drug companies to market their drugs without competition from generics for periods up to 20 years.

They say that the price of new and existing drugs already increased substantially to individuals, to provincial and private drug plans since 1987 when the Liberals brought in Bill C-22 which allowed up to a 10-year period of no generic competition.

Therefore, these petitioners call on Parliament not to proceed with Bill C-91 and to also repeal Bill C-22 so that Canadians will have the full benefit from lower priced generic drugs and so that provincial and private drug plans can serve Canadians without being forced to charge higher fees or provide less coverage.

POVERTY

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased on behalf of a number of Canadians from Alberta, British Columbia, New Brunswick, the rest of Atlantic Canada and Quebec to draw the attention of the House to the fact that hundreds of thousands of Canadian senior citizens live below the poverty line and that over 80 per cent of single women over the age of 65 live in poverty.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the government to ensure that Canadian old age security pensions are sufficient to meet the basic needs of Canadian senior citizens.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege and duty to rise in accordance with Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by 66 of my constituents in the Salmon Cove area, Perry's Cove, Adams Cove, Broad Cove or what is called the north shore of my riding in the Carbonear area.

They have asked that consideration be given to those who are employed outside the fisheries seeking employment. They are bringing to the House notice of the tough economic times in their area and the difficulty they have in finding employment.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to provide them with guidance and in particular with assistance in finding employment.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition that has been signed by a number of Canadians. I think the message is very clear.

They call upon Parliament to reject legislation implementing the North American free trade agreement, NAFTA.

I believe that is a very simple message and I hope all parliamentarians will listen to it.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I too have a significant number of signatures on a petition from my constituents endorsing precisely the same message that my colleague has presented to the House.

That is a very straightforward message which says to this Parliament that it urges us very strongly to reject legislation implementing the North American free trade agreement. The strong view of my constituents is that this agreement will make a bad situation worse. It will hurt jobs in this country. For that reason we are asked to reject any such legislation.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present another petition signed by numerous residents of Ottawa who object to the high gas prices in this area as opposed to the prices in other parts of Ontario, particularly the southern region.

I may say that these citizens are very long suffering because I have been filing petitions like this with the House for months. The same problem with respect to gasoline prices pertains to my own constituency of Kingston and the Islands. Some of my own constituents have been moved to sign similar petitions that I have presented in the past and all we get from the government in response to these petitions are pie in the sky answers that the government does not control prices and it does not intend to do anything to alleviate the suffering of Canadians who are being unfairly treated in the gasoline pricing.

I note the petitioners claim that this kind of pricing is unfair and they call upon Parliament to urge the government to correct this injustice to Ottawa area motorists. I agree with their petition and suggest to the government that it do something instead of filing these pie in the sky announcements in response.

BILL C-86

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty under Standing Order 36 to present a petition from residents of Toronto who petition the House of Commons that, whereas we are concerned with recent amendments to the Immigration Act and Bill C-86, particularly we strongly oppose the restriction and delay that parents will face when seeking to join their sons and daughters in Canada, therefore, the undersigned your petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the government to withdraw these amendments.

I have a second petition also from a number of residents of Toronto concerned with the same bill but with different aspects of it.

They point out that the American government allows inland processing of families of convention refugees and that the current policy of the minister of immigration in Canada in refusing minister's permits to the families of accepted refugee claimants can deprive these immigrants of security of person, physical and mental health because their families are separated for years at a time.

Therefore, the undersigned petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the minister of immigration to issue minister's permits for spouses and dependant children of refugee claimants who have been permitted to apply for landing from within Canada, including persons in the backlog and persons accepted under the new legislation, and allow them to be reunited in Canada for inland processing.

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, finally, I have a petition from a number of residents of metro Toronto who are concerned with the continuing policy of Canada in using the land of the Innu people in Labrador and eastern Quebec for NATO low-level flight training.

They ask that Parliament join with the Assembly of First Nations, the Innu of Labrador and other aboriginal peoples of northern Canada in opposing use of their land for NATO and NORAD attack training and that the Canadian government end all NATO and NORAD low-level flight training in Canada and redirect Canada's NATO and NORAD funding toward enabling Canada's aboriginal peoples to regain control of their lands and their livelihood and promoting sustainable development for all Canadians.

BILL C-91

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to present a duly certified petition on behalf of my constituents in Saskatoon—Dundurn. They ask the government through Parliament not to proceed with the passage of Bill C-91 and to repeal Bill C-22. They would like that to occur so that Canadians will have the full benefit of lower priced generic drugs.

An hon. member: Who passed Bill C-22?

Mr. Fisher: The Conservatives did. Then the provincial and private drug plans would not be unduly hit with the higher prices of drugs.

In asking for this they point out that Bill C-22 raised the period of protection from seven years to ten years. While the government promised that the prices would not increase, that was not the case. Experience has shown that the cost of drugs has escalated tremendously to the great detriment of all concerned.

Going from 10 to 20 years is not going to do the Canadian economy, and certainly not the people of this country, any good whatsoever.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by a large number of people from Surrey which points out that family class and assisted relatives have always been an historically important part of immigration into Canada because they have relatives that can assist them with employment, housing and learning Canadian language and customs.

The petitioners point out that the present proposals of this government would severely restrict family class and assisted relatives from obtaining immigration visas. They ask the government to change their priorities so that family class and assisted relatives are assured first priority in immigration into Canada.

BILL C-91

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to bring before this House a petition signed by a number of Canadian citizens who are extremely angry that Bill C-22 should have been introduced in the first place. This bill erodes the Canadian institution of compulsory licensing which provided inexpensive drugs. We are now confronted with Bill C-91.

In short, the petitioners ask that Bill C-91 be withdrawn and Bill C-22 be revoked.

It is a pleasure to submit this petition because my party and I support that view.

CANADA POST

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from my riding at Raymore which points out that post offices are the backbone of many rural communities.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to support Canada's rural way of life by supporting the maintenance of rural post offices and postal services and to reject the Conservative agenda of cutbacks and closures of those services.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of petitions here, one which is from many people in my riding of Simcoe Centre. These petitioners request that Parliament revise the laws of Canada to replace the Young Offenders Act with an updated juvenile delinquents act with a lowered maximum age of 13 years.

PROUD TO BE CANADIAN

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, the second petition indicates that it is appropriate to encourage all Canadians to take pride in a united, strong and independent Canada. Canadians are normally a reserved people, often concealing their patriotic feelings. Kinsmen and Kinette Clubs of Canada have created an opportunity for all Canadians to participate in the Proud to be Canadian project during the celebration of the 125th anniversary of Confederation in 1992.

Therefore the undersigned hereby support the Proud to be Canadian project as an opportunity to nurture a positive life-long relationship with our heritage and our flag, to encourage stronger ties among all Canadians for the further advancement of Canada as a leader in world circles, and to promote our tremendous pride in being Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): According to the rule, the time provided for presenting petitions has now expired.

Question No. 348—Mr. Young (Acadie—Bathurst):

Since 1985 to the present, with respect to the Department of Supply and Services (a) how many contracts through the department in excess of $100,000 have been awarded as sole source (b) how many contracts in total were awarded from the department and what was the total dollar value per year?

Hon. Paul Wyatt Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): (a) With respect to contracts in excess of $100,000 which have been sole sourced, 18,238 contracts were awarded through Supply and Services Canada (SSC) since 1985.

The award of a contract on a sole source basis is permitted only where the following conditions are met: (1) in the absence of bids in response to a competitive bid sollicitation; (2)* when, for works of art or for reasons connected with protection of exclusive rights, such as patents or copyrights; (3) insofar as is strictly necessary when, for reasons of extreme urgency brought about by unforeseeable events; (4)* for additional deliveries by the original supplier; and (5) the procurement of prototypes or a first product which are developed in the course of, and for, a particular contract for research, experiment, study or original development.

* For each GATT and free trade procurement meeting single tendering conditions (2) or (4), an advance contract award notice (ACAN) must be prepared by the appropriate directorate.

Any determination that these conditions have been met must be fully substantiated at the procurement planning stage. The substantiation is required for contract approval purposes and must be explained in or attached to the approval document.

(b) The following lists the total number and dollar value of contracts awarded:

Fiscal Year	Number of Contracts	Dollar Value ($M)
1985/86	311,847	6,706
1986/87	294,669	8,751
1987/88	287,647	10,351
1988/89	283,754	7,429
1989/90	287,099	8,495
1990/91	243,261	8,699
1991/92	188,136	9,787
1992/93 (in progress)	27,569	1,296

Question No. 363—Mr. Pickard:

With respect to the undertaking of certain functions by Canada Post Corporation from Revenue Canada Customs on July 1, 1992 in relation to postal imports (a) what is the amount of compensation to be received by Canada Post (b) how much revenue does Canada Post estimate to generate on an annual basis?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): (a) The government has asked Canada Post Corporation to take over some of the data entry, material handling and revenue collection functions associated with the clearance and collection of duties and taxes on postal imports. Canada Post Corporation's agreement with Revenue Canada Customs and Excise for the provision of these services is similar to agreements that Canada Post Corporation has with other customers. A handling fee of $5 for each parcel subject to duty or taxes or both was introduced on the importer to cover some of the costs incurred by Canada Post in providing these services. This cost recovery fee is similar to that charged by other countries.

(b) Revenue projections are commercially sensitive information and cannot be disclosed.

Question No. 370—Mrs. Gaffney:

What are the amounts received through procurement contracts by the Department of Supply and Services (a) for the fiscal years 1984–85 to 1988–89 for each of the following ridings: Lanark—Carleton, Nepean, Ottawa West, Ottawa Centre, Ottawa South, Carleton—Gloucester, Ottawa—Vanier (b) for the fiscal years 1989–90 to 1991–92 for the riding of Lanark—Carleton?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): The statistics in this report do not cover all goods and services purchased by the Government of Canada. Supply and Services Canada (SSC) procures only 55 per cent of the total goods and services bought by the federal government.

SSC neither awards contracts nor maintains contracting statistics on the basis of electoral or other boundaries. To produce the following listing by constituency SSC sorted its procurement data base by postal code.

The statistics do not necessarily reflect the origin of the goods and services purchased. More often, a contract is listed in the area where the contractor is located and does not reflect any subcontract work or other services carried out elsewhere. For example, fuel purchases from Esso are part of a total of $249,678,000 in government purchase from Esso Petroleum Canada through its office in Nepean, Ontario, but the fuel is not refined in Nepean and the oil does not come from Ontario. Nepean is a point of billing only.

Finally, many contracts are multi-year in nature and are accounted for only in the year of award (i.e. major crown projects such as large shipbuilding contracts).

Question No. 392—Mr. Bosley:

What was the cost of the CBC-NFB production "The Valour and the Horror"?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): "The Valour and the Horror" is an independent production produced by Galafilm Inc. in co-production with CBC English Television and the National Film Board of Canada through the Co-Production Program, in association with la Société Radio-Canada and with the participation of Telefilm Canada.

The National Film Board provided $200,000 directly to Galafilm Inc., spent $55,000 on editing and provided post-production and other services in the amount of $474,641.

With regard to the CBC's portion of the cost of the three-part series, it has not been customary to require the CBC to provide such details of its internal management and administration. The background to this custom is explained in detail in the reply to question No. 2530 asked by Mr. Cossitt May 22, 1975 and printed on November 6, 1975:

Question No. 2530—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 2,295 which stated in part: "it has not been customary to require the CBC to supply such details of its internal management and administration" (a) on what date and by whom was such a policy arrived at (b) what are all the reasons justifying such a decision (c) will the government agree to a change in this policy by making available to Parliament answers to all requests for legitimate information concerning CBC and its operations and (i) if so, on what date (ii) if not, for what reason?

Hon. J. Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State of Canada): In reply to parts (a) and (b) I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: (a) and (b) Parliament has not as a matter of custom since the corporation's creation in 1936 required CBC to supply in answering Parliamentary questions certain details of its internal management and administration. Parliament has had two reasons for following this custom: first, the independence of the CBC as a Crown corporation established for the purpose of producing and broadcasting independently of political or commercial interference programs for a national program service; and, second, the competitive nature of many of CBC's activities. The appropriateness of the CBC providing certain categories of information has been considered on many occasions by various parliamentary committees and when the CBC has suggested that such information should not be made a matter of public record its views have been accepted by them. Names of staff members and their functions in relation to specific programs and the costs related to such assignments as requested in Question No. 2295 are examples of details which it has not been customary to require the CBC to supply. It is open to Parliament to discuss the policies it and the CBC have followed in this regard and it would be appropriate to review them when the CBC's estimates are before the House of Commons Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

(c) No. The government makes available all information requested by members except where publication would be inconsistent with the mandate given to the corporation by Parliament. This principle is well established and accepted with respect to information about government agencies and Crown corporations which are in competition with the private sector.

Question No. 394—Mr. Angus:

Did the Government of Canada institute restrictions on the hours of work of interprovincial truck operators and, if so, for each of the five years prior their implementation and for each year since their implementation (a) how many truck accidents occurred (b) how many trucks, for how many hours, operated with a crew of one driver (c) how many trucks, for how many hours, operated with a crew of two drivers (d) what is the accident ratio for single driver operated trucks versus trucks operated by a double crew (e) what is the average annual income of truck drivers?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Transport Canada instituted new federal hours of service regulations effective July 1, 1989. Enforcement of these regulations which is the responsibility of each province commenced with the implementation of complementary provincial hours of service regulations governing intra-provincial carriers. The majority of provinces commenced enforcement in 1990.

(a) The number of trucks involved in fatality producing, injury producing or property damage only collisions is as follows: 1986—26,645; 1987—27,130; 1988—30,225; 1989—33,064; 1990—31,364. This data excludes figures for Quebec and Alberta which are incomplete at the moment. The 1991 statistics have not yet been compiled.

(b), (c) and (d) There is no data available on these issues.

(e) From Statistics Canada publication on the for hire trucking survey, the following is the reported national average annual income for drivers including supervisors and helpers: 1986—$28,390; 1987 -$28,348; 1988—$30,489; 1989—$32,099. Data has not been published for 1990.

