"Far be it from me to cite their example as any justification of any single act of mine. I know I should have very little standing room in your presence if my defence was based on anything so weak as that, but when they say, as they do say, if not directly, certainly inferentially, that we are guilty of certain things, they mean, of course, that these things are wrong. If they are wrong, how are they to justify themselves in relation to matters exactly in the same line which they have done. I say we have done nothing that can in the slightest degree justify the attack which has been made upon us; but I say further that if you charge that these things are wrong, how are your own actions in regard to the same matters; how do you justify them?"

Now, in referring to a matter which it suits hon. gentlemen opposite to deem ancient history, I have always worked upon this maxim, and I have said if you were right how do you turn about now and tell us in the course of a few months that we are wrong in doing the same thing? Consequently, I may remind them that they are preaching and professing what they never seemed to believe when in power. They cannot possibly forget that the Hon. Senator Foster, who is now dead, not only received a contract from the Government, but that the hands of the Ministers were thrust into the Exchequer, and $45,000 of public money taken therefrom and paid to Mr. Foster. Nor can they forget that members of this House owning railways, had many tons of rails loaned to them by the Government in order to enable them to construct their roads. I remember one particular instance in which an hon. gentleman rose in this House and condemned the Government for not giving him the rails; he went back to his constituents and said: "I told Mr. Mackenzie that if he would not give me rails enough to rail my road, I would not support his Government." What was the result? The hon. gentleman got the rails, and he supported the Government. Now, there is not an hon. gentleman opposite who believes that any favor the Government could grant would make me a more ardent supporter than I am. I have always been a Conservative, although I have endeavored to treat my opponents as courteously as possible. But I desire to direct their attention to the opinion of an hon. gentleman, whose opinion they ought to respect, whose opinion they did once respect when he had power and patronage; I refer to the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie). Many hon. gentlemen present must recall, as I recall, sitting in the press gallery at the time, that in 1877 the Speaker of the House was charged with receiving patronage from the Government, and Mr. McLeod, a member from New Brunswick, was charged with receiving $10,000 for transporting rails; what was the defence of the hon. member for East York at that time, when the leader of the present Government made those charges against hon. gentlemen? He said, addressing an audience at Newmarket:

"No language could be too strong to denounce such a statement as this. I recollect reading an incident related of a man who was known to be a very profane swearer. He was taking a load of pumpkins up a long hill, when some boys came up from behind, took out the tailboard of the waggon. His horses sprung forward, and he looked back to see all his pumpkins rolling down the hill. He sat speechless, and the boy said: 'Why don't you swear?' 'I can't; why, no language can do justice to the occasion.' No language, I say, can be put in the mouth of man to denounce so shameless a piece of political profligacy—to denounce such a speech as that from a gentleman in his high position—a statement so scandalous in its conception, so infamous in its utterance."

At that time the present leader of the Government was arraigning the existing Government for its offences against the Independence of Parliament Act. The hon. member for East York further said:

"Let him name a member or a man who, as he says, was bought by the giving of a contract. Surely he does not refer to the case of Mr. Anglin, for, as every one knows, I had no firmer and few abler supporters in Parliament than the member for Gloucester from the moment I first took office. We had worked together in almost everything since I sat in Parliament; and it is a curious thing if one is to be obliged to buy one's staunchest friends."

The Reform party were jubilant over this maxim; but to-day, ready to turn with any fashionable gale, they condemn those who, not in their own interests, but in the interest of the constituencies they represent, are endeavoring to advance public enterprises by expending a portion of the surplus an active and industrious Conservative Government have rolled up. We are to be condemned as criminals by hon. gentlemen opposite, who placed on the Statute-book the very law that allows members of Parliament to be shareholders in corporations which secure patronage from the Government; they are prepared to assume a virtue though they know they have it not. Now, Sir, what is the truth with regard to this Independence of Parliament Act? We have been lectured to-night about it, and have been told how wrong it was. I ask hon. gentlemen who put the existing law on the Statute-book, and why they put it there? The Government of the hon. member for East York inserted that clause in the Act—and what for? For the very purpose of allowing hon. gentlemen opposite to participate in profits derived from business done through companies with the Government. And yet, as soon as they were caught, so soon as the public eye was on them, instead of facing the public and admitting they had done wrong, they brazened out the offence and used a powerful majority to bolster up their corrupt cause. This was the provision they placed on the Statute-book:

"This Act shall not extend to disqualify any person as a member of the House of Commons, by reason of his being a shareholder in any incorporated company having a contract or agreement with the Government of Canada, except companies undertaking contracts for the building of public works, and any company incorporated for the construction or working of any part of the Canadian Pacific Railway."

Why was that passed? because Mr. Norris, who was unseated for his offence, was proved guilty of having received $40,000 of patronage from the Government of Mr. Mackenzie, and by whitewashing him, they opened the way for further inroads on the public Treasury, and placed on the Statute-book, this clause which they now blame Conservatives for having transacted business under.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Norris resigned.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. He did resign, but when on a public platform he was accused by Mr. Miller of having a contract with the Government, he denied it, and expressed the wish that his hand might wither before he would sign a contract with the Government; and when the investigation took place in this House, it was found that he might not have signed the contract, but that one of his relatives probably signed it, and he became again a candidate for the representation of the county of Lincoln, and the hon. member for Bothwell knows that. Now, we have been told that this Government has assisted its friends by giving them timber limits. My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior has made it perfectly clear that there has been no favoritism shown towards Conservatives—that Liberals as well as Conservatives have had the opportunity of doing business with the Department of the Interior; but we can remember when that hon gentleman, referred to in this debate as the sturdy and unbending Premier of Ontario, Mr. Mowat, made grants of timber limits to his friends. We can recall when the Hon. R. W. Scott secured the commissionership of Crown Lands under the Administration of Mr. Blake, in consequence of a telegram sent to him from the city of Ottawa, saying, "Do not take anything unless you can get the Crown Lands." So soon as those gentlemen were in power we find that Oliver, Davidson & Co.—Mr. Oliver being at the time a member of the Local Legislature—purchased 24,800 acres in 1872-73 from the Ontario Government in the townships of Blake, Crooks, and Pardee, in the Thunder Bay District, obtaining mineral land at $1 per acre. This did not give them the title to the pine timber; but after the purchase, Mr. Oliver procured an Order in Council allowing the owners of the land to purchase the pine on the property at 50 cents an acre. Oliver, Davidson & Co., availed themselves of this Order, and in October, 1873 it was revoked. Oliver, Davidson & Co. secured their lands at $1 an acre, re-sold them again for some $97,000, and they are held to-day by Mr. Carpenter at $400,000. More than that, I will tell hon. gentlemen that in the case of Mr. Birkett, a wealthy and influential citizen of Ottawa, when he was refused by the present Government a renewal of the lease he had in the disputed territory, on the ground that the dispute between the Ontario and the Dominion Governments was not settled, the secretary and organiser of the Reform party, Mr. Preston, wrote a letter to his father in this city, saying that if Mr. Birkett would give him one-half interest, he would secure the title from Mr. Mowat, and Mr. Birkett could endeavor to settle his matter at this end of the line, so far as the Dominion Government was concerned. That is the manner in which these gentlemen, purists in opposition, deal with the public domain when in office. I regret having to trouble the House, but I do not desire to sit down without showing the unfairness of the attack made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) and the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron). They insinuated that every gentleman who wrote a letter in favor of a constituent or anyone in any part of the country, for the purpose of promoting any transaction the latter might have had with the Department of the Interior, was guilty of corruption. Let hon. gentlemen look back again and see the position in which they place their leader, the hon. member for West Durham, by this contention. We remember that when his party controlled this House, in 1874, he wrote a letter in favor of his friend, Mr. Moore. How he repudiated the charge, how, as a pure-minded statesman and the son of one of the purest men that ever lived, it cut him to the heart to be suspected of anything wrong. What did the right hon. the First Minister say on that occasion? He stated, at once, he believed the transaction was correct, so far as the hon. member for West Durham was concerned. The First Minister had the manliness to stand by the member for West Durham. Then that hon. gentleman wrote:

"My Dear Mackenzie,—David Moore, of Walkerton, asks me to inform you that he is about to tender for the Goderich works, and I do so accordingly. I told my friend Moore that an introduction was unnecessary, as you would let the work fairly without respect of person."

Mr. IRVINE. Tell us all about the Pacific scandal too; tell us the whole of it.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I promised to refer to the Glasgow scandal, but I certainly do not desire to detain the House. I can assure the hon. gentleman that the two men who made surveys with regard to the amount of timber on the hon. gentleman's land which was sold in Glasgow, are doing well and growing fat under the Ontario Government. See how fairly the right hon. the First Minister acted with the hon. member for West Durham at that time, and that hon. gentleman proudly quoted the words which the right hon. the First Minister had said in his behalf. This was the language used by the First Minister:—

"The letter written by the hon. Minister of Justice was highly creditable to him—it was a letter which Mr. Moore had a right to ask from him. Mr. Moore supported the hon. Minister of Justice as the candidate for North Bruce in 1867. He was, therefore, a friend of the hon. gentleman, and had a right to receive a letter stating all the hon. gentleman could honestly state. The hon. Minister of Justice was not in any way personally responsible for the loss of those $29,000 to the country."

Mr. MILLS. I would like the hon. gentleman to say whether he does not know that his leader afterwards withdrew that statement and reiterated the charges made by his followers against Mr. Blake.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I am not aware what subsequent evidence was produced to change the opinion of the First Minister, but I can simply say that taking the charge as it came up in this House, without investigating it, he was willing to absolve the hon. member for West Durham, while hon. gentlemen opposite attack us without giving us an hour's notice, and on the flimsiest possible foundation. I am sorry to have detained the House so long, but must say in concluding that never since I have entered Parliament have I known what it was to receive one dollar of public money improperly; never have I received one dollar of public money for services rendered to any corporation, and when I hear these charges made, naturally enough feel indignant, knowing what I have done, knowing I am a poor man, that I have kept my honor as a member of the House of Commons clear and spotless.

Some MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. Hon. gentlemen may sneer. It is the nature of some human beings not to know what honesty is, not to believe public men can be honest; and when I meet that class of men, I am prone to be very suspicious of their character. So far as I am concerned, and so far, I believe, as my brother members are concerned, the charges of hon. gentlemen are groundless. If they have any direct charges to make, let them formulate them where we can meet them. It is not fair, while the lips of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Beaty) are closed, to allow the evidence of irresponsible men without this House, men suspected of perjury, whose testimony would not be accepted in any court of law, to go against the solid opinion of Parliament. Hon. gentlemen may themselves be in power some day——

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I do not insinuate that the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Cook) will ever live to see that day, or that the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Irvine), will live to see it; but the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), and some other of the younger members may, and as hon. gentlemen opposite put utterances on record at one period that come up against them now, so will the record of their utterances to-day come up against them in the future. I say it is only right to deal honestly between man and man, to have courtesy towards one another, and if we have done wrong, let hon. gentlemen arraign us before a committee of the House. Knowing hon. gentlemen on this side, I believe them to be as guiltless and as fair-minded as men can be, and so far as I am concerned, I make my own statement, not because I believe any hon. member has not the right to purchase lands and to lease lands or timber limits, but simply to show upon what a fragile basis the charges are supported. Whenever hon. gentlemen opposite choose to prefer those charges, let them give us notice, and they will find that we are prepared to defend our character at five hours' or two hours' notice; but it is unfair for the hon. member for West Huron to travel through the country making statements which we have no opportunity of denying, and in so far as the hon. member for West Simcoe (Mr. Cook) is concerned, we are absolutely indifferent as to whether he speaks or does not. My own impression is that if we could induce him to make a tour through Canada, we would sweep the entire constituencies.

Mr McCARTHY. I certainly do not propose at this hour of the morning to debate the question which is before the House. I rise simply to make a personal explanation. It will be very brief, and I trust sufficiently so to allow my hon. friends on both sides to listen to it. With regard to the charges made, not so much here as in the newspaper press, that I was interested in timber limits, or grazing lands, or coal lands, I have only to give these charges a most distinct and positive denial. I never applied for either one or the other, either for coal lands, timber lands, grazing lands or anything else, either for myself or for anyone else with whom I was interested, either directly or indirectly. In any form of words I can put it, I desire to state that I had nothing whatever to do in any way, shape or form in obtaining a timber limit or anything else in the North-West. That I applied for my constituents from to time I do not deny. If that is a crime, I plead guilty to it. As to the other matter in regard to which the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) has made a statement, which he shows the most perfect ignorance about, which has evidently been placed in his hands, and which he has not taken the trouble to investigate, I think I have a right to complain. I think, before a charge is made against a member of the House, the member who makes the charge should endeavor to satisfy himself as to the particulars and nature of the transaction. But I am safe in saying the hon. member did not know what he was talking of, and did not understand it in the slightest degree. It is evident, however, that the policy which has been adopted by the Opposition, since everything else has failed, is to slander indiscriminately, to slander every man, whether there be any truth in it, or any ground or pretence for it or not. They know they are safe under the privileges of Parliament to make their charges, which they know they dare not make outside of Parliament, or in any other way. In regard to this particular matter, the charge is so grotesque and so absurd as almost to refute itself. The history of it is simply this: When the Government determined finally to give a bonus to the road which was connecting the railway system of Ontario with Callander, they determined to give it to the Ontario and Pacific Junction, or rather to the Northern Pacific Junction Railway Company with which I was connected, simply on the condition that it was leased to the Northern and the Hamilton Railway Companies, which formed the connecting links between Gravenhurst and the cities of Toronto and Hamilton. Since that time, I have had only a nominal connection with the road. It is true I am the president of it, and if the House will bear with me I will explain how that position was offered to me, but I have had nothing more than the barest nominal interest in the road. With regard to the bonus, it was made over to the contractors as their price or a portion of their price for building the road, the balance of the money which was to be paid them was to be paid in bonds. The only bonds that have been issued have been issued to the contractors on account of their price for building the road. The only bonds which are to be issued are for that purpose and for the purpose of equipping the road. No bond or the proceeds of any bond, or the proceeds of any bonus, has gone into my pocket or any of my associates, or, as far as I know and believe, into the pockets of any of the gentlemen who are interested in the enterprise. The bonus is taken up substantially by the two railway companies, the Northern representing two-thirds and the Hamilton representing one-third. The road is built by these companies with the bonus which the Government granted, as it granted a bonus to the Canada Central Company, and upon these bonds issued to the contractors, and now held by banks on behalf of the contractors. As to my position as president, it is really a matter with which this House need not concern itself very much, and I am almost ashamed to trouble it with a matter so purely personal and with which, I am sure the House will agree with me when they have heard my statement, it has no concern whatever. The history of it is this: When the Hamilton and the Northern roads, the one representing the city of Toronto and the other the city of Hamilton, agreed to take the road over as they did, there was a certain rivalry between the two companies and the two cities, and it was arranged that the board should be composed of four representatives from each city and from each road, four from Toronto and four from Hamilton. I was to be the ninth director, occupying the position of president in order to see that between the two companies and the two cities there should be fair play. So necessary was that felt to be that, when I had to go to England in 1884, I resigned my position as president and Mr. Charles Moss, of Toronto, was appointed to fill my place. He did fill my place, and he was the person who actually signed the contract, and I assumed my position on my return. The only object in my holding that position, is to see that there is fair play between these two rival roads and these two rival cities in the matter which has to be dealt with in the lease of the road and the building of it, and so on. I ought to say a word in regard to Mr. Stuart, whose name is mentioned here. Mr. Stuart is not a member of the Conservative party. Mr. John Stuart, of Hamilton, is a leading and well-known Reformer, but I feel I have a right to speak for him in this matter, and I am safe in saying that he has not, nor has any other gentleman in connection with that road, pocketed one cent or one dollar illegitimately or improperly. I know, because I am interested on behalf of that road between them and the contractors just now, and so I happen to know more about it at this moment than I have for some time. There have been disputes between the board and the contractors, because they think the contractors have not handed over the sections as they should have done, from time to time, while the contractors claim that they are entitled to hold the whole road until it is built. There is no further dispute between them, and I know that for the money which the contractors are getting, and the sum which will be spent in equipping this road, the bonds will be issued and for nothing else. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Lister) whom I see now in his place, who made this charge, ought not I think to have made it under the circumstances, and considering the relations between us in the past, he ought not to have taken that course without a better knowledge of what he was speaking. Had some members done so I would not have minded it, but from him I did not expect it, and I think he ought not to have adopted it and to have made the charge. It is utterly and entirely without foundation, and I give it the most entire and absolute contradiction.

Mr. DESJARDINS. I must say that I regret that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has thought it his duty to make such sweeping charges against the House in general. The system that he has been denouncing may have led to some abuses. I do not know of any system that cannot lead to any abuses by designing persons, but from that to making such a condemnation as he has wanted to have the House register against the system which has obtained for a certain number of years, I think there is a distance which we must pause before passing over. I for my part cannot entertain the opinion that some of the hon. members on this side of the House seem to entertain on the general character of the members of this House. It is a well known fact that, on account of the special condition of the country, with a small proportion having undertaken the task of developing its immense territory, members of Parliament are expected, public men are expected, to do many things, to promote many useful enterprises that would suffer if they were not to be promoted by public men having the confidence of the country. When you have to take some 300 men who are supposed to be the most prominent, commanding the trust and confidence of the country, to bring them to fill seats in the House of Commons and in the Senate, if you prevent those men engaging in any public undertakings calculated to promote the welfare of the country, you are doing a great injury to the country itself. Hon. members have been charged with making applications to the Government not only on behalf of themselves, but even on behalf of their friends and constituents. Well, Sir, this is the first time that I have heard it was a crime in members to perform one of the duties of their mission. A member is the representative of his constituents; he is considered as the intermediary between them and the Government. It is through him the electors expect to obtain anything of advantage to them; and if a member is to be prevented from taking advantage of his position to make application for the people he represented for timber limits, railway subsidies, or anything of public or local interest under the special invitation of our own legislation, his position would be useless. The position of a member is not only to record votes for or against the Government, but after the Session is over he is supposed still to continue to look after the interest of his county and the country in general. Some members have been charged with procuring railway subsidies from the Government. I must at once admit that I am one of the culprits, I happen to be a shareholder and director in a railway company known in our district as the Chemin de fer du Curé Labelle, that is, a railway that is to start from St. Jérôme, pass over the Laurentian range to the Ottawa Valley, and bring the increasing population of that important region into communication with the commercial centres. A subsidy has been granted to this railway, and although it is apparently a large one, yet when compared with the amount of work which must be done, it has proved to be so insufficient that no contractor has been found who would undertake the construction of the railway, under the conditions established by the Government. It reminds me of a remark of my late lamented friend from Maskinongé (Mr. Houde), who, when speaking of the subsidies granted by the Government, said that they, in the majority of cases, would prove to be illusory because insufficient. The fact is that millions of dollars have been voted by this Parliament within a few years to open new districts of country, through the construction of new lines of railways, so as to open them to colonisation, work their mines to give an impetus to commerce, and still many of those railways are not yet constructed, for the reason that contractors dare not undertake them with the aid at present offered. Only a small sum has been paid out of the large amounts voted in some particular lines, because in most of the other cases the help granted by the Government, was insufficient to enable the promoters to build it. I think that unless the hon. member for North Norfolk is able to point to some particular act wherein the Government have unduly influenced members of this House, it would be unjust and unfair to ourselves to pass his motion. We would lead the public to believe that the men they have sent here to represent them are a corrupt lot, who look only after their own interest to the neglect and detriment of the interests of their constituents. Under these circumstances I feel it my duty to vote against the motion.

Mr. COOK. I much admired the ingenious way in which the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), answered the charges made against him. He said he could assure this House that he had sold no bonds, and had pocketed no money, but he did not say that he was a one-third shareholder in the stock of the Northern Pacific and Junction Railway to the extent of $182,000, out of the total capital stock of the company of $200,000.

Mr. McCARTHY. If I did not say so then, I say so now.

Mr. COOK. Well, Sir, your name is down, it is on a return brought down to this House a short time ago.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is not correct.

Mr. COOK. I will read the names of the parties on that return :

"Samuel Barker, Adam Brown, C. J. Campbell, Wm. Joice, John Procter, Hon. F. Smith, John Stuart, Hon. James Turner, Hon. F. Smith, John Stuart, Dalton McCarthy."

Mr. McCARTHY. "In trust," read the whole of it, please.

Mr. COOK. Not in trust.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes.

Mr. COOK. It is not so stated in the return, it is very easy to have it in trust for yourself. The hon. gentleman did not say that he was not receiving $5,000 as president of this road.

Mr. McCARTHY. I was not charged with it.

Mr. COOK. He did not say that he was receiving money for being solicitor of this railway.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am not the solicitor of the road.

Mr. COOK. I did not say you were. I say it has been charged against you that you received money as president of this road.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not deny that.

Mr. COOK. Now I am satisfied. I did not know but that you were solicitor for the company. I know that you are after a good many little pickings. I remember the time when that hon. gentleman in Simcoe held up his hands in holy horror at the Mackenzie Administration, and said that men who would do these things were not worthy to be the people's representatives. We, however, find the hon. gentleman at the very first opportunity coming to this House and engaging in the acts he had condemned. What will the people of Simcoe think of it, for probably they will hear of it? The hon. gentleman caused a large number of circulars to be placarded against me at the last election, in regard to a timber limit they said I got in the North-West. The hon. gentleman was very anxious to show the electors the wrong side of the shield. He wanted to make it appear that I had committed an illegal act. I am fortunately or unfortunately a lumber merchant, and it is necessary for me to have lumber standing to cut in order to carry on my business. I purchased my limits from the Ontario Government, and they are sold by public auction. I never got or asked from the Government of Ontario a single tree that I did not buy at public auction. I am opposed to the principle of granting timber limits except by public auction. I have stated that before and I will repeat it on every platform when I have the opportunity. But the hon. gentleman who knows nothing about lumbering, and men who do not know a tree from a saw log, went to the North-West and got timber limits—lawyers, doctors, clergymen, tailors and every other class of the community got timber limits. What did they do with them? They try immediately to sell them. They never attempt to work the limits. Lumbermen who get limits have a right to them. A night or two before Sir John A. Macdonald resigned in 1873, what did he do? He wrote three letters to three different parties, in which he said they could have timber limits in what is now known as the disputed territory. When Mr. Mackenzie came into power I saw the letters. He consulted me in regard to the matter, because I happened to be a lumberman. Those limits were granted to those parties because Mr. Mackenzie felt he was in duty bound to carry out the acts of his predecessor. Were they Reformers? No, everyone was a Tory. Was Mr. Fuller, of Hamilton, a reformer? No. Was Mr. W. J. Macauley a Reformer?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. COOK. A curious kind of Reformer he was. When Sir John A. Macdonald was defeated in Kingston, did he not travel to Provencher, and then sent a telegram that he had secured the constituency for the Tory leader. Sir John A. Macdonald would not accept, but he telegraphed to Victoria, B.C., for a seat, as he could not get a seat in his own Province where he was best known. I find also that Mr. Quinn, my old opponent, has a timber limit. I asked the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) at what time Mr. Quinn obtained that limit. I do not know whether he had the limit at the very time he was running against me or not. I believe he had. At the same time he was telling my constituents that I was doing a very wrong thing. If he had not the limit at that time, he had it shortly afterwards, for he acquired it soon afterwards, and holds it now. Something was said about my friend from Huron (Mr. Cameron) purchasing land in the North-West. If he has not the right to purchase land when he pays money for it, I cannot understand it. He bought most of it at second hand; if not, he had the right to buy it from the Government. But hon. gentlemen opposite did not buy it—they got it for nothing. Hon. gentlemen got timber limits for nothing, lands for colonisation companies for nothing, and they put these then on the market and traffic in them, and some of them have lost money, and I am mighty glad of it. Hon. gentlemen opposite should do as well as they can because I do not believe they will be let off scot free if the Grits get into power as they will do whenever an election takes place. The handwriting is on the wall. I see another friend of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is down as getting a timber limit —Dr. Kirkland, who is one of the men going to be a candidate. The hon. member (Mr. McCarthy) is getting tired of the constituency; the truth is he is being driven from the constituency by the nomination of the Hon. Mr. Anglin and he feels his chances are waning. His brother has been made a judge; his brother-in-law has been made a judge. I will not go into family matters. It is well known that the people of the riding are looking about. Only the other day a gentleman said to me: "I wanted to get the position of collector of Customs at Penetanguishene, but Mr. McCarthy wrote me to the effect that they wanted to get a man who knew something about the business He was a first-class bookkeeper and an intelligent man, a man as capable of performing the Customs duties as the hon. gentleman himself. He was refused because he was not intelligent enough, but the position was given to a young man who was not of age, and they had to wait until he became of age. He was the son of a wealthy man, one of the nabobs, one of the blue blood. The Government must distribute their honors to their friends, although the poorer classes do not like it, and as regards the member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) they say he is not the boy for Galway. The hon. gentleman is now seeking a seat in Toronto, where he is building a house; and although he left Simcoe under circumstances that were not very favorable, no-doubt with the Government grants he is in a more favorable position. One day, in the Session of 1877, I had occasion to go into the Surveyor General's Department to get some maps to send away to my constituents. Colonel Dennis said: Why do you not go up and get a timber limit? I replied that I did not want a timber limit in the North-West. There were no railways. The place where the limits were selected were 1,000 miles from Winnipeg, and it was of course no easy task to go in there. You had to take your machinery down the Red River from the Northern Pacific Railway and cart it across a distance of 900 or 1,000 miles.

Mr. McCALLUM. You had three years in which to do it.

Mr. COOK. Certainly; it required that time to do it. The Minister of the Interior has made the statement on several occasions that is untrue, and I state in my place that I can prove it to be untrue, just as the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) proved that one of the hon. gentleman's statements was untrue on another occasion. It is highly improper for hon. members in this House to make statements that are false. This was in the spring of the year, and I knew I could not spare the time and would not bury myself in that wilderness. I made arrangements with one of the managers, and I then wrote to the Minister, making application, and I got a reply which I shall read before I sit down. It has been said there were no conditions, but there were conditions. The extent of the limits was 100 miles, but mine were joined with Mr. Sutherland's by the Order in Council, making it 200 miles, and I did not object. We were to pay $3,000 bonus. When the Government took it away from me, they gave it to Nicholas Flood Davin, who is a lumberman, of course, at $2.50 per mile. They gave it to him for $500, but they would not let me have it for $3,000. I was to cut the timber and have everything in operation in three years. I was not to charge over $25 to $35 per 1,000 feet, the current price being $35 to $40 per 1,000 feet, as the Government were anxious to have lumber sold cheaply to the settlers to encourage the settlement of the country. Colonel Dennis was anxious about the matter; he was, I believe, a good Conservative and he said that they must get some one who could manufacture lumber, that they must have a man of capital.

Mr. COOK.

Mr. McCALLUM. Where was that?

Mr. COOK. It was west of Edmonton.

Mr. McCALLUM. Did you select it yourself?

Mr. COOK. Partially. We spent $6,000, and I put on our men until we discovered that the Order in Council had been made inoperative. I telegraphed and wrote to Sir John A. Macdonald, and it was stated that the reason it was inoperative was because we were idle and were not doing anything. Sir John A. Macdonald would not allow me to retain it on any consideration. It was not the first time he showed his hostility to me, but I could live without him and beyond him; I know that he and his friends have carried their hostility into private life but I do not care.

Mr. McCALLUM. Did you select the 200 miles in one block or where?

Mr. COOK. The timber of that country grows in clusters, and when I made application I made it on the same terms as others. When I came to look at the applications made by other gentlemen I found it was three square miles in a block.

Mr. McCALLUM. Do you mean Mr. Davin?

Mr. COOK. No, I am not talking about Mr. Davin. You cannot bother me even if you get up your old mud scow with $8,000 damages. Then, Sir John A. Macdonald's Government allowed Mr. Macaulay and three other applicants to whom he gave limits the very night before he resigned to select it in three mile belts. The Government insisted that it should be twenty mile belts and that it should not be any more, because there was a large portion of the country on which there was no timber, and there was no necessity for licensing that, and I agreed with them. Now, I do not ask for any favors in this matter; if I had wanted to act sharply I could have made application in the name of some person else, but I did not want to steal anything; I wanted to operate a mill and make lumber, which was my legitimate business. But what did this Government do? They locked up the whole country for the benefit of their friends and their personal gain. I look upon it that I was a member of Parliament when I got the license, and that it was my legitimate business as my constitutents quite understand. On the 14th May, 1878, I wrote to the Hon. Mr. Mills, Minister of the Interior, this letter:

"MIDLAND, 14th May, 1878.

"HON. D. MILLS,
"Minister of the Interior, Ottawa,

"DEAR SIR,—I have the honor to make application to you for a timber limit, say for 100 square miles, to be selected and surveyed at my cost, in the vicinity of the Saskatchewan River, between Edmonton and the Rocky Mountains. My object in obtaining this is for legitimately manufacturing and supplying lumber, shingles, &c., &c., to the settlers on prairie lands in the territories to the east.

"As you are aware, the supply of timber fit for making lumber, in Manitoba and the territories south of the river mentioned, is so limited that unless the Government facilitates to every reasonable extent the views of men having capital, and accustomed to the lumber business, who are willing to develop the large timber district known to exist west of Edmonton, the price of timber must be such, for years, as to operate powerfully against the settlement of the country. I now, therefore, respectfully urge the concession of the above privilege, requesting one year from the 1st of July next, in which to make my selection, and to furnish you with the plan and description of the limit, when I will be prepared to accept the same on such terms as the Government may, under all the circumstances, and considering the great expenses of taking machinery to such a great distance, may consider reasonable."

When I mention one year, I would make the selection in one year, but it would take two years to get the mill into operation. On the 6th of June following, I received this reply from the Department:—

"I have the honor by direction of the Minister of the Interior in reference to your application dated the 14th ultimo, for a timber limit of one hundred square miles to be selected and surveyed at your cost in the vicinity of the Saskatchewan, between Edmonton and the Rocky Mountains, the same having had the consideration of the Minister of the Interior, I am directed to inform you that under certain conditions, he would be disposed to recommend the same to the favorable consideration of the Privy Council.

"As the great object of encouraging a proposal of this nature is to cheapen the price of lumber to settlers in the Territories, the Minister would desire to receive an assurance from you, that whereas he understands that at present the price of lumber at the mills in Prince Albert is from $35 to $45, you should agree not to charge more at your mills than from $25 to $35 which he considers would be very profitable rates. In case the limit should be conceded you, a certain bonus per square mile would be required, in addition to which you would require to conform to the terms and conditions as regards payments of ground rent and royalty as set forth in section 51 of the Dominion Lands Act, a copy of which is herewith transmitted."

Now, sub-section 5 of section 51 of the Dominion Lands Act states: That a man must pay in addition to the bonus an annual ground rent of $2 per square mile, and further a royalty of 5 per cent on his monthly account. That is contained in the Statutes of 1872, and it is in the Dominion Lands Act to-day, and these gentlemen disregard it. They charged us $15 a mile as bonus, an annual ground rent of $2 a square mile, and a royalty of 5 per cent. on the monthly account, that is, on the gross receipts on the money invested, and not the net profits.

Mr. McCALLUM. Will you tell us where you were going to sell the lumber?

Mr. COOK. I was going to sell it on the Saskatchewan.

Mr. McCALLUM. You were not going to take it to Glasgow?

Mr. COOK. No, we send other kind of lumber there; we send logs there, something like yourself. I will tell you something about Glasgow. A company in Scotland had a limit on a reserve west of Owen Sound for which they paid a large amount, and the moment this Government got into power and found that I was the manager of that company they cancelled the limit. The company paid $60,000 for that limit.

Mr. McCARTHY. Whom did they pay the $60,000 to?

Mr. COOK. To several companies that they purchased it from; I am not able now to give the list. I want to say that this system of granting limits by this Government extends not only to the North-West; there is not a limit all along the Georgian Bay in the Province of Ontario that has not been put under license at a nominal sum; and some of the constituents of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) in the town of Collingwood, have been faring very well by them. Mr. Long, Captain Campbell, and Mr. Charles Cameron, have been figuring to a large extent. I believe there was one limit last year that was granted to them by this Government at a nominal sum of $15 or $20, and they sold it a week after they got it for $15,000. I am not sure of the amount they paid, but I know that it was a nominal sum. I do not suppose my hon. friends would do it, but there have been gentlemen who get commissions on sums of money that are made out of the country by granting licenses to their friends.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name, name.

Mr. COOK. If you want the name it was the member for Lincoln; he is not here. I have had occasion to refer before to the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) in this House, but seldom could find him here. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) said it was a shame that I should attack the hon. member for North Simcoe in his absence, but I told the hon. gentleman that I had met him on four occasions in Simcoe, and on three I had made him touch the beam pretty lively, and if he has ever an opportunity to cross my path again in any constituency, he will touch it higher than he ever did before; he will go as high as Gilderoy's kite. The junior member for Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh) made a speech, but I do not think I shall pay any attention to that, because the speech did not amount to anything. He simply made criminations and recriminations, stating some things, and apparently did not know what he was talking about. I know in one case he did not know what he was talking about, and that was when he referred to a place called New Glasgow, and the hon. member for Monck took it up.

Mr. McCALLUM. I have been in New Glasgow before.

Mr. COOK. No doubt.

Mr. McCALLUM. Yes; and I can go there again, too.

Mr. COOK. Do doubt you could, but I do not think the hon. gentleman could ever get away again. They would put him in a glass case because he would be quite a curiosity there now. I want now to go a little further with this. I want to show the opinion of Mr. Dennis on this matter. This is a memorandum written on the 21st May, and it shows the recommendation he made to the Department after the conversation I had with him:

"Referring to Mr. Cook's application for a timber limit, as set forth in his communication of the 14th instant, the undersigned begs respectfully to remark that he considers that it would be very much calculated to encourage the formation of settlement on the line of the Saskatchewan, if facilities were afforded for obtaining lumber at a reasonable price.

"The undersigned has been given to understand that the price of lumber at Prince Albert is from $35 to $45 per thousand, and shingles at $6.50 per bundle.

"The undersigned is convinced that a reasonable competition would reduce the price of lumber to from $25 to $35 per thousand, and the price of shingles in proportion, and if Mr. Cook or any other capitalist accustomed to the manufacturing of lumber would undertake to supply settlers along the line of the Saskatchewan within those figures, it would appear to him that the Government should facilitate such person being placed in a position to do so, by a grant of a timber limit upon reasonable conditions.

"Respectfully submitted,
(Signed) "J. S. DENNIS,
"Surveyor-General."

Now follows the Order in Council, and, as I said before, we sent our men up there. They were sent by Mr. Sutherland and myself, and we expended a large sum of money, $6,000, and deposited copies of the accounts in the hands of the Government to the amount of $4,000. We, therefore, went on with the locating in good faith and with the result you know.

Mr. BOWELL. Read the Order in Council.

Mr. COOK. There is no parellel between this case and that of hon. gentlemen who hold positions in this House, and go into enterprises they know nothing about; men who embark in railway speculations, who get stock and money out of these railways for the use of their position and influence in this House and the Government. I am told that several members of Parliament, in the case of the Northern Pacific Junction Railway, share in the profits, and that one member pocketed $50,000 as his portion. It is hardly possible that these gentlemen would vote against the Government, supposing there was another Pacific scandal. I appreciate hon. gentlemen who have risen in their places and made statements; they are good, strong party men. I am satisfied the junior member for Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh) is a good party man, and that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is a good party man; but as for the latter it is said he is not quite in accord with the policy of the Administration. I do not know whether it is on this account or because he wants to go in a little deeper. I am told, however, that he does not think, and some others do not think, the Old Man is running the machine to suit them; but this, of course, is only a rumor. No doubt other hon. gentlemen are good party men, safe to support the Government by all means through good and evil report. If they were members of an election committee I am quite sure they would not convict any hon. member who might be brought up for offences of which they are guilty themselves. I would be surprised, for instance, to find the hon. member for Simcoe

(Mr. McCarthy) declare that the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. White) should be released f om blame. I would like to know if the gentleman who is president of a company, who has such influence with the board that he can relegate his position to another man and go on a tour to the Old Country for either gain or pleasure, gave the party who acted in his behalf the money he was entitled to, at the rate of $5,000 a year. Men in that position will not convict a man who is guilty of the same crime, and that was the reason the leader of the Government in 1873, when he committed that act by which the whole world was shocked, his friends, his honest Conservative friends, in the House then, the independent Conservatives, said: We cannot stand by you, we cannot vote for you; but there are acts as bad as that today. Will you tell me there is a gentleman in possession of one of these chartered companies, a gentleman who gets stock in these companies, or who gets $5,000 a year for being president of a company, who will go back on the Old Man? No, they are bound hand and foot; they are slaves; they are not independent men, and they will find that out when they go to their constituencies, they will hear tell of it when they go for re-election.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. COOK. It is all very fine; gentlemen may laugh, they may talk, they may chirp like unmentionable animals, but it is not going to drown the effect of this thing. Do you mean to tell me if the whole electorate of the Province of Ontario or the Dominion of Canada were here at the present time, and saw the action of these men like children, like boys, they would not be ashamed of them? Do you think they would not go back to their homes and friends and say: We are going to send common sense men to Parliament? The time is coming. Oh, yes, Sir. Now the hon. member the Minister of the Interior—I am sorry he is not in his place—has been going through the country making statements which are untrue. He goes to one place and he iterates the statements; he goes to another place and reiterates them, and some people believe them. Yes, some people who do not know him believe his statements, and it is an unfortunate thing for the country, because the papers of the country are so bound up, are so subsidised that they cannot give an honest expression of what is going on. They are also bound with the members of this House, and there is not a paper on the Conservative side of any consequence but is subsidised, and the political articles that appear in these papers are dishonest.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. COOK. I say the honest articles that should appear in these papers do not appear there; they are dishonest; and the people do not in their own organs get an expression of what is right and what is wrong. What do you think of the Montreal Gazette? What do you think of the Belleville Intelligencer? Why, the hon. the Minister of Customs cocks his ears up as if he was the editor of that paper. I do not for a moment intend to accuse him of having an interest in that paper. No; I do not think he has. I will trust you, anyway. Now, I only want to deal with one more gentleman. When the member for Cardwell via Montreal, got up and attempted to attack me, he said it was a vile thing on my part to take a timber limit, but he turned round to his friend, the member for Russell, and said: "My friend, Mr. Dickinson, who is an old established lumberman, has a right to have timber limits." Well, I do not know how long he has been lumbering. My impression is that he is not lumbering now. Are you?

Mr. DICKINSON. Since 1852, unceasingly, more or less.

Mr. COOK. The last time I heard of him he was lumbering in spools. He had a little turning lathe run by a four-horse power machine. I have no doubt that he is so wedded to the lumber trade that he will stick to it like old Mr. Marsh after his failure, who had been a lumberman, and who was found one day shaving shingles. He was asked what he was doing now, and he said: "I am in the lumber trade, and I am going to remain there even if I have to get down to wooden toothpicks." I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has got down to wooden toothpicks yet, but he has two timber limits which are of wonderful value, for he professes that they have four hundred millions of timber on them.

Mr. DICKINSON. False.

Mr. COOK. That is the statement. He came to a party in Toronto to sell it, and when he was talking about the enormous amount of lumber on that limit—he was talking to a lumberman, mind you—when he saw Professor Macoun's report, which was given to him no doubt for no other purpose than to endeavor to sell his timber limit, stating that there were four hundred millions of timber on 100 miles—he got one limit for himself of fifty miles and one for his son, he could not get it all in one name, because Sir John had declared that he would not give more than fifty miles to one person; he changed that in order to get an excuse to cancel my timber limit. Well, he stated that there were four hundred millions on the two limits, and, when he said that, that party in Toronto cooly said: "I cannot have anything to do with it." He was not talking to the marines. It is impossible for four hundred millions of timber, of spruce, to grow on 100 miles in this country. The statement was falsified, and he was going about with a false statement supplied by Professor Macoun of the Geological Department of this Government, he was going about trying to make people believe there was more timber on that limit than there was. He approached the hon. member for Welland, so he stated; he went all the way to Niagara Falls to try and sell it. Then he said, if they would take half interest, he would sell for $10,000. And it had four hundred millions of timber on it. Why, if it was worth a cent, it was worth $400,000, and he was willing to sell one-half for $10,000. I would not refer personally to matters of this kind, but gentlemen say he is immaculate; he is entitled to have timber limits, he is a lumberman—in making spools; and then he tried to get rid of that limit by nothing more nor less than a fraud, and I characterise it as such.

Mr. SPROULE. Many members of this House are charged with very serious and grave offences. As I am one who is included in these charges, I think I have a right to make an explanation and defend myself in this House, especially as the charges are made by an hon. gentleman who was last year in his place in the House when the subject was referred to by the Globe, and when, on a question of privilege, I distinctly denied any connection with the charges made. I think, if an hon. gentleman who holds his place in the House, and by virtue of his position we are bound to call him honorable, will not accept that, but will go out into the country and repeat it, we are not entitled to call him honorable. I have in my hand a copy of the Globe, of the 12th January last, giving a report of a speech by M. C. Cameron at Wingham, in which he read charges against Conservative members of Parliament. I am spoken of in the following language:—

"Dr. Sproule represents East Grey in the Commons. His brother was an applicant for a timber limit in the North-West. Another relative, a brother I believe, is one of the corporators in the Farmers' North-West Land and Colonisation Company, and he is mixed up with one Graham, for a timber limit of fifty square miles on the Carrot River. Dr. Sproule is but clay in the hands of the chief potter."

Now, only a few days ago, when a libel suit was brought against that paper, its managers said that they had been mislead, they were always ready to do justice to anyone who had been maligned or misrepresented in its columns. I wish they had always been as willing to make reparation as they pretended to be then. Now, we are charged in this House in a wholesale manner. There is scarcely a member supporting the Government who is not included in these charges, and my name has been mentioned among others. I will explain the only connection I have had with anything of the kind, either directly or indirectly. Like other members I am obliged to do the work of my constituents when they ask me. When my constituents have asked me to procure post office facilities, I have endeavored to do so; if any of them ask me to apply for timber limits, I did so. Applications have been made to me for that purpose by parties whom I never saw. I gave the post office address of the parties, and put in an application, and I paid no attention to them since. I may say that out of fourteen or fifteen applications that I made, I think twelve of them were for Reformers. One is a Mr. Nelson, who was formely a resident of my riding, a Reformer, and a respectable man, who went to Birtle. He built a grist mill there, and afterwards sold it and went into the timber business, and intended to take up machinery from Ontario with which to build a saw mill. He applied for a timber limit for himself, and in the name of some of his associates whom I never saw. I believe one was a Mr. Graham. I never saw him, but I am told he is a Reformer. I have had no connection directly or indirectly with this limit, and no interest in it. I never had an acre of land in Manitoba or the North-West, except a few town lots which I bought at auction. I never had a relative of mine who got advantages from this Government for any timber limits, or grazing lands, or anything else, directly or indirectly, except for one of my brothers who has been living in Winnipeg for a number of years, associated with a Mr. Wood, whom I never saw, and Mr. Fair, another gentleman who proposed to build a mill somewhere in the North-West. I was written to by Mr. Fair and Mr. Wood to put in an application for them, and I did so, but after a while they decided to abandon it. Mention has been made to-night of a case where an Order in Council was passed. When that Order in Council was passed I think it was sent to the parties, and so far as my impression goes there was nothing more about it. With reference to the other assertion that I have a brother who was an applicant for incorporation connected with a colonisation company, I have no knowledge whatever of it. If it is the case I do not know it, and I am sure it could not have occurred without my knowing something of it. Surveyors have also asked me to apply for them for positions in the North-West; and in obedience to their wish I have written down to the Department, and endeavored to assist them, as any other member of Parliament would do. But in no case whatever have I done anything which could prejudice my independence as a member of Parliament. Now, who makes these charges? They are made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and what is his record in this House? He is a man, the height of whose ambition, it appears to me, is to mix up with scandals of his own manufacture, or to tinker with seduction Bills. The only instance in which he deviated from that, is when he introduced a resolution for shortening speeches, and he is, himself, the greatest violator of that principle. Who is the other member, the one who spoke at Wingham? Mr. M. C. Cameron, and we have all heard what the courts have said of him. The judge said, speaking in reference to his corruption, that he could as readily believe that he might be put down in a lake and taken up dry, as to believe that that man was not connected with bribery in his election. I have a book before me, and what does the record show? When he was brought before the courts, what was the evidence brought out?

Mr. MILLS. The judge does not say so.

Mr. SPROULE. Let the hon. gentleman for Bothwell restrain his philosophy for a little while I have before me a record of the evidence of what his expenses were, and how he gained his election. I have here: "Callendar, $50; expenses at nomination, $25; expenses on election tour, $200." From the information I have received about this man he is recognised as the shylock of his profession in that part of the country. It is a pity for the man who gets into his clutches, for he generally skins him and leaves him nothing. But when it comes to elections, he is very liberal in the cause of Christian churches, he not only tries to bribe the electors, but those who are connected with the House of God. He gave to one church in Erinville, $50; to the church in Freidsburg, $75; to another at Crediton, $50; to the Bayfield church, $25; to the Stanley church, $25; to the Catholic church, $25; in all $250. I find some other items here. A gentleman states that he received $250 to go out and electioneer, and he tells him to keep within the bounds of the law. Another says he has received $500 for the same purpose; another admits he has received $750, and the various items make up somewhere, I think, about $2,075. I believe an estimate that was made by a gentleman, who was acquainted with the facts, that he must have spent somewhere about $10,000 in gaining that election. This is the champion of purity; this is the champion of bribery and corruption, who has lectured this House on every occasion, and refers to what he believes to be a violation of the Independence of Parliament Act. Now, what is the history of that hon. gentleman? a man of whom it was said, he came into the world by accident; who has been pushing his way through life by cheek and abuse of others,——

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. DAVIES. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has been guilty of most unparliamentary and ungentlemanly language.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw that language. It is out of order to speak of an hon. member as coming into the world by accident.

Mr. SPROULE. I said he was credited with it.

Mr. McMULLEN. You did not say so.

Mr. SPROULE. I did.

Mr. McMULLEN. You did not.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentlemen will please address the chair and not continue the personal remarks.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman professed to state the words that he said were to be found in that judgment. I said they were not there. He said they were, and I asked him to read from the judgment the words he used.

Mr. SPROULE. If the hon. gentleman made any such statement, I misunderstood him. I did not say they were in the judgment, for I have not the words of the judgment here. I said they had been brought out in evidence on the trial.

Mr. MILLS. What the hon. gentleman said was this: That the judge had said with respect to Mr. Cameron's conduct he would as soon believe that a man might be dipped into the lake and come out dry as that Mr. Cameron could have done what he did and not be guilty of bribery. I say there are no such words in the judgment.

Mr. WALLACE (York). I have the words of the judgment here, and I will read them:

"There are strong grounds for thinking that the respondent, Malcolm Colin Cameron, was guilty of personal bribery. Had the judge, who tried the case, found the respondent guilty of personal bribery, which would have sustained the judgment. As it is, we will sustain his ruling."

Mr. BOWELL. The remarks applied to the hon. gentleman were applicable to Mr. Walker, of London.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Withdraw.

Mr. SPROULE. Certainly, if I am wrong I withdraw the statement with pleasure, because I do not want to misrepresent anyone. I spoke in regard to the items brought out in the evidence which I have here in my hand, and any hon. member can satisfy himself in regard to them. I say these charges are made by men notorious throughout the country as violators of every principle that they are professing to champion here to-night. I need not say more in regard to those hon. members, because I do not wish to occupy any more time than is necessary. I will say a few words in regard to the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Cook). That hon. gentleman pretended to defend himself here to-night. If there is one man in the Dominion of Canada who ought to be ashamed, and hide his head when timber limits are mentioned, that man is the member for East Simcoe. He is a man who has travelled all over the country and taken the timber off it. He is a man who has had islands in the Georgian Bay bought from the Department of Indian Affairs, and limits in Parry Sound and Georgian Bay districts, on the south shore and north shore in Algoma, in Manitoba and the North-West, and in every instance, he has shown the most unscrupulous disposition in dealing with the parties where he has been operating in lumber, and with those to whom he has sold it. He stated that parties who got timber limits from the Government never intended to work them. They could not do worse than did that hon. gentleman himself, if they sold them to some foreigners and cheated them out of a large amount of money. The poor unfortunate Scotchmen, in Glasgow, who paid him $450,000 have a lively recollection of the hon. gentleman and his timber limits. The hon. gentleman said, in regard to timber limits he held on the Indian peninsula, that the present Government cancelled those limits, because he was president of the company. I say, from some knowledge of those grievances, that it was nothing of the kind. The poor unfortunate settlers who went into that country and located on land, from which they were scarcely able to make a living, were not allowed to cut a stick of timber, for Cook & Co. had a lease to cut every stick of timber. I have in my possession, though not here—I would have had them here if I had known the question would come up to-night—petitions from my constituents praying that the timber license might be cancelled. If they were starving, those poor people could not take a stick and sell it for they were liable to be brought up by Cook & Co., and it was in consequence of representations made to the Government on behalf of those poor unfortunate settlers that the present Government cancelled the lease, and they did it justly. The hon. gentleman, I understand, still holds a lease for a large amount of timber in Manitoulin, and on a number of islands in the Georgian Bay, and a large extent on the north shore, and if there is one man in the Dominion who has a right to hide his head when timber limits or timber speculations are mentioned, it ought to be the member for East Simcoe. If we went into the question of subsidising and supporting railways I could name numbers of hon. gentlemen who were now posing as virtuous men, who have connections with railways. I need not go further than the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). I notice when any Grand Trunk question comes up, that hon. gentleman, because he happens to be president of a branch of the Grand Trunk, about forty-five miles in length, and has had a rather amusing connection with the road, is always ready to champion the Grand Trunk and condemn the Canadian Pacific Railway. Did that connection influence the hon. gentleman's actions? I think it would influence him as much as other hon. members would be influenced by roads running through their constituency in which they were very much interested. I might go on and give several other cases; I do not do it because it is not required. The newspapers have been repeating the charges and members of the Opposition have been reiterating them in the face of a distinct denial. The idea of the Opposition is to "boom" scandal, to reiterate it and to endeavor to press charges home on members so that if possible by sheer force of agitation and persistency the people of the country may be led to believe there is something radically wrong in the condition of the country. It is not because hon. gentlemen opposite are able to prove them or that they believe them. It has been even stated that men were bought by receiving their indemnity, and that it was something wrong. That was on the principle of throwing mud in all directions, with the hope that some would stick. I repeat that hon. gentlemen opposite are making these charges in the belief that by persistency they will make some people believe there is something in them.

Mr. DAWSON. I had intended to say something on this subject a little earlier in the evening, and if I had had an opportunity of speaking I could have shown that the timber limits which hon. gentlemen have spoken of so much have really cost the people who bought them more than they have got or are likely to get out of them. The hon. member for North Norfolk referred to applications for timber limits, but as the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) said just now, one who is in the position of a member must sometimes be a medium of communication between his constituents and the Government; he cannot be otherwise, especially in such a wild district as I represent—not with reference to applications for timber limits alone, but applications for a great many other things as well. The course I have always adopted in such cases, is to mail these applications to the proper Department, to be there dealt with. The hon. gentleman mentioned the name of Mr. Marks, and said that I sent in an application for him, I suppose because he is a very prominent supporter of mine. I remember sending in an application for Mr. Marks, but I forget what particular place that application was for, and I rather think that he did not get what he applied for. At any rate, I had no personal interest in the matter, and I think that the course of throwing out serious charges against members of this House, simply because they had sent in applications of this kind, is discreditable to the hon. gentleman and contrary to what I have hitherto known of the hon. member for North Norfolk. The hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) indulged in a a great deal of the worst kind of abuse and insinuations against members on this side of the House, and then he walked out of the House and was not here when the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) showed, on incontrovertible evidence, that the accusations he made were utterly and entirely wrong, and left the hon. gentleman absolutely branded as a slanderer. He did not wait to answer, and no person has answered the clear and distinct charge which the hon. member for Leeds has made. With regard to these timber berths, it is not simply $250 which has to be paid for them, but a mill which will saw at the rate of 10,000 feet per day, has to be put up. Now, on the whole area which the hon. member for North Norfolk says was granted, this would produce in six months more than 780,000,000 of feet, more than enough to supply all the markets of North America. The fact of the matter is, that many of these parties took up limits, without knowing that the country was bare of timber, and they abandoned them.

Mr. ORTON. I must say that nothing is more plainly proved by the course which hon. gentlemen opposite have taken than the utterly helpless and hopeless condition of their party. The motion was made to give the hon. member for West Huron an opportunity of uttering slanders with regard to members of this House inside of these walls as he had formerly uttered them outside. The hon. gentleman made the following statement in Wingham with regard to myself on the 12th of January, as reported in the Globe:—

"Dr. Orton, the Tory member for Centre Wellington, secured his appointment as physician to the C. P. R., from which he derives an income of $10,000 a year. Like Darby Bergin, Dr. Orton is a versatile genius. He was not satisfied with a princely income received through the C. P. R., he applied for fifteen square miles of timber limits on the Bow River, and fifty square miles elsewhere in the North-West Territories, and in March, 1882, he obtained from the Government 320 acres of rich coal lands. Men under such obligations to the Government; men who share with the Government the odium of dividing up among them the public lands of Canada; men who are particeps criminis with the Government in plundering the country of its most valuable asset, dare not vote against the Government."

Now, with reference to this allegation, all I have to say is this that I never received a salary from the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is true I have a contract with that company by which I was to provide not only medical assistance, but also to build hospitals and supply them with food and bedding during the construction of the railway through the Rocky Mountains. That was a contract entered into with the construction company, and although I may perhaps have made some money last year, yet during the first I lost some $1,500 in consequence of an epidemic of typhoid fever breaking out in the mountains, which necessitated the building of a number of hospitals and extra assistance. Had I been employed by the Canadian Pacific Railway I have only to say that I would not have occupied any worse position than some hon. gentlemen on the opposite side. I believe the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Wells) is to-day paid by the Canadian Pacific Railway, as their solicitor and, perhaps, to some extent, as we have seen, it may influence his vote; but the position I occupy has never influenced my vote. I say that medical men have just as good a right as lawyers have to be employed by a railway company, or any other corporation in such matters. The next charge is that I applied for fifty square miles of timber limits on the Bow River. It is very true there were some limits advertised on the Bow River, which I, in conjunction with another, tendered for. There were a large number of tenders made at the time, and we deposited our cheque in the same way as other tenderers. We did not obtain the limit because our tender was much below that of the party who obtained it. With regard to any other limit in the North-West, it is utterly untrue that I have any other limit, and it is also utterly untrue that I applied for a coal limit or ever obtained one. This is only another instance of the gross falseness of the slanders made by hon. gentlemen opposite against members on this side. I wish to point to the position occupied by the hon. member for West Huron with regard to the lands in the North-West. He undertook to purchase those lands, not by himself, because he knew that it was utterly impossible for any one person under the regulations to buy more than one section, and he bought them through agents who made them over to himself, and he obtained patents for 13,000 or 14,000 acres of land by fraud.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. ORTON. If I am out of order, I will withdraw the assertion; but certainly the regulations at that time did not permit any one gentleman to purchase more than one section of land; and he has acknowledged himself that he became the owner of 13,000 acres. I believe the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) also became the possessor of a large quantity of land in the same roundabout way.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman is utterly wrong. The Government of Mr. Mackenzie did impose such a restriction, and the hon. gentleman's leader abolished it, and at the time he speaks of you might have bought 100,000 acres if you desired.

Mr. ORTON. My recollection is quite different. I cannot recollect the regulations being altered on that point. It certainly never was the intention of the Government to allow parties to become possessed of those large quantities of land, and the only reason they allowed settlers to purchase was that they might be together.

Mr. TUPPER. I will only occupy the attention of the House a moment or two while I refer to a matter that has already been referred to, that is, the extraordinary recklessness and ignorance shown by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) in hurling charges against his fellow members in this House. Two or three instances have been given by hon. members who followed him. I think the charge which he levelled against me will also show the game which the Opposition are playing in this House. It is not a new game by any means; they have played it before—once with tolerable success, which has encouraged them to do it again. But I wish to call attention to the gross ignorance of the hon. member for Lambton. After having voted on the Bill for the construction of the railway from Stellarton to Pictou Town, after having sat in this House during the explanation and discussion of that measure, interrupting speakers by calling out that it was a job, he shows how little attention or thought he gives to matters on which he bases charges of corruption, when to-night he speaks of the Stellarton Branch Railway as a private affair, and as being promoted by a private company, and charges me with being not only a promoter but a shareholder, or as he said, either a shareholder or a promoter. He will be surprised on looking over the votes he has given in this House during the present and the last Session, at learning that he is just as much interested in that railway as I am—that he and I, alike with all the people of Canada, are interested in that railway, because it belongs to the people of Canada. I wish to speak of another matter. Although it was stated in this House, and not denied, that I had severed the connection I had with the North-West Central Railway Company, that I had resigned the position to which I had been elected without my knowledge, and had no connection with the company in any shape or form, the hon. gentleman in order I suppose to string out this long list of imaginary corrupt doings, and to connect me with them, began with that railway company. I simply give that my denial. In conclusion, I would call the attention of the hon. member for South Huron to his experience in by-gone days, and I think he will sympathise to some extent with the party he has forsaken in having now to stand this storm of filthy abuse from their opponents. It does not matter whether a member of Parliament obtains a railway subsidy, a land grant, or a timber limit, so long as it is a reward and the member is working for that reward; and this is the opinion of the Globe of 3rd June, 1869, of that hon. gentleman, and I ask him to sympathise with us. The Globe alluded to him as "one of Sir John's most docile followers, who hoped that his leader would, at some time, reward him with a Cabinet office." I think that reminiscence for the hon. gentleman is appropriate to-night.

Mr. HAGGART. I intend to take up the time of the House only for a few moments for the purpose of correcting some of the charges made by the member for North Norfolk against me. He stated that I was an applicant for a coal lease of 320 acres of land. I give that an explicit denial. I never was an applicant for a coal mine or a coal lease or any acres of land in which there was a coal mine. Another charge he made against me was that I promoted the application of a friend of mine, Mr. McLaren, for a limit of twenty-six miles on the Turtle River. There was an application made for such a timber limit jointly by Mr.

McLaren and Dr. Sinclair, and I simply sent to the Department the application of those gentlemen. Anyone who knows Dr. Sinclair knows that he is one of the most pronounced Grits in the Dominion of Canada; and the hon. gentleman, in mentioning Mr. McLaren, concealed half the facts of the case; he never mentioned that Dr. Sinclair was connected with him. They did not get the timber limit on their own application, they were notified that there were other applicants, and they were told to tender for it. They did so; they offered a certain amount, and they got the timber limit, showing that by no act of mine was any influence used with the Government in order to obtain it for them. The hon. member for West Huron has made some charges through the country, which he has not had the courage to make on the floor of the House this evening. He made some charges against members of Parliament, when speaking at a place called Wingham, and he has not had the courage to state one single particle of those charges this evening. He made a charge against me, and I have been waiting a long time, for an opportunity to meet that hon. gentleman and see if he would dare repeat it in the House, or hear what his reason was for making the charge, that I might give it a flat contradiction. He stated in reference to me:

"John Haggart, the Tory member for South Lanark, has managed to capture out of the 'loot' 320 acres of coal lands, a timber limit on the Shell River, at $5 a square mile, an interest with Peter McLaren, of 'Rivers and Streams Bill' notoriety, in other portions of the public property, and is believed to have had an interest in more than one of the contracts on the C.P.R. Those who know John Haggart best say that there are many and peculiar reasons why he must stand firm by the Government."

I simply state that is a cowardly, lying statement, framed out of whole cloth, by a party who had not a particle of evidence to justify him in making the statement.

Mr. TYRWHITT. As my name has been mentioned amongst those guilty of corruption, I feel it my duty to say a word in my own defence. The mover of the present resolution has stepped out of his ordinary character in this House. As it has been his custom in the past to promote legislation of a moral character, he opened his remarks by saying he had been to church, but he immediately afterwards broke the pledge he had made with the Minister of the Interior, that he would not bring this motion up to-night. He proceeded then to quote scripture and make false statements alternately.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. TYRWHITT. I withdraw the expression; but it is certainly a false statement, as far as I am concerned. It has been well proved, that every statement made by the mover and seconder of the resolution, was false.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. There are parliamentary expressions which the hon. gentleman can use, and he must confine himself to those.

Mr. TYRWHITT. The offence of which I confess to have been guilty is a very simple one. I consider it my duty as representing my county to correspond with the Government on the business of my constituents, and on the present occasion two gentlemen visited me and asked me to correspond with the Minister of the Interior with regard to timber limits. They were men of different political stripes. The main mover happened to be a Reformer, Mr. Meany, and the other was a Conservative. The Reformer had been in the North-West, and had seen this timber limit for which he made this application. His application was granted, and I have never seen the gentleman since. I do not believe he received the grant, because he did not comply with the regulations of the Government.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman who leads the House that in view of the fact that there are a number of gentlemen on both sides who would like to say something more, it would be better to adjourn and finish the debate during the course of the day. It may be closed now, but I fear the result will be that another day will have to be given up to this, and it would be better for us to adjourn at once. As it is past five o'clock I will not weary the House with a discussion on the question, but simply make my suggestion because I do not think this argument can be regarded as closed whether we take the vote or not.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that this matter has gone too far for the opposition to rest. Hon. gentlemen opposite have made statements which are either true or not. If hon. gentlemen on this side have spoken the truth, these charges are most foul slanders, and it behoves the Opposition, who have made these charges, not alone on the floor, but on every hustings, to make them good if they can. I believe the hon. gentleman who has taken his seat has taken the proper view, and that this debate should be adjourned so as to give the Opposition the opportunity of making good the statements, the slanders, I believe, they have hurled against hon. members on this side.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) accused me of making a false statement with regard to himself, and proceeded to corroborate exactly what I had said, which was that he had been an applicant on behalf of another party for a timber limit.

Mr. McCARTHY. That was not the charge made against me.

Mr. CHARLTON. I refer to Mr. Tyrwhitt.

House divided on Mr. Charlton's motion.

Amendment negatived.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

Committee rose and reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

HOME RULE FOR IRELAND.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved:

That the proposed motion of which Mr. Blake gave notice in his place this day be made the first order of the day on Thursday next, after questions put by members.

Motion agreed to.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 5.45 a.m., Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 5th May, 1886.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

WORKS IN NAVIGABLE WATERS.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 130) respecting certain works constructed in or over navigable waters. He said: The object of this Bill is to regulate the construction of public works in navigable waters, in order that everybody may not erect works of that kind without proper authority.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT, WOODSTOCK, N.B.

Mr. IRVINE asked, Is it the intention of the Government to appoint a successor to the late James H. Jacques, Customs Department, Woodstock, N.B.? If so, when?

Mr. BOWELL. The Government will appoint a successor to Mr. Jacques as soon as they consider the interests of the revenue demand it.

NORTH-WEST TROUBLES.

Mr. LAURIER asked, 1st. Whether any of the half-breeds admitted, upon enquiry by the commission, that they had taken part in the late insurrection? If so, how many? 2nd. Were the claims of such half-breeds to scrip rejected on account of such admissions? If so, is it now the intention of the Government to give them certificates for scrip?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Thirteen half-breeds, who appeared before the commission, admitted having taken part in the rebellion. Two refused to answer the question put by the commission as to whether they had taken part in it. No scrip has been issued in any of those cases, and the question as to whether scrip will be issued is still engaging the attention of the Government.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether Mr. Dewdney has been authorised to inform the Indians of the North-West Territories that no arrests will be made of any who took part in last year's troubles?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Dewdney has not been so authorised; but with regard to certain half-breeds in the vicinity of Turtle Mountains, on the other side of the line, who, it has been represented strongly, were simply misguided, and have not been guilty in any way except in joining in the outbreak, he has been authorised to say that if they return and behave peaceably and loyally they will not be disturbed.

MILITARY OPERATIONS IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex) asked, When will the special report promised in the Annual Report of the Minister of Militia, respecting operations in the North-West, be brought down? Will the Government also submit to the House a statement showing the payments on account of the service since the 30th of June last?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. A special report respecting operations in the North-West, will be brought down within a very few days. I hope the expenditure on account of the service, as far as possible, will be brought down, since the 30th June last.

POSTMASTER AT MOUNT MIDDLETON, N.B.

Mr. BURPEE (for Mr. WELDON) asked, Is D. S. Sinnott, the postmaster at Mount Middleton, King's County, N.B.? If not, when did he tender his resignation, and at what date was the same accepted by the Government?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Sinnott resigned his appointment on the 21st April, and his resignation was accepted the same day by telegram.

POSTMASTER AT BUTTERNUT RIDGE, N.B.

Mr. BURPEE (for Mr. WELDON) asked, Is Charles J. Keith the postmaster at Butternut Ridge, King's County, N.B.? If not, when did he tender his resignation, and at what date was the same accepted by the Government?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Keith resigned his appointment on the 24th March, 1886. His resignation was accepted 26th March, the same year.

POSTMASTER AT NEREPIS STATION, N.B.

Mr. BURPEE (for Mr. WELDON) asked, Is David McKenzie the Postmaster at Nerepis Station, King's County, N.B.? If not, when did he tender his resignation, and at what date was the same accepted by the Government?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. McKenzie has not resigned.

WOODENWARE GOODS—DORCHESTER PENITENTIARY.

Mr. RAY asked, Do the Government place upon the Canadian market, in competition with Canadian manufacturers, the woodenware goods manufactured by convict labor in Dorchester Penitentiary? Is it the intention of the Government to discontinue such manufacture and sale of that class of goods?

Mr. THOMPSON. Wooden goods were manufactured for many years before in the penitentiary of St. John,

Machinery was erected, and these goods manufactured at the Dorchester Penitentiary. Representations have recently been made that the production of those goods at Dorchester interferes with Canadian manufacturers, and the propriety of continuing the production is under consideration.

ASPY BAY AFFAIR.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, Whether the Government have in their possession any report or reports from any officer of the Marine and Fisheries Department in reference to the Aspy Bay affair, and if so, whether they will lay them before the House?

Mr. FOSTER. The Government have not in their possession any such report or reports.

CARRYING FIRE-ARMS IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether Mr. Dewdney has been authorised to notify the North-West Indians that there is a law for both whites and Indians, prohibiting them from carrying fire-arms in settled districts; and that as the Government intends to send a large number of soldiers and police into the country, it will be necessary for any Indian who wishes to hunt off his reserves to get permission of his agent to carry fire-arms; and that if found off his reserves with fire-arms, without the permission of his agent, he will be liable to arrest.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No authority has been given in the terms of this question. However, Mr. Dewdney has been called upon to make a report as to what action he has taken in this connection, and his report will be communicated to the House as soon as received.

RIDEAU RIVER FLOODS.

Mr. MACKINTOSH asked, Is it the intention of the Government to institute an enquiry into the causes of the floods from the Rideau River, in the vicinity of the city of Ottawa?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. A complaint or representation has been made to my Department on this subject, and my intention is to have the matter looked into.

MUSKOKA DISTRICT—NET FISHING.

Mr. COOK asked, Is it true that the Government have refused to allow the settlers of Muskoka District to take fish in nets in the waters of Lakes Muskoka, Rousseau and Joseph?

Mr. FOSTER. It is not true.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY TARIFFS.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Have any alterations taken place in the authorised tariffs of the Canadian Pacific Railway; and if so, will the papers be laid on the Table? What is the passenger rate at present authorised between Winnipeg and Emerson?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In the absence of the Minister of Railways, I have to say that no alterations have taken place in the authorised tariffs of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The passenger rate at present authorised between Winnipeg and Emerson is, I believe, 3½ cents per mile.

CONSOLIDATED FUND.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, What amounts were expended and received on account of Consolidated Fund during the month of April last, giving sums received on account of Customs and Excise and other items, as usually stated in the Gazette.

Mr. THOMPSON,

Mr. McLELAN:

Receipts from Customs in April	$ 1,393,627 00
Excise	157,088 00
Post Office	210,393 00
Public Works, including Railways	247,025 00
Miscellaneous	134,189 78
Total	$ 2,142,322 78
Revenue to 31st March	25,165,252 23
Total	$ 27,307,575 00

The last item is hardly embraced in the question, but it is usual to give it.

Expenditure in April	$ 2,647,642 54
to 31st March	26,202,606 59
Total	$ 28,850,249 13

THE FLOATING DEBT.

Mr. JACKSON asked, What was the floating debt of the Dominion Government on 1st May, 1886?

Mr. McLELAN. $14,263,625.

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, 1st, the amount of the gross public debt of Canada on 1st May, 1886; 2nd, the amount of the net public debt of Canada on 1st May, 1886?

Mr. McLELAN. Gross, $281,433,629; net, $205,569,263.

FISHING FEES.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex) asked, What is the license fee charged to fishermen engaged in fishing in the waters extending from Point Edward to Lake Erie? Was such fee charged during the present year? If so, when? What was the former license fee? and what is the present? Was the license fee increased from $40 to $50, and again reduced from $50 to $25 per one pound net this year? If so, when were these several changes made?

Mr. FOSTER. The license fee charged to fishermen engaged in fishing in the waters extending from Point Edward to Lake Erie is $10 for seines and $50 for pound nets. Such fee was charged during the present year. The fee is charged generally at the issue or about the issue of the license. The former license fees were respectively $10 for seines and $40 for pound nets. The license fee last year was $40 for pound nets and $10 for seines, and it was increased to $50 for pound nets. There has been no reduction from $50 to $25.

I. G. BAKER & CO.'S CONTRACT.

Mr. SOMERVILLE (Brant), for Mr. McCRANEY, asked, Have the Government given, or do they intend giving any more contracts to I. G. Baker & Co., after the revelations in this House on the supply of flour by that firm?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I object to the form of this question, for it is much more than a question. If the question is reduced in its proportions, so as to be merely a question, I shall answer it.

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes, there is a matter of argument there. Strike out from "after the revelations."

Mr. SOMERVILLE (Brant). I beg to ask, Have the Government given, or do they intend giving any more contracts to I. G. Baker & Co.?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government have given a contract for the ensuing year, commencing 1st September, for a portion of the beef to be supplied, to I. G. Baker & Co., they putting in the lowest tender and giving ample security.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). At what date was that given?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The other day.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. BRYSON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I rise to a question of privilege. As I read in the Hansard of the 3rd May, the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) made the startling statement to the House, with reference to myself, that:

"The hon. member for Pontiac is a director of the Pontiac and Pacific Junction Railway. I see he is not in the House, but I would not fear to make the statement if he were here. I make it from the 'Parliamentary Companion'"

I desire to inform the hon. gentleman from Grey that he has been entirely mistaken. The "Parliamentary Companion" for 1885 does make that statement in reference to me, and it is wholly unwarranted. The statement must be an error, and it has never been submitted to me for my approbation. I am not, and I never have been, a director of the Pontiac and Pacific Junction Railway, nor was I ever a stockholder in that railway. The only matter in which I was interested in regard to that railway was the construction of it through my county, in which I contributed with some little zeal to assist the Government in carrying through the measure giving a subsidy to that railway. I hope the hon. gentleman and his supporters on the Liberal side will cease making that statement, because I think no hon. gentleman has any desire to misrepresent me in that way, but, as reference was made to it last night by two or three members on the Liberal side, I hope, after my denial, that statement will be withdrawn, and that my statement will be accepted by the hon. member.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I made the statement on the authority of the "Parliamentary Companion." I had no desire to misrepresent the position of the hon. gentleman. I supposed the "Parliamentary Companion" was but an autobiography given by the hon. gentleman himself. I had no desire, nor have I now, to misrepresent the hon. gentleman or any other gentleman in the House, but I gave it from a source which I supposed was reliable and which I was justified in quoting from.

THE COLONIAL EXHIBITION.

Mr. BLAKE. I desire to direct the attention of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture to the statements which have been repeated in various quarters, on this side and on the other side of the water, in reference to the very unprepared condition of the Canadian exhibit at the Colonial Exhibition, and the statement that there has been a detention at Halifax of a considerable portion of the goods. We must be very much interested in Canada in that matter, after the liberal contributions which have been made, and the anxiety to be fully represented from the beginning; and it would be interesting to us to know from the hon. Minister what measure of truth there is in the statements, what steps have been taken to remedy the delays, if any delays have taken place, and what expectations the hon. gentleman has as to the condition of the Canadian exhibit, at an early day.

Mr. CARLING. I have not seen the statements the hon. gentleman referred to, but I believe that the great portion of the goods has been delivered at London as intended. There were some pictures of the different cities in Canada that, through some mismanagement, were detained on one of the railway cars, but the moment the attention of the Department was drawn to that, they were immediately sent forward, and they are on their way now to the Old Country. There are some goods still at Halifax, but not to any very large extent, and everything has been done that could possibly be done to push them forward as fast as possible.

THE WRIT FOR HALDIMAND.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I wish to again ask the attention of the Government and the House to the enquiry I made yesterday in reference to the issue of the writ for the electoral division of Haldimand. Yesterday, the First Minister informed me that a decision had not been arrived at. I should be glad if he could now tell me that the Government have arrived at a decision and have directed the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to issue the writ.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government have not yet selected a returning officer, and have not yet given instructions for the issue of the writ. If the hon. gentleman will repeat the question on Friday, I will be able to give him more specific information.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. IVES. I desire to make a personal explanation in regard to a matter which was referred to in the House the other night by the hon. member for Grey, and which appears in the Toronto Globe of the 4th May. I should not refer to this matter were it the first time that I have seen a similar statement made, and were I not satisfied that—I will not say a conspiracy—but a persistent effort is being made by gentlemen on the other side of the House and their press, to put me in a false position, a position in which I have no right to be placed. Now, the Globe says:

"It was eminently fitting that the principal defender of Mr. Beaty's railway jobbing, should be Mr. Ives, son-in-law of the Minister of Railways and successor to the latter on the directorate of the International Railway Company."

And in another place:

"Mr. Pope allows his son-in-law to take his place on the board of directors. 'A fellow feeling' makes Mr. Ives wondrous kind towards Mr. Beaty."

Now, I may say, once and for all, that I am not a director of the International Railway Company, chartered by this House, and never was. I never had any connection with that undertaking, except as solicitor to the road. In that capacity, on one occasion last autumn, when certain arrangements and contracts were being made between the International Railway Company and the International Company of Maine, of which I am a director. I was appointed a director of the company, in order that I might sign contracts and represent, as it were, the International Railway in Maine, and I resigned immediately on my return. I never had any connection whatever with the company, never owned any of its stock, and have not now, and never expect to have, the slightest pecuniary interest in it, one way or the other. This story has been copied in the local Grit press in the townships, and a great deal is made of it. The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Landerkin), the other night, alluded to the same matter, and I was surprised to find that he, when quoting from the "Parliamentary Companion," failed to quote the exact facts. He told the House that I was a director of the International Railway. He was talking about railways subsidised by the Parliament of Canada, and chartered by this Parliament, particularly. Now, he certainly could not have failed to observe from the "Parliamentary Companion" he was reading, that there was no statement in it that I was a director of the International Railway, but a statement that I was a director of the International of Maine, an organisation chartered by the State of Maine, and, it may be said, indirectly assisted by this Government; but, at the same time, it cannot be held that the hon. gentleman was in good faith in making that statement. With regard to the International Railway, I have no interest in it whatever, I am only solicitor for the company, and have acted for it in various matters in which the two companies are interested, but I have no stock, no interest whatever in it, except as a professional man in my capacity as solicitor.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I wish to say one word, in order to show the good faith in which I acted in this matter in quoting from the "Parliamentary Companion." I will read from that book again, to show how far I was justified. I believe the International of Maine, is a road that was subsidised by this Government.

Mr. IVES. That was not the gravamen of the charge.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I was not speaking of the charters given by this House, but of the roads that received subsidies from this House. I quoted in good faith from the book, and in doing so I acted from a stern sense of public duty. I have no desire to injure the feelings of the hon. member at all. This is what the "Parliamentary Companion" says, in reference to that gentleman:

"He was called to the bar of the Province of Quebec in the year 1867; was appointed Q.C. on the 11th October, 1880. Is president of the Dominion Cattle Company, of Texas, and a director of the International Company, of Maine."

Mr. IVES. That is just what I said.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course the hon. gentleman is quite in his right in making the statement. But in order that the explanation may be complete, I desire to say that I suppose the statement that I have seen in the press that he was the person who signed the contract for a subsidy from the Government of Canada, the Minister of Railways being the signatory on the part of the Government, and himself on the part of the company, is not correct?

Mr. IVES. It is not correct at all. The contract was signed by the president of the company, and not by myself, who never held that position.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—RELEASE OF BONDS.

Mr. McLELAN moved that the House receive the report of the Committee of the Whole on resolutions respecting the release to the company of the amount held as security for the operation of the Canadian Pacific Railway. He said: one or two points were brought up in respect of these resolutions when they were in committee. The first was respecting the application of the bonds that are to be raised upon the Algoma branch. I propose to insert in the Bill this clause:

But the proceeds of such bonds shall be applied exclusively to the cost of construction and equipment of the said Algoma branch, including a bridge over the said river.

And further on:

Exclusive application of the proceeds of said bonds for the purposes hereinbefore defined shall be secured in case of default.

And so on. I will insert in the Bill a clause applying strictly the proceeds of the mortgage to the completion of the Algoma branch, as well as the bridge over the river; also a clause with respect to the bonds that are in the hands of the public and that are not yet taken up and not provided for, stating:

Nothing herein contained shall affect or impair the security or remedies of the holders of outstanding land grant bonds.

I propose to insert in the Bill founded upon the resolutions these two clauses. I understand the latter one is satisfactory to the bondholders in all respects.

Mr. BLAKE. After the statement of the hon. gentleman—of course it is impossible properly to appreciate the value of words one hears across the floor—but it occurred to me that the first phrase the hon. gentleman used was, perhaps, not exactly adequate to carry out his intentions, because it is, as he read, that the proceeds of the Algoma branch bonds are to be applied to the construction of the branch as well. As I understand the arrangement when we agreed to that special mortgage, it was to the completion of the branch. What I mean is this: that it should not be competent to the railway company, having issued bonds upon the Algoma branch, to take two millions and a-half of the proceeds of those bonds and say: We shall use them to apply them to the work we have already constructed; but that the money raised upon the whole and already constructed work was to be applied to the completion of the work. However, it is not easy to hear the words accurately across the House, and I shall not attempt to discuss them now. So far as I can judge from the explanation of the hon. gentleman's proposals, they are, in both these respects, reasonably satisfactory; but as inasmuch as one cannot form a final judgment upon them, nor upon some other points to which I wish to call the attention of the House before this measure receives its final reading, and I shall not detain the House now, preferring to wait till the opportunity which will be afforded when we have the measure of the hon. gentleman fully before us.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to enquire of the Minister of Finance, whether these same bonds in the hands of the public are not liable to be redeemed by the railway company on payment of 10 per cent. premium?

Mr. McLELAN. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, they might easily close the whole affair, then.

Resolution concurred in.

Mr. McLELAN introduced Bill (No. 131) further to amend the Act respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Bill read the first time.

DOMINION LANDS.

House again resolved itself into Commitee on Bill (No. 94) further to amend the Dominion Lands Act, 1883.—(Mr. White, Cardwell.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). If the commitee will allow me, there are one or two clauses I should like to go back to for the purpose of making merely verbal alterations. The first is clause 3, in regard to the different forms. The clause at present provides that these shall be changed by the Minister of Interior, with the approval of the Governor in Council. I propose to leave out the words "with the approval of the Governor in Council."

Mr. BLAKE. I thought when this clause was inserted that it was one of very doubtful propriety, and I think it is made still more objectionable by the proposed amendment. If there is one thing important it is that the forms on which the various steps are based which are required to be taken in order to acquire those titles, should be general forms, the same for all persons. But the hon. gentleman proposes, not merely to take power to make forms applicable to a special class of cases, but also forms applicable to any special case. And now he proposes that the power shall be conferred on the departmental Minister. What does that mean? It means that those forms are to be moulded to suit each case, as the Minister pleases, and thus there is no certainty whatever. The regular form may be used in one case and a different form in another, and no one is to know, with any degree of certainty, what the real limit of the obligation may be. The proposal affords the greatest possible loophole for fraud.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I think the hon. gentleman has magnified the importance of the clause, which has been pressed upon me as being of great convenience to the Land

Board at Winnipeg. They say there have been cases where such a power is desirable. For myself, I do not attach a great deal of importance to it one way or the other; it is a mere matter of convenience to the Land Board. I do not see the inconvenience mentioned by the hon. gentleman, but I would rather drop it than it should be necessary that every form which might be required to be altered would necessarily come before the Governor in Council. That would be giving an importance to the form that is not warranted. This change, I repeat, is urged upon me by the Dominion Land Board in Winnipeg as a matter of convenience, and the commissioner, who is giving a very great deal of attention to land matters there, and who is probably the most popular officer ever connected with the Government in the North-West, urges that this change would be convenient in the working of the Land Act.

Mr. BLAKE. Before we make such an important change, which, as I conceive, will place the forms all at sea, because it is the Minister who has to decide what the requirements shall be, we should have some greater reason for the change stated than that the Chairman of the Land Board thinks it would be convenient. The hon. Minister ought himself to have mastered the reasons why these officers desire this change, which, so far as we know, have not been given, because the Minister has not stated to us any reason. He simply says that the Chairman of the Land Board thinks the proposed change would be very convenient. This is a re-introduction of the appeals to Ottawa, which the Minister has himself declared to be most objectionable. It is not the Land Board that has to do this work—though perhaps next time we go into committee the duty may be assigned to the Chairman of the Land Board—but it is the Minister. Some one may say to the Land Board that he is unable to comply with the law, and ask what release he can obtain. The reply will be: None at present; but after this Bill passes, the application can be sent to the Minister of Interior, and he may order that the particular requirement that cannot be complied with may be dispensed with. The whole machinery is to be thrown at loose ends, not merely for a class of cases, but for a single case. Before the proposal of the Minister is acceded to, it should be shown that the wisdom of man cannot devise some different forms or an alternative set of forms that would be satisfactory. The hon. gentleman says he would rather abandon the clause than that it should be required that the Governor in Council should act in every case, but then it was the hon. gentleman himself who proposed to us that the Governor in Council should act; it is his clause. A few days ago he did not propose to abandon the clause, because it would be a wrong thing to ask the Governor in Council to interfere: that was what he asked the House to agree to. Now he says he is mistaken and that we had better drop it. I say that we ought to have some better reason for the course pursued—that reason being really, for parliamentary purposes, noth ing at all. The mere statement that an officer thinks it convenient that this should take place is no reason for Parliament.

Mr. MILLS. This clause is practically doing away with the forms altogether. There is no difference between saying that there shall be no form required by law and saying that the Minister may vary those that are given in the law; the result will be exactly the same. Now, I think the Land Board or the Commissioner ought to have pointed out to the Minister in what particulars the law at present is found inconvenient. New experience from time to time will suggest a variation and modification in the forms required, and perhaps the introduction of new forms, but the Land Board, if it does its duty, ought to furnish the Minister with the information as the result of its own experience. If it had informed the hon. gentleman in what respects the present forms are found to impose impediments in the way of an efficient and convenient administration of affairs connected with the Department, then the hon. gentleman might have introduced some variations in the existing form, or some additional forms, and so Parliament might have retained its control of those having to deal with the Land Department, and that is precisely what is required. But what the hon. gentleman proposes, if this clause is carried in its present form, or is amended as he suggests, is to leave those who are interested in the matter, and Parliament which is responsible for the law, in the dark with regard to what is done. Now, it would be a very easy thing, not with the intention perhaps of doing any wrong, but with the view of meeting a particular case of apparent hardship, to vary the form in such a way as, if it were made a general rule, would lead to very great abuses, and if it were not a general rule would also give rise to abuse, by furnishing one measure of relief to one party, and another and different measure of relief to another party. What we ought to do, as far as we can, is to substitute a law for the mere will of the Minister or officer engaged in the administration of public affairs, and in order to do that, there must be some uniform rule of action laid down which everyone who chooses may know, and which, if they choose to conform with it, will entitle them to a certain remedy and relief which the Minister or the Department will not have any authority to withhold. Now we do not want to place in the hands of any Minister of any party the power of determining what the rule of law shall be in a particular case; the law itself should determine that. I am satisfied that the Minister would do that which is best in his own interest and that of the public, by striking out the clause altogether, and requiring the commissioner to give him information on this particular point, and indicate in what respect the present forms are found to be defective. It will be an easy matter another Session to frame a series of additional forms, if so required, in accordance with the rules that experience shows are necessary. It is certainly most desirable that in these matters we should adhere to well-settled rules and principles, and that we should not substitute the mere caprice of the officer, far away it may be from the Department, by whom the Minister himself must in a large degree be guided, for what ought to be a settled rule of law.

Mr. CHARLTON. I fully concur in the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), that the law should govern these matters rather than the will of the Minister; and I have felt for years disposed to make more radical changes in this matter than my hon. friend would seem to indicate. I believe the will of the Minister has been used, in place of consulting the will of Parliament, in matters relating to our public domain, greatly to the detriment of the public interest. I do not believe the Department of the Interior should be allowed to fix the price of land or the conditions of settlement, or to arrange as to the conditions of homestead entry. I believe that any regulations pertaining to the management of the public domain, dividing these lands into classes, fixing the price of those lands in the various classes—that all these should emanate from the Parliament of Canada, and that the Minister of the Interior should not be allowed to fix the price, and usurp the legislative functions of this House, as he has hitherto done. Now, commencing in 1879, between that period and the 23rd December, 1881, the Minister of the Interior usurped—I think I may properly use the term——

The CHAIRMAN. Is the hon. gentleman confining himself to the clause?

Mr. CHARLTON. I think so, Mr. Chairman—usurped the power of fixing the price of the land with reference to four different occasions. These regulations and the frequent changes which were made in them were the means of creating a great amount of confusion and discord and prejudice to the public interest. We had, for instance, the first five mile belt in which homesteads were not allowed and the lands in that belt were fixed at $6 per acre; the next belt at $5; the next at $4; the next at $3; and the next at $1 per acre. Now these were regulations of the utmost importance in their character; it was dealing practically with an empire. No legislation, no regulation pertaining to the interest of the public of Canada could be of greater importance than these regulations which emanated from the Department of the Interior and were put in force by the will of one man. It was an exercise, in this country with free institutions, of despotic power, and that power has been exercised by the Minister of Interior very naturally in such a way as to forward the interests of his party. If you take the colonisation regulations of 23rd December, 1881, by which parties could make application for colonisation lands, in one year and eight days 251 applications were made, covering nearly 2,300 townships, and by means of that scheme the Department of the Interior and the Government were able to use a leverage of vast importance and power in the elections. Now, whatever may be the rules and regulations adopted with regard to our public lands, it is a matter of the greatest moment and public interest that these matters should receive the careful and full consideration of this Parliament, and that before the Minister of Interior or the Department is permitted to act in this matter they should be obliged to consult Parliament and receive the sanction of Parliament to any rules and regulations they may propose to establish. For this reason I believe that our policy with regard to the public lands should be entirely changed. Now, in the United States the idea of a head of a Department making regulations with regard to the price of the public lands——

The CHAIRMAN. I do not think the hon. gentleman is in order in entering into the general discussion.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am about to propose a substitute for this section.

The CHAIRMAN. Still the hon. gentleman should not open up a discussion on the whole policy.

Mr. CHARLTON. I think it is high time it was discussed.

Mr. BLAKE. As I understand, the question we have before us is the policy of Parliament putting in the hands of the Ministry power to alter the stipulations and the rules which Parliament has made.

The CHAIRMAN. As regards this clause.

Mr. BLAKE. But this clause involves the whole thing, as you will see if you look at it.

Mr. CHARLTON. As I observed, the exercise by one man of such a power in the United States, would not be permitted for one moment. Everything in that country relating to the management of public lands is carefully considered and sanctioned by Congress before any action can be taken by the heads of departments or by the officers of the Government. Such ought to be the case here. I would rather trust to the collective wisdom of this body than to any one man as Minister of the Interior, however wise or just he may be. We are more likely to have the public interest looked after by the representatives of the people than by the Department, which is liable to make use of its powers for political purposes, as it has done in the past. I move that the following be substituted for this section:

All regulations as to the price of the public lands of Canada, conditions of settlement, reserves for homesteads and pre-emption, and grants under leasehold, shall first receive the sanction of Parliament before being acted upon by the Minister of the Interior, and all provisions of the existing law, conflicting with the reservation by Parliament of full control in all matters pertaining to the management of the public domain as aforesaid, are hereby repealed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I object to that as altogether out of order. It has no relation to this clause.

Mr. CHARLTON.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not think this is a proper amendment to this clause.

Mr. BLAKE. Since we opened this discussion I have sent for the Act, and I find that the practical effect of the hon. gentleman's proposal is to place at the disposition of the Minister of the Interior all the conditions upon which homesteads are to be secured. This clause proposes that whenever it is necessary the Minister may vary any of the forms from A to M, or cause to be adopted such other forms to the like effect as he considers applicable to any special case or class of cases. Now, Sir, the forms are the regulations and the requirements. They are not merely the proofs of certain statutory requirements, but it is in the forms alone that you find the requirements of the law. For instance, the 27th section of the Act which is proposed to be amended, says this:

"Any person, male or female, who is the sole head of a family, or any male who has attained the age of eighteen years, shall, on making application in form A in the schedule to this Act, be entitled to obtain homestead entry."

Now, form A is a simple application; that, of course, is of no consequence. Then, clause 29 says:

"To obtain homestead entry it shall be necessary for the person applying therefor to appear and make affidavit before the local agent, according to form B, C, D, or E, in the schedule to this Act, as the circumstances of the case require."

Form D is an oath or affirmation that the party is over 18 years of age; that to the best of his knowledge and belief the land in respect of which his application is made is open for homestead; that there is no person residing on the land applied for; that the application is made for his exclusive use and benefit, with the intention of residing upon and cultivating the said land; and that he has not heretofore made an entry for a homestead on Dominion lands.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). They are all in the Statute.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not find them in the Statute; but if everything here is statutory, the hon. gentleman is proposing to take power to vary the Statute, because if this form requires to be varied, it must be because the requirements of the Statute cannot be complied with. So with reference to forms B, C, D, and E, and so with reference to forms H, J, K, and L—they are all requirements or proofs of statutory requirements. M is the local agent's certificate that the party who is the holder of a homestead entry has complied with the provisions of the law in order to entitle him to receive a patent for such land, and recommending the issue of such patent. The hon. gentleman is to be authorised to alter that, so that the agent may give a certificate which will not prove that the law has been complied with, and upon that the patent may issue. Now, it does seem to me that it is monstrous that the power should be placed in the hands of the Minister to alter these provisions, and that secretly. There is no provision for publicity; the rule the hon. gentleman adopts in the case of John Jones, the relaxation he makes in his case, may not be known to others, and other parties have no means of knowing what measure of justice and favor may have been granted to him and omitted to them. You thus expose the Minister and the Department to constant applications to waive the provisions of the law in all sorts of cases; you invite the homesteader to be careless about fulfilling the conditions, in the hope that by pressure he may remove them; and you authorise the Minister privately and with reference to a particular case to alter the conditions, and so to establish rules for different individuals in cases analogous or nearly so. It does seem to me that no reason has been given for such a serious change in the law.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The argument of the hon. gentleman is quite relevant to the resolution, and it is a question of course whether the words "with the approval of the Governor in Council," should or should not be struck off. His argument is in every way clear and unobjectionable, and I must say there is weight in it. But that is a different thing from the amendment moved by the hon. member for North Norfolk.

Mr. BLAKE. I understood the Chairman to rule that out of order; I thought he was quite right, and therefore I did not address myself to that.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). In that case I will move the clause as we passed it the other day. I do not know that any danger can arise from that.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am glad to hear the decision the Minister of the Interior has arrived at, because it is consistent with the action of other Departments. I remember, for instance, that the Minister of Customs, when passing his Customs Bill, would not take the power that this House was willing to give him, to deal with special cases of hardship, when false entries were made in good faith. I am not sure but he was right, contrary to my own idea at the time in providing in the Act that certain things must be done, and taking no responsibility to deal with cases himself; and I am not sure, looking at the experience we have had in the North-West, that the same rule should not be applied to the Department of the Interior.

Mr. BLAKE. Under these circumstances I will not prolong the discussion now, but will give notice that unless at a further stage the hon. gentleman is able to give us more reasons, or rather any reasons—for he has not given us any yet—for enacting this provision, I will move an amendment to this clause.

Mr. CHARLTON. Perhaps I may give notice that I intend to move my amendment as a new clause to the Bill.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The third sub-section provides that the Minister of the Interior or the Dominion Land Board may, on a requisition signed by intending immigrants or other persons proposing to settle together, authorise any person they name to obtain homesteads and pre-emption entries for them before their arrival in the Province or Territory. I propose to extend this provision to ordinary settlers who, after their arrival, may depute one of their number or any one to make the entries for them, on condition, of course, that they settle on the lands personally within six months. Under the law at present, each of these intending settlers is obliged to make his entry in person. The clause, as altered, will read:

The Minister of the Interior or the Dominion Land Board, upon requisition, may authorise any person named therein to make a homestead entry or homestead and pre-emption entries on behalf of any person desiring to obtain such entry or entries.

Mr. WALLACE (York). The change is in the right direction. If several people go to the North-West and select their homesteads, by the law at present each one has to go to the land agent in person. The change will enable them to appoint one to make the entries in their names, and will thus save a great deal of trouble and expense to settlers.

Mr. BLAKE. But the trouble is that no precaution is taken to see that the person who makes a requisition to the Minister of the Interior or the Land Board to obtain homestead and pre-emption entries for others, who, he declares, have authorised him to act in their behalf, has really such authority, or merely does so for the purpose of preventing the land being taken up.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). That is an omission that can easily be rectified by altering the sub-section so as to require proof that the requisition is a bonâ fide one.

Mr. MILLS. I would suggest that, providing the agent is duly authorised by the party on whose behalf he acts, a form should be provided, and then there would be no difficulty.

Mr. BLAKE. What difference will be effected by the proposal the hon. gentleman submits to the committee from the clause as it stands?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Under the law as it stands this is confined to persons who propose to settle together. This will make it wider; then the general form of the existing law makes it apply specially to immigrants, while this applies it to every person.

Mr. BLAKE. Certainly the law does apply very distinctly at present to others than immigrants unless you strike out the words "or other persons," which I do not suppose the hon. gentleman would feel authorised to do even if we gave him very considerable power in regard to the law. I understand, then, that the substantial reason is to apply it to the case of persons who do not propose to settle together?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. That, of course, is capable of very large application. Has it been found in practice that inconvenience has resulted from the present limitation?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Sometimes a person who desires to settle on land goes out to look at it, and it is remote from the agent's office. By this, he can get anyone who is going to the agent's office to make the entry instead of going one or two hundred miles himself.

Mr. BLAKE. That is, of course, perfectly legitimate. It would be covered by striking out the words "before their arrival in the Province or Territory," and the words "proposing to settle together," and leave the law as it stands.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). In the 4th sub-section I propose to strike out the words "or before the homestead inspectors." In the Bill, as originally drawn, the homestead inspector was allowed to take entries; but, on considering the matter, I thought that was open to serious objection, but the words were not struck out of this clause. In sub-section 7, I propose that the person making the entry shall prove to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Dominion Lands, or the Dominion Land Board, instead of to the satisfaction of the Dominion Land Board only. If there should not be a majority of the board at Winnipeg at the time, it might be inconvenient.

Mr. MILLS. Why not strike out the word "satisfaction?" It is a surplusage.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I think the word is necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. It is proposed to amend sub-section 7, clause 5 by inserting after the words "to the satisfaction of the" the words "the Commissioner of Dominion Lands or the Dominion Land Board."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. WATSON. I suggested the other day that it would be well to make some change in the provision for a person holding his title to pre-emption. There are provisions in this clause whereby a person is entitled to make an entry, to prove the entry, and to receive a patent. I find by the memorial presented by the North-West Council that the same feeling exists in the North-West as in Manitoba, to a large extent. Therefore, I wish to move:

That settlers who are entitled to homestead and pre-emption, and who are now, or may be hereafter, entitled to a patent for a homestead quarter section, be allowed to enter their pre-emption as a second homestead entry on the condition of additional three years homestead duties.

I find that the North-West Council go even further than that. They ask the Government to give homesteaders the privilege of making an entry of the pre emption on condition of an additional three years' settlement. It was stated by the Minister of the Interior the other day that he was repeatedly told by parties who met him in the North-West, that one of the reasons why they wanted to have second homesteading done away with, was because people were leaving that section of the country, and it was becoming depopulated from the fact that an Order in Council provided that they should not take up a homestead within forty miles of the first homestead, and that this practically obliged them to remove from that section. I am aware that petitions were presented to the Minister of the Interior, to the effect that homesteaders should be allowed to homestead their pre-emptions on condition of an additional settlement of three years. Now I think that would be just to the settlers. Some sections of the country are not as well settled to day as they were a few years ago, and I think this would have a good effect in securing a settlement of those places, and would be agreeable to the people of the North-West. I will read from the memorial of the North-West Council, clause 13, where they say:

"That settlers who have entered for homestead and pre-emption, and who are now, or may be hereafter, entitled to a patent for their homestead quarter section, be allowed to enter their pre-emption as a second homestead on condition of additional three years homestead duties on their former homestead quarter section, and cultivation duties on the present pre-emption or homestead, as circumstances will permit."

I do not go so far as to allow a man to have the right of free pre-emption on those terms, but I think there could be no objection to allowing a man to enter his pre-emption as a homestead on condition of three years additional residence.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I do not think the hon. gentleman seriously expects Parliament to accept his amendment; I am quite aware that the North-West Council have passed resolutions to this effect, and I am well aware it is popular with the settlers. They would be different from any other people I ever saw if they would not desire to get all they could for nothing, it is the most natural thing in the world. It is presumed that the settler intends to live upon his lands after having taken a homestead, and yet the hon. gentleman proposes that he shall do nothing but remain there for three years more, and, by the simple fact of his being there, he shall escape the payment of his pre-emption altogether. It means converting every homestead into 320 acres instead of 160. Even if we were disposed to do this, I do not think it would be an advantage to insist that the extra homestead duties should be made upon the pre-emption quarter section. The man would be the best judge himself of what part of his farm he desired to cultivate, or what part he desired to reserve as pasture land for the cattle he may have; therefore, I do not see that it would be any advantage to him at all. The presumption is that the homesteaders of the North-West intend to remain upon their land and to cultivate as much of it as they can with their means, and, therefore, there is no obligation whatever, in connection with this, imposed especially upon them. It is merely a proposition to give homesteads for nothing, 320 acres instead of 160, on a six years' residence instead of three.

Mr. WATSON. Six years residence is much better than three, as the Minister is aware. Quite a number of settlers have left their homesteads in different parts of the North-West, and also from some parts of Manitoba. I do not suppose they have resided there long enough to receive patents. It is not expected that they shall reside on their homestead and receive a patent for 320 acres after a continued residence of six years; it is supposed to be provided that they shall reside on the pre-emption. I would suppose that very often the original homesteader would sell his original homestead, and would reside upon and cultivate his pre-emption.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). When this Bill was in Committee the other day I stated to the Minister of the Interior that I had received several communications from the North-West with reference to it, one coming from a meeting of citizens which had been convened to consider the Dominion Lands Act. I understand that a copy of the proceedings of that meeting was forwarded to the Minister. I have also, since then, received communications from the North-West dealing with the same matter and without expressing an opinion on them myself I propose to lay them before the committee in order that they may receive the consideration they are entitled to. One of the subjects mentioned in a letter I have is that of pre-emption, and it is therein stated:

"Another clause I do not see at all in said Act, is one lowering the price of pre-emption from $2.50 to $1.00, as Mr. White, I understood, gave us to understand when he was west; for I can assure you that unless there is a reduction made of some kind, our pre-emptions will be left to the badgers and gophers, as there are very few of us able to pay for said pre-emptions."

Such were the representations made by the chairman of the meeting.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). What district is that from?

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). From the Moose Jaw district. Although these matters have no particular reference to the clause under discussion, I desire to place these representations before the Minister. The chairman of the meeting further represents that the Minister promised them some consideration in view of the fact that water was exceedingly scarce there. They understood that one of the promises of the Minister was that a well borer would be provided. They also represented in view of the water difficulty that settlers should be allowed to live a greater distance than two miles from their homesteads. I suppose these are exceptional cases, and possibly would justify exceptional treatment. It is also represented that settlers who came into the country since the alteration of the Act, allowing second homesteading, feel considerably aggrieved over the change of policy in that particular. The chairman said that, while he was not entitled himself to the privilege of second homesteading, some of the settlers there were entitled, and it seemed to be depriving them of a right that really belonged to them. I cannot imagine that the number of settlers entitled to that privilege could be very large, because the privilege of second homesteading only existed for a short time. I observe that the Minister is making provisions for special cases under the Act, and perhaps the claims of those settlers would receive special consideration.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I desire to correct the member on one point, and that is, that I made any promises in the North-West to anyone. I made no promises whatever, I was not authorised to do so, and therefore I did not make any. The only point on which I expressed a decided opinion was on the subject of the abolition of second homesteading. As to the price of the pre-emption, I discussed the various suggestions that had been made to me without expressing any opinion of my own or making any promise that a reduction in price would be made to $1, because I was not authorised to do so, and I could not make any promise without the consent of my colleagues, even if they had the power to make the change, and inasmuch as it would be giving up a debt due to the Crown we could not have done so without the sanction of Parliament itself. As to the promise of a borer, what I said was that there was a borer coming into the territory. It is now at work in the Regina district, and as soon as some progress is made the intention is to move it to the Moose Jaw district, where efforts will be made to obtain water. It is rather remarkable in connection with this water question that borings have been made to a depth of several hundred feet without obtaining water and yet within a very few feet of that point an abundant flow has been struck within fifty or sixty feet of the surface. It is very much a matter of accident as to whether water will be struck at a particular point or not.

Mr. BLAKE. There is one point in the remarks of the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Cameron) to which the Minister did not allude, and which I must confess has very considerable weight. Nothing I think has given greater satisfaction and more relieved the apprehension than the adoption by the Department of the equitable rule that the conditions on which a man entered should be the conditions on which his title was to be considered throughout, no matter what subsequent conditions might be made. That principle, applicable to the conditions which the Government were authorised themselves to make and change, appears to me to have still greater force with respect to parliamentary conditions. We provided, during a year or two, that persons who came in and settled in the North-West should be entitled, under certain conditions, to a second homestead, and it will be considered to be a breach of parliamentary faith if we subsequently repeal that law in such a manner as to deprive those persons, who entered during the period of the existence of that law and came into the country upon the faith of it, of the right they had so acquired. So far as one can judge of the number that came in during the time when this law was in force, it is clear that the number will not be very many of those entitled to avail themselves of that privilege. What I would submit for the consideration of the Minister is whether it would not be better to repeal the law except with regard to those persons who came into the country and took up homesteads during the vigor and vitality of that law. The man who was in before finds himself deprived of a benefit which would have been conferred on him if he had seen fit to avail himself of it. He cannot however be said to have acted on it, but the man who came in while the law was in force and on the faith of that additional advantage, occupies a different position.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). As to the meeting held at Moose Jaw, at which this subject was discussed, it was in favor of abolishing second homesteading. I am speaking of the meeting at which I was present. I did receive a communication from a gentleman, a friend of my own, in which he strongly protested against the abolition; but the feeling of the people was generally against the principle of second homesteading.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. member for Middlesex did not deny it, but he said it was represented by the chairman of the meeting, who said that he was not himself entitled to come within the clause; that those who came into the Territory and took up homesteads during the time the law was in force, not unnaturally claimed that they were entitled to have their claim allowed, although the policy of Parliament as to other persons was altered.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). It is represented that a meeting was recently held at Moose Jaw, at which this particular question of second homesteading was considered, and that whatever their wishes may have been as to the future, they were unanimously of the opinion that it would be unjust to permit those who had settled within the time when the second homestead was allowed, to be deprived of that privilege.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. WATSON. As I stated the other day I think there should be a clause in this Bill providing for homesteads under conditions of cultivation. I think such a clause would be in the best interest of the country, and I have prepared a clause which I think would meet a large class of cases. The conditions of cultivation are large and such a homesteader is not to get more than a homestead of 160 acres without any pre-emption. I move that the following be added to the clause :—

That homesteads of 160 acres be granted on the following conditions and entitled homesteads on conditions of cultivation that within the first year after the date of his homestead entry he broke and prepare for crop not less than twenty acres of his homestead. That within the second year he cropped the said twenty acres and broke and prepared for crop not less than thirty acres in addition. That within the third year he cropped the said fifty acres and broke and prepared not less than thirty acres in addition. That within the fourth year he has cultivated the said eighty acres and erected thereon a dwelling house and outbuildings of not less value than $600.

I think there should be no objection to a homestead being taken up on these conditions as they are large, and any person availing himself of such a provision will earn his homestead. I know of a number of people who I think would avail themselves of this privilege, and I think we should induce mechanics, who are perhaps making more money working at their trades than by settling on a farm, to put out their earnings into the cultivation of the soil. The fact that so large an amount of land required to be cultivated will always ensure the residence of some one upon it, and I do not think it makes much difference whether it is John Jones or John Smith who reside on the land, so long as the cultivation is done. As the country can only become valuable by the cultivation of the soil and the export of grain I think every inducement should be offered for people to invest their money in the cultivation of the soil, and therefore I hope my resolution will be accepted.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I hope the committee will not accept the amendment. The homestead principle in the North-West should be the principle of residence, and the moment you depart from that, we give up the great motive we have for giving away the land at all. We give, say, 160 acres, in order that we may have a settler on the soil, who contributes by his presence to the growth and progress of the settlement, and I think any principle by which we would allow persons from towns and cities to get land by simply coming out and performing certain settlement duties would be a serious mistake.

Mr. MILLS. There is a class of cases which impressed themselves very strongly on my mind in Manitoba, and I daresay they are to be found in the North-West too, for which no provision is made. There are cases where there is no good water to be found on the homestead or its immediate vicinity. I know parties who took up homesteads in Manitoba, and were obliged to build some distance away from their homesteads, simply for the convenience of obtaining water for domestic purposes and for the use of their stock. The house was perhaps one mile or two miles away; they cultivated the land, they used it for homestead purposes in every way except that the buildings, the actual residence, was not upon the land. Now, it seems to me to be a hardship to such parties to say that they cannot take that land as a homestead, but that they must purchase it. There were cases of that kind, I know, to the west of Rat Portage, where the parties had to build some distance away, in the vicinity of a spring creek, in order to obtain water. Now, I think the hon. gentleman would not interfere with the principle of homesteading, and he will perhaps consult the convenience of a very considerable number of the population in different parts of the country if he provided by the Bill that parties might be counted as homesteaders.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I am afraid the suggestion of the hon. gentleman would be open to great abuse. I know of some cases such as he describes, but the practical difficulty is how are you going to meet them. You cannot form any set of regulations to be of general application—and I think they should be open to as few exceptions as possible—without having some individual cases of hardship, but the moment you open the door to these cases—as in the case of the absence of water, which may be merely due to the absence of proper search and digging for water—you open the door to serious abuses. However, the matter may be held over and considered, but I do not think we should deal with it now.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman will see that the question of sinking artesian wells and searching for water is a matter to be determined by the homesteader, and a man will not submit to the inconvenience of living off his homestead, when he is cultivating it, unless for good reasons. Cases of that sort might be reported upon, and I think there will be no difficulty in providing fairly by law when such parties might be allowed to have their homesteads on certain conditions.

Mr. WATSON. I do not agree with the Minister of the Interior that the amendment I moved is one which the Government could not possibly accept. Under the provisions of the Land Bill it is provided that a person who has made entry for a homestead shall go upon his homestead within six months; that he must break five acres the first year and ten acres the second year. Now in two and a half years he is supposed to have fifteen acres broken on his land, and he has also the privilege of taking a pre-emption. In the fourth year he is supposed to crop the fifteen acres and he has to reside, or is supposed to reside, on his land six months a year for the three years next to his application for a patent. Now, under the amendment, I propose that a man must hold his homestead four years; and he has to have 80 acres under cultivation and buildings to the value of at least $600. This ensures that some person shall live on and cultivate the soil; and that being our object, I think we ought to encourage all parties who have surplus earnings to put them into the cultivation of the soil. I believe this provision would be acceptable to a large number of settlers in the North-West in preference to the ordinary homestead provision. To my mind it would be much more in the interest of the country to have 80 acres broken upon a quarter section than 15 acres, and to have buildings erected to the value of $600 than to have merely a habitable house, which might cost not more than $75 or $60. I do not think this provision could be open to abuse, because a man could only obtain a quarter section of land in four years. I believe it would be a good thing for the country, and I hope the hon. Minister will accept it.

Amendment negatived.

On section 6,

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). This clause was laid over. The objection made to it, as it stands, was that it was going to delay considerably the issue of the patent, so that practically the settler would not get his patent until the end of four years after his entry. The clause is practically in the interest of the settler himself, with the view of securing an inspection of the homestead at the earliest possible moment, so that the patent may issue. In the United States a very expensive method to the settler is adopted. There every settler has to give three months' notice every alternative week in a newspaper, and in it he has to give the names of his two witnesses who are to testify that he has performed his duties. He must do that before he can get his patent. We propose to require a simple notice to be sent to the Commissioner of Dominion Lands or to the Land Board; but as the question of six months' notice arose, I would suggest this as a substitutionary amendment to the clause:

Every person who has obtained a homestead entry, and proposes to apply for a patent for such homestead, shall give six months' notice in writing to the Commissioner of Dominion Lands of his intention to make such application, and shall produce evidence to the officer who is authorised to receive the application that such notice has been duly given.

The effect of that would simply be that if the homesteader gives his notice to the Commissioner of Dominion Lands six months before the time at which he would be entitled by lapse of time to receive his patent, having at the time really fulfilled the conditions of residence and improvement, he would get his patent at the end of six months. But if he leaves his residence duties to the end of three years, it is his own fault if a longer time elapses. It does not at all follow that because the notice is given the whole six months will be consumed; he simply gives his six months' notice in order to give the inspector an opportunity to go to the homestead and see that the duties have been properly performed before the patent issues.

Mr. MILLS. When this clause was under discussion the other day, I pointed out that the six months' notice was altogether unnecessary. What the hon. gentleman desires is to put the necessary machinery into operation for the issue of the patent. He does that by authorising the party to give notice that he desires the patent, and once that is done, the Department will no doubt issue the patent as soon as it can. The party gives notice by making his application. What is the object of requiring him to give six months' notice of his intention to apply, and then requiring him to give a second notice after the report is made? His very object in giving notice is to state that he has performed his duties, and that he is ready for the inspector; and the hon. gentleman is compelling him to make two applications when only one is required. The conditions of the American law are altogether different, because the circumstances are different. The Government there does not depend on an inspector but it requires that legal testimony shall be furnished that the homestead duties have been performed, and that makes all these preliminary steps necessary. But the hon gentleman does not depend on testimony of that sort; he depends on the report of the officer of his Department. I think the clause will meet the object hon. gentlemen have in view by making it read as follows:—

Every person who has obtained a homestead entry and has acquired the right to receive a patent, under the provisions of the said Act or of this Act, shall, on giving notice to the Commissioner of Dominion Lands and providing he has complied with the settlement conditions, be entitled to such patent.

All that would be necessary is that the report should be made; there should be no necessity for six months' delay or for second notice.

Mr. WATSON. I cannot see why the Minister wants a homesteader to give six months' notice. If the homesteader proves that he has complied with the settlement conditions and is entitled to receive the patent, he ought simply to have to apply for his patent and receive it, as soon as the Government are satisfied he has complied with the conditions. If the settler expected, under this clause, to get his homestead at the end of three years, he would have to be qualified at the end of two and a half years, because he has to give six months' notice, or else wait three years and a half for his patent.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman ought to amend his clause and adopt it to suit the convenience of the population. Why require a settler, who has resided upon his homestead for three years and performed the necessary settlement work, to wait another six months before he can get his patent? Why should he be required to make a second application at all? A simple notice from him that he has conformed to the law and that his homestead is open to inspection should be sufficient. The hon. gentleman has made a cumbrous proposition, taken from a law based upon a wholly different plan and policy.

On section 9,

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). This is the clause for which I propose to substitute the clause of which I have given notice. Under the law, as it stands, any person can advance to a settler going into the North-West, and I think the Crofters were brought out under that provision. The law at present provides that any person or persons or companies can advance any immigrants coming into the country to the extent of $500 at 6 per cent., to enable them to make settlements on the lands, and if they remain on the lands three years and get their patents, this $500 is the first lien on the property. It has been represented to me by those who have assisted immigrants, that a somewhat greater security is necessary, and I believe the clause I propose to substitute meets with the approbation of a large number of members on both sides who did me the honor of calling on me. It enables persons to advance to settlers, to enable them to go into the North-West, to the extent of $600, at a rate not exceeding 8 per cent., and against that amount can be charged the money expended in paying the passage money of the settler, for building the settler's house, breaking a portion of his land, &c. In addition may be charged the interest for such period as may be determined upon—for one or two years—against the capital, so that the settler will not have to pay interest the first year or two, that going as part of the capital he will have to pay. The important difference between this clause and the present law is, however, that in the event of a settler leaving the land before he has completed his settlement duties, those who advanced the money shall be entiled to the patents, and their advance will be the first lien upon it; and if, within two years after getting the patent, they have not put on the land a new settler, they be forced to sell the land to any settler for the amount of money advanced, together with the expenses. At present, they simply have the power to put another settler on if they think proper, in cases where the original settler abandoned the land before the issue of the patent. That is the principle of the amendment proposed. It has been represented to me by several people—I may mention one, Sir George Stephen, who has practically, now the railway is completed, ceased to be so actively and constantly engaged in that enterprise, and who is most anxious to devote himself to the settlement of the North-West; I may mention, also, the solicitor of Lady Baroness Burdette-Coutts or of Lady Cathcart, I forget which, Mr. Edwards, of Edinburgh, also spoke to me on the subject. They are all very anxious to continue the work; but one or two settlers, among those brought out, abandoned their lands, and that somewhat alarmed those who have been aiding this excellent work, because the security did not turn out quite as good as they hoped it would, since it is only on the improvements, and, unfortunately, improvements on a deserted homestead are not very valuable. As to the settlers who have taken up lands under these auspices, about 8 per cent. of them have left, and the balance, 92 per cent., are to-day on their homesteads, apparently doing well and quite contented. The belief is that a policy of this kind will enlist a large number of persons in the Old Country, particularly, in the work of putting on new settlers in the North-West. That is the chief object of the resolution of which I gave notice, and which I wish to see embodied in the Bill.

Mr. MILLS. There are two features in the Bill: first, the lien which the hon. gentleman proposes to create on the property; and second, the method by which the lien is to be secured. I suppose the Minister of Justice has looked at the clause and compared it with the Land Registration Bill before the House. The hon. gentleman proposes a method of registration by the entry of a memorandum upon the certificate title; but here is no patent issued, no certificate of title, no provisions to make the proposed law conformable to the provisions of the other Bill.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 75) to incorporate the School Savings Bank.—(Mr. Massue.)

Bill (No. 91) to incorporate the Yarmouth Steamship Company, Limited.—(Mr. Kinney.)

Bill (No. 90) to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to the Montreal Board of Trade.—(Mr. Curran.)

Bill (No. 112) to consolidate the borrowing powers of the Western Canada Loan and Savings Company and to authorise the said company to issue debenture stock.—(Mr. Beaty.)

Bill (No. 113) to consolidate the borrowing powers of the Freehold Loan and Savings Company and to authorise the said company to issue debenture stock.—(Mr. Beaty.)

Bill (No. 98) to consolidate the borrowing powers of the Canada Permanent Loan and Savings Company, and to authorise the said company to issue debenture stock.—(Mr. Small.)

Bill (No. 69) respecting the Bank of Yarmouth.—(Mr. Kinney.)

Bill (No. 114) to amend the Acts respecting the British Canadian Bank.—(Mr. Dawson.)

WINNIPEG AND HUDSON BAY RAILWAY AND STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

Mr. ROYAL moved the second reading of Bill (No. 119) to amend the Act to incorporate the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway and Steamship Company. He said: The object of this Bill is to modify certain clauses of the Act in order to facilitate the work of Mr. Sutherland, the president of the company, who is now in England, to float his scheme. This accounts for the lateness of the season at which this Bill has been placed before the House, and I may say great interest is taken in this enterprise by the people of Manitoba.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 128) to incorporate the Northumberland Straits Tunnel Railway Company.—(Mr. Hackett.)

DOMINION LANDS.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 94) to amend the Dominion Land Act, 1883.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). As to this clause the question arises whether under the Act as it stands the certificate of entry was subject to cancellation at all or not. A difference of opinion existed on that point, and it was to meet that difficulty that this clause was put in. On reading the clause, however, it will be seen that the certificate of entry, unless the entry or sale has been revoked by the Minister, entitles the person to maintain suits of law, &c., and that therefore it may be regarded as an instrument respecting lands, and is covered by section 74, which provides a msans of cancelletion for such instrument. I propose to drop clause 10 of the new Bill. Then I propose to add the following words to clause 13:—"Or such other places as shall from time to time be fixed by the Minister of the Interior." This refers to the meetings of the Board of Examiners of land surveyors. At present the place of meeting is fixed at Ottawa.

Mr. MILLS. The fixing of other places would entail additional cost for travelling expenses. Does the hon. gentleman make any provision for that?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I do not know that it would necessarily imply any more expense, as the members of the board are scattered all over the Dominion. There are a large number in the North-West and a good many in British Columbia, so that, so far as the expenses are concerned, it might involve no more expense to hold a meeting, say at Winnipeg, as it may be convenient sometimes to do.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. BLAKE. I hope before the amendments are considered, the hon. gentleman will have the Bill reprinted, as they are somewhat numerous.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Very well.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION.

Mr. FOSTER moved the second reading of Bill (No. 103) further to amend the Steamboat Inspection Act of 1882. He said: This Bill has been partly explained when it was introduced to the House. The first two sections have reference to some legislation to provide for the issue of 1st and 2nd class certificates to engineers. This is consequent upon the action of the Board of Trade, the outcome of which is that our engineers of the 1st and 2nd grade shall have equal rights with those of the same grade as constituted by the English Board of Trade. Section 4 and the following sections amend the Steamboat Inspection Act of 1882. Section 5 gives a little more power to the chairman of the Board of Steamboat Inspection. The work of the inspector of hulls and the inspector of boilers and machinery is divided, and the certificate of each of the officers is made independent and complete in itself, whereas under the old law the boiler inspector had the power of revising the certificate and the work of the inspector of hulls. Sections 7 to 10 inclusive make verbal amendments. The most important section is section 14 which adds some securities against the dangers arising to vessels from the employment of coal oil lamps and of explosive oils on board of steamers. Section 15 changes the status of engineers, so far as the yearly renewal of their certificates is concerned. Under the law at present these certificates have to be renewed each year. It is proposed in this section to put the original certificates of engineers on the same footing as those of masters and mates. When once gained upon examination they remain good, unless forfeited for cause. Section 52 of the Act is amended so as to make it obligatory on the officer of Customs to demand the production of the certificate of inspection, instead of leaving it optional, as it is under the present law.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and the House resolved itself in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 12,

Mr. WELDON. What provision does this repeal?

Mr. FOSTER. Section 32 of the present Act provides that every steamboat shall be provided with sufficient means for lowering safely and expeditiously each boat required to be attached to such steamboat; and sub-section 2 of that section provides that three davits shall be sufficient for lowering the boats. That sub-section it is proposed to repeal, as three davits are not considered sufficient.

Mr. WELDON. Does the hon. Minister propose to have an inspector appointed for New Brunswick? I believe the late inspector has resigned.

Mr. FOSTER. Application has been made looking to a division of the Maritime Provinces into two inspectorships. It is not proposed, however, at present to do that. Mr. Smith, who was formerly our inspector, has been superannuated, and a younger and more active man has been appointed. If he cannot overtake the work, help will have to be given to him.

Mr. WELDON. Where is it proposed that the new inspector shall reside?

Mr. FOSTER. The new inspector has been for the last month in St. John city.

Mr. WELDON. It is important that, as navigation has opened early, the boats should be inspected speedily.

Mr. FOSTER. The law provides that each boat shall be inspected once a year, and the inspector is given two or three months to overtake his work.

Mr. McCALLUM. A great many complaints have been made by steamboat owners about the office of the chairman of steamboat inspection. They consider that his office ought to be here at headquarters. There is a great deal of red tape about it. If any complaint is made, it is sent here to the Minister; then it is sent to Toronto, and then it is sent back to Ottawa again before an answer is given. I insist that the Government shall make it their duty to see that the chairman's office is brought here. There are no less than three of these people living in Toronto, and I do not see why the chairman should be there also.

Mr. FOSTER. I think there is no doubt about that. A great many questions arise at the Department for the solution of which the chairman should be here, as vexatious delays often take place. However, it has been found somewhat difficult during the past years to make the change; but the Department has the change in view, and on the first feasible occasion it will be made.

Mr. McCALLUM. Will the hon. gentleman tell us what is in the way? There is a great deal of trouble caused in having the chairman in Toronto instead of in the capital. This place is as central as Toronto, and I do not see why he should not remain here.

Mr. BLAKE. I can tell the hon. gentleman why. It is the grand principle that the office is made for the officer and not the officer for the office.

Mr. McCALLUM. It is a very important office, but at the same time there are many men in this country qualified to fill it; and it is not treating the steamboat interest fairly, that, for the sake of aiding one individual—I do not care whether he be friend or foe—its interests are to be neglected.

Mr. FOSTER. No doubt Toronto for steamboat inspection purposes, especially in this section, is quite as central as Ottawa, probably it might be more so, but the difficulty arises in the Department itself, on account of delays in settling questions, which might be settled at once if the chairman of the board were here.

Mr. WELDON. Who has been appointed inspector for the Maritime Provinces?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Douglas Stevens of Halifax.

Mr. WELDON. My hon. friend is aware that a large number of steamers are employed in bringing down rafts to St. John and in the harbor itself, and steamboat owners complain that they cannot have their boats inspected in time. I think the work of inspecting steamers is too much for one man, taking the number of boats in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

Mr. FOSTER. One inspector has done it up to the present and he resided in St. John. The present inspector is also a resident of St. John, and although it will be a little more difficult for a new man to undertake the work, it is to be hoped the difficulty will only be temporary. The expense of the steamboat inspection has to be borne out of the fees, and of late years it has been more than the receipts from the fees. We have to take that into consideration, if we wish to make the expenditure balance the receipts.

On section 15,

Mr. FOSTER. I have been asked by steamboat owners to remedy what seems to be little injustice in section 45, sub-section 4 of the Act. That provides that persons who hold certificates as assistant first-class engineers under the old Act may, at any time, exchange them for certificates as third-class engineers under the present Act, on the payment of $5 to the Inspection Board. It appears that assistant first-class engineers are inferior in qualifications to the second and third-class engineers under the old Act, and I have been asked to insert before first-class assistant engineers second and third-class under the old Act. I would ask, therefore, that after "as" in the first line of sub-section 4, section 46, of the Act be added the words "second or third-class engineer or as."

Amendment agreed to.

On section 16,

Mr. VAIL. It seems to me that this might be improved a little in the wording. It refers to "section 50 of this Act." It ought to be "section 50 of the Act hereby amended."

Mr. MITCHELL. Is this power given to the chief officer, to sell a steamboat in default of payment of the penalties contained in the old Act? It seems a large power to entrust to a chief officer of Customs.

Mr. FOSTER. It is the same in the old Act. I wish to add another section. Section 34 of the old Act provides that life-preservers shall be made of the size and material approved of by the inspector. That may mean the quality of the material, and in that case it is consistent with section 36, which provides that a cork jacket shall be the only form of life-preservers to be used on passenger steamboats. That restricts the form of the life-preserver to one material alone. It has been brought to the attention of the Department that a cheaper, and it is thought equally good form of life-preserver, not made of cork, may be had which could be used on some of the smaller vessels; and probably, if after being tested it proves good, could be substituted in part for the present and more expensive article. I propose, therefore, to amend section 36 by adding "or such other description of life-preserver as may be approved by the Governor in Council."

Mr. WELDON. A cork jacket is known to be a valuable life-preserver on large steamships, and it would be well to limit this to smaller boats.

Mr. FOSTER. Our larger boats carry life-preservers to a certain maximum, and are then allowed to use wooden floats or other contrivances. If a form of life-preserver, other than cork, is found to be sufficient, the deficiency might be made up by these instead of by the bulkier floats.

Mr. MITCHELL. A petition was, I believe, presented to the Department in regard to life-preservers containing a light in the case of people falling overboard. I would ask whether the Department has taken that subject into consideration, because I think it is very important. It is adopted in England, and by our Atlantic steamers, and I think the Minister should give it his attention.

Mr. FOSTER. A largely signed petition came before the Department this year, and I have no doubt that the particular kind of light and preserver is excellent. It was not, however, thought necessary to introduce it by legislation this year. Of course it is an added expense, and, unless there is a fair demand for it, or a necessity for it in our inland waters, the expense would bear heavily, especially just now, when the shipping interest is not in the most prosperous condition in our inland waters.

Mr. MITCHELL. I found that the petition was signed by the leading shipowners of Montreal, and I think it is a subject the Department might fairly take into consideration.

Mr. FOSTER. The Department has already tested those lights, and found them to be excellent of their kind.

Mr. JACKSON. What amount of dead weight are these life-preservers intended to buoy up?

Mr. FOSTER. The Bill provides that every life-preserver shall sustain twenty-three pounds of cast iron immersed in water.

Mr. JACKSON. Under the American system, it is twenty-five pounds.

Mr. FOSTER. It may be objected that substituting this new form of testing might add expense, in that the present life-preservers would not come up to that buoyancy. I am informed, however, by the chairman of the board that the new test will not displace any considerable number of the life-preservers at present in use.

Mr. McCALLUM. Can the Minister tell us the material which the new preserver he speaks of is to be made of?

Mr. FOSTER. At present there is only one material out of which the law allows life-preservers to be made, that is cork. I have had in the Department, within a few days, a rather ingenious form of life-preserver, which the officers are now testing. It is made of light wood, hollow inside, in cylindrical form, with a head screwed into it filled with air. It is very buoyant and less expensive than the cork jacket, and, if it stands the test, it will be as effective and at the same time less costly.

Mr. McCALLUM. It is a most important question whether it would not get out of order and let out the air. Large steamships now carry the cork jackets, and a number of floats in addition. It is easy to throw a piece of plank out which will support a man, and that does not get out of order. You should be very careful in regard to any life-preservers except those made of cork. Formerly they used to make pin-cushions of them and destroy them. It would not do to make a pin-cushion of this new kind.

Mr. BAIN. A friend of mine drew my attention to the fact the other day that in the Act, as you propose to amend it, you require the standard of weight to be thirty-three pounds in place of sixteen. Does that imply that all the old life-preservers are to be laid aside and superseded by the new standard at once, or does it only apply to future changes?

Mr. FOSTER. I explained that a moment ago. The clause which is introduced into this Bill making the new test, is simply a change in the form of test, and the test as applied here will not displace those that come up to the proper test at the present time, so that it will not involve additional expense. It is simply another way of testing by attaching to the life-preserver cast iron metal to the weight of so many pounds, and throwing it into the water, and if the life-preserver buoys it up, it passes the test.

On section 17,

Mr. LISTER. I desire to call the attention of the Minister to a circumstance that materially affects the masters, mates, engineers and pilots of steamers of this Dominion. Before coming down to this Session I met several of these people, and they desired me to call the attention of the Government to the fact that before they were entitled to take command or to sail on American steamers, they have to be residents of the United States and to declare their intention to become citizens of that country. Now, people following these avocations in this country, feel that if such regulations are adopted in the United States our Government ought to provide similar regulations with respect to foreigners in Canada. Within my own knowledge several of our sailors, masters and others, within the last few months, have removed from Canada to the United States and made the necessary declarations although they had heretofore commanded and sailed American steamers while residents of this country. I noticed the other day, in one of the local papers, this item:

"Some months ago Congressman Mayberry, of Detroit, Mich., introduced a Bill in the House, which provides that hereafter no alien who has not declared his intentions to become a citizen of the United States shall be granted a license as pilot, engineer, mate, captain or other officer on any steam-vessel carrying the flag of the United States. The object of the Bill was said by its author to prevent Canadian vessel men from entering the service of the United States steamboat owners to the exclusion of Americans. The Bill was favorably reported from the Commerce Committee of the House some days ago, and passed Wednesday without a dissenting vote. It is believed that it will go through the Senate with equal facility."

Now, these men I refer to appear to have had some knowledge that such legislation was to be introduced into Congress, and for the purpose of protecting themselves and being able to follow their employment, they have left the Province of Ontario and removed to the State of Michigan. Now, Sir, if the United States think proper to pass such a law as that, excluding Canadians from commanding or working upon American steamboats in the capacities mentioned in this article, I think it is but right to our people on this side, that Parliament should pass a similar law. I believe there is a law upon our Statute-book preventing Americans from occupying these positions upon vessels above a certain tonnage; but on vessels below a certain tonnage, American engineers, mates and so on, are entitled, I believe, to take command and sail them. I think, on behalf of this large class, it is the duty of the Government to introduce such legislation as will place them upon an equality with men of their class in the United States. I promised these gentlemen I would bring the matter before the House, and I now discharge that duty. I hope the matter will receive the consideration of the Government, and that such legislation as may be necessary to give effect to the reasonable wishes, the simple rights of these men, will be passed, if not this Session, at all events at the next Session.

Mr. McCALLUM. Does the hon. gentleman complain that Americans come into this country and take charge of our vessels as masters, mates and engineers? If they do, of course there is a great deal in what the hon. gentleman says. But if they do not, certainly we cannot interfere with the legislation of the United States.

Mr. LISTER. Because they do not do it, we should give them the privilege of doing it—is that the hon. gentleman's reasoning? I know as a fact that American engineers are working on our vessels.