Question No. 397—Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing):

Did any member of the Canadian Armed Forces participate in the raid on Dieppe on August 19, 1942 and, if so, what are the names, ranks and regiments of those who received the France-German Star for participating in the Raid on Dieppe and what reason was given for awarding them the medal?

Hon. Gerald Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Yes, however the France-German Star is granted for entry into operational service on land from June 6, 1944 in France, Belgium, Holland or Germany until May 8, 1945, the date of the end of active hostilities in Europe.

Also, airborne troops of the army who have taken part in airborne operations in a qualifying army area for land operations between June 6, 1944 and May 8, 1945 will qualify.

Question No. 399—Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni):

With respect to the government, its bodies and agencies and the company First Satellite Communications (a) what is the total value of contracts since January 1, 1990 (b) what were the dates of these contracts (c) which departments or agencies were involved (d) what was the value of each (e) what was the subject matter of the contract?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): With respect to the government and the company First Satellite Communications (a) $20,181.75; (b) April 1, 1991; (c) Indian and Northern Affairs Canada; (d) $20,181.75; (e) communications support services.

Mr. Edwards: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am in receipt of a notice of motion under Standing Order 52(1) from the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, earlier today I wrote to you and asked that you accept the letter I gave you as notice of my intention to rise under the provisions of Standing Order 52 and seek the adjournment of the House to debate an urgent issue of national importance.

Very briefly, for some period Canada's airline industry has had serious financial problems. These problems have now reached critical proportions. In fairness, all airlines service communities from coast to coast to coast. It is a very important national situation. In fact, one of the carriers may be forced to apply for bankruptcy within days, so timing is extremely important.

The Government of Canada is currently examining options for assisting one of the carriers and must make its decision within hours, if not a day or so.

I conclude by saying Parliament has a responsibility and should have the opportunity to assist the government in its decision-making process by having a full and open debate on this issue before the decision is made.

While there will be supply days before our Christmas adjournment, it is extremely unlikely that one will be scheduled before the government responds. Nor will Question Period provide the House with sufficient opportunity to properly explore the options available to Canadians.

It is for this reason that I submit that a debate is urgently required.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member has raised a very important matter, but unfortunately in view of the conditions and constraints of Standing Order 52 I cannot entertain the request of the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan at this time.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAYS

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81(8)(b) the total number of allotted days in the supply period ending December 10, 1992 will be reduced by three days. Consequently the total number of allotted days in the supply period, which was fixed at six on Wednesday, September 18, 1992 pursuant to Standing Order 81(8)(c), is now fixed at three.

PATENT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Thursday, September 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Blais that Bill C-91, an act to amend the Patent Act, to amend another act in consequence thereof and to provide for related matters, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to participate in this debate on Bill C-91, an act to amend the Patent Act.

Members of the House will recall that in January of this past year the government announced its decision to remove compulsory licensing of patented pharmaceutical products. Today, in continuing second reading of Bill C-91, we are carrying through on that announcement.

We are doing that for three fundamental reasons. First, the policy is good for Canada and for Canadians; second, it will end the uncertainty that has risen in the industry over the issue of compulsory licensing; and third, it will end the international isolation in which Canada has found itself on this issue and bring Canadian practice more in line with other industrialized countries.

Let me address each of these three motivating factors. First, there is no question that the changes embodied in Bill C-91 are good for Canada.

Above all else, improvements to patent protection will attract hundreds of millions of dollars in new investment to Canada.

Since January, when we first announced the government's intention to end compulsory licensing, pharmaceutical companies have announced that they will invest over $500 million over the next five years. These large scale new investments were motivated by the expectation of improved patent protection. However, they are conditional on this form of protection being provided. Without it Canada will not be able to compete in the pharmaceutical industry and these investments will move to other more inviting parts of the world.

This is no trivial matter. Over $500 million in new investments means quality jobs for Canadian researchers and medical personnel. We are talking about the full range of industrial activities: provision of plant and equipment, research and development carried out in-house as well as in hospitals, research institutes, universities and private sector laboratories. These investments include international R and D and manufacturing mandates.

These investments are not just in central Canada. In fact, $90 million of these investments that are being announced are for projects outside of central Canada.

[Translation]

This is just the kind of sector that Canada should invest in, a sector driven by innovation, a sector devoted to the creation of high value added products, a sector that supports high quality employment. Altogether, the pharmaceutical industry employs more than 22,000 people in brand name, generic drug and fine chemical companies. Bill C-91 will create an environment in which all sectors of the industry can grow.

[English]

All of this is good news for Canadian research and manufacturing. But there is also good news for Canadians in general.

Bill C-91 will position Canada to participate and become an important player in the search for new medicines and new cures.

At the same time, the bill embodies provisions that will keep drug prices reasonable. The Patented Medicines Prices Review Board is to be strengthened with new powers that will ensure that it is even more effective in the future than it has been in the past.

The board was created in 1987 as part of this government's commitment to keep drug costs reasonable. Since then, the board has acquitted itself admirably. From January 1987 to December 1991 the prices of existing patented drug products increased at an average rate of less than 3 per cent a year, 2.9 per cent. This was well below the rise in the Consumer Price Index.

[Translation]

A recent U.S. study found that medicines in Canada are much lower priced than in the U.S., 32 per cent lower in fact. This study has identified our Patented Medicine Prices Review Board as a key factor in achieving this.

[English]

I said at the outset that the policy means increased research and development and manufacturing, coupled with strict controls of price increases. This is good for Canada and good for Canadians. Let me turn to the second fundamental reason that we have initiated this bill.

It is time to end the uncertainty with Canada's patent protection for pharmaceutical products. The government announced its intention to end compulsory licensing in January 1992 in the expectation that the GATT process would be concluded shortly. Although I remain hopeful a deal will be reached in the very near future, negotiations have not yet been concluded.

Canada, however, cannot afford to wait any longer. Since the government announced its intention to end compulsory licensing a flood of new investment commitments have been announced. We have a responsibility to create the environment in which these investment commitments can be realized. With each passing day uncertainty in the sector grows and investment commitments may not materialize for Canadians.

[Translation]

Since the Dunkel text became public last year, the generic industry has flooded the system with over 250 new applications for compulsory licenses, compared to just 57 in all of last year.

All compulsory licences issued since December 20 when the Dunkel report was tabled have been accompanied by a written stipulation that the license may be revoked if the government went ahead with the change in policy. These licences will be declared null and void once this bill is through, but in the meantime all parts of the industry are waiting in an uncertain business climate.

[English]

It is our responsibility to ensure an orderly marketplace. We cannot maintain an environment of uncertainty that makes it impossible for companies to plan for the future. It is imperative for the sake of all parties that this issue be resolved immediately.

Finally let me speak on the third reason. Bill C–91 will end Canada's international isolation on this issue. Canada is the only industrialized member of the GATT that still maintains a system of compulsory licensing for pharmaceutical products.

During the negotiations leading up to the tabling of the Dunkel report on December 20, 1991 Canada was isolated among industrialized countries on this issue. Frankly Canada can no longer hope to attract international investment in the pharmaceutical industry while maintaining compulsory licensing.

The pharmaceutical industry is in the process of restructuring on a global scale. Patent protections for innovations is a critical factor in choosing a location for investments. If we are not competitive with our patent protection Canada will lose these new investments and manufacturing mandates to other countries.

Since the January announcement the innovative sector of the industry has announced new investments totalling over $500 million. Nordic Merrill Dow has pledged $40 million in new R and D over the next five years. Glaxo announced a new manufacturing facility worth $70 million and Ayerst pledged $60 million for a new plant in Brandon, Manitoba. These are just three examples, and there are many more.

These are the reasons the government is moving forward with this policy. It is good for Canada. We can no longer afford to be out of line with international development.

To better appreciate why we have come to these conclusions we must look back over the past few years. Bill C–91 is the completion of a process that this government initiated in 1987 when it moved from a period of no market exclusivity at all for pharmaceutical products to a guaranteed period of market exclusivity of 7 to 10 years.

This House will well remember that piece of legislation, Bill C–22, which reinstated patent protection for pharmaceuticals in 1987. That step represented a compromise that we believed would be enough to secure R and D investment and export mandates in Canada while protecting the public against abusive price increases. The government was subjected to a fire–storm of criticism about the effects of Bill C–22. Critics predicted doom on a number of fronts.

The critics were wrong, very wrong. I will take the House through three key predictions of doom from that time and show how Bill C–22 was sound legislation that was good for Canada.

In 1987 the innovative sector of the industry committed itself to doubling its spending on research and development as a percentage of sales from 5 per cent to 10 per cent by 1996. It has more than lived up to that promise. In fact, the innovative industry virtually achieved that target five years ahead of schedule by spending 9.6 per cent of sales on R and D in 1991. The innovative industry spent an estimated $1.1 billion from 1987 to 1991.

During this time annual spending on research and development rose from approximately $100 million in 1987 to $376 million in 1991.

Further, the innovative pharmaceutical industry has become the leading medical research and development funder in Canada. Since 1987, the industry has invested a total of $320 million in Canadian hospitals and universities for medical research and development.

The industry now ranks in the top five in total R and D spending in Canada. This certainly was not the case before Bill C–22. It was this government, through that bill in 1987, that created the environment that produced this tremendous activity in increased research and development. Make no mistake about it, that was a critical factor in those decisions.

There are also many other positive aspects of the record of Bill C–22 in economic terms. The industry said in 1987 that it would create jobs if we passed Bill C–22, and it has done exactly that. Employment in the innovative industry has grown substantially to about 18,000 currently, an increase of roughly 2,400 new relatively high paying jobs.

We have proven the critics of 1987 wrong on the question of research and development, and we have proven them equally wrong on all other counts.

Critics predicted the total collapse of the generic pharmaceutical industry in 1987 if Bill C–22 was passed. We passed Bill C–22 and sales of the generic industry have not dropped. They have grown by roughly 190 per cent since 1987. In fact, sales of the generic industry have grown at more than twice the annual rate of growth of the over–all pharmaceutical industry since that time.

The point is that the generic industry did not disappear with Bill C–22. It has done very well and it will continue to do so under Bill C–91.

That brings me to the third major doomsday prediction of 1987 concerning Bill C–22, which shows just how far we have proven the critics wrong.

That concerns the prices of patented drugs. Critics predicted that Bill C–22 would cause dramatic increases in the prices of patented drugs. That did not happen. Price increases have been kept well below changes in the Consumer Price Index.

Over the past five years patented drug prices in Canada have risen by 2.9 per cent a year, less than the 4.4 per cent increase in the Consumer Price Index.

The Patented Medicines Prices Review Board that we created with Bill C–22 has worked, and it will continue to work with the increased powers that this bill will give to that board.

The critics of 1986–87 were wrong. Bill C–22 was good for Canada and it is legislation of which we are proud.

The 1987 legislation, however, is no longer sufficient to cope with dramatic changes in this fast–paced industry. There is a new dynamic in pharmaceutical development that requires a new policy framework. Other countries have responded by strengthening their patent protection for medicines. If Canada is to remain competitive it must also provide a climate in which high quality and high paying jobs can be created.

The Liberals and the New Democrats say they want high quality and high paying jobs and more research and development, but they then oppose the key legislation that will help bring that about. They cannot have it both ways.

[Translation]

The policy of this government is to improve the climate for the intellectual achievements of those who have invested in the expensive and high risk research essential for innovation in the pharmaceutical sector. At the same time this governement is firmly committed to preventing any abuses in drug pricing. The enhanced powers of the Patented Medicines Prices Review Board will ensure that prices of both new and existing drugs are kept within reasonable limits.

[English]

By pursuing a policy based on balancing these two objectives the government will encourage investment, research and development, job creation, and the search for new cures while at the same time protecting consumers.

Bill C–91 is designed to achieve the best of both. That is why I think it is very important for industry in Canada to see this bill approved by this House.

As you are very well aware, Mr. Speaker, we have seen the release of the action plan of the prosperity initiative which calls for precisely what this bill is designed to do: the creation of more research and development, the creation of new investment, and the creation of foreign trade opportunities. By bringing these all together through an improvement in the protection for patent legislation it provides the environment whereby these companies are able to achieve the objectives that were set out in the action plan so that when we hear what people are looking for in the country today, an increase in research and development, in investment, and international trade opportunities, it is precisely this type of bill that will create the environment to achieve these objectives.

I call on all members of the House to support this bill in order to support the objectives that Canadians have set out for us through the prosperity initiative.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have three questions for the minister arising out of his speech. I am not surprised he defended this policy. I think it was he who announced it back in January.

My first question is: Why he would announce this policy during the course of the GATT negotiations? If Canada is the only major industrial partner in GATT that has not agreed to this policy, it might have been used as a bargaining chip to help bring those talks to a successful conclusion, a conclusion that might have been helpful for Canadians in other walks of life instead of throwing it away as the government did previously with Bill C-22 in the course of the free trade talks with the United States. When it might have been used as a bargaining chip it threw it away then and it is throwing it away a second time. I ask him as minister responsible for international trade to answer for that which is in my view a serious error, the throwing away of this bargaining chip earlier this year. I ask him to explain why that was done.

Second, why as a term or condition of this bill would he not require that drug companies reinvest part of their profits, a specified portion of their profits, in R and D in Canada? Why would he not require as a term of the legislation that that research and development be in the development of new drugs in Canada instead of spending the money on marketing?

Third, how can he say that prices have increased only by less than 3 per cent in accordance with the figures provided by this board that the government set up under Bill C-22 when the province of Ontario drug plan reports a 13.2 per cent increase in drug prices, when Green Shield health insurance company reports an 11.4 per cent increase in drug prices, and when the Manitoba health insurance plan reports a 12.3 per cent increase in drug prices, and when Health and Welfare Canada in its own report on health expenditures reports that "expenditures on drugs exhibited the highest level of growth among categories of health care expenditures increasing by 14.3 per cent from 1989 to 1990"? In the face of those figures, how can he put any trust whatever in the report of the drug prices review board?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre)): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has put three questions and I appreciate that he has done so because it gives me an opportunity to answer what clearly he is hearing from some of his colleagues in his own caucus.