Mr. McCALLUM. I do not think I know a single instance where Americans have come in and taken charge of our vessels; but, on the other hand, I know that many Canadians go to the United States, and that one-half the American vessels on inland waters are to-day commanded by Canadians. The hon. gentleman says that now they must become citizens. Formerly, I believe, if they lived there it was sufficient to declare their intention. But as long as that does not affect Canadians here, of course we cannot put an embargo on people going into the United States to take charge of American vessels. But do American citizens come into Canada and take charge of our vessels as masters, mates and engineers? If they do, there is a cause of complaint, and the Government ought to look into it.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman forgets that although many Canadians have gone into the United States and many American vessels are commanded by Canadians, these men heretofore have not been obliged to sever their allegiance to this country. But under this new law they are obliged to do so, and to become American citizens. Because none of these men come over to Canada, the hon. gentleman argues that we should allow the law to remain as it is. The hon. gentleman must not forget that while our people heretofore have gone to the United States, it is only reasonable to suppose that under the National Policy, which the hon. gentleman supports, the shipping interest ought to become very great and prosperous in this country. It is hardly creditable that it is in a depressed condition, and if it booms up, as we have a right to expect, we will find Americans coming over here to take the place of our own engineers and seamen, and we ought to stop the possibility of such a thing. As a matter of fact, American engineers are working on boats in our waters to-day, numbers of them. I say this should not be so. If the Americans think proper to place restrictions upon Canadians working on their boats the same restrictions should be placed upon Americans working on our boats. There should be reciprocity.

Mr. McCALLUM. I am very glad the hon. gentleman has become a convert to the National Policy, and that he now goes in for protection.

Mr. LISTER. It does not involve payment of any duty.

Mr. McCALLUM. Certainly it does. If American engineers come here to work, they have to pay a fee on examination. I am very glad the hon. gentleman has become converted and is now a National Policy man. I do not, however, see that it is necessary to have an Act of Parliament passed to accomplish that result. His only complaint is in regard to engineers. There is nothing to hinder the Government passing an Order in Council, providing that all engineers on Canadian boats shall be British subjects.

Mr. LISTER. Let such an Order in Council be passed. But from the feeling way in which the hon. gentleman speaks, I should judge he has an American engineer on one of his own boats. I believe he has; if he has not this year, he had last.

Mr. McCALLUM. I always speak feelingly what I believe is right. The hon. gentleman says I have an American engineer on some boat owned by me. I never employ American engineers when I can get Canadians. He had no right to make that statement. I may say I have no engineer at all now. I did not come to this House, however, to represent myself, but my constituents, and to say I am interested, because the hon. gentleman brings up a point in the discussion in which I cannot agree with him, that the Government should bring in a law which I do not consider necessary, is surely improper. I agree that we should exclude Americans, if it is necessary to do so, but they do not come here.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman must pardon me for having charged him in some way with interested motives. I had entirely lost track of the fact that the hon. gentleman had the great misfortune some years ago to have lost that vessel.

Mr. McCALLUM. What vessel was that? I want an explanation as to what vessel is referred to, as I have lost several vessels. Does the hon. gentleman refer to the vessel for which the Government paid me. I can tell him that what I got from the Government I got by a vote of this House, and further there were only eighteen Grits who voted against the grant.

Mr. LISTER. I did not charge the hon. gentleman with anything of that kind; I am not complaining about his getting the money.

Mr. McCALLUM. If you have any dirt to throw, over with it, and I am ready to meet you.

Mr. MILLS. Down with your cash.

Mr. McCALLUM. So far as my acts have gone they have been straightforward. There was another hon. gentleman who talked in somewhat much the same way about me. It is true a few years ago I had a vessel going through the Welland Canal and she was damaged owing to the fault of the Government in not keeping the canal in proper repair. The amount the Government paid me was what I proved to be my loss before the arbitrators, and they kept me out of the money eight years and then did not pay me any interest. There were only eighteen Grits who voted against that grant, and they were the extreme wing of the party, for everyone knew that I had suffered and all through no fault of my own. This is the scandal of which I am said to be guilty, and I cannot rise in this House and speak on a question of importance to the commerce of the country without being told that I am unfortunate, if so, there are many unfortunate men. I am not the first man who has got damages from the Government.

Mr. BLAKE. We will take it all back and say that the hon. gentleman has been fortunate.

Mr. McCALLUM. That may be your opinion. I have not made any complaint against you, but I am here as an independent member of Parliament and I am ready to meet any charges. If any hon. member has anything to say against me or against my course in Parliament or any insinuations to make, out with them, for I am ready to meet one and all.

Mr. FOSTER. With respect to what the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) spoke of, I have noticed the same paragraph in the paper as that which he read. I do not think it is the law yet. I think they have had a provision making residence necessary. That is also necessary for masters and mates who take charge of our boats, they must have been domiciled for a number of years in Canada before they can obtain certificates as masters and mates of our vessels. With respect to engineers, I do not think it is so. However, when that legislation becomes perfect, if it should become the law of the United States, the Government can look into the matter with respect to our engineers.

Mr. MILLS. I am sure it will be gratifying to the colleagues of the Minister of Public Works to know that the constituency of Verchères in Quebec has been carried by the Liberals by a very large majority.

Bill reported.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee.

Salaries and contingent expenses of the Senate $57,388 00

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Here is something contrary to all precedent. The Senate are cutting down expenses, and I would like to know the reason. How is it that they are able to get along with only $57,000 as against $61,000 the year before?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. "While the lamp holds out to burn, &c."

Mr. BOWELL. I suppose the hon. gentleman has not forgotten the fact that the Session last year was about double the usual length.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think any of u will forget that fact for the term of our natural lives. Is that the only reason for decrease?

Mr. SPEAKER. The details show that the vote last year was only $57,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I know that, but I see there is no apparent explanation of it.

Salaries, House of Commons per Clerk's estimates $64,075 00

Mr. SPEAKER. This item shows an increase of $725, which is accounted for in this way: There are thirty clerks who are receiving an increase of $50 per year, in accordance with the report of the Internal Economy Commissioners, laid on the Table last year. That makes $1,500. That report provided for a new junior clerk who has been appointed at $400, making an increase of $1,900, but there has been a saving in the salary of Mr. Poetter, whose death has occurred since last Session. This makes a net increase of $725, but owing to some changes which have taken place since that time, next year there will be really no increase, although we are giving these statutory increases of $50.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice there are thirty-seven sessional messengers at $250 a Session. A certain number of messengers are, no doubt, necessary, but I hardly think there is a necessity for thirty-seven. I do not know how many there were engaged in the past, but I have noticed that there are more than are really necessary. I cannot see that there is work for so many men at $250 a Session.

House of Commons—Contingencies $24,000 00

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Last year, although we had a very long Session, we did not seem to require the whole of this amount. Only $19,000 were charged to contingencies. Was that sufficient?

Mr. SPEAKER. The whole of the $12,000 is required for stationery. The stationery is increasing very largely every year, as the hon. gentleman must know from the quantity sent out to the country, and it is with great difficulty that the clerk of stationery is able to keep down the estimates. He has only done it by giving us a cheaper kind of stationery. He has made a great saving by lowering the quality of the envelopes. Hon. members now use a great number of envelopes instead of wrappers in sending out their speeches and papers, as they think that ensures their being sent with greater expedition, and they, of course, cost more than common wrapping paper. The other items are the same. We may have only spent $9,000 last year, but the saving has been in unforeseen and unprovided expenses, the amount of which we cannot estimate exactly in advance, and we try to save as much as possible in them.

Mr. VAIL. Do the boxes of stationery come out of that amount?

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes, out of the $12,000.

Mr. VAIL. I observe in the Auditor-General's report that while the trunks of the House of Commons cost only $3, those of the Senate cost $4.50. Are they not made by the same party?

Mr. SPEAKER. We buy very closely; I suppose we are more economical.

Publishing Debates, House of Commons..... $40,000 00

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How much did this service cost us last year?

Mr. SPEAKER. About $70,000, owing to the long Session.

Salaries and contingencies, per Sergeant-at-Arms estimate $30,842 50

Mr. SPEAKER. That shows a decrease of $10, which arises from putting the report of the Commissioners of Internal Economy into operation, and is owing to a change in the messengers. While the other messengers got the statutory increase, the new messenger was given the lower salary.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Under whose control is the restaurant down stairs?

Mr. SPEAKER. The Internal Economy Commissioners. I hope it has been satisfactory this year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, it has not. I believe it is good enough up to a reasonable hour, but when we are kept late, it requires a little looking after. It is not as well attended to as it might be.

Printing, printing paper and book-binding..... $80,000 00

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. One would suppose that the amount last year would have been more than ample for any ordinary Session. I presume a portion of the expenditure was due to the increased Session, but apparently we only spent $72,724. It appears a very large sum for that particular service, and it has been increased once or twice within two or three years.

Mr. BOWELL. It is possible that last year they may have had a surplus from the year before, or otherwise the amount might have been exceeded. That is the only information I have been given.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Apparently there were some disputes with the contractors. What was it about?

Mr. BOWELL. I never heard of any, except the usual dispute as to quality of paper or difference in color.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. 20 per cent. of half the year's work is said to have been withheld for some reason or other. What I want to know is simply whether this $72,000 really covers the amount expended last year or is only apparently covering it. The whole account seems somewhat complex.

Mr. BOWELL. It may be possibly some accounts are not in. They retain 20 per cent. every year until the whole business is closed, and in this account they are charged with the 20 per cent. of last year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They seem to have got through in a manner which is rather suspicious.

Mr. BOWELL. I see there was some dispute between the Auditor General and the Printing Committee, the nature of which the hon. gentleman will see by the correspondence.

Mr. SPEAKER. The account was not made up in the form that pleased the Auditor General, and the committee recommended that his signature be dispensed with.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Auditor General would not pass the account, and he is to be relieved of any necessity of signing any account. I do not think this House ought to concur in a report which nullifies the duties of an officer as regards ourselves in particular. It is a short and summary way of disposing of the Auditor.

Mr. SPEAKER The objection was only as to the form of the account. The hon. gentleman will see it all explained in the report of the Committee which comes up for concurrence on Tuesday next.

Salary of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery..... $2,250 00

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Up to what figure is he supposed to go!

Mr. SPEAKER. $2,400.

Arts, agriculture and statistics..... $99,500 00

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What was done with this amount of $6,000 for the care of archives.

Mr. CARLING. This is the usual expenditure: Books purchased, $1,058; copying, $732; travelling expenses, $942; expenses in London, Eng., $1,833; binding, $773, and so on.

Mr. SPEAKER.

Mr. VAIL. What did the whole expenditure amount to?

Mr. CARLING. $5,224.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How is it that in 1885 apparently an expenditure of nearly $12,000 took place on this? The vote appears to have been very largely exceeded.

Mr. CARLING. It is made up of the same kind of items.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What I wanted to know was what had been done, what particular manuscripts or works connected with the history of Canada are at present in process of being obtained, and what does the Minister intend to use this particular vote for in the course of the next year.

Mr. CARLING. I am told that this is printed in detail in the report of Mr. Brymner presented to the House. Historical documents have been copied which have been selected by Mr. Brymner.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What ones?

Mr. CARLING. I cannot exactly recite them at the moment, but I shall be glad to get the information for the hon. gentleman before concurrence.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In 1885, one sees a large sum, nearly $2,000, for books and newspapers for archives. Books of course one understands. What description of newspapers are they, and how much of that went for newspapers? Are they old files of newspapers that have come into the possession of the archivist?

Mr. CARLING. They are files of newspapers which are selected and kept as a record.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Oh, you make future history. I hope, if that is part of the work, the newspapers which represent the cause of truth and purity on this side of the House are not forgotten. I have no doubt that, if the future historian only gets the subsidised press, he will be awfully bothered on comparing it with Hansard to know which is which.

Mr. BOWELL. I am afraid it will be very difficult to get any newspapers such as the hon. gentleman refers to.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What! the subsidised newspapers?

Mr. BOWELL. No; the first-class the hon. gentleman refers to, the newspapers representing truth and purity.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No doubt. However, there is a paper called the Intelligencer which might be got.

Mr. BOWELL. No doubt, that is a true paper. Then there is the British Whig.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, there is some truth in that.

Mr. BOWELL. I suppose in the part you own.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How did we come to spend so much as $2,500 for the Queen's Printer in connection with the archives?

Mr. BOWELL. An hon. gentleman wants to know if you are a shareholder in the Whig?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, I am not. I give the hon. gentleman that information gratis.

Mr. BOWELL. You are just as much as I am in the other paper you mentioned.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What does that amount of $2,500 consist of?

Mr. CARLING. It is chiefly for binding.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is not that a disproportionate sum out of so small a vote?

Mr. CARLING. I am informed that it is all for binding. Large numbers of public documents and papers and all the manuscripts were bound.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Surely that would not be an ordinary usual charge?

Mr. CARLING. No, it is not an ordinary usual charge, but an extra charge.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has been long enough in the Department to have had his attention specially called to these matters. But with respect to these archives, I mentioned once or twice that there was reason to believe that very important papers were to be found in some of the American States, more particularly in New England. I want to know if any steps are being taken to procure copies of the rarer manuscripts in the various libraries in the New England States. I called his predecessor's attention to that matter, and something was said about the desirability of making an enquiry.

Mr. CARLING. Correspondence is now going on in reference to this subject.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am inclined to think there is a good deal of interesting and valuable matter connected with the early history of Canada to be found in the New England State libraries, and I happen to know that the New England societies have been paying a great deal of attention to these matters within the last two years. It would be worth while for the hon. gentleman to make a note of this, and to cause some attention to be directed that way. A few hundred dollars expended there would, I am inclined to think, produce very interesting results.

Preparations of Criminal Statistics..... $4,000 00

Mr. VAIL. There is an amount for extra services in the Agricultural Department, and I do not see how that can come in here. On this item of criminal statistics, $4,323 were spent last year, and to make up that item there is extra services in the Agricultural Department, $1,012. It seems a large amount for extra services in making the criminal statistics. I do not think that ought to appear in the Agricultural Department,

Mr. CARLING. This is chiefly for extra clerks, copying and compiling a large amount of statistics.

Dominion Exhibition $10,000 00

Mr. FISHER. I would like to ask the Minister whether any decision has been come to yet as to whether this exhibition is to be held this year.

Mr. CARLING. Applications have been made from different parts for this money, but no definite decision has been come to yet.

Mr. FISHER. I would strongly urge upon the Minister that this grant should be given to the exhibition of the Eastern Townships' Agricultural Association, in Sherbrooke next fall. Last fall this association held its opening exhibition in the city of Sherbrooke, which may be called the capital of the Eastern Townships, and that exhibition gave promise in the immediate future of a very important agricultural union of the people from all over the Province of Quebec, and I may also say from all over the Dominion. A great effort is to be made this year that the second exhibition of that agricultural association shall be a very much greater success than it was last year; and knowing, as I do, that this association is taking a great deal of pains and spending a great deal of money to perfect their new grounds for the exhibition, I trust the Government will aid them by having the Dominion Exhibition there this season. I understand that the Quebec Local Government has agreed that the grant for the Provincial Exhibition shall be given to this association at Sherbrooke, and if additional assistance is given by the Dominion Government, there is no doubt whatever that the exhibition this fall at Sherbrooke will be one of the best which has ever been held in the Dominion of Canada. The association of which I speak is a young organisation, just commencing a work which, I think, will be of the greatest benefit to the Eastern Townships, and I think it is only fair that it should receive the assistance and recognition from the Dominion Government which the holding of the Dominion Exhibition there this year would afford it. I refer to this matter as being myself a member for one of the counties of the Eastern Townships, and especially as being interested in this association, which the people of the townships hope will become a permanent one, and will be of great value and assistance to the agricultural interests to that part of the Province of Quebec. I trust, therefore, that the Dominion Government will favorably entertain the application which, I understand, has been made to them, that the Dominion grant should be given to that association.

Mr. CARLING. An official application has been made by the Agricultural Association at Sherbrooke, and I also understand that the Provincial Exhibition is likely to be held there.

Mr. FISHER. That has already been decided.

Mr. CARLING. An official application has been made and strongly urged by the member for Sherbrooke, the member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), and the member for Compton (Mr. Pope). I can only say that the matter is receiving favorable consideration.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I would suggest to the Minister of Agriculture that he should consider whether it would not be well to have this exhibition in British Columbia. I think that would be a most desirable place, and I am certain the people of Eastern Canada would embrace the opportunity of visiting that part of the Dominion which the opening of the Canadian Pacific Railway will shortly enable them to do at little expense. I sincerely trust the Minister will take this matter into his serious consideration.

Mr. HESSON. There are other points, as well as the city of Sherbrooke and the Province of British Columbia, that deserve some consideration. I also am an applicant for a grant by this Parliament to an agricultural exhibition. The city of Stratford is a young, flourishing and enterprising city, the centre of a fine agricultural district, yet it has never had a dollar's support for agricultural purposes, since this Government came into existence. Stratford is well situated for railway accommodation, it has six railway outlets, and is in the centre of one of the finest agricultural districts in Ontario. Indeed I may say it is the garden of Canada, and I think the Minister of Agriculture might very fairly consider the claims of Stratford. A grant has gone to London, to Hamilton, to Guelph, and frequently to Toronto, but, Stratford, the hub of Canada, has been omitted. I trust the Minister of Agriculture will not overlook us any longer. He is a neighbor of my own and should have some consideration for the flourishing county where agriculture is far from being neglected, but still it could be encouraged by the Government. The Eastern Townships are also pressing their claim. I trust the Minister of Agriculture will consider that there are also points elsewhere which have claims that should be pressed and would be pressed.

Mr. WATSON. I hope the Minister of Agriculture will not lose sight of the North-West. I have an idea that British Columbia is a little too far west and Sherbrooke a little too far east, that Stratford does not belong to us, and that the exhibition should be held at Winnipeg, which is the hub of the Dominion. I hope the Minister will take into his favorable consideration the question of giving the grant to Manitoba. I pointed out last year that it will be a great benefit to the country if the people who went there were able to see the exhibition held there. I hope the Minister will take the matter into consideration, not only in fairness to the Province but for the advantage to the Dominion.

Mr. TROW. The convincing argument of the hon. member for North Perth, should satisfy the Minister as to the advisability of holding the Dominion Exhibition at Stratford. We have every convenience there, and a more favorable point could not be selected in the Dominion. The Government, I hope, will take this matter into its favorable consideration.

Mr. CARLING. I am very glad to hear such glowing accounts from the different sections of the Dominion, including Victoria, B. C. I am sure this House has a desire to do everything possible to advance the interests of British Columbia; but the Canadian Pacific Railway is barely completed, and not in running operation. It will be in thorough order in a short time, and I hope we will all have an opportunity of seeing that beautiful country, when no doubt we will be able to consider the propriety and necessity of doing everything to advance its interests, from an agricultural point of view. With respect to the remarks of the members for North Perth and South Perth, I am sure no one knows the prosperous state of that country better than I do; that Stratford is a most prosperous city, and the county is one of the best agricultural districts in Canada. But as the amount of money voted for agricultural purposes was expended in the west last year, I can hardly promise that we will consider the claim from that quarter this year, but another year we will be glad to give it every consideration. With respect to Manitoba; there can be no doubt its turn will come, but for the present I hardly think the hon. member would expect the Dominion Exhibition to be held there. No doubt, in a few years, the excellent facilities for getting into the country will justify it being held there.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice that the money was divided last year. According to the Auditor General's report $5,000 was contributed to the Montreal exhibition and the balance to Ottawa.

Mr. CARLING. The hon. gentleman is referring to the previous year, when the amount was divided as he has stated. $10,000 were given to the Provincial Exhibition at London last year.

Mr. BAIN. I do not propose to put in a claim for any particular locality with which I am connected, but I think it would be wise to ask, what is the beneficial effect to the Dominion of the grant we make to this exhibition? What is the benefit to the Dominion at large after the experiment has been tried for several years? I grant that, in so far as the localities receiving the money is concerned, I can understand that Stratford, Montreal, and all those places are quite interested in having the prize lists of their exhibitions in the locality increased by a handsome sum such as Parliament contributes. So far there is no fault to be found. But I remember a few years ago when this proposal was started it was with a view to secure something in the way of a Dominion representative character in those exhibitions. I begin to doubt whether we have any tangible results sufficient to justify us in continuing this large expenditure. In so far as the newer Provinces of British Columbia and of the Prairie Province are concerned, and perhaps one central point in the Maritime Provinces, there is considerable to be said, especially in regard to the North-West, in favor of a Dominion contribution proving useful. But I ask the representatives from the older Provinces, where agriculture has been developed for many years and where enterprise has shown itself, what are the net results to the Dominion from this additional expenditure of money? If the amount is given to encourage the development of the North-West Territories and British Columbia, then I am in favor of the proposal; but so far as the experience of the older Provinces goes the time has come to consider whether that money is not perfectly wasted. What is the result in regard to the Provincial Exhibition? Is there not a strong feeling that with our local development and the wealth and enterprise manifested in our Province that the Provincial Exhibition has almost survived its day and become a thing of the past. If the Dominion grant is to be any benefit, it can only be by aiding enterprises in some of the newer Provinces in the Confederacy.

Mr. CARLING. I differ from the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, as to the particular localities where the exhibitions are held getting the benefit. I do not think they receive any more benefit from $30,000 in prizes than from $20,000. These prizes are not paid to the localities; they are paid to the agriculturists and manufacturers from all parts of the Dominion. Last year when the exhibition was held in London, exhibitors came from Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and all the different Provinces. The show was not only a credit to the Province of Ontario, but a credit to the Dominion of Canada. The amount of prizes paid was something like $30,000, and the larger the amount of prize money offered the greater is the inducement to exhibitors as well as others, to attend from the different Provinces. I am quite sure that $10,000 added to the prize money of the Provincial Exhibition increases very much the number of the exhibits, and, of course, the exhibitors are chiefly from the agricultural districts.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). It simply amounts to this, that you offer the parties larger prizes, you help to draw a large local exhibit, and to the same extent a larger outside exhibit. But I ask any person familiar with the facts, what the number of exhibits was that was drawn to London, last year, from beyond the Province of Ontario. I venture to say it was but a small proportion of the exhibit. But this does not touch my objection, which is, that when we have paid our money, we have simply made the local exhibition a little larger; we have not succeeded in developing anything new in these exhibitions. So far as Ontario is concerned, the best guarantee of their success is to hold them in a densely populated part of the country and thereby draw large numbers of visitors. Everybody knows that the backbone of these exhibitions is the gate-money collected, and we all know that a week of pleasant weather, or the reverse, may mean all the difference between the success and failure of a show. The object was, when this grant originated, to give a Dominion character to these exhibitions, but I submit, from the way in which the Dominion is naturally placed, it is practically impossible to place any new feature in any exhibition in the Province of Ontario, by an additional grant of this kind, which it did not already possess in a very high degree, and it is for that reason that I begin to ask whether it is worth what it costs to the Dominion.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think it would be well, if the Minister of Agriculture feels it to be his duty to continue this grant, that the exhibition held in each Province each year should receive the entire sum which is going round the different Provinces, and that the prize list should be so arranged that a certain sum would be offered for a certain kind of exhibits from each of the Provinces. The money, as given at present, does not accomplish the end which is intended, that of giving it a Dominion character, though you may get a few more exhibits and a few more people. If you give a prize for the different classes of products of goods from each Province, it would undoubtedly have a beneficial effect by showing the people what each of the Provinces can do. For instance, if the Minister were to stipulate that prizes should be offered for wheat, or pease, or cattle from British Columbia and the other Provinces, it would tend to bring together a large amount of produce of one kind and another; it would educate the people, by enabling them to compare the products of different Provinces. It would show, for instance, how far Ontario is ahead of Quebec, how far Quebec is ahead of the Maritime Provinces, and possibly how far British Columbia was behind the others in the matter of stock, cereals, root crops or other produce. If people in one Province were desirous of selling out and going to another, they could get a good idea, by going to the exhibition, what Province would suit them best, and it might be the means of some of our people going to British Columbia, for instance, instead of to the other side of the line. At present, I do not think the object intended is accomplished. I know there are many people who make a business of attending exhibitions, and at present it is an acknowledged fact, that when you have attended one of these exhibitions, whether in Montreal, or Toronto, or Ottawa, you see all that is to be seen. With regard to Stratford, I say it is undoubtedly the centre of a very desirable agricultural district, and it would be as well entitled to a share of the money as Sherbrooke, Montreal and other places. If you are going to distribute the money that way you had better divide it all round. I know towns in my own section which would be glad to get $100 as a help to their shows. In that way, by comparing the products of the different Provinces, the people would get educated, and competition between the different Provinces in the matter of products would be encouraged. But in dividing the money as you are doing, you are not going to accomplish anything.

Mr. HESSON. I am somewhat suprised at the remarks of the two gentlemen who have spoken last, especially those of the hon. member for North Wentworth (Mr. Bain), whose county has had the advantage of many a Dominion exhibition, and who now seems desirous of cutting all other places off. I do not think that is a fair spirit to exhibit. We all remember the fine exhibitions that have been held in Hamilton, the capital of the hon. gentleman's county. The last speaker says the grants have not accomplished any good. I differ from him in that. I think they have had the effect of developing stock of the very finest character. We have had exhibitors in Canada whose fame as the owners of stock has gone beyond the country. The hon. gentleman must admit that the aid granted has been an encouragement to those gentlemen to improve the quality of their stock, and if he has attended the exhibitions he must have marked the extraordinary improvement in the stock from time to time. That in itself is a sufficient answer to his statement. The proposition of the hon. gentleman, that stock should be brought from British Columbia, is most absurd, even if it should get the prize. I think our experience in the past, of the anxiety shown in different parts of the country, from time to time, to get the benefit of this expenditure, is of itself a sufficient justification for it.

Mr. McMULLEN. Of course the prize list would have to be arranged so that you would offer a prize for a certain article, the product of British Columbia or the product of the Maritime Provinces, and in that way you would attract exhibits from the different Provinces. If the money was divided in that way, say in connection with the Toronto Exhibition or in connection with an exhibition at Montreal or here, it would be of advantage. If you had to give $10 for a bushel of wheat from British Columbia, it would still be an advantage, because it would let the people see what is raised there. But in arranging the list as you do, you simply increase the prize list for the little district where the exhibition takes place. I hope the Minister of Agriculture takes a note of my suggestion, and if he acts on it I think we shall have an exhibition that will fairly represent the whole Dominion, and for which our people would be willing to grant the money.

Mr. WILSON. I think there is a fair chance of the hon. member for North Perth having the exhibition in his town, for I understand that the city of London has sold its exhibition grounds, and will not, therefore, be able to have any more exhibitions. I understand that the Military College is to be established on those grounds. I imagine that the Minister of Agriculture is the only person who has any property in the neighborhood of the city of London suitable for an exhibition ground, and as he is now an agriculturist, he will no doubt be anxious to retain his property. I, of course, have no hopes that the exhibition will go to the city of St. Thomas, although we could afford it every accommodation, because the county of Elgin sends two members of the Opposition to this House. My hon. friend asks where St. Thomas is. It is in Western Ontario, and London is a little to the north on its outskirts. But without any jesting, I think that as the city of London has now no fair grounds, the Minister should state that the hon. member for North Perth will certainly have an opportunity of having the exhibition in his locality.

Mr. MACMILLAN. I wish to call the attention of the hon. member for East Elgin to the fact that when the old exhibition grounds in London were disposed of, much more convenient grounds were secured, being within 200 or 300 yards of the railway station. What is known as Salter's Grove was selected by an overwhelming vote, and that property is kept for that purpose, and that purpose only. It will afford much more convenient grounds than those we had previously. The railway track runs by them, and the cars can be unloaded right alongside, whereas formerly all the exhibits had to be carted for a distance of a half or three-quarters of a mile. So that it will be seen that we have as good, if not better, grounds than we had before, and certainly more convenient.

Mr. CARLING. I am surprised that the charge should be made that some favoritism has been shown the city of London. The grant was given to London last year simply because the exhibition of Ontario was held there, and on no other account. It was given to London, as it has been given in previous years to cities in New Brunswick and Lower Canada. As the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has said, the very idea he suggested was carried out, because representatives from the Ontario Agricultural Association were sent to all the different Provinces to induce them to send exhibits to this exhibition. Every inducement was given, and a portion of the amount was devoted to reducing rates, so as to enable goods from Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Quebec, to be sent forward at reduced rates.

Mr. ALLEN. The most central point in this Dominion, the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway steamers, for this exhibition, is the town of Owen Sound. We can in Owen Sound offer facilities above those offered in any outlying places such as the Lower Provinces, Stratford, Winnipeg, St. Thomas, London, Sherbrooke, or British Columbia, or any other place, and I sincerely hope the Government will decide on holding this year's exhibition in Owen Sound, especially as the corporation of that town is putting up an exhibition building at a cost of $10,000 to $15,000. We expect to be able to accommodate the whole Province in that thriving town.

Mr. McMULLEN. Can the Minister of Agriculture state what amount of exhibits were brought from the different Provinces to London last year?

Mr. CARLING. I cannot give the figures, but Mr. Wade, the secretary of the Agricultural Association of Toronto, visited the Maritime Provinces, and he told me the delegates had been very successful in inducing people to send exhibits to the London Exhibition.

Mr. McMULLEN. No doubt some may have come from the Maritime Provinces, but I think that the hon. gentleman will find that unless he adopts the system of increased prizes and facilities to exhibitors from the outlying Provinces, he will not get much representation from them. I am glad to know that advantages were offered, and I hope they will be increased, if we are going to continue the grant at all.

Health Statistics $10,000 00

Mr. WILSON. On several occasions we have asked for information in connection with health statistics. Last year we contended it was unreasonable to ask us to vote the amount then asked, $15,000, without giving us a detailed statement of the work done. During the year 1884-85, about $8,000 were used, and now we find the Government asking for $10,000. I have no objection that there should be expenditure on health statistics properly collected, but I would like to know if we are getting a proper return for our expenditure. It appears to me there is no system really adopted by the Department to make the new service efficient. It is confined wholly to cities and towns, and while we are anxious to have statistics from the cities and towns, we should not rely wholly upon their statistical reports, but we ought to have some means of getting reports from the rural sections as well.

Mr. CARLING. The total amount voted last year was $15,000, and the amount expended, $7,917, and we are only asking $10,000 this year. We are extending our enquiries to all the towns and cities where boards of health are appointed, and the amount of information to be obtained is increasing. We intend to extend our enquiries as far as we can.

Mr. WILSON. In what way is it intended to extend the system? Is it proposed to extend it to the rural sections?

Mr. JENKINS. I believe that the object of this vote is an excellent one, but my experience is that the money is not wisely expended. I believe it is worse than thrown away, because information on the subject, to be useful, must be thoroughly reliable and complete. The information we get is neither reliable nor complete, and I hope the Government will soon see its way to get up an efficient registration of births, marriages and deaths, as that is the only thing that can be of real value in this connection. The information received now is exceedingly imperfect, and therefore of very little value to the country at large. But I think an official registration of births, marriages and deaths, would give information which would be exceedingly valuable, and I hope the Government will see its way next Session to bring in a Bill for that purpose.

Mr. CARLING. I think the information so far as it goes, taken from the different towns and cities, is thoroughly reliable, and that we can depend upon the officer who collects the information in each city. As I mentioned to the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson), it is the intention to collect information from other towns and cities as far as possible, but the amount of money asked for is not very large, and in the country districts there are no boards of health such as we have in the cities and towns. The hon. gentleman can rely upon everything being done by the Department to obtain all the accurate information they possibly can.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know how it may be in other Provinces, but in Ontario there are townships' boards of health in the greater portion of the townships.

Mr. CARLING. Not to any great extent.

Mr. WILSON. I know a number, and the Local Legislature has passed an Act empowering the municipal council to establish boards of health, to whom it would be very easy for the Minister to extend the collection of this information. I agree thoroughly with the remarks made by my hon. friend that they are not carrying out this efficiently at all, that the expenditure is worse than thrown away, because we have a statistical report that is unreliable in every particular and tends to mislead the general public. If we are going to have reports, they ought to be such as we could depend upon, but no one can place any confidence in the correctness of the reports from this bureau. I see items for travelling expenses. I see Dr. Tweedle, of St. Thomas, is credited with receiving a certain amount for travelling expenses. Now that city is very small, where has he been travelling? What has he been doing? Riding round the city in a cab, perhaps? I see that other physicians were paid for travelling expenses, and I would like to know what that was for. Were they called down here to receive their instructions? Could not the instructions have been sent? They must certainly lack ability to appreciate their duties if it was necessary that they should come to Ottawa to get instructions to collect a few health statistics. I also see charged to this item, so as to make the amount appear somewhat large, a sum for extra services. If we pay the fees of the different individuals, $10 a month, for collecting these vital statistics, I would like to know if we are to pay a similar amount for copying. It is nothing more nor less than utilising the money to spend it, perhaps, satisfactorily to their friends in the various Departments where they are serving.

Mr. CARLING. The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken. The boards of health in the different towns recommends a medical man for that position, and he has been invariably selected and appointed by the Government. With regard to the travelling expenses, it was thought proper by the Deputy of the Department, Dr. Taché, a very worthy man, a man of a great deal of experience, that, when these parties were appointed, they should be brought to the capital to receive their instructions and to receive the forms. I do not think there is anything very wrong in that. Either the officer had to come or some one would have had to be sent to him.

Mr. WILSON. I see an item here, R. Tracy, $32 for travelling expenses. He is not a physician. Perhaps the Minister will tell me who he is and were he is located.

Mr. BOWELL. He lives in Belleville.

Mr. CARLING. That took place in 1884, I think, and I cannot state now who R. Tracy was or what the $32 was paid for, but I can get the information.

Mr. AUGER. I see travelling expenses to Mrs. A. F. Lyster. Will the Minister tell us who she is and what she has been travelling about?

Mr. CARLING. Mrs. Lyster has been for some years the head of this branch, and in some cases she was sent to give instruction instead of the parties being brought to the capital. If expenses were paid to Mrs. Lyster to go to a particular city, no expenses were paid to the party to come here.

Mr. JENKINS. I can corroborate what has been said by the Minister as to the political character of the medical men appointed, because the gentleman chosen in Charlottetown is one of the most arrant Grits we have, but I think the statistics are utterly unreliable.

Mr. WILSON. I did not complain of the amount paid for collection, but of the amount paid for extra services in the Department.

Mr. CARLING. That is for clerks receiving $1 a day, and I do not think the hon. gentleman will object to that.

Mr. VAIL. The Minister will see that, where the whole item is $9,772, the amount of $2,803 is out of all proportion for extra services. If it belongs to the Agricultural Department it ought to be charged to that Department. Of course the Minister is not to blame for what took place two years ago in the Agricultural Department, but I hope he will see in future that the accounts are made out differently.

Mr. CARLING. If men are employed at $1 a day to compile these statistics for this branch, it is proper to charge it to that particular vote, and, if these parties are not required, their services can be dispensed with.

Mr. VAIL. Then the gentlemen who collect these statistics are not half paid. If the whole amount paid to collect the statistics is $2,366, and $2,803 is paid to compile them, it is certainly out of all proportion.

Mr. WILSON. My friend says I ought not to complain because these clerks receive only $1 a day. That may be true. We have not the various items separated so as to be in a position to tell very correctly. But I observe that C. Steacey, extra clerk, is paid for seven months at $400 a year, $223. The same individual is paid for 150 days at $1.25 a day, and the same individual for copying $148.50, or in all he received $569.

Mr. CARLING. It is often the case in making up the statistics at the end of the month, that parties have been employed at night work, and you cannot expect the men to work fifteen or eighteen hours a day without extra pay.

Mr. WILSON. Do they work at night enough to make up 150 days, at a cost of $148.50? This is one item. If you go through the Agriculture Department, you will find that a number of these clerks are employed at a certain extra amount per day, from $1 to $2.

Mr. CARLING. In some cases parties who are well up in writing and figures are employed at night, and they are paid so much a folio. I am told by the Secretary of the Department that is the way in which they have been paid. The hon. member spoke about R. Tracy's travelling expenses, he is the medical gentleman who collected the statistics at Belleville, and I suppose that is the meaning of the extra expense.

Mr BAIN. It gives our Public Accounts an unsatisfactory aspect to see large amounts credited to clerks in the way of extra services. It looks unsatisfactory to those of us outside, who are accustomed to employ officials to do a certain amount of work on the assumption that we employ them to do a reasonable day's work. Here we find officials putting in all the way to 400 days' work in the course of a year. There is no doubt the tendency to modern times is towards short hours of labor; but I think it is worth while for Ministers to consider whether there is not an opening here for parties to neglect their work during the day for the purpose of enabling them to secure more payment for extra work at night. It does seem to me that we have enough officials paid for in connection with public Departments here to be able, if they honestly do the work, to accomplish all the business of the Departments that requires to be done, within the regular office hours, except on occasions when there may be an unusual pressure of work. With reference to this matter of public health, I think, speaking from a non-professional standpoint, that the additional powers that were conferred two years ago by the Provincial Act of Ontario on local health boards, has done much to attract public attention in that direction. In my own riding I know that township boards of health have been established under this Act, and their influence is being felt for good in the localities. There is no doubt that, as the country grows older, and people get more into this artificial condition of society, circumstances may require, in the interest of the public health, some such organization as these boards of health, but I do not think they would be available for the purpose of collecting statistics with respect to the population. So far as the Province is concerned, the provincial authorities have taken a great deal of pains to secure a systematic return, not only of births, marriages and deaths, but also returns from medical men of the prevalence of certain diseases, and it is from that side that I think a good deal of information that would be of general practical value, could be readily acquired. I do not think it would be possible, without large expense, to extend the collection of these statistics, with our present machinery, with any degree of success to the rural population. There is no doubt that in the large centres a great deal of accurate information can be collected without its costing very much.

Colonial and Indian Exhibition..... $60,000 00

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What will be the total cost of this?

Mr. CARLING. It is difficult to say, because the tonnage of goods that have been sent over, has been very large, amounting to something like 3,000 tons. At the Paris Exhibition the freight sent over amounted to 800 tons. The Paris Exhibition cost $116,000, and the total cost of the Colonial and Indian Exhibition may, perhaps, amount to $150,000 or $160,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then you will have to apply for a supplementary vote. Is that $60,000 expended? I am not disposed to criticise very much. If this thing is done at all, I have always held that it should be done well. I am inclined to believe that a great deal of energy has been used in making a good display on the part of Canada. Still I would suggest to the hon. gentleman, if it is in his power, to submit a brief memorandum as to what cost has been incurred and any general information he can supply as to the doings in connection with that branch.

Mr. CARLING. Yes, I shall be glad to do it on concurrence.

Resolutions to be reported.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11:45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

GOVERNMENT SAVINGS BANK—INDEPENDENT ORDER OF FORESTERS.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, Has the Independent Order of Foresters been allowed to deposit $10,000 in the Government Savings Bank Department?

Mr. McLELAN. Under the law, we are not permitted to disclose the names of depositors. There are a number of large amounts in the Savings Banks. I think up to 1876 or 1877, there was no limit to the amount received; then it was limited by Order in Council to $10,000, and subsequently, in 1880, it was reduced to $3,000. I think the practice in England, and this country for some time, was to receive deposits of charitable societies for larger sums than the limit, on the ground that they are supposed to be the collection of savings of a number of individuals gathered together.

STANSTEAD, SHEFFORD AND CHAMBLY RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. BECHARD asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to order the demolition of the wharf which the Stanstead, Shefford and Chambly Railway Company have erected, without authorization, in the middle of the Chambly River, and occupying about two-thirds of the said river alongside of the bridge of the said company, in the vicinity of the towns of St. John's and Iberville?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. In the absence of the Minister of Railways, I have the honor to say to the hon. member, that the attention of the Government has already been called to that matter.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to say a word with reference to a state ment made by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) in the discussion of the motion of the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). That hon. gentleman (Mr. Lister) is reported in Hansard to have said:

"I find, Sir, that the Ontario and Pacific Railway, running through Cornwall to Perth, has been bonused to the extent of $262,400, and that the hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin) and the hon. member for Renfrew (Mr. White) are stockholders in that company."

Then the hon. gentleman said again:

"I find, Sir, that in 1885 this Parliament granted to the Ottawa, Waddington and Northern Transportation Railway $166,000, and that the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. White), the hon. members for Ottawa (Mr. Tassé and Mr. Mackintosh) are stockholders in the company."

I simply wish to say, in reference to those statements, that I am not now and never have been a stockholder in either of those companies. I regret I was temporarily absent when these statements were made, and was consequently unable to deny them then, but I take this, the first opportunity which presents itself, to make the denial.

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to call attention to a matter in connection with the debate of the 4th inst. In giving a list of applicants for coal land leases, I mentioned the name of the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) as one of the applicants, and the following words were exchanged between us, as reported in the Hansard:—

"Mr. HAGGART. An application that I made? For what?
"Mr. CHARLTON. A coal lease.
"Mr. HAGGART. No, I did not.
"Mr. CHARLTON. I found your name in the returns.
"Mr. HAGGART. No, you did not.
"Mr. CHARLTON. Well, we will hunt it up."

I have hunted it up, and this is the document:

"OTTAWA, December 9th, 1882.

"SIR,—I have the honor to apply for a mining location, being west half of Section 16, Township 3, Range 9, west of second meridian, and I will comply with all the requirements of the Statute and the regulations of the Department.

"I have the honor to be, Sir,
"JOHN HAGGART.

"The Hon. the Minister of Interior,
"Ottawa."

Mr. MCLELAN.

"OTTAWA, December 15th, 1882.

"SIR,—I have the honor, by direction of the Minister of Interior, to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 9th inst., applying for a coal mine location, being the west half of Section 16, Township 3, Range 9, west of the second principal meridian, North-West Territory.

"I have the honor to be, Sir,
"Your obedient servant,
"A. RUSSELL,
"For the Minister of Interior.

"JOHN HAGGART, Esq., M.P.,

HOME RULE FOR IRELAND.

Mr. BLAKE. In pursuance of the Orders of the Day, and for the reasons I stated on Tuesday, no intimation having reached me from any member of the House that any portion of this motion is, in its form or substance, objectionable, I beg to move in the form of which I gave notice:

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty to respectfully assure Her Majesty that the interest and concern felt by the Commons of Canada and the people whom they represent in the condition of Ireland, and their desire that some means may be found of meeting the expressed wishes of so many of Her Majesty's Irish subjects for the grant to Ireland of a measure of local self-government, still continue as warm and earnest as in the year 1882 when they were humbly signified to Her Majesty by an Address to which this House affirms its abiding adhesion;

Humbly to inform Her Majesty that this House hails with joy the submission by Her Majesty's Government to the Parliament of the United Kingdom of a measure recognising the principle of local self-government for Ireland;

And humbly to express to Her Majesty the earnest hope of this House that the principle of the said measure may be affirmed, and that it may form the basis for such a settlement of this great question as shall conduce to the peace, happiness and prosperity of the Empire.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Without referring to what has already taken place when this motion was brought before this House on a former occasion, I feel bound to offer a few re arks with regard to the position that I then took, and the position that I intend to take to-day on that subject. It is, no doubt, felt by many of our friends in different parts of the country that the Parliament of Canada ought to be again asked to express an opinion on the subject of Home Rule, or to express its sympathy with the people of Ireland in their efforts to obtain that system of government which we prize so highly in this country. It is no secret, nor did I intend that it should be, because full publicity was given to the facts, that representative men of one very prominent Irish society of this city called upon me, urging the propriety of moving some resolution on this question. Their object, of course, was not to consult wtih me as to the desirability, or otherwise, of taking that step, because those who have read the reports of the proceedings of the society will see that, in the first place, the society decided that that was the proper step to take, that some resolution should be moved, and they then decided that a committee should ask me to take that step. The reasons that I gave them, I think, hold good at present. I stated, and I repeat now, that, if on that occasion we had not been successful, and whether hopeful of success now or not, if we had failed on that occasion, we might and it would be our duty to make another attempt to gain an expression of sympathy from so important a body as this is. Then, having succeeded beyond, as I stated before, the most sanguine expectations of the most earnest Irishmen in this country, in obtaining a unanimous expression of sympathy from this Parliament in favor of the Irish people and the constitutional agitation they were carrying on for the attainment of that system of government and those constitutional privileges which we enjoy in this country and cherish so highly, I believed, for one, that it was not only not prudent or advisable, but that we had no just reason for asking Parliament to take this question up again. I noticed that in some of the city papers giving my reasons for refusing to move in that direction when I was called upon to do so, it was declared that I stated that my reason was that I feared the defeat of the resolution. I deny ever having made such a statement. I entertain no such fear. I am quite satisfied that the Parliament of Canada, that the representative men in this country are always ready and willing to give an expression consistent with the privileges and the constitution under which we live, and that there is no man in Canada who would not be willing to see his fellow-men in any part of the globe enjoying the privileges of free and self-government which we enjoy in Canada. I did say, however, that, as we could not expect to get Parliament to give a stronger expression of opinion, what would be the object of introducing the question again, when the risk might be to get a weaker expression of opinion. I did not say that the question would be defeated. I did not entertain such a belief at all, but it is possible that some division might take place, that some one man or some two members, or three or four, if you will, might differ from the views taken by the majority of the House of Commons on that occasion, and therefore, to that extent, the expression would be that much weakened. I am not on this occasion going to make any allusions, or to impute motives either to the hon. gentleman who has moved this resolution or to those gentlemen who, outside, have suggested that it should be moved. I am simply going to take the ground that I intend to discharge my duty faithfully and honestly in the interests of the country, and with a due regard to the expectations that my countrymen entertain of the manner in which I should discharge my duty here. I know that my motives have already been attacked; I must submit to that. I will not retaliate at present. I will confine myself particularly to the duty that I think devolves upon me now. That duty is, while I take the same ground that I took before, while I say I would not be responsible for bringing this question again before Parliament for the reasons I gave, that Parliament can give no stronger expression than it generously gave before, to see, as far as I can, now that it is forced upon Parliament, as a believer in the free institutions of this country, and one anxious and willing that those free institutions should be extended to our fellow-countrymen in Ireland, that no adverse vote shall be recorded on this question, no matter who is responsible for it. With that view, I propose to move an amendment to the motion placed in your hand by the hon. gentleman who has taken his seat. Before I do that, I must also give another ground which I stated at a very early stage when discussing this question with some friends outside. I stated that, in view of the reception with which the respectful Message sent by the Parliament of this country to Her Majesty met at the hands of the Government then, by the reply given by the Earl of Kimberley, I did not think it would be right to ask this Parliament to move another Address in view of the reply given at that time. Nor do I believe that, so far as that particular phase of the question is concerned, if it be brought in as an evidence of sympathy with our people, that our people care little in what form that Address shall come. All they want is an assurance that the Parliament of this country sympathise with their fellow-countrymen in Ireland in their efforts to obtain the rights which, as I said before, we prize so highly in this country. I, therefore, beg leave to move in amendment to the motion, seconded by Sir Hector Langevin:

That all the words after "That" be struck out, and the following added instead thereof:—the Commons of Canada desire to express their deep and abiding interest in the prosperity and happiness of their fellow-subjects in Ireland, and their adhesion to the sentiments expressed in the Joint Address to Her Majesty of both Houses of the Canadian Parliament passed in the Session of 1882;

That in such Address Parliament suggested that Canada and its inhabitants had prospered exceedingly under a Federal system, allowing to each Province of the Dominion considerable powers of self-government, and expressed a hope 'that if consistent with the integrity and well-being of the Empire, and if the rights and status of the minority were fully protected and secured, some means might be found of meeting the expressed desires of so many of Her Majesty's Irish subjects in that regard.'

That in answer to the said Address the then Secretary of State for the Colonies was commanded to state that "Her Majesty will always gladly receive the advice of the Parliament of Canada on all matters relating to the Dominion and the administration of its affairs, but with respect to the questions referred to in the Address Her Majesty will, in accordance with the constitution of this country, have regard to the advice of the Imperial Parliament and Ministers, to whom all matters relating to the affairs of the United Kingdom exclusively appertain."

That this House, having reference to the tenor of the said answer, does not deem it expedient again to address Her Majesty on the subject, but earnestly hopes that such a measure or such measures may be adopted by the Imperial Parliament as will, while preserving the integrity and well-being of the Empire and the rights and status of the minority, be satisfactory to the people of Ireland, and permanently remove the discontent so long unhappily prevailing in that country.

Before resuming my seat, I would ask the privilege of adding a few words. I think, if the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution now before the House, to which this is an amendment, will consider this matter, he will acknowledge that the amendment will cover the grounds as well as his resolution, with the exception that it does not propose an Address to Her Majesty. I do not think that it will be asking the hon. gentleman to make too great a sacrifice if I say that I think he would do well to give his support even to the amendment, in order that it may have that strength which a united action alone can give it in its passage through this House. The hon. gentleman may object, on the ground that he still prefers the terms of his own resolution; but he must remember also, that, on a former occasion, when I moved the resolutions of 1882, he then found fault with their terms, as did many of his friends, and stated that they had been mutilated—in fact, emasculated, so that they were almost worthless. The hon. gentleman, the other day, in alluding to those resolutions, stated that on that occasion Parliament spoke, and spoke loudly. I think it did; I think it spoke loud enough, and I think that all reasonable-minded men will be satisfied if Parliament speaks in the same terms to-day. The fact of the resolutions being mutilated or emasculated did not prove that they were not the wisest that could have been submitted to the House. The object was to carry such resolutions as would embody the principles that we advocated at that time, and those resolutions did clearly embody those principles. They secured the most important end—they secured the unanimous support of that House, and the almost unanimous support of the Senate. More than that: after the action of Parliament had become known to the representative Irishmen on the other side of the water, those who, I suppose, were as deeply interested in this question as any man in this country can be, the Irish representatives in the Imperlial Parliament at that time, met and returned a vote of thanks—not to the political leader of the Conservative party, not to the political leader of the Liberal party, not to the mover or seconder of the resolutions, but they returned their sincere thanks to the Parliament of Canada for passing an Address which they considered the most important step that had been taken outside of the United Kingdom. With these remarks I will take my seat, earnestly hoping that this amendment, being a repetition of the sentiments expressed, and which were so acceptable to the people of this country in 1882, may be acceptable to the House now, and that it may pass now with the same unanimity that the resolutions did on that occasion.

Mr. CASEY. I have heard the remarks which have fallen from the Minister of Inland Revenue with regret that he should have seen fit to adopt the course he has taken. He adheres to his former argument, the argument which he said he used in speaking to the deputation which asked him to take charge of a measure of this kind: first, that the former expression of opinion was sufficient; and, next, that it was not prudent to bring it up now because he feared, not the defeat of the motion, but a less unanimous expression of opinion than that formerly given. He said: "Why should we bring it up now, why renew it? Was not the expression of opinion which this House gave in 1882 quite sufficient?" If the hon. gentleman asks me for reasons why we should renew that expression of opinion, I have plenty to give him. First, because this is a new Parliament. After that expression of opinion in 1882 the members of this House went to their constituents, and if the constituents objected to the course taken in 1882 they had means of showing it. I do not think there is anything in the result of that election to show that they did object to that expression of opinion But we do wish to put on record the fact that this House of Commons, after the expression of opinion given by the former House of Commons and after consulting the constituencies, entertains the same opinion that the House held four years ago. That is one reason for renewing the expression of opinion. Another reason, and still stronger one, is, because now Home Rule is a practical issue. When we spoke before we were only urging the Government of Great Britain to take a step which it seemed almost hopeless to hope they would take so soon as they have taken it, for although my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition did express the almost certainty that the accession to power of the Liberal Government in Great Britain would bring about this result, it seemed more hopeless to the rest of us. We are glad to find that he has proved a truer prophet than our own fears. The accession of that Government to power has had the result which the hon. gentleman anticipated. At that time, I say, the resolution passed by this House was merely an expression of the vague opinion that something of the kind should be done and a vague hope that it might be done. Now, it is a practical issue; now, something has been proposed; now, a measure, however defective some of us may think it, has been submitted to the British House of Commons, and apparently it has a possibility, at least, of being adopted in principle, a measure adopting, at all events, the great theory of Home Rule, however we may differ from the details proposed in that measure. Now I say is the time when our renewed expression of opinion will be useful. The old resolution might possibly have been regarded as having been got up for a political object.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASEY. I say it might have been regarded at that time, when Home Rule was not a practical issue, as having been got up for a political object; but now, when Home Rule has ripened, when Home Rule is in process of being granted to Ireland, an expression of opinion coming from this House, of which the great majority is known to be Conservative, would not be looked upon as a political dodge, but as a sincere and earnest attempt to strengthen the hands of those who are working for justice to Ireland. And it would have that effect if it had come, in the first place, from the Minister of Inland Revenue, just as much as it will now, when the proposal has come from the leader on this side of the House. I deeply regret that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Costigan) has seen fit to throw objections in the way of approving a motion of this kind, and has repeated on the floor of this House his objections given to the deputation, and thereby weakened most appreciably the effect that will be produced by the resolution when it is adopted. After having told us that we should not have discussed the question at all, after having refused to introduce a proposal of this kind in the House, yet after the proposal has been introduced by another hon. member, the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue goes on to propose an amendment to the resolution. That is not the course we would have expected him to adopt, from the language he used when the question was up on Tuesday. When the leader of the Opposition proposed this resolution, the Minister of Inland Revenue asked for time to consider the resolution and time to consult with the leader of the Opposition upon a form of words which would be acceptable to the whole House, if the form then proposed was not acceptable. The hon. gentleman asked for time, and he asked for liberty to make suggestions. The time was granted by the mover of the resolution; the liberty to make suggestions was also granted. Nay, he was invited to do so, and I certainly understood from the tenor of the Minister's remarks, that he was only waiting for an opportunity to make suggestions. Has he made suggestions? I do not know. Has he asked the leader of the Opposition to consult with him as to the wording of the resolution? I do not know; but it does not look like it. If he had consulted the leader of the Opposition, he would probably have stated so; if there had been differences as to the forms of words he would, no doubt, have stated so. But instead of taking advantage of the opportunity for which he asked, he has come down with an amendment proposing to proceed in a different manner from that proposed by the leader of the Opposition. I think this conduct is inconsistent with the expressions he used on Tuesday; inconsistent with his duty as one who has taken a prominent part in promoting the principle of Home Rule, and whose duty it is to see that everything should be done in such a manner as to secure the largest possible support to any legislation that could be introduced to secure that unanimity. He tells us that is his object in introducing this amendment. But, Sir, if he had that object in view intelligently, he must have seen that the way to secure unanimity, was not to bring in an amendment, of which no notice has been given to this side of the House, at this period of the discussion, but to consult with the leader of the Opposition, who had introduced the original motion, and try to agree with him on such a form of words as the House would unanimously accept. Of course, I am in no position to say whether the mover of the resolution will accept the amendment or not, but, without regard to anything he may do, I desire to express my own disapprobation of it, and my preference for the original motion. The sole reason which the hon. gentleman alleged for this change is contained in the Kimberley message, which he has incorporated in his amendment. Now, Sir, what is the effect of that resolution incorporating that message? I have not had time to carefully weigh and ponder every word in it, but it seems to me to amount to some such statement as this, to the British Government: "We asserted in 1882 our right to petition the Throne, in regard to a matter which we declared to be of Imperial significance, but which we declared to have material bearings on the prosperity of Canada as well. You snubbed us, and now we accept the snub. We accept the statement that we have no right to petition the Throne; we accept the position of outsiders, in which that message appears to put us." I say that the acceptance of that resolution by this House, appears to me to be an acceptance of the snub which was administered to this House by the then Secretary for the Colonies, at the time we sent the former resolution. If the hon. Minister does not mean it for that, it must have another signification. It must be an expression of sulkiness on the part of this House. If he does not mean to say: "We accept the snub," he can only mean: "You would not hear us before, when we offered advice on this subject; now your Premier has actually invited an expression of opinion from similar bodies, has rejoiced in receiving them not only from the Colonies but from outside of the Empire, and now, when you are willing to hear our advice, and when our advice is invited by the Premier and the English Government, we will get on our high horse and sulkily refuse an address to you. Instead of putting our opinions in the form of an address, directed to the quarter where they will have most effect, we will raise our eyes to Heaven and express a vague namby pamby hope that the Government of England will be led by the help of Providence, without assistance on our part, to do that which will be best for Ireland and the Empire." Now, I object to take either position. I object to admitting that we have not the right to petition. Granting the right of petition, I object to taking the ground that, because they would not hear us before, we will not speak to them now, when they are willing to hear us. And I must refer—although it has been already referred to—to the remarks of Mr. Gladstone in his late manifesto and elsewhere. They have been presented to the House, but they do not seem to have made any impression on the mind of the hon. gentleman who moved the amendment. I hope they may now sink into his mind. Mr. Gladstone writes to the Legislative Assembly of Quebec:

"I am deeply grateful for the resolution adopted by your honorable body. It is my belief that the people of England, who have partial responsibility for the old misdeeds of the British Government, and the people of Scotland who have really none, will concur in the wise and liberal view entertained by the Quebec Assembly."

There is a distinct expression of thanks for an expression of opinion, not from the Dominion Parliament but from the Parliament of one of the Provinces, whose right to address the Crown on such a matter must be even prima facie less than ours, if there is any difference in rights at all. To the Mayor of Boston, in answer to a resolution, he cabled:

"I feel that American opinion, allied as it is with a regard and affection for the Old Country, affords Her Majesty's Government a powerful moral support."

That is not addressed to a British Legislative Assembly of any kind, not to a body representing 5,000,000 of British subjects. It is addressed to the mayor of an American city, and he says that even American public opinion must afford the Government powerful moral support. What, then, would be the support afforded to that Government by an expression of opinion by this Parliament, known to be composed of representatives of all races and all creeds, a Parliament known to contain a very large Conservative majority, so far as Canadian politics are concerned? Would not such an expression of opinion serve to show that men, not only of all races and creeds, but men of both political parties, recognised the fairness of the principle of Home Rule as applied to Ireland, and afford the most powerful moral support possible to the man who is risking so much to carry out that principle? Then, again, in his address delivered a few days ago, known generally as the Gladstone manifesto—his address to his own constituents—he said:

"Never have I known an occasion when a parliamentary event so rang through the world as the introduction of this Bill, under the auspices of the British Government. From public meetings and from the highest authorities in the colonies, from capitals such as Washington, Cincinnati, Boston, Quebec, and from the remotest districts lying beyond the reach of all ordinary political excitement, I receive the conclusive assurance that kindred people regard it with warm and fraternal sympathy. Our present effort is to settle, on an adequate scale, and once for all, the long-vexed and troubled relations between England and Ireland, which exhibit to us the one and only conspicuous failure of the political genius of our race to confront and master a difficulty, and to obtain in a reasonable degree the main ends of civilised life."

What is the meaning of those words? Is it not are cognition that not only Quebec, a French Province living under British rule, filled now with British sympathy and love for British constitutional Government, not only a French Province like Quebec, but even States entirely severed from the Empire, are members of the great British family council, composed of the offspring that have come from the loins of that great nation? Is it not a recognition of our fellow-citizenship in the British Empire? I say it is. It is more than a recognition of our right to speak in that family council. It is an invitation to lay our opinions before the head of that family, with the assurance that those opinions will be accepted with gratitude and regarded with the favor and respect that their importance deserves. Now, whatever may have been the effect of the Kimberley message, whatever may have been the meaning of it, whatever may be our constitutional and technical right to petition the Throne, these acknowledgments, coming not merely from a Colonial Secretary but from the Premier of Great Britain, take away utterly any effect that might be in that message tending to discourage colonial legislative bodies from expressing opinions on this great question. And if the Minister of Inland Revenue has nothing stronger to shelter himself behind, when he asks the House to depart from the usual constitutional method of addressing the Throne, and to express anxiety and great hopes and wishes to the skies and atmosphere, I say his defence is of the most flimsy character. Let me recall to your memory the fact that my hon. friend the proposer of this motion objected to the mutilated motion proposed by the hon. Minister on a former occasion: yet on that occasion my hon. friend accepted it because there was no opportunity of amending it, and because he did not wish to have any dissension in the House in connection with the matter. That conduct stands out in bold contrast to the conduct of hon. gentlemen opposite. They did not, it appears, altogether relish the form in which this motion was proposed on Tuesday. Instead of accepting it for the purpose of avoiding division in the House on this great non-political question, they took a course which must necessarily lead to difference of opinion; whether it leads to difference of vote or not will depend on the self-sacrifice of the members of the House who hold contrary opinions. The hon. leader of the Government sneered at the resolution, and threw cold water on the whole proposal. The hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, who has always posed as the leader of this movement, also threw cold water on it by asking for delay. He has thrown more cold water on it to-day by asking us to abdicate our constitutional right of petition, and to accept a wishy-washy proposal of vague hope and sympathy. This course stands out in bold contrast to the sacrifice of individual opinion displayed by my hon. friend on the former occasion. I hope yet that the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, having screwed his courage up to the point of proposing a resolution in that form, will go still further, and have the courage to adopt the form of petition, which we adopted in 1882—what we had a right to do then, and what we have a right to do now. He says the matter of the amendment is identical with that of the motion. I cannot say whether it is or not, because I have not had the opportunity of carefully reading it. If it is, there is simply a difference of manner and not of matter, and if that is the case I think he must show stronger reasons for departing from the precedent we have already set ourselves than he has yet shown. If it were necessary, Sir, to discuss the question of Home Rule itself, to discuss whether Canadians should support some resolution sympathising with that principle, I could do so with great pleasure, and at a length which I am afraid would not be pleasing to the House. I do not intend to do so at any length; but being on my feet, I feel that I cannot sit down without saying a few words on that subject, even though it may not be necessary for the conviction of hon. members of this House. Though of Irish descent, and though proud of that descent, I hope I shall be able to discuss this question rather as a Canadian than as an Irishman. I hold that Home Rule is as much a principle of the Canadian people, is a sentiment as dear to the Canadian heart, as it is to that of the native Irishman; I mean Home Rule in the general sense, not merely as applied to Ireland, but as applied to all isolated communities who claim the right to manage their own affairs. I should be as ready to support a proposal of Home Rule for Scotland or for Wales, if the people of those countries demanded it with the same unanimity, as I am to support the proposal of Home Rule for Ireland. We, in Canada, have been living under Home Rule for the last nineteen years; we know its effects, and we are generally agreed that those effects are good. I mean that since that time we have had Provincial Home Rule. We have had Home Rule as colonies for a still longer time, and there are some of us old enough to remember what it cost us to obtain it. But for the last nineteen years we have been living under an enlarged system of Home Rule—Federal Home Rule, under which each Province has the right to manage its own affairs. Now, having once expressed our approval of that principle, it would ill-become us now to do other than unanimously reassert that approval. The right of these Provinces and of this Dominion to do what they like within their own constitutional bounds, is an axiom in the constitutional theory of Canada; and if we refuse to apply this axiom to the affairs of Ireland, we are not only doing a wrong with respect to Irish affairs, but committing ourselves to the position that the application of this axiom has not worked well in the affairs of Canada. And there is great similarity in some respects between the circumstances of Canada and those of the United Kingdom. Ireland is peopled by a race different in origin and religion from the mass of the people of the United Kingdom. Canada also has its Province, the majority of whose people differ in race and religion from those of the rest of the Dominion. Ireland and Quebec stand in somewhat similar circumstances in this regard. Troubles arose under the old Legislative Union of Upper and Lower Canada out of those differences of race and religion, and it was largely from those troubles that the proposal for Confederation grew. Has Confederation been a cure for those troubles? Ask the people of Quebec in Legislature assembled. They have given an almost unanimous declaration of opinion in favor of Home Rule, thereby implying that Home Rule has worked well with them. Another parallel exists in the fact that there is a large Protestant minority in Ireland whose rights some people fear will be injured by the concession of Home Rule to that country. There is also a large Protestant minority in the Province of Quebec. Has Home Rule in Quebec been disastrous to the Protestant minority? I do not think any member of this House will contend that it has. It is evident that the English-speaking members of the Quebec Assembly do not think it has, for they have given their assent to the principle of Home Rule. And is it to be asserted that the people of Ireland, with whom so many of us are allied by race, are less tolerant or less disposed to live at peace and harmony among themselves under Home Rule than the people of Quebec? I repudiate the assertion, if any one is hardy enough to make it. No doubt there have been quarrels and troubles in Ireland between the adherents of the two religions, more than in most countries; but why? Almost entirely because they have not had the opportunity of managing their domestic affairs, and because one section has been to a great extent, by the authority of the law, placed in a position of superiority over the other, and in a position to injure it. Irishmen are not disloyal to the law anywhere except in their native country; no man is naturally more loyal to a Government with which he is contented than an Irishman; and if this is not the case in Ireland, what is the cause of it, except that there Irishmen have not the right to rule themselves? If England goes halfway to meet Ireland, I believe Ireland will go more than halfway to meet England. I am afraid that is rather an Irish expression, because under those circumstances they would hardly meet, but if England goes any distance to meet Ireland, I believe Ireland will come twice as far to meet her; and the result of a fair attempt to meet Ireland will be to make Irishmen in their native land as loyal to the Government under which they live as they are in Canada or in the United States, or in any other country where they live under a Government which they have a share in managing. Besides, this principle, I contend, is in accord with the spirit of the age. We are told that the people of Ireland are not quite prepared to govern themselves. Well, a man cannot learn to swim until he gets into the water, and the people of Ireland cannot learn self-government until they have it. Let us take an instance and comparison. Are the people of Ireland any less prepared to govern themselves, are they any less prepared to swim without experience in the water of politics than were the people of Hungary, when it was a dependency of the Austrian Empire, and in a state of disaffection even greater than that in which Ireland has been for years? No one will assert that the Hungarians were better prepared to govern themselves, yet they were granted self-government by the Austrian Empire, and have managed to make it a very fair success. Take the other view of the question, that Home Rule in Ireland will lead to the disruption of the Empire. Is Austria to-day not a more united Empire, and stronger against all her foes, without and within, than she was before Home Rule was granted to Hungary? Is not Austro-Hungary to-day a greater force in the politics of Europe than was Austria, as an Empire, with her Hungarian Ireland to quell and keep in subjection, year after year? Of course she is. Therefore, I say this movement is in harmony with the spirit of the age, and will tend to promote the happiness of the people and the credit of the Empire. For that reason, not only those who favor local autonomy, but all true friends of the Empire, should support the measure which seems more likely than any other to secure for the Empire itself union, strength, and influence throughout the world. For all these reasons, I give my hearty support, in the first place, to the resolution introduced by my hon. friend and leader, and in the second place, if that resolution should not meet the acceptance of the House, to whatever form of words may be agreed upon by the House and to which we can give our unanimous support; while I maintain at the same time, a strong preference for the form of proceeding we have already adopted. In this, I believe I am only doing my duty, not as an Irishman, but as a Canadian. I believe the action this House will take will greatly strengthen the hands of the venerable statesman who is risking all the fruits of a great and long career to do what he conceives to be just to Ireland, and who is doing this at the risk of losing the support of many who have been his friends through life. In that position he demands the sympathy of the world, and I hope he will receive the sympathy, not only of Reformers but of Conservatives as well, throughout British countries. It should be remembered by all those who deal with this matter in British countries, that it requires to be dealt with in such a way that their action will do nothing to weaken his hands, but a good deal to strengthen them. This has been spoken by some as a Catholic question. I protest against any such insinuation. Protestants in Canada are Home Rulers to as great an extent as Catholics. Even in the Protestant part of Ireland, Ulster, the black North, as it is sometimes called, a majority of Home Rulers was elected at the last general elections, a small majority, to be sure; but I wish to show you, Sir, that the majority obtained at the polls there did not represent the real strength of the Home Rule vote cast in Ulster. In constituencies where there was not a sufficient number of Home Rulers to justify that party in bringing out candidates of their own, they supported the Conservative candidates. At that time the Conservative party in England were holding out the right hand of fellowship to Mr. Parnell, and led him and his party to believe something great would be done for them by the Conservatives if elected. Therefore, in counties where only Liberals and Conservatives were running, Home Rulers were requested by Mr. Parnell to vote for the Conservative candidates. I have even seen, in an Irish paper, a letter of Mr. Parnell's, directing the Home Rulers to vote for Mr. Johnston, of Ballykilbeg, the candidate of the Orangemen, and the most Orange of Orangemen; and the fact that he was returned is, to some extent, due to the existence of a Home Rule feeling in that county.

Mr. O'BRIEN. What does he think of it now?

Mr. CASEY. He has a different opinion now, but no doubt he was glad to receive the support of the Home Rulers then; and if his leader had introduced a measure of Home Rule, his opinions would have been modified; but, not imitating the generosity of the Home Rulers who supported him, he has shown himself since then much more bitter and outrageous in his conduct towards the mass of the people of Ireland than ever before. He has used in his speeches language which I would not be justified, with any regard to the propriety of the debate, in quoting. I hope the result of this discussion will be to adopt some resolution that will materially advance the prospects of Home Rule, and affirm in a dignified manner the right of the Canadian Parliament to approach and address the Crown.

Mr. CURRAN. The question now before the House is one of such vast importance, involving, as it does, so much, not only that concerns the material interests of Ireland, but the deepest and inmost feeling of a large section of the people of the Dominion, that I feel I would be wanting in my duty were I not to say a few words on this occasion, expressive of the sentiments I have always held—sentiments which have not been born within me since I entered political life, and which it might be, perhaps, to my advantage to parade, but sentiments which I have labored to promote, and which I shall continue to treasure until this question of Home Rule for Ireland is a settled fact. It has been the dream of my boyhood, the labor of my maturer years; and I trust I may live to witness, and that before long, before my old age has come, the people of Ireland contented and happy under Home Rule, and giving strength, power and prestige to the Empire at large. My first impression, on rising to address this House, however, is, I am bound to say, that I regret exceedingly a certain portion of the remarks which have fallen from the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. I do not think that, whilst he has expressed himself to be a friend of Ireland and desirous of securing some expression of opinion from the House favorable to the principle of Home Rule, he has adopted the best means calculated to secure the result he says he desires so much. On the contrary, I think, when he opened his observations and counselled his leader, so far as he was concerned, to adhere to the original resolution which was laid upon the Table and not to accept the equally comprehensive but far more dignified course for this House that has been suggested by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, that he made a very great mistake indeed. As for myself, I feel that no one can question my motives or my sincerity in this matter. I can point to the fact, and I do so with pride, that in the city of Montreal there was organised the first Home Rule Association that ever was established on the continent of America; that the president of that association was my old and valued and patriotic friend, Mr. Edward Murphy; and that I had the honor of being, under that old patriot always true to the cause, the first vice-president of that association. Ever afterwards, whenever the occasion required, I felt that my course was plain, whatever my conduct might expose me to—and it did sometimes expose me to something that was not very pleasant for one who had political aspirations; that my duty was plain as a man, as the son of an Irish father and of an Irish mother, as one who had a deep interest in the welfare of the land of my forefathers, and who wished to see peace and harmony existing there and existing here in Canada amongst those of my race, and those of other races who have made this country our home, despite any inconvenience or unpopularity in certain quarters that my conduct might have exposed me to, whether it was on the occasion of the visit of Mr. Parnell to the city of Montreal, when he spoke in the Theatre Royal, and when I said in his presence what I say now in your presence and in the presence of the representatives of this country, that I hoped the time was not far distant when, by the labor of the patriotic sons of Ireland, the day might dawn when they could exclaim in one breath "God save Ireland" and "God save the Queen;" or when, again, Mr. Parnell was imprisoned by the Government of Mr. Gladstone in Kilmainham gaol, and my friends and myself called a meeting to express our sentiments on that occasion. However, it is not my desire to refer further to these facts, except in order to vindicate the position I take to-day, and to state here that I for one would not support the amendment that has been brought forward by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue if I did not feel that it was better calculated to serve the purpose that we have in view, that every good and honest citizen has in view, than the resolution which was proposed in the first place by the hon. the leader of the Opposition. I desire to approach this subject in a conciliatory spirit. I do not wish for one moment to cast any doubt upon the motives that may have inspired this action, but our motives have been attacked, our course, or rather the course which has been suggested by the representative of our people in this Government, has been attacked, and I think, without at all wishing to disparage in any way the motives of the hon. the leader of the Opposition, that there are some circumstances surrounding his action in this matter which are far more suspicious than anything which can be attributed to the hon. gentleman who has proposed the amendment. There is no doubt that parliamentary courtesy is perhaps the strongest prop to a man's faith. The hon. gentleman has said he is sincere in this matter so far as wishing to eliminate all party feeling and all party advantage therefrom. I am obliged, under parliamentary courtesy, to believe that, but my credulity is put to a very strong test. I think, after all, if we look at some of the circumstances surrounding the bringing in of this resolution, we will be struck very forcibly with a certain number of omissions which the hon. gentleman has made. In the first place, there are in this House a certain number of gentlemen of Irish extraction and Irishmen by birth as well, and he never consulted one of those gentlemen before bringing in this resolution. But there was more than that. The fact that this resolution was brought in as an amendment to going into Committee of Supply must have impressed everyone in this House that, after all, there was something about such a procedure that would cast a little doubt upon the sincerity of the hon. gentleman's motives. But there was a great deal more than that, and I think this is perhaps the gravest omission of all. That was not the fact that the Irish members were not approached, because, so far as the Irish Catholic members are concerned, unfortunately there are only eight of us in this House, and, perhaps, although I believe there is no personal ill-feeling between us and the gentlemen opposite, there might have been a hesitancy on the part of the hon. gentleman to approach us, as none of us are his political supporters, but there could not be anything like a hesitancy, there should not have been anything like a hesitancy, if there was an honest desire that that resolution should pass; it was absolutely necessary, in fact, that the hon. gentleman should have addressed himself, at all events, if not to the rank and file, to the leader of the French Canadian party in this House, without whose sanction and without whose approval, and without whose influence, perhaps, no such resolution could be carried at all. All these things were omitted. But we have still other circumstances that must attract very grave attention in this matter. We know that the Globe newspaper is supposed to be, to a very great extent, the organ of the hon. gentleman opposite, and that paper last week told us that the hon. the leader of the Opposition, not commanding a majority in this House, could not be expected to bring forward anything of this kind. He could not command a majority for anything he might bring forward, and therefore it was his duty not to bring it forward at all. But there was more than that in connection with this, and I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without drawing the attention of the House to it. There was, in the first place, as I have said, the statement of the Globe, but in the city of Montreal there is published what claims to be an Irish newspaper giving the views of Irishmen all over the Dominion. Its own constituency will not satisfy it; it professes to speak for Irishmen throughout the length and breadth of the land, and it especially speaks in praise of everything that is said and everything that is done by the hon. gentleman opposite; and what was the position that that particular organ of the Liberal party placed the hon. gentleman on this side of the House in, whose duty it is supposed to have been to propose this resolution? I will read a brief extract from that paper's Ottawa correspondence, published on the 15th April, 1886, only a couple of weeks ago. This is what is said:

"It is said that a resolution will be proposed in Parliament sympathising with Mr. Gladstone and the Irish people on the prospect of obtaining Home Rule for Ireland. Should this be proposed from the Ministerial side of the House it will be understood at once as a Tory dodge to win back Irish support. It is hard to see, however, in what way it can benefit them. * * * The Irish people are not to be humbugged. The records of both parties are before them. The press has shown the feeling prevailing in either camp. But the time has passed for resolutions of the kind."

That is what the Irish members of this House, at all events, were met with on this occasion. I do not think that I can let this opportunity pass without corroborating what has been said by the Minister of Inland Revenue with regard to our feeling on this subject. There is not one in this House who would not go to the utmost limit in voting for any resolution that might benefit Ireland in any sense that was considered the best by the truest friends of Ireland; and, Sir, in order that we might arrive at a just conclusion, the friends of the cause, those who were pointed to as having the duty imposed upon them of attending to this matter, met together; meeting together we discussed the question not in a party spirit, not in a spirit of seeking to achieve any party advantage, but every gentleman in this House, or in the Senate, who was present at that meeting, is to-day a living witness that the question at that meeting was: Will it be for the advantage of Ireland that such a resolution should be brought forward? In view of what has been said in the press, in view of the imputation which was cast upon us, in view, more particularly, of the unanimous vote cast in this House in 1882, a more emphatic expression than which this could not possibly have been given, we thought, Sir, it would be impossible for us to secure anything more forcible, and that it was desirable to let that matter stand before the world, before the eyes of Mr. Gladstone, who had received it and who had returned it in the contemptuous manner that has been referred to. That was the unanimous expression of this Parliament. It had never been appealed. No one had stood up in this Parliament and asked that a different opinion should be recorded, and we felt under the circumstances, and not only those gentlemen, but the best Home Rulers in this country whom I had consulted, those who had given their time, their money and their energy to the cause, also felt that unless we could secure a unanimous vote again in this House, or something tantamount thereto, it was in the interest of Ireland that the old resolutions should stand, which had been carried by a unanimous vote, and that they should not be disturbed. It was under these circumstances that we adopted the course we did. The hon. Minister was approached by one association in the Dominion of Canada, and that is the only association that has spoken throughout the length and breadth of the land upon this subject. No other Irish society, either Protestant or Catholic, had approached the hon. gentleman, either by delegation or by letter. Not one gentleman had ever approached me. I had gone to the city of Montreal, I had appeared on the public platform there at the meeting presided over by His Worship the Mayor of Montreal, when these resolutions of the city of Montreal were passed. I had taken part in that meeting, and not one man, not one president of an organisation, had sought to impress upon me the necessity of having an expression of opinion from this Parliament. As I have said, I went out of my way to consult the best friends of Home Rule, and if we did not proceed it was from motives of prudence, from a true, sincere and heartfelt desire that what had been well done for Ireland, should remain well done, and should stand before the world as the expression of opinion of the Parliament of Canada. Sir, we had the organisation to which I have referred; we had the Montreal True Witness, the weekly edition of the newspaper to which I have referred; and we had the expression by the Catholic Record, of London, as to what this Parliament should do under these circumstances; but I failed to gather in the resolutions of the leader of the Opposition anything like an attempt to follow the advice that was given by either of these organs of public opinion. The leader of the Opposition has undertaken to present a humble Address to Her Majesty. Now, Sir, neither one nor the other of those papers asked for a humble Address to Her Majesty. If we refer to the Catholic Record, in which an appeal was made to the Irish members of this House—certainly not couched in very inviting or courteous language, in a portion of it where we were told not to be "dumb brutes," but there was another portion of it which I will read, as I do not wish anything to go upon the Hansard which would in any way mar the effect of the proceedings of to-day, which, I trust, will end harmoniously. The London Catholic Record said

"It is now in order to the Dominion Parliament to follow up its resolutions of April 20th, 1882, to their logical conclusion, and give Mr. Gladstone the benefit of a hearty expression of sympathy."

According to this paper, it is a question of passing a resolution of sympathy with Mr. Gladstone himself; something, no doubt, in the form that has come to us to-day in the public press from the Province of Nova Scotia, where Attorney General White introduced a Government resolution referring to Mr. Gladstone's Home Rule Bill, and resolved:

"That this House desires to record its warm sympathy with the noble efforts put forth by the Premier of Great Britain in the direction of giving Home Rule to Ireland, and expressess its sincere hope that his efforts may be crowned with success."

This body does not feel it necessary to present an Address to Her Majesty, but I may say that the course which has been adopted by the leader of the Opposition not only does not meet the views of those who may be supposed to speak for the Irish people of the Dominion, but it meets with their entire disapprobation, according to the statement of the Post. I think the House will admit that I am perfectly right in saying so when I refer them to the proceedings that took place a short time ago in the Quebec Legislature, when Mr. Carbray presented a resolution, probably a great deal more comprehensive than the one which has been presented by the leader of the Opposition in this House, and the resolution of Mr. Carbray was denounced as an act of toadyism, as an act of flunkeyism, as an act unworthy of the occasion. The resolution was as follows:—

"We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Quebec, in Parliament assembled, desire, in our name and on behalf of the people whom we represent, to renew the expression of our unswerving loyalty and devotion to Your Majesty's person and Government:

"That this House, always sensible to everything aiding the greater welfare, progress and happiness of every section of the Empire, desires to record its warm appreciation and great pleasure on the initiation in the Imperial Parliament of legislation of a character to give a local government to Ireland, and the prospect of an early action with a view of an equitable settlement of the land question there, whereby the position of the tillers of the soil will be improved to a large and beneficial extent, without injustice being done the present land owners. We pray that Your Majesty may be spared long years to reign over your devoted and loyal subjects."

Here, then, was a resolution embodying all the sentiments that are contained in the resolution proposed by the hon. gentleman opposite. Here was a resolution addressed to Her Majesty the Queen, just as his resolution is addressed to Her Majesty the Queen, and yet we find this organ of hon. gentlemen opposite, which assumes to speak for all the people of Canada so far as the Irish race is concerned, writing the following article in reference to the motion in question:

"The Legislature of Quebec is to be given an opportunity to express, in the name of the Canadian people, its sympathy with the struggles of the Irish race for self-government, and to extend to Mr. Gladstone its congratulations on having had the courage to introduce a Home Rule Bill in the British Parliament. Hon. Mr. Mercier has presented a set of resolutions which are to the point. Mr. Carbray has also moved in the matter, but his intention is to present an humble Address to Her Majesty the Queen. Now we would like to know what the Queen has got to do in this matter or why her name should be dragged in at all? Mr. Gladstone has had to fight against the Queen to bring in his Home Rule Bill. It is not Her Majesty that we have to thank for the Ministerial recognition of the principle of Home Rule for Ireland, it is Mr. Gladstone. Consequently it is the latter, and not the former, that should be made the object of our admiration and the recipient of our congratulations. Under the circumstances Mr. Carbray's proposed Address is out of order; it is not only uncalled for, it is undeserved.

That was the view expressed in this rather forcible language by the organ in question. We have on another date the following in an editorial article in the same paper:

"In view of this happy turn which events have taken, would it not be opportune and even beneficial to the cause of justice and freedom, which it has already pleaded, for the Dominion Parliament to imitate the example of Quebec and other Legislatures abroad, and send across to the Grand Old Man a message of sympathy and of encouragement in the great and noble work he has undertaken to accomplish in face of colossal difficulties and obstacles? The Post thinks it would be a meritorious act on the part of the Federal House to do so. Mr. Gladstone himself would esteem it so."

No doubt, the editor was in the confidence of Mr. Gladstone. Again, in another article, we find:

"Who will, then, move in the House that Gladstone is deserving of the thanks of the Canadian people for his scheme to give Ireland Home Rule?"

Again, in another article we find:

"Is there any reason why the Dominion Parliament should not follow in the footsteps of the Quebec Assembly and adopt resolutions of congratulation to Mr. Gladstone on the question of Home Rule for Ireland? There is no reason that we can see. The Federal Parliament has already placed itself on record as being in favor of self-government for the Irish people. This fact to our mind is a special reason why it should to-day tender the hand of sympathy and of encouragement to the statesman who had the courage to espouse the principle of Home Rule and advocate it from the Treasury benches in the British House of Commons."

The resolution proposed by Mr. Carbray in the Quebec Legislature, which corresponds with, but goes further than the resolution proposed by the leader of the Opposition, was withdrawn, and a special expression of the thanks of the Quebec Legislature was proposed to Mr. Gladstone on account of the stand he had taken. We, therefore, find, on referring to the journal from which I have been quoting, that the position taken by the leader of the Opposition on this subject is endorsed, whilst the very same motion and the very same action on the part of Mr. Carbray, who, by the way, is a Conservative in the Province of Quebec, was denounced in the most forcible language that the editor could call to his assistance. I say further that, in view of the statement made that if hon. members on this side of the House had brought forward a resolution asking this House to pronounce upon the question of Home Rule—we have it there in black and white—it would be a mere political dodge on our part. I say that if I or any other hon. member had come forward and proposed to this honorable House a resolution asking that a humble Address be sent to Her Majesty the Queen thanking her for what has taken place, I or any other hon. Irish Catholic member would have been denounced as a coward, as unworthy of the position of member in this House, as not representing the sentiments of the Irish people, that I should have proposed a resolution to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone and left Her Majesty aside altogether. If we proceed to consider this question further, I ask this House if there were not very great difficulties in the way of again presenting a reselution of this kind. I have spoken not merely to friends, but I have consulted gentlemen of different nationalities and races in this House as to the advisability of bringing forward a resolution on this subject. A very great difficulty indeed exists, as has been pointed out in such a plain manner by the Minister of Inland Revenue, in view of the reception which our last Address received, when Mr. Gladstone himself advised Her Majesty to tell us in plain language that while the Government of England would always be ready to receive any advice we might have to offer upon Canadian affairs, yet, so far as regards Imperial concerns, Canada had better mind her own business. Should we have attempted, without the assurance of carrying a resolution by a very large majority, in view of the opinion expressed by several hon. gentlemen who may be depended upon to support Home Rule, I ask would it have been prudent for us to have proceeded exactly in the same manner and in the very tracks we had gone before, when we were brought face to face with this snubbing that was given by the Imperial Government, and which remains to the present day. For, whilst Mr. Gladstone has upon many occasions of late, it appears, referred to congratulatory addresses forwarded to him in regard to the Home Rule question, there is one thing certain—that in all his sayings there is not one word as to what he stated to the Parliament of Canada when that answer was sent by his own Government, not a single reference to the Home Rule resolution of this Parliament. There is perhaps another view to take. We have that statement from the Earl of Kimberley before us. Every man in this Parliament, every man in this country, is aware of the existence of that answer, and it would look, perhaps, a little satirical were we to adopt a humble Address to Her Majesty to-day, after the strong position has been taken by him when we were told to mind our own business in Imperial affairs; we should again, by this very resolution, just remind the hon. gentleman of the little mistake he made in 1882, and remind him that after all the advice of Canada was not so bad, if he had taken it kindly at the time. Now, Sir, the substance of the hon. gentleman's resolution may be all right enough, but according to his own friends, according to common-sense ideas and a due regard for our own dignity, we cannot adopt by any possibility the form which he has adopted, the form which brought this answer from the Earl of Kimberley, whilst we have an equally effective mode, a mode that will involve no discourtesy towards this House, if it exists; a mode by which this Parliament places upon its records, and publishes to the world what its views are upon this question in its present state in the Imperial Parliament. Now, Sir, I think, under these circumstances, there is an admirable opportunity, if the hon. gentleman is sincere in the desire which he has expressed, to have unanimity on this question, to run no risk, to strengthen the cause of justice to Ireland—I say if the hon. gentleman is sincere, more particularly in view of the embodiment of the principles that are there enumerated in the amendment of my hon. friend—I say he has an admirable opportunity of showing that there is no desire upon his part to make this a party or political question, a question out of which political capital may be made, because it would show his anxiety to do good to the cause which he has espoused; and as we are all laboring together, and all claiming to be animated by the same spirit, nothing, I think, will evince that more than by the hon. gentleman subscribing to the amendment which has been proposed by my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue, despite the advice given him by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey). Now, Sir, I think that there ought not to be any need, on an occasion of this kind, to address this House where Home Rule exists in the full plenitude of its beneficence any question, any word, any statement in advocacy of the principle that is now being laid before us. I trust, Sir, that there are not, at all events, many in this House who do not approve of Home Rule for Ireland. I do not believe that there are many gentlemen in this House who would stand up before their constituents in any part of the country and declare that they did not desire that the Irish people in Ireland should enjoy the privileges that are enjoyed by Irish, and English, and Scotch, and French in the Dominion of Canada. I do not believe that any man in this House would go before his constituents and be listened to approvingly in the utterance of such sentiments. I trust, therefore, that there will be, at all events as regards this amendment of the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, unanimity or a strong majority in this House in its favor. I will say to those who may not believe in Home Rule for Ireland that, under existing circumstances, that question has become, you may say, a fixed factor in the politics of Great Britain. One of the greatest men in Ireland to-day, a member of the British Parliament, Justin McCarthy, has said in a letter recently published that this present measure now before the House, which, to use the words of Mr. Parnell himself, is one in which there are blots and blemishes, which must be removed ere it will be acceptable to the Irish people—I say Justin McCarthy has stated that in his opinion this Bill may not become law at present. But, Sir, as sure as there is a kind Providence which watches over the fate of nations, Ireland is destined to get justice in the matter of Home Rule. I would point out to those hon. gentlemen to whom I am now specially addressing myself, a statement made by a very distinguished statesman of England in 1880. I refer to Mr. Lowe, who had abandoned his former position with regard to the extension of the franchise, and who thus gave his reasons in a speech on his re-election for London University:

"You took me as your representative at a time when you knew that I differed from the mass of the Liberal party on the subject of the franchise. That was a kindness I shall never forget. What has happened with regard to that question of the franchise? Why, this. One-half of the subject has been settled by those with whom I acted at that time—the Tories themselves. You see that Sir Stafford Northcote has been complaining of the masses of people who have sprung up everywhere as if they were the dragon's teeth. But who sowed the dragon's teeth? This has to be said to the credit or discredit of the Tory Government—that this greater number of people have the franchise because the Tory Government, out-trumping the Whigs, gave it to them. Well, gentleman, now comes the question of the county franchise. I am a practical man. You know that I fought as long as there was a possibility of success, but I am now in this dilemma: if I go on any further I must unite with the Tories, who have already deceived and betrayed me—(laughter and cheers)—or else I must confess myself, as I humbly do, utterly beaten in this matter. I must confess that public opinion is entirely against me, and give up all opposition whatever. Gentlemen, I prefer the latter course. (Cheers). Politics are a practical science, and, as I have said from the first, what I desired was that the subject should be fairly brought before the country, and that we should have its decision upon the question. Well, it has been brought before the country in this election, and the decision of the Liberal party has been, so far as I know, absolutely unanimous. I, therefore, have nothing to do but to bow to that decision."

And, Mr. Speaker, what has taken place in the question referred to will take place with Home Rule. This has become a question of practical politics in the Imperial Parliament, and if this Bill of the Right Hon. Mr. Gladstone be not carried, the Tories will probably out-trump Mr. Gladstone at an early day, and a broader and more comprehensive Bill of Home Rule will be brought in by the Conservatives. I know it has been urged on many occasions that this question of Home Rule involves separation from the Empire. I have never believed that. I have given many years of study to this question in my own humble way, and I am convinced that the honor, the glory, the power and the prestige of England, Ireland and Scotland are bound up together. Just as in this country we cling to the prestige we have acquired by the joint exploits of the two great sections that make up our population, just as the English speaking people would now consent to allow the glory shed upon our history by our French Canadian brethern, from the days of Jacques Cartier to the present time, through their glorious struggle and achievements, recorded in Les Relations des Jésuites and in the opening pages of Garneau, I say, just as we could never allow that glory and that prestige to be taken away, so, with regard to the people of Ireland they feel that they have cast a halo of glory around the British Empire; they feel that they have embellished the literature of that Empire; they feel that their poets and their orators, their scholars and their statesmen, their men in every position of life, by their genius have enhanced the glory of that Empire. They feel, speaking the language of Richard Lalor Shiel, that on many a battle-field the blood of England, of Ireland, and of Scotland, has been shed together; in the same deep pits in many lands, their bodies have been deposited, and the green sward of spring now covers their commingled remains. The Irish people feel and know what they have contributed to the Empire, and they know what they would lose by total separation from that Empire; they know that England, Ireland and Scotland, as separate nations, could never possess that commanding influence in the world which they possess to-day. But the people of Ireland demand, and with God's blessing they will have, Home Rule there as we have Home Rule here; and in the words of the amendment that has been submitted by my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue, the result will be that peace and contentment will reign in the land, that the Irish people will be happy and prosperous, and that the bonds of union between Ireland, England and Scotland, will be strengthened, not weakened thereby, and the future prosperity of the Empire secured.

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that it is right that any Irishman should get a groan in this House. I claim to be an Irishman just as much as the gentlemen who have already addressed the House on this question. I believe I am just as true an Irishman as any who sits within this Chamber. I was born on the old sod; I lived there for a good many years; I have visited it and travelled through it frequently. I love and reverence the green hills of Ireland just as much as any man in this House; and when I, in my humble way, rise to offer a few words in the interest of this important question I think I am just as fairly entitled to a hearing as any man who sits in this House. Now, Sir, I regret the course that hon. gentlemen opposite have deemed it proper to take on this occasion. I should have liked very much that the question had been received by hon. gentlemen opposite in the same spirit in which it was presented. I am quite sure the hon. leader of the Opposition took the position he did honestly and earnestly desirous of strengthening the hands of the Hon. Mr. Gladstone who has assumed the enormous task of endeavoring to secure Home Rule for Ireland. I believe hon. gentlemen opposite would have accepted the proposition had it not emanated from the hon. leader of the Opposition. If the hon. leader of the Government had presented that resolution, they would have held up their hands and yelled in joy that it had been presented to this House; but simply because the hon. leader of the Opposition brings it forward, after waiting for weeks—yes, for months—for hon. gentlemen opposite who have the majority of the members of this House at their backs, they refuse to support it. Why did they not take action themselves? Did they consider the question one of so little importance as to be not worthy of their attention? The hon. gentleman who has just sit down has told us that the Irishmen of this House and the Irishmen of the Senate had a meeting and talked the whole question over; and he said that every Irishman in this House and in the Senate was present. Well, Sir, I claim to be an Irishman, and I was not there; I heard nothing of the meeting, and I do not believe there is an Irishman on this side of the House who heard anything of it. I would like to know if the hon. leader of the Opposition heard anything of it?

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Mr. CURRAN. I spoke of Irish Catholic members and Senators.

Mr. BLAKE. It is a Catholic question, is it?

Mr. CURRAN. No, it is not, but you are trying to make a Grit question of it.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am sorry the hon. gentleman is so exceedingly narrow-minded on this question. I would like to know if the resolution carried in this House in 1882 was carried only by the votes of Irish Catholic members. I would like to know if both Catholic and Protestant members did not support that resolution. Mr. Parnell is not a Catholic, and why should the hon. gentleman narrow the question down to Catholics? No doubt he wanted to feel, and find out quietly what would be the prospect of carrying this resolution by hon. gentlemen opposite, and what would be the political effect of introducing the question; and, after considering that, he probably decided in his own mind that it would be better simply to have the Minister of Inland Revenue send a despatch across the Atlantic on behalf of the Irishmen of Canada. I cannot understand why he should claim the right to send such a despatch on behalf of the Irishmen of Canada. At any rate, they thought it proper to jilt the matter in that way; and now, when the hon. leader of the Opposition, after two months for them to move, has brought forward the question, they find that the wind has been taken out of their sails, and they anxiously ask themselves: What course can we take; it will never do to go to the country with the leader of the Opposition. introducing a resolution for Home Rule for Ireland; it will never do to allow him to carry away the laurels; we must try if we cannot in some way share the glory and popularity of having passed such a resolution. And in order to do that, the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue has brought forward his amendment. Now, if we could take the resolution that has been presented by the hon leader of the Opposition and the amendment that has been presented by the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue and place those two resolutions in the hands of Mr. Gladstone and in the hands of Mr. Parnell, I venture to say that their decision would be, let us have the resolution of the hon. leader of the Opposition. That is what suits our purpose. Why, in addressing Mr. Gladstone, do you think a resolution of this House would strengthen his hands or induce him more earnestly to give attention to the question? No; what he wants is a resolution asking the Queen and Crown of England to lend aid and encouragement to him in the tremendous struggle he has undertaken. We have had a little experience in this country with regard to the question of Home Rule, and are therefore in a position to speak with some authority on that subject. We know the differences that existed among our Provinces before Confederation; we can well remember the old political struggles that took place, when one Province was set against the other, and we are all glad to think that the days of those unfortunate differences are past, owing chiefly to Confederation. We are therefore in a better position to offer advice to the Crown than any other portion of her colonies, and it is only just to the people of Ireland that we should sympathise with the efforts made in their behalf, and show our sympathy and encouragement by petitioning the Crown to yield to those efforts. There is another point, Sir, to which I wish to call your attention. For many years we have been spending large sums in trying to bring out immigrants from Ireland and other portions of the British Isles, and I believe our efforts and our money have been to a great extent uselessly sacrificed, owing to the ill-feeling that existed in the minds of the Irish people with regard to British rule. I believe if years ago Ireland had got Home Rule, we would to-day have more Irishmen living in Canada, which would be a decided advantage to us. Any man who will travel through Ireland, as I have and witnessed the evidence of ancient greatness on every hand and the unfortunate condition of things to-day which stand out in strong contrast to those evidences of past grandeur, will come to the conclusion that something is wanted. He will easily see that Ireland has not been progressing and that there is evident necessity, and the evidence of the necessity that something should be granted in the way of Home Rule is to be seen on every hand and to be heard in the expressions of the people, giving vent to the almost unanimous desire for some change of that kind. If Ireland got Home Rule, she would use it cautiously and carefully, knowing that the eyes of the world would be turned upon her to see whether she would really use the privilege granted to her with prudence and care. I believe the Catholic majority would deal out to the Protestant minority an ample share of fair treatment, and that the latter would not suffer in the slightest. I shall never believe anything else until I see the measure of Home Rule proposed by Mr. Gladstone put in operation, and see it fail, which latter event, at present, I do not think at all probable. I believe it is the incumbent duty of this House to express our opinion on this question, and not to present our resolution in the emasculated style proposed by the Minister of Inland Revenue. The hon. gentleman who last spoke appeared to challenge the sincerity of the leader of the Opposition. I cannot understand why the hon. gentleman should challenge his sincerity. I think the leader of the Opposition has given ample evidence of his sincerity, first, by introducing the resolution in a broad and comprehensive style, and, second, by the very admirable speech which he delivered on that occasion. Is there a gentleman in this House who sympathises with the Irish movement, who could take exception to a single word in that speech? Did not the leader of the Opposition try to impress on the House the absolute necessity that its expression of opinion should be unanimous, not as a party question, but as an expression of Canadian public sentiment, with the object of strengthening Mr. Gladstone's hands by securing to him the prestige which would arise from our action and our experience in the mater of Home Rule. The hon. gentleman also stated that the leader of the Opposition had introduced the measure on his own responsibility, without consulting anybody in the House. That is not true. As far as I am concerned, I can speak as an Irishman, and I believe he did not confine his views to the Irishmen in the House or the Catholic Irishmen on this side as did the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman said he consulted the Catholics of the House and the Catholics of the Senate, but the leader of the Opposition did not confine his opinions to Catholics or Protestants. He is not accustomed to proceed in that way, and before the hon. gentleman should undertake to say that the leader of Opposition consulted nobody, he should have taken the trouble to enquire a little into the facts. Probably he thought that the leader of the Opposition proceeded in the way the hon. gentleman did himself. The hon. gentleman also spoke with regard to the attitude of the Globe and Mail. Well, any person who is in the habit of reading the Globe can come to no other conclusion than that the Globe is a consistent advocate of Home Rule. Its course on that question has been advocated in that bold and liberal spirit which that newspaper agitates every question it takes in hand. But what has been the course of the Mail? The Mail played shy for a long time. It followed the course which is usually followed by the leader of the Government in an important question. It wanted, first, to see how the wind would blow, to see what course would be taken by its leaders, and after hesitating a long time, it mustered courage enough to come out and express opposition to Home Rule. Irishmen have not much to thank the Mail for. They will be able to see through the course taken by the Mail and by the hon. gentlemen opposite, and I do not believe they will be a party to this scheme of blinding the eyes of those who sympathise with Home Rule and hoodwinking the Irish population. The people will see through this thin garment of hypocrisy, and give the leader of the Opposition credit for his sincerity, notwithstanding the efforts made by hon. gentlemen opposite to decry and distort his motives. I am exceedingly sorry to see that hon. gentlemen opposite should play dog-in-the-manger in the way they are attempting to do, simply because they are not honored with having introduced the resolution, because they lost their opportunity. They waited day after day and week after week, they felt the pulse of the outside press, and no doubt they consulted their political leader. They studied the question, they were approached by Irishmen in the city of Ottawa and no doubt from elsewhere, they were written to, they were advised, they were encouraged, they were urged, they were pressed to bring in this resolution, but all the pressure and all the encouragement they got failed to have the desired effect. Then, when the resolution is introduced, they begin to see that they have lost a grand opportunity, they have thrown away their changes, they have sacrificed the opportunity of making themselves popular, and, in order, if possible, to turn the tide of venom and ill-feeling and contempt which they naturally deserve from the Irishmen outside of this House whom they claim to represent and to lead, they want now to kick up a little dust and try if they can get an amendment introduced, try to get some little change made, and try to persuade the people: "Did we not do the business after all; it was not Mr. Blake at all, it was we." Do you not see what has pinched the Minister of Inland Revenue? He feels that he is out-generalled. Look at the devoted utterances that hon. gentleman used on the occasion of this question being discussed in 1882. Read the utterances of the member for Montreal (Mr. Curran) on that occasion. Could anyone speak in a more patriotic and glowing style on the advantages of Home Rule in Ireland? Yes, they tried it to make capital out of it then, and no doubt they will try some more of the same kind. I suppose we shall have an address from others on that side of the House on this subject. No doubt the member for Montreal and the Minister of Inland Revenue will not be allowed to stand alone. No doubt the First Minister will address the House. We expect him to. No doubt we shall hear from the Minister of Customs, he is an Irishman.

Mr. BOWELL. You are wrong.

Mr. McMULLEN. We also expect the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) to speak. Surely he is going to say a word on this question.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. And the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. White), surely we will have a word from him on this question.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I am opposed to it.

Mr. McMULLEN. All these men will rise, and they will deplore the unfortunate spirit that actuated the leader of the Opposition in introducing a question of this kind without consulting hon. gentlemen opposite. It was a sad thing, and on him must rest the responsibility of the defeat, if it is defeated. They are sorry he has placed it in the unfortunate position in which it is placed before the House, and that they have been compelled to take the stand they have, and it is only in the interest of Home Rule they are doing it. If it were not that they are so devoted to the cause of Home Rule and to the cause of Ireland, they would sacrifice a little to meet the views of the leader of the Opposition, but they are so devoted to that cause that they dare not allow this resolution to pass, they must amend it in some way, it is so crude, it is placed in such a position, they feel that the Queen would not be honored to receive an address based upon such a resolution without passing their glossy hands over it and putting it in proper shape. No doubt we shall hear a good deal in regard to that, and a great many expressions of regret that the hon. the leader of the Opposition did not take time. He did it too hurriedly, he got it up too quickly, it is badly worded, it is a pity it is presented in that shape, and a great many other faults of that kind will be found, and they will try to show that it is a deplorable thing that he should have permitted himself to be driven to bring in this resolution without consulting gentlemen opposite and getting them to put it in decent shape so that it might look creditable. I deplore the spirit that has been evinced by hon. gentlemen opposite in connection with this question. If they had accepted the action of the hon. the leader of the Opposition in the spirit in which it was tendered, I believe this question might have passed this House unanimously, and they would have had just as much credit by taking that course as they will have now by the course they have adopted, just as much credit by casting in their lot unanimously with the hon. the leader of the Opposition as by attempting in this cheese-paring kind of style to interfere and to dabble with the resolution, and to try to cut and carve it so that, when they go to the country in a few months, they will say: "Why, it was we, after all that prepared that resolution; had we permitted it to go home in the shape in which it was prepared by the leader of the Opposition it would have been deplorable, it would not have suited Mr. Gladstone, and Mr. Parnell would have been horrified, the country would have risen, and said, are there no men in Canada able to prepare something decent to send to the Queen instead of sending a Home Rule resolution in this style, in place of something like the production of a man of brains and sense." But, no matter how they may talk, they have got into an unfortunate dilemma, and they will try to struggle out of it as best they can. They will all try to show willingness. The hon. Minister of Inland Revenue has given the cue, and according to that they will all preach and prattle the doctrine he has laid down as to the desirability of sending an address merely to Mr. Gladstone and not to the Queen. I am rather disposed to think that hon. gentlemen opposite, notwithstanding all their vaunted loyalty as Conservatives, are disposed to ignore the Queen in this question. They do not seem to be disposed to acknowledge the Queen. The idea of men led by the First Minister daring to petition the First Minister of England on a matter of this kind without sending it to the Queen! I am surprised. A knight, a man honored by the Queen, several of his colleagues honored by the Queen, to think that they would send it to the First Minister instead of the Queen, instead of to the Crown! Surely the First Minister has not had the concocting of this matter. Surely he has not been consulted. Surely he would not propose to ignore the Queen. He is disposed to express a great deal of loyalty, and, whenever any question comes up on which the Queen might be approached or the Government of England, he displays a great deal of loyalty and respect for the Crown and the Queen. We all do, and I am sorry that hon. gentlemen are disposed to reflect upon Her Majesty the Queen in connection with this question. If we petition at all, is not the Queen the proper party to address? Certainly she is. If any other colonies of the Empire were to address a resolution to this House on a question of vital importance to this Dominion of ours, and that petition was sent to the First Minister of this House instead of to the Governor General in Council, I am sure hon. gentlemen opposite would say it was a very strange proceeding for these men to take, to address the First Minister; did they not know that we had a Governor General, a representative of the Queen? Why did they not address the petition to the representative of the Queen in the country? And they would stand up and hold up their hands in holy horror, to think we should dare to receive a petition of that kind. I am surprised, with all their boasted loyalty and boasted admiration for our Queen—and we have a noble Queen—that they should talk in this way. I think it would be a great pity to ignore her right to be approached on this occasion. They may claim that the answer we got before was not an answer such as we would like to get, but there has been a great deal of change in the feeling in Ireland and England on this question since that petition was sent home. The people of England have been dealing with that question; they have had a general election; that question has been one of the vital questions at that general election, and is now the question of paramount importance in England. I say, when that is the case, we have a perfect right, as a humble colony claiming loyalty to our Queen, and having had the experience we have, to offer our views humbly and courteously on this question. We have a right to exercise that right, and if we fail to do that, we are not doing justice to those who are in jeopardy, and who are trying to secure for themselves that measure of representation and self-government that we so much glory in ourselves. We boast of our system of home rule in Canada, and I believe it would have been a greater success than it has been if the Dominion had been presided over by men less disposed to dabble with questions that legitimately belong to the separate Provinces, and allowing them to exercise their home rule without interference. I hope that we shall have a general expression of opinion on this subject. For my part I have no hesitation in expressing myself cordially in unison with the view of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. I believe that is the proper view. I believe the Irishmen of this country, if the question were submitted to them by counties, would endorse the view expressed by the leader of the Opposition, and I believe that is the view that will be most likely to assist Mr. Gladstone in his struggles on behalf of Home Rule. I think we should not allow these little bickerings to enter this discussion; I believe politics should have been banished from it. I am sure the leader of the Opposition was anxious that all political feeling should be set aside, and that we should all approach it in a spirit of anxious desire to assist Mr. Gladstone in the effort he is making. But hon. gentlemen opposite have chosen to take another course. Oh, politics is a terrible thing. A man cannot possibly introduce any question from this side of the House but he must be charged with a desire of making political capital. The hon. leader of the Opposition is charged with having some sinister design in view, with trying to strengthen the hands of his followers. Well, I am sure he did not steal a march on hon. gentlemen opposite. If he had introduced it in the very beginning of the Session, without allowing hon. gentlemen opposite an opportunity of acting, then he might fairly be charged with having stolen a march upon them. Did he do that? No, he has waited till the ninth week of this Session. He has given the hon. gentleman for Montreal (Mr. Curran) and his associates ample time to have moved. They have had eight or nine weeks to prepare their resolution, to consult their chief and his co-Ministers—they have waited all this time without taking any action. Still they have not moved. There must have been some secret cause at the bottom, and they did not think it worth while to move, but all at once the leader of the Opposition introduced his motion, and then they arose in their might and felt it their duty to express their earnest desire that something of a different kind should be introduced and carried through. They then became alive, they shook off the shackles of laziness and rose up. Then they were ready to act, but they were never ready to act before. I suppose if the leader of the Opposition had not acted, the probabilities are that you, Mr. Speaker, would have left the Chair for the last time and the Governor General would have given his assent to every Act we have passed here, before they would have acted; and if we had done that the probabilities are that they would have gone to the country and said: Well, we were afraid to move on that question, we were afraid of the leader of the Opposition, we did not know what course he would take, we were afraid of these fellows that were following him, and we began to think they were not going to support us, and we feared we could not carry a resolution through. But we have got the Minister of Inland Revenue the most prominent Irish member in this House to cable home a despatch urging and encouraging Mr. Parnell in his noble undertaking. We did all we could do, all that we possibly dared to risk, in order to promote the cause of Home Rule. But now they have an opportunity of joining hands across the floors of the House in the interests of a country that has been admittedly suffering. There is not a man in this House who will deny that poor, unfortunate Ireland has suffered for years for the want of that measure of Home Rule that we believe would be pleasant to her. They attack the resolution of the leader of the Opposition, and I am sorry to say that there are some men of Irish parentage who have been so neglectful of the honor they owe to their parent land, that in the moment of her struggles, and of Mr. Gladstone's efforts in her behalf, they have stood, while clothed with the honor of being representatives in this House, clothed with the privilege of discharging the duty of representative of constituencies that, in many cases, have a large number of Irishmen—they have stood still for nine weeks without offering one word of encouragement to the leaders of the Home Rule movement, or presenting any resolution in order to back up Mr. Gladstone in the enormous task he has undertaken.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. McMULLEN. When the House rose, I was endeavoring to present some ideas with reference to what I conceived to be the duty of the representatives in this House on this important question. I endeavored to show what I conceived to be the reasons why the Government had chosen to take the course they have taken in interfering with the resolution that has been presented by the leader on this side of the House. I am sorry that hon. gentlemen opposite have not seen it to be their duty to go further in meeting the views of the leader of the Opposition, than by moving an amendment simply to confirm the resolution we adopted in 1882. I contend we ought to be in a position to go further than that. We have had the experience of four years. We have seen the unfortunate results of the disturbances that have existed in Ireland; we have read from year to year the unfortunate occurrences that have take place there. I am sure we must be convinced that there must be some necessity for a change in the system of Government, that would remove those unfortunate circumstances that have been so plainly brought before us, and that the House should not say that after all the experiences we have had, after all the experiences we have had ourselves as a confederacy, we are not in a position to go further than simply confirm what we did in 1882. We have had ourselves four years more experience. We enjoy a measure of home rule, which has been a real advantage. It is conceded by each of the Provinces, notwithstanding unfortunate interferences that have taken place between the Dominion Government and the Provinces from time to time, that our condition is better than it was prior to Confederation. Well, then, after having those experiences, and after having seen what we have seen in regard to Ireland, are we not in a position to go further than to re-affirm what we did in 1882. I think we ought to be able to go further, and we are not discharging our duty as fellow-subjects with the people of Ireland if we are not prepared to do so. I would ask if the statesmen of England are not holding different opinions to-day to what they did in 1882. Are not the public men who were hostile to Home Rule then, who characterised it as breaking up the empire and even worse, admitting that some change is necessary? Is Mr. Gladstone of the same mind to-day as he was four years ago? He is not. He has come to the conclusion that the change is necessary. We have been eye-witnesses of those experiences in Ireland, and if we are not in a position to go further than simply confirm what we did in 1882 we have not been sensible of the incidents that have transpired in the meantime and not been faithful observers of what has passed before our eyes. I contend that we should go even further than the resolution itself. If the amendment had added force to the resolution it should have been seriously considered. I must again express regret that the question has not been approached in a spirit of liberality and fairness by hon. gentlemen opposite. I am sorry to think that little political bitternesses should influence members on this great question and should interfere with the decision of this House with respect to it. Simply because hon. gentlemen opposite think the leader of the Opposition might make a little capital out of this question, they interfere and actually risk the chance of reaching a conclusion on it such as would be satisfactory to our friends on the other side of the water and such as would in some measure strengthen the hands of Mr. Gladstone. I hope, whatever bitterness may have characterised the discussions so far, we will abandon those little political bickerings and deal with the question fairly, and let us get over the matter with that measure of credit to ourselves which we should like to claim. We may contend about our own political questions, but when a subject of this kind affecting a portion of the Empire is brought forward we should be able to bury our political differences and deal with it in a spirit of generosity, kindness and British fair play. Holding that feeling; and being deirous as an Irishman to do everything in my power to aid the efforts being put forth by Mr. Gladstone in favor of Home Rule, I beg to move in amendment to the amendment:

To leave out all the words in the amendment after "that" and insert the following words in addition thereto, after the word "adhesion:"

And that this House is confirmed and strengthened by the events which have occurred since the passage of the said address in its convictions that the true interests both of Ireland and the rest of the Empire will be served in the highest degree by the granting of Home Rule to Ireland.

Mr. BURNS. I am afraid, notwithstanding all the professions made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, that his actions are not entirely uninfluenced by party considerations. The whole tenor and temper of the speech of the hon. gentleman could only leave the impression on one's mind that political considerations were largely at the bottom of his action and statements. I shall not in any way try to disprove what the hon. gentleman has stated, when he said he was actuated by the desire to secure as far as possible the passage of some measure which would go to strengthen the hands of those who are now endeavoring to strike the chains from off the feet of Ireland; but while giving him credit for being influenced by that motive, I cannot divest myself of the idea that within and behind there are also political considerations. The observations which he addressed to the House can leave no other impression on my mind, and because that impression is on my mind, I must so express myself. The hon. gentleman, in the course of his speech, has charged the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue with being derelict in his duty to his countryman in not bringing forward, for the consideration of the House, some resolution of this kind. It comes with very ill grace from the hon. gentleman, or from any hon. gentleman in this House, to charge the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue with being now or of ever having been derelict in his duty to his countryman. The record of that hon. gentleman, as an Irishman, stands to-day as high as that of any Irishman, or any man in the Dominion of Canada. In the Province to which he belongs, no name carries with it greater weight than the name of John Costigan, the Minister of Inland Revenue. He has from time to time proved his devotedness to his countrymen on every occasion which presented itself, he was not slow in advocating their interest when attacked. In 1882, in the face of opposition from his own party, he introduced into this House a series of resolutions, which were carried unanimously, or almost unanimously. What has the hon. gentleman to gain by the introduction of those resolutions? No political advantage for himself; he never sought for any political advantage——

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. BURNS. No, he never did. If he had sought for political advantages for himself these advantages might have accrued to him long before that. He was actuated, I am sure, by the sole desire of serving in some way the country he claimed as his own, though he was not a native of it. Prior to 1882 it can be said of him that he proved his devotedness to his countrymen, to their interests—their religious interests especially—on every occasion when they were attacked. Then, I say, it comes with a very poor grace from the hon. gentleman who has just sat down to charge the Minister of Inland Revenue with having in any way deserted his country, or the cause of his country. The facts are as stated by the Minister, that it was suggested to him that resolutions of this kind should be introduced, but after consultation with those with whom he was associated, with his countrymen if you will, it was deemed inexpedient, or unnecessary rather, that resolutions of this nature should be introduced, and why? Because in 1882 the Parliament of Canada had passed resolutions, and we knew the treatment they received. We know the reply which was given to the address; and therefore, in face of that fact, it was deemed unnecessary now, with that record of the opinion of the Canadian Parliament standing before the Imperial Government, to re-introduce similar resolutions. It was because of the conclusion arrived at that the hon. Minister deemed it unnecessary, I say, to take action in the matter. Was the action of the hon. leader of the Opposition a spontaneous action? He said in his speech that he had waited until the last moment, waited to hear from this side of the House. One would be led to infer from that statement that the action of the hon. gentleman was a spontaneous one. I would ask was it not after that hon. gentleman had been waited upon and asked to move those resolutions, that they were introduced. Was the action one of his own motion? I leave the question to him to answer. At all events current rumor has it that he did not move until he was moved, and we know that as the leader of a great party in the Dominion of Canada, he was very likely to be influenced by political considerations, if he thought his political interest and the interest of his party could be served by bringing forward these resolutions, in order that he might catch the Irish vote of the Dominion of Canada. Well, the Irish vote of the Dominion of Canada is not so easily caught as that. The Irish voters of the Dominion of Canada can distinguish grain from chaff; they know who their real friends are, and are able to discriminate between those who are their real friends and those who are not. The fact stands to-day in the presence of the House, that not one Irish Catholic sits in the House except on the Conservative side. What the electors in 1882 did—that is the Irish Catholic portion of them—I feel satisfied they will repeat on the next occasion that presents itself, and therefore the efforts and labors of the hon. gentleman will have all been in vain. I do not wish to trouble the House with any lengthy remarks. No one feels more strongly than I do for the cause of Ireland, my native land. No one feels a stronger desire to see her relieved from the thraldom in which she has been enslaved. No one would go further in rendering a service to his country than I would. I have before my consideration to-night two resolutions. One resolution means the sending of an address to Her Majesty, referring to the Irish question, and expresses the sentiment of the Canadian Parliament thereon, and the other re-affirms the sentiments contained in the resolutions passed in 1882. I consider that the amendment moved by the Minister of Inland Revenue embodies the ideas and sentiments and feelings of the great majority of the Irishmen of this Dominion, and because I believe so I will support that amendment.

Mr. O'BRIEN. It seems, Sir, to be assumed by all who have yet spoken on this question, that this House is so unanimous in an expression of opinion in favor of Home Rule for Ireland, as embodied in the Bill brought in by Mr. Gladstone, or in some similar measure, as to pass in favor of that question by unanimous consent. Now, Sir, I, for one, view with the very gravest apprehension as to the result, not only to Ireland and the best interests of Ireland, but also to the Empire at large, of the measure introduced by Mr. Gladstone, and chiefly for this reason, that I do not believe any measure, which is the mere child of terror, forced on a man contrary to his convictions, contrary to the convictions of his own party and the nation at large, is likely to be attended with any great measure of success. Now, before proceeding further with that view of the question, I wish to claim the attention of the hon. mover of the first resolution, and I congratulate him upon this fact, that whatever the result of this motion may be, that hon. gentleman has shown that he has found one more point upon which he can stand and hold his party together, and carry them with him, in addition to the policy which was so fully developed the night before last, the policy of slander. On that occasion I noticed, whether from accident or design, he left the development of that policy to his able lieutenants, and certainly to one of them it was a congenial and suitable task. The hon. gentleman was not present to vote on that occasion. I can hardly suppose it was the result of design, but, at any rate, it had a singular appearance, when a proposition was laid before this House, a proposition which any member could hardly, in the abstract, have dissented from, that he was not present to take part in the discussion, a discussion, which, like everything else the hon. gentleman introduces, succeeded, by the personalities with which it was connected in the course of the debate which followed, in landing him, as it always will land that hon. gentleman, so long as he pursues the policy——

Mr. BLAKE. I rise to order. I would ask whether this is an allusion to a past debate.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Well, then, I congratulate the hon. gentleman upon the position in which he stands, and upon his peculiar suitability for the position that he has taken as the mover of this resolution. I hope this remark may not be considered out of order. He poses—I withdraw that word, because it implies a charge of insincerity; but that hon. gentleman stands in the position, among laymen, of a declared supporter of evangelical protestantism in Ontario; and yet he comes forward here as the champion of a measure which every Protestant in Ireland views as dangerous and perilous to his liberties.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No!

Mr. O'BRIEN. Before I have done I will bring forward strong evidence on that point. The hon. gentleman, I say, stands in that respect in a peculiarly happy position as the mover of this resolution. It might be supposed also that as a great lawyer, as a man who has gained his eminence in this country by his practice at the bar, and by his knowledge of constitutional law which is often boasted of, he would not be so ready to support a measure which sets all law at defiance. There never was a system of coercion in Ireland to be compared with the terrorism exercised by the Land League since Mr. Parnell has been occupying his present position; and it is somewhat singular that anyone can be found to support a body whose recognised agents have endeavored, and unfortunately too often successfully, to carry out their measures by the vilest crimes that any man can possibly conceive of. Hon. gentlemen will remember that upon this day four years ago, two men who landed in Ireland charged with a message of peace, which, if there had been time given to utter it, might have very much changed the position of affairs, were cut off by assassination before they were allowed to utter it. Now, I have a word to say to the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue. That hon. gentleman has spoken throughout this debate as though he alone had a right to speak on behalf of the Irish members of this House. I should like to have that hon. gentleman's definition of what an Irish member is. I should like to know who are the Irish members of this House. Are they those who, like himself, are of the Roman Catholic religion, and are also supporters of Home Rule?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The hon. gentleman is laboring under a misapprehension as to the position I assumed in speaking on my own behalf as mover of the Irish resolutions. I have assumed that position in face of the unanimous vote given in favor of that resolution; and, as I stated before, I do not believe that position is binding on anyone who dissents from the resolution which was then adopted.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I accept the hon. gentleman's explanation so far as it goes; but I desire to say this, that I utterly repudiate the idea that those gentlemen who support Mr. Parnell's doctrines as to what is best for the Government of Ireland, can be said to represent what is popularly called the Irish people, except so far as they speak for their own following in that country. I want that hon. gentleman to understand—and I think I am perfectly justified in making the remark—that there is a very large population in Ireland who have no sympathy with Mr. Parnell's doctrines or his movement, and who do not recognise him in any way as a leader. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether an Ulster Orangeman or a Protestant from the west of Ireland has not just as much right to speak in this House on behalf of that portion of the population of Ireland who are opposed to the principle of Home Rule, who look upon it as disastrous and perilous to their best interests, as anyone who believes in the position assumed by Mr. Parnell. Now, Sir, I, for one, occupy precisely the same position as the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue. I am the descendant of an Irish family, which at least has borne a not ignoble part in the history of that country; and I say, as representing that class of Irishmen to which I am now alluding, that I protest against any measure such as that introduced by Mr. Gladstone, which bristles with objectionable features, and which I think should be defeated on the ground that if it is passed something worse must follow. When the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue or other hon. gentlemen undertake to speak on behalf of the people of Ireland, I think it only fair to mention that at least one-third of the population of Ireland, including the great bulk of the Protestant population, and a large minority of Roman Catholics, who do not believe in the doctrines of Mr. Parnell, look on Mr. Gladstone's measure as disastrous to the country, and have protested and do protest in the strongest manner against it. They have taken very many occasions to express that opinion; and to show the depth of their feeling, I think I may be allowed to quote the remarks made by a member of the English House of Commons, whose name is historical, and who will, I think, be accepted as an authority on the subject. I allude to Mr. Plunkett, who, I think, is the member for the University of Dublin. At a public meeting recently held, that gentleman used the following language :—

"I wish I could realise for you the feelings of anxious grief, almost of despair, with which the loyalists of Ireland regard the present crisis. We foresee that our country, where we were born and bred, with which every hope and every affection and every tradition of our lives is bound up, will be committed to a condition of squalid poverty and violent social disorder which before long is almost certain to end in civil war."

These are serious words; they were uttered under a full sense of their importance, and I think they may be accepted as expressing the feeling of the minority of the people of Ireland towards the measure now before the Imperial House of Commons. But, Sir, the most serious objection to that measure, and the one which we, as Canadians, are most entitled to consider, apart from any sympathy which we may feel, as I do, with that Protestant minority, is that it is regarded by Mr. Parnell and his followers, whatever may be said to the contrary, as a mere lever by which they may accomplish what they really desire—that is, the complete isolation and independence of Ireland. In proof of that, I may cite no less an authority than Mr. Parnell himself, who, speaking at Cincinnati so long ago as 1880, said :

"None of us, whether in America or in Ireland, or wherever we may be, will be satisfied until we have destroyed the last link that keeps Ireland bound to England."

And that language has been repeated time and again. It was repeated only the other day by Mr. Davitt, one of Mr. Parnell's most trusted lieutenants, who, when asked if he approved of the Bill now before Parliament, replied: "When a man gets his breakfast, is it to be said that he should not get his dinner ?"—meaning thus to illustrate his feeling towards that measure; and if it is carried, even with modifications, can anyone believe that those who support it in Ireland would stop short of claiming absolute independence ? Mr. Gladstone has put a weapon in their hands, which I am sure they will not be slow to use. Why, did not that hon. gentleman say, when speaking of the laws made for Ireland: "Laws might be good in themselves, but not be accepted by the people because they came in a foreign garb." He there laid down the doctrine, from which I most decidely dissent, that anything connected with England is foreign to Ireland. Now, what will be the necessary consequence, which will result from the absurd anomaly, looking at it from a constitutional point of view, no matter what one's politics may be, that taxation is to be unaccompanied by representation. The hon. gentleman proposes that the officials of what he himself said is a foreign country, shall hold possession of Ireland. If that is to be the case, how long will the Irish people consent to such foreign domination ? I consider it a great misfortune that Mr. Gladstone should have used that word; but it is not a misfortune in the sense that the use of it gave the people of the Empire to understand what will be the necessary and inevitable results of the measure he has introduced. Not to be tedious, I will briefly refer to another objection, which, from an Irish point of view, is a most serious objection. I cannot understand how an Irishman, with any ambition beyond a mere provincial ambition, can give his consent to a measure which will degrade Ireland from the position of an integral part of the Empire to that of a mere Province. This, in the converse form, was well put by Lord Clare at the time of the Union, and, though hon. gentlemen may criticise his conduct and say his opinion was of little value, he was a man of surpassing ability, whose opinions necessarily carried great weight, and who may fairly be given as an authority on this matter, when he asked, putting the converse of his proposition: "What Irishman and what man who valued the independence and welfare of his country, would wish it to be degraded from the position of being an integral and governing part of the Empire to that of a mere mercenary Province ?" That is precisely what Mr. Gladston's Bill will do, and I am astonished any man of ambition should support a measure which will cut him off from all Imperial employment and Imperial honors. How could any man in Ireland, no matter what his ability, expect promotion or employment in the Imperial service ? How could he expect to be anything better than the official of a mere Provincial Government, when he had no longer a voice or representation in the conduct of the affairs of the Empire. It is a matter, not of congratulation, but of humiliation, to think that there should be a party in Ireland which will declare to the English people that they want to shut themselves out from the dignity and responsibility attached to their position as citizens of an integral part of the Empire at large, and become degraded to the position of mere provincialists. Take our Provinces. Is it not considered a higher position to have a seat in this House, to have something to say in the management of the affairs of the Dominion, than to have a seat in one of our Provincial Legislatures ? Would any Irishman of ability be satisfied that he should be restricted to a mere provincial position ? Would he not desire to be enabled to gratify his legitimate ambition for a share in the management of the Empire ? Would he not consider it humiliating that it should be placed out of his power to take any part in the management of the Empire, and that his country should be reduced to the position of a large municipality ? For these reasons, I am disinclined to say anything, which, however remotely, may tend to strengthen Mr. Gladstone in this measure. Mr. Gladstone made a very singular statement in his manifesto the other day. He said the opposition to Home Rule came from a single class. But do we not know well, does not every gentleman who takes an interest in public proceedings know, that the opposition to Home Rule is not confined to any one class, is not confined to the hangers-on of any one particular class, as Mr. Gladstone politely put it ? Do we not find men like Mr. Goschen, Mr. Collings, Mr. Rylands, Mr. Chamberlain, to say nothing of Lord Hartington, Lord Derby, and Lord Salisbury, showing their faith in the true interests of the Empire by their opposition to this measure ? When we see leading Radicals casting their radicalism aside, and standing forward as champions of Imperial interests, it is certainly time to give this matter more serious consideration. How many hon. members here who are prepared to vote on the resolution proposed, really know anything, or have read anything, or have thought anything, about Irish affairs ? Have they considered the necessary consequences to Ireland which will result from the carrying out of this proposed measure ? Have they ever considered what will be the position of what is called the minority, and what will be the effect, commercially, if this measure should pass? One of the great troubles of Ireland is that it is a poor country, but where has the money come from which has been employed in that country during the last century in the promotion of public works? It has come from England, and is it to be supposed that if this measure should pass and a great shock be given to the constitution of the country—is it to be supposed that if the Government of Ireland should be handed over to the 86 men who follow Mr. Parnell, English capital will continue to flow into Ireland? It is more than likely on the contrary it will flow out. This is a consideration that ought to weigh with those who profess, and no doubt honestly feel, an interest in the welfare of Ireland. It is a consideration which ought to make us pause, and which is well worth the consideration of those who desire, however earnestly, Home Rule. I think that a measure forced upon a man against his convictions, because it is only a few months ago that Mr. Gladstone, speaking of Mr. Parnell, said he was marching through rapine to dismemberment and disintegration, can hardly be said to be an honest, well considered measure. The humiliation of the country, by reducing it from the position of an integral governing part of a great Empire to that of a province, is one that ought to come home to men like my hon. friend from Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), who, if in Ireland, would hardly be satisfied to occupy the position of a mere provincial. I heard the hon. gentleman's eloquent speech which we all admire and few can imitate, and I ask if men like him in Ireland would not feel very cheap if their abilities had to be restricted to parish politics.