Was this a reasonable bargaining chip? I think that is the basic question one has to ask rather than putting the question the way my hon. friend has done. The answer is that it was not going to be a reasonable bargaining chip since we were the odd man out. We were the only country that maintained this compulsory licensing regime.

If we had continued that we would have been the losers, not the other countries. We would have been the losers because we would not have had the new research and development mandates or the new investment and manufacturing mandates. And it is because we were in a period, and still are in a period of significant change in the global pharmaceutical industry that there is going to be rationalization which puts Canada in a position where we must compete for this investment. We could have said no, that we keep the compulsory licensing in place but we would have lost that new investment. We would have lost the $500 million of new investment that has already been announced, as well as new investment that is still to come once this legislation is passed.

That is the reason it could not be used as a bargaining chip, because we would have been the losers if people had called us and said that is not a realistic bargaining chip.

I can see my hon. friend does not understand some of the basic principles of investment and the global economy Canada is living in today. It is one of the tragedies of debate in this House that members opposite do not understand that things have changed in the 1990s; they have changed from the 1950s and 1960s and 1970s because of the nature of the economic interrelationships we have today. We are not an island unto ourselves. We have to compete and if we do not compete we are the losers, not the other countries.

My hon. friend asks why we should not require reinvestment of the moneys into research and development. We have seen over the past five years how the revenues generated have been reinvested by the increase from 5 per cent to close to 10 per cent of the sales in research and development. This is happening. It is the normal response of a company if it is working in a competitive environment, a favourable environment for its investments in research and development, that it will continue to invest. But if, like the Liberal Party policies of the past, things are required which say that you must do this or you must do that, then the people who are investing the money will say that well, if we are going to be forced to do this this year, what are they going to force us to do next year and what are they going to force us to do the year after?

If we had taken that step we would have been sending out negative messages and we would not have generated the $500 million of investment opportunities. We would have not generated the high paying jobs and the good research and development in the companies as well as in the universities and the hospitals across Canada.

Finally, my hon. friend compares the 2.9 per cent with some of these other figures from the Ontario government's green plan and others. As my hon. colleague, who is very familiar with this business because of his professional background, says, these are apples and oranges. That is absolutely right. Because the 2.9 per cent measures the increase in the cost of the patented medicines that are brought on to the market. What these other measurements refer to are other things, including the amount of usage of drugs. The types of drugs that people are using today are different from what they were in 1987 or 1989. You cannot compare the 2.9 per cent with these other figures. That has been made abundantly clear by people who have reviewed both the conclusions.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): I must say that the minister talks about how marvellously the government understands the current economic situation in this world. That is why in eight years it has taken this country almost to the point of bankruptcy and the most difficult economic situation we have ever faced.

I want to ask the minister three basic questions. First, the government keeps denying that this is part of the free trade agreement, and yet when it passed Bill C-21, William Merkin, who was the deputy chief trade negotiator for the United States, made it very clear—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Time is running out and I ask the hon. member to ask one question, please.

Mr. Karpoff: I will ask him one question. I will get a chance to ask him many more. The government's own prices review board said that 40 per cent of all new drugs coming on the market were above its own guidelines. British Columbia made a study which showed in detail that existing drugs rose 6.4 per cent between 1988 and 1991, not the 3.2 per cent that he talks about, and that the average ingredient cost in pharmacare went up 133 per cent. The cost of actual dispensing went down 47 per cent. The actual moneys going to the pharmaceutical companies went up 133 per cent during that period of time.

• (1600)

How can the minister keep saying this when the government's own prices review board says it could not even control the costs of new drugs coming on and it has been documented that existing drugs went up much faster than he is claiming and that details show a 133 per cent increase?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will not rise to the bait in the preamble of my friend's question. We will have another opportunity to debate that.

Let me just respond specifically to the point he has made on initial pricing. Yes, my hon. friend is correct. The PMPRB did point out that the initial prices were initially offside. That was because when the initial price in Canada was compared with the international bench-marks we did not know what that international bench-mark was until some time past the establishment of the initial price. However, once the companies found out what that bench-mark was, they did reduce their prices to bring them into line with the existing international bench-mark that they had to meet.

What Bill C-91 does do in strengthening the role of the prices review board is it provides for a roll back to the initial date of the initial price or the introduction on the market so that there cannot be the windfall profits my hon. friend has referred to.

Rather than asking the question in a critical way, what he should be saying as I referred to in my speech is that this bill improves and strengthens the prices review board in a way that meets the concerns he has just expressed.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–91 is a very dangerous piece of legislation with respect to Canada's health care system.

The basic premise for the last 20 minutes or so from the minister of trade and industry and the former Minister of Finance was basically that this is a good policy for Canada: "Trust us, Canadians. This is good". This is the same minister who said that the FTA was good for Canada, that NAFTA was good for Canada, that the GST is good for Canada, that the 33 new taxes since 1984 are good for Canada and Canadians and that this eight–year record of this trickle–down economic theory which has placed literally millions of Canadians in the unemployment lines was also good.

Quite frankly Canadians did not believe him then and they will not believe him now that this piece of legislation by any stretch of the imagination is going to be good for Canadians or for Canada.

Let us put this bill into some historical context. Compulsory licensing was born in this country in the late sixties when the then Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, introduced compulsory licensing for two reasons. The first was to diversify the industry, competition, something that I thought was part of the Conservative credo: diversification, competition in the marketplace. The second reason was to try to moderate and lower the price of prescription drugs, so it allowed the generic firms to replicate the brand name drugs in return for royalties paid to the brand name companies.

In 1987, along comes this government and through Bill C–22, and it basically eliminates the royalties and replaces them with seven–year effective protection for brand name companies. That means that the generics would not be able to duplicate those drugs until that seven–year period ended.

The government comes along in 1992 and through Bill C–91, rather than seven years, effectively adds another three years. When the process by which a company must obtain the permission of the government to introduce that drug in the marketplace is added there is a 20–year patent protection for brand name drugs.

That 20–year protection will kill the generic companies and it is also retroactive to last December. Can we imagine the gall of these government members opposite, not just having introduced and passed legislation but saying that it takes effect last December? This will kill that generic industry because after a 20–year monopoly the duplication of drugs will always be surpassed by new technologies and new drugs to administer to Canadians' needs.

That must be put into perspective. I am going to present four reasons why this bill must be stopped. The first one is that we cannot afford increased health care costs through increased prescription drug prices for Canadians in this day and age. Overwhelmingly, Canadians want accessible and affordable health care.

The elimination of compulsory drug licensing means increased prices for prescription drugs. They will be higher, and in fact they will be unchecked. As the hon. member from Kingston mentioned a few minutes ago, since Bill C–22 we have seen the increases in those costs. In my province of Ontario there has been a 13.2 per cent increase in the drug plan. In Manitoba the increase has been 12.2 per cent and for the Green Shield health insurance company the increase has been 11.4 per cent.

This is a recipe for increased prices. The Green Shield health insurance company, a large third party health insurer, had this to say in its report:

> The average cost of a prescription claim has risen at a rate in excess of 11 per cent compounded annually, for the period of 1987 through 1991—

It goes on to say that:

> —it will result in continued high levels of increases in drug costs, bearing in mind the high costs being experienced with new drugs as they are introduced to the marketplace.

Then there is the regulatory board that was set up after Bill C–22 to monitor and control the price of drugs. It has proved to be completely ineffective. In fact brand name companies are ignoring the guidelines of the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board. There is a 30 to 40 per cent non–compliance rate.

The chairman of that board, Dr. Eastman, said in his report:

> The high number of prices out of compliance suggests either that some patentees following a strategy of setting high introductory prices so as to benefit from a temporary gain or that they resist the board's guidelines, especially those limiting the prices of new drugs that bring moderate, little or no therapeutic improvements to the range of drug products already existing in Canada.

That is from the chair of that board that was established after Bill C–22.

It is no different in the United States. I was watching CNN the other day and there was a report on an organization called Families U.S.A., which had a press conference to outline, among other things, that the top 20 prescription brand name drugs in the United States have gone up in price over 70 per cent in the last six years. This government wishes essentially to emulate the same system that exists in the United States.

• (1610)

Even the government's own study provided to the consumer and corporate affairs minister recently said that longer patent periods:

> —will increase the length of time before generic competition can occur. Therefore consumers will have to pay more for drugs over time.

That was a study provided by the government's own department.

The evidence is clear. Vote for Bill C–91 and that is a recipe and a prognosis for higher prescription drug costs. Canadians do not want any part of that.

Second, the minister always says that we must provide Canadian entrepreneurs with a stimulus to develop and compete not only domestically but internationally. What does Bill C–91 do for the Canadian generic industry?

The generic industry is wholly Canadian owned and grown. Brand name manufacturers are largely offshore multinational corporations. The generic industry employs almost 3,000 Canadians across this country. It has been able, through the drug licensing system, to capture almost 10 per cent of the marketplace in Canada. It had sales last year of over $430 million. All those jobs, all those profits, all those taxes, and all the research and development that takes place in the generic industry happens in this country. Profits are not flowing south. There are no tax write–offs. There is not the stimulus to send jobs south. It all happens in Canada.

Therefore Bill C–91, which would kill that generic industry, would remove the window that this system has provided for Canadian companies like Apotex Incorporated in Toronto and Novopharm of Scarborough, two leading generic companies that are doing extremely well. We should be proud of the fact that they are doing well in this high–tech pharmaceutical industry because they are Canadian. They also moderate our drug pricing systems for Canadians.

Why not encourage, through this system, Canadian companies to take pride and stimulate additional companies like Novopharm and Apotex in the future. Through this legislation not only would we be killing an Apotex or a Novopharm but we would be ensuring that in the future no other such companies, Canadian companies with Canadian risks and Canadian creativity for Canadian jobs, will be given a chance to establish themselves.

The minister talks about the flood of investments that will flow from the multinational corporations. He was the same minister that talked about the flood of investments if we were to approve Bill C–22 some years ago.

The government promised that there would be some 5,000 new jobs created. It is not even one–third of the way, as we speak today, in delivering on that promise. Over half those jobs are in the marketing and sales components and divisions of those multinational corporations. They are not in the research and development area, as this government promised us.

Second, let us get behind our Canadian industry and Canadian companies in this pharmaceutical industry. The worry of the international community is that this system will be emulated in other parts of the world. In fact President–elect Bill Clinton made an issue in his campaign, a successful campaign which we all witnessed, the bringing to a stop of the spiralling costs to America of their prescription drugs as well as their health care system.

Third, does this government not have any pride left in any Canadian institutions?

Does it have to put its hands on every Canadian institution that has served this country well? Does it not realize that the generic compulsory drug licensing system is an institution made in Canada for Canadians and by Canadians and that it is working well? It is fair. The brand name companies are making their profits as they should, and the generic industries are in there to moderate those prices and to give incentives to Canadian companies and jobs.

This is yet another institution touched by this government. This is the removing of yet another piece of fabric in that Canadian blanket that we have been proud of, which in the end serves to define who we are and who we are not. The government took all those individual strands: VIA, the airline industry, our infrastructure in transportation, Canada Post, doing away with FIRA in terms of protecting Canadian industry, not anti-foreign investment but standing up for number one, and the trucking industry.

The CBC is not able to promote Canadian unity. Can you imagine anything more insane for a Canadian broadcasting channel? Now the government touches the compulsory drug licensing system. I am not advocating, our critic who has spoken on this matter eloquently is not advocating and our party is not advocating, that we run the multinational companies out of town. Not at all.

We are suggesting that the compulsory drug licensing system allows both the brand names and the generic names to live and coexist, and allows each to do well. Does the House know who benefits in the current system, leaving the brand name and generic companies alone for a moment? Canadians do because Canadians get a health care system that is more affordable. Canadian companies do well. There are jobs and profits, and taxes are paid in this country.

Why fix something that is uniquely Canadian and that is not broken whatsoever?

Fourth—I do not like raising it but I will—is that in the debate on Bill C-22 elements on that side suggested: "If you are against Bill C-22 you are against Quebec". We hear those voices again now on Bill C-91. A lot of brand name multinational corporations are in Quebec, though not exclusively. In my own province of Ontario there are quite a number as well, but there is a large component of companies in Quebec.

Now voices opposite suggest: "Hold on, if you are against Bill C-91 you are against the province of Quebec and its interests". This is precisely the type of allegation that poisoned the referendum debate that all of us were engaged in. These are the voices that are the true enemies of Canada.

We know where we stand with the province of Quebec. We know what we did during the referendum when Canadians spoke, and whose voices must be respected. Bill C-91 is not a test of loyalty or patriotism to one province in our federation. Bill C-91 is an issue of health care. Bill C-91, whether there are brand name companies in Quebec or not, and there are, is of interest also to Quebecers, to Canadians in Quebec, because they too are concerned about how much they spend for their prescription drugs on which unfortunately they must rely.

Those are the four issues at stake. It is not: "Believe me, Canadians, this is a good policy for Canada". If that is good for Canada I would hate to see what the minister's definition of a bad policy is, and I think Canadians are wise to it.

I urge Canadians to rally to the defence of this compulsory drug licensing system which is a Canadian, home-grown, home-bred institution. This issue can be a sleeper. Do you remember when the party opposite tried to deindex senior citizens' pensions, thinking that the seniors were somehow not powerful and would not be able to mobilize public opinion? Do you remember when that beautiful, elderly lady called the Prime Minister a Charlie Brown? She captured the imagination not only of senior citizens but of young Canadians, nephews and nieces, and mobilized them until this government was forced to back down.

This issue is something like that debate, particularly when we talk about senior citizens. They are the ones who are most reliant on our health care system and the provincial drug plans that provide prescription drugs for them.

I urge senior citizens and not so senior Canadians to involve themselves in this debate. We certainly will stand our ground. This system has worked well. It has provided for moderate increases in prices, and it has allowed both the brand name and generic companies to co-exist, to continue.

Why must we let go without a fight an institution that has worked well for Canada and for Canadians? We must be concerned about the safety of our health care system. At the very time when provincial health care ministers are coming to Ottawa on a daily basis talking about the increased costs, this government is moving in the opposite direction. The first piece of business, once we came back from the post-referendum episode, when we are supposed to be getting back to business and creating economic prosperity, is about the dismantling of a Canadian industry in Toronto, in Winnipeg and elsewhere.