Mr. CURRAN. I am a Home Ruler to the mast head.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The hon. gentleman is no doubt patriotic, and may to some extent be self-sacrificing. What would be the effect on English politics had Home Rule been granted half a century ago? How many Irishmen whose names are illustrious in the annals of the Empire would have been heard of? How many mute and inglorious Miltons would have gone down to obscure graves? What would have become of Lalor Shiel, Daniel O'Connell himself, Burke, Sheridan, Grattan, and a host of others? Those men would have had no voice in the British Parliament, and would have been compelled, I will not say to waste their sweetness on the desert air, but to waste their eloquence on the quarrels of the small, miserable factions such as existed in Ireland before the Union. What would have been the loss to the country had such a state of things been brought about half a century ago? The commercial question alone is one of serious moment, because we cannot believe that, if the revolutionary measures proposed by Mr. Gladstone be carried, English capital will continue to flow into Ireland. Talk of the country not being prosperous; will anyone who has read about the condition of Ireland half a century ago, and who has travelled through Ireland in these days, fail to recognise that it is a greatly improved country? There has, no doubt, been suffering there; so there has been everywhere else, but there has also been decided improvement in its condition. The people are not so poor, as many people would lead us to believe, great material progress has been made; and are we now to lose all chance of further progress? Are we to gratify the wishes of what I honestly believe to be nothing more than a faction, who have sincerity, no doubt, but are actuated by motives that fall short of anything like true patriotism. Holding these views, believing as I do that this measure is one that ought not to pass the Imperial Parliament, I raise my voice here in protest against it; and, as far as voting upon the resolutions now before the House is concerned, I shall vote for the amendment of Mr. Costigan, simply on this ground——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Hon. gentlemen may cheer, but let me finish my sentence—simply that it is just the one resolution of all the three that I think is likely to have the least effect.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I desire to address a few words to the House on this very important matter. The question of the government of Ireland is one that has engaged the attention of the greatest statesmen that have lived in Britain during the last half century. The minds of those statesmen have been engaged in striving to solve the problem for the better government of Ireland. It is well known that Ireland has been oppressed; it is well known that a system of landlordism has prevailed in Ireland that has disturbed the peace and marred the happiness and tranquillity that otherwise would have existed there. Various expedients have been thought of; various expedients have been devised with a view of ameliorating this condition and giving to Ireland control of her own affairs. Ireland has asked and sought for this, but she has always asked and sought in vain. A short time ago, you will remember that, when it was announced that that distinguished statesman who leads the Government of the British Empire, the Right Hon. William Ewart Gladstone, was about to propose a measure for the amelioration of this condition of affairs in Ireland, that he had a measure to propose that he thought would bring about peace, would relieve the distress, and stay the crime that had marked itself in Ireland for the past half century or more, the nations of the world stood as it were on tip-toe anxiously awaiting the utterances of that distinguished statesman. No question introduced in the Parliament of Britian in the last century has moved the hearts of the people of the civilised world as much as that which has been proposed by the distinguished Premier of Britain; and when we read the oration which he delivered on that occasion, an oration which at once stamps him as a God-like man and a statesman without a peer in the civilised world to-day, the hearts of the people of Canada—not only the Irish hearts, but the Canadian hearts and the heart of every other true loyal Briton—went up in the refrain that Ireland might be reclaimed from the bondage under which she had suffered by the measures handed to the House by the distinguished Premier of Britain. And it is not to be wondered at. Ireland is great in many respects; she is renowned for her statesmen, her orators and her poets; she has a climate that is salubrious; she has vegetation that surpasses almost anything in the world, and the generous hearted people that inhabit Ireland have been oppressed and have sought for relief. Well, if they felt they were oppressed, had they not a right to say so, and, if they were misgoverned, had they not a right to amend this condition of things? Why, it is but the natural outcome, and crime is but the result of the misgovernment. It is not a trait of the Irish character, and the crimes that have been committed have not been committed by the Irish people themselves. They have been but a result of misgovernment and oppression. No wonder that there was a distinguished O'Connell, a Burke, a Curran and a Grattan, who rose up; but it was the times, to a great extent, that made these men; it was the oppression that rankled in their hearts that led them to stand forth as the champions of liberty and of freedom, and their names to-day are dear to Irishmen, and to every lover of liberty to whatever nation he belongs. Well, the nations of the world were moved when it was announced that Gladstone was to speak, and we read that speech, a speech distinguished for its statesmanship and its brilliancy, a speech that was unequalled in the British House of Parliament, with a measure that was generous and just. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) seems to think that every condition in the measure proposed is vital and essential. The Premier says, with regard to the representation in the Imperial Parliament, that it is not a vital principle, it is liable to be amended, and all that the member for Muskoka has objected to in that respect—and that is the principal objection he used to the measure — is likely to be amended so that Irishmen will represent Ireland in the Imperial Parliament. The hearts of the Old Country people in this country and the hearts of the Canadians in this country go up in fervid accord, a united people in this country outside of this House, in hoping that Gladstone may be sustained and that his arms may be strengthened so that he may be enabled to give to Ireland what she has asked for many years past. It is the desire of every patriotic man in this House that the wrongs under which Ireland has suffered shall be redressed, that the landlordism that has existed and that has oppressed the poor tenants in that country shall be done away with, that eviction and coercions of every kind shall be taken away from the law that governs Ireland, and Ireland shall yet be free, shall have her own Parliament, shall make her own laws, shall have her own Home Rule in effect. Well, this is natural, that we should sympathise with the distinguished statesman who has brought in this measure, a measure which, by reason of the traditions, by reason of those conditions that have existed in the hearts of other parts of the British Empire—traditions that have been formed, prejudices that have been grounded in the people—has met with much opposition; but it is the desire of true Canadians and true Britons that Ireland may receive that measure of justice which she has clamored for, which she has demanded, and which she has a right to expect. Are the Irish people, because they ask liberty, to be stamped out as rebels? Are the Canadians who desire a change in our constitution to be said to be rebels? Are those who are now in this country seeking a change in our constitution and desiring Imperial Federation rebels? The First Minister himself is advocating radical changes in the constitution of this country, and for that is he a rebel? And is Mr. Gladstone, when he is redressing wrongs, stamping out injuries which have existed for centuries in Ireland, not deserving the support, the united support of this Parliament in the most important dependency of the British Empire, supposed to be represented by those who are true to the parent stem from whence we sprung? Now, Sir, in reference to the resolution introduced here some years ago, strongly as I felt that the wrongs of Ireland should be redressed, I saw that there was no practicable measure before the Imperial Parliament, and I thought it was inexpedient to introduce the question here, it appeared to me to be devised for the purpose of securing popularity to those who introduced it. It would not look to be a sincere and an honest thing. But to-day, when there is a practicable scheme, we see the author of the resolution in 1882 now shrinking from enforcing the principles he professes to admire. The member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) says he is a Home Ruler, and to-day he fears to urge this measure lest it might do some harm in one quarter or another. If the hon. gentleman was sincere in his efforts then for Home Rule and liberty to Ireland, he should be more so now, when there is a reasonable probability that the wrongs under which Ireland has labored so long are about to be redressed by the Liberal and enlightened measure of the distinguished statesman of Great Britain. When the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Blake) spoke on that measure, he made a speech that will cause his name to live wherever the English language is spoken for all time to come. He based his speech on a broad and liberal platform, and it was characterised by that broad view which he brings to bear upon every question, and showed that he had made such an elaborate research into the affairs of Ireland, that it has endeared me to that hon. gentleman with stronger ties than ever I felt before. Well, Sir, the Minister of Inland Revenue was not in the Government then. He was then a humble follower, a private in the ranks. He introduced this resolution, and shortly afterwards, he entered the Government. Now, he thinks that all this should cease, that there is no necessity now for this House endeavoring to strengthen the hands of Mr. Gladstone and his Government, in the face of the opposition they meet with. At that time, there was no practical scheme before the British Parliament for the amelioration of the condition of Ireland, and yet that hon. gentleman moved the resolution. His utterances, to-day, give me an idea that he is not sincere, and that so soon as that gentleman got into office, the wrongs that had cried out for redress for a century, might continue to cry so long as that hon. gentleman enjoyed the spoils of office. Does it not look like that? So soon as he was transferred from the ranks into the Government, to use the words of one of Ireland's poets:

> "He forgot the dust from whence he grew,
> And thinks himself—the Lord knows who."

Now, that is the difference caused by the sweets of office, and it is a lamentable thing. I am glad the hon. gentleman is not entirely Irish. I would hate to see an Irishman give up the struggle for Ireland so long as a single wrong remained unredressed, and it is my great consolation to know that the Minister of Inland Revenue is not truly an Irishman, for otherwise he would not allow the charms of office, with the emoluments of office, to make him forget the wrongs that have cried out for redress so long. Now, Sir, Mr. Gladstone's scheme is capable of amendment. Mr. Gladstone indicates that it may be amended in committee, and that the principle of representation without taxation shall not be maintained. There is not an hon. gentleman opposite who should oppose the measure upon that ground. They have taxed the people in the North-West from year to year without representation. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), opposes that. The hon. member supports a Government that allowed that condition of things to exist until it bred rebellion in that country, and still he had not a single word to say against the Government that permitted that system. And here he condemns Mr. Gladstone, who has since stated, and other distinguished members of his Government have stated, that modifications may be made in order to meet the wishes of the people of Great Britain and Ireland. Now, Sir, when a society sent a deputation to wait on the Minister of Inland Revenue, he told them that it would be injudicious to introduce this measure now.

Mr. COSTIGAN. No, I did not. If the hon. gentleman had been in the House he would have heard me correct that statement made by the newspapers. I made no such statement.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I have just read it in the Ottawa Citizen, and that is the excuse given. I did not hear him deny that he had made that statement. Then if he had not this good excuse, in heaven's name, what excuse had he? What other excuse could he bring, when the wrongs of Ireland had gone on unredressed so long? If he had had the virtue of clinging to that excuse I would have given him some credit, but now he has taken away all the merit he might have, and has no other reason to offer than the fact that he is now in office and that it might possibly hurt the Government if he went on with it. Then the Government are responsible for what he did. He thinks this is extraordinary statesmanship, endorsed, no doubt, by the Premier, and the Minister of Public Works who seconded his amendment. They sent a telegram to Mr. Parnell. Parnell is not introducing this measure. Why not send it to Mr. Gladstone? If they do not desire to give it a party significance, why not approach the foot of the Throne? If ever the First Minister grows eloquent it is when he talks about the "foot of the Throne." I wonder why he did not lay this grievance at the foot of the Throne.

I think the member for Muskoka described Parnell as a robber, or something of that kind, and here we have the Government, through the Minister Inland Revenue, communicating with a gentleman whom the member for Muskoka dubs as a rebel, or something worse. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think all the lovers of freedom in this House will support the amendment to the amendment that has been moved by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen). I rather favor that. There is a word in the motion proposed by the leader of the Opposition which I would like to see left out. I will read the first sentence and point out the word, which I think might be left out because it gives it a narrowness which the motion ought not to have, I wish to see that one word "Irish" left out and "Her Majesty's subjects" inserted.

Mr. BLAKE. I would explain to the hon. gentleman that that word is in the original address, which I was following in that paragraph, and that is the reason it is there.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That is the address passed in 1882?

Mr. BLAKE. Yes.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That is quite satisfactory.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The explanation as given is somewhat satisfactory no doubt; but it is not quite satisfactory to my mind because it has a broader signification

Mr. BLAKE. I quite agree.

Mr. LANDERKIN. And if there was an error at that time in the address I do not see why it should not be corrected now. With the motion of the leader of the Opposition I am heartily in accord. I am also heartily in accord with the amendment proposed by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). I cannot understand that any gentleman who professes to be Irish, or any gentleman who professes to be liberal, anyone who professes to be loyal to Britain and British institutions, would refuse to pass the address at this time, when a Home Rule measure has been so far successful that in all human probability it will carry, and will become the law that will govern Ireland; a measure calculated, we must all admit, when we read the speech of the distinguished Mr. Gladstone, to cause us to wonder that statesmen of Britain had not devised a plan before. We wonder that Ireland should have been left so long crying for redress of its grievances. Mr. Gladstone's measure appears so simple, so statesmanlike, so broad, so much in accordance with the principles of liberty, freedom and eternal justice, that we wonder it was deferred so long, that the problem of the proper government of Ireland had been left to be solved by Mr. Gladstone in the zenith of his power, of his years and of his greatness, and that it had been left to him to introduce a measure comprehensive, liberal and just, a measure calculated to right the wrong that had existed so long, calculated to remove those grievances that had goaded the Irish people so long, calculated to remove the system of landlordism that had ground down the people of that country into a state of almost abject slavery. Is such a measure of statesmanship to be ignored by this House? I hope for the honor of the Canadian people this House will not come to such a decision. I speak here as a Canadian and a Protestant, and speaking from that standpoint I believe it is necessary in the interests of all the people in this country, irrespective of religion, creed or nationality, to come forward at this moment and assist Mr. Gladstone, and do all they can to strengthen his hands so that his statesmanlike measure may be carried into effect.

Mr. ORTON. I desire, before recording my vote on this very important question, to make a few brief remarks. Unlike many of the hon. members who have preceded me, I have not the honor of being an Irishman or the descendant of an Irishman, but I happen to be an English Canadian. At the same time I have for many years been in favor of Home Rule for Ireland. As far as my humble ability would allow me to judge, I have always held that to grant Home Rule to Ireland would be the best means of strengthening the British Empire and causing Ireland to be like what we desire Canada to be, more closely allied to the British Crown and the fortunes of the British Empire. I believe Home Rule for Ireland would have the effect of strengthening rather than weakening the British Empire. But while I hold these views I do not consider the system of Home Rule about to be inaugurated by Mr. Gladstone, is one that is calculated to strengthen the British Empire; it is not one calculated to elevate Ireland to the extent that Home Rule should elevate that country and improve its condition. In the first place, the reason why I am opposed to the resolution of the leader of the Opposition is because it endorses the Home Rule principle laid down by Mr. Gladstone.

An hon. MEMBER. No, it does not.

Mr. ORTON. I say that is not calculated to do good to Ireland. The principle laid down in the Home Rule proposition of Mr. Gladstone is one simply of local government in minor particulars and on minor points. It is not proposed to give to Ireland the management of her own customs revenue or her own Excise revenue, and I hold that the only way in which Ireland can ever be largely benefited is by giving to that country the management of its own customs duties, so that it can encourage its own manufactures and furnish additional channels for the employment of the people. That, in my opinion, is the only possible way in which a material improvement in the condition of the people can be brought about. One of the greatest causes of the misery and the unfortunate condition of affairs in Ireland to-day is because the Irish people are nearly altogether an agricultural people. They have no possibility of successfully competing with the accumulated capital of England and other manufacturing countries unless the Irish people have complete control over the Customs duties; and unless this is secured they can never hope to have large manufacturing establishments in Ireland. It is for this reason I cannot agree with the resolution of the leader of the Opposition. I do not feel the same fear as do some of my Protestant friends that the Protestant minority in Ireland will be oppressed. It is possible that such might occur under certain conditions, and I think a scheme should have been devised so as to have specially guarded their interests; while I am afraid the scheme of Mr. Gladstone is one that is devised to give opportunity for the oppression of the Protestant minority. We have seen the same thing in our own country, and I would like to see extended to the Protestant minority, in Ireland, the same principles that we extend to the Catholic minority in Ontario and the Dominion, and the same careful consideration of the minority as is conceded to the Protestant minority in the Province of Quebec. But that, in my opinion, is not provided for in the measure that has been submitted to the British House of Commons, and therefore I say that I cannot support the resolution of the leader of the Opposition, because it causes this House to accede to the principle laid down by Mr. Gladstone in his Home Rule resolutions, and those principles are not the principles which I would like to see carried out. I would like to see the people of Ireland more closely allied to the British Crown. I would like to see them have representation in the British House of Commons; I would like to see them partake in the expenditure for the peace and preservation of the British Empire; I would like to see them contribute, as no doubt they will be able to contribute, to the support of the British army and navy; and I would like to see Irishmen join with Scotchmen and Englishmen, and all the other peoples that constitute the Empire, in sharing the glories of the British arms in defending the rights of British subjects. For that reason it is most essential to the prosperity of Ireland, most essential to the unity of the Empire, that there should be Irish representation in the British House of Commons. It is utterly impossible, considering the position which Ireland occupies, in such close proximity to England and Scotland, that she should be separated in the manner in which Mr. Gladstone proposes to separate her from England and Scotland. Therefore, Sir, I shall not vote for the resolution of the hon. leader of the Opposition, and I say that the amendment moved by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) is merely an addition to the resolution of his leader. It seems certainly a very singular position the hon. gentlemen occupy. First one hon. gentleman gets up and moves an amendment to his leader's resolution, and if that amendment means anything it means that he believes his leader is not in earnest, that he has not sufficiently strongly expressed his feelings in favor of Home Rule—the abstract principle of Home Rule—and he has moved this amendment to his leader's motion in order to make it more emphatic and perhaps more general in its character. Then again we find that another hon. gentleman on the same side has another objection. He objects to the expression of "Her Majesty's Irish subjects," and wants to give it a still broader meaning. Therefore, I say, that the position they occupy is not a united one; it is not one which is calculated to carry with it that weight and strength that such a resolution should do in this House and I must say that the amendment made by the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue is one we could all unite upon. It does not express approval of the exact character of the Home Rule introduced by Mr. Gladstone, but it does approve of a form of Home Rule which will unite Ireland more permanently to the British Crown, which will unite instead of trying to dissever Ireland from the British Empire, and, therefore, I say, it is more thoroughly British in its character; it is more in the interests of Ireland, and it is more in accord with the sentiments and feelings of the vast majority of the people of this country, who desire to see Ireland enjoy the same liberty and freedom that we enjoy in Canada under the British flag.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not intend to occupy the attention of the House on this subject more than a very few moments. It is one with reference to which I should have liked to have addressed the House after having had some opportunity of considering what I was going to say about it. I think the magnitude of the question is such as to demand that it should be discussed with the best ability that all the members of this House are able, individually, to direct to it, and, therefore, I have no intention at the present time of attempting to make a speech on the subject. I wish, however, briefly to explain what my views are on this subject, how I shall vote, and why I shall vote as I do. Before doing so, however, I should like to congratulate the hon. gentleman, the leader of the Opposition, on at last having discovered a policy. I am sorry, however, that I cannot congratulate him on the nature of the policy he has discovered. That policy is a policy of discord. The hon. gentleman knows as well as he knows that a soul is in his body that the people of this country, the people of the Dominion of Canada, entertain views with reference to this question as wide as the poles asunder. The hon. gentleman knows that in his own city of Toronto, the other day a meeting was held, attended by some of the best informed and most influential men in Canada, and that at that meeting views were expressed diametrically opposed to the views that hon. gentleman presented to us to-day. He knows, too, that the sentiments to which I have referred are sentiments which may very readily be stirred deeply in the breasts of the people of this country. He knows also that this question has excited such an agitation in England as neither he nor I have seen before. He knows that England, that Great Britain and Ireland are divided into hostile camps on this subject. He knows very well that Great Britain and Ireland are in the throes of such an agitation as they have never seen before, in reference to this very question, and that an agitation so fierce is in progress there that actually the fearful and awful words "civil war" are whispered from lip to lip.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear," but he knows that.

Mr. BLAKE. No, he does not.

Mr. McNEILL. Well, if he does not, he should read the newspapers or correspond with his friends in Ireland and he would know it. He knows that, and he knows how deeply that question may stir up feelings of animosity among men who are to-day neighbors and friends, and yet he had no hesitation in going out of his way to introduce this question and thrust it into the minds and hearts of the people of this country, irrespective altogether of the terrible results which may accrue. However, I do not mean to say the hon. gentleman is inconsistent, because we found the hon. gentleman the other day perfectly prepared to stir up or, at all events, to side with a movement which most people in this country deem likely to introduce inter-provincial strife in this country, and it is perfectly consistent with such a policy that the hon. gentleman should introduce into Canada the question and press home to the minds and hearts of the people the question which he has now introduced. Nevertheless, I think the hon. gentleman will find that he has not succeeded in doing anything so very clever as probably he supposes he is doing. At any rate, he has done something dangerous in the hope of doing something clever. Sir, I say the hon. gentleman has gone out of his way to do this, because on the last occasion when this question was before this House, at a time when it was very differently viewed and regarded both in this country and in the mother country from the manner in which it is regarded to-day, the Government of Mr. Gladstone, by the mouth of his Colonial Secretary, informed us that it was not a question with which we ought to intermeddle at all. Yet notwithstanding that the hon. gentleman proposes that we shall open up this question.

Mr. MILLS. He has changed his mind and we haven't.

Mr. McNEILL. Yes, Mr. Gladstone has changed his mind; and just because he has changed his mind under certain circumstances, we are now, forsooth, to go to him and say to him: Will you kindly allow us to advise you now, because it suits you, while before you told us in cool blood that it was not a thing we should meddle with? Mr. Gladstone at that time was able to advise us on the subject in cold blood. He finds himself to-day in a very different position. He finds that in his attempt introduce this question into the House of Commons, he has shattered his party in England; he has driven from his banner almost all the names that have shed lustre on the Liberal party of England during the latter part of this century. I ask: Where is Bright to be found to day? Where is Hartington? Where is Chamberlain? Where is Mr. Gladstone's late Attorney-General, James? Where is Dilke? Where is Goschen? Where is Roundel Palmer, his Lord Chancellor? Where Derby and Argyle? Where is Mr. Gladstone's late Irish Secretary, Mr. Trevelyan? Where is that other Irish Secretary, that great man who up to the very last moment until his Imperial spirit fled, was found in opposition, as they all are, to this proposal of Mr. Gladstone? And because, forsooth, Mr. Gladstone finds himself in that position, and is glad to pick up any little crumbs of comfort that he can find here, there, and everywhere, we, the Canadian House of Commons, are to be asked to say to him: You would not accept our advice before—pray accept it to-day; and in order to place ourselves in that position, we have a question introduced which will sow discord throughout the length and breadth of Canada. But, for my part, I venture to say that I am as much entitled to speak here on behalf of Ireland as any man in this House. I am not merely an Irishman by descent, but by birth; I spent my childhood, my boyhood, and a part of my manhood in Ireland; and I do not speak of this matter from theory, but from actual knowledge. There is not any person inside or outside this House in Canada who loves Ireland more dearly than I do. My home was there, my father and mother are buried there, and I have dear relatives and friends there to-day. I claim to have as much right to speak on behalf of Ireland as any man in this House or this country, whatever he may call himself, and if I thought the measure introduced by Mr. Gladstone would be for the benefit of Ireland I would support it as heartily as anyone; but I do not support the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Blake's) resolution, because it practically supports that measure; it practically amounts to this, that if we pass it, we shall be endorsing Mr. Gladstone's action.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL. Hon. gentlemen know perfectly well that if that resolution is sent over, it will simply be used by Mr. Gladstone as an argument to strengthen his position.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL. I am glad to hear hon. gentlemen admit that. Now, what is that measure of Mr. Gladstone? It is not a measure which is calculated to settle the Irish question; it is not only very far from that, but if it is passed into law, we shall find that it will be only the beginning of trouble and discord in Ireland. It is not in any degree such a measure as this House expressed approval of in 1882; it is the very opposite. What was it that this House said in 1882? It was this, that if it was consistent with the safety of the Empire, and with the safe-guarding of the rights and privileges of the minority, some kind of Federal Home Rule would be advantageous for Ireland. Is it Federal Home Rule which is proposed now? It is the very opposite. So far from being a measure of a federal nature, a measure which would afford an opportunity to the different Provinces of Ireland to give effect to their own views and to pass their own laws, it is exactly similar to what a measure for legislative union would be in Canada. It is just as if we passed a measure which would prevent the people of the Province of Quebec from dealing with their own affairs. There exists in Ireland, as is very well known, a very curious parallel to the condition of things in this country. In the Province of Ulster in Ireland, there exists a condition of things very much like what we have in the Province of Quebec. The people of the Province of Ulster are dissimilar, to a great extent, in their sentiments, and their religion, and race from the bulk of the people of the other Provinces. Now, the measure proposed in this House in 1882 was a federal measure which would give those people an opportunity of safe-guarding their own interests as a separate Province. The measure the hon. gentleman is supporting is one of a perfectly different nature. It is one which will prevent those people from having any control over their own affairs, but which will put them under the heel of the people of the other three Provinces of Ireland. But, Sir, the measure proposed by Mr. Gladstone is a measure degrading to Ireland and the Irish people. It is a measure which deprives Ireland and the Irish people of any voice whatever in Imperial affairs. It reduces them to the rank of a mere Province, without the right to say one solitary word with reference to any Imperial question. But my main objection to the resolution the hon. gentleman has proposed is this, that the measure which Mr. Gladstone has introduced, so far from being the simple measure so eloquently described by the hon. member from Grey, is so complicated and so dangerous a measure that it has resulted in the disruption of Mr. Gladstone's own party, and has driven from his side many of his best and ablest supporters. Furthermore, if it should pass, it will simply enable those who desire to sever Ireland altogether from England, more strongly and more effectually to carry out their designs. I say this from my practical knowledge and experience of the feelings of many of the Irish people. I say it also because of the utterances of those who are called the Home Rulers in Ireland. I say it because of the mottoes which you find inscribed on banners and flags at Home Rule meetings. I say it because of the statements, more especially, that have fallen from the lips of the leader of the movement, Mr. Parnell himself, who stated, in Ireland, that he never would have taken off his coat to go at this work had it not been that by doing so he would be able to sever the last link that bound Ireland to England; and, moreover, because I know, from the expressions we have seen from time to time published in the press, that those are the views and sentiments of thousands in the United States who have lent to these people, not only the sinews of war in a monetary sense, but in another sense also. Therefore it is, that I cannot support the hon. gentleman's resolution, and that I shall feel obliged to support the amendment. I think the amendment of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) only makes the matter worse. I shall support the amendment of the Minister of Inland Revenue, because it expresses this view, that we do not ask the people of England to pass any measure of Home Rule for Ireland, of any kind or description, unless that measure can be passed in such a way as to secure the unity of the Empire, and at the same time safeguard the rights and privileges of the minority of Ireland. There are very few Irishmen, in or out of Ulster, who would not be glad to have some measure or other of greater local self-government for Ireland than we have at present, but under the circumstances, and for the reasons I have expressed, I shall vote against the resolution and in favor of the amendment as the better of the two.

Mr. HACKETT. Although the resolution before the House does not strictly affect Canadian interests, still I consider it my duty to make a few observations in regard to it. I believe Home Rule in Ireland would add to the strength of the Empire and unite the whole people of Great Britain and Ireland in one solid body. For this reason I support the principle of Home Rule. In 1882, when I had the honor of being a member of this House, a resolution was introduced by the Minister of Inland Revenue affirming the principle of Home Rule. An attempt is being made to make it appear that the hon gentleman then was actuated not by motives of sincerity, but by personal motives, in order to gain popularity with a certain class. Being fully cognisant of the facts connected with the introduction of those resolutions, I can speak with authority and I say that the hon. gentleman was not actuated by mercenary motives but by the high motives of patriotism. He believed that at that time, when Mr. Parnell and his small band of Home Rulers were struggling for Home Rule in Ireland, it was particularly becoming, in fact it was the duty of the Canadian Parliament, to move a resolution in favor of Home Rule, thereby encouraging Mr. Parnell in the noble fight he was making and strengthening his hands at a very critical moment. That resolution passed unanimously, and was forwarded to Her Majesty. What was the answer of Mr. Gladstone? He said: Mind your own business; we are willing to take your advice on all matters connected with Canada, but on all Imperial affairs we can only consult the Imperial authority. He did not receive our address graciously, but now, owing to the skilful manner in which the agitation for Home Rule has been conducted by Mr. Parnell and his coadjutors, Mr. Gladstone is forced, by political exigencies, and not because of any strong feeling on his part for the Irish people, to introduce his measure. He has introduced it, mainly because he believed that Mr. Parnell would eventually force Home Rule on the Parliament of Britain, and that it was necessary to anticipate such an event. Believing that the resolution in 1882 was sent at a time when it would do the most benefit, I arrived at the conclusion, on consultation with other gentlemen of Irish extraction in this Parliament, that we should rest our record on that. We had there before the British Government the resolution of 1882, showing that the people of Canada were strongly in favor of Home Rule, and as no action has been taken since then, as our resolution has remained uncontradicted, we consider it was in the interests of Ireland that no resolution should now be introduced, which would not meet with unanimous support, as, instead of strengthening Mr. Gladstone's hands, such resolution would have a depressing effect. It was rather astonishing to find, the other evening, that the leader of the Opposition had introduced his motion as an amendment to go into Supply, and then compared his resolution with that of 1882. I maintain there is no comparison whatever. The Minister of Inland Revenue gave full notice of his resolution.

Mr. MILLS. No.

Mr. HACKETT. The notice was considered sufficient.

Mr. MILLS. No, it was changed and another motion brought in.

Mr. HACKETT. Well, the motion affirmed the principle of Home Rule, and hon. gentlemen were fully aware it would be brought. It was found that owing to the business of the Session, it would be impossible to reach the motion in due course, and the right hon. the leader of the Government consented to allow the hon. gentleman to move it in amendment to Supply; but the leader of the Opposition introduced his resolution without giving notice. No hon. gentleman on this side had any intimation that the resolution would be introduced, but the hon. gentlemen asked: Why did not we consult with the Irish members of the Opposition. My experience of those gentlemen would not lead me to consult them on a matter of this kind. In 1882, when the Minister of Inland Revenue, in his zeal for the Irish cause, invited leading gentlemen on that side to meet him and discuss the matter, a meeting was held at which it was decided to appoint a committee composed of hon. gentlemen on both sides who would wait on the right hon. the leader of the Government and the hon. the leader of the Opposition, and endeavor to obtain their support to a resolution in favor of Home Rule. To our great surprise, when the committee was named, a prominent gentleman on that side, Mr. Anglin, who was placed on the committe said: I will have nothing further to do with you, and walked out of the room. That was the way a leading Irishman, who should have taken an active part in introducing the measure, acted. After being appointed to the committee to wait upon the leader of both great parties, the hon. gentleman would not consent to anything of the kind, and walked out of the room, leaving there gentlemen of less experience, and ability to endeavor, as best they could, to carry through this important resolution. Therefore I say the experience we had on that occasion would not lead us again to consult those hon. gentlemen on matters of so important a character. The hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) said the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue should have spoken now, that he should not have spoken before. Of course in that he was only repeating what was said by his leader. I say the time the resolution was sent over in 1882 was the most important time, that now when the victory is almost won, now at the very threshold of success, after they have been battling and contending with the great powers they had to contend against in Ireland, those gentlemen who have succeeded in obtaining this for Ireland, though we should congratulate them upon their great success, still 1882 was the time when they needed help and not now when they have almost obtained victory. Therefore, though the hon. gentleman is quite correct in that statement, that these resolutions may have a good effect, and may in some way strengthen the hands of Mr. Gladstone, the time to fight for liberty is not after the fetters have been struck off the feet of the slave; it is not then that you are to come forward to support him; the time to support him is when he is down, when he is struggling for liberty, and not when he has obtained it. The hon. gentlemen in opposition, pretend now to be very strongly in favor of Home Rule for Ireland; but during the five years they were in power what was done? Did they introduce a resolution in favor of Home Rule? Was not this question as important then as it is now? Did not Parnell in 1876, and Biggar, and those men who were contending with him at that time, and Mr. Butt, who was then the leader of the Home Rule movement, want that moral support from the people of Canada, and the whole world, that Gladstone wants now? Yes, they did. Those were the dark days, when every man in Ireland was struggling against the greatest odds. Those were the days when some support should have been given to them by the people of Canada. But during the five years that they were in power there was not one word about Home Rule; not one word in the Parliament of Canada to encourage those brave men who were fighting for Home Rule. But now they are boiling over with enthusiasm in favor of Home Rule, they are bursting with their fervor for Home Rule, after they see that Parnell and the men who co-operated with him have almost achieved success, when a measure has been introduced into the Imperial Parliament which will probably be carried through, although in its present shape it is not such a measure as I would care to see; because, I think, if the Irish people are not represented at Westminster, they are deprived of their representation in matters of great importance affecting their interests; and I hope to see before the Bill becomes law that it will be amended in that respect. I do not know that I need continue this subject further than to pass a remark on what was said by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien). He spoke with great warmth, and I have no doubt with great sincerity. He said that no Protestant in Ireland was actually in favor of Home Rule. He must have read history astray. Is not Mr. Parnell a Protestant, as good a Protestant probably as the hon. member? Is he not the apostle of Home Rule in Ireland at this time? Is not Mr. Justin McCarthy a Protestant, and are not others of those who are battling for Home Rule in Ireland at this time, and fighting the battle with such great success, Protestants? They are Protestants, and it is for that reason that Irish Catholics should stand by them. There is, of course, a very respectable minority in Ireland opposed to Home Rule, but it is hoped and believed that this measure will afford to these people the same protection in their rights and privileges as is afforded to the minority in Quebec and to the minority in Ontario. It is a part of our Federal Government that could be very fairly put in force, and, with these amendments, I am sure that those people in the north of Ireland who are now opposed to Home Rule will be reconciled to it and will see eventually that Mr. Parnell and those sincere Protestants who work with him are patriots as well, and are working in the interests of the whole country. But, after the snub we received in sending home the address of 1882, I think it would be quite improper again to send an address of a similar character. I think we should do as they did in the Parliament of Quebec, simply pass a resolution affirming the principle of Home Rule. They are proposing to pursue a similar course in the Legislature of Nova Scotia, and, in view of that fact, I support the resolution of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue in amendment to the main motion of the hon. the leader of the Opposition. I believe that resolution is more in accordance with the genius and spirit and the dignity of the people of Canada and that, after being treated in the insolent manner in which we were treated in 1882 after the passage of that address here and after having it sent to Her Majesty and after having received the very insolent reply from Lord Kimberley, we should not allow ourselves again perhaps to be treated in a similar way. I therefore support the motion of the Minister of Inland Revenue, as it affirms the principle of Home Rule as fully as the resolutions of 1882, which have been quoted so approvingly by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. ALLEN. I desire to say a few words on this important subject before the vote is taken, being an Irishman by birth, having lived in that country for nineteen years, knowing that oppression reigns in that country, knowing and believing by past experience that that country has been so managed that there have been grievances for the past five hundred years, that no statesman for the past two hundred years has been able to grapple with the affairs of that country. To-day we find that there is such a gentleman, Hon. W. E. Gladstone, who will stand up in the House of Parliament in England and advocate the rights of Ireland and the rights of Irishmen, while many in this country and in other countries deny the fact that Irishmen are competent or deserving to govern themselves. It is a slander which we do not deserve. Irishmen are able to take their position in all British dependencies in any part of the world. They are competent and able to take a position on every platform. We find them so in every department of life and commerce. I learned with a great deal of satisfaction and pleasure, a few weeks ago, that the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) had prepared a resolution on this very subject, which I was determined to support, if at all reasonable. I was very much disappointed when I heard afterwards that for some reason he had abandoned the idea. Later, I learned with pleasure that a deputation from an Irish society waited on the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, and that he was about to bring forward a resolution to the same effect. But, Sir, I was more than disappointed when I learned that he refused to bring forward this motion, which was, in some respects, similar to the one brought forward by him in 1882. The grievances of that lovely and down-trodden country is a matter of history, which I hope the present Imperial Parliament will settle to the satisfaction of Ireland and well-being of the Empire. If there had not been grievances in that country, it would be to-day the most lovely, fertile and happy country in the world. While we here enjoy Home Rule to our heart's content, are we willing to sit down and say that our mother country shall not enjoy the same privilege? We have a population in Canada of not quite 5,000,000 inhabitants, and we find that Ireland contains about the same number, 5,300,000. I hold in my hand a report of the last general election in Ireland, and I find in my native county, which has sent Conservative members to the English Parliament, probably for 30 years out of 40, in the north riding of that county, the Nationalist candidate received 5,268 votes, while the Conservative candidate, one of the most popular and honorable gentlemen in the county, received only 772. In the south division of the county of Sligo, of which I am a native, the Nationalist received 4,610, while the Conservative received only 541. This is in the north-west part of Ireland. But I will refer to the northern counties of Ireland. I find in the county of Cavan, one of the Protestant counties, that in the east division the Nationalist candidate was returned unopposed. In the west division the Nationalist received 6,425 votes, while the Conservative received only 1,779. In the county of Donegal the Nationalist received 4,597, while the Loyalist received only 952. In the east division of the same county, the Nationalist received 4,089, while the Liberal candidate received only 2,992. In the west division of the same county the Nationalist was returned unopposed. In the south division the Nationalist received 5,505, and the Loyalist, 1,379. In the county of Down, one of the most populous Protestant counties in Ireland, in the north division the Conservative received 4,315, and the Liberal 2,841. The most strongly Protestant county in Ireland is that wherein Belfast is situated. We find there that although the Protestants predominate, the Conservative majority was very small, that Mr. Johnston was the only gentleman in all Ireland who really received a large majority. He received 3,610, while the Liberal received only 990, and the Conservative, 871. So that Home Rule is not opposed by Protestants in Ireland as bitterly as represented in Canada. Now, if we turn from these to other counties, we find that in the county of Londonderry, another Protestant county, the Conservative only received 5,180 votes, while the Liberal received 3,017. In the south division a Nationalist was elected. In the county of Derry a Conservative was elected by 1,844 votes, and the Nationalist received 1,792. In the country of Tyrone a Conservative was elected in the north division. If we turn to the south of Ireland, we find that in the county of Cork, the Nationalist received 5,033, and the Unionist 106. But there are even larger majorities than that. In Mayo, south, 4,953 votes were given to the Nationalist, while the Conservative received only 75. Now, Sir, in a county of 5,300,000, where they give such a decided expression of a desire to govern themselves electing eighty-four Nationalists to seventeen Conservatives, where there has been such dissatisfaction with the Government of England, are they not entitled to some consideration under a constitutional government? Look at the results of the Government in past years. At the time of the disestablishment of the English Church in Ireland, the excitement was almost as great as it is now. It was stated then that the country was going to ruin, that it would bring separation from England and destroy harmony between Ireland and England. But I am glad to state on the best authority that the English Church in Ireland has never been so prosperous at it has been since it has been self-sustaining;—and I believe self government in Ireland in local matters will remove agitation and unite bonds of friendship which has not existed the past century. Sir, are we afraid or ashamed to stand up for our rights and again ask Her Majesty to consider a resolution from this House? Is it true that we have been insulted? Why, Sir, we are entitled to our rights as British subjects, and privileges as an independent people, and I say we should stand up for the same rights which we asked for in 1882, and again give our advice to the Home Government to take into consideration the question of justice to that country which we love so much. I hope this House will support unanimously the resolution as submitted, and I, for one, will support the resolution as submitted, or the amendment of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen).

Mr. WALLACE (York). I desire to make a few remarks on the resolution before the House. Two days ago, the hon. member for West Durham sprung a resolution upon the House. He had evidently not sufficient time to prepare his resolution with sufficient care, because we find that he has had to avail himself of the literary abilities of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) to assist him in perfecting his resolution. Sir, I do not think that the resolution proposed by the hon. member for West Durham will meet with the approval of this House, because it asks this House to affirm the principle of Mr. Gladstone's Bill giving a measure of Home Rule to Ireland. There are many people who will favor Home Rule if it is a fair and equitable measure, but who oppose the scheme of Mr. Gladstone because of its gross injustice, and the manifest failure that will attend it if it should become law. For myself, I can say that if Home Rule in Ireland means such home rule as we have in Canada, if it means those rights of local government which we find so beneficial in our own country, I favor such a measure of Home Rule. But if Home Rule in Ireland means, as many people believe it does, the dismemberment of the Empire, then Canada will be strongly opposed to such a measure. Mr. Parnell, who is at the head of the Home Rule party, is a man with great d rectness of purpose; he states his desires and wishes pretty plainly, and in his course he has not deviated very much from his first purpose. And what does he tell us? In a speech delivered by him at Cincinnati, on 23rd February, 1880, on the Irish question, he said:

"None of us, whether in America or in Ireland, or wherever we may be, will be satisfied until we have destroyed the last link which keeps Ireland bound to England."

That was the policy which Mr. Parnell in 1880 enunciated when adressing the people of Cincinnatti. We find Mr. Parnell's course and policy since then have not varied. What was his policy then is evidently his policy to-day. I am afraid the measure proposed by Mr. Gladstone, which is supposed to be for the better government of Ireland will have the effect of carrying out Mr. Parnell's policy, for we find when we examine Mr. Gladstone's Bill, which we are asked by the resolution proposed by the leader of the Opposition to sanction and afford our moral support, indicates this. What do we find in the Bill? Mr. Davitt was asked:

"Whether Irishmen would be satisfied with these arrangements, and whether they would accept them as a permanent settlement of the question. He said that was as unreasonable as to ask him after he had had his breakfast to refrain from demanding his dinner and his supper. Sympathise with Mr. Davitt, but do not be led astray:

If Mr. Gladstone's measure becomes the law of the British Empire, then we will find in case of war that Ireland will have no interest in it, that the people will not have to pay a cent of money to defray the expenses, that they will have no voice in saying whether there should be war or peace, and that they would not be compelled to contribute their quota of men and means, and therefore Ireland would have no interest in the struggles which Great Britain may have for her very existence. What do we find further? That the foreign and colonial policy of the British Government will have no interest for the people of Ireland. No portion of the British Empire has done more to build up our foreign and colonial possessions than has the Irish race. No portion of the British Empire has contributed braver soldiers to assist in fighting the battles of Great Britain than has Ireland; yet, if this measure becomes law Irishmen will have no chance of obtaining position or promotion in the British forces, because by the law Ireland will not be called upon to take part in the defence of the British Empire, and instead of the people being active in assisting to maintain the supremacy of the British Empire, some may be found on the other side, because, having no direct and pecuniary interest in the result of the conflict, other circumstances may prevail which might cause them to take the other side. We find still further in Mr. Gladstone's Bill, which the member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) asks us to approve, that while the whole control of Excise and Customs is taken from Ireland and centred in Great Britain, not an Irish member will be a representative in the Imperial Parliament at Westminster. The Parliament at Westminster will make many of the laws for Ireland, impose the taxes for revenue and do many other acts, but yet she will not have a voice at Westminster. How long will Ireland tolerate such a gross injustice? That one thing in itself contains the elements of dissolution of the union between Great Britain and Ireland, and the elements of discord which will sever the Empire if Mr. Gladstone's measure becomes law. But though we may in the abstract pass resolutions that we think may be of benefit to Ireland, yet the Irish people themselves are the best judges of their own position. What do we find? A large portion of the Irish people, 25 per cent. of the whole, and, practically, the whole Protestants of Ireland are bitterly opposed to Mr. Gladstone's scheme, while the Home Rulers themselves have not expressed approval, but have taken it, as Mr. Davitt says, as an instalment of what is to come. The Protestants, I repeat, have, with great unanimity, expressed their opposition to Mr. Gladstone's Home Rule scheme. I have here the words of a distinguished English statesman, one of the leading members of the Liberal party, and whose opinions and statements I heartily endorse. He cannot support Mr. Gladstone's Home Rule scheme; and he says:

"We have been accustomed, perhaps a little too much, to talk of Ireland as if it were one people. There are two nations in Ireland (hear, hear,) two communities separated by religion, by race, by politics, by social conditions. There are in Ireland at this moment something like one and a quarter millions of Protestants, most of them in the province of Ulster, a great number in Dublin, and others scattered up and down the country in little groups everywhere, working out their existence by becoming the centre of honest, praiseworthy industry and enterprise (cheers). This minority—it is not a small one (hear, hear), it is one quarter of the whole population—through good repute and evil repute has been loyal to the British connection (cheers). It has been industrious and it has been prosperous. They are bitterly opposed to this scheme, rightly or wrongly. Under the protection of the British Government they have lived on terms of amity with their Roman Catholic neighbors. They believe that their property, their religion, aye and their lives, could not safely be trusted to a Nationalist Parliament in Dublin (cheers). For my part, I hate coercion, and I am not disposed to coerce these men by British soldiers (hear, hear and cheers). I am not prepared to disregard altogether their wishes and their feelings (hear, hear). I think that they are entitled to some consideration from the British power that they have hitherto uniformly supported (hear, hear). We are asked now to pledge the credit of the British nation to the extent, as I shall show you directly, of 150 millions (hear, hear) for the benefit of the Irish landlords (oh, and shame) who, as Mr. Gladstone has shown himself in the speech wich he made in introducing the Land Purchase Bill, have not always had a blameless record in the past. We are told that this enormous liability is a duty laid upon us by the misdeeds of our ancestors—that is, an obligation of honor ("Not at all") But then is there no obligation of honor to that great Protestant minority of one and a half millions who, at all events in recent times, have never committed any act of oppression, who have never lent themselves to violence or disorder (cheers), whose patient industry has contributed more to the prosperity of Ireland than all the agitators that ever lived (loud cheers,) and who even now are giving in the shape of taxation, in the shape of enterprise in the shape of all that can come from enlightened citizenship as much as all the rest of the population put together."

That may be accepted as a correct statement of the case, and when we find that a large portion of the Irish people, the most enterprising and wealthy are directly opposed to Home Rule, when their interests are not considered in the scheme proposed by Mr. Gladstone, I think we should be chary, we should be very careful how we recommend motions of which we do not know the purport. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) on a recent occasion could not proceed with a resolution, could not take any action in a certain case which came before the House, because he had not sufficient papers. He was living in this country, was cognizant from day to day of the case as it progressed; he knew all the circumstances of it, but in consequence of a greater number of papers not being forthcoming he could not pronounce judgment. But in this most intricate question, one involving great issues, one involving the prosperity of a great country—because Ireland is a great country—he can make up his mind almost in a moment's notice and put resolutions on the paper endorsing the scheme which has had to face the opposition of Mr. Gladstone's own political party. It looks to me—perhaps I am wrong—a good deal like toadying to Mr. Gladstone. There is one other matter to which I shall refer, which has already been referred to by the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton), and that is the fact that in these resolutions of Mr. Glandstone, the Customs and Excise, the power of putting on taxation, the power of protecting the industries of the country, is not given to Ireland, but is retained by England. Well, I had occasion a few years ago, when this question was up for considération, to make some remarks, and I then said, and I repeat now, that I think the principal cause of Ireland's want of prosperity is the fact that they have no protection for the industries of the people. Mr. Speaker, no country ever became great or prosperous or wealthy without manufactures. There is no instance of a people becoming wealthy through agriculture alone. There are more people in Ireland than could cultivate perhaps twice as much ground as they have here, and in order that the people should have sufficient employment there must be manufactures in that country. They have very few manufactures there to-day, and those are mostly in the north of Ireland where we find the people most prosperous. What Ireland requires to-day to ensure her prosperity and give employment to her people, to make them prosperous, contented and satisfied is protection, and the encouragement to build up the manufacturing industries in their midst; and while these are lacking I venture to predict that Ireland will not have a career of great prosperity. I am sorry that, with all Mr. Gladstone's ability, he has been unable, and perhaps unwilling, to formulate a scheme by which manufactures might be encouraged in Ireland; because I am convinced, as I said before, that Ireland will never become a great, prosperous and contented people until employment is given to her population, until they have various manufactures in their country, and employment is given by manufactures as well as by agriculture to the people of that great country.

Mr. BLAKE. If the question which is the fittest motion to be made, which is the motion that would get the greatest measure of support in this House and yet accomplish the greatest measure of assistance for Ireland, is to be solved now, on the floor of this House, by discussion between hon. members and by public expressions of opinion on the different forms proposed, that responsibility does not lie at my door, because, when I was in a position in which I was able to obtain the decision of the House upon the precise proposition which I thought moderate and yet the best calculated to produce that result, I abandoned that position upon the statement of the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue that, to take the other attitude and withdraw my motion and to accept the right of bringing forward my views in this form, might produce the result, after conference, of agreement. The hon. Minister of Inland Revenue in inviting me to accede to the suggestion of the First Minister said:

"Therefore I think the hon. gentleman should withdraw it. Then there would be an opportunity given to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, who, he thinks, have been lax in their duty, to consult with him. We do not claim that anything we may say will influence his views; we do not pretend to hope that; but I think we are entitled to say to him that, feeling as much interest as he possibly can in this question, it might be possible for us to agree upon a motion that would be passed unanimously by this House. We might possibly agree upon a motion to be submitted to the House and passed unanimously, and I am sure the hon. gentleman will agree with me that such a motion would be of more value than one which necessitated a division. I am not here to discuss what changes we might ask for; that could be discussed among those specially interested, and to whom the matter might be referred. If the hon. gentleman thinks that would at all meet his views, and that we could come to such an understanding, I will not continue my remarks; but if he thinks my request is one he cannot entertain, I will have to crave the indulgence of the House while I make further remarks on this subject."

I rose and, after making an observation or two, on other things, said:

"I may at once say that I am quite willing that whatever time is reasonable and consistent with the object of the resolution should be given at once to carry out the suggestion of those hon. gentlemen. My object is just what the hon. gentleman's is, to procure a unanimous motion; and because he tells me expects, by the course he proposes, to produce such a result, I am all the more ready to agree to that course."

At a subsequent part I said:

"In the meantime, as to the form in which the motion shall be presented, I shall only be too glad to meet the hon. gentleman, or any other hon. member, with the view of settling that point."

At a subsequent period, after recess, the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue said:

"Whether the suggestion comes from one side of the House or the other, there are grounds, perhaps, upon which we can unite, and the suggestion that we should agree upon a resolution, is worthy of fair consideration."

"Hear, hear," said I. The hon. gentleman proceeded to say:

"And I think that the hon. gentleman who refuses that must assume considerable responsibility, if the vote is not as large as it might be made by a fair discussion of our views on the subject."

"Hear, hear," I said assentingly to that remark. Then, when the final arrangement was made, my last words were these:

"And I add to that, in response to the statement of the Minister of Inland Revenue, and to the suggestion rather than the statement of the First Minister, that if there be any opportunity in the meantime to accommodate matters with reference to the form of expression of that motion, I shall be only too glad to facilitate such a happy result."

Then the Minister of Inland Revenue said:

"Whatever difference of opinion may exist between the hon. gentleman and myself, I feel much pleased that he has taken this course, as I think it is the wisest course and one calculated to bring about, if possible, a solution of this question. I am glad the hon. gentleman has taken the course he has."

Now my motion was before the hon. gentleman; he had stated his desire to consult with me; he had stated his desire to make such suggestions as he hoped after conference might produce an agreement. I at once responded, twice and thrice responded, declaring that I would be most happy to concur in the steps he proposed to take, with a view to our arriving at that result. But the hon. gentleman, as I was obliged to say in offering my motion to-day—neither he nor any other hon. gentleman intimated to me the slightest dissatisfaction with the form of my motion. They made no suggestion or proposition for a change; they have invited me to no conference on the subject from the time the discussion closed down to this moment. Therefore, I say, if it be on the floor of this House, by the hon. gentleman bringing forward his proposition in opposition to mine, if it be on the floor of this House that we have to dispose of the question which is the fitter resolution, which is the more appropriate, the responsibility of that result, whatever may be the measure of it, lies not at my door. Now, Sir, the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue explained the reasons why he had not acted in this matter in the House; and he took occasion to say that one of those reasons was not what had been stated erroneously in one of the papers to be the case, a danger that the resolution would be defeated! Not at all; he never apprehended that; but a danger that there would be three or four dissentients. That was what the hon. gentleman said, that was the measure of the danger which prevented him from bringing up this question in this House! Now, Sir, we know from the proceedings which took place very shortly after the passage of the address in 1882, that there were three gentlemen who stood up and announced that they dissented on that occasion; though neither you nor I, as I had occasion to say at that time, had seen any expression of dissent. There was therefore a public avowal of dissent on that occasion. What the hon. gentleman has now declared is that after considering the whole situation, after analysing the feeling of the House, so far as he could judge it, and anxious as he was to go forward, after ascertaining what the feeling was, he believed that there might be three or four dissentients out of the 211 members of this House; and that circumstance affrayed him from the enterprise. Well, we are glad to know that. In whatever quarter the hon. gentleman apprehended those three or four dissentients resided, it was not on this side, for he asked none of us our opinion on the subject; and we have tolerably well learned already, in the course of this debate, where it was the hon. gentleman found that the dissent existed. We have heard it from the outspoken utterances of some; we have heard it from the more veiled utterances of others; we know it was in the house of the hon. gentleman's own friends; and because there were three or four of his own supporters who disapproved of the measure, he chose—and that is his defence to the people of Canada—he chose to determine that no resolution ought to be moved here. But the hon. gentleman said: There was another reason; it is a useless thing to do in view of the circumstances of the former address, as well as a dangerous thing, because the new work could not be so thoroughly accomplished as the old. It was useless, although this was a new House; useless, although the conditions had changed so much between that time and this! I believe the feeling in Canada has changed; but my belief is that there has been a growing feeling in favor of Home Rule in Canada, and that feeling is very much stronger to-day than it was in 1882; and certainly that is not a change which should affright us who favor Home Rule from endeavoring to obtain the views of the representatives of the people on the subject. But there is another circumstance. The time is critical. Read the cabled reports in the newspapers of the impressions of the leading organs of public opinion and of those who take most interest in following public measures, and you find it impossible to say what the fate of the principle of Home Rule—because that is what Mr. Gladstone says he holds to be at stake on the second reading of the Bill—is to be; and, Sir, if there was no reason why some further action should be taken to-day by those who acted before, I want to know why the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue telegraphed to Mr. Parnell that he and the Irish members of this House still abided by that address. He gave Mr. Parnell that encouraging and flattering assurance, that assurance so calculated to cheer and elevate his mind, that the Irish Catholic members were really still true to Home Rule! What was the inference to be drawn from that message? Why, the inference was that of the other members he could not say the same. What other inference can you draw? He says to Mr. Parnell that the Irish members, by which I understand him to mean the Irish members of his own creed—nay, those of them who sit on his own side of the House—are of the same opinion as before. He treats it as an Irish Catholic question, as the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) treated it——

Mr. CURRAN. I beg your pardon, Sir. I did not do anything of the kind.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes; and so treating it, they got together a body of gentlemen from the Senate and the House of Commons who are Irish Catholics—no, not the Irish Catholics, but the Tory Irish Catholics. Did the hon. gentleman invite Senator Power to that meeting? Did he invite Senator Scott? Were they there? Did they take part in it? No; the Irish Tory Catholic clique meet together, in a little assembly, and they say, this is so purely an Irish Catholic question, and a Tory Irish Catholic question, that we alone are to decide whether a resolution is safe, or prudent, or advantageous to be introduced into the House. Sir, if there be a step which is calculated to prejudice the cause of Home Rule at home or abroad, so far as we can do it, it is this treatment of it by hon. gentlemen in the hon. member's position as an Irish Catholic question—as if it was not a general question in which all lovers of liberty throughout the world have an equal interest.

Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. HESSON. Where are the Irish Catholics on your side?

Mr. BLAKE. I have mentioned two Irish Catholics on my side of politics, members of Parliament, whom the hon. gentleman did not consult.

Mr. HESSON. Not members of this House.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not say members of this House; I said members of Parliament. Now, Sir, I ask what inference must be drawn from the state of things to which I have referred. In 1882 an address passed unanimously by the Commons of Canada in favor of Home Rule. In 1886, the question being in a critical condition, in which the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue feels it necessary that something should be said on behalf of some portion of the Commons of Canada on the subject, to show that they are still true to the views they formerly expressed, he despatches his utterance on behalf of the Irish members of the Parliament of Canada. Now, here is the contrast that would be drawn. The enemies of the cause would say: Oh, in 1882, the Canadian Parliament, unanimously in the Commons and by a very large majority in the Senate, passed resolutions in favor of Home Rule. In 1886 a Minister of the Crown, the same Irish Catholic who moved before, is afraid to move a resolution in favor of Home Rule, and he sends forward, forsooth, his own cable despatch to Mr. Parnell, which is to be taken as equivalent to the voice of the Commons of Canada. No, it could not be equivalent. Is it a substitute? No, but it is a declaration by inference, that the other members of this House, beyond those for whom the hon. gentleman, by what authority I do not pretend to say, chose to speak, would not say what he said. I ask, did he apply to any of them to allow him to speak for a larger constituency than those for whom he assumed to speak? If he did, what answer did he get which discouraged him from speaking for more? That is the position in which the hon. gentleman's action put the question, so that the enemies of Home Rule could say: Canada will no longer speak in favor of that measure, and the best proof of that is, that the Minister who moved the resolution in 1882, does not move another resolution to-day, and does not profess to aver that the Canadian Parliament believes as it did then. Now we know the reason. The hon. gentleman stated it would be a dangerous thing to move again, because there would be some dissent, although he limits the dissentients to three or four. Again, the hon. gentleman says: "Oh, then, there is the difficulty about the form of another address which deterred me;" but still that does not appear to have been a very serious difficulty, because the hon gentleman has found another form which gets rid of that difficulty to-night, so that that could not have prevented him from earlier action, unless his wit has been spurred by the exigencies of the last day or two, and his zeal for the Irish cause was not sufficiently potent to enable him to find out what, under the pressure of necessity, which we all know is a powerful lever, he has since ascertained. He has proposed a method, he says, of getting over the difficulty. But circumstances now differ. We are not, under my motion, now doing what Lord Kimberley, unadvisedly, in my opinion, told us in effect we ought not to do; we are not now tendering advice to Her Majesty's Ministers as to the policy they ought to accomplish; but we propose to cheer and encourage them on in the course they have declared they will pursue. We are not offering advice, but we are adding the moral force and support of this House to them, to aid them in the course they are themselves pursuing.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I hope it won't.

Mr. BLAKE. Ah! there is one of the dissentients.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I have always been one.

Mr. BLAKE. I will have to settle an account presently with these three or four who have deterred the Minister of Inland Revenue, up to this day, from bringing forward his resolution. I say we were right, in 1882, in averring that the Commons of Canada had the right, and that it was our duty respectfully to address our Queen, the Queen of the Empire, tendering our loyal suggestions and opinions upon this question so interesting and important to us, as citizens of the Empire and as Canadians. I hope no hon. member of this House will declare to-day that we were not right in doing that, because, forsooth, a Colonial Secretary has been found to express a different opinion; I hope we are not going to abnegate that right as citizens of the Empire; I hope we are not going to derogate from that right as citizens of the Empire. I say our most dignified course is to pass on, and to speak again when the occasion again arises, as it is now arising, in which, not under similar circumstances, because, as I have said, we are not now tendering advice but are still expressing an opinion wherein we are fortunately able to say we abide by the views we expressed in 1882, which you did not think fit to adopt then but have since adopted and are now carrying out —I say no more fortunate occasion could be conjectured for this country to re-assert with dignity its right to address the Queen on this important subject, with the certainty that the right this time will not be repudiated but be gratefully acknowledged. The most dignified course for us is to re-assert in that way, not by any reference to Earl Kimberley, our right to speak to our Queen, to signify to her our views on this question, the occasion, as it is now admitted, calling for it. The hon. gentleman himself proposes that we should signify our opinions, although in an abortive fashion; and proposing that we should signify our opinions, I say the most dignified and the happiest method is simply to go forward and once again, in a constitutional manner—unless we are prepared to rescind our address, unless we are prepared to agree that we should do so no more—re-assert our sentiments, with such variations as the circumstances of the case may require. But if we do not choose to proceed by an address on this particular occasion —and that because we have been told formerly that we ought not to proceed by address to advise or suggest—I hope that we shall not fall so low as formally to record on our journals the agreement that we ought not to act for that reason. If the hon. gentleman's amendment is passed, we shall agree that, because Earl Kimberley chose to make this statement four years ago, therefore we do not choose to address the Crown; and that of course will apply to all cases of emergencies in which Imperial interests may be concerned. We shall be agreeing and in a formal manner assenting to the view of Earl Kimberley; we shall be acting upon that view, we shall be declaring he is right and we are wrong, and in thus agreeing we will close the door upon ourselves by our own resolution, from, at any future time, venturing a humble address to the Queen upon an Imperial question. Sir, there are, no doubt, exciting times ahead for the British Empire; there may be troublous, dangerous times ahead for the British Empire, and I shall never willingly agree to abandon the right of a British subject or of the House of Commons of any colony to approach the Queen and to tender her respectfully the advice and opinions of her subjects in foreign parts upon those questions which touch the interests of the Empire, which so nearly concern ourselves, although we are not able to speak directly by representation in the British House of Commons. I now turn to the substance of the hon. gentleman's resolution. It is a suspicious circumstance, it is a circumstance which ought to make the hon. gentleman himself suspicious of his resolution, that it finds so much favor with the enemies of Home Rule. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), with that frankness which commends itself so much to the confidence of this House, told us in the concluding, the most pungent, and, he will allow me to say, the most forcible phrase of his speech, that he would vote for the amendment of the Minister of Inland Revenue because it would do the least harm. Let me make an appropriate alteration in that phrase, if we are to put it in the mouth of the friends of Home Rule; and we would say: We would vote for either of the two other resolutions because they would do more good to the cause than the resolution of the Minister of Inland Revenue. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), is loyal to his party, and so he proposes to vote for the resolution of a Minister of the Government he follows, which resolution he does not approve. It is a harmful resolution, but even that one, colorless as it is, pallid as it is, hedged around as it is, built up as it is to satisfy, as far as possible, the susceptibilities of the hon. member for Muskoka, he is prepared to take, but to take only because it does the least harm of the three. The hon. gentleman has presented to him three different kinds of nauseous drugs of which he must take one. He smells at them, he sips them a little, he sets them up between him and the light, he puts down two rejected as the worst, and with a wry face he swallows the third. If these are the sentiments of the enemies of Home Rule held as to these different resolutions, what should be the sentiments of the friends of Home Rule? I am very sorry, for the cause of Home Rule, that the Minister of Inland Revenue, in the attempt to please his three or four dissentients, in the attempt not to wound their susceptibilities, should have proposed a resolution, which, by comparison, will be certainly less favorable than I should have desired, which will provoke unfavorable comparisons just where we want favorable comparisons to be put. I am very sorry that, in the attempt to combine the heterogeneous elements of which the hon. gentleman's following is composed, he should have given us a resolution which has produced these comments from the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), and practically, though in more veiled language, from other hon. members of his way of thinking. Now the hon. member for Montreal (Mr. Curran), after having made a speech which I do not think really was very likely to conduce to harmony and good feeling—perhaps it was the hon. gentleman's mode of producing harmony; perhaps, an Irishman like myself, he thinks a good fight is the way to promote harmony and good feeling—uttered a fervent expression of trust that the proceedings might end harmoniously. After all our heads are broken, I suppose we are all to shake hands. And the hon. gentleman proceeded to apply his blackthorn to my unlucky pate, and to smash me as hard as he could. Well, I am glad to know that the hon. gentleman's arm is not quite long enough to reach me, and that I do not feel much the worse for the exhibition of prowess which he displayed on this occasion. He says that there are grounds for suspecting me. He will not suspect me; oh no, not he; but it makes a great draft on what he calls his credulity not to suspect me; and he proceeds, with the precision of a criminal lawyer trying to make out a case in a police court, to give the grounds upon which I am to be suspected, which grounds are not sufficient, with his candor and kindness and good feeling, to induce him actually to suspect me; but it is about as hard for the hon. gentleman not to suspect me as it is for the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) to swallow the resolution. He says the first ground is this: There were other Irishmen in the House, and did I consult them? Now, for a long time these hon. gentlemen, having their little clique together, got talking over this matter, trying to decide what should be done. I ask, did they consult me? Had I not helped them before? Had I not done my best to forward the cause? Had I not done my best to produce a happy result on the former occasion? And, if there was a question to be considered on this occasion, might I not fairly have expected that before they reached a decision upon it they would have consulted me? I do not complain of their not consulting me unless they chose. I do not take the line of the hon. member for Montreal, but if it is a ground of complaint against me that I did not consult them after they had decided that it was too dangerous to move in the matter—though where the bomb-shells are to come from they know, not I; where the mines are to be exploded they know, not I; where the danger lies they know, not I—I should like to know with what reason they can complain of my not consulting them. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue was good enough to consult me on a former occasion, in a sense. He referred to it, though with an inaccurate recollection of the circumstances, the other night. He did not invite me to his committee. I suppose it is to be pardoned to him as to me, the making of these little slips, but he gave a new nationality to one hon. member. He said they had decided to bring all the Irishmen in the House to the committee except the First Minister and the leader of the Opposition. I know that "seven cities claim" the First Minister's birthplace. Sometimes we hear that he was born in Scotland, and sometimes in Canada.

Mr. COSTIGAN. If the hon. gentleman will allow me for a moment, I will say that he is correct in regard to what I stated. I remember that I committed that error in the words I used. What I intended to say was that we did not think it advisable at that time to invite any of the leaders of the House, and his being the leader of the Opposition was the reason why he was not invited.