If the government has learned anything from the referendum message, if it has listened to the deep disaffection that Canadians have, it will do the honourable thing in this legislation. It should not satisfy the needs of multinational corporations, those that the Prime Minister wishes to sing to. It should look after the needs of the people. From there, we will be able to build successfully. Start at home and let us do away with Bill C-91.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to what my friend opposite had to say about this bill. I was a little surprised because it would seem to be in direct contradiction to what I heard during Question Period when there was a lot of rhetoric about jobs, jobs, jobs.

If we are looking at jobs for Canadians then we should look at the record and see what the innovative drug companies have done in creating jobs since 1987.

Right now the innovative industry, the industry that will be looking forward to investing more money in Canada, employs about 18,000 people in this country. Since 1987, with the advent of Bill C-22, they added about 2,400 new jobs. This is 2,400 new jobs just because of Bill C-22.

At that time I was not a member of the House, but I remember as a citizen being frightened because of the dire predictions of the opposition about what would happen if we passed Bill C-22. What happened is that we got 2,400 new jobs in Canada. We got a doubling of the R and D investment to the 10 per cent promised by 1996. It has already happened and it is not even the end of 1992.

Therefore, I have to ask the hon. member why he is making these comments against Bill C-91 and why he is trying to scare seniors by making all kinds of threats and predictions about rising costs. That worries me because there are a lot of seniors in my riding, as I am sure there are a lot of seniors in the hon. member's riding as well. It is highly unfair and highly inappropriate to make predictions about rising costs of prescription drugs that make seniors and others who have little ability to defend themselves to quake in their shoes in fear.

The hon. member can tell me if I am correct. I would like to get his opinion. The facts are that only 20 per cent of all of the drugs that are bought over the counter by people or through their doctor's prescriptions are patented. Those are the drugs we are talking about here. That is the portion of the bill that seniors and others would have to bear and only 20 per cent will be affected by this bill.

The hon. member has been saying that the prices review board was not effective.

An hon. member: Ask your question.

Mrs. Dobbie: This is a period for questions and comments. I can make my comment and then pose my question. He says that the prices review board has not been effective. The facts speak for themselves. The prices of these drugs under patent, not the patents that are being unfairly encroached upon because of special licensing created by the Liberals, have only increased by 2.9 per cent while the CPI has raised by 4.4 per cent.

I would like to hear the hon. member defend his dire predictions about price increases that frighten the elderly and people on fixed incomes. They are totally unfounded according to the facts and figures that I have.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, I was not trying to scare seniors. I was trying to appeal to seniors to look into this issue. There is nothing more scary to seniors than this government. If the member wants facts and figures she should start with her home province.

She talks about the CPI rate. Since 1987 the health plan in her province of Manitoba has gone up, since Bill C-22 arrived, some 12.3 per cent.

Second, she talks about the need to create jobs and investment and how dare I criticize Bill C-91. In Bill C-22 her colleagues promised an avalanche of jobs in research from the brand name companies.

An hon. member: Overnight.

Mr. Marchi: Let us keep it in perspective. The brand name multinational corporations enjoy 90 per cent plus of the pharmaceutical market in this country. We are talking about the generic companies trying to survive in that 10 per cent market share.

I ask the hon. member and the government she is part of if that is unfair. Are we saying that we have run the multinational corporations out of town when they enjoy 90 per cent of a billion dollar market rather than 10 per cent?

The research and development and the profits, the taxes and the stimulus from the brand name companies do not all stay in Canada. At least we can say in trying to have those two co-exist that with generic firms the direct employment, direct spin-offs, direct taxation, direct research and development all happen on Canadian soil and nowhere else. The hon. member forgets that. The hon. member forgets that Apotex Inc., the leading generic drug company in Canada has put on hold a multimillion dollar development in the city of Winnipeg because of the legislation we are debating today.

Is the member from Manitoba speaking up for Manitobans and the people of Winnipeg or is she paying lip service to the policies of her government which clearly have not passed the test? I advise the member to go back to her province, check her facts, check with the interests of Manitobans and then come back to this Chamber and talk intelligently.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for what I thought was a well turned intervention, not challenged seriously from the other side. I do not know where the other side gets its numbers but the actual facts show that only half as many jobs were created as they claim in their own statistics and other statistics were left out.

I was interested in something the hon. member had to say. The hon. member who speaks on behalf of the Official Opposition will know that just before it was defeated in the early eighties the Liberal government was planning changes to compulsory licensing of an undetermined sort. Nevertheless it was perfectly clear that compulsory licensing under the previous Liberal government was under threat.

• (1630)

It is also true that the former Prime Minister was a member of the board of directors of Sandoz. It is true that the present spokesperson on behalf of the multinational drug corporations is a former Liberal cabinet minister who is one of those interested in changing compulsory licensing. We know as well that one member has been communicating with other members of the Liberal caucus, along with others, opposing the Liberal position on Bill C-91.

I was very glad to hear the hon. member point out that the Liberal Party as usual is unified on this. I would be interested in knowing just what machinations went on to achieve such unity within an otherwise divided house.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, I said that the party position was that advocated by our consumer and corporate affairs critic who spoke before this House recessed.

I do not think it would do much good for the hon. member to speak of divided houses because the rumblings coming from the NDP caucus and the challenges to his leader's ability to control the divisions within the constitutional issue indicate that the member is on very thin ice when he talks about divided houses. Obviously he should take a look at the sensitivities in his own party before he casts the first stone.

The fact of the matter is that it does not do anything for the national debate if I were to point out that the NDP Government of Ontario is cutting back on health care and that the NDP Government of British Columbia is prepared to take certain drugs off its list. However it does not do anything to further the debate.

The core of this debate is whether Canadians should have access to a system of prescription drugs that allows the pricing of those drugs to be controlled, that they remain affordable, and that they not escalate beyond the means of average Canadian families who must unfortunately rely on prescription drugs and medicines when a member of their family is ailing. That is the central premise of the issue.

The second one for me is allowing generic companies that only have 10 per cent of the market share to continue as Canadian corporate companies and citizens so that they can invest in this country and give rise to further jobs and stimulus.

If the NDP wishes to look at divided houses we would be happy to have an emergency debate and respond to every one of those challenges.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 38, it is my duty to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception—Atlantic Fishermen; the hon. member for Davenport—The Environment; the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast—The Economy; the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso—Westray Coal Mine; and the hon. member for Ottawa West—The Environment.

[English]

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the consumer and corporate affairs committee and as a member representing a riding in which there is a university, the University of Alberta, I am pleased to add my comments to those of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who spoke in September and today of the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology on Bill C-91, an act to amend the Patent Act.

The legislation before us today is designed to foster science and technology, build expertise in niche markets and to enable our research facilities to respond to global trends.

Bringing Canada's patent protection more in line with intellectual property laws in the rest of the world will help do all these things.

We have what it takes to become a world leader in pharmaceutical research. We have a well respected medical establishment, a health care system that is the envy of the world, an educated work force, and R and D tax credits that are among the most generous in the world.

However, we have been missing an essential ingredient: intellectual property protection in line with the standard practices of the rest of the industrialized world and patent laws that compare with those of the nations with which we compete for R and D investment.

Since 1984 the government has given high priority to the reform of Canada's intellectual property laws as a component for its agenda of economic renewal. It has recognized the need for patent laws that protect ideas and innovation and that attract investment.

But the government has had to fight every step of the way in its effort to modernize and streamline these laws. It comes as no surprise for me to hear the complaints of hon. members opposite. Over the years they have tried in vain to halt the government's progress.

I have heard some members across the floor complain that the government is moving too quickly with second reading of this bill. They seem to ignore the fact that some $500 million in new investment is at stake here, that innovative pharmaceutical companies stated their intentions to invest that amount once they heard last January that the government intended to strengthen patent protection for pharmaceuticals.

This is a substantial investment at a time when the world-wide industry is scrambling to restructure. Make no mistake about it: other countries around the world would love to get hold of that investment.

I often wonder about my colleagues opposite. They talk about the economy and they talk about how we need to do something. Here is $500 million waiting to be invested in Canada and yet they say we should not go ahead with it.

If Canada does not move quickly to take advantage of this offer, a window of opportunity will slam shut. I would remind those in the House that hon. members opposite and their colleagues in the other place have a track record of delaying patent legislation well beyond any reasonable time frame required to study the bill adequately.

In the last Parliament they used every obstruction tactic at their disposal in an effort to defeat or delay the first phase of patent reform. During the last Parliament Bill C-22, an act to amend the Patent Act, was given first reading on November 7, 1986. The Liberals and the NDP in this House obstructed the bill to such an extent that it was not forwarded to the other place until May 6, 1987.

I remind this House of the turbulent history as a warning that we cannot afford to see a similar delay in the passage of this bill. What I find disturbing is that many of the arguments I have heard today from the opposition benches echo the arguments made in the other place when it tried to thwart the government's legislation.

Back in 1987 the Liberals maintained that the amendments to the Patent Act would result in higher drug prices. They use the same line today. I would like to quote Senator Thériault who told that other place:

> By removing the competitive element provided by generic drugs in the industry, Bill C–22 will undoubtedly result in a huge price increase.

Senator Bonnell from Prince Edward Island, and a doctor himself, felt that we were encouraging research by multinational drug companies at the expense of disadvantaged Canadians who would have to pay higher drug prices. He said:

> For goodness sake, don't take off the backs of the sick, the hospitalized, the infirm, and the aged by increasing drug prices.

• (1640)

He said that on August 13, 1987.

In a similar manner Senator Buckwold raised the spectre of fear, inferring that the legislation would hurt the people of Canada because of higher drug costs. He said:

> In my opinion, if we pass this bill we will be doing a great disservice to the people of Canada. We will be adding to the problem of health costs. We will be denying drugs to people who otherwise would have bought them, and who desperately need them.

He raised the spectre of fear. Shameful. This is what the Liberals in the other place said about the legislation increasing drug prices. Today we know that their predictions were inaccurate and terribly unfounded. It was a shameful procedure.

In fact from January 1987 to December 1991 the prices of patented drug products increased at an average rate of only 2.9 per cent. This is well below the rise in the Consumer Price Index. The Minister of Industry, Science and Technology spoke about that a bit earlier.

Bill C–91 gives the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board tough new powers. These powers will, first, allow the board to better influence introductory prices for new patented drugs. This was a concern of Bill C–22 and the government has met this concern.

Second, these powers will authorize the board to order price reductions or penalties which could compensate for past excessive prices and deter excessive pricing practices.

Third, they will provide for fines and imprisonments for failure to comply with the board's order.

Finally these powers will give the board's orders the same force and effect as an order of the Federal Court.

These are tremendous powers and the board will be very effective.

Again many Liberals both in this House and in the other place had dire predictions that drug manufacturers would not double the research and development as a portion of sales, as they had promised to do.

Senator Thériault said:

> As far as research and development are concerned, it is clear—that it is not Bill C–22 which will increase the level in Canada. We have nothing but promises and commitments from the pharmaceutical industry which has never proved quite reliable. There is nothing in Bill C–22 itself which would compel it to meet its commitments.

Senator Bonnell added:

> In the original bill, there is not five cents guaranteed to go into research. There is just a promise.

We now know that the effect of the changes to the Patent Act was indeed to open the gates to a flood of new investment by the pharmaceutical companies. The industry has lived up to its commitments.

In fact the fourth report of the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board points out that the ratio of R and D to sales by the companies that filed patents with the board in 1991 now stands at 9.7 per cent, well on its way to the 10 per cent commitment it promised.

Total expenditures on R and D for these companies grew to $376.4 million last year, an increase of over 23 per cent from 1990.

This money is valuable money. It helps create high value added jobs, research and development jobs, the type of jobs we want to build a new economy, to provide for new growth in our economy. We need these jobs very badly as we face globalization and restructuring. Five hundred million dollars in new investment is at stake here and we must push forward with this patent legislation.

During the debates on the old bill, Bill C–22, Senator Buckwold expressed doubts about whether Canada had the capacity to play a major role in the international pharmaceutical industry. He had doubts about Canada's role to compete internationally, to compete in the world environment. I have confidence in Canadians. I have confidence in Canadian researchers, in Canadian universities and in companies in Canada.

Senator Buckwold said:

> I do not know how the government can be so naive as to really believe that suddenly Canada will become a major player in the research world.

It was Senator Buckwold who was naive in this case. He lacked confidence in Canada. He lacked confidence in our researchers, in our universities and in others.

We on this side of the House have no doubt that Canada will become a major player in the research world. What we require, however, is public policy that enables the science and technology community to get on with the job, and that is what this legislation is all about.

In my riding of Edmonton—Strathcona, Glaxo announced on October 6 a $15 million investment to undertake basic research at the University of Alberta. This pledge is an addition to the quarter of a million dollars announced by Bristol-Meyers Squibb last July. I was a participant in that announcement. The Bristol-Meyers Squibb announcement of $250,000 will be spent over five years and it is renewable for another five years. That is half a million dollars and it will be matched by other sources. These investments will add to the university's high reputation for medical science.

We have a lot to be proud of in Alberta about the University of Alberta because it is a leader in many areas, in medical and pharmaceutical research, and it will lead again with the types of investments the Patent Act will bring.

At both those announcements the presidents of each of those companies lauded the government for Bill C-22. They indicated how much more money they had spent than they had committed to. They talked about the successes of their new drugs, how these new drugs would help Canadians and people in the world fight disease and improve their health.

That is what we want. We want high value added jobs through which we can export high value added products like pharmaceuticals.

Albertans recognize the importance of these kinds of investments and they are well aware of the connection between intellectual property protection and R and D.

Dr. Michael Lee of Edmonton has written to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to say:

> I believe that the brand name pharmaceutical industry has stepped into the forefront as one of the primary sources of funding for Canadian medical research.

Dr. Lee adds:

> It would seem logical that the maintenance of the patent protection will encourage continuation, and in fact, further investment by the pharmaceutical industry enhancing Canadian competitiveness in medical research.

Mr. Bachinsky of the University of Alberta, a former dean of pharmacy, has written to the minister and has said:

> You have my support in the forthcoming GATT negotiations to extend patent protection and to bring Canada into the post-industrial world.

I hope all members of this House will see the wisdom behind the words of these Albertans. We cannot afford to lose time, as we did in the last Parliament, by squabbling over this legislation in order to score political points.

We will fine tune Bill C-91 in committee. I am a member of that committee and I will be open to suggestions of opposition members and people who come forward to us. I am looking forward to a healthy, good process. Many members of the consumer and corporate affairs committee will be on that legislative committee.

We have worked well in the past. We have produced some good reports. We worked well on the bankruptcy legislation and on the consumer and corporate affairs study into credit cards. We will continue our work in a non-partisan sense on Bill C-91.

I will welcome constructive suggestions, but let us move quickly to the committee stage and avoid repeating the costly delays of the Patent Act amendments in the last Parliament.

• (1650)

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, the member for Edmonton—Strathcona, which is a very good seat, has left out a few things.

One of them is the fact that the industry tells me that they have 18,000 employees across Canada. I asked one of their spokesmen how many lived and worked in western Canada which has about 8 million people. The answer that I got was about 1,600 out of 18,000. Not a very nationalized industry in my view.

Maybe the member will have something to say about whether or not his friends in the industry are planning to increase employment. In my part of the country, the member knows that the chemistry department at the University of Alberta is one of the best known departments of the entire university. Why does it not hire people in Alberta and in other parts of western Canada or Atlantic Canada?

I hope he will also comment when he gets up on the fact that J. W. Gilman in a paper entitled "The Impact of Pharmaceutical Companies Sponsored Research and Basic Research of Canadian Universities" wrote in part: "Canadian medical schools have found that Bill C-22 has had a minimal impact on basic research and development in Canada".

The basic research is 26.5 per cent. Universities and hospitals research is about 23 per cent. I gather that this amounts to about $14 million yearly now going into basic research. I also have a figure that the member will want to clarify, employment in the industry. We were told by people like the Minister for International Trade that the brand name drug producers would create 3,000 jobs by 1996. My understanding is that there has only been about 1,300 jobs created since Bill C-22.

Will the member please respond to the specific questions with respect without giving us the bafflegab he was giving us until he sat down?

Mr. Thorkelson: Mr. Speaker, those are good questions and I appreciate the member's concern about R and D investment in western Canada. Like him, I would like to see more R and D investment in western Canada.

As I mentioned there were two announcements at the University of Alberta, one by Bristol-Myers Squibb for basic research. That was to fund a chair in the department of pharmacy to increase the amount of basic research done which was one of the points of the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast.

The $15 million by Glaxo is in co-operation with the University of Alberta hospitals and the medical school. The professor that is heading that up is from the medical school. It is also funded by the Alberta Heritage Savings Trust Fund Medical Foundation. There are four or five partners bringing in people from the department of medicine, bringing in people from the department of pharmacy, from the hospitals and from the industries. That is indeed beneficial.

There was also an announcement of a firm spending I believe $30 million at UBC. Ayerst has announced it will spend $123 million which will produce 1,000 jobs in Manitoba. Yes, we could do more in Western Canada. We are building on our base there which is very important. As time goes on we hope to increase the research done in Western Canada.

I am not going to get into the game of pounding on one part of the country at the expense of another which is what the hon. Liberal member spoke of earlier. He was accusing some of trying to divide the country by saying that this was a bill for Quebec. It is not. It is a bill for all of Canada. It is a good bill. It is a bill that builds on our base. It is a bill that tries to provide high quality research jobs across the country. I am pleased that in Alberta my riding is a part of it and it is a part for all Albertans. I am pleased that there are investments at the University of Manitoba in Winnipeg and at the University of British Columbia.

I would like to see greater investments in Atlantic Canada. I am hoping that the industry will take heed of the hon. member's remarks, my concerns and the concerns of the members on this side of the House and try to spread their investment more equally across the country.

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the member if he is aware that British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia have all taken action to counteract high drug costs set in motion by the Conservative Patent Act amendments. They have deinsured drugs and, in one case, 350 drugs have been deinsured. The drug eligibility continues to be reduced in those provinces because of increasing costs for the reason of this legislation. Deductibles are being increased on pharmaceuticals for seniors and others. User fees are being added directly to the pharmaceuticals. Clearly the cost of drugs is going up and is going to accelerate.

Would the member support a resolution where National Health and Welfare got involved with doctors to support an initiative to clearly and carefully prescribe drugs that were in the generic area or were alternatives to the brand names? Would he also support National Health and Welfare working with hospitals to reduce the number of approved drugs so long as they covered the needs in order to do an end-run around the pharmaceutical companies in Canada and support pharmacists in the same way?

I contend, as does almost every other Canadian in this country, that this project has more to do with putting money in the pockets of friends than with research in this country or jobs.

Mr. Thorkelson: Mr. Speaker, I am well aware that several provinces have moved to control health care costs. I think the hon. member is trying to infer something when he says they are trying to control drug costs. Some of those deinsured drugs are drugs that are not affected at all but are already generics and so on.

This bill talks about new drugs and new investment, extending patent protection for those. The hon. member's question, with the greatest of respect, really is not relevant.

I have sympathy with what he is saying. Yes, health care costs are rising and yes, we must do something. Some of the provinces have moved in areas to control the health costs and it is up to them to decide how they want to control those health care costs. If some want to deinsure drugs or if some want to put user fees, that is up to them. I am not saying that I agree with that. I believe in universal health care and I believe that we have one of the finest health care systems in the world and we must maintain it at that. However, that question is not relevant to this bill because some of those drugs and some of those items that are deinsured are completely outside the scope of this bill which affects drugs that will be the subject of research and will come on the market. It does not affect drugs that are already on the market.

NOTICE OF ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER SECOND READING OF BILL C-91

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I would like to move the following:

> That since an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Order 78(1) or (2) with respect to second reading of Bill C-91, an act to amend the Patent Act, to amend another act in consequence thereof and to provide for other related matters, under the provision of Standing Order 78(3), I give notice of my intention to move a time allocation motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allotting a specified number of days or hours for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at the said stage.

Let us get on with the business of the country.

Some hon. members: Shame, shame.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am shocked.

An hon. member: You should not be; they have used it about 50 times.

Mr. Boudria: Perhaps I should not be shocked, as my colleague has so eloquently just put it. This government has used closure on dozens and dozens of occasions. This is just terrible. This time we are talking about a major piece of legislation. Less than three hours of debate has gone on and this government wants to shut this place down. Parliament has been back since eleven o'clock this morning and this government has lasted until 4.55 p.m. without invoking closure.

• (1700)

An hon. member: They are tired. They are worn out.

Mr. Boudria: They just could not resist any longer. They lasted an unbelievable six hours without invoking closure.

An hon. member: Shame.

Mr. Boudria: Shame on those Tories across the way. I was not going to engage in partisan debate today. I really was not. However I feel provoked by the actions of the government.

I have just spent a number of weeks in my constituency campaigning on the referendum. Before I get into all the details of this bill, I want to take this occasion to thank my constituents for their efforts in that regard, whether they agreed or disagreed with me. I want to take a moment and offer my respects to all who participated in the process. People from all walks of life, people who were known Liberals, Tories, New Democrats all joined together in that effort.

The past president of the Conservative Association of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, a fine gentleman by the name of Mr. Bob Binmore, helped me a lot in the campaign. Symbolically, in order to show that there was no partisanship at the time, I attended every public meeting in the riding wearing his tie. We thought this was a symbolic thing. As a matter of fact, I am wearing it today. This is Bob Binmore's tie. I do not think this constitutes a display for the cameras and it does not offend the Standing Orders, although when some of my colleagues see how aggressive this tie is, they might want to comment on that. It is very aggressive. It makes a statement about our Canadian provinces and Canadian unity. This tie was given to Mr. Binmore by his daughters, Julie and Jennifer, and I made him a solemn promise to wear it in the House today, the first day back.

We all behaved in an unpartisan way and I am proud of that. However, we are only back a few hours today and the government goes at it, jack-boots and all. I thought the minister responsible for fisheries was a little less partisan than some of the others across the way because at one time he had the good sense to be a Liberal and that would make him immensely better than some of his colleagues. However, I see it did not make much difference.

I have before me a stack of little cards sent to me by constituents and people right across Canada who are just concerned about this Bill C-91. There must must be a pile four or five inches thick of these postcards sent to me. I am sure the member for Dartmouth received postcards from people paying the high price of prescription drugs who are concerned about the future of the pharmaceutical industry.

Here is what the postcards say. I will read a few sentences from one of them: "On June 23, 1992, the federal government introduced Bill C-91, legislation intended to extend retroactively to December 20, 1991, patent protection for brand name pharmaceuticals and eliminate Canada's system of compulsory licensing. This legislation will result in significantly higher drug prices in Canada and its retroactive provisions will cripple the Canadian owned generic pharmaceutical industry". This is not what I said. This is what hundreds and hundreds of Canadians have said.

An hon. member: And the government ignores them and wants to cut them off.

Mr. Boudria: However, no one across the way wants to listen to what all these Canadians have to say. They say there are going to be millions, possibly even billions, of dollars invested in Canada and thousands and thousands of jobs will be created with this new bill. There is a certain deja vu as we say in French, because in 1987 I heard the same refrain from the Conservatives opposite.

In 1987 they said that Bill C-22 was necessary and would create thousands and thousands of jobs. That is what the Conservatives opposite said. I have in front of me an article in The Gazette of Montreal last September which says there are few benefits from 1987 drug patent changes. This speaks of a study by the federal government, by Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I think that is the same guy who introduced this bill on June 23, the same Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the same department at least, that was telling us then that Bill C-22 would create all these new jobs. Now, years later, the minister wants to introduce another bill which is supposed to create all these new jobs. If he keeps repeating this over and over again I suppose some day, somewhere, some jobs might be created.

Here is what the study said. The government predicted first of all in 1987 that 3,000 jobs would be created by 1996. These are 3,000 jobs which might be called high-tech jobs, scientific jobs, stuff like that.

Lo and behold, according to the study by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, only 1,386 jobs had been created between 1987 and 1990, and half of them were in marketing and sales.

As my colleague from Dartmouth said a little while ago, a number of them were also in areas that were not related to marketing and sales. Some of them had to do with—shall we say, not all of course; I do not want to diminish this—being a janitor.

The government can talk until it is blue in the face, which of course is kind of natural for it, about jobs created in this industry, but so far it has not lived up to its promise, let alone those of someone else. In 1987 the government made a promise and it did not deliver. Today Conservatives stand in the House making another promise.

Should we be surprised that Canadians are a little sceptical. Would you not be, Mr. Speaker? I know you are a non-partisan person sitting in the House of Commons and you are able to look at this in a truly objective and completely detached fashion which I am sure you always do in your capacity as a Speaker.

But say, Mr. Speaker, that you were a Tory and that this was the situation. How could you possibly believe in that hypothetical situation what some of these ministers are saying. Obviously you would have great difficulty, as I do and as all my constituents do, in believing what those Conservatives say.

Mr. Speaker, if you think my colleagues and I are alone here in believing this, if you by any chance think that we might be slightly partisan in our approach here today, well far from it. I know that would be the last thing on your mind in any case.

Let me read what The New York Times of November 16 says in an article under the general heading "Business Day". This particular story is entitled "Canadians See Rise in Drug Costs". This article was written by Milt Freudenheim. I want to read a few little extracts from it which should make some of these Tories across the way cringe just a little bit.

> Canada's success at delivering drugs at costs lower than those in the United States is an important feature of its medical system, which has been a model for many health policy experts seeking to contain soaring costs in the United States. Medical costs are about 28 per cent lower per capita in Canada than in the United States, although spending on health care has been rising there, too.

• (1710)

We have lower health care costs in Canada on a per capita basis than they do in the United States, largely because of our prescription drug program, which this government wants to do away with. What are we to conclude from that, other than that the government wants to increase the cost of health care in Canada? It is going to do that, of course, at the expense of the taxpaying public, and at the expense of the provincial governments.

I want to read from a little further on in the same text. It mentions the burden of changing our patent legislation, and it says:

> Extending the patent life of drugs is likely to cost consumers immediately and also add to the burden on the government health plans which are already under economic pressure. Compared with hospital and doctors' bills, prescription drugs are a relatively small, though rapidly growing expense.

Even in the United States people are lauding Canada's generic drug system. However here in Canada the government wants to do away with it.

[Translation]

I do not say that there is no room for both industries in Canada, because there surely is. Besides, the conventional pharmaceutical industry has nearly 90 per cent of the Canadian market and certainly has its place. I am not one of those who want to make life harder for them than it is. I think that we must have an approach that is sensitive to the needs of Canadians who often use generic products which save them money.

As I just said, the United States or at least some American journalists praise our present system which the government opposite is ready to dismantle. About 15 or 20 minutes ago it introduced in this House a closure motion to cut short the debate which should take place.

If we review this whole issue, we see that compulsory licences are not new in Canada. They have been around since 1923 but perhaps they were not used so much then. In 1960 a royal commission of inquiry recommended that patents and compulsory licences be granted for pharmaceutical products.

In 1960 a Conservative government was in power. Three years later, the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission recommended abolishing pharmaceutical patents. After that, in 1969, we had amendments to the Patent Act authorizing compulsory licences in Canada. From then on we had the tools to give us pharmaceuticals at prices that if not reasonable were at least more reasonable than they might otherwise have been.

Just now a New Democratic member addressed the issue of what the government intended to do in 1983 when it mandated the commission to review the whole matter. I think it was time to review it in 1983. Then the Eastman commission reported to the government and recommended some changes that could benefit drug manufacturers in Canada.

The Conservative government opposite did not even listen to the Eastman commission. It gave away more.

Bill C–22 went much further than the Eastman report. Subsequently, as I said before, we had BillC–22 and the promises of the government opposite, promises which were never kept.