Mr. BLAKE. I thought the hon. gentleman, with his superabundant loyalty to his chief, which he has exhibited on several occasions and notably on one occasion, in order to keep up that harmony on which he lays so much stress, was desirous to strengthen the First Minister's hold on the people of this country by declaring him an Irishman for the occasion, but he now tells me that it was one of those blunders that he and I as Irishmen are privileged to make. I say the hon. gentleman was good enough, in 1882, after having settled the form of this motion, to send it to me with a note to which I responded in general terms, but in the altered motion which the hon. gentleman afterwards brought forward I saw another hand. He knows who drew it. It was his brother Irishman, the First Minister. It is quite true he did not consult the First Minister early, but he consulted him late. He brought him at last into his committee, and, when the final blow was to be struck, when the hon. gentleman was at one bound to fix himself on the pinnacle as the representative of Irish sentiment in Canada, it was his brother Irishman, the First Minister, who helped him! This is the first reason why the member for Montreal (Mr. Curran), my prosecutor here, proposes to show that there are strong grounds, which only his great sense of generosity can induce him to say are inadequate, for suspecting me—that I did not consult him. The next is, that the resolution was brought in as an amendment to Committee of Supply. A dreadful sin; because I followed strictly the precedent of the last occasion, when the resolution was brought in as an amendment to Committee of Supply; because in 1882 it was brought in as an amendment to Committee of Supply, and in 1886 I proposed it in the same way, because the First Minister, when in Opposition, in 1878, had brought up the constitutional question of the Letellier case on amendment to the motion for Supply, not at all impugning the Government at the time, but simply bringing up the question, whether Lieutenant Governor Letellier had acted constitutionally in dismissing his Ministers, brought it up as a non-party question and stated so distinctly, because I thought these two precedents were ample justification, and served as a good reason for me to propose this resolution in amendment to Committee of Supply—particularly as there was no other way of getting at it at all; because I knew that hon. gentlemen thought it was too dangerous to touch, and of course would not help me to touch it; that they thought it ought not to be brought up, and of course would not give me facilities for bringing it up; and therefore, but for my bringing it up in that way, we would not have not have had it at all—because I did not perform impossibilities, only his great sense of generosity can lead him to consider the reasons inadequate for not suspecting me. Then he says that perhaps I ought not to have spoken to him, but at any rate I ought to have spoken to the Minister of Public Works, the leader of the French Conservative party, it was my business to have spoken to him, and because I did not the hon. gentleman feels grievously inclined, but for that superabundant good nature of his, to suspect me. Well, I have often had occasion to consult the Minister of Public Works, during the unfortunate absence of the First Minister, on the ordinary routine of public business and so forth, and our relations are always, I am happy to say, very pleasant; but what particular reason there was for consulting with the Minister of Public Works on this question I do not know. I suppose that the decision of the Minister of Inland Revenue and his friends was not taken without consulting with his colleagues and the Minister of Public Works. We know that all these gentlemen had decided that it was too dangerous to bring this question up. Well, then, the hon. gentleman says: Oh, but the Globe said some time ago—I do not know when—the Globe pointed out that I was in a minority, and I could not bring a resolution up; and because the Globe expressed an opinion, which I heard of for the first time, I must confess—for I am not so diligent a reader of my Globe as the hon. member for Montreal (Mr. Curran) is of his—I say, because the Globe expressed the opinion a fortnight ago, that being leader of the minority, I could not bring up this resolution, the hon. gentleman finds another ground which, to less credulous persons, would be a good ground for suspecting me. Then he goes further. He says that the Ottawa correspondent of the Montreal Post said that such a resolution, if moved here by the Conservatives, would be a Tory dodge, and because the Ottawa correspondent of the Montreal Post—I have no doubt a very respectable gentleman, but one whose acquaintance I have not the honor of having—said that a resolution moved by the Tories in this House upon this question, would be a Tory dodge, therefore I am to be suspected if anybody but the hon. member for Montreal Centre brings up the resolution! Well, under these circumstances it is that I am a suspected character, and that I presume, under the old coercion Act, I would have been liable to be sent to Kilmainham! Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman says that there should be no address, that it is contrary to the feelings of the Irish people—by which, I presume, he meant the Irish Catholic people—that we should address the Crown again upon this subject. I think the hon. gentleman mistook the feeling of the Irish people, whether Catholic or Protestant, I do not believe it. I think he is entirely mistaken. I should be very sorry to suppose that there is any reluctance on their part to the Commons of Canada submitting to the Queen of the Empire their opinions on this subject; and all I can say about that is that he and I are at issue there. The hon. gentleman states that he consulted a great many persons—of course on his side of the House; and he was told there would be a very great difficulty indeed in proceeding, because of the answer to the last address—very great difficulty. I daresay that the friends of the hon. gentleman who don't want Home Rule, did magnify the difficulties, and pointed out to him that the snub, as it is called, of Earl Kimberley, was a reason why this great step, in which he and I are so much interested, should not be taken by the Commons. Allow me to advise the hon. gentleman in the future, when he is trying to find out whether there are difficulties, rather to distrust the opinion of those who don't want the step to be taken. You know of the timorous man who generally finds a lion in his path. The hon. gentleman has found a good many lions in his path, I do not know whether they are colored orange, tawny, or what, but to my mind it looks very like—for I do not share the hon. gentleman's too generous feelings in a desire not to suspect—it looks uncommonly to my mind, considering the quarters in which he searched, as if he was in search of lions, as if he wanted some good cause to be afraid, as if he wanted to find a reason for not doing anything; and he went about among the alarmists, and the alarmists alarmed him, and, being properly alarmed, he held his tongue. Then he says, the address may be regarded as a satire upon Earl Kimberley. Earl Kimberley is a very respectable and able personage, and I am sure he would have too much good sense to suppose that it was a satire upon him. But those hon. gentlemen who think that we have been snubbed by Earl Kimberley's answer, I suppose, would not be very loath to reassert our rights and our dignity by addressing the Throne, even if it did happen to be a little satirical upon Earl Kimberley. I suppose it would not grieve their souls very much that we should be able to say: We were right then, and we saw a little further into the future than you did, and we now help you on to do that thing which, four years ago, we exhorted you to do. I do not think the hon. gentleman's pack of alarmists would, from that point of view, have great difficulty in supporting the address. Well, then, there were some other hon. gentlemen who referred to me—for, really, I have had so much attention paid to me to-night that I feel embarrassed properly to respond to the compliments I have received—there were some other hon. members to some of whose remarks I shall not pay any attention, but to one or two I shall. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Burns) said that I had said that I had acted spontaneously. Was I not asked to move? he said; was I not forced forward? Sir, I have frankly stated that I waited until the last moment in the hope that some of the opposite side of the House would move. I felt satisfied that their apprehensions could not be due to my side, that they could not fear any opposition from me, knowing what I had done in 1882, and I hoped that they would be able so to compose the differences in their own ranks, so to create a unity of feeling on their side of the House, that, knowing that the solid Liberal force would be with them, they would not be afraid of their own friends, so far afraid of their own friends as not to propose a resolution. I hoped that happy result would ensue; I did hope we would find the Conservative party a unit with the Reform party in favor of this, and I waited until the last moment, in order not in the slightest degree to embarrass the efforts which I felt sure—and I now find I was right—that the Minister of Inland Revenue and the hon. member for Montreal were making, in order to achieve that happy result. It seems they failed to promote a unanimity of feeling amongst their friends, and that, therefore, they gave up the attempt. It was not until then, and until the question was, as I said the other day, almost at the door that I moved. Now, with reference to my being asked to move. I was not asked to move until after I had made up my mind that I was going to move, and when I was asked to move, I will tell the hon. gentleman the response which I made to those who asked me. I was asked by a deputation from a very respectable society here, the St. Patrick's Literary Society of Ottawa, and I told the gentlemen who were good enough to wait upon me that, highly as I felt the honor of the invitation, I could not accept any invitation from any body, speaking for any particular sect, or class, or nationality in this community, either to act or to abstain from acting, upon a question of this description. I said I believed that the question itself would be injured if it were treated from any such point of view, as the special property of one portion of the community. I said that it was as Canadians, as persons interested, from their experience of its blessings, in the principle of Home Rule and its extension, as Canadians, citizens and subjects of the Empire, interested in the prosperity of England, as free men, interested in the propagation of the cause of freedom, that we should act, and that I thought the strength and force of any such movement would be greatly diminished, and that prejudices would be excited which ought not to be excited, if it were attempted to be moved from one particular section of the population, or by any man as the exponent of one portion of the population. I decline altogether to agree to the position which some hon. gentlemen opposite arrogate to themselves in regard to this question. The Irish Catholic members in this House and in the other Chamber, and particularly the Tory Irish Catholic members, have no special part in this question—none whatever, and their cause suffers when they attempt to assume such a position. It is as Canadians they are to speak; it is as one whole body; with the exception of three or four individuals who have frightened the Minister of Inland Revenue, it is as Canadians speaking in favor of a common cause, moved by a common impulse and acting on a common principle, that, we are to succeed, and they who make difficulties for the cause are they who declare that this question is the special part and property of a particular class of the people. Then the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Burns) said that I was trying to catch the Irish vote. I have been in public life a good many years. The Irish population of my Province is, of course, composed of the Irish Protestant population and the Irish Catholic population. I have endeavored to do my duty and to act upon what I believe were sound liberal principles towards all classes of the population. I have found myself opposed by a solid body, by the great majority, by the vast bulk of the Irish Protestants of Ontario. They are my strongest, and sternest, and fiercest political opponents to-day. I have found myself opposed by the great bulk of the Irish Catholics of Ontario. They also, with some noble exceptions, were amongst my opponents when I was defeated in South Bruce, during my absence from the country through ill-health, it was the Irish Catholics of that riding that rejected me, that deprived me of my seat in Parliament and obliged me to stand for another constituency at a subsequent date. I have endeavored, notwithstanding all that, to do my duty and to act according to my lights honestly, justly and fairly towards the Irish Catholics and towards the Irish Protestants, towards all classes. I make no distinction whatever in consequence of class or creed, and I extend no bid for the support of any class or creed. The position of the Irish Catholics and the Irish Protestants is this: They know that from the Liberal party they will obtain all they can justly claim, whether they give or refuse their support to that party. They know that the Liberal party will always act on the principle of justice, freedom and equal rights, because that is the plank upon which we stand. They know they have nothing whatever to gain by supporting us, because they will not gain one jot or tittle beyond what those principles of justice, freedom and equal rights require. They know they have nothing to lose by opposing us, because they know, however strenuous their opposition may be, it will not make us one whit less earnest or less active in the promotion of their interests and of the common interests according to the same principles of justice, liberty and equal rights. And therefore there is no need for them to turn their votes one way or the other in order that they may obtain from the Liberal party their meed of justice and of liberty. That is our relation to that class, as to which the hon. gentleman rather coarsely said I was attempting to catch their votes. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), who is an old personal friend of mine, and who I am sure must have been very much excited to-night when he raised his blackthorn against me as did the member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) used some expressions in regard to a former debate, for which he was called to order and to which I will not refer. He said later that I occupied a very peculiar position because I happened to be—he misstated my position—the leader of a party in religion. I am none such. I am certainly of the evangelical portion of the denomination to which I belong, and I am a member of the advanced wing perhaps of that party. That is quite true. And the hon. gentleman says because I am a Protestant, occupying that position I must know, if I have any Protestant friends in Ireland, that every Protestant in Ireland denounces Mr Gladstone's measure, and that I am inconsistent in my present course. I have some Protestant friends in Ireland and I have some in Canada, and the bulk of my Protestant friends in Ireland, and, though I regret it, it is perfectly natural considering their condition, circumstances and surroundings, are opposed to Home Rule. But I deny altogether the statement that every Protestant in Ireland denounces Home Rule. It is not so. The hon. gentleman will find that there are a very considerable number of Protestants who are for self government for Ireland. And it is not to be forgotten that such was the sentiment of the country at the very time at which that union took place, which is now thought such a sacred compact—that compact which was begotten in profligacy and corruption admittedly without a parallel, that compact which was certainly not a holy compact—it was opposed as strongly and earnestly by a large body of Protestants, aye by Orangemen too, as by the other classes of the population. Then the hon. gentleman from Muskoka said—and I quite approve of his observation, and I made one like it myself—that he claimed the right to speak for Ireland as well as the Minister of Inland Revenue. He is perfectly right. I quite accord the right to speak for Ireland to the hon. member for Muskoka; let each speak according to his lights. He thinks Home Rule will be disadvantageous to the country from which his people came, and I think it is an advantageous proposal for the country from which my people came. We are each of us I suppose entitled to our own views and are free to follow our own convictions. I quite agree that the hon. gentleman has as good a right to speak for Ireland as any other hon. member whose ancestors came from Ireland, but in each case it must depend upon the circumstances under which, and the degree of interest and thoroughness with which the hon. gentleman has studied the question, and after all any definite conclusion at which any of us may arrive may be erroneous. The member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) said he also had something to say about it. He endorsed the principle of Home Rule, but he found words to say that he would support the Ministry. I do not think it takes very much to induce the member for Centre Wellington to support the Administration. I pass him by. The hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) said that I knew there was a great diversity of opinion in Ontario. I have no doubt there is a considerable number of persons absolutely, though a very small number relatively, I believe, in the Province who entertain strong opinions adverse to Home Rule; but I believe that the vast majority of the people of that Province, taken as a whole, are directly, thoroughly and irrevocably in favor of the principles of Home Rule as applied to Ireland. That is my opinion; I may be mistaken; the member for North Bruce may be right if he entertains a different opinion, but such at all events is my opinion. Then the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) said that the motion would not do because it endorses the measure of Mr. Gladstone. What my motion does is to endorse the principle of that measure, which principle, as I pointed out to the House on Tuesday, the author of the Bill himself declares to be the principle of Local Government or autonomy for Ireland. The question of Irish representation for Imperial purposes at Westminster, Mr. Gladstone said, I put to one side; I do not ask you to vote for that on the second reading. There are other details in regard to internal matters, and in regard to them Mr. Gladstone says, I do not ask you to vote for them; but I ask you in voting for the second reading of the Bill to vote for the principle of self-government for Ireland and for this measure as calculated, at all events as far as the Local Government of Ireland is concerned, irrespective of the question of the measure of control Ireland should have in Imperial affairs and of some other questions, to form a basis for settlement. What the hon. gentleman from West York says is that the measure will not do. It does not suit his views. He is opposed to any large measure of Home Rule. He would like the Irish to have municipal institutions, but a large measure of Home Rule he is opposed to, and therefore he is opposed to my motion. That is the very reason I want my motion carried—because I am in favor of a large measure of Home Rule. He is opposed to my measure because it will aid, comfort and support the second reading of Mr. Gladstone's Bill, which he does not want to take place. But that is just what I do want—that the second reading of that Bill should be carried. I believe that the most important stage in the question of Home Rule for Ireland would be achieved by the second reading of that Bill. I do not believe the question will be ultimately settled in the terms of that Bll, but the most important stage in the settlement of it will have been passed if it is carried, and if it fails I do not choose to forecast the consequences. But I do say that the very reason which the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) who, with those other gentlemen, are, I suppose, the dissentients, to whom the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue referred—the very reason he and others give as a ground why the motion of the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue is preferable to the motion which I have offered—that they are prepared to support it, because it would do so little good to the cause of Home Rule and that it would do less harm to the opposition to Home Rule than the other, is the reason why my motion should receive the support of the House. Then the hon. gentleman says the question is a most intricate one. Undoubtedly, it is a vast question, an enormously intricate question in its details; and if we were offering an opinion on all its details I think we would require a great deal more study and perhaps a great deal more local knowledge, as to some of them, than we have had the opportunity of acquiring. But we are not asked to pronounce on the details of the measure. We are asked, as I have said and as I have established, to pronounce on the second reading of Mr. Gladstone's Bill, as an affirmation of the principle of Home Rule to Ireland. That is the best, the most sensible, the most practical step towards the accomplishment of the object which I believe a majority of this House has at heart, and that step we are asked not to take, that step we are asked to set aside in favor of this pale, this colorless resolution of the Minister of Inland Revenue, which is acceptable to hon. gentlemen who do not like Home Rule, because it is the least calculated to promote Home Rule! The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) said it really looked to him is if I were toadying to Mr. Gladstone. Because I had not moved an address directly to Mr. Gladstone, because I had not asked the House to express its sympathy and admiration for Mr. Gladstone, as has been done by other bodies, because I preferred passing him by, and moving for an address to our Most Gracious Sovereign, I am supposed, forsooth, to be toadying to Mr. Gladstone! When in 1882 I ventured to point out the difficulties of Mr. Gladstone's attitude at that time, when I pointed out what he has since proved true by his action, that it was not a sufficient defence for him to say that a small minority which had grievances did not formulate a plan which they had no power to carry into effect; that if he admitted that there existed grievances, it was his duty, who had the power, to formulate the best plan he could in order to remedy admitted grievances according to his lights, the First Minister said: Here is a gentleman criticising that great statesman, Mr. Gladstone, criticising him adversely, using harsh language towards him, telling him that he is mistaken, that he is wrong, that he ought to do some other thing; Mr. Gladstone, he said, though a great statesman, like other men, is human, and he will be annoyed when he sees the hon. gentleman's speech; I hope, he said, that the report containing the speech will be delayed in transmission; I hope that by some happy accident the mail steamer may be lost, so that the hon. gentleman's speech may not reach him, because, if it does, the good which the address will do will be defeated by what he has said of Mr. Gladstone! Yet the hon. member for West York finds to-day that I am toadying to Mr. Gladstone! Now, Sir, I believe it is extremely unfortunate that the proposals of the Minister of Inland Revenue as to an effort to agree upon the motion, in the interval between Tuesday and to-day, were not by him carried out. I think it would have been much better if that had been done; but we have now to settle the question in the ordinary way. I consider my motion preferable to the hon. gentleman's for the reasons I have stated. I consider the amendment which the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) is proposing to introduce in it an improvement on my motion. I intend, therefore, to vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Wellington.

Mr. THOMPSON. There is only one reason why I feel justified in trespassing on the indulgence of the House after the long debate we have had, and especially after the exceedingly able speech to which we have just listened, and that is the reason that I am one of the few members of the present Cabinet who have not had, previously to to-day, an opportunity of expressing an opinion on this question. I am one of the members of the party now in power who sympathise with the resolutions and the address which this House adopted in 1882. Although I had not then the honor of a seat in this House, I sympathised with those resolutions and with that address for reasons which I propose to state to this House in a very few words. They are mainly the reasons which induced the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), to impugn the wisdom, the policy and the good faith of those resolutions and of that address. The hon. member for South Grey in the observation which he addressed to the House a few moments ago, intimated that those resolutions and that address in 1882 were ill-timed. He told the House that at that time there was no practical measure before the Parliament of the United Kingdom, and that our words would have very little significance and very little effect. Now, Sir, the circumstances in which the Irish question stood in 1882 were the circumstances which induced me to feel proud, as one having some Irish blood in his veins, of the action taken by the hon. gentleman who now occupies the position of Minister of Inland Revenue, and to feel to some extent proud of the action of this House. The position of the Irish question in 1882 was such that the voice of friends, and courageous friends was called for. The people of Ireland in 1882, and especially the men who spoke for her, had few friends in the British Parliament, and they could feel that the voice of encouragement, coming from fellow-subjects on this side of the ocean, would bring to them sentiments of friendship and elements of strength which they greatly needed. A number of the representatives of the Irish people who had been struggling for Home Rule, and the amelioration of the land laws, were then in prison, and this Parliament was one of the first on this side of the Atlantic, if not the only Parliament within the British Empire, that raised a voice, not only to assist the national cause, but to ask clemency for the men who were then in Kilmainham prison. Let me ask this House where were the friends of liberty and freedom, who are so boastfully declaring this evening that only within their ranks are true liberals to be found? Where they were when those sentiments were pressed on this House, and why did they not meet as now and put forth their leader to ask the House to proclaim that the sentiments of liberty and freedom, they are so proud to advance to-night, should then be advanced in favor of the cause which had few friends, and of the men who were actually immured in dungeons in Ireland in 1882? These were the very reasons which induced the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) to say that the resolution and the address then were ill-timed. These were the very reasons which led me to believe, as one having some sympathy with the cause in favor of which that address was sent forward, that the voice of this Parliament was a timely voice. The position in which that cause stands to-day is very different. It is the hour of success, notwithstanding that some hon. members on this side of the House doubt the immediate and perhaps the eventual success of the cause in favor of which this struggle has taken place. This much at least has been achieved, that the principle of some liberal measure of Home Rule for Ireland has received far wider acceptance in the United Kingdom than anyone anticipated in 1882. The friends of that cause, who were then imprisoned, are leading a most influential party, which actually holds the balance of power in the British Parliament; and it is only when the cause may be said to have triumphed—when at any rate it has advanced so far that the success of some such a measure, consistent with the safety of the Empire and the rights of all classes, is assured—then it is that those friends of freedom, who combine with their own ranks and caucus alone the sentiments of liberty, are willing to come forward and ask this House to adopt resolutions in sympathy with the cause which has achieved such triumph. Now, a reason given why the House should adopt this resolution is that it is the right of the House, in spite of the rebuke of the Earl of Kimberley, to assert its undoubted privilege of addressing the Throne. Let me call the attention of the House to the fact that this has been altogether renounced in the resolution now offered to this House and in the speech of the hon. member for West Durham. That resolution and that speech assert no right. They simply express joy at the action of Mr. Gladstone in introducing the Home Rule measure; and the hon. member for West Durham says: "We are not approaching the Throne as we did before, we are not tendering advice to Her Majesty, or Her Majesty's advisers; we are cheering them on." Sir, the House in 1882, on motion of my friend the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, did cheer on a depressed, a downcast cause; and I humbly think it is beneath the dignity of this House, as I feel sure it is beneath the dignity of gentlemen expressing such a large love of liberty, to say that this action is taken only to cheer on the Imperial Government, because they have yielded a measure of justice to a portion of the United Kingdom. As an instance of the change of sentiment I may mention that I have under my hand a speech delivered by Mr. Gladstone not more than four months before that resolution and address were adopted by this House, in which he declared that the policy of Mr. Parnell and his Irish followers, which had been put forth by their friends as one of the points of Irish patriotism, was simply the "gospel of plunder." I think it was consistent with love of civil liberty, and love of personal liberty, that the voice of this Parliament should be raised then, as my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue asked Parliament to raise it under those circumstances. Now, Sir, the hon. member for West Durham let fall one remark in support of his contention that we are not sacrificing our dignity, which fell somewhat strangely on my ear. One of the reasons he has just advanced why this House should again approach the Throne, or rather Her Majesty's Ministers, with an address expressing joy for what they have done, is that the action of Lord Kimberley in 1882 was "unadvised." The impression may be on the minds of some of the members of this House that for the tone of the reply sent to this Parliament Lord Kimberley alone was responsible. Let me call the attention of the House to the fact that we are asked by the resolution before the House this evening to express our joy at the action of that "god-like statesman," as he was termed by the hon. member for South Grey, while not Lord Kimberley alone, but the "god-like statesman" himself declared in the British Parliament in 1882, not "unadvisedly," but deliberately, that this was a subject about which the Parliament of Canada had no right to interfere. Let me read from the English Hansard of 1st May, 1882:

"Mr. CALLAN asked leave to propose the following question, which has stood in his name on the notice paper:—

"To ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the telegraphic despatch in the Times of April the 2nd, under date:

"'OTTAWA, 20th April.

"'In to-day's sitting of the House of Commons of the Dominion Mr. Costigan, a Conservative, moved that an address should be presented to the Queen, praying that a form of self-government should be granted to Ireland similar to that enjoyed by Canada, and that clemency should be extended to the political prisoners in Ireland. Mr. Blake, the leader of the Opposition, made a powerful speech in favor of Home Rule for Ireland. Sir John Macdonald, the Premier, also supported the resolution proposed by Mr. Costigan, which was unanimously adopted. Sir John Macdonald stated that he would see that the necessary steps were taken to have the address prepared, in order that it might be sent to the Senate for concurrence;'

"Whether he will have any objection to direct that a copy of the said address be laid upon the Table of the House; and whether he proposes to take any action in the matter?"

"Mr. GLADSTONE. I think when such a question relating to a public body had been for some time on the paper, it is necessary that it should be answered as soon as possible, and I propose to answer, at any rate, so much of the question as is before us.

"Mr. CALLAN. I wish to make an addition to the question, and to ask whether the right hon. gentleman is aware that since my notice was first given, the Canadian Senate, or Upper House, has confirmed the resolution?

"Mr. GLADSTONE. No, Sir; I am not aware that the Senate had concurred in the proceedings of the Assembly. The Address was not transmitted in the regular manner. We are cognisant of the resolution having been passed, and of its contents, but only by a telegraphic report. We cannot present it to the House, because we are not in possession of the document. With regard to the substance of the resolution, the hon. gentleman has called upon me to enter upon a matter which is fitter for debate than a mere reply to a question; but, of course, I may observe that although, no doubt, the Assembly of Canada desired to assist our deliberations, the question referred to in the address appertains exclusively to the Imperial Parliament; and I may add, that so much of the subject matter as touches the discretion of the Executive Government—for this is part of the subject matter—had our close and constant attention before the intimation of the wish expressed in the address, either from that quarter or any other quarter, had reached us in the shape of any suggestion."

It will not be now said that the expression in the despatch by which the address of this Parliament was answered was an expression "unadvisedly" used by Lord Kimberley. It will now be seen that we are asked to sacrifice all dignity and self-respect to approach Mr. Gladstone, not for the purpose of advising, not for the purpose of giving practical assistance, but simply, to use the expression of the hon. member for West Durham a few minutes ago, for the purpose of cheering on the gentleman who said, in answer to our advice in 1882: "I wish you to understand that this is a matter which belongs exclusively to me, and with which you have nothing whatever to do." I do not profess to concur in that opinion at all. I agree in the statement of the hon. member for West Durham, that we have the right to express our opinion, as fellow-subjects of the Empire, on that or any other question; but I do say that before this House is asked to sacrifice its dignity by approaching again the very men who have declared they have no advice to take from us, that the matter is exclusively one for themselves to consider, and that they had formed their opinion before hearing from us, at least it should be shown that some practical useful purpose is to be served and somebody to be benefited. It is for these reasons that I am in sympathy with the Minister of Inland Revenue, in feeling indisposed to invite the action of Parliament upon that question again this Session. Now, however, that the subject is here, I feel no hesitation in voting for his resolution, inasmuch as it expresses the adherence of this House to the principles of the address of 1882, which looked to a measure for the pacification of Ireland, the gratification of the lawful ambition of a great body of its people, the preservation of the rights of the minority and the integrity of the Empire; but I do say, both as one who is entirely in sympathy with the address of 1882, and as a member of this House, that I am opposed to passing any address on this subject in view of all the circumstances, and that I think the dignity and self-respect of this House will be best maintained by simply asserting that what this House resolved in 1882 it adheres to to-night, and records its opinion, without undertaking to present an address on the subject to the man who spurned our address before, and from whom we have no reason to expect any change in this particular, although there may be a change in the question now before Parliament. There is no reason whatever for considering that Mr. Gladstone would deem the advice of the Parliament of Canada more useful or the administration of Irish affairs any less exclusively in the province of the Imperial Parliament in 1886 than in 1832. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) seems to have a contrary view, because he calls the attention of the House to the manifesto issued by Mr. Gladstone. I humbly differ from the hon. gentleman. I think that Mr. Gladstone did not, in that manifesto, invite an expression of the opinion of the Parliament of Canada, and I do not believe that the influence of the Parliament of Canada at this stage of the discussion will have any useful result. If he thought it would assist in the consideration of the question in the Imperial Parliament that the opinion of the Canadian Parliament should be known, Mr. Gladstone could call it up from the Colonial Office. He would find there the address of both Houses of Parliament—the unrescinded expression of Parliament, declared in the most formal way and conveyed to the Imperial authorities in the exercise of our rights as British subjects—and can use it if he pleases on the second reading of the Bill. The contention made by one of the hon. gentleman's supporters that because a new Parliament has come in it is necessary to reiterate all those resolutions, seems to me an extraordinary one. If that be so, it would be the duty of a new Parliament to adopt all the resolutions of the old one, excepting those dissented from and it would be our duty to re-enact all our old Statutes. But we have been accustomed to suppose that that which went forward deliberately and solemnly, by the unanimous votes of both Houses, is an expression of opinion which might be said to last, at any rate, until a contrary opinion is expressed. When the hon. member for West Durham moved his resolution two days ago, I confess it was with surprise I heard the statement, which I was bound to accept, that it was introduced in no party spirit. I felt surprised at that statement, because I supposed that the leader of the Opposition, in moving that resolution as an amendment to the motion to go into Supply, an amendment which the Government were bound, under the circumstances, to treat as a vote of want of confidence.—

Mr. MILLS. Not at all.

Mr. THOMPSON. I suppose the hon. gentleman would have avowed his position to be this, that he proposed to challenge on public grounds the attitude of the Government on this question. But the hon. gentleman chose to state at that stage of the discussion that it was introduced in no party spirit, and we were bound to accept that statement—although, I must say, it was with considerable difficulty I accepted it. I am glad that the strain involved in the acceptance of that proposition is no longer upon us, because the hon. gentleman, in the pleasing speech which he made a few moments ago, gracefully threw off the mask, and declared, if not in so many words, in effect that this is being pushed on this House this evening as purely a party measure. The hon. gentleman evinced an ecstasy which I have not witnessed upon his countenance since I came to this House, and which I would be exceedingly gratified to see, if not in such a cause, in pointing out the gentlemen on this side who are unable to concur in the resolution. There he showed at once that one of the objects he had in bringing this resolution forward was to show that hon. gentlemen on this side were not a unit on this question. But I am sure nobody would accuse me in this House of being wanting in charity, in imputing any such motive to the hon. gentlemen, when they recall the words by which I regretted to hear him assail a number of gentlemen on this side led by the Minister of Inland Revenue—gentlemen who have justified their adhesion to the principles of personal freedom and civil liberty under many trying circumstances which that hon. gentleman has never had to undergo; gentlemen who have evinced their willingness to support this cause when the hon. member for West Durham and his friends, in the Liberal caucus, of freedom and liberty were mute in this House; men who raised their voices and induced this House unanimously to express an opinion in favor of Home Rule. He assailed these members in words which I think the hon. gentleman himself will regret to have on record, when he assailed them as the "Tory Irish Catholic clique." I suppose that, after words like that uttered against gentlemen on this side of the House for no other reason than that they felt unwilling to obtrude this question unnecessarily again, and because they were unwilling to support the hon. gentleman in an appeal to the Throne to cheer on the statesman, who told us in 1882, with a double voice, that this was a matter exclusively for himself, and that he was quite able to form an opinion upon it without hearing us at all, we are relieved from crediting any further the statement that the matter was not brought forward in a party spirit. When the hon. gentleman attacked the friends in this House who had brought this matter successfully forward before as the "Tory Irish Catholic clique," I thought I was justified in assuming that the strain he put on my credulity the day before yesterday would be altogether relieved to-night. There was one other reason which was perfectly obvious, both from his remarks and from the remarks of the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), for the introduction of the resolution, and that was that it was to put, if possible, in a false position my hon. colleague, the Minister of Inland Revenue. One-half of the hon. gentleman's remarks two-thirds of the remarks of the hon. member for South Grey were given to an assault upon that gentleman's consistency. As I have said before under the circumstances which existed in 1882, when popular opinion was not to be gained, when the good graces of Mr. Gladstone were not to be gained by the expression of opinion on this question, my hon. friend who sits beside me asked this House to join in that expression of opinion at a time when those who claim that the principles of liberty are altogether in their keeping were unwilling to express an opinion upon it until they were led by the present Minister of Inland Revenue. Nobody knows better than I do the statement that was made in the London Times and read to the House of Commons that in 1882 the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) made a very able speech upon this subject, showed a great deal of ability, and went with the favorable gale which was then carrying that resolution through the House. I do not wish to detract from the contribution which an eloquent speech like that made to the business of the occasion; but I am still disposed, as one of the members of this House, agreeing with the amendment which has been moved this evening, to decline, notwithstanding the hon. gentleman's great eloquence and great fervor on that occasion, to agree with him in the attack he made on the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, who, without the aid of the hon. gentleman so freely tendered the day before yesterday, brought the question before the House and chose the time for doing it when the resolution of this House could do the most good, and we had not merely the agreeable task of cheering on Her Majesty's Prime Minister in a course which he has already adopted without the advice of Canada, and after informing Canada that she has nothing to do with the question. As one of the members of the House taking this view. Notwithstanding what has been said this evening, I declare my adhesion to the consistency and the sincerity of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, and I believe that the people throughout this country who sympathise with the principles expressed in this amendment, will prefer the course which the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue has adopted to the course the Opposition have adopted on this question, notwithstanding the desperate attempt that has been made to break down that gentleman's position as regards his consistency and his right to speak for his fellow countrymen and his co-religionists. But, if the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Blake's) words were not sufficient, when he pointed with such pleasure to the dissentients in this House, if his words were not sufficient when he assailed gentlemen on this side of the House who felt so warm an interest in this question that perhaps from pardonable zeal they thought the question entirely in their own keeping, I should suppose the words of the hon. mover of the amendment to the amendment this evening would be quite sufficient to show that this is being pushed upon the House as purely a party measure and purely to put the Government in a false position upon it, which I venture to say they shall not be able to do. I need not say the hon. member for West Durham is responsible for the statements of the mover of the amendment to the amendment, because he sat by and heard them all, he cheered them all, he failed to disallow any of them, and he declared at the end of his remarks that he intented to vote for the motion with which the hon. member for North Wellington closed his speech; and that gentleman perhaps at an earlier stage than his leader intended, disclosed the whole game by stating that we were angry on this side of the House, because "the wind had been taken out of our sails," and because we saw that "we had sacrificed an opportunity to make ourselves popular." Now, the hon. mover of the amendment to the amendment, with the tacit assent of his leader, has declared, in words in which it may be safely said he speaks for his party, that the object of bringing this whole question before the House, and especially in embarking the little resolution with which he concluded his remarks, is simply to outsail the Government, to outsail the members in favor of Home Rule on this side of the House, and to seize the opportunity which he thought we had sacrificed of cultivating popularity, making ourselves popular, although the expression of the opinion of this Parliament cannot serve any useful purpose other than that of making ourselves popular, and would be, in the way in which it is proposed to express it, a sacrifice of the dignity and the consistency of this Parliament.

Mr. COURSOL. Notwithstanding the lateness of the hour, I feel that I cannot give a silent vote on this question, representing, as I do, the largest and most populous division in the Dominion, inhabited by so many thousands of Irishmen, true to their adopted land, and true to Ireland. I have had the occasion to attend meetings in favor of Home Rule, called by the most influential Irishmen of the city of Montreal. There was but one sentiment, and that was in favor of the scheme proposed by Mr. Gladstone, and then and there it was said that they hoped that every effort would be made by the friends of Ireland, whenever that occasion should come, in order to strengthen the hands of Mr. Gladstone at the present moment. It is indeed a great sight to see the Premier of the British Empire coming forward with a scheme to relieve Ireland from the grievances of centuries past, and it is not surprising that the attention of the world is now rivetted on the British Parliament. From every part of the globe Mr. Gladstone has received despatches and letters of congratulation; from every part of the globe Mr. Parnell, who has behaved so nobly in behalf of Ireland, has also received, probably, the same amount of congratulation. The Legislature of the Province of Quebec sent a resolution to Mr. Gladstone, which he acknowledged with pleasure, and it now remains for the House of Commons to do the same. I am sure that the 9,000,000 of Irishmen inhabiting this continent, believe that something ought to be done in this House. I think it is the opinion of all the Irishmen in Canada that something should be done here, and I believe they will be thankful to the mover of the resolution. This is no time to quarrel about politics. This is no time to say that it has been brought in by the leader of the Government or the leader of the Opposition. It is for us to decide whether the proposition before us deserves our approval, whether it will serve the purpose desired, whether it will show to England, to the British Empire, that Mr. Gladstone, in his Home Rule measure, has friends in Canada who are disposed to cheer him on in the course he has adopted. The measure may have many defects, it may not pass in its shape, but all we want to know is whether Ireland will be benefited and satisfied. If we find that the measure satisfies Irishmen, we also shall be satisfied. I am not an Irishman, but I have felt for Ireland ever since I read her history, and now at last, after so many centuries of oppression, so many centuries of persecution, at last one man steps forward and brings up the measure intended to remove her grievances, and that man is the Premier of England. We are told that Mr. Gladstone held different views some time ago. I do not care what views he may have held in the past, I care for his views of to-day. I take his proposition as I find it, and I think it deserves our hearty support. I believe the day is not far distant when he will achieve that great feat of repairing the injustices of the past, that he will receive the reward he deserves, and that his brilliant career will be closed by passing a law that will be a blessing to the people who have suffered so long. For my part, I do not view this as a party measure. If the proposition of the Minister of Inland Revenue had been alone before the House, I would gladly have supported it. But if I find something more to the point, something calculated to do more good, I am bound, as a friend of Ireland, as a lover of freedom, to support the second proposition. I know that the Minister of Inland Revenue has done all he possibly could for his country. I know the love he has for Ireland, he has proved it on many occasions, and I am sure that in this instance he has been moved by the purest motives of patriotism. But that alone should not prevent us from judging all the motions before us. We are bound to take them as we find them. I think the motion of the leader of the Opposition, coupled with the amendment, is calculated to do good, and that it will have the effect of showing the position of this House and the country. It is said we have received a rebuke from England. Well, Sir, so far as I am concerned, and I believe so far as the people of this country are concerned, it is a matter of indifference whether this House received a rebuke four years ago; all we want is to accomplish our object, the position is not the same now, circumstances have changed. Are we to be told that we British subjects living in this great Dominion, have no right to lay our views at the foot of the Throne? Are we not interested in this question—perhaps even more than any other colony of the Empire? Who knows the consequences which a refusal of Home Rule might entail upon this Dominion? Who knows where trouble might come from? We might have to defend our shores with our money and our blood. I know not what might be the consequences if that measure should be refused. But if it passes I believe it is calculated to bring peace and harmony, not only to England, but to the whole world, wherever there are Irishmen, and especially in this part of America. Now, Sir, the motion of the hon. leader of the Opposition is couched in a calm, dignified tone, there is nothing in it to offend, and I am sure if it is sent by this Parliament to Mr. Gladstone, he will receive it with gratitude, and thereby correct the mistake that was made before. We ought not to think of that, if we can accomplish our end, our first object is to do good to Ireland, and we ought not to dispute about the terms, we need not be so punctillious about the terms; let us do our duty first about the cause of Ireland and of Home Rule, and if we succeed we shall be satisfied. If, on the contrary, the English Government should think fit to return such an answer as they did before, then Canada will know what she will have to do, but I presume no such thing will happen. I shall vote in favor of the amendment as it stands, hoping that it will be annexed to the motion of the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I desire to say but a few words on the subject that has engaged the attention of the House this afternoon and evening. I have waited until our Irish friends in the House have had an opportunity of expressing their views, and now that they have had full opportunity, and one of our French friends has found occasion to approve of the course of the leader of the Opposition and of the resolution which he has submitted, I, who cannot claim to be either Irish by birth or Irish by descent, recognize that fact, and at the same time venture to claim that I am in a position in which I may be permitted to say a few words on this question. I conceive this to be a question that is more than an Irish question. These resolutions are introduced into the Canadian Parliament, and as a Canadian, and as a representative in the Canadian Parliament, I feel I am at liberty to express my views in regard to the substance of them, and to intimate what my views are in that direction. I think it is eminently proper that in the Canadian Parliament, composed of the representatives of various Provinces, which enjoy to the full the privilege of local self-government, such resolutions should be introduced. I was one of those in the House, who, in 1882, was very glad, along with almost all the members in the House, to ratify by my assent and by my vote on that occasion what I believed to be a correct principle, that local self-government should be given to the people of Ireland, permitting them to manage their own local affairs as to them might seem right and proper. And therefore when the leader of the Opposition has to-day placed in your hands, Mr. Speaker, a resolution declaring that we adhere to the principles we enunciated at that time and evidenced by our vote and that he desires further to express to Her Majesty our belief that the principles we then advocated have been incorporated in a measure that has been brought down by the Imperial Cabinet and submitted to the House of Commons, I feel that I desire to express my approval of that resolution and give it my support, and, if I have an opportunity, my vote. It is to be regretted very much, I think, that on a question of this great consequence, on a question on which it is so desirable that we should all be united, an attempt should have been made to introduce an element of party strife. It is particularly to be regretted that the evident intention to introduce if possible party strife into the discussion of this question should come from those who have constituted themselves, as it were, the special champions of the Irish people and of the Irish cause. They have seen fit to accouse the leader of the Opposition of acting from party motives in introducing his resolution. The Minister of Justice has not thought it beneath him to charge upon the leader of the Opposition that he was actuated by purely party motives in introducing this resolution. I excuse some of the statements he made to-night, as I feel that the hon. gentleman understood he was in an awkward position when he intimated that he would vote down the proposal of the leader of the Opposition. His charge was that the hon. gentleman had moved it for purely party purposes. What was the evidence he gave? Can any hon. gentleman in the action or in the words of the leader of the Opposition point to a single word or a single circumstance that would corroborate such a statement? Hon. gentlemen opposite say the proof is to be found in the leader of the Opposition having moved this motion as an amendment on going into Committtee of Supply, when it became, as a matter of course, a vote of non-confidence in the Administration. The hon. gentleman knows that that statement is not correct. He knows that the leader of the Opposition moved the motion on that occasion, because it was only upon such an occasion that it was possible for him to move it during this Session; and more than that, the hon. gentleman took care, when he made the motion, to announce that it was not made in a party sense and not as a leader of a party, but in the hope that it would receive the unanimous approval of the House. It was only necessary for the Minister to act on the resolution in the spirit in which it was proposed, just as was done in 1882 when the Costigan resolutions were introduced at a precisely similar time, to have removed it entirely out of the region of party politics, had they been anxious to do so and united on their side of the House, and thus a unanimous vote on this occasion might have been secured as it was in 1882. When the leader of the House objected to the motion coming up as an amendment to Supply the hon. gentleman announced his willingness to withdraw his motion if a day was appointed and immediately the leader of the Opposition agreed. Subsequently, the leader of the Government made another stipulation that it should not be brought up as an amendment to go into Supply but as a substantive motion; and the leader of the Opposition signified his acquiescence. He did more than that. When the Minister of Inland Revenue suggested that by conference they could probably arrange a resolution that would secure the unanimous support of the House he said he desired a conference with the hon. gentlemen opposite, and that he would be happy to receive suggestions, and to arrive at some motion that would pass the House unanimously. Where then is the proof of the charge laid against the leader of the Opposition that he has introduced this resolution in a purely party spirit and for party gains and purposes? The Minister of Justice charged that when the Costigan resolutions were introduced, one of which expressed the hope that persons then confined in gaol might be released, the voice of the leader of the Opposition was not raised on that occasion. Does not the hon. gentleman know that on that very occasion the leader of the Opposition seconded the motion. Does not he know, and if he was not present has he not heard that such was the case? I well recall that his eloquent advocacy of the cause of local self-government for the Irish people captivated the entire parliamentary assembly, and that the cheers rang out not only from his supporters but from those who were politically opposed to him. I have here the testimony, in contradiction of the charge of the Minister of Justice that the leader of the Opposition had sat silent upon that occasion. I have the testimony of the Minister of Inland Revenue himself. In his speech delivered in this House the other day he said:

"Mr. Speaker, on a former occasion, when this same subject was discussed before this Parliament, no man who sat in this Chamber and listened to the hon. gentleman when he spoke on that occasion admired him more sincerely than I did, or was more ready to congratulate him upon the very able speech he delivered on that occasion."

And yet, Sir, the Minister of Justice rose and charged when these resolutions were passing through—alluding to one of them desiring the release of the persons then in prison—the leader of the Opposition had remained silent. I tell you, Sir, and I tell the House that long before the Costigan resolutions were introduced into this Parliament this measure of Home Rule for the people of Ireland was in the heart, and found expression from the lips, of the hon. leader of the Opposition. Two years and four days before the Costigan resolutions were introduced into this House, when my hon. friend was speaking of the Canadian Pacific Railway and of the probable immigration we would receive into our country, reciting the fact which he much regretted that we did not receive so large a number of immigrants from Ireland as he desired we might, he pointed out what he deeply regretted, that unfortunately the Irish Catholic population of Ireland, when they left their country, owing to the embittered feelings which existed between Ireland and England, instead of seeking our shores where they could find comfortable homes and work their fortunes, they sought the shores of another country and became settlers of, and helpers in building up, a foreign nation. Upon that occasion the leader of the Opposition, after deploring the fact I have pointed out, said this:

"But I hope for great things for Ireland and the Empire from the events of the last few days. I hope and trust that the advent to power of the Liberal party, supported by a great majority of decided Liberals and Radicals, will result in fresh measures of relief and justice to Ireland, which will tend still further to weaken her old feelings of hostility and disaffection, and to make the Empire in this regard an United Empire. I hope we shall see among other things a moderate measure of Home Rule for Ireland, and witness by the application of that measure the creation and maintenance of true and real bonds of Union between Ireland and the rest of the so-called United Kingdom."

That was the sentiment deep in the heart of the leader of the Opposition, a sentiment which found expression from his lips two years and four days before the Costigan resolutions were moved at all; and yet, although that is the record of the hon. gentleman, he is charged by hon. gentlemen on the other side, now that the desire of his heart in that respect seems to be approaching completion, now when he sees that by another effort it may become almost an accomplished fact, they say that after having waited, after having given them every opportunity to move from the other side, in order, if possible, that a unanimous vote might be secured, after waiting until he found from the newspapers that they would not move, he comes forward and moved his resolution—a resolution which is simply an affirmation of the one which was adopted by hon. gentlemen on both sides in 1882, and stating further that we desired to inform Her Majesty that this House hails with joy the submission by Her Majesty's Government to the Parliament of the United Kingdom, of a measure recognising the principle of local self-government for Ireland—they now find fault with him for moving this resolution. Is it not a meet and proper thing that he who desired it in 1880 and expressed a belief that through the restoration to power of a Liberal Administration this measure of Home Rule would become law—is it not fitting, now when he sees this measure actually submitted to the Imperial Parliament by that distinguished statesman and that it stands a chance of becoming the law of the land, that he should desire to place on record our approval of that principle, and lend the weight of the opinion of the Parliament of Canada in behalf of what we conceive to be a principle that will be conducive of good and good only. And who, Sir, intercepts the motion of my hon. friend, and desires to prevent this House from stating that they hail with joy the introduction of this measure? Why, Sir, it remained for the man who moved the resolution in 1882, expressing a desire that this might be brought about —it remained for him, and a sad task it must have been, to seek to intercept the motion of the leader of the Opposition, giving us the opportunity of expressing our joy at seeing likely to be accomplished what we asked should be done by them And yet we find he takes shelter from that position, which is not, I venture to say, a creditable position, which is, I think, a position he must regret—though it is perhaps not too late for him to retrace his steps, by moving to withdraw his amendment in order that the resolution of the leader of the Opposition may be adopted—the excuse he gives for intercepting that resolution—and he embodies it in his resolution—is, that because when the resolutions of 1882 were sent to Her Majesty, Earl Kimberley replied in what he calls a snub to the Parliament of Canada, therefore, as the Minister of Justice said, it would be beneath our dignity to again adopt that course. Why, Sir, I am at a loss to perceive how it is a greater sacrifice of dignity upon our part respectfully to re-affirm the position we took at that time, and to express joy that those who differed from us at that time have embraced our views and are acting upon them, than that we should place on the journals of the House of Canada that we were snubbed, as they term it, by the Colonial Secretary, and that we desired to place it on the journals of the House and intend to make it our guide for all time to come, in order that we might take care that never more should we approach the foot of the Throne. I think the sacrifice of dignity on our part will be to carry the amendment of the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, which is, in effect, to acknowledge that we received a snub —if snub it be—that we accept it as just, and that we claim the privilege of putting it on our journals, where it may always be before our eyes to prevent us from ever again doing such a thing, and prevent us from expressing our joy that a measure we approved of at that time and desired to see submitted has been submitted. And what is the position of the Minister of Inland Revenue upon this very question? Has he changed his views? No; he tells us that the reply of Earl Kimberley did not change his opinion at all. He said:

"I agree with the hon. gentleman in thinking that we had a perfect right to send the address we did send. It was couched in respectful language; it was moderate in its tone; it covered the principle involved; and as we took the ground that the question affected our interests in this country, we felt that we were acting within our clear right."

And still thinking we did nothing wrong, thinking that we were acting within our clear rights, he hesitates to stand upon his rights and desires to have entered on our journals the fact that what we considered to be our rights was denied to us by the Imperial Government, and the fact that they sent a reply of this kind he acquiesces in as a paramount reason why we should not again approach the Throne and express our views to Her Majesty. I say it is to be regretted that the hon. gentleman found himself obliged to take such a course; it is to be regretted that a gentleman to whom we will endeavor to give credit for heartily desiring that the principle of local self-government should be accorded to the Irish people, should himself be a party to intercept a motion which is calculated to strengthen the hands of the man who is endeavoring to give effect to the views which we then expressed. What will be the effect of the amendment of the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue? It is simply a resolution saying we said so and so in 1882, we think so now, but Her Majesty's Government told us at that time that no matter what we thought we had no business to tell them, that therefore we will not tell them again what we do think in reference to this matter. But we will put it upon the journals of our own House, that notwithstanding what Earl Kimberley said in 1882, we think so still; and it is there. It is not to be transmitted to the British Government or to Mr. Gladstone or to Her Majesty; it is not to be sent beyond the four walls of this Chamber, unless some enterprising news-agent should see fit to cable it across, which would not be the act of this Parliament at all. Sir, I say that Canadians value the liberty of local self-government, as they do value it, having longed lived under and enjoyed that blessing, it is meet and right that we should signify that our feelings are unchanged in this respect, and signify it to Her Majesty's Government—should signify that we, who are in a position to know that the granting of local self-government, instead of weakening, strengthens to the greatest degree the tie that binds free people together, believe that as it has been in our case so it will be in the case of Ireland—that we believe that that country, misgoverned and downtrodden as she has been for many years, being once accorded the right which should be hers, to manage her own local affairs, instead of cherishing feelings of envy and bitterness toward those who have misgoverned it, will recognise that at last justice is about to be done, and that this will enkindle in the people of Ireland feelings of kindness, of unity and of regard towards the British Empire, which, instead of being weakened, will be strengthened in a very material degree. If no higher reason, based on principles of justice and right, existed, although that reason does exist, why the Irish people should have the rights and liberties we enjoy, we find a potent reason in the fact that our material interests are bound up in this question in no slight degree. As stated in the resolutions of 1882, we cannot hope while the present state of things and the present feelings exist in Ireland, to receive the immigration from that Island which we are entitled to receive. But once let peace, good will and unity be brought about between Ireland and the rest of the Empire, by the concession of justice in this respect, and then may we hope to have great accessions to our population from those who may leave the shores of that Island to seek their fortunes beyond the sea. We, Sir, are entitled to have them in our midst; we desire to have them here; we open our arms to them, and we say to them: Come over to us, we have fertile lands which we will give you free to settle on; and if they were animated by friendship and love for the mother land, I believe we should be successful in obtaining large numbers of them. I noticed one remark made by an hon. gentleman opposite, who announced himself as entirely opposed to this principle of local self-government for Ireland. He pointed out that we did not know what the result would be, although it was certain that the measure would be fraught with evil consequences; and he gave as a reason why he should vote for the amendment of the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, that it would be productive of less ill-effect, in the direction in which he looked for ill-effect, than the others. I have only to remind you that when great constitutional changes have taken place in this country, there have been those who have hesitated and have seen danger in them. There are those living in Canada to-day who have seen great constitutional changes which they regarded as fraught with danger to the well-being, the peace of this country, and who, to-day, enjoying the blessings thus secured, would be the last to relinquish them. Is it not a matter of history that when it was first proposed to grant municipal institutions to the people of this country, there were those who denounced them as sucking republics, who said our safety as a people would be endangered if we allowed the control of municipal affairs to pass into the hands of the people? Municipal institutions, however, were granted; and to-day no institutions are more highly prized by the people of Ontario, and I believe by the people of the other Provinces, than those municipal institutions. No man would willingly part with then; and yet as grave fears were expressed about the granting of those rights to the people as we have heard expressed about granting self-government to Ireland, There may be those who express alarm; but I am not one of those who can see where danger can arise. It is difficult for a Canadian to see how the Empire can be weakened by doing justice to one portion of it which has not received justice hitherto. It is impossible for a Canadian, who sees that by giving self-government to this Dominion, the Empire has bound it to itself by a stronger bond than before, and who sees that by giving self government to the Provinces, they have been more strongly united together than before—I say it is impossible for a Canadian who has seen all this, to see how danger can arise to the Empire from applying the same principle to that important portion of the Empire. I would be glad, if an opportunity were given to me, to vote for the resolution introduced by the hon. leader of the Opposition. I would desire to express my joy that now at last there has been a measure submitted to the Imperial Parliament by the Premier of the Empire, to secure that boon to the Irish people; and I am of the opinion expressed in the words of the amendment offered by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), that the events that have taken place since 1882 have strengthened the conviction we then entertained, that it was a proper and a desirable thing to grant such a measure. I shall therefore have much pleasure in voting for the amendment of the hon. member for North Wellington, which will express to Her Majesty, as we have clearly a right to do that we hold the same views now that we held in 1882, and that we rejoice to know that those views are now embodied in a measure submitted to the Imperial Parliament for ratification and approval. I shall have much pleasure, Sir, in supporting this resolution, and I only regret that the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue has sought to supplant the original resolution by the introduction of a resolution that will not tend in any material degree, I fear, to strengthen the hands of the right hon. gentleman engaged in this great task, but whose hands would be most materially strengthened if the original resolution were to receive, as it ought in my opinion to receive, the approval of the members of this Chamber.

Mr. MITCHELL. At this late hour I will crave the indulgence of the House for but a very few minutes. I do it because it is the first time I have had an opportunity from my place in Parliament of expressing my opinion on the question of Home Rule for Ireland. It is useless to argue at this age of history the question of whether the Irish people should have Home Rule or not; it is universally admitted that grievances have existed and that the peace of Ireland has suffered from the want of that power of self-government within the Island itself, which is almost universally admitted to be now necessary. I will, therefore, not now discuss that side of the question, because I think there is but one opinion on all sides of this House, and that is that the action taken by the right hon. the First Minister of England, that the principle of the Bill which he submitted—I am not going so far as to say I will endorse all the details, I think there are many the right hon. gentleman knows he will require to alter—but I say the principle of the Bill is one which will be universally admitted in this House to be of absolute necessity in order to secure the peace of the Empire. Those who say to us that we are interfering with a subject which is outside the region and power and rights of this Parliament are but very few indeed. At one time that contention may have been sustained, but to-day it is almost universally admitted—certainly universally within this House, because the votes of hon. gentlemen will show this whether they vote for the resolution or for either of the amendments, and I presume every hon. gentleman will vote for one of them—and no one pretends that the Parliament of Canada, which has among its members numbers of Irishmen, both Protestants and Catholics, and a large number of men who depend upon Irishmen of both persuasions for their seats, has not the right to express its opinion on this matter to the Imperial Government. When we look at what the population of Canada is composed of, its mixed character, the varied influences, and when we consider the strong sympathies which all classes in the community feel in the agitation going on in the mother land, cannot doubt the propriety of the course we are about to take. Not only the peace of the Empire, but that of all the colonies, depends largely whether that vexed question will be settled satisfactorily or not. When we find the right hon. the First Minster of England is receiving assurances of sympathy from foreign land, from Irishmen south of the border, and from other British colonies, it is our duty, as well as our right, to give expression to the wish which in our heart we feel that every effort should be made to meet the just expectations of that country which has suffered so much from maladministration. I will say no more on this point, but simply express my opinion as to what is desirable we should do to sustain the hands of Mr. Gladstone. I regret very much to find that the reasonable motion of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) was not accepted by the Administration. Let anyone take up that resolution and let him take up the amendment moved by the Minister of Inland Revenue, and say whether there is any very substancial difference between the two, except this that the resolution of the hon. member for West Durham is more explicit, more to the point, conveys better the idea we desire to convey, conveys in the strongest manner possible the desire of our people through their representatives in Parliament to press upon Her Majesty, Her Majesty's advisors, and the people of England, the fact that we in Canada, comprising between 5,000,000 and 6,000,000 people, admittedly the brightest gem in the crown of England, her foremost colony, one that has shown by her enterprise that she is prepared to receive the homeless millions of Europe—sympathise with Mr. Gladstone; and our opinion should be expressed in a manner in which there will be no uncertain sound or doubt. If the hon. member for West Durham had not moved his resolution, and the Minister of Inland Revenue had submitted his as an original proposition I would have supported it with pleasure; but in my opinion it is not as strong as the other, because it is simply an expression of the opinion of this Parliament, while the motion of the hon. member for West Durham is a direct address to the foot of the Throne. If the motion of the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue had been presented in the first instance, I would have gladly supported it, and I feel that, after the unanimous expression of the opinion of this Parliament which we gave in 1882, when I had not the honor of being in Parliament, it is a matter of regret that on this occasion we should not act unanimously. If there be a division on the motion of the hon. member for West Durham, and if the House divides on the motion of the hon. member for Wellington and the amendment of the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue is carried, I suppose it will be carried on a divided House. That is a fact that I would very much regret. I feel that if we are sending an expression of opinion on so vital and important a question to a large number of our fellow subjects on the other side of the water, we ought to send an unanimous expression of opinion, and I would ask the Ministry whether, even at this late hour, they could not find that it would not derogate from their dignity or influence, but, on the contrary, lead them to be more respected in this House and country, if, in order to command unanimity, they should withdraw the motion of the Minister of Inland Revenue. The hon. member for West Wellington would then withdraw his and the first resolution go as proposed. But if the Government are determined to press for a division, the country will hold them responsible for it. The hon. member for West Durham, who waited two months after the House opened before he submitted his resolution, I am sure, though I am not in his confidence, knew nothing of this motion, and would have been willing at once to accept the proposition of the Minister of Inland Revenue, if it had been submitted in the first instance. If, with so little difference between the two resolutions, a division is had, the country will hold the Administration of the day responsible for preventing that unanimity upon this question which we all desire. That is all I have to say. In sending home a resolution on this subject, I do not want to vote as the hon. member for Muskoka said he would for a resolution that will do the least good. I want to vote for the strongest resolution, and therefore I propose to vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Wellington, and, failing that, for the motion of the hon. member for West Durham.

Mr. COSTIGAN. In the few remarks I offered in placing my motion in amendment to the motion made by the hon. member for West Durham, in your hands, Sir, I gave my reasons for moving that motion. I stated that I still adhered to the view I entertained, that I thought it would be better to leave that unanimous expression of the Parliament of Canada to have its full force and effect than to court a division and a debate such as we have had to-night creating division on the question and inevitably resulting in a divided vote of this House. I was sincere in taking that view. I was actuated by a desire to do that which was best in the interests of those who have at heart, above all their political feelings, the welfare of the Irish people and the success of their present struggle. The hon. gentleman who moved the resolution to which mine has been moved in amendment has in his usual eloquent terms tried to impress upon the House the great value of an expression of this new Parliament upon the question. He has pointed out what strength it would give to Mr. Gladstone in his present praiseworthy efforts to give to Ireland what has been so long withheld from that unhappy country. I wish to say to the House and to the country that there is no position in the gift of this country or any other country, there is no pecuniary consideration which would influence me or prevent me from taking that stand which would be best calculated to promote the interests of the Irish people and the heartfelt views of the Irish Canadians in this country. I listened with pain, as I have often had to do before, to the remarks of the hon. gentleman from South Grey (Mr. Landerkin). In the first place, he stated with regard to the resolution moved in 1882 that there was no call for it, that it was inexpedient to move it then, though he thought it was quite expedient to move it now, and that moving it at that time looked as if it was moved for party purposes. Mr. Speaker, in moving it at that time, I labored under greater disadvantages than any gentleman who might propose a similar resolution at present. I agree with the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) that the feeling in Canada in favor of the movement in Ireland has not abated. I think the sentiment in Canada as well as in every other civilised country is growing daily in favor of Home Rule for Ireland. I have no doubt about that, but I say, if the expression of this Parliament is of any value to the leader of the Government who is now proposing to grant a measure of Home Rule to that country, let him refer to the unanimous verdict of this Parliament which is within his reach, the address passed by both Houses and presented to Her Majesty in 1882, and he can use that with authority. I need not repeat what I have already stated, and what has been better stated by my colleague the Minister of Justice, that the contention has been a little strained that, because a new Parliament has come in, that resolution is of no force unless it is renewed by this Parliament, I say it has all that force it had on the day it was passed until some adverse resolution is adopted by the Parliament of Canada. It is true that we are not the same in personnel, that we are not the same Parliament, but we were the voice of Canada at that time, and the expression of the people of Canada through their representatives has never been reversed up to the present time. It may be reversed to-night. It may be, if a vote is taken, that it will be weakened, I hope I shall not be held responsible for that.