On June 23, 1992 the government once again was ready to give the pharmaceutical companies an advantage and put an end to the present system which allows the manufacture of generic pharmaceutical products. In any case the government's bill will certainly weaken the potential of the generic drugs industry and raise the prices of pharmaceutical products for the Canadian consumer.

Earlier I heard the hon. member for Winnipeg South say that we should not scare Canadians and tell them that the price of pharmaceutical products will increase. Mr. Speaker, as you know I am not afraid of telling Canadian consumers the truth. I am not afraid to tell them they are being had by the government opposite. I hope Canadians will keep sending the kind of cards I have here in my hand, signed by hundreds of people who are going to tell this story to all members in this House and to the Prime Minister. I hope they will call him up today or tomorrow and ask to speak to him personally and say: "We want to maintain an affordable drugs system, and we don't want Bill C–91". That is the position we and the Liberal Party have taken. I am not saying Bill C–22 should go on existing in its present form. Some day we will probably have to amend the bill but let us study it and determine what is best for consumers. Then and only then can we consider moving away from what we have now.

Meanwhile Bill C–91 goes much too far. In any case it goes further than what we as members of the Liberal Party are prepared to support. More important, I think it will make pharmaceutical products far too expensive for most Canadians.

Interestingly the government is about to make life easier for the big pharmaceutical companies at a time when the U.S. government, the new government that will be installed quite soon, is about to tighten the reins. What does this mean? We will probably see a Canadian government giving more latitude to the big pharmaceutical companies, while in the United States they will be concentrating on better protection for consumers. In that case the government would not only be going against the wishes of Canadians and members of the opposition but also against the wishes of those they claim are their friends, the government and authorities of United States of America.

I say to the Tory members opposite that they still have time to change their minds.

[English]

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said the government had promised back in 1987 when it passed Bill C–22 that we would have 3,000 new jobs by 1996. He pointed out that just a couple of years later we had about half that. It is only 1992. Since Bill C–22 was passed in 1987, 2,400 jobs have been created, well ahead of the predicted number of jobs that were supposed to be created when Bill C–22 was passed and in spite of the predictions of dire consequences that were made by the Liberal Party of the day.

• (1720)

We see from the lessons learned from Bill C–22 that Bill C–91 will indeed produce new jobs, new investments and new growth in our economy, which is what everybody wants. We all want jobs.

I have a question for the hon. member. I want to know if he believes in patent protection, if he believes that when people get a patent they should have that patent right protected. Is that not a valid and reasonable right? If he does believe in patent protection then I want to know how he can defend the Liberal government's invention of something called compulsory licensing, which was in fact a mechanism designed to break its own patent law. Either you believe in patent protection or you do not believe in patent protection. It seems to me that the Liberals were confused. I cannot think of anything else. If they believed in patent protection I do not understand why they would have created something called compulsory licensing.

When I first came to this particular portfolio and was being briefed one of the things that the deputy minister talked to me about was compulsory licensing. I asked: "What is that?" She explained it to me and I still could not understand it. I could not understand how a government that says it gives so much time for protection under a patent would then also be saying that it would give other people special licences to infringe on that protection.

Perhaps the hon. member who may have been here, or at least may have some sense of the history of this compulsory licensing, would like to defend that particular practice and tell me if he thinks that it is correct or if he does not believe in patent protection. Perhaps he should clear that up for us.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member knows that patent protection exists now. No right is absolute in any society.

I could engage in a long discourse with the member and explain to her, as she knows perfectly well, that the right of free speech, for instance, does not give anyone the right to scream fire in the middle of a crowded theatre. Similarly the right of patent protection is not eternal and is not all encompassing. Everything we do, every right we have and every privilege we have, is relative.

The point is that there are opposing views, there are opposing needs and conflicting needs in any society. What we do must be done in such a way as to ensure the best for society as a whole. Of course there must be patent protection. It exists now.

No right or privilege is absolute. The only question is how long it should be. Should it be absolute? Does it mean that the society that has contributed toward the whole process has no right of its own? Does it mean that the society that has trained all the people and that has paid for the education of all of them has no right of its own? Does it mean that nothing can be done in that regard?

It does not mean any such thing. That is why we have laws in this country that balance these things out.

In my opinion a system that permits the large drug manufacturers to have roughly 90 per cent of the business has not exactly driven those manufacturers into the ground. There must have been some justice in that.

If the member opposite thinks that is totally unjust then is she repudiating her own leader and her own colleagues who enacted Bill C–22 only five years ago. If Bill C–22 is so wrong, as she has just herself suggested, then how could she have possibly been a candidate for a party that lacks any kind of judgement, as she has just described?

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, this is one of those watershed bills that we get periodically in the House of Commons which fundamentally demonstrates the difference between the insane right wing agenda of the Conservative Party and the voice of reason of the Liberal Party.

Clearly the introduction of compulsory licensing in 1968 was done by the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra who was a former Prime Minister and former leader of my party. From 1968 until today it has served us well.

The question that I want to ask my colleague is quite important. I do not understand why, with perhaps 3.5 million people either unemployed and on unemployment insurance or collecting social assistance and with over 1.5 million kids unemployed, this government on the first day back in this place does not come in to talk about a massive job creation project. It does not talk about trying to create jobs in this country for the poorest of the poor and it does not present economic policies or a budget so that the people out there who have lost hope because of this Tory agenda can have some light at the end of the tunnel.

It comes in with a piece of legislation this afternoon that has been debated for only three hours. It is a bill that is a billion dollar bonus bill for the big multinational drug companies. It is not going to do squat for Canadian consumers. It is going to take probably in excess of $1 billion from their pockets.

The question I have for my colleague concerns this. It is pretty interesting. I am reading from The New York Times, Monday, November 16:

> Gerald J. Mossinghoff, president of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association in Washington, said his members would like to eliminate Canada's government price controls.

I would like to ask my colleague whether he is comfortable as a member of this House knowing that we have a government opposite, with millions unemployed, that is not responding to the agenda of Canadians but is responding to the agenda of Mr. Mossinghoff and the largest lobby group in the United States, the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association in Washington.

It has done its job well. It has shut debate down for its American friends down south in Washington.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, my colleague is quite right. I want to congratulate him for this interesting observation.

What he has indicated is quite correct. The agenda of the drug manufacturers is certainly quite well known. In fact this government is following in lock-step with what they are asking. What is strange now is that while this government is listening only to the drug manufacturers rather than everyone else who also has a word to say—I do not mean that the drug manufacturers do not have a word to say—it is going to find out in just a few weeks from now that the reaction from the government in the United States is going to be more toward the protection of consumers.

To pose another interesting proposition, why is it that the government instead of bringing forward measures today to bring people back to work is going with this right wing agenda? I do not know. It is hard for me to understand Tory behaviour at the best of times. Here is what the government's agenda is going to do.

The minister of health for the province of Ontario, Francis Lankin, said that this will create another $1 billion in health care costs in Ontario over 10 years.

The Saskatchewan health minister, Louise Simard, said:

> Bill C-91 is a severe blow to health care in Saskatchewan. It will cost our consumers and the health department a substantial amount of money.

The member from western Canada who has just posed that question must surely be familiar with those comments made by provincial cabinet ministers, particularly the one made by the minister from the neighbouring province to hers, Saskatchewan.

Those concerns have been aired right across the country by provincial governments and I am quite surprised that the Conservatives have not listened to them.

I want to pay special tribute to my colleague, the member for Dartmouth, who has listened to the concerns of the provincial health minister.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The time for questions and comments is now over.

• (1730)

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on this very important bill today. I support Bill C-91 because it is good for Canada and it is good for Canadians despite all the rhetoric on the other side. Innovation and competitiveness are very much on the minds of everybody these days, as is the protection of the consumer. I believe that Bill C-91 serves all of these interests.

If we want to continue to be an affluent country, a nation of opportunity, we have to rely on more than just the natural resources that are out there. We must be strong in knowledge based industries and advanced technologies and that includes technologies of modern healing of which pharmaceuticals play a part.

The government has been committed to that objective since its first mandate and that was the central purpose of Bill C-22, the historic amendment to the Patent Act that was passed by this House in 1987. The government was convinced then, as it is convinced today, that pharmaceutical R and D is a sector of critical importance. It is an area in which Canada must be strong.

We said in 1987 that weakness in this field was inconsistent with the profile of a modern industrialized society. We said that the key to a stronger Canadian pharmaceutical sector was better protection for the rights of innovators, protection comparable to that of our other trading partners. As earlier speakers have reminded us, members of the opposition party took a much more dismal view at that time.

They predicted then, as they have again today, that greater protection for innovators would devastate the generic industry. They said that prices would go through the roof. They did not see any connection between weak protection for patent rights and the lag in Canadian R and D in this particular sector.

It is five years later and it is instructive to examine just what has happened to the pharmaceutical industry in Canada. In 1987 the ratio of research and development to sales in the innovative drug industry was about 5 per cent. When we introduced Bill C-22 the brand name sector of that industry was committed to doubling that. It thought it could happen by 1996.

That 10 per cent ratio was reached last year. It doubled from what it was in 1987. There have been spin-off benefits as a result. Let me mention one that gives me particular pleasure.

In 1987 a young Canadian science graduate who wanted to make a career in the pharmaceuticals field would likely have had to look in the United States or in Europe for an opportunity. Now, in 1992 there are opportunities to have careers in that field, in Canada.

Since 1987 the industry has created 2,400 new jobs for Canadian scientists and researchers, and many of those have been in the west as we heard from my colleague a little bit earlier. This is the kind of result that makes us realize what a difference the environment of public policy and law can make. It is the kind of result that makes us glad to be legislators because this is what it is all about.

What about prices? Did they go through the roof as was predicted by my hon. friends across the way? Let us check the record. Since 1987 the price of existing patented drugs in Canada has risen by an average of 2.9 per cent. That increase was actually lower than the average rate of increase in the Consumer Price Index in that period which was about 4.4 per cent.

I will now discuss the two main features of the bill. First, it does away with patent encroachment and returns to the innovator the exclusive right to market his patented product from an average of 7 years to about 10 years. Let us look again at that change in both the domestic and global contexts.

Canada currently provides less effective patent protection for pharmaceutical products than do any of its major trading partners. Internationally the implications are significant. When a country gives less patent protection than its trading partners it sends a certain message. It says we do not put a high premium on innovation. That is the last kind of signal that a competitive country wants to send. What message have we been sending up to now? Our patent period lags behind that of the United States, behind all the European countries, behind Japan, and behind Mexico. It is half that of Italy.

By passing this bill Parliament sends a positive signal. It says that Canada respects the right of the innovator to full patent protection. It says that if you want to pioneer and invest and grow, come here and do it in Canada.

This legislation ends the practice known as compulsory licensing. There have always been two sectors to the pharmaceutical industry. The innovative sector does the research and development, exploration that develops new products, new cures, new technologies and new treatments. It is the sector which takes the economic risk in these development exercises. And there are the manufacturers of the so-called generic drugs. These are the people who copy the drugs that have been developed by the brand name sector which takes the risks.

Both sectors serve the public interest. The innovative industry advances the technology of healing. The generic industry gives us something just as important, and that is protection for the consumer, healthy competition once the patent period has expired.

The task of the legislator is to strike a healthy balance. Compulsory licensing is not compatible with that balance. Up to now in this country a generic company can, well before the patent period has expired, obtain a compulsory licence to manufacture the drug that the innovative drug company has developed at great cost and great blood, sweat and tears.

This can take place as soon as seven years after the patented drug comes on the market, an average of 17 years after the original patent—which would normally be 20 years—has been applied for. Henceforth generic companies must wait an average of three more years until the patent has expired.

Those who say that they are afraid the generic industry needs compulsory licensing to survive need only look at the experience in other countries where there is a strong generic industry without a system of compulsory licensing. That said, we realize that the removal of compulsory licensing changes the equation. This bill makes the necessary corrections to maintain the balance needed to protect the consumer.

Once again the instrument here is the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board. Bill C–91 gives that board significant new powers to better deal with any kind of excessive pricing that might be contemplated. Both introductory and existing drug prices will come under its control. The board's guidelines have the same force and effect as a federal court. The board will have the power to order price restrictions or penalties. Failure to comply will subject offenders to stiff penalties including fines and even imprisonment.

We see by the record of the past five years what improved patent protection can do in this field. We have a pretty good idea of the benefits that an extension of this protection will create. Over half a billion dollars in new investment has been announced since January when the government announced that it would end compulsory licensing. Companies in this field have already announced that their Canadian operations will be the base for international product mandates. We expect to see the total research and development investment by the innovative industry reach $2 billion over the next five years.

Five years ago, with the passage of Bill C–22, we set out on a new course confident that it was the right one but content to be judged by the record. We see now that it was the right course. It is time to continue.

This bill is good for Canada. This bill is good for competition, good for the consumer, good for our economic well–being. I urge all honourable members to give this bill speedy passage.

I would like to also add that in the period since Bill C–22 was passed the total research and development expenditures by the innovative industry are estimated at $1.1 billion for the four years from 1987 to 1991. That is $1.1 billion in research and investment and jobs that we would not have had if Bill C–22 had not been passed. I also would like to note that the funding for basic research increased from $30.3 million to $94.2 billion between 1988 and 1991.

• (1740)

Those are just two of the statistics out of many I could give to show that this kind of opening up of competition to the innovative drug sector is very good for Canada. It is good for our science and technology sector. It is good for jobs. It is good for the economy. Ultimately, it will be good for consumers as more and more new drugs are brought on to the marketplace. Hopefully drugs that were developed and researched right here in Canada will be among the leaders in the field tomorrow.

Again I want to reiterate my urging of all hon. members to give this bill speedy passage so that all of the research and development dollars and other investments that are waiting to flow to this country can start flowing.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I have a short question for my colleague who just delivered her thesis for why this bill should pass quickly. First I would like to voice my displeasure at the fact that the government has brought in another closure limiting debate on an issue that is important to all Canadians, Bill C–91.

My question is simply this: We have been accused in this House of complicating matters more so than they should be. I think that message came through loud and clear in the recent referendum vote in Canada.

Let us get back to the fundamentals that are being discussed in this House today which are, as I understand it, the purpose of the legislation. Really the purpose of the production of drugs and the research in drugs is that drugs are used to cure illness. Drugs are used to control disease and drugs are used to alleviate or lessen pain. Those are three functions of drugs.

Drugs are an intricate process in the health care of the people of our country. I think all sides of the House are dedicated to a comprehensive plan of medical care for all Canadians. We have to come down to the basic issues of the purpose of drugs and how they interact with the curing of illnesses of citizens through our comprehensive medical plan.

Then we have to ask ourselves three fundamental questions. One is whether Bill C–91 is going to increase the cost and availability of drugs through the provincial plans that already distribute drugs in this country. The empirical data is unquestionable that it will increase the cost of drugs through our health care system. Will Bill C–91 increase the cost to young families who are not covered under a comprehensive drug plan in this country? The empirical data indicates unquestionably that it will increase the cost of drugs to young families in this country. Will Bill C–91 contribute to the cost of drugs to senior citizens in this country? The empirical data we have available indicates that it will increase the cost of drugs to senior citizens in this country.

If you get an answer of yes to those three fundamental questions this is bad legislation at this particular time for Canada where we cannot afford to add one more cent to the cost of living of all Canadians. Why would this government propose this legislation at this time?

Mrs. Dobbie: Mr. Speaker, I can understand it if the hon. member has concerns about increased costs. We all do. This is a time in our lives when money is tight and we are all concerned about the future. The government is no less concerned about this.

One of the initiatives we have undertaken is to give new powers, broader powers, to the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board. Let me just give an outline of some of the things it will be able to do to ensure that prices are kept very reasonable according to all the criteria we can find to make sure that prices do not rise inordinately.

The legislation gives the board the power to better influence introductory prices when drugs are patented. It can authorize the board to order price reduction or penalties which could compensate for past excessive prices and deter excessive pricing increases. That means it can roll back the prices if necessary if it sees a particular innovator taking advantage of the new opportunities that will be out there because he has the full protection of his original patent. It can also provide for fines and imprisonment for failure to comply with the board's order and that is extraordinary. We do not just lightly set prices that are going to be against the regulations that are set down by the new board and under its new regulations because to do so could land you in prison.

These are all measures the government believes will help to keep prices down as much as possible. Of course that gives the board orders the same force and effect as orders of the Federal Court.

I respect my hon. friend across the way. I know he would not make comments he had not thought through carefully. He is quite right that there will be some increase in prices and that is something we have looked at and contemplated. I will share with him the information that we have been able to research after a great deal of careful consideration.

What is being projected right now is that the increase in cost of purchases by pharmacies and hospitals—I think they are the groups we are concerned about right now—of all prescription and behind the counter drugs due to the removal of compulsory licensing is predicted to be 0 per cent in the first year, gradually increasing to less than 2 per cent annually by the year 2000. It is a very small increase.

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, in the previous speaker's comments about the business of extended patent protection for the pharmaceutical companies, one of the things she said was that the opposition was frightening Canadians, that she was extremely upset about that and that our task here was to frighten Canadians.

It is important for the member to know, especially after the referendum debates and all the meetings each one of us attended, that Canadians are mad as hell. They know exactly what is going on and all they want is a chance to get at that government for betraying them. Closure is no problem today because this is the way that government operates. Canadians also clearly know they are going to have to wait one year to get these guys and then they are going to get them.

British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia have all taken action because of rising drug costs. They claim those rising drug costs are due to this government's patent protection and the virtual monopoly in those drug areas that this government has given. They will give an even more extended monopoly when it goes to 20 years through patent protection. We are going to get situations like deinsuring more and more drugs so that people have to pay out of their own pockets and user fees so people pay out of their pockets. We are going to find that large deductibles on pharmacare programs will nail people over 65 and young families. But they know that and they are ready for it. They know they have only one more year of it. Believe me, they are upset and concerned. They want a clear chance to deal with this government through an election.

Mrs. Dobbie: Mr. Speaker, first the Liberals did it and now the NDP is doing it. They are trying to use facts and figures that really are not factual to scare people on fixed incomes and seniors and people who are concerned about anything that has to do with health care and any increased costs.

The fact is that the retail sector which deals with patented drugs, the patented drugs being the part under the control of the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board, represents only 20 per cent of all of the prescription drugs sold in this country. Therefore, even if the drug prices went up considerably, it could not do the things that my hon. friend is suggesting.

However, I will repeat because I want to reassure all of the people out there who are listening that in fact they will not be saddled with huge and inordinate drug increases because of this new bill. The predictions are that there will be no increase in the coming year and that there will be a small increase up to about 2 per cent by the year 2000. That is all.

• (1750)

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to enter into this debate on Bill C-91. It proposes to extend patent rights for 20 years on pharmaceutical products developed by national or foreign multinational corporations in Canada.

It is interesting why we are being saddled with this legislation. Canada has about 2 per cent of the world's drug market. It is not a major place in which to sell items. However it certainly can be an example for other countries, especially if the Americans want to ensure there is no extensive development of national generic drug companies.

If foreign multinationals, especially American multinationals, are to have a patent protection arrangement that will last for a long period of time, George Bush has certainly had an easy task to bring this Conservative government under control, get it to pass an extension to the Patent Act and eliminate generic opportunities. Now we see an even further example of that extension.

When the previous speaker says that this is not a matter of health care concern, it surprises me. We have eight governments in Canada saying it is a major health care concern and one that frightens them, one that makes them concerned that their pharmacare programs are going to become financially unsound if they continue in their present direction because of a substantial increase in those drugs. Specific kinds of actions are going to be taken.

It is not just the concern about rising pharmaceutical costs because of irresponsible legislation by the Conservative government. It is the fact that the unilateral movement away from partnership in health care generally is a serious problem.

The activities of the Conservative government over the last few years have resulted in British Columbia losing about $1.6 billion of federal funding to health care. That started out as a partnership agreement. Then by unilateral change the federal government simply said: "We do not like the situation. We are going to change that situation". British Columbia is out $1.6 billion.

I do not have the figures offhand for Manitoba but certainly the previous speaker, the province in which she will be laying her record before the electorate, will be more than somewhat concerned by the major loss of funds that were originally in a partnership arrangement with the federal and provincial governments that has damaged the health care system, and indeed the entire economy of most provinces.

We are talking about a combined effect. On one hand we see a $1.6 billion loss to the health care system by removal of federal funds and on the other hand a response to federal legislation by removal of generic drugs and placing patent protection over brand name pharmaceuticals produced by multinational corporations.

This is not about job creation. In the final analysis we may wind up in Canada with some jobs. They may be simply jobs that were required at any rate for testing new drugs introduced. They may simply be pure science arrangements to develop new drugs that would have been spent anyway at universities of good quality with good quality results.

Certainly they are not going to offset the cost to Canadians of high priced pharmaceuticals. The minimal amount of research in this country, the minimal amount of employment, is not going to be offset by the work done by generic drug companyies. That research, that job creation, is coupled with a major saving to our pharmacare operations, to prescriptions to individuals and to prescription medication put out by hospitals which was something in the order of $100 million last year in British Columbia, in excess of $100 million. It has an enormous impact for Canadians.

I guess what will happen in the situation is that people will be very concerned. In the short term the Conservative government has one more year to go to November 22, 1993. In that period of time people will be very concerned about what further damage can be done. There is clearly an indication with the present deficit that the Conservative government will take even further action.

In a speech in Alberta the Minister of Finance indicated that the way they were going to deal with the current deficit of the federal government and its failure to reach any of the targets it has set for Canada was by more attacks on the health care programs of Canada and more attacks on the social programs of Canada. In that speech the Minister of Finance indicated that he was laying proposals before cabinet that would lead to an even further erosion of the health care system. We are looking at, probably by the year 2000, a multi-billion dollar impact on each one of the provinces in terms of lost resources for the health care system.

There is no guarantee of what will happen during the period. The Liberal Party of Canada in 1969 certainly put the licensing procedure in place that allowed generic drugs to come on the market, but by 1983 it was certainly talking about changing that process. It is very worrisome for Canadians that the Liberals will not deliver on what they are talking about in the House today and during the debate of this bill. In fact some members are very careful to couch their presentation which allows them an opportunity, if they come to power, to maintain support for the foreign multinational drug companies to maintain those patents.

It has to be a clear, unequivocal statement in the House because waffling will not work. Too many people remember what happened with the Liberal Party in the election debate when it said: "Of course we will not have wage and price controls". A short period of time into its term after winning that election we had wage and price controls.

There is no clear statement on the trade agreement from the Liberal Party. It appears quite clearly that it supports it, but there is certainly the waffle factor. On the issue of reversing the legislation that the Conservative government has placed in the House to allow a free run of generic drugs in Canada, it is absolutely critical that the Liberal Party stands up, stops waffling and lays unequivocally before the House and the people of Canada its position on abolishing this legislation and permitting generic drugs.

There is a lot of discussion about a former Liberal cabinet minister running the Canadian Pharmaceutical Association public relations campaign to sell this pile of nonsense to the people of Canada. Judy Erola, cabinet minister and member of Parliament who sat in this House, is now the shill for those drug companies.

Some hon. members: Consumer Affairs too.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Exactly, Consumer and Corporate Affairs, an incredible conflict of interest.

The right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra sitting on the Canadian board of directors of a Swiss drug company is certainly a very questionable position when we are trying to establish a consensus in the opposition in this House and the legislation of the Conservative government to promote brand name pharmaceuticals to Canadians at a high price and to exclude generic drugs is in question.

There needs to be some assistance to provinces, to hospitals across Canada, to begin to buy pharmaceuticals in ways that permit them to make major savings and to avoid the high price regimes of patented pharmaceuticals and brand name pharmaceuticals. The same should apply to prescriptions by physicians. There needs to be an opportunity for physicians to gain information about lower priced alternatives to the brand name pharmaceuticals. This has to occur and has to occur quickly.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

Adjournment Debate

ATLANTIC FISHERMEN

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, at the outset before I launch into my adjournment debate, I want to say that I for one am very pleased to be back in this House to take control of the situation in the country and to bring some order to the very poor economic state that exists.

I was somewhat disappointed in the two bills that were debated here today. One, if passed, would result in university students being denied the right to the interest on their loans being forgiven for the first six months of their work.

The other one involves the Patent Act, the one we were just discussing. It will increase the cost of prescription drugs somewhere beyond 11 per cent a year. I am not sure that is what Canadians had in mind when they knew the House was coming back.

The point I want to make concerns a question I asked in September of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. It pertained to the discrepancies in the Northern Cod Adjustment and Recovery Program, known in Newfoundland now as NCARP. I see the hon. parliamentary secretary is here so I will refer to it as NCARP.

In my question to the minister of fisheries I used the example that three months after the announcement of the program the six lines in my office received numerous calls. In a period of six days Newfoundland Telephone recorded over 10,000 calls.

The point I was making, in using that statistic, was that a lot of people were not sure where they stood, for example truckers, fish handlers, small plant operators and even people involved in small industries that used welding systems and small engineering for their fishing boats which now of course are not operating. They were all concerned about where they stood.

As a follow-up today I want to use an example of 22 crab plant workers in the town of Bonavista. I should explain that the crab plant and the fish processing plant are one and the same. They are essentially situated in the same plant in Bonavista owned by Fishery Products International. These people lost their jobs earlier in the summer and they have been trying to get compensation. They have been trying through other means and I became involved within the last three weeks.

I am using them as an example. They applied through NCARP for compensation and were told they could not get compensation because they worked in a crab plant. The point here is that they were displaced by the fish processing plant workers who had the seniority to take their jobs, which normally would not have happened.

The point I made in a letter to the minister of fisheries and the point I am making this evening is that they did not have enough weeks to qualify. They did not have enough work because their crab plant processing operation was taken over by the fish plant operators who in turn were displaced because there was no northern cod.

This is a good case for those ladies who are sitting in the town hall this evening in Bonavista and will continue to sit until some dispensation is given to them. They feel they have been displaced by the northern cod moratorium. They believe that they, among the other examples I quoted this evening, should qualify for NCARP, and if they do not emergency jobs should be created for them.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member opposite I know he has brought this matter before the House on many occasions. He referred to his question of September 6.

I might add that the NCARP is an exceptional response to a very difficult problem and many people are being helped under this program. I can say from the government side of the House that we are doing our best to ensure that others in need of help but not qualified under the program will be helped by other government programs and that is being actively pursued right now.

As of the last benefit period ending on November 7, there were approximately 24,400 individuals eligible under NCARP. This included 9,900 fishermen, 13,600 plant workers and 900 trawlermen. A total of 142 plants have been designated under the program and to date the benefits paid have reached $84.9 million.

Under the terms and conditions of the program approved by Treasury Board, individuals other than fishermen and plant workers affected by the northern cod moratorium are ineligible for assistance under NCARP. However provisions have been made within existing terms and conditions to include individuals called fish handlers and assemblers. These individuals are employed by firms contracted by designated fish plants to unload, weigh, grade, ice and load fish at the docks. This type of work is normally associated with a fish processing operation and therefore these individuals have been deemed to be plant workers under the existing terms and conditions.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has established two independent review committees, one each for fishermen and plant workers, to enable individuals regarded as ineligible by DFO to appeal their eligibility under NCARP. These committees consider individuals who have an acceptable historical attachment to the northern cod fishery but do not meet the program's criteria for automatic eligibility due to exceptional circumstances. A total of 468 appeals has been heard by the two committees up to November 10, and more than 300 additional appeals has been requested.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, as you may recall, the issue that was discussed following an intervention last May has to do with the question of climate change and global warming.

As you know, scientists are telling us that in every part of the world, the north and the south, the rich and the poor nations, something is likely to happen by way of climate change and by way of global warming caused by carbon dioxide which is the product of energy consumption in human society.

This is an issue that has been raised by scientists on a number of occasions in recent years. There are signs of warning because climate change as a result of global warming will lead to an elevation in sea levels in many parts of the world, and therefore to dislocation of millions of people who will have to move from areas which will be submerged as a result of sea level rise.

The Government of Canada has made the right speeches and made the right declaration over time. May I recall to you that in The Hague in 1989 the Prime Minister of Canada said that Canada would play a leading role in the question of reducing carbon dioxide emissions in an attempt to modify this trend in climate change.