Some hon. MEMBERS. You certainly will.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Hon. gentlemen say that I certainly shall be. I am prepared to take the responsibility of any act I perform. I have always been prepared to do that, and before I finish, I will have a few words to say in regard to that responsibility. But I must say, in concluding the few remarks I have to make in reply to the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), that he stated that I was a private member of this House at that time, and that now I am a member of the Government, and that makes all the difference. Is that the value the hon. gentleman places upon a position to which a very considerable salary is attached? Does the hon. gentleman value the position of a Cabinet Minister, to which a considerable salary is attached, for the pecuniary advantages which it entails? I do not, and I have no hesitation in saying that the man who accepts a position as a Cabinet Minister and has to endure the slanders, the cowardly slanders which are uttered against him, will find that they more than compensate for the salary he receives. Some men may think that, because I am a poor man, the salary of $7,000 a year is a great item to me. Those who know me, know that it has not the slightest influence upon me, that to-morrow morning, I could step out of the Government of which I am a member, if I had reason to do so, and could trust in the health and constitution which God has given me to earn an honest and independent living. Yet these men who boast that they are the representatives of religious and national freedom in this country tell me I am cowardly now because I do not think as they do, because I do not choose to endorse the views they express here. With regard to the question of Home Rule, I have been what I am to-night, a sincere friend of that movement from the first day it started in Ireland and in this country. I can refer to the first prominent meeting that was held by an Irish organisation in this country in the city of Quebec, at a time when Home Rule was not so popular in this Dominion, when Irish sentiments were not so pleasant to the majority of gentlemen on that side of the House, when Irishmen were called Dogans. I was invited to go to that meeting in Quebec and to put in an appearance on a public platform in favor of Home Rule and a reform in the land system of that country. Other prominent Irishmen were invited. One gentleman who was a very prominent Irishman on that side of the House was invited, and he sent a statement that he was suffering under a bad cold and could not go. I was not suffering under a bad cold and I did go, and I was one of the first who stood on a platform in this country to advocate Home Rule for Ireland, while the hon. gentleman who sent the statement that he was suffering from a cold, spoke for three hours in this House on that very same night while I was speaking in Quebec in favor of Home Rule. And yet I am to be taunted, and my motives are to be accused, and I am to be told that I was a Home Ruler until I got into the Government. My position in the Government of the day is perhaps a peculiar one. I have confessed before that I do not owe it to any particular ability that I possess, to any extraordinary talents with which I have been endowed. It is true that I have served my country as a public man in a humble capacity for a number of years. It is true that I have discharged my duty to the best of my ability, but I am quite free to admit that there are many men in Canada and in our party who are not in the Government who have abilities of a far higher order than mine. It is quite true, I am willing to confess that I owe my position to the fact that the leader of the Government believed that a portion of the people to which I belong, that is the Catholic people of this country, would have confidence in me as representing their special interests in that Government, that I would be true to their interests and would represent them faithfully as far as my abilities would enable me. From the day I entered that Cabinet until now, I have never forgotten the thoughts that occurred to me at the time my name was suggested. Let no one suppose that I entered it blindfolded; let no one suppose that I did not foresee the difficulties that loomed up before me, the cowardly attacks likely to be made upon me for political purposes. My only reason for entering the Cabinet, my only reason for remaining in it at present, is that, while, discharging my duties as a public man, and endeavoring to promote the peace and happiness of all classes so far as in my power lay, I might also specially benefit those whose interests it was my duty to advocate and to guard. Now, Sir, what treachery have I committed against the Irish people that I should be denounced by a newspaper because I did not fall in with a movement which called upon me to resign my seat on account of the unfortunate occurrences which followed the North-West rebellion. I committed no treason; I still believe that I was discharging my duty according to the well understood wishes of the large majority of those people whom I believe I represented; and I give you my word, Mr. Speaker, and I give the hon. gentleman opposite my word, that I have no desire to retain the position of honor and trust I hold now, one single hour longer than I can do so while enjoying the confidence of that people. If there is any fair and reasonable indication on the part of my Irish friends in this country that I no longer enjoy their confidence, without a word of complaint, without a regret at all, or feeling of disappointment, I will retire peacefully from the position I hold, and trust to my ability to earn the few crumbs that are necessary for my maintenance during the few days longer I may have to live. I represent the same constituency now for 25 years, and hon. gentlemen talk of my playing the part of a demagogue! No Irishman in my part of the country could have held that seat as I have held it—not because there were not Irishmen more able than I, more worthy of the confidence that has been reposed in me, but because circumstances were in my favor. I had been brought up in that county. My father before me did business in that county, and became associated with every French elector in that county, enjoyed the respect of the people. I came forward as a young man, grown up among the French people. It was the French people who elected me, not the Irish people, because the Irish people in my constituency, are a very small minority. Did I play the demagogue for the last twenty-five years in holding that constituency, even against candidates who were brought out against me from among the French people themselves? The question of nationality was raised by supporters of hon. gentleman opposite, and an opponent was selected from amongst the French residents, and the first time he appealed to the electors he said: I need no introduction to you, the blood that flows in my veins is the same blood which flows in your veins. You have been long enough represented by an Irishman, now is the time to show that you are worthy of the blood that flows in your veins and have a representative of your own. I answered that gentleman at a meeting of four or five hundred persons, among whom there were not forty-five English speaking electors, and I told him that I never knew how cowardly a man on that side of politics could be before. I said: You are addressing a purely French body of electors and you have not faith in your own nationality, and you are afraid to depend upon the sympathy which should properly exist between you and them in order to supplant you. You tell me now that an Irishman should not enjoy their confidence; I am proud of being an Irishman, and that as an Irishman I have been able to discharge my duties so well to the French electors in my county that I can come back with confidence and ask them to support me again. Well, Sir, I have always been proud to be able to say that I have never lost the confidence of the French people of that county, and they have continued to give me their support, notwithstanding the national appeals made against me. Therefore the attack that has been made upon me has no effect except to pain me to some extent. It is always painful when any man feels that he is trying to do what is best, that he is acting honestly, and still to be so misrepresented. I know this, that I have heard men make attacks upon me and impugn my motives, who knew in their hearts that they were making a cowardly and unjust attack, and they were doing it for paltry political purposes. I can assure the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) that the salary attached to the position of a public man is not so very tempting when he considers the slanders, the injustice and the unjust accusations to which he is liable, and which he cannot resent, as often I would like to resent it, in a more striking manner than in mere words. Now, with regard to this subject which has aroused the sympathies of hon. gentlemen opposite, with regard to that enthusiasm of which they boast when they wish to fly to the succor of every suffering people, and of every suffering class of people, I can only say what I said before, and repeat the saying of a man who had some experience, who had been deceived by a friend, and who said: "If he deceives me once, it is his fault; if he deceives me twice it is my fault." Hon. gentlemen opposite boast of their liberality. Let me remind them that they have proved false to their profession of liberality on more than one occasion. They talk of their love of freedom and fair play, and that it makes no difference to them what attitude the Catholics of this country may take with regard to them, because the Catholics know that they will get justice from the Liberal party whether they oppose them or not. These are fine sentiments, Mr. Speaker, in theory, but they do not tally with the practice of hon. gentlemen opposite. When they defeated the Government led by the present Premier in 1873, they knew that they had an Irishman in their ranks who had contributed to their victory and who, in point of ability and education was equal to their best man. They know that they were scarce in material in forming their Government, but scarce as they were of material—which was proved by the fact that they were obliged to go out of their ranks to fill up their Ministry—they were unable even then to extend to the Catholics that great, broad measure of justice to which the hon. gentleman just alluded. They refused to do justice to a distinguished Catholic who supported them, who had helped to bring them to power, to Mr. Anglin, who was a devoted follower of their own and as able as any man upon their side of the House; they had to exclude him because he was an Irish Catholic, and for no other reason. Now we are to be told that they alone can properly appreciate what belongs to true liberality and that they alone can give a fair distribution of justice to all classes and creeds in this country. I say that will not go down. I say more than that. If they will go back over their actions perhaps they will be able to see the error of their ways in the future; but I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that not only did they exclude one of their prominent supporters from the Government at that time because he was an Irish Catholic, but they knocked down every Irish Catholic they put in nomination in the Province of Ontario, and they put them up to use the fact in other constituencies. The proof is they have not brought an Irish Catholic to Parliament. They have failed to prove that liberality of which they have boasted so much to-night. I might also refer to another fact that is worthy of some notice. The hon. gentlemen, who have vied with each other to-night to prove that my attachment to my people and my interest in my people is not so warm and sympathetic as it ought to be, belong principally to the Province of Ontario. It strikes me as a remarkable circumstance that in that Provincial Legislature, which is controlled so thoroughly, fully and completely, by the Liberals, some resolution was not offered congratulating Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Parnell, the Irish people or at all events somebody. Why were they silent? Why has there never been a resolution moved in that Assembly? As I told a member of that body, who said it was the duty of this Parliament to speak out on this great question, that it was strange no motion had been passed by that Legislature, and until it had spoken as plainly as the Dominion Parliament, they should not dictate to us. I said: You have remained silent up to the present and have never uttered a single word of congratulation to Mr. Gladstone for his Home Rule measure. Still, unless we take any motion that the leader of the Opposition chooses to offer to this side of the House our motives are to be called in question. I say with regard to the question now before the House that my earnest endeavors have been to prevent a discussion which would weaken the hands of Mr. Gladstone himself, if he chooses to use what we placed in his hands in 1882, the solid vote of this Parliament in favor of the principle of Home Rule. I said I was afraid any attempt to deal with this question again might not result as favorably as it did on that occasion. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake)—I did not choose to interrupt him—I am sorry to say did not fairly represent me when he alluded to the reasons I gave for not complying with the request of the deputation sent from St. Patrick's Literary Association. He said after counting the House, after counting noses, I came to the conclusion that there might be three who would not vote, and therefore on account of those three I was afraid to submit a motion to the House. The hon. gentleman surely knows I did not make use of any such language. The hon. gentleman heard me correct the false report of what I did say which appeared in the Free Press; he heard me rise and put the member for South Grey right on that subject, who was misstating what I said for the reason of course that he was not in the House and did not hear my explanation before. But the member for West Durham did hear it. I did not say that it was on account of three members or that I had counted noses or anything of that kind; but I did say there was a probability that a division might take place and we might not succeed in getting the unanimous vote we had in 1882, and if not, it would be much better not to disturb that vote or break its effect before the country or weaken its power in the hands of those who might legitimately use it. I feel that in this Parliament we are not all agreed upon any subject that comes before us. I feel that on few questions can we get a unanimous vote; but I feel that the proposition I have made is one so reasonable that if a unanimous vote can be reached at all it will be on that motion, which asks this new Parliament to re-affirm what was expressed in 1882, and to express further than that, which my resolution does, the hope that the British Parliament may pass a measure granting Home Rule to Ireland, and thus remove the cause of discontent which has unfortunately existed in that country. The adoption of my motion by a unanimous vote of the House will strengthen the hands of Mr. Gladstone far more, and will be a greater endorsation of the policy of Home Rule than the motion of the hon. member for West Durham or that of the hon. member for North Wellington, who proposed an amendment, which simply means cutting off my resolution and tacking the amendment to the amendment to the motion of the hon. member for West Durham. I am glad to know that even the hon. member for West Durham in some things is open to correction. He is so perfect in his idea of things; he criticises the actions of every hon. member so closely, and is so severe upon those who fail to attain perfection in every subject, that it is somewhat of a relief to my mind to find that even the hon. gentleman has failed to know what it was necessary to move on this occasion in order to express the views of the House on the subject of Home Rule for Ireland, and it was only after the hon. member for North Wellington had brought his genius to bear, and used that eloquence for which he is so well known in this House, that the hon. member for West Durham was convinced that he did not know how to prepare the motion on this subject. My duty will be to sustain the motion I put before the House and to take the consequences of it, and to take those consequences honestly. I will not do, as the hon. member for West Durham has done, refer to personal matters. The hon. gentleman alluded to an occasion when he found me sitting on the back benches and that afterwards I came and sat on the front bench, when it was a question of resigning my seat in the Government. The hon. gentleman has made considerable capital out of the matter and has ridiculed me considerably before this House. It has been his special duty, added to those great duties that he performs so ably, to criticise every act of mine since Parliament has been called together, not only to criticise every act of mine, but to do so in the most ungenerous way; to catechise me and criticise every word I say in regard to the business of the Department over which I preside, as if it were his business to show that I was entirely unfit for the position I hold. Well, I do not overestimate my own abilities. I do not think that whatever faults I have that hon. gentlemen in this House will say that I am wanting in sufficient modesty to acknowledge my own deficiencies. But while it is true that I did take a seat upon the back benches, while it is true that the question of whether I should remain in the Government or not was unsettled for a short time, the hon. gentleman should not have criticised me too severely for that. The reasons which impelled me to take the course I did, in offering to withdraw from the Government, were reasons which were honorable to myself, were reasons which would be satisfactory to my people, if I could make them known; and the reasons which induced me to reverse the decision and retain my seat were equally honorable to myself and the leader of the Government who offered to make that arrangement with me. But the hon. gentleman was liable to be found changing seats also. There was a time when he reminded me of a school to which I used to go, where the rule was that only one boy should go out at a time. A board was placed next the door, and a boy on going out had to turn this board, to show whether he was in or out. At one period of the hon. gentleman's history it appears to me that a board like that would have been useful to his friends, to tell them his position. It is true the hon. gentleman has changed since that time. Although there have been some indications of a little dissatisfaction, of a little cross pulling between himself and his followers, still he has not gone out. Well, the position is different; he has at last become leader of the party, since he came back into public life, and he has taken the position which was filled with credit by the hon. gentleman whom he supplanted. I say since that time he is not so restless; he has not gone in and out so often, although I daresay he feels sometimes as he did on an occasion not long ago, when he found himself and his party were divided on a question on which they thought they could ride into power, and I daresay on that occasion he thought of his old habit of playing in and out. But being the leader, the same reasons did not exist. I daresay he did not feel comfortable amongst his own followers, to serve under any man as leader, and I think that was one of the reasons why he was so discontented—that he had to serve under another leader, and he is now more contented because he has the leadership in his own hands. I will vote against any amendment that may be proposed in order to reach my own motion. I believe that my motion will recommend itself to a majority of this House, and I think it will meet the reasonable expectations of every man who wishes to see harmony in this country as well as Ireland, which is the subject of our discussion to-night.

An hon. MEMBER. Harmony and peace on that side of the House, you mean.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Well, the harmony and peace we secure on this side. We do not know all the little differences that occur on that side. We have not the means of prying into secrets which were used in olden times to get the secrets of this side of the House. We do not intend to stoop to such means; but if we may judge by appearances there is room for a little of that kind of thing over there, and if I do not mistake it will give them all they can do to harmonise the differences which have occurred between certain gentlemen in their own party. I take the full responsibility of voting against any proposition made against the motion which I agreed to move in amendment of the motion made by the leader of the Opposition. I will not take the decision of the member for South Grey as to whether I represent the Irish element or not or any portion of it. I will not take the decision of the hon. leader of the Opposition as to whether I am doing that which I ought to do as an Irishman to strengthen the hands of my Irish friends who are advocating Home Rule. But if the day should come that it appears to the people most interested in this question that they have reason to believe I have failed in the proper discharge of my duty, I will pay the penalty of not having their confidence any longer by tendering my resignation. That is the proof I will give, when there is reason for them to believe that I no longer enjoy their confidence, and if the hon. gentlemen will make the same proposition and carry it out honestly the Reform ranks would be thinned wonderfully in this House.

Desaulniers (Maskn'gé),

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE. However deeply I may regret, Sir, that the Commons of Canada should have decided to speak with a voice so vague and ineffective, and to add so slight an impulse to the movement I was hoping to advance, it is yet for me to consider what is the best use that can be made of that vague and ineffective voice and that slight impulse. The resolution we are to substitute for the original resolution is a simple expression of our opinion, to lie upon our journals. Weak and inadequate as it is, it is still better that it should do some good; and I therefore move to add to the motion, as amended, the words following:—

And that a copy of the resolution be communicated forthwith by Mr. Speaker to Mr. Gladstone.

Sir JOHN A MACDONALD. I object to this amendment simply on the plain ground that it is in direct contravention to the resolution we have just passed. It is in effect an address.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I object to it on another ground. I think it is unworthy of the dignity of this House that we should append to a resolution such as we have passed a message requiring you as the Speaker of this House, to communicate it even to such a distinguished individual as Mr. Gladstone; and if by doing so, as I have no doubt my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition desires, we should give encouragement to his proposition for Home Rule for Ireland in the sense in which he has denunciated it, I demur to it on that ground also, as totally dissenting from any such proposition.

Mr. MITCHELL. I support it on this ground, that inasmuch as the minority of this House, who I believe will find their action endorsed by a majority in the country, have failed to get such a resolution as would fairly express in the strongest terms our approval of Home Rule for Ireland, and secure the greatest amount of good, I believe our next duty is to put the resolution adopted by this House into such a shape that the man who stands foremost in the world today, and is endeavoring to give Ireland the benefit of self-government, shall have his hands strengthened in every way in which we can do it; and I have much pleasure in seconding the resolution.

Mr. MILLS. The position the hon. First Minister has taken on this resolution shows very clearly to the House and the country what are his real feelings on this subject. It is well known that hon. gentlemen opposite are not sincere advocates of the principle of Home Rule. It is well known that the hon. leader of the Government has again and again declared himself against the principle of federation, against the principle of local self-government, and in favor of a legislative union. But those hon. gentlemen have not the courage of their convictions. While they profess to favor Home Rule, they propose a resolution that is addressed to nobody. Now, Sir, when my hon. friend proposes that that resolution should be sent to the Prime Minister of England, who is struggling with the aristocratic classes there to maintain the rights of the people of Ireland, then these hon. gentlemen say: We shall not consent that that resolution shall be sent to

Mr. Gladstone; we shall not consent that it shall be put into the hands of the man who is seeking to confer that benefit on the people of Ireland; but we will leave it on the journals of our House; if the Irish people of Canada attack us we will say, we voted in favor of this resolution; and if our Orange friends are disposed to attack us for voting for Home Rule, we will say, it is true, we attempted to conciliate a section of our followers by voting for that resolution, but we refused to forward it to Mr. Gladstone, because we did not intend that it should be of the slightest service to the people of Ireland.

Mr. COUGHLIN. I crave the attention of this House for a few moments. I beg to propose a resolution, and I ask the followers of Sir John A. Macdonald to back me up:

That a copy of this resolution be sent to Mr. Parnell.

The Irish people to-day owe this movement to Mr. Parnell. We would not be here to-night voting for this resolution if it had not been for the noble exertions of that noble man. If any credit is due to any person for the position of the question to-day, it is due to Mr. Parnell; and I ask my hon. friends on this side of the House to back me on this resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is moved by Mr. Coughlin to strike out the word "Gladstone" and insert the word "Parnell."

Mr. BLAKE. I should have been very glad if the hon. gentleman had proposed to add the words "and Mr. Parnell" to the words of the resolution; and I should have cordially acceded to that, recognising as I do the great services that Mr. Parnell has rendered to the cause of Home Rule. But at this moment I think it is the hands of Mr. Gladstone that want strenghtening, and I am not going to vote to strike out the name of Mr. Gladstone in order to substitute that of Mr. Parnell.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think it is well that the First Minister, at any rate, has thrown off the mask, and has shown us clearly and distinctly, what all of us who know him know, that he has no sympathy for Ireland, and no more sympathy for Home Rule in Ireland than he has for Home Rule in Canada. The hon. gentleman has been plotting, since the time he was sworn in as First Minister of Canada, against the Local Governments of this country. We know, Sir, that but for Sir George Cartier, when he was sent to England as a delegate some nineteen years ago, he would have misused and abused the power put into his hands to deprive us of our local liberties, and, Sir, now, thrown off his guard for a moment, he cannot help showing his real sentiments. He cannot help showing as far as lies in him that even this emasculated and miserable resolution, which the Minister of Inland Revenue, I regret to say, has allowed himself to be made a tool of to have placed on our journals ——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman should not use that word.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, Sir, if you rule that to say that one Minister is the tool of another is out of order, I will withdraw that in deference to your ruling. I maintain my own opinion as to the use that has been made of the hon. gentleman by the First Minister on this particular occasion, as before: Sir, the hon. gentleman's resolution, I do not doubt in the least from the verbiage of it, has been conceived in the brain, if not traced by the hand of the First Minister; and Sir, if there could be a more contemptible, a more ridiculous, a more absurd proposition placed before this House, after formally passing a resolution—which if it has any meaning or object, if there is any conceivable sense in it, must be intended for the purpose of strengthening Mr. Gladstone in the struggle againt great odds that he is now maintaining, for the bestowal of Home Rule upon Ireland —it is the refusal to adopt the sensible proposal of my hon. friend beside me, that that resolution should be sent to Mr. Gladstone. What position shall we be in —what attitude shall we assume—if it turns out that we are bold enough to pass a resolution here, but are not bold enough to send it where alone it would be of use—that we have dared to put it on our journals, but do not dare to communicate it to the Imperial House? For my own part, I say that we, as British subjects, have got a good right to advise the Empire on all points of Imperial policy such as this. There are greater issues contained in this question than the mere question of Home Rule for Ireland. From this will spring other results. I believe that one result which will spring from this will be that in substance, within a few years, the English people will have to adopt a system somewhat similar to that which we have here; because I believe that this doctrine of Home Rule cannot be applied to Ireland alone, that, in all human probability, there is comprised in it a Federate Parliament for the British Isles, and probably for the British Empire. It may be something more than that; it may be an alliance, if not a federation, of the whole British race, and it is because I believe the interest of the whole British Empire and British race depends to a large extent of doing away with these just causes of complaint which the Irish people have long had, that I am prepared to support my hon. friend's motion. But in any case, let us not commit the miserable absurdity of putting a resolution on our journals and yet not daring to communicate it to the Imperial Government.

Mr. McNEILL. There is no question of daring in the matter.

Mr. BURNS. No doubt, in a very few minutes, the action this House has taken will be cabled across the Atlantic, and not only Mr. Gladstone but everybody else in the British Islands will be aware of the action we have taken. I am in sympathy with the amendment of the hon. member for Middlesex, and I will support it. My reason is that the position of affairs to-day, as regards Ireland, is due to the action of Mr. Parnell as much as to the action of Mr. Gladstone. Year after year the Irish people, under various leaders, struggled to obtain something like independence, and of late years Mr. Parnell has led them to what may be called victory. In 1882, when this Parliament passed resolutions and sent them to Mr. Gladstone, we know what action Mr. Gladstone and his Government took. At that time, he and his associates with him were not disposed to listen to the advice offered them by Canada, but now, when Mr. Gladstone is brought face to face with the difficulty, when he finds that Ireland has returned an almost unanimous representation on the principle of Home Rule, he, in order to strengthen his hands, seeks the advice and sympathy of those whose sympathy and advice he repelled in times gone-bye. To Mr. Parnell is due more than to Mr. Gladstone the present position of affairs, and therefore I will vote for the amendment.

Mr. CURRAN. I have great pleasure in supporting the amendment of my hon. friend from Middlesex. I hear, on the other side of the House, a great many jeering remarks, but I want to say that, for my part, I look upon the sturdy perseverance with which Mr. Parnell has conducted his campaign, as being the cause of bringing Mr. Gladstone to the position he occupies, and if we are to give cheers, let us cheer the people who have done the fighting.

Mr. MITCHELL. I feel it is necessary to state the reason why I am going to support the amendment. I will support it, not because I think it is the best thing to be done in order to secure what the statesmen of England and Ireland are trying to secure for Ireland, but because it it the only thing open for us to do, after we have passed the resolution. This amendment is not in accordance with the dignity of the House, after having given expression to the opinions we have expressed, as to what the feelings and sentiments of this Parliament are upon the great question which is agitating our friends on the other side, but as this House, under the leadership of the right hon. gentleman, has chosen to refuse to send the resolution to Mr. Gladstone and to refuse to send the address to Her Majesty, as, while endorsing the sentiment he refuses to countenance its transmission, the proposition to send the resolution of the House to Mr. Parnell will receive my support. I have great satisfaction in endorsing what has been said about Mr. Parnell. He deserves every credit from his co-nationalists. By his perseverance, resolution and determination, he has done more than ordinary men could do, and I am pleased to be able to speak of him as I have, but to send the resolution to him alone, and not to Mr. Gladstone, is not in accordance with what I believe to be the true dignity of Parliament and the position of Canada.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I have always objected to giving too much prominence to this question as a political question, either on this or the other side of the Atlantic. Hon. gentlemen have attacked and ridiculed me for presuming to send a cablegram to Mr. Parnell, and questioned my right to do so; they have questioned the importance of such a message coming from me on behalf of the Irish representatives of this House. I say this, that I objected to the address for the reasons I gave. I still hold that the Irish people at home and here are in doubt as to whether Mr. Parnell will approve of the measure before Parliament, as we may learn, in 10 or 15 days, that the measure proposed by Mr. Gladstone will be pronounced unsuitable for the Irish people by the men who have been fighting the battle from the first. In that case what position would we be in? I do not presume to go in advance of Mr. Parnell, but I am willing this House should convey, in the speediest manner possible, to Mr. Gladstone, to the leader of the Opposition, and to Mr. Parnell the hero of the struggle, the message stating what has taken place.

Mr. McNEILL. I cannot support the amendment to send this resolution, the expression of this House in favor of some measure of Home Rule, to the gentleman who said that he never would have taken off his coat to go to this work had he not expected by so doing to sever the last link between Ireland and England. So far as the other proposition is concerned, since Mr. Gladstone has told us in the most explicit manner to mind our own business, I will not support the proposal now made to send a resolution of sympathy to him when he feels himself in some difficulty.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). By the action of the House to-night——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I have kept very quiet and have interfered with no one, and I am only going to speak for a few moment. It looks, by the action of the House to-night, as if the people of Canada were unanimously in favor of Home Rule. I say it is not so. I say there are a large number of people in Canada who are not in favor of Home Rule. A large number of the Irish people are not favorable to Home Rule. Many gentleman have said to-night that they come from Ireland; well, I think I know a little about Ireland, and I contend that the people of Ireland, as they are governed to-day, will be more contented than they will after they get Home Rule, if they do get it. I am opposed to this House interfering directly or indirectly with the British people. Let them pass their own laws without any interference from us. I am opposed to every motion made, and shall vote against every motion made, no matter from which side of the House it comes.

Mr. CASEY. I think the remarks of the leader of the House on this proposition were particularly unfortunate. They will be regarded by everybody in this country as indicating that the hon. gentleman preferred to risk the utility of the resolution which we are about to pass, to risk its having no effect at all rather than to appear to add anything to the strength of a party leader who is opposed to him in politics. Everyone will believe, Irish people and those of all other nationalities, that the hon. gentleman's opposition to the amendment is dictated by a petty jealousy of the party leader in England. The motion of the hon. member for North Middlesex (Mr. Coughlin) is objectionable for the reason stated by my hon. friend the leader. If you are going to send it to anybody, you must send it to the person who has control of the Government. You must send it to headquarters. If you do not send it to the Queen direct, you must send it to the leader of the Government. I should be very happy to see it sent to Mr. Parnell also, as suggested by my leader. I agree with the eulogies which have been passed upon Mr. Parnell, as a statesman and as a manager of his party. I am willing that he should have the compliment paid him, and should be willing, as my leader said, to have his name added; and I should not have any great objection to the suggestion of the Minister of Inland Revenue that it should be sent to all three representatives of parties in the English House of Commons.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. CASEY. Excuse me, I lead nobody and these are my personal opinions. I have no objection to its being sent to the leader of the Opposition as well as to the other two, but I wish to urge upon the hon. member for North Middlesex to consider the position in which he is placing his friends and the friends of Home Rule by proposing to strike out the name of Mr. Gladstone. Surely, if Mr. Parnell deserves to have it sent to him, and it can only be a compliment in his case, because he is not the leader of a Government or even a member of a Government. The leader of the Government of England, who is sacrificing so much and risking so much to carry out the views of Mr. Parnell, deserves to have it sent to him also. Surely my hon. friend does not wish to do this of his own desire. Surely it must have been put in his hands by somebody.

Mr. COUGHLIN. No, it was not.

Mr. CASEY. I accept the hon. gentleman's denial. Surely then he will accept the suggestion of his friend and leader the Minister of Inland Revenue, and will accept at all events his proposition or something else rather than the bald proposal to strike out the name of Gladstone and put in the name of Parnell. He will see, when he thinks it over, that he is putting himself and his friends and the cause of Home Rule in a very peculiar position.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not intend to notice the speech of the hon. gentleman from South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), or his remarks respecting myself. I have heard a good deal from him before, and have treated it in the same way as I do now, with contemptuous silence The reason why I shortly objected to sending the resolution to Mr. Gladstone was that the whole of these resolutions, not only the resolution which was carried, but the original resolution moved by the hon. gentleman opposite, the amendment of my hon. friend, and the amendment to the amendment, will be sent by cable to England and known everywhere in England, by Mr. Gladstone, by Mr. Parnell, and by the leaders of the Opposition in both Houses, tomorrow. Therefore it would avoid the appearance of in fact sending an address to Mr. Gladstone instead of to Her Majesty. The information will go to England, it will have its effect in England completely and fully, and it will not have its full effect unless all the resolutions voted this evening should be sent at the same time. I have no objection that a resolution should be adopted and added that this resolution and the other resolutions on the same question voted upon shall be transmitted to the three gentlemen mentioned by my hon. friend.

Mr. BLAKE. That is not in order.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Not just now.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of Mr. Coughlin.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Lost.

Mr. BLAKE. Yeas and nays.

Mr. COUGHLIN. I will withdraw it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. You cannot withdraw it.

Amendment negatived.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I mentioned a little while ago that I would propose certain amendments, but it has been suggested to me, in order to avoid the appearance of partisanship, that I had better substitute the following motion; I therefore beg leave to move:

That all the words after the word "following" be struck out, and the following be inserted: And that a copy of this resolution be transmitted by the Speaker to the Speaker of the House of Commons in England.

Mr. BLAKE. This is another way of making the House speak with a dumb voice. This question arose with reference to the proper form of action in another assembly, an enquiry was made, and the result of the enquiry was that the Speaker of the House of Commons, in England, was deemed to have no authority to communicate to the House resolutions so transmitted to him. You, Sir, in the Chair, I think, will confirm that statement, so that if my motion is amended, as the hon. gentleman proposes, he will have accomplished his object. His object is to get rid of any communication across the water. He so stated. He said: We don't want to communicate. He then suggested that we should communicate to the Marquis of Salisbury the defeated motion, after he had found difficulty in the first place. Now he proposes we should communicate it to the person who will have no authority to communicate it to the House of Commons of England at all. It is an ingenious device to accomplish the objects of nullifying, as far as possible, the feeble effects of the resolution. I hope the House will not adopt that device, and I ask you to say whether I am not correct in that statement.

Mr. SPEAKER. The Speaker has no power or authority to communicate it to the House. A communication like this was sent to me from the British Columbia Legislature, and I simply sent it to the Prime Minister as a private communication.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no doubt that the Speaker of the House of Commons in England will take the same course you did. He will take steps to give it full publicity in England.

Mr. BLAKE. Why should he not send it to Mr. Gladstone directly.

Mr. MITCHELL. It looks very much like an attempt to burk the expression of opinion in this House. It is not only likely to result in the failure of the object of this discussion but it will bring discredit and disgrace upon the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. CURRAN. I have no desire that the expression of opinion by this House should remain, even by implication, a dead letter. We know very well that the proceedings of this House will be telegraphed immediately to England, and if communicating it to the Speaker would be the best means of making it known, I would be in favor of doing so. In accordance with the expressed desire of all the organs who have spoken on the subject of Home Rule, if the leader of the Opposition had brought a direct motion in favor of Mr. Gladstone's position in the first instance, I should have supported it.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I wish there may be no misunderstanding about this. I stated, before the hon. gentleman moved to add some words to the resolution, that I was willing that we should take such steps as would secure the intelligence of the action of this House being placed before the persons most interested. The hon. gentleman moved that it be sent to Mr. Gladstone, and, my hon. friend from Middlesex (Mr. Coughlin) was anxious that Mr. Parnell should also be communicated with. I stated then that I thought we might solve the difficulty by communicating it to the three leaders in the House of Commons, so that there may not be any party significance given to it, and I state now that if the channel which the right hon. gentleman has indicated, that is the Speaker of the House of Commons, is one that will, without doubt, answer the purpose, I am willing to accept it. But you, Mr. Speaker, indicate that there is a doubt, and that it might not reach the House of Commons through the Speaker. I do not want any doubt about it.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. COSTIGAN. No, the hon. gentleman need not say "hear, hear." The House of Commons having pronounced upon this question, there ought to be no bickering about the final steps to be taken now. I am willing to adopt any reasonable mode by which we can place this resolution before the people and Parliament of Great Britain, so that Mr. Gladstone shall have an opportunity of knowing what we have done, and that the leader of the English Opposition may also know, as well as Mr. Parnell. Mr. Speaker has questioned the competence of the House of Commons in England to communicate any message except through this House.

Mr. BLAKE. Then you had better persuade your leader to withdraw the motion.

Mr. THOMPSON. It seems to me the uneasiness manifested as to this resolution being known by those interested in this question is altogether misplaced. The House knows from the passage I read in the English Hansard this evening that on 1st May, 1882, before any official communication had reached Mr. Gladstone or the Colonial Office in London the proceedings of this House had not only appeared in the London Times but had been read in Mr. Gladstone's presence in the House of Commons. I undertake to say that before the news can be officially communicated by the officers of this House the proceedings of this afternoon will not only be published in London, but will be known to every member of the House of Commons, and therefore, the question of how we shall officially communicate is not one of essential importance.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman like other hon. gentlemen opposite this evening has declared that we do not want to communicate this resolution to anyone.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentlemen and also the First Minister have declared that on account of the despatch of Earl Kimberley it would be beneath the dignity of this House to communicate with Her Majesty. The hon. gentleman is afraid of sacrificing the dignity of Parliament by communicating anything to the Queen, and so when it was proposed to communicate the resolution to the Prime Minister of England, the Prime Minister of this country said we will not communicate the resolution to the Prime Minister, and he proposes to communicate it, to whom? To the Speaker, who cannot make known the communication officially to anyone. Hon. gentlemen object to communicate with the Prime Minister because it is beneath the dignity of this House to communicate with him. That is the only reason given. While hon. gentlemen opposite refuse to have a communication sent direct to the Prime Minister they wish to save our dignity by having the Speaker of the British House of Commons, after receiving the communication, communicate it to the Prime Minister, if he chooses. Of course, the hon. gentleman is proceeding on the assumption that he will choose to do so. That is the way the hon. gentleman proposes to get out of the difficulty, and I am sure the hon. gentleman's followers must be very highly pleased indeed with the demonstration made on this question this evening.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). It seems to me that this matter is really becoming a burlesque. Perhaps some hon. gentlemen wish to make it such, but I desire if possible to bring the House back to a sense of its own dignity. It seems to me it is entirely inconsistent with the dignity of this House that it should condescend to send any resolution it may pass to any individual or in any other way than by the usual and constitutional usage. It is entirely inconsistent with the dignity of the House that we should pass a resolution and add a rider that it should be sent to Tom, Dick or Harry.

Mr. BLAKE. His name is William Ewart.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). Whether it is to Mr. Gladstone or Mr. Parnell or anybody else, so far as this Parliament are concerned they are Tom, Dick and Harry. We are degrading ourselves and losing sight of our dignity by sending the resolution to anyone or communicating anything except in a proper and constitutional manner. I trust any resolution communicating what we have done to-day will not be sent to anyone.

Mr. BLAKE. Let us expunge the resolution then.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). For all practical purposes I think the resolution might he expunged. In other words, the whole thing is buncomb. I think the leader of the Opposition in moving the resolution moved it as a buncomb resolution for the purpose of catching or strengthening his hold on the Irish Catholic people of Ontario, and the whole discussion from beginning to end has been conducted with that view, possibly by both sides of the House. I have no hesitation in saying so. It is all buncomb.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think it is an order for an hon. member to refer to a resolution of the House in that way.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I did not understand the resolution was yet passed.

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. I think the hon. gentleman voted for it.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). If it is unparliamentary to declare that what the House has done is buncomb, I withdraw the expression. I have no desire to offend against the rules of the House even by telling what every hon. member knows is the solemn truth. We know the discussion is conducted with this point in view, and that the leader of the Opposition who has expressed strong sympathy with his fellow Irishmen on moving this motion had an ulterior object in view.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I have not finished my sentence. I was going on to say that the hon. gentleman had an ulterior object in view of increasing that popularity in which the Irishmen of the country esteem him. I think that is parliamentary. I have no hesitation in saying that I believe the principal reason why my friend brought forward this motion and raised the discussion to-night has been a desire and expectation that the Irish Catholic vote will be influenced by this discussion.

Mr. MITCHELL. You said that before.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). The hon. gentleman says I said that before. I think the hon. gentleman's observation and his votes too have been very largely influenced by the fact that there is a large Irish element in his constituency.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). To come back in all seriousness as to the right or propriety of transmitting the proceedings of this House to any other than a duly constituted assembly, or to Her Majesty, and that we should condescend to send them to individuals, even if they happened to be the leader of the British Government, or the leader of the Irish party.

Mr. MITCHELL. Half a loaf is better than no bread.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). The public effect of the announcement, if it is deserving of any, will be given for what it is worth, and I think it is better to let the matter rest there.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria).

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. After your strong expression of opinion, Sir, I will withdraw my amendment.

Amendment to the amendment withdrawn.

Mr. MILLS. I beg leave to move in amendment to the amendment to add the name of Charles Stuart Parnell, M.P.

Mr. THOMPSON. I would suggest, inasmuch as hon. gentlemen opposite have not been willing to accede to the proposition of the Minister of Inland Revenue that the resolution should be communicated to the leaders of the various parties in the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, Oh.

Mr. THOMPSON. I say that hon. gentlemen have manifested an unwillingness to do that, and there is no use in hon. gentlemen signifying their dissent. I will suggest as a motion, I will move in the event of this not being carried, that the resolutions be communicated to the Colonial Secretary.

Mr. BLAKE. After that statement, and the reason for it, I will state why I could not give my assent to this resolution being sent by the Parliament of Canada to the Marquis of Salisbury. The reason is that the Marquis of Salisbury is himself a bitter opponent of Home Rule in Parliament.

Mr. THOMPSON. He is leader of the Opposition.

Mr. BLAKE. Not in the House of Commons, and I suppose the leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons entertains the view of the leader of the Opposition in the House of Lords. On the 15th of April the Marquis of Salisbury expressed his views on this question, and he said:

"Home Rule, which a year ago was a chimera, has suddenly become a burning question. It needs no apology from us if, in presence of so great a calamity threatening our nation, we put aside all minor differences and join hands to defend that which is equally precious to us all."

A little later he said:

"Now this is, I hope, the commencement of a great many meetings which will take place in various parts of England. I hope, in the first instance, that these meetings will rouse up the people to study and appreciate the terrible gravity of the problem placed before them, and to resist this tremendous change in the constitution of their country. But I hope that such meetings will rouse them to do something."

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Hear, hear.

Mr. BLAKE. That is the view of the hon. member for Hastings.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. And that is the reason he would like to have the resolution sent to the Marquis of Salisbury and Sir Michael Hicks-Beach. The Marquis of Salisbury said further:

"My belief is that the future Government of Ireland does not involve any such unmanageable difficulty, for the people of this country will be true to the Empire to which they belong. (Loud cheers.) We want a wise, firm, continuous administration of the law. (Cheers.) But you must support it, or it will not take place. We want a steady policy—that no considerations of weariness or difficulty at Westminster, that no considerations attaching to the manifold ties of party government under which we live, shall drive aside from its strong course the policy upon which the people of England have decided. It is not enough for them to decide it. They must watch over it when it is decided; they must, by their constant and steady support, by the overwhelming force of their will, sweep away this body of resistance which has hitherto, at Westminster, prevented anything like a steady, or constant, or wholesome policy for Ireland (cheers); for this matter, believe me, does not concern Ireland alone. There is a great responsibility upon you, and it will be a terrible thing if, through your weakness, the Irish people are abandoned to the anarchy under which assuredly they will fall. But there is something more which you, as owners of a vast Empire extending to the ends of the earth, must consider before you take this fatal step downwards to which your rulers are inviting you now. There has been a great contest between England and the discontented portions of the Irish people. It is a contest that has lasted through many generations past, through many vicissitude, and now you are asked to submit to a measure which is placed before you, and to end the contest by a complete and ignominious surrender."

Again he said:

"Your course is watched all over the world; if you consent to this great capitulation; if you mark it with these last signs of disgrace, that you abandoned those whom you induced to fight for you; if, like the Russian traveller, you lighten your sledge for your own flight by throwing out your defenders to the wolves, believe me that it will not be a mere sentimental punishment that you will suffer. Your enemies in every part of the world will be looking on what you do with exultation. Your friends, your supporters, your partisans will view it with shame, with confusion and with dismay, in every quarter of the globe."

And the Minister of Inland Revenue proposes that we should send the resolutions to the Marquis of Salisbury.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down has given the very strongest possible reason why, from his standpoint, this resolution should be sent to the gentleman he mentioned. If in 1882 it was necessary to send the resolution to a Parliament which was hostile to Home Rule, in order to persuade those who are not so forward then, as they are now, it is from the hon. gentleman's own standpoint doubly necessary to express the opinion of this Parliament to the very able and very influential gentleman who does not happen to be so far forward as the leader of the Opposition in his Home Rule principles.

Mr. THOMPSON. Lest it should be supposed that I was proposing by what I said that I would move hereafter that the resolution should be sent to the three leaders, I wish to say that my statement was that if the amendment should not be adopted my motion will be to transmit the resolutions to the Secretary of State for the Colonies.

Mr. COSTIGAN. One remark in reply to the hon. leader of the Opposition. With regard to the Marquis of Salisbury he says that because that gentleman has expressed strong opinions against Home Rule we should not communicate the resolution to him, as it would only strengthen the hands of those who are opposed to Home Rule. I say that we should send the motion to the leader of the Opposition, because I think we should send it to enemies as well as to the friends of Home Rule. I voted against the motion to exclude Mr. Gladstone's name and substitute Mr. Parnell's alone, in the expectation of having an opportunity of having Mr. Parnell's name added to Mr. Gladstone's.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am opposed to sending any address to Mr. Parnell, and I shall vote against it no matter in what shape or form it may come up. I think I can give a very good reason for so doing by reading an extract from Mr. Gladstone's opinion about Mr. Parnell and his dealings with the Home Rule question given not long since. He said:

"Mr. Parnell has never uttered one word of disapproval or misgiving about the assassination literature of America, maintained by a knot of Irishmen who are not ashamed to point out how the ships of Her Majesty's navy ought to be blown into the air, and how gentlemen that they are pleased to select ought to be made the object of the knife of the assassin. You know that there have been some attempts of that kind made in this country. You have heard of the explosion of dynamite in Salford. Mr. Parnell said that occurrence appeared to him to bear the character of a practical joke."

I certainly shall not, sitting here in my place in this Parliament, vote to send a resolution to Mr. Parnell, who has thus been characterised, and I believe truly characterised, by Mr. Gladstone, for reasons now apparent to us all. I would also refuse to send it to Mr. Gladstone for this reason. I think our sending it to him would be, as the leader of the Opposition desired by his resolution, an approval of the measure submitted by Mr. Gladstone for the consideration of the Imperial Parliament. While I am in favor of a fair and reasonable scheme of Home Rule, which will secure the rights of the minority as well as the majority of the people of Ireland, I am not in favor, and I do not believe the majority of the people of Canada are in favor, of handing the minority over to the majority, and bringing about a worse state of things than existed before. I do not believe Mr. Gladstone's Bill is one that will be accepted by the people of Ireland. I believe it is accepted merely as a step in the direction of separation by the people who are advocating separation. I have good proof of that. I will read an extract from T. P. O'Connor's letter to the London Times, in which he speaks in very distinct terms of the measure Mr. Gladstone has presented to Parliament. He says:

"To tax Ireland for Imperial purposes and give Ireland no voice in Imperial affairs"——

That is the proposition in Mr. Gladstone's measure.—

Mr. MITCHELL. That is changed.

Mr. McCARTHY. Pardon me, it is not changed. The only change is the dropping of the Land Bill, but this has not been changed, and there will not be any change in so vital a principle of Mr. Gladstone's measure.—

"would be taxation without representation in a very aggravated form, and would be calculated to make the Empire odious instead of dear to the Irish people."

That is the measure now submitted, and that is the measure which Mr. Parnell has accepted as an instalment; but I think we all know that it is accepted with the view of carrying out the scheme Mr. Parnell has pursued for years, and has never attempted to deny, that is, the separation of Ireland and the dismemberment of the Empire. For these reasons I am opposed to sending this resolution to Mr. Parnell, and I am also opposed to sending it to Mr. Gladstone. I am not willing to go further than the House has gone in approving of a measure of Home Rule which is fair to all classes.

Mr. CURRAN. I very much regret that the last speaker should have read the statement made by Mr. Gladstone about Mr. Parnell. I am equally sorry that the hon. leader of the Opposition should have given the effusion that he gave from another English statesman. I do not think any great good can be done by the reading of these extracts from speeches. I think anyone who has read Irish history knows that there is scarcely a British statesman who has not said things which, after consideration, he will not sincerely regret. I have stated to-night that, just as Mr. Gladstone has changed his opinion from what it was when he put Mr. Parnell into prison, so I am satisfied that with the progress of ideas, and the change that will take place in the political atmosphere, we shall find the gentleman who made the speech alluded to by the hon. leader of the Opposition, changing his views and his policy. I believe, however, that we ought now really to try to get a solution of this question, as has been aptly said, to-night. It is not merely to the friends of Home Rule that we wish to communicate the views of the Parliament of Canada, but we wish to let every man whose opinion is worth influencing, know exactly what the state of opinion in the Dominion of Canada is. Therefore, I hope the hon. gentlemen will accept the suggestion to add this other name, and that this discussion will end by a unanimous vote on the subject.

House divided on amendment of Mr. Mills.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. THOMPSON. I made a suggestion a few moments ago as to a channel through which I thought this resolution might be communicated without any objection and without any loss of dignity. Since then it has been suggested that it would be desirable to have a more immediate and public communication on the matter. I therefore beg to move in amendment to substitute these words:

That the resolution be transmitted forthwith by the Speaker to the High Commissioner for Canada "——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am very glad that my motion seems to meet with very good humored approval by hon. members on the other side of the House; but I am afraid if they will allow me to finish reading it, that they will not be so well pleased.

"for the information of the members of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom."

Mr. COOK. For the information of the Minister of Justice I would inform him that the High Commissioner is the gentleman who has no confidence in the breed.

Mr. CASEY. The Minister of Justice says this is in order to obtain more immediate transmission of the resolution to the parties whom it concerns. Instead of sending it to the First Minister of Great Britain for the information of the House of Commons, he wishes to send it to the High Commissioner of Canada for the information of the British House of Commons. Sir Charles Tupper is a very great man, and in the estimation of the Minister of Justice he is a peculiarly great man. The Minister of Justice owes his position in the Cabinet and many other things to him, but to ask us to believe that Sir Charles Tupper has greater facilities for communicating this resolution to the House of Commons than has the First Minister of England is an absurdity. I believe the Minister of Justice claims to be Irish to some extent. By proposing this motion, he has only shown his capacity for committing a most stupendous Irish bull.

Mr. CURRAN.

Mr. ORTON. I wish to explain why I have, upon every occasion on which a vote has been taken in this House with reference to communicating with Mr. Gladstone, opposed the proposition. It is because I feel that as Canadians we ought to uphold the dignity of the country, and I feel it is wrong for the Parliament of Canada to communicate in any way with Mr. Gladstone, who replied to our communication sent him in 1882 by a direct insult. We had the right to appeal to the Throne of Great Britain, but in consequence of the advice of Mr. Gladstone, our appeal was received with a reproof. I have great pleasure in supporting the Minister of Justice, because it is a direct compliment to our representative in Great Britain, and an assertion of our own dignity.

Mr. BLAKE. The Minister of Justice in behalf of the Government, which, a little while ago, declared, through the mouth of the leader of the Government, that they were opposed to any communication whatever, is now so anxious there should be direct and immediate communication, that he proposes to facilitate the immediate communication which, at the beginning of the discussion, was thought objectionable, by a process which rather seems to be based on the belief in the old proverb that "the longest way round is the shortest way home." The most prompt way of communicating the resolution to the English House of Commons would be to communicate it to the leader of that House, but the hon. gentleman thinks he will get nearer and quicker to the House by communicating to Sir Charles Tupper who has not yet obtained a seat in that body, which some newspapers declared he was seeking. How then is he going to communicate it to the members of the House? By issuing circular letters, each containing a copy of the despatch, to the members, so that each member will find it in his box at the post office? Is that the way each individual member is to receive our communication from the High Commissioner? This is only another proof of the secret feelings of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. LANDERKIN. If this is to be cabled to the High Commissioner, let it be made "collect."

House divided on amendment of Mr. Thompson.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it is well now that we should know what course is to be taken by the High Commissioner in London when he receives this document.

Mr. SPEAKER. There is nothing before the Chair.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is rather too late to discuss the subject now, but I think the Government ought to give the matter their serious attention, and direct the Commissioner how he will communicate it to the members of Parliament.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 4:30 a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 7th May, 1886.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FRANCHISE ACT—FEES IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved that the House will, on Tuesday next, resolve itself into Committee to take into consideration the following resolution:—

That inasmuch as, in view of the extension of the electoral franchise to the North-West Territories, and of the remoteness of certain portions of the said Territories, it may appear that the allowances for fees and disbursements provided by section one hundred and twenty-six of "The Dominion Elections Act, 1874," will be inadequate or insufficient for a fair and just but economical remuneration for the services performed, the Governor in Council may make a tariff of fees, costs and expenses, based, as nearly as may be, on the tariff of fees, costs and expenses in the said section set forth, to be paid and allowed to Returning Officers and other persons employed at or with respect to elections under the Act respecting the representation, in the Parliament of Canada, of the North-West Territories, and may, from time to time, revise and amend such tariff; and that a copy of every such tariff, and of every amendment thereof, shall be laid before the House of Commons at the then next Session thereof.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. HAGGART. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to make a personal explanation. When the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) was moving his amendment the other evening, he stated that I had been an applicant for some coal lands in the North-West, and that I had urged the granting of licenses to a friend of mine, Mr. McLaren, of Perth, for some timber lands at Turtle Lake. I denied the statement at that time, stating that I had not been an applicant for any coal lands in the North-West, and that I had not urged the granting of a license to Mr. McLaren for timber lands at Turtle Lake. Yesterday, when I was not in the House, the hon. gentleman read a letter from me to the Department applying for a coal land license, and the answer of the Department to that letter. I was astonished when I heard of the letter being read, and went immediately to the Department for the purpose of seeing whether I had made an application or not. When I went down to the Department, I found that an application had been made in my name for a mining location, being the west half of section 16, township 3, range 9, west of the second meridian. I have no knowledge or remembrance of ever having made the application. The application is not in my handwriting, and I have no recollection, even to the present time, of ever having made it. The hon. member was perfectly justified in making his remarks, stating that an application had been made in my name. Before the debate came on, I read in the papers that I was accused of being an applicant for coal lands, and I asked the Minister of the Interior to enquire in his Department whether the statement was true or not. I received the following letter, which was from Mr. Burgess to Mr. White, and was handed to me before the debate commenced:—

"DEAR MR. WHITE,—There is no application from Mr. Haggart, and, of course, no grant to him, nor any application or grant made through Mr. Haggart acting for anyone else, for 320 acres or any other area of coal lands."

That confirmed my memory of the transaction, and upon this letter and my remembrance of the facts, I made the contradiction to the statement of the hon. member for North Norfolk the other evening. At the same time, from the papers brought down he was perfectly justified in making the charge that he did make, because it appears from them that I had been an applicant for it. In reference to the other matter about Mr. McLaren, I asked Mr. White to get the letter I sent to the Department with the application of Messrs. McLaren and Sinclair for a timber license at Turtle Lake. The only letter of application that I ever sent to the Department, was this:

"March 29th, 1884.

"DEAR SIR,—Enclosed I send plan and description of limit applied for by Peter McLaren and A. C. Sinclair, sometime ago.

"Yours truly,
(Signed) "JOHN HAGGART.

"Hon. Minister of the Interior."

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). In justice to the hon. gentleman I desire to say that when the debate was going on he came to me and asked if I knew anything about it. I said: I have no recollection of it, but I will find out; and from my place here I wrote over to Mr. Burgess, the Deputy Minister, and received an answer which I handed to the hon. member for South Lanark. I have since asked Mr. Burgess how the mistake came to occur, and he sent me Mr. Ryan's letter to him as follows:

"MY DEAR SIR,—You instructed me to report to you whether or not Mr. John Haggart, M.P., had made an application to this Department on behalf of himself or anyone else, for a coal mining location in Manitoba or the North-West Territories, and I reported to you that he had not. I now find that what I stated to you was incorrect, as the records of this Department show that on the 12th December, 1882, an application was received here from Mr. Haggart for a coal mining location of 320 acres. This location, however, was never granted to him, and no further correspondence than the application and acknowledgment appears in the records."

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I may state that the name of the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) appears in the printed returns, printed in the blue-books for the last year, as being an applicant for, according to my recollection, two different locations; and if hon. gentlemen are misled, it is simply because a name appears in the blue-book. My information was taken from the blue-book.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman is making a statement on a personal explanation of mine, with reference to distinct charges made against me by Mr. Charlton. If he has any charge to make against me this is the time. He did not do it before. Let him do it again, and I shall answer him. If he has a specific charge to make, let him make it, and if he makes these charges that he made up at Wingham against me, I shall make such an explanation as that, I think, hon. members would refuse to sit in the House with him who makes charges so untruthful as these.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I made no charges in Wingham or elsewhere that were not fortified by information obtained from public sources. I made no charge against the hon. gentleman now. I said that his name appears in the Sessional Papers for 1885 as an applicant, either once or twice, for coal lands in the North-West Territory.

Mr. HAGGART. Let me give a distinct denial to that statement. It may be that an application was made such as I have explained just now, an application for coal lands. But the gentleman made a statement in the country which was entirely different from that, when he said that I had been granted coal lands of 320 acres.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). No.

Mr. HAGGART. That I was interested in contracts from the Government in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I did not say so. I say it was reported.

Mr. HAGGART. All that I have to say is, that it is cowardly.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Every word of it was true.

HALDIMAND—NEW WRIT.

Mr. LANDERKIN. On Wednesday I enquired of the leader of the Government when a writ would be issued for the county of Haldimand, and he replied that he would let me know on Friday who the returning officer was, and when the writ would be issued.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Would the hon. gentleman be kind enough to wait till the First Minister is in his seat? If he will renew his question then, I am sure he will receive an answer.

THE PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Mr. DAVIES. I desire to make a short statement across the floor with reference to something that occurred to-day at the meeting of the Public Accounts Committee. The committee was to have met to take evidence from some public officials who had been summoned with reference to the Inch Arran Hotel, and I was to examine those witnesses, but, unfortunately was not present, and some gentlemen present expressed dissatisfaction. I wish to explain how it was. This morning when the House adjourned a little after five o'clock, I went across the Chamber and spoke to the Finance Minister, and asked him if it was desirable that the meeting should be held at half-past ten to-day, and he said that as we would only have half an hour, it was not desirable, and that I had better inform the chairman of the committee. I went through the corridors everywhere in search of the chairman, but failed to find him. Of course, after the late night's work it was impossible for me to get there, and I am very sorry that I did not find the chairman and acquaint him with the understanding I had with the Minister. I hope an arrangement will be made that the committee may meet at an early day, and that we may get through these examinations. They will not be very long, such as they are. I am ready to go on at the earliest moment.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 103) further to amend the Steamboat Inspection Act, 1883.—(Mr. Foster.)

RELIEF OF THE TOWN OF COBOURG.

Mr. McLELAN moved the second reading of Bill (No. 122) for the relief of the corporation of the town of Cobourg.

Motion agreed to, and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. VAIL. I would like to know the exact amount given to the town of Cobourg.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. $25,000.

Mr. VAIL. I know the amount of $25,000 is there mentioned, but this includes the interest, I see. I would like to know what the whole sum amounts to, with the principal.

Mr. McLELAN. The amounts are $25,000 and $19,295, respectively. The interest was paid to date.

Bill reported.

MANITOBA CLAIMS SETTLEMENT.

Mr. McLELAN moved the second reading of Bill (No. 123) to explain the Act 48 and 49 Vic., chap. 50, intituled: "An Act for the final settlement of the claims made by the Province of Manitoba on the Dominion."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman was to have given the House some information as to the exact position of the debt and the total amount payable to Manitoba just now.

Mr. McLELAN. The amount that was at the credit of Manitoba as a capital sum, previous to the arrangement, was $662,272, and of this the Government has drawn $458,386. That is the amount to be chargeable against the capital sum, as provided under this arrangement.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do I understand that the sum total remaining to the credit, so to speak, of the Province of Manitoba, is a little under $200,000?

Mr. McLELAN. I thought the hon. gentleman asked as to how much they have drawn from their capital account. That sum was $458,000. They had at their credit, before this arrangement was made, $236,000. The hon. gentleman understands that this takes the place of all previous arrangements, so that under this there will be placed at the capital account about $4,000,000, from which will be deducted amounts which we had advanced previously on capital account and all sums for works of a local nature.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How much will there be on capital account when this Bill becomes law?

Mr. McLELAN. The balance on capital account at their credit is $3,596,614, against which will be chargeable anything that may have been advanced to them that may be considered of a strictly local character, this being chargeable according to the terms of the arrangement. That matter has not, however, yet been settled.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Speaking generally, about $3,500,000 are at their credit. What rate of interest is payable under the present arrangement?

Mr. McLELAN. Five per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They will get then for future revenue $175,000 as interest, and under the arrangement so consummated last year, about how much is paid to them? What is their total revenue just now?

Mr. McLELAN. I have not looked into that matter.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I take it to be about $400,000. But I should like to know exactly what it is, because we have been altering these arrangements many times, and it is impossible, without an authentic statement from the Department, to know exactly where we stand.

Mr. McLELAN. I will give such statement before the third reading.

Mr. WATSON. Can the Minister give us an idea of the quantity of public land to be transferred to Manitoba?

Mr. McLELAN. There is no information I can furnish.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That has reference to the swamp lands which it is proposed to hand over to the Province. Does the Minister recollect whether they are to be handed over free, or whether there is to be a nominal charge made upon them?

Mr. McLELAN. Nothing is mentioned as to whether they are to be free or not. No mention is made of any charge, it being simply stated that the swamp lands are to be handed over.

Mr. WATSON. I would suggest to the Government that some estimate of the quantity of land to be transferred should be made, and that as soon as possible. I suppose the Local Legislature has to take a hand in in deciding what are swamp lands. It is a mistake that the swamp lands were not defined before the final arrangements were made. The matter was discussed at length last year, and I had hoped, from what the Minister stated a few days ago, that he would have been able to give the House some approximate idea of the quantity of lands that will be transferred to Manitoba under the terms of last year. It seems strange there should have been no understanding with the Local Government as to the quantity of land that would be transferred, or what lands would be termed swamp lands.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The hon. gentleman is not quite accurate in his statement that no understanding has been arrived at. When I was in Winnipeg last year I had an interview with members of the Local Government on this subject, and we agreed generally, subject, of course, to the decision of the Government, that we are to take the description of swamp lands as fixed by Act of the American Congress in similar circumstances. We agreed as to the time at which surveyors should be sent out, and I am now communicating with Mr. Norquay with regard to their being sent out in the spring, with a view of settling the whole question of the swamp lands.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Minister states that an agreement has been made on the basis of giving the Province of Manitoba what they call swamp lands in the American border States. What is that?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). What I stated was that we agreed generally that that would be a satisfactory arrangement. I have sent a letter reciting the facts and am expecting an answer daily. The plan they adopted in the United States as fixed by Statute, was, that where, for instance, a township or section was largely swamp land, as determined by the surveyors appointed for that purpose, the whole township or section should be considered as swamp lands. Where, on the contrary, a small proportion was swamp, then the whole section was considered as good land.

Mr. WATSON. I think the explanation of the hon. Minister is satisfactory, but it would be interesting to the House if he would explain, at the third reading of the Bill, what are to be termed swamp lands. He will probably remember that last Session, although perhaps he did not himself take an active part in the debate, the Minister of Customs stated that only lands which were continually covered by water would be so considered, and that, I contend, would be very unsatisfactory to the people of Manitoba.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The hon. gentleman must not expect me to give a definite answer on the third reading, because both sides have not absolutely agreed on the basis of what may be recommended to Council, as the basis of an Order in Council, and as the matter is now before the Manitoba Government, until we get an answer from them, it is clear we cannot communicate the information.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman's memory does not serve him correctly as to what I stated last year. What I said—as he will find by referring to Hansard—was, that I was unable to give a distinct and positive answer as to the interpretation of the term "swamp" lands. A good deal was said about lands constantly covered with water, and those which were overflowed by the lake, but it was also said that that was a matter which would be decided in future between the Government of Canada and the Government of Manitoba. I know the hon. gentleman tried to get me to define what was really meant by swamp lands, but if he remembers, he will acknowledge that I told him I was totally unable to say at that time what would be considered swamp lands, but that my own impression was that those lands which were termed swamp lands in Ontario would be considered swamp lands in that country.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, considered in Committee and reported.

EXPERIMENTAL FARM STATIONS.

Mr. CARLING moved the second reading of Bill (No. 124) respecting experimental farm stations.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. MILLS. I think the hon. gentleman should give us some idea of the character of those institutions which he proposes to establish—the extent of the farm, the kind of operations carried on, the kind of buildings and their probable cost, and what the hon. gentleman expects to accomplish by them that is not at the present time accomplished by the agricultural farms and colleges established under Provincial authority.

Mr. CARLING. When the resolutions were introduced, I stated that the intention of the Government was to establish a central station in the vicinity of the capital, with a farm of 400 or 500 acres. This is to be an experimental farm for testing different kinds of seeds and cereals, experimenting on stock, forestry, horticulture, etc., and the result of those experiments will be distributed to the public monthly, or oftener, by bulletins and through the press. The Bill also provides for the establishment of stations, one in the Lower Provinces, one in Manitoba, one in the North-West Territories and one in British Columbia. Tests will be made at these different stations and the results will be forwarded to the central station, which will then issue bulletins to the public, giving these results. The total cost, as I stated in introducing the resolution, for all these stations will be about $240,000. That is, the purchase of land, the erection of buildings, fencing, and all the other requirements of the farm. The annual cost, if all these places were established, would be $30,000 or $35,000.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman has not given all the information we require. The practice of the United States, I believe, is that the consuls scattered throughout the world collect seeds and other materials and send them to the proper officer at the capital, who distributes them among the population, on condition that they will experiment with them; the persons receiving them report to Washington the results of their experiments, and upon those reports a report is made up, showing in what State and in what kind of soil and climate the experiment has succeeded, or whether it has failed. If we had consuls abroad to collect the cereals of other countries, to be sent here and distributed amongst our population, to see how far they could be successfully produced in this country, I could understand that that might be a benefit. But the hon. gentleman proposes, by means of experimental farms established in different parts of the country, to carry on these experiments under the direct supervision of the Government I think the hon. gentleman should have shown us that this official mode of proceeding would be superior to the voluntary mode in vogue for many years in the United States. When the hon. gentleman tells us that he proposes to establish an experimental farm of 500 acres in the vicinity of the capital, he ought to give us more information than he has given us on that subject. He tells us those farms will probably cost the country $240,000. How is that sum made up? How much is for land? What farms is he going to purchase? Of what nature and to what extent are the experiments to be carried on?

He spoke about forestry. What kind of trees is he going to try to grow in this climate—fruit trees or forest trees? We already know the kind of forest trees that can be grown in this climate—those that are indigenous to the climate. Does he intend to introduce others? What kinds of stock is he going to select? What knowledge does he propose to give the agricultural population that has not already been given by the Provincial farms and by private enterprise? If he is not going to accomplish anything beyond what has already been accomplished, the experiments would be altogether unnecessary. It is therefore desirable to know exactly the kind, the extent, and the cost of the operations the hon. gentleman intends to engage in. The hon. gentleman spoke about horticulture as well as agriculture. How are the seeds to be collected, and from what districts? The hon. gentleman tells us he has reached a certain conclusion; it may be he is right, but we want the data furnished us so that we may judge of the accuracy of that conclusion. The House must assume the responsibility of founding these experimental farms, which will be a serious charge on the public for all time to come. It is, therefore, of no little importance that the hon. gentleman, before entering on a policy which in a large degree points in the direction of a legislative union, should be able to give the House the information I have suggested.

Mr. CARLING. Had the hon. gentleman taken the trouble to read the report of the committee appointed in 1884, he would have obtained the information he now desires. That committee made a very full investigation into the working of agricultural colleges and schools of farming generally, and they suggested that the Government should take into favorable consideration the advisability of establishing a bureau of agriculture and an experimental farm under the supervision of the Department of Agriculture.

"CONCLUSION.

"Considering that the proper development of our agricultural resources is indispensible to the upbuilding and maintenance of our national wealth and prosperity, and that all progressive countries are at present making strenuous efforts for the introduction of improved methods of agriculture, your committee believe that no object is more deserving of the active and generous support of the Federal Government than that of fostering and promoting this great industry, and of prompting, guiding and co-operating with all local and provincial institutions formed for the furtherance of this object. Your committee, therefore, beg leave to submit the following recommendations:—

"That the Government take into earnest and favorable consideration the advisability of establishing a bureau of agriculture, and an experimental farm in connection therewith

"That this bureau be formed in connection with, and under the supervision of, the present Department of Agriculture.

"That the objects aimed at in the establishment of such bureau and farm be as follows:—

"1. To conduct such experiments in the introduction and culture of new varieties of seeds, plants, trees, etc., as will most efficiently aid in the advancement of Canadian agriculture; to institute experiments with regard to the comparative value of fertilizers, the proper testing of seeds as to vitality and purity, and the healthy preservation and productive conditions of plants and animals.

"2. To make careful investigation into the origin, distribution and habits of insects injurious and beneficial, and the contagious and other diseases to which animals and plants are subject, in order to arrive at the best method of destroying and counteracting them.

"3. To study the qualities of the various breeds of cattle and other domestic animals, with the view of reporting on the best means of improving them; of protecting them from parasites and epidemic diseases, of feeding them for the market, and on the treatment of milch cattle.

"4. To initiate and carry out a convenient and comprehensive system of gathering the latest and most useful information, statistical and otherwise.

"5 To publish and send to the press and the various agricultural and horticultural societies of the Dominion, at different periods of the year, bulletins giving the results of trials made on the experimental farm, and whatever other information the Bureau may consider useful, either in the prevention of the ravages of insects and of contagious diseases among animals, concerning improved methods of culture that have stood test, or for the special advancement of any line of agricultural pursuits.

"All of which is respectfully submitted, with the evidence herewith appended.

"G. A. GIGAULT, Chairman."

many persons that there is room for improvement. Professor Arnold and Mr. Lynch, two witnesses heard by the Select Committee on Agriculture, declared that Canada was losing certainly annually $5,000,000 on account of the inferior quality of her butter. I am happy to say that the report of this select committee was commented upon favorably by Professor Fream in a lengthy article on Canadian agriculture, which was published in the journal of the Royal Agricultural Society of England. That professor, who is considered a good authority on agriculture, hopes that the conclusions of this committee will be put into effect. Here is what he says in that article:

"That some generally applicable system of instruction in the theory and practice of modern agriculture would exert a powerful influence for the better is beyond doubt. That the Canadian farmers recognise the weakness of their position in this respect is sufficiently evidenced by the tone of the replies obtained by the Select Committee on Agriculture, the majority of which were in favor of the establishment of a central bureau and of an agricultural experimental farm. * * * It is much to be hoped that before long these suggestions will be realised."

Speaking of the Canadian butter, the same writer says:

"The average price of butter in Canada may be put at 9d. per lb., but it varies from 7½d. or 8d. west of Toronto to 11d. at the creameries. Taking the average price of Danish butter on the English market at 15d. to 17d. per lb., it is thought that the Canadian butter would not command so high a price as Danish, yet by improvements in manufacture and in means of transport the average price of the Canadian product might be increased by at least 3d. per lb."

Another writer gives also a fair illustration of what experimental dairy stations will do here in Canada. He speaks of the influence exerted by the experimental dairy stations in Denmark, and he says:

"To sum up, the results of agricultural education in Denmark have been something extraordinary. Twenty years ago the butter sold in the market by the yeoman farmer was pronounced execrably bad; at present Danish butter in its season has practically no rival on the London market."

If we look at the cheese industry in Canada we find that in 1868 the exports of cheese from Ontario and Quebec, were only $617,943; while in 1883 the same two Provinces exported cheese for $8,177,757. Experienced farmers declare that if there had been an experimental dairy station under the control of the Government many years ago, that industry would have made much more progress than it has. In the United States the industry of wine making, and the culture of oranges and grape vines, are due chiefly to the action of experimental stations established in that country. The director of the experimental station of Roehampstead, in England, has been knighted on account of the great services he has rendered to agriculture. It is said by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that the establishment of these institutions should be left to the Provincial Legislatures. The resources of our Provinces are very limited, and many of them are not in a position to make the necessary expenditure for such institutions. It is the Federal Treasury which profits most by the increase of the agricultural production. When that production is considerable, when the farmers receive good prices, the imports of manufactured goods increase, there is a larger consumption of articles on which we receive Excise duties, and the Canadian Treasury is always overflowing with revenue accruing from Customs and Excise when the farmers are in a prospering condition. So I believe that it is chiefly the duty of the Federal Government to make the necessary expenditures for the improvement of agriculture. For many years past we have made many efforts to improve our manufacturing industries, but, notwithstanding those praiseworthy efforts, our exports of manufactured goods from 1868 to 1885 have increased only by $1,608,955. We find a different result as to agricultural products. During the same period the increase of exports in agricultural products has been more than $20,000,000. So we see that agriculture has always been, and will be for many years, the main industry in Canada, and the first one which should be fostered and protected by our Government. It is always interesting to read reports of directors of agricultural institutions in other countries. In France, Professor Grandeau, in a report of the experimental station which is under his control, ascertains one of the benefits which can be derived from such institutions. Speaking of the agricultural production in France, he says that it could be increased at least by 20 or 30 per cent. if the farmers of that country made a good choice of seeds for the cultivation of cereals. At the agricultural station under his control thirteen varieties of wheat were sown on thirteen different parcels of land. Each parcel was of the same quality, but no more fertilisers were employed for one parcel than for another; yet we see that the choice of seeds had a very large influence over the production. One variety of wheat produced 18 hectolitres per hectare, while another kind produced as much as 35 hectolitres per hectare. This is the best evidence that such institutions produce good results, and I am sure that they will help here, as in other countries, to increase our agricultural productions and to improve the quality of our agricultural products. If these institutions are well managed, the Minister of Agriculture will be entitled to the congratulations, not only of the agricultural class, but also of every class in our community, for the measure which he has proposed, because on the prosperity of agriculture depends our national prosperity.

Mr. BURPEE. I should like to obtain some information from the Minister. I understand from the Bill there is to be a central farm near the capital and four out-stations, one to be in the Maritime Provinces, one in Manitoba, one in British Columbia, and one in the North-West Territory; the cost of the central farm to be about $120,000, and a similar amount to be expended on the out-stations combined. At the central station there are to be experiments in stock, butter and cheese, field crops, fruits, vegetables, &c. Will all those experiments carried on at the central station be conducted likewise at the out-stations?

Mr. CARLING. No. At the central station arrangements will be made to have different officers to make tests, including chemical tests, and at the outlying stations there will be practical experiments made in the management of trees, the raising of fruit, cattle, &c. Arrangements will be made with the Post Office Department that all packages required to be tested from different sections of the country shall be sent through the Post office free. The bulletins will also be sent free. It is not intended at the outlying stations to make chemical tests as at the central station.

Mr. BURPEE. Is it intended to have farm stock and make experiments with them at the out-stations?

Mr. CARLING. It is not intended to have a stock farm, but experiments on the feeding of stock, the best kind of food and the breeds most suitable to the locality will be made. We must have a certain number of head of stock, but it is not intended to make it a stock-breeding farm.