Since then countries like Germany, Denmark, New Zealand, Australia and The Netherlands have committed themselves to reduce by 20 per cent their carbon dioxide emissions by the year 2005. Canada has decided not to follow this example. It simply announced some time ago that it would stabilize its carbon dioxide emissions, using 1990 as the base year, by the year 2000.

Until now we have not heard any statement from the government any indicating Canada's plan with respect to how it intends to achieve this stabilization by the year 2000. We do not know which sector has been approached and which sector has agreed on stabilization of carbon dioxide emissions, be it transportation, agriculture or energy. There is total silence from the government benches.

• (1810)

We do not know whether the government has approached the provincial governments or whether Ottawa has arrived at agreements with the provincial governments so that nationally we can develop a program for the reduction of carbon dioxide emissions.

In other words, four years after The Hague declaration by the Prime Minister of Canada in which a promise was made to the nation and to the world that we would be the leaders in the field of carbon dioxide emission reduction, there is silence from the government. There is no indication of a precise timetable and approaches as to how this target will be reached by the year 2000.

Not only that, we have also not adopted the more intelligent, I submit, approach, namely that of pursuing energy efficiency as adopted by other nations.

I am really anxious to hear the parliamentary secretary as to where we are at this stage.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member that one of the great achievements of the earth summit held in Rio last June was the commitment made by the international community to take action against global warming through an international framework convention on climate change. The Prime Minister signed this document on behalf of Canada, together with representatives of more than 150 countries throughout the world.

The cornerstone of this convention was restrictions on emissions of CO_2 and other greenhouse gases. Under the framework convention, a general agreement was reached at the negotiating table—the only way to solve the problem of global warming—by adopting resolutions and reaching compromises at the international level. Developed countries, including Canada and the United States, made a political commitment to limit emissions of CO_2 and other greenhouse gases agreed to bring emissions back to their 1990 levels by the year 2000.

I may also remind the hon. member that even before the framework convention became a reality, Canada was already committed to limiting its greenhouse gas emissions to 1990 levels by the year 2000. This measure puts us in the forefront of the fight against climate change. Our objective is not regional or sectorial but truly national in scope.

The federal, provincial and territorial governments are working together to implement this objective as part of the national strategy on global warming.

The federal government believes that more substantial reductions will be necessary, but these will be undertaken only when the international community has agreed on reduction objectives and calendars, to be worked out as part of the negotiations on the UN Convention on Climate Change.

The framework convention will provide a mechanism for countries to take a co-ordinated and co-operative approach towards achieving the ultimate objective of preventing any harmful interference with the world's climate. It remains to be seen, whether the next step will be a 20 per cent reduction in emissions or something else. Canada insisted—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the rules of this debate are very strict. I will now recognize the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast.

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I rise to seek guidance from the Minister of Finance, or whoever is representing him, on his economic policies.

On April 8 I asked him to retreat on his government's commitment to cap the amount of transfer payments it pays to the three so-called have provinces. One of those provinces is not only his home province but my own as well, Alberta.

Capping the cash transfers reduces severely the ability of the government of Alberta to pay for programs to retrain men and women to assist those who are unable to work. The cap now reduces the ability of the government of Alberta by about $200 million in Alberta alone.

This corresponds with one of the greatest violations of the social contract our country has seen. At a time when the money is most needed, when Alberta residents are most anxious to retrain themselves, this unloved government has pulled the rug out from beneath many of them. On April 1 in a question I pointed out that 46,000 people were then unemployed in Edmonton. Furthermore, the number of Edmonton residents on assistance or living below the poverty line had increased by 28 per cent since the same month in 1991.

On May 1 I informed the House in Question Period that the minister's policies were wreaking havoc in his own constituency of Vegreville. Stores were closing and farm auctions were proceeding at far too great a rate. The minister replied that he did not have to be lectured on problems facing his constituents. I would suggest that he does need to be told about the problems of his constituents because it has been six months since those facts have been presented to the government and nothing has been done to try to repair the economy.

Fully 46,000 Edmontonians were out of work in April; today there are more than 50,000 unemployed persons according to Statistics Canada. What the government persists in doing is invoking myths and spreading myths about the economy. The myths are fooling nobody or very few people out there, certainly not the 1.6 million Canadians looking for work, most certainly not the 4,500 citizens and businesses forced into bankruptcy in the month of October alone.

Government myth number one is that the economy is growing. Virtually all current figures on employment, output in corporate earnings, confirm that the 1990 recession is continuing. The economy is not expanding enough to bring unemployment down virtually anywhere in the country. Moreover, small business, in which so many new jobs were created prior to 1990, is finding it more and more difficult to access capital and credit.

The second government myth is that we are in a world-wide recession. It is preposterous to argue, as the Minister of Finance and others do, that our difficulties are being shared world-wide, that Canada is suffering no worse than other nations. The U.S. recession, for example, on a peak to trough basis is only about half as bad as our own. Germany, France, and Japan have all managed to keep economic growth above 4 per cent annually over the past two years. Canada has barely managed to sustain a 1.5 per cent growth rate.

The third government myth is that "the government has got the economic fundamentals right," a direct quote from the finance minister.

A study by WEFA Canada Limited concluded that the federal cabinet and the officials simply do not understand how to deal effectively with booms and busts. Following the 1987 stock market crash the study concluded the Bank of Canada increased the money supply wildly irresponsibly. Only 12 months later did the Bank of Canada governor belatedly clamp down on the money supply growth, sending the exchange rate of our dollar skyward. Our export strength was seriously harmed in consequence, leading to the first trade deficit in a decade.

High real interest rates over the past several years have encouraged excessive foreign borrowing by both governments and the private sector in this country and have driven up the cost of servicing our debt. The government has also helped keep our dollar at a level which made many of our exports uncompetitive.

The WEFA study concluded in short that incompetent macroeconomic policy in Ottawa has been a major cause of bankruptcy and rising unemployment across the nation.

The fourth myth of the government is that the North American free trade agreement will spark new economic growth in Canada.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer to just one of the myths that the hon. member opposite talked about in the House on May 1 when he was asking his question. He said:

> When will the minister get the point? What will he tell his constituents about what his fight inflation only, his high interest and his high dollar policies are doing to them?

If ever there was a situation where a person is misrepresenting the facts to the public of Canada, that member opposite was doing it that day in the House of Commons. This government does not have a high interest rate policy aimed at protecting the external value of the Canadian dollar, quite the opposite. Policy is geared to achieving stability and durably lower interest rates through controlling inflation. Nor is there a target for the Canadian dollar to be set at.

The exchange rate is determined by market forces. Over the past year, for example, the Canadian dollar has fallen approximately 10 cents U.S., yet short-term interest rates are lower now than they were a year ago.

While we do not have a target we cannot ignore the costs to Canadians of short-term volatility in the foreign exchange markets. Accordingly the policy is used to smooth fluctuations to ensure orderly conditions in the exchange market during periods of instability such as had occurred in recent weeks. Over the past few weeks there have been increases in interest rates but these are temporary.

• (1820)

Policy is clearly and publicly committed to achieving price stability along the path set out in the inflation reduction targets. Achieving and maintaining price stability is the only way to permanently lower interest rates. This is essential for strengthening the recovery and for sustained, strong economic growth through the medium term.

The proposals that we have made in reducing inflation means there is room for interest rates to fall when financial markets stabilize. This means that Canada will be able to take full advantage of the strengthening of the world economic recovery and can look forward to a sustained period of strong, non-inflationary growth.

WESTRAY COAL MINE

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I reluctantly return to a question I asked on May 20 regarding the May 9 disaster at the Westray mine, a disaster which killed 26 men.

Six of these men: Myles Daniel Gillis, Peter Francis Vickers, Roy Edward Feltmate, John P. Halloran, Benny J. Benoit and Angus Joseph MacNeil were from my riding. They and their families deserve answers. Indeed the families of these men have been pressing for months for an adequate investigation into the circumstances leading to this tragedy.

Last May I asked the government why it ignored reports about the risk of spontaneous combustion in the Westray mine and went ahead to guarantee an $85 million loan to that project. Since then the Westray loan has been called in by the Bank of Nova Scotia. Because of its guarantee, the federal government is now liable for anywhere between $75 million and $80 million.

The Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism replied to my question by saying that the federal government had ensured, through constant monitoring by independent mining consultants, that safety regulations were being followed, yet Bank of Nova Scotia officials have denied this.

The minister of state claimed as well that investments like this would continue to be made despite the tragedies. "These things happen", he said. How the Westray accident occurred will be the subject of the provincial inquiry he assured us. Yet both the federal and Nova Scotia governments have been stalling for months saying that everything would come out in the inquiry.

The province dragged its heels while Westray officials have done everything possible to put roadblocks in the path of this investigation. As we all learned last week, the inquiry is effectively dead. Nova Scotia Supreme Court Justice Constance Glube struck down the inquiry because its terms of reference stepped into the area of criminal jurisdiction, prejudicing, she found, the criminal proceedings being undertaken against Westray officials.

What now? How do these questions get answered? On June 9, the Liberal Party called for a federal parliamentary committee of inquiry to examine all aspects of the federal role in the Westray coal project.

That call was repeated on Friday of last week by my colleague, the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond. As my colleague so rightly pointed out, nothing in Justice Glube's decision prevents the federal government from holding its own inquiry. Indeed that inquiry is now more important than ever.

A federal inquiry would examine why the economic and safety advice of civil servants was overruled. It would clarify the federal politics involved in getting the loan guarantee approved.

It would examine just what cabinet knew about the safety concerns prior to authorizing this $85 million guarantee. It would determine why, in the face of well-known considerations of safety concerning this project, this government would put $85 million of taxpayers' money at risk.

These are important questions. They are questions that any government, serious about safety in the work place and about the responsible use of public funds, ought to be deeply committed to having answered.

The time has come for this tired government to finally gather the courage to look within itself and permit a thorough examination of its role in the May 9 Westray tragedy. I hope the parliamentary secretary opposite is now rising to announce just that.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member from Cape Breton Highlands—Canso for his continued interest in this subject.

The hon. member knows that the federal government does not have jurisdiction in the area of occupational health and safety. This is the responsibility of the provincial government. However, the initial environment assessment, the Acres report, did point out the key health and safety concerns associated with coal mines and the methods that the company was putting in place to overcome these concerns. All concerns, including those associated with health and safety, were deemed to be correctable with known technology. Furthermore, the CANMET review spoke briefly of mine ventilation and spontaneous combustion risk and concluded that in spite of these technical uncertainties, the proposal had no major technical failings. The government knew that Westray would have to comply with all appropriate coal mining regulations in Nova Scotia, including those dealing with mine ventilation and spontaneous combustion matters and that regular provincial mine inspections would be carried out.

According to the mine industry, the causes and mechanisms of coal dust explosions are well understood through past research and it is the responsibility of operators and regulators to apply that knowledge base in developing control strategies.

We put in place steps to ensure that the company was in full compliance with the provincial regulatory standards on health and safety. This was monitored on a monthly basis by independent mining consultants. All of these facts were taken into consideration before making the decision to fund the project.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to return again to a question I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare in April of this year. It concerned the measures being taken to address the very alarming findings and recommendations of the International Joint Commission on its Sixth Biennial Report on Great Lakes Water Quality. The report asks: "Are humans and our environment in danger from persistent toxic substances now? Are future generations in danger?" We believe the answer to both questions is yes.

The minister's answer at that time failed totally to respond to the concerns. He gave generalized comments about how the ministry was doing everything it could to protect the health and safety of Canadians, but nothing concrete in terms of responding to the overwhelming condemnation of the discharge of toxic substances into the largest freshwater body on the face of this earth.

We have a commitment, through international agreements, to achieve virtual elimination of the discharge of toxic substances into the Great Lakes. The IJC nonetheless concluded that persistent toxic substances are too dangerous to the biosphere and to humans to permit their release in any quantity.

Notwithstanding that and notwithstanding a report from the Minister of the Environment's own officials that the entire content of organo–chlorines going into our waterways is a toxic substance, the government has failed to act to eliminate the discharge of these substances into our waterways.

The IJC concludes zero discharge means just that, halting all inputs from all human sources and pathways to prevent any opportunity for persistent toxic substances to enter the environment. To prevent such releases completely, their manufacture, use, transport and disposal must stop. They simply must not be available.

I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare, given the damage both to parents and to children from these toxic substances, what action was being taken. The answer was totally unsatisfactory. Zero discharge means zero discharge. That is the only safe level according to these very important conclusions.

I hope that in the response this evening I will receive not a vacuous general statement of good intentions, but some reassurance that in the seven months since I asked that question some concrete actions have been taken to approach zero discharge of toxic substances which damage the health, not only of this generation, but of future generations.

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I listened very attentively to what my colleague said. I would remind her that many programs have been put forward by our environment minister and our government to deal with water quality. We need only think of the very ambitious program to clean up the St. Lawrence. We need only think as well of the amendments to Canadian environmental legislation. We need only think of the new, very strict regulations on dioxins and furans from paper companies in particular. These measures are internationally recognized as courageous action taken by the Canadian government.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, and as the hon. member knows too, environmental awareness necessarily involves better management of toxic wastes. Various countries, as well as Canada, are asking for much more natural products. Of course not only the government but businesses and even the provincial governments are working hand in hand to implement new regulations and adjust to them.

It would be easy and even preferable or desirable if we could snap our fingers and all toxic waste would disappear tomorrow morning. But we have been asked as a government to talk more about the economy. We talk about the economy, but not the economy at any price. We look at everything that can be done in terms of the environment.

Look at the position taken by the Government of Canada at the Rio summit; look at the laws put forward by our government. I just spoke about the law on dioxins and furans, but I am also thinking of the Fisheries Act. The government has done a lot and it has not just been talk. It also spent very considerable amounts of money.

Once again I would simply remind my colleague of the very ambitious plan to clean up the St. Lawrence River which has produced some very concrete results so far.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 38(5), the motion to adjourn the House is deemed adopted.

Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until 10 a.m. tomorrow, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.31 p.m.