Mr. BURPEE. We have already in New Brunswick an experimental stock farm, and the Local Government have expended a considerable amount of money, over $5,000 a year, on this farm, where they raise a good many cattle and experiment to some degree in regard to them. They have four or five different breeds; they had last year seventy-five acres of meadow land, and portions of land laid down with oats, wheat and so forth. They make experiments on those different subjects, but especially in regard to stock. At Prince Edward Island there is also an experimental stock farm, which has been very successful. Whether the out-stations proposed will come into competition with the experimental farm carried on by the Local Government, is a question. I think it would be very much better if the Local Government and the Dominion Government would combine and establish one good experimental farm. To have two small experimental farms in one Province would not be of very much usefulness. And it would be a mistake to go on with the proposal without having some arrangement with the Local Government, which could carry out on the farm to very much greater advantage than the Dominion Government. However, I am not objecting to the establishment of an experimental farm; it will be experimental in every sense of the word, and I am willing the experiment shall be tried. But the Dominion Government, in establishing the out-stations should have some respect to the existing experimental farms already established in the different Provinces. As to experiments in shade trees, I do not think they would be any material benefit whatever so far as the Maritime Provinces are concerned, as we have too many of them already. As to fruit trees, we have enterprising nurserymen in those Provinces who have done much in experimenting and introducing the best description of fruit trees. May I ask if any locality in the Maritime Provinces has been selected for the location of the out-station ?

Mr. CARLING. I think I mentioned to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), that no place had been decided on and no land had been selected.

Mr. BURPEE. There will be no difficulty, I think, in obtaining a good farm in a central point of the Maritime Provinces at a fair rate. It will, however, be a great mistake to establish another small experimental farm, while there is one in operation, without amalgamating them, or, at least, consulting with the Local Government so as to divide the work between them. Let the local farm take one department of experiment and the Dominion out-station another. At all events, it will be a mistake to establish two experimental farms in one vicinity; their management should be combined in some way, I think.

Mr. DAVIES. The central station, where, in the first instance, the experiments will be carried on, will be established, I understand, near Ottawa, and it is intended to serve for the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. The one in the North-West will, I suppose, be on a somewhat large scale, too. I shall say nothing about it, but I have no doubt it will be desirable to have an experimental station in that locality, as it is a new country, and many of the people who go there are not acquainted with the proper methods of farming, &c. With regard to the station in the Lower Provinces, I do not suppose the hon. gentleman has given a great deal of consideration to the matter yet, but he will see, on reflection, that if he desires, say, the Province of Prince Edward Island, to benefit by the scheme, it would be better to give assistance to the Local Government in maintaining the one which is already established in the island on a small scale. A farm station established in New Brunswick, or on the border between New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, though it might benefit the localities of the mainland, would certainly not benefit Prince Edward Island, as our system of farming is different, and I do not understand that any experiments carried on in the mainland would be of any great benefit to agriculture in the island. As we have already an excellent farm and experimental station, if the hon. gentleman desires to assist the agricultural interests of the Province, he could do so either by augmenting the local grant to the farm, or else by doing away with it altogether as a local concern and carrying it on under the auspices of the Dominion. I am glad my colleague has had his attention drawn to the matter, and I am quite sure he will agree with me.

Mr. TEMPLE. I wish to say a few words on this question, and not allow the lawyers to monopolise the discussion on agriculture altogether. I have done a good deal of farming myself in this country and I know a little about it. I think the scheme before the House is an excellent one, and that it reflects great credit upon the hon. Minister of Agriculture. I am satisfied it will be a very great benefit to the agriculturists throughout the length and breadth of the country. The Local Government of New Brunswick has had a stock farm for some years, although they have not been able to carry it on to as large an extent as I would like to see, but what they have done has been a great benefit to the Province. I cannot agree with the proposal of the hon. gentleman from Sunbury (Mr. Burpee) to unite those stations with those established by the Local Government, as I think the result would be much better if each Government is allowed to do its own work in this direction. I think the hon. member for Prince Edward Island is perfectly right in what he has said about the station for that Province, as they have a good stock farm there and they can raise good crops on the island, and if the object can be accomplished by assisting the farm they have there, I think it would be much better for the Province. With regard to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, I think it would be better that the stations of those Provinces should be carried on separately. As regards tree planting, so far as Nova Scotia and New Brunswick are concerned, experiments of that kind would be of no benefit, because we have plenty of trees and are cutting them down every day. But as regards fruit trees, they would be of very great benefit. I hope the Minister will be able to carry his scheme through, as I am satisfied the country will be largely benefited by it.

Mr. JENKINS. I cannot see that there is any force in the objection of the hon. member for Sunbury (Mr. Burpee) to the excellent scheme of the Minister of Agriculture, that there will be competition. I think if there was competition it would be a healthy competition, and would be rather an advantage than otherwise. I hail with great satisfaction the attempt being made by the Minister, because I am satisfied it will be of great service to the cause of agriculture in Canada. It is to agriculture that Canada must owe her wealth, at all events, her first great start, and although her manufactures and mines will assist greatly in adding to the wealth of Canada, still her mainstay for many years will be agriculture, and I think it will be satisfactory to the people of Canada that the general government is going to take the matter up. It is true, we have our stock farm in Prince Edward Island, which is very successful, but it is only a stock farm. The resources of the Province are limited, and we are not able to establish an experimental farm which would be of any great service. My hon. colleague has stated that Prince Edward Island occupies an exceptional position, and it is perfectly true; and if there is to be one experimental farm established for the three Maritime Provinces, it seems to me that Prince Edward Island is the proper place for it, because that Province adjoins both of the other Provinces, and our soil is better fitted for it than the soil of either of the other Provinces. I am sure that if it were placed either in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, the one Province would be jealous of the other, and it would be a practical solution of that difficulty to establish it in Prince Edward Island. The soil of that Province is very amenable to culture, and would show the benefits of improved farming better perhaps than any other soil in the Dominion. So far as the North-West is concerned, I think this is a step in the right direction. There is such a capacity for improvement in that country, and so small an opportunity for the local authorities to carry on improvements, that I think it absolutely necessary that the general government should lead the way. We know that that country is very fertile, but it has its drawbacks, among which are the severity of the winter and the want of water. If it were planted with trees, however I believe a very great improvement in both of these respects would result. I think very great credit is due to the hon. Minister for bringing this subject forward.

Mr. MILLS. I am rather surprised at the observations of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. My hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) pointed out that the climate of Prince Edward Island, from its insulated position, was so different from that of the other Maritime Provinces, that the experiments carried on there would be altogether different from those carried on on the mainland, and that experiments on the mainland would not be sufficient for the Island. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken has repudiated that position, and has declared that experiments on the Island would answer very well for the mainland, and it follows that experiments on the mainland would be quite sufficient for the Island. Now, I wish to make an observation or two with reference to the very excellent report of the committee appointed in 1882. No doubt a great deal of useful information and many valuable suggestions are contained in that report; but the question whether these experimental farms would be better conducted under the supervision of the Local Governments or the Federal Government is well worthy of the consideration of Parliament. The hon. gentleman has spoken of the great benefit these institutions have been in the United States; and yet he admits that every one of them is under State and not under Federal control. He has told us so much of the value of experiments carried on in the territory of Dakota, in reference to fruit trees and other trees, that one would almost be disposed to think Dakota was a paradise. I am afraid if such encomiums had been pronounced on that territory by anyone on this side of the House, he would be accused of trying to persuade our people to leave the Dominion and take up their residence there.

Mr. CARLING. Does the hon. gentleman say that I was passing encomiums on Dakota?

Mr. MILLS. What does the hon. gentleman call his remarks on the valuable experiments carried on there?

Mr. CARLING. I said that trees had been imported from Russia and successfully tested in Dakota, and that I was quite sure they would be equally successful in our North-West, where the climate was similar to that of Dakota.

Mr. MILLS. Well, all these experiments have been made by individul enterprise or under State supervision. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault) says our Provinces are poor, and have not sufficient funds to carry on those experiments. In the United States the various States receive no aid from the Federal treasury.

Mr. CARLING. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. The Federal Government granted large tracts of land to the various States, which amount now to the value of about $15,000,000.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman is in too much hurry. I say the various States have received no revenue from the Federal treasury. They are not in the position of our Provinces, which receive subsidies from year to year, and it is in the power of the Local Governments to supplement those subsidies by direct taxation to any extent they think proper. It is quite possible for the Federal Government to do, with regard to these experimental farms, what they did years ago with regard to immigration. They entered into an arrangement by which they contributed a certain sum of money towards immigration to the different Provinces, and they could do the same thing with regard to the experimental farms. I admit that an experimental farm in the North-West, if properly conducted, would be of very considerable value. But under whose supervision should it be—the Territorial Government or this Government? The Government say that even the public lands cannot be properly managed from Ottawa, and they have established a Land Board in the North-West to manage them; and how is the hon. gentleman going to exercise supervision over his experimental farms in that country? Does he intend to establish an agricultural board up there for that purpose? I do not say that the hon. gentleman may not give a contribution from the public treasury in aid of agricultural societies, but I say there is a proper sphere in which the operations of this Government may be carried on, just as there is a proper sphere in which the operations of the Government at Washington are carried on; and there is a propher sphere which belongs to the Local Government. If the Local Governments, in the different Provinces, feel that they cannot establish institutions so large or so expensive as is required to secure the most beneficial results, that may be a reason why the Government here should aid the different Provinces in the establishment and working of those different establishments, but it is not a reason why we should undertake to establish institutions independent of the Provinces, and carry on operations, thousands of miles away from any oversight which it would be in our power to exercise. It seems to me we are called on to expend a large sum of money for work that can be better done by the Local Legislature than by us. I am not going further in opposition to this proposition, but wish to state here I have little or no doubt as to what the result of our proposed action will be. We have a federal system of Government, and each Government, both Federal and Provincial, has its proper sphere of action. The hon. gentleman by this proposition is encroaching on the authority of the Local Governments, and using the resources of this Government in doing that which, by law, should be undertaken by the Local Governments, and which we have not the necessary resources to efficiently carry out. If the Local Governments have not the necessary resources to establish those experimental institutions, that may be a reason for our supplementing the resources of the Local Governments, but not a reason for our undertaking to carry out work which ought to be left in their hands.

Mr. HESSON. I wish simply to point out the fact that the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat is never satisfied with any measure that the Government can possibly propose. The hon. gentleman finds fault with every measure proposed by the Government, whether in the interest of the people or not. He seems to think it is his sole business to find fault, and admirably he performs it. He would be satisfied that we should aid the Provincial Governments, but he is not prepared to put the administration of affairs in our hands, though we are to find the ways and means to administer them. Were his party in power, I have no doubt he would have full confidence that the Government here would administer these affairs in the most admirable manner, especially if he happened to be Minister of Agriculture. I think he ought to give credit to the Government for trying to do what is right in behalf of agricultural interests, and give credit to hon. members on this side for a sincere desire to promote the best interests of the country. I object to a vote being given in aid of provincial agricultural institutions, because it would be diverted, in all probability, from the purposes it was intended to carry out. Does the hon. gentleman say it is impossible for us to find experienced agriculturists to carry on this work? He knows well they can be found, and that there are enough people in the immediate neighborhood of those institutions, as for instance the Local and Federal representatives, who will be sufficiently interested in the matter to see that the expenditure is employed in the right direction. The hon. gentleman finds fault with the Minister for not entering into details. He wanted to know about the fencing and the number and description of trees and other matters of detail, but that is at present impossible. The Minister has done all he could in ascertaining, after careful enquiry, that certain results would in all probability follow the employment of certain methods in certain cases, and if neighboring countries have succeeded in accomplishing good work in the direction proposed by means of certain expenditure, it is only fair to assume that similar results will follow that expenditure here. The Government will be responsible for this expenditure, and be called to account for it, and will see that it is properly put to use.

Mr. MILLS. As is the case of the Indian farms.

Mr. HESSON. The hon. gentleman has had his say and he should allow me to have mine. He knows no more about what he is talking now than he often does. I do not believe he ever put his hand to the plough himself, he understands more about teaching school and studying law than he does about farming, but, as usual, he is prepared to discuss any question, no matter how remote it may be from his experience. My experience of agriculturists is different from that of the hon. gentleman. I believe that men can be chosen from that body who will carry out effectively the work entrusted to them. The object of this measure is undoubtedly a good one, and with the exception of the hon. gentleman, hon. members on both sides do not object to our aiding agricultural interests, in which this Government has a peculiar interest, an interest greater than that of any Provincial Government, from the fact that by the promotion of our agricultural interests and the consequent export of our agricultural products, an immense revenue is being created to the country at large. It is one in which he is interested as a representative of an agricultural constituency as well as myself, and I am sure that when we come down to the matter of expenditures required it will be time enough to find fault and to ask for particulars as to the number of trees to be put on each farm.

Mr FISHER I have taken a good deal of interest in this question. I had the honor of being a member of the committee of which my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Gigault) two years ago was the chairman, and in the course of the investigations of that committee the members of it were fully impressed with the importance of something of the kind being undertaken by the Dominion Government. The committee obtained information from all the best sources, not only in this country, but also from the United States, and by means of letters and communications in some cases also from England, and we found, by the reports which were presented to us, that this undertaking was one for which we could find many examples, in almost all the best governed countries in the world. I think, therefore, it is quite proper for the Dominion Government to undertake to do this for the benefit of the agriculturists of this country. We all know perfectly well that agriculture in this country is passing through a change from the first stages of a new country, and that, in the older Provinces at all events, our agriculturists have to meet with all the disadvantages and difficulties that the agriculturists of Europe have to encounter. They are no longer in the position which the people of the Western States and the North-West of Canada are, in having the advantages of a virgin soil and a quick return for the labor they employ thereon. The result is that our agriculturists have to study the best methods of their business that they can possibly acquire. and I believe that in this they can be assisted very much by the Government. That commission obtained information with regard to the establishment of agricultural stations and experimental farms in other countries. Chiefly, of course, we looked to the United States, the circumstances of which country are more like our own than those of any other, but we also found it to our advantage to look to the agricultural stations and experiments in Europe, because we knew that these questions are more thoroughly and scientifically gone into in Europe than they are on this continent. We knew that in Germany and in France, which are in this respect far ahead of our own Mother Country, the best scientific minds are employed in investigating these matters and trying to find out by what means the agricultural classes may benefit best. There is one particular difference, however, which I wish to draw the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to, between the experimental agricultural stations in Germany and France and those in America. In Germany and France, the experiments and investigations carried on are of a purely scientific character. They are not what perhaps would be called by our farmers of a practical character. In the United States, the agricultural stations and experiments are more frequently on a large scale, and are carried on in what may be called a practical and a rougher method, and the result is that in many cases they have not been so accurate as those in Europe. I do not say that sweepingly of all the stations in the United States, because in a few of the stations there they have gentlemen of high scientific attainments who are able to carry out the experiments in the most scientific manner. But I want to warn the Minister of Agriculture and urge upon him strongly that in the experiments he wishes to carry out in this country he will rather take the example and the model of those in Europe than of those in the United States. What the farmers of this country want more than anything else is absolutely accurate information as to what they are able to do. This can only be acquired by men who have been trained in accurate scientific investigation. A farmer, a man who is accustomed to do the rough handiwork of the fields cannot possibly undertake these experiments; he has not the training which is necessary for accurate observation, he has not the delicacy of hand or the training of mind which is necessary to enable him to conduct a long series of careful experiments, and the only result which will come to our farmers if these experiments are not accurately and carefully conducted will be that the agricultural community will be led into mistakes and errors, and will lose more than they will gain by the experiments. This leads me to a point which I wish to urge upon the Minister of Agriculture with considerable force. I see that in this Bill he takes power to acquire a large tract of land in this immediate neighborhood, and also asks power to acquire large pieces of land in three or four other localities in the Dominion. I think, if the Minister will enquire into the state of affairs in those stations in Europe to which I referred, he will find the most accurate and famous and best known experiments in agricultural matters are carried on on comparatively small tracts of land. The Rothamstead experiments, which are conducted by Sir J. B. Lawes and Mr. Gilbert, have been conducted on very small plots of land. I think it is only a few acres which are occupied by these experiments, which have acquired a world-wide fame and have resulted in so much good to the whole agricultural people of the world. If the Minister will look at the report of the committee to which he has alluded, he will find several instances of questions put to the witnesses asking them what they thought would be necessary as the area of an agricultural experiment station here at Ottawa, and I find in one instance that a gentleman who is very well known to many of us and who is thoroughly well acquainted with the needs especially of the horticulture and forestry branch, Mr. Charles Gibb, of Abbottsford, said, that for a good time to come, at all event, a small plot of ground, perhaps ten acres in extent, would be sufficient for that portion of the experimental station to which he was referring, I mean in connection with agriculture and forestry and the trial of fruits and fruit trees. I think it is well for the Government and this Parliament to hasten slowly. We are trying a new thing. We are inaugurating a branch of our governmental expenditure, and while I thoroughly endorse and sympathise with the movement, and am desirous that it should be conducted to a successful conclusion, I am very desirous also that no mistake should be made, and that the result should be entirely and absolutely satisfactory to our agricultural classes. To accomplish this, I think it is very necessary, as I said, that we should hasten slowly. I would urge upon the Minister of Agriculture that, instead of buying 400 or 600 acres in the neighborhood of this city, he should buy only a small area, 100 acres, or even less, which I am satisfied would be quite sufficient for what I consider necessary in this regard. The other branch of the subject, which has drawn forth remarks from my hon. friend the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and has been alluded to as interfering with the Local Governments and with the efforts of those Governments towards the improvement of agriculture in their various Provinces, I think ought to be very carefully looked into. I know that in regard to these careful investigations and scientific experiments to which I have been alluding, where they are once well conducted, it is quite sufficient for the whole country. It is not at all necessary that we should test a certain class of seeds here at Ottawa, and also down in New Brunswick and up in the North-West. If we test them carefully under the eyes of scientific investigators it can be done in a small way, and done nearly as well, at one point as another. When we come to ascertain whether these seeds are proper for general use throughout the country, it is true that we will have to test them in a different way, and I propose soon to suggest a scheme by which that can be done. But besides the question of testing seeds there is, for instance, the question of the investigation of the value of agricultural and artificial fertilisers. Now if a fertiliser is used in this country its value is the same in all the Provinces as at Ottawa, and the test of such a fertiliser, if carried on at Ottawa, would serve for the whole Dominion. The same way, also, with the test of the nutritive value of the different foods in connection with the feeding of cattle; the same also with the test of the manner and best methods of producing butter and cheese, so that our dairy interests may be improved, and our dairy products may acquire such a standing in Europe that they will command the highest prices. All these things can be best carried on in one central station, where we could command the services of men of high scientific attainment, upon whom we can depend to give us accurate results. Now I am going to make a suggestion to the Minister by which experiments all over the country may be more satisfactorily and cheaply carried on than by branch agricultural stations. Let us have a central staff who will have at their command a sufficient number of seeds, of fruit trees or trees for forestry purposes, and let them send these seeds or trees with which they wish to experiment, all over the country to, we will say, one individual in each constituency of the Dominion. Let the members of this Parliament recommend some reliable man in their constituency who is competent to make reports and to observe intelligently, I am quite sure that a number of such men can be found in all the constituencies of this country. Let that gentleman, that farmer, be paid for what he does, for the small amount of labor expended by him upon these experiments on his own farm. A few days' work in the year will be quite sufficient for him to test the success of any particular experiment, to test the success of a particular variety of potatoes, we will say, or something of that kind. Any practical farmer who is able to do a little writing, and observe a little more accurately than the majority of his neighbors, just such a man as can be found in every municipality, probably, would be able to undertake this business, and to carry on the tests. There should be a small central bureau to give him his instructions, absolute instructions which he should be obliged to follow, so that he would have no responsibility as to the manner in which the experiment was being conducted, except to do simply what he was told. Then that man could make his report. If it was an experiment which required to be reported periodically he could send in every month an exact state of the crop, for instance, or the result of whatever might be the subject of experiment. If it only required one report at the end of the year, as in the case of the product of a certain kind of grain, he could send in his report at the end of the year. It might also be well to have in each Province, or in every thickly populated centre, an inspector who would go around and carefully examine the results of the experiments in each locality, and in that way I think this inspector, whom I would suppose to be a man with some scientific attainments, would be able to give advice and to make an intelligent report of what he found in the different counties of the Dominion. Then these reports could be compiled and employed in making up an annual report which should be issued from the general bureau—about which I spoke. I think these branch establishments which the Minister has suggested would be likely, in some instances, to clash with the local provincial institutions, and I think they would be unnecessary alongside the local provincial institutions. These provincial institutions have to be supported by the Local Government or, in other words, by the people of the country, and the branch institutions which the Minister proposes to establish, will also have to be paid for by the people. The people, therefore, will have to pay for both, and though it does not matter very much whether they are carried on by the Dominion or Local Government, it does matter whether the people have to pay twice over for the same work. Therefore, I think that these branch institutions are practically unnecessary. I quite agree with the Minister that it is essential that we should have information as to the results of the tests from all over the Dominion, and I think the scheme which I have pointed out, and which I have discussed with various agriculturturist and other gentlemen who are interested in this question of the establishment of experimental stations, will meet the case for all practical purposes. Such men as Mr. Gibb, Prof. Penhallow, the Hon. Mr. Joly, of Quebec, to whom I have spoken, have endorsed the position I have taken on this question. I think by this means we might arrive at a more accurate result than we could possibly attain by the establishment of branch stations in two or three Provinces of the Dominion. I wish also to make one remark with regard to Manitoba and the North-West. I quite agree that in that region special experiments are required which cannot possibly be carried on at Ottawa, for example with regard to forestry. That is a question of enormous importance to the North-West, and, indeed, to the whole of Canada. We must find out what trees are best adapted for cultivation in that country, whether for verdure, or for fuel, or for wind-breaks, wherever they may be required. In our eastern Provinces we still boast of being a great lumber country, but before many years we shall be unable to make that boast any longer, and the question of forestry is also likely to become a vital one in the eastern Provinces. In the North-West, especially, it is absolutely essential that experiments should be conducted with a view to ascertaining the best way of cultivating trees for wind-breaks and other purposes. That cannot be done on a small scale, it cannot be done at Ottawa, and I believe that, also, will have to be done in the way I propose for other experiments, that is, all over the North-West. The Government should appoint in different parts of the North-West Territory individuals who may be depended upon, who have been recommended for their intelligence and for their eagerness in carrying out this work, who will have to be asked to try the experiment of planting in their own locality, whatever trees are most likely to flourish in that region. For instance, there is a certain tree, the willow—will that serve the purpose as a wind-break all over the North-West? Another of great importance to the North-West is the discovery of a kind of wheat which will ripen there without any danger from frost. There is no doubt that in certain parts of Russia such wheats have been found, and if they could be introduced into the North-West they would completely revolutionise the production of wheat there; I believe there can be no doubt that in a few years in the North-West, if the experiments are carried out and attempts made to raise different varieties of Russian wheat, there will be no danger of summer frost or of the evils attending a failure of our great staple crop in that Territory. This is a question of very great interest to the agriculturists of this country, and when I say that I mean to the people all over the country, because our whole prosperity is dependent upon our agricultural interests. I have taken upon myself to make these suggestions, because a great many hon. members have not waded through the lengthy report and the testimony of the special committee on agriculture. I am quite prepared to endorse the action of the Minister of Agriculture in embarking on this undertaking. I only desire again to urge upon him, in its inception, not to take too long a step at once. I am convinced as to its importance, and the sooner it is established the better, as results will more quickly flow from it; but there is danger that mistakes may be made, and I therefore urge the Minister to hasten slowly. I do not make this suggestion because I particularly lack confidence in the Minister, or in the Government of which he is a member. I am not dealing with the question in that sense, and I would give similar advice at any time to any Government. But it is important in entering upon this experiment that we should do so carefully and successfully. It is because anyone who undertakes a work of this character is liable to make a mistake and err in spending too much money at first, that I urge the Government to exercise caution; and I do so, not because I am particularly lacking in confidence in the hon. gentleman who now holds the portfolio of agriculture.

On section 3,

Mr. DAVIES. I trust the hon. Minister will take power to establish, in addition to a station in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick or Prince Edward Island, one for Prince Edward Island in case that, after examination of the points I have suggested, it should appear to be desirable.

Mr. CARLING. From the statements made to day, it seems that one hon. gentleman thinks it is not necessary to have a station in New Brunswick, as it might come into competition with the provincial experimental farm. The same difficulty may extend to Prince Edward Island.

Mr. DAVIES. No.

Mr. CARLING. If the Government find that the people of the Maritime Provinces do not require these stations, the Government may not consider it necessary to incur the expenditure; but I take power to have one established for the three Provinces.

Mr. FISHER. Does the hon. gentleman propose to immediately establish the different stations?

Mr. CARLING. I have stated that we are taking the necessary powers, and it will depend on the House as to whether we shall go on with the undertaking at once or not.

Mr. DAVIES. I think the hon. gentleman recognises the force of the remarks I have made, and that to establish an experimental farm in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick might be of no benefit to Prince Edward Island. It cannot be of any benefit to Prince Edward Island if it is established in New Brunswick, because of the difference in the position of the Provinces. The hon. gentleman might take power to establish a station in the island.

Committee reported.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

ST. GABRIEL LEVEE AND RAILWAY COMPANY.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 116) to incorporate the St. Gabriel Levee and Railway Company.—(Mr. Curran.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. MASSUE. It is not my intention to oppose this clause, but I should like that this company should be held responsible for any damage that may be done in keeping the water away from Montreal. It may overflow some of the parishes on the south shore, and the company should be held responsible for any damage produced in that way.

Mr. SHANLY. The area which it is proposed to save by the embankment is so small that it could not possibly raise the water more than a very few inches on the other side of the river. If a man's farm is covered with four or five feet of water the addition of half an inch or so would make little if any difference.

Bill read the third time and passed.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 48) to amend the Act to incorporate the Niagara Frontier Bridge Company.—(Mr. Rykert.)

Bill (No. 73) to incorporate the Winnipeg and Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Haggart.)

Bill (No. 95) to incorporate the Victoria and Sault Ste. Marie Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Dawson.)

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee.

Library of Parliament.....$31,850 00

Mr. SPEAKER. The two last items of contingencies of the Library, $2,500, and binding newspapers, &c., $2,000, include an increase of $500. Last year the vote for contingencies was $2,000, or $500 less than the year previous, but the Librarians have shown it is impossible to get on with that amount, and that it is necessary to go back to the old vote of $2,500. As regards the binding of newspapers, pamphlets and books, $1,000 was given to buy books on America. They are mostly old works, some not bound and others with old binding, and also they comprise a number of pamphlets which require to be bound, and this has increased the cost of binding.

Mr. MILLS. Last year, when the Government decided to appoint two Librarians, they stated that the increased efficiency which that change would give, would have the effect of cutting down the expense, but now it appears we are going back to the old figures.

Mr. SPEAKER. The salaries are reduced $1,600, and the only increases are in the binding, $600, and the contingencies, $500, so that there is a net diminution.

To meet probable amount for veterans of war of 1812.... $9,800 00

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. These gentlemen must average in number 100.

Mr. BOWELL. According to the Auditor-General's report the number is over 100. Before they are placed on the pension list, a full investigation is made.

Pensions payable on account of rebellion of 1885..... $20,000 00

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I presume the Minister of Militia will give us a statement of the rule that is adopted or to be adopted with respect to these, and also of the pensions granted. If I understand it, these are annual pensions and have nothing to do with the granting of gratuities.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Minister of Militia will lay before the House a statement of the pensions and the gratuities and of the rule adopted in coming to a conclusion. Certain rules have been adopted by the Government which are followed in every case.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Although I am in favor of dealing very liberally with persons who have been disabled, under the circumstances, still I would call the attention of the Minister to this circumstance that apparently—I say only apparently, because we have not the information requisite on which to base a judgment—there have been considerable differences in the treatment awarded to different persons. Many statements have been made to me, according to which, apparently, men entitled to the same pensions have received different sums. The Minister will understand that the fullest possible discussion must be had whenever the question is brought up, and I understand the information required will be laid on the Table on Tuesday.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It will. The treatment, of course, is different in different cases. For instance, a man has been wounded or rendered unfit for work for a time, and the amount given him will depend altogether on the length of time during which he has been unfit for work. In another case it is a wound. Well, if another man has the same sort of wound, he may not have the same pension, because the grade in the army was different. The treatment is different in that way, the same as in the regular service.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not speaking of gratuities, but of pensions. This sum of $20,000 does not include gratuities, I understand.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No.

Additional public building, Wellington street, Ottawa, $110,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the total cost of this work expected to be?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. As I stated last year, the total cost, including the site, will be $594,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is equivalent to a rental of $24,000 a year. I must say that I think that, with the accommodation that we have in the two large buildings, $600,000 additional does appear a very large sum to provide for the number of clerks that are going to be accommodated there. How many employees does the hon. gentleman suppose will be lodged in that building?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That is very difficult to say. Besides the basement, there will be three regular storeys, including the ground floor, and besides that the attics. The attics, as far as I can see now, will be used for the model rooms, which will give plenty of space for that purpose, and these models will be put in such a position as to be able to be examined and to be of some use. Then, the archives will be in the basement, and that portion of the building is vaulted and will accommodate all the archives of the Departments. Then there will be three regular storeys, where three or four Departments will be accommodated, which will relieve the main buildings, and will thus give accommodation for the now overcrowded Departments.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the total cost of the land that we have purchased? It was purchased, I think, in several parcels. Can the hon. gentleman give me the sums paid for each portion respectively?

Sir HECTOR LANGENIN. I cannot say exactly now. I gave it last year and we have not purchased anything since.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My recollection is that last year a portion was given. I think a sum of $20,000 was mentioned, but I think the actual cost of the site was a good deal more than that.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I gave the total cost last year which covered not only what had been purchased during the six months but before; it covered the whole ground.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I see by a memorandum in the hon. gentleman's report, which I had not observed, that the total cost of the site purchased, interest, legal services, &c., is put at $90,555. I had been under the impression that it was pretty large, about $60,000, but I had no idea that it amounted to $90,000.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I was under the impression that it was $95,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What quantity of land have we got, and were there buildings on it?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The building is 280 feet on Wellington street, 110 feet on Elgin street, and 99 feet on Metcalfe street. That will give an average of about 100 feet in depth. I would say in round figures it would be about 28,000 square feet. That would be a little over $3 a square foot. That is not excessive.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is the hon. gentleman's mode of calculation according to Montreal habit, but our habit here is so much per running foot. I should say that $300 per foot, which this amounts to, is a very high price indeed to pay for land in Ottawa on a street which cannot be considered a business street, as the hon. gentleman knows, although for certain purposes I admit the land there is of value.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Very valuable.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. $300 a foot is approximating to Winnipeg prices.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There were certain buildings on the property.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I remember them perfectly.

Mr. WATSON. It is too far from Winnipeg to be worth that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the sum paid was much more than any other purchaser than Government would be likely to give, and I remember a very large charge was made by Mr. O'Connor, the legal gentleman who was employed, for his valuable services in getting us this land. I think to pay $300 a foot and several thousand dollars besides to your legal adviser for procuring it, is altogether too much.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No, it was not considered too much. At the time we bought this property it was considered a very moderate sum. We understood that if the Government had not employed an agent, as they did, to purchase the land, the proprietors, knowing it was for the Government, would have demanded a larger sum. Of course we wanted to obtain it at the market rate. I think if the hon. gentleman tried to purchase, for example, that property between the Club and Bank street, he would find that the price paid was very moderate.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is just the reason why. I am interested in the Club, as one of the original proprietors of the concern, and I have had dealings in various ways, through other corporations, with some of the properties along that range; and although the hon. gentleman may be right enough in saying that when you come to buy you find it difficult to get a property, I can tell him that when you come to sell in the city of Ottawa there is great difficulty in realising approximately to this. I think that was a large commission to pay for the purchase. I do not think last year that the sum the hon. gentleman mentioned was at all as large. Did he not pay two or three thousand to Mr. O'Connor for obtaining this?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I do not remember the exact amount now, but we paid him the ordinary commission on purchase.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is a very heavy commission.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. After that, Mr. O'Connor was engaged by the Department of Justice to look after these titles. I think he was paid what he would have been paid by other firms.

Mr. WELDON. I see a sum of $6,386 paid to the corporation for a drain. Is that the whole expense?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We paid our share of the drain. We had to have a drain from Bank street, that is the street at the end of the property belonging to the Government, and the drain had to be cut from that street up to the building that is now being erected, in order to give the proper level.

Mr. DAVIES. Was not there a partial drain before?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No, not for this building. It had to be deepened very much on account of the basement, in order to make it perfectly dry for the archives below.

Mr. DAVIES. I understand we paid the whole expense.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That was our share. I think it cost more than that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In looking over the expenditure for last last year, I observe that under this head occurs a charge which I hardly understand, "Salaries in Ottawa not charged to Civil Government." How did such an item as that come to be charged to the public buildings on Wellington street?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There is a staff of officers who are not permanent officials of the Department, the assistant architect, and other officers of that kind. Their salaries have to be distributed amongst the different buildings under control of the Department, and that is done according to the amount put on the building; because you cannot every day ascertain exactly what amount of work has been done on each building, and therefore that has to be apportioned on the different buildings, which has been the custom for a number of years.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, but when the total expenditure was only $40,000 all told, $4,610 appears to be a large charge to put for a single year on the expenditure of $40,000.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It may happen to be a little more on this building than on another, but of course it has to be apportioned upon all the buildings.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How was it made up?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There are only two or three of these officers who are permanent, all the others are temporary, and have been employed for various terms from two to twenty years, as the service required.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps the hon. gentleman does not understand me. You see here above there is a charge for $1,000 for the clerk of works, and if these salaries are properly charged against these buildings, I want to know what work was done? Does this represent the drawing of the plans and all that kind of thing?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes, there are one or two clerks who have permanent charge of the building itself. When that building is completed these officers will disappear. Besides that, you have overseers, and you have some one to make up the pay-list, and sometimes you have to despatch one of the officers to see how things are going. Sometimes there is a quarrel between the clerk of works or the local architect and the contractor, and an officer has to be sent from the Department to settle the difficulty. All these expenses are involved, and they have to be paid in some way. Well, this is apportioned on the different buildings as far as possible, according to the amount of work to be done, or the trouble incurred.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, it seems a large amount. Who is this gentleman, Mr. Charlebois, whose name I see here?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. He is the contractor.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is he the same personage who was once rather contumeliously spoken of by the hon. gentleman's predecessor.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think I answered that last year, and I answered yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then who is correct, the hon. gentleman or his predecessor? Because I recollect that the hon. gentleman's predecessor described Mr. Charlebois, if I remember aright, as a person he would not entrust with any contract whatever.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. He has showed himself to be a good contractor.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We ought to have had him up in British Columbia so as to save that $209,000 on the contract there.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken about that. I think the contractor had made what you would call a mistake, by depositing a cheque that was good only for three days, and therefore my predecessor rejected the cheque.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman's predecessor had a secretary, who had unfortunately been trained in business habits, and he telegraphed to find out if the cheque was good; and, finding it was so, was indiscreet enough to report it. I notice Mr. Daniel O'Connor received $5,718.37 for legal services, and 3 per cent. commission on land purchase, which amounts to $2,195. That was on the score of this purchase, I believe.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No doubt it was correct. In regard to the commission, that was in my Department. As regards the legal fees, they, of course, were based on those allowed by the courts.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to know on what principle a commission of 3 per cent. could have been paid to a gentleman who was acting as solicitor for the Government at the time, and receiving nearly $7,000 for his legal services. In ordinary business, although a solicitor is very often employed to negotiate the purchase of property, I have no recollection in my private experience, which is moderately extensive, of ever paying a solicitor any such sum for negotiating a purchase for me, or do I know that it was ever paid. In case of sale the matter is different. Then, no doubt, a commission is often allowed to the solicitor; but to pay over $2,000 to a solicitor, who that very year had received $6,700 from the Government for legal fees, looks an outrage.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I know Mr. O'Connor had a good deal of trouble, and was employed a large part of his time in securing this property for the Government. In so far as regards his legal fees, Mr. O'Connor had to look over the titles and deeds, and had to follow the cases into the courts and see that the title was made good. The amount paid to him was fixed by the Department of Justice according to the established rates.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not raising any question now as to whether the charges for legal services were right or wrong. I am pointing our the extreme awkwardness and inconvenience of paying a legal gentleman a heavy commission on the purchase of land. The thing appears to be contrary, not merely to professional custom and etiquette, but it is a temptation to a man to give more than what the property is worth, because the larger the amount the more his commission would reach.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The remuneration was fixed according to the work done by the gentleman. The Government saw that the property had been purchased at what they considered a very reasonable figure. If it had not been thus purchased, the public would have had probably to pay $50,000 or $60,000 more. That being so, we thought the agent of the Government should receive a reasonable amount of remuneration, and that 3 per cent. under the circumstances was not too much. If instead of employing Mr. O'Connor, we had employed another gentleman, he would have had to be paid the same amount, and Mr. O'Connor, who was afterwards employed to look over the titles, would have obtained his legal fees. We would have had in any case to pay the same amount whether we employed one party or two parties. The amount was considered reasonable and not too heavy.

Mr. DAVIES. I am sorry the hon. gentleman assumes a tone of apology for this charge.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I do not.

Mr. DAVIES. This matter was discussed last year, and it was admitted by both sides of the House to be totally indefensible. It is a totally wrong principle to pay a solicitor a commission. The amount of money paid for the land affords no index of the trouble in searching the title. During the discussion last year it was stated that in the Maritime Provinces such a charge for searching titles is never known. Some hon. members said there was a rule in Ontario, which had been followed by the Government in this case. It was then, however, stated that the amount of commission paid in this case was far in excess to the ordinary rate. I remember distinctly that the charges were acknowledged by the Government to be indefensible, and a promise was made by the Government that they should not be repeated. I should therefore regret if any language used by the Minister could be in any sense interpreted or twisted into a defence for what has been done in this case. The amount of money received by that gentleman was nearly $9,000, a good income for a couple of years for a practising lawyer. This matter was thoroughly discussed last year, but the Minister does not appear to be so strong in condemnation of the principle as he was last year. It must be remembered if this practice of paying commission is allowed in Ottawa the principle must be extended all over the Dominion.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have nothing for which to apologise, and I will not apologise now. The charge made at the time was considered by the Government a proper charge, and we paid it. If the charge had to be paid again, and we thought it a reasonable one, we would pay it on our responsibility. As to the fees of which the hon. gentleman speaks, he will remember perfectly well, that at that time there was a long discussion about the fees, not only in this case, but in a number of others. Some were considered heavy, and I do not say that I did not consider some of them rather heavy myself, as I stated at the time. The Minister of Justice, or some of the other Ministers, stated that great care would be taken that these fees would be carefully looked into in the future, so that no error might occur. As to the commission granted to this gentleman, we thought, after the time and labor given and the capacity he showed in obtaining this properity at the rate he obtained it, he was entitled to the amount received.

Mr. VAIL. Those commissions seem to me to be rather high, and I do no not think my hon. friend could have taken the precaution of ascertaining what commissions are paid for the sale and purchase of property. It is generally understood that the commission paid for the sale of property is considerably higher than that paid for buying property. I know that I purchased some property myself, in Ottawa, at one time, and the commission charged for the purchase was 1 per cent., one-half by the seller and one half by the buyer, so that the commission in this case seems to have been 2 per cent. more than that usually paid.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My objection was not in this gentleman's legal fees. The reason I called attention to it was that this Government was a most excellent customer of Mr. D. O'Connor. As a matter of fact, when you happen to be doing a great deal of business with a solicitor, as the Government was in this case, the solicitor is only too happy, in a general way, to lend his services for the purchase of property, taking his profits out of the business it brings to his office, and the examination of titles and so on. I do not recollect of ever having paid a commission to the extent of 3 per cent. for the purchase of property, though I have known large fees to be charged for the sale of property.

Mr. WELDON. I see that this gentleman got $8,943 last year, and the firm of O'Connor and Hogg $660, making between $9,000 and $10,000 for them in one year. I do not know whether he is a relation of John O'Connor who got $5,000 or so, but if he is that family seems to be well treated.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. They are not relations.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. One O'Connor family, would seem to be enough at this rate.

Esquimalt Graving Dock $45,000 00

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the total cost of that work?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In round figures about $750,000 or $800,000, the British Government contributing £50,000 sterling.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If I recollect aright the Minister stated in a former discussion on this subject that some alteration was to be made in the dock so as to take iron clads of larger dimension.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The dock is of the dimensions asked by the British Government when it was undertaken, and as I stated last year, it was so planned that another dock might be built at the end of this, so that we could have gone from one dock to another and extended the one to two or three docks. But as we were building only one, and the entrance was provided at the port end of the dock as well as the lower end of the dock, if instead of doing that we were rounding the dock we would give about 50 feet more in length. We communicated the matter to the British Government and they agreed to that, but they insisted upon having the dock completed within the time so that their vessels might be docked then. The report we have about the dock is that it would be large enough for all purposes of the fleet there, and the fleet that visits that port. Representations have been made since, however, to induce the Government to increase the length of the dock, but we thought that inasmuch as we had a contract with the contractors and the dock was being built in accordance with the arrangement with the British Government, and as we were bound to complete the dock within a certain time, in order to receive from the British Government this sum of $250,000, we have been of opinion that we should not change the dimensions of the dock, but that if in future years the dimensions of the vessels on that coast should increase, then it would be quite time enough for us to increase the length of the dock.

Mr. VAIL. There is a statement in the Auditor General's report that the sum of $1,894 was expended for advertising. Surely that is a mistake.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No, we had to call for tenders twice, and this being a large work we had to advertise not only in British Columbia but all over the Dominion in order to have the best competition possible, and that is the reason it came to that amount.

Mr. DAVIES. The £50,000 which the British Government are to contribute has been refunded, has it?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is to be paid by the 1st of January.

Mr. DAVIES. But we have paid British Columbia the $600,000 we voted to recoup their expenditure.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We have paid about $250,000.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman, in his report on this graving dock, says that we voted over $600,000 to recoup the Local Government the money they expended on the work.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Not only that, but other amounts mentioned at the time of the settlement with British Columbia.

Mr. DAVIES. The money the British Government were to repay us has not come yet?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No, it will not come till after the 1st of January.

Mr. DAVIES. Then, the total we shall pay will be $1,000,000, less the $250,000 contributed by the British Government.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES. When does the hon. gentleman expect that that dock will be finished?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. About the end of September.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do you propose to pass to our account the $250,000 paid by the British Government, or simply apply it to the work? In other words, are you going to spend $300,000 in 1886-87 in addition to this $45,000?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We intend asking in the supplementary estimates for $250,000 to correspond with the $250,000 that will be paid in January next by the British Government. Of course, that being debt, it must go into the public coffers, and therefore we must have the authority of Parliament to draw it.

Amount required for construction of Port Arthur harbor and for Kaministiquia River..... $70,000 00

Mr. TROW. How is this sum apportioned?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The intention is to take not more than $20,000 to complete the works on the Kaministiquia River.

Mr. TROW. Can the hon. gentleman inform me of the width and depth of the cut at the mouth of the river?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The channel will be 100 feet wide, and of an average depth of 18 feet in the centre from the mouth of the river to the Canadian Pacific Railway elevator.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What will be the total cost of each?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The work on the Kaministiquia will cost $35,000 or $40,000, and the Port Arthur works about $200,000, when the amount we are now asking will be expended.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the nature of the work at Port Arthur?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is a large breakwater. I think we shall require about $50,000 more to complete the work. Then it will be a very perfect harbor.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the size of the breakwater?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is from 24 to 30 feet wide, and 1,600 feet long. It is on the east side of the harbor, running about north-east.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I notice in the charge for the Kaministiquia River that the dredging is put down at 23 cents per cubic foot, which is a little over $6 per cubic yard. Is not that a rather excessive charge?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The work is done by contract, and we accepted the lowest tender.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is no rock, it is mud bottom, is it not?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is hard clay.

Mr. SHANLY. The price is certainly high if it is clay dredging. Perhaps there is not a large quantity.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There was 120,000 feet dredged out.

Mr. TROW. I would ask whether the spring freshets cause accumulations in this cutting.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No. It was thought at first that the bottom was quicksand, and engineers so reported; but on further examination it was found that there were three or four inches of sand and then hard clay. That clay, after being removed from the water and exposed to the atmosphere, becomes as hard as brick. There has been no filling in, so far as I have been informed, since the work has been done.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to know whether the hon. gentleman's late colleague, Lieutenant Governor Aikins, is quite satisfied with this expenditure on the Kaministiquia. When I was Minister of Finance I think that hon. gentleman had a committee of enquiry in the Senate to show the extravagance Mr. Mackenzie was guilty of in making use of the Kaministiquia at all, and it would be interesting to know if he approves of this expenditure.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am not in a position to answer the hon. gentleman affirmatively; but I think if Lieutenant Governor Aikins saw the work done he would be satisfied with the result.

Mr. DAWSON. As some hon. gentlemen were making enquiries about the position of the breakwater at Port Arthur, and as I am tolerably well acquainted with it, I may inform them that it extends in front of the town and parallel to the shore 2,000 feet, and that, inside this breakwater, there are a number of wharves built by private individuals who have laid out $100,000 thereon. These wharves run straight from the shore, and are protected by the breakwater which passes in front of them, half a mile outside. This breakwater will make Port Arthur a most magnificent harbor. It may be of some interest to the House to know that Port Arthur has grown within the last three years from being a village of 1,200 inhabitants, to a town of 6,000 inhabitants, and that its shipping has increased from 150,000 or 200,000 tons yearly, to 500,000 tons yearly. It is now the most important harbor in Ontario as regards shipping. My hon. friend from South Perth (Mr. Trow) used to take a little pleasure in having a quiet joke about the differences regarding the Kaministiquia harbor, but now all are united. The people of the town and river are acting hand in hand in opening up their respective places, and are contemplating a street railway between the two. The population is increasing fast, and the whole country progressing wonderfully.

Cape Tormentine Harbor, N.B..... $130,000 00

Mr. DAVIES. A very large sum was expended, nearly $5,000, in obtaining a survey. Will the hon. Minister give some details of the results of that survey, as the report has not been brought down? and will he bring down the report without a formal notice? The report is going to assume an importance which was not, perhaps, thought of at the time, as the Railways and Canals Committee has now before it a Bill with reference to building a subway, and a good deal of discussion will take place on the subject, particularly with regard to the character of the bottom in and around Cape Tormentine, as to whether it is sandy or rocky, because the feasibility of a subway depends largely on that fact. Have the Government come to a conclusion as to the exact place where they are going to build this?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The survey has cost a good deal, because we thought before locating the pier we ought to make sure of a proper location. There were two or three places suggested, and we thought we should have each place properly surveyed. I have no objection to bringing down such extracts of the report of the engineer who made the survey, as will give the information the hon. gentleman wants; but I cannot give the whole report because there are a number of matters in it for the information of the Government engineer who has to make a report, and whose report is the one that will be submitted to Parliament. I am not in a position to give the exact location because I have not the description here, but tenders were called for some time ago, and so many contractors from different portions of the Dominion wished to tender, that, seeing the delay was rather short, about eight or ten days before the time fixed for the acceptance of tenders I extended the time, to give a chance to all who wished to tender. I think to morrow is the last day. The tenders will be opened most likely on Monday. I expect there will be very keen competition, and we may expect to have good contractors to build the work.

Mr. DAVIES. The site chosen is directly opposite where the old cable house on Cape Tormentine stood, a little distance to the north of where the present cable house stands.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have the plan here, and if the hon. gentleman will cross the House I will show it to him.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I object to the hon. gentleman crossing the House.

Mr. DAVIES. As it will be only temporary I hope the objection will be withdrawn.

Mr. McCARTHY. You would not like to lose him?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would not exchange him, I was about to say for a dozen, but if it was a case of three dozen, we might consider it.

Mr. McCARTHY. Well we can afford that.

Mr. LANDERKIN. We will all go over very soon to that side.

Mr. SHANLY. In speaking of the probable location of that pier, does the Minister of Public Works refer to it in connection with the possible subway?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No, it has no connection with the sub-way at all. It was determined upon before.

Mr. DAVIES. I only mentioned the subway because the report on the location of that wharf will give an idea of the bottom, and I wish to have that information when the Bill in reference to the subway comes before the Railway Committee.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The committee meets on Wednesday next, I will see my chief engineer and secure a copy of that portion of the report which relates to this, and I will have a copy for the House and a copy for the committee.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Supposing the work to be carried out, what is the total cost expected to be?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The tenders are not opened yet, and really I cannot say. The amount of $150,000 that was put in in the first instance was of course guesswork. It may cost a great deal more than that, for all I know.

Public Buildings, Nova Scotia..... $47,000 00

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the amount of $4,600 complete the work on the Amherst public building, and what has been the total cost?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This will complete it. The total cost will have been $41,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How much of that was for site?

Mr. DAVIES. The site was granted by the town. The contract was only $27,000, I understand. What is going to make it cost $41,000?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The amount of the contract was $27,574. Then you have the furniture and fittings for the post office, custom house and so on, $3,359; architect, $1,000; clerk of works, $600.

Mr. DAVIES. That only makes $30,000.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The total amount expended up to the 31st December, $24,000; estimated from 31st December to 1st July, $8,172; grant asked, $4,000; still required for grading footpath, superintendence, &c., $3,504. That makes a total of $40,933.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I see that one George Thompson is employed as clerk of works at $75 a month, that is at the rate of $900 a year. Is he an officer of the Department or a person resident on the spot, and selected?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. He must be some person selected on the spot.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Because the charges for clerk of works come to a very appreciable item of the total cost. Now, the expenditure of $12,000 would hardly necessitate, one would suppose, an annual charge for clerk of works at $900. Really the total expense was probably all put in within two or three months.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We can hardly have a reliable clerk of works for less than $2.50 a day.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. So long as he is actually employed, I grant.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. You employ a clerk of works during the building season, and afterwards you pay him at a lower rate, if his work is lighter; for example, to look after the stone that is being cut, in regard to dimensions and so on, and to see that no bad stone or stone with some fault should be accepted. I think the amount paid is well invested for the interests of the Government.

Mr. WELDON. I find an item of legal services, the Hon. J. Armstrong, $10. The amount is not large, but I find the same thing in nearly every contract, in addition to the legal services of the agents of the Minister of Justice.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In these cases, it was when the Department of Justice was very overworked, and they could not look after the titles and so on, and we had to have a legal gentleman to look after those matters. He examined the papers and was paid his fee.

Mr. WELDON. Did this gentleman search the title with regard to the Amherst public building?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That I cannot say.

Mr. WELDON. I see in the Bathurst public buildings the services of Mr. Harrison, the agent of the Minister of Justice, in connection with the site, $78, and also the Hon. J. Armstrong, $10. I find this all through the buildings. Is this gentleman in Ottawa?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That gentleman was going to the different places and examining the contracts. He had to see that they were prepared and properly signed.

Mr. WELDON. I see by the Auditor General's report that the whole amount is about $655.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Perhaps so; but the Department now has been organised in such a way that we have not to pay these amounts any more. The titles are being examined by the Department itself, and we have now a form for these contracts which curtails the expense very much, and thus the expense has about ceased.

Mr. WELDON. I understood it was the business of the agents of the Minister of Justice to look after these matters in St. John and Halifax.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. A large number of these contracts having to be prepared, the Department of Justice could not possibly attend to them from press of work. We could not wait until they could attend to them, as the contracts would have to be delayed, and therefore we had to employ a legal gentlemen to prepare these contracts in the proper form. Besides that we have now a form by which these contracts can be prepared without any legal assistance.

Mr. DAVIES. I must say that I do not understand what this gentleman was paid for doing. I think that this particular account has appeared in the Public Accounts of previous years.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It has appeared.

Mr. DAVIES. That is the expense for last year. It appeared in every public contract let. There are two items which appear with unfailing regularity every year, that is for the names of C. S. MacLaughlin and the Hon. J. Armstrong. Now, so far as the Hon. J. Armstrong is concerned —and if he did any legal work, of course he ought to be paid for it—but we know that the contracts are prepared by the Minister of Justice, the forms have been settled long since, and everybody who has had anything to do with the contracts knows that the forms are all printed and there is nothing for a lawyer to do about them, all the agreements —everything has been settled upon long since, and these printed forms have only to be filled up by the officials of the Department. Now, what Mr. Armstrong did was simply to do a clerk's work. Talk about the Minister of Justice being overworked! I am surprised to hear that statement, because I remember very well that the deputy head was occupied in work outside of his Department, in consolidating the Statutes, and made $4,000 or $5,000 for it besides. So that, far from being overworked, the deputy head of that Department—I am throwing no aspersions upon the gentleman at all, no doubt he did his work very well—was paid $5,000 for doing extra work this very year; and it appears now that while he was doing that extra work, another gentleman was employed to do the work he ought to have done and the country pays $6,000 or $7,000 for it.

Mr. HESSON. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES. Does the hon. gentleman's cheer mean an approval or a disapproval? I never knew him yet to disapprove any act the Government ever did.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Does the hon. gentleman who criticises these legal expenses remember his own $15,000? Does the hon. gentleman from St. John (Mr. Weldon) remember his $5,000? Mr. Speaker, I must say that the lawyers are a hard lot. The country that has to sustain the lawyers has a hard lot.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In the case of the hon. member for Prince Edward Island we have not much cause to complain, for if we paid him handsomely for his services, we got four or five millions out of our American friends for it. However, we have here an illustration of the result of employing officers of a Department to do work that does not properly belong to it. The Deputy Minister of Justice, I believe, is a very excellent officer, but I call attention to the fact that he has been in receipt of $5,000 for extra work during two years. It appears, from what my hon. friend says, that the Department of Justice was not able, during that time, to overtake its own work, and consequently somebody else was employed to do work appertaining to the Department, at the very time when its regular head was adding $2,500 a year to his salary for extra work. Now, that is not business; it is not expedient, and it is not desirable that it should be done.

Mr. THOMPSON. As regards this sum paid in connection with the revision of the Statutes, I did not suppose the question would be raised this evening, and as it may come at some future stage I shall be prepared to give a fuller explanation than perhaps would be regular now. I think hon. gentlemen opposite will agree with me that it was desirable that this gentleman should be associated with the commission on the revision of the Statutes. Sir Alexander Campbell, my predecessor, sat upon that commission as head of the Department, of course, without remuneration. But the services which the head of the Department could render on that commission could necessarily not be so close and constant as were desirable, and I think, from what I know of the work and from what I have heard of it, that it was exceedingly desirable that the deputy should be one of the commission.

Mr. DAVIES. Do I understand the Minister of Public Works that there will not be a repetition of this charge the present year.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No, it has ceased now.

Mr. DAVIES. I would entirely relieve my mind if he would tell me now the particular legal services that gentleman did.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. He looked over the contracts for the different works. Now, you have not only to look to the printed forms, but you have to look to the important matters in a new contract, which is not a printed form, as the hon. gentleman knows, and of course we had to see that it was properly drawn up, in order that there might be no difficulty afterwards. In a contract of $20,000 or $50,000 it was important to make sure that that document was properly executed, and we paid a small fee for it. But that has ceased now, the contracts now are being prepared by ourselves, and if we have any doubt about any additional form to be added to the contract, we shall consult the Department of Justice.

Mr. HESSON. When the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), was speaking, I was thinking how differently hon. gentlemen of the legal profession measure the value of their services. I remembered hearing a legal gentleman in this House saying that he was sacrificing an income from his profession of something like $25,000 a year. But we find other hon. gentlemen in this House valuing their services at $5,000 or $6,000 a year, so it is awkward for a non-professional gentleman to come to any conclusion as to what value we ought really to place upon their services.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The objection to paying this amount of $5,000 to the Deputy Minister of Justice is that it is paying two salaries. We pay him $4,000 a year, which may be enough or may not; but, over and above that amount, he has received $2,500 a year for two years for so-called extra services.

Mr. DAVIES. I do not want any hon. gentleman to think that in my opinion the Deputy Minister of Justice is overpaid. He is not so by any means.

Mr. BOWELL. Nor any other lawyer, I suppose.

Mr. DAVIES. Yes, in the case of Mr. O'Connor, who acted in regard to the new buildings.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is only right to say with respect to Mr. O'Connor's charges that his services in connection with that property were of a somewhat peculiar nature. He acted as the agent of the Department, and not in the capacity merely of a solicitor. He obtained the refusal of all the properties from a large number of owners, and he had to conduct that business in a special manner, of course without disclosing the fact that the Government would be the purchaser. In conducting those negotiations it became necessary for him to provide the purchase money until the transaction was completed.

Mr. WELDON. Three per cent. is charged for commission besides the legal charges.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is the Minister of Justice aware that Mr. O'Connor fills another very important position in the city, namely, that of President of the Conservative Association? Did any of this money go to that particular fund? There is a nigger in the fence.

Mr. VAIL. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will give some information in regard to the vote of $8,000 asked for the New Glasgow public building.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That amount will complete the building. The total estimated cost, including heating, etc., is $42,000.

Mr. WELDON. What are these amounts which constantly appear as having been paid to S. J. MacLaughlin?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. A photographer is employed in the Public Works Department. In order to save the travelling expenses of the chief architect or chief engineer, as the case may be, the photographer obtains the photograph of the building at a certain moment. The chief architect is able to judge of the progress of the building from the photograph, and thus saves his own time and travelling expenses. If there is any difficulty between the clerk of works and the local architect and contractor, the photograph is there and the chief architect can decide the matter. With respect to the North Sydney post office, custom house, &c., $15,000 more will be required to complete. The whole cost will be $25,000. With respect to South Sydney post office, custom house, &c., $3,500, the difficulty has been about the site. The total cost of the buildings will be $31,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How far apart are North and South Sydney?

Mr. McDOUGALL. The distance by water is seven miles, by land seventeen miles.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You give these places, a few miles apart, two post offices, two custom houses, and two et ceteras.

Mr. WELDON. Just as Pictou has two railways.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They are very well taken care of. In spite of all that, the member in the Local House is to-day supporting a resolution for secession. A grateful people those Nova Scotians!

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. With respect to the vote of $10,000 to the Yarmouth post office, custom house, &c, when this amount has been expended, $5,000 more will be required to complete. The total cost will be $41,000.

Public Buildings, P.E. I.	$41,500 00

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Looking at this, I find great difficulty in understanding on what principle the salaries in Ottawa, not charged to civil government, could have run up to the sum of $2,288, which is the amount according to the Auditor General's report.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There must be some mistake about that, as the information I have is that we have expended, up to the 1st of July, $44,597 on this building.

Mr. DAVIES. When the old custom house and post office was burned down at Charlottetown, the Department of Public Works rented the old bank of Prince Edward Island, and they expended in refitting that bank the enormous sum, as it appears to me, of $6,207. I find, however, on looking at page 249, that of this $1,587 was expended for a safe for the Assistant Receiver General's office. The salaries in Ottawa not charged to civil government is for the construction of the new building now going on. The whole amount is charged in the Auditor General's report to Charlottetown public buildings, but a portion of it relates to the new public buildings going up, while the other items consist of repairs, furniture, &c. I cannot see how in the world they spend $6,000 in alterations, and there must be some mistake about that, as I do not think so much was paid.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That may be, but the system followed is for the clerk of works or the architect on the spot to report what is wanted, give it in detail and put opposite each article his valuation, which of course varies according to the locality. We have in the Department sufficient data to allow the chief architect to see that the prices are reasonable, and if found reasonable, then they are ordered.

Mr. DAVIES. I do not at all complain of extravagance in that regard—in fact it is in the other direction, and although they have erected this new building, the building is so small that no reasonable expenditure could accommodate the people. In fact it is simply terrible the way the public are used in that building. There is no extravagance in that matter; I think if there was a little more the public would be better satisfied.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am much pleased to have another good witness on that side of the House in that direction. Of course it is possible with these works scattered all over the Dominion that abuses may occur, but there is a great deal of care taken by the heads of the different branches, and they are honest, honorable and able men, men who do the best they can, and who I think generally succeed in taking care of the interests of the Department.

Mr. VALL. I do not think there could be very much danger of extravagance in Nova Scotia, simply because there is scarcely any money spent there.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps when the secession resolutions are passed you will hear about that. What are these new Dominion buildings likely to cost?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. $92,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I find here that salaries in Ottawa, not charged to civil government, amount to $2,288; and the total expenditure, exclusive of this, is about $3,800, after deducting the safe. Now, I understand, in a sort of fashion, how the hon. gentleman came to make a charge of $4,600, for a work which he expected to cost $600,000; but here is a work which will only cost some $90,000, and the proportion of salaries at Ottawa seems to be enormously large, because it is in addition to the charges for clerks of works, and architects.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. As I said before, the total expenditure has to be divided into different works. The object of that is, by taking these men temporarily, when the works are completed you may discharge them, and thus you save not only the permanent salaries, but the superannuation afterwards.

Mr. DAVIES. On page 367 of the Auditor General's report you will find a list of salaries not charged to civil government which foot up to $52,404. At the foot there is an abstract showing the amount charged to the Public Works Department. What we want to know is by what rule is this division made?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is impossible to define it according to rule, but one cannot know how long the different clerks have been employed on this or that work. It is divided among all these works. We follow the same rule that was followed before.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is this work equivalent to architect's work, such as preparing plans and specifications?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes, a portion of it. For example, the chief architect prepares a certain plan or sketch and sends that to the local architect. But we cannot exactly divide the charges for such work to the dollar among the different works.

Mr. McINTYRE. I wish to know who is the contractor for the construction of the Montague post office and custom house.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. L. A. Wilmot.

Mr. McINTYRE. I see that $800 was paid for the site, which appears to me to be a large amount for a village like Montague. What are the dimensions of the site?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. 103 feet by 76 feet 6 inches.

Mr. McINTYRE. It appears to me it is an extraordinary sum to pay for a site of those dimensions in a village like Montague.

Mr. DAVIES. Does the hon. gentleman know the village at all?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No.

Mr. DAVIES. I see that his report states that it was bought from Lambert's estate, but the money was paid to McEvoy.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's P.E.I.). I think I can explain that satisfactorily to the hon. gentleman. The property was bought from the Lambert estate, but it was bought through McEvoy as the administrator of the property. The price is not excessive at all, considering the price of other properties bought in the vicinity at the same time. Other properties as well situated could not be bought for less money.

Mr. McINTYRE. Is the work now going ahead? This amount of $4,800 was voted some three years ago, and as far as I have been able to ascertain nothing has been done towards the construction of the building up to the present time.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The work is going on. This amount, I think, will cover the whole cost.

Mr. McINTYRE. When does the hon. gentleman expect to have the building completed?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The date fixed is the 6th of October, 1887.

Mr. DAVIES. I wish to ask whether a claim has been preferred by the contractors for the Summerside public building for a large sum above his contract, and whether that claim has been granted by the hon. Minister.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think a claim has come, but has not been decided.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman knows that the contractor, Mr. Doyle, was here for the larger part of the Session, and I thought probably, from the number of interviews the hon. gentleman had with him, that he had come to some conclusion.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think I saw him twice. I do not remember to have come to any conclusion. If the claim is a large one, it is not likely that it is yet decided.

Mr. DAVIES. What was the amount he asked?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I cannot say that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What was the total cost?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The building will cost altogether $35,500.

Mr. McINTYRE. Is the hon. gentleman sure he did not send away Mr. Doyle quite satisfied?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I do not know; perhaps the hon. gentleman could tell me?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Here is a total expenditure of $11,000 in that year. The architect was paid $375, and that, no doubt, was exclusive of the work done at the headquarters, and the clerk of the works $925, or a total of $1,300, which is a large proportion for work to the amount of $11,000.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The amount paid to the architect is for the preparation of certain plans, and then he receives a certain commission on the amount of the work, which is paid as the work progresses.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does not commission on expenditure include supervision?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. He is obliged to visit the works. We have a clerk of the works who looks to details, who sees that the stones are properly laid and the brick work and mortar are good and so on, but the architect has the general supervision and sees whether the work is well-performed or not.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You are paying $1,300 for services and supervision in the strictest sense on an expenditure of $11,000, which really involves an enormous charge, about 12 per cent. on the expenditure. No private parties would allow the wages of supervision to amount to that. Probably this $11,000 has been expended in five or six months, unless the contractor is very dilatory.

Mr. DAVIES. What rate do you pay the clerk of the works?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The rate is about the same all round. It varies from $2.50 to $3 a day. I do not think the amount has gone beyond that.

Mr. DAVIES. It must have in this case, because it is a small building. The clerk of the works at Charlottetown got $75 a month, and the whole payment was $225; the architect in this case got $375.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That would be at $75 a month, if employed the whole year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In practice, the hon. gentleman will see that the contractor, in all likelihood, would not have many men at work except for five or six months.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. They cannot work more than seven or eight months.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is the first year's work, and as the whole cost is $30,000, spread over three years, it is extremely improbable there was more done in this year than putting up the outside walls.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This work began in 1883. There was more progress made in 1885; and in 1886, up to 31st December, the expenditure was $8,010.

Mr. DAVIES. Is it probable the hon. gentleman will bring down a sum in the Supplementary Estimates to meet the claim Mr. Doyle makes?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If his claim is a proper one, I will have to ask my colleagues to let me put an extra amount in the Supplementary Estimates, and no doubt the hon. gentleman will agree with us that the amount must be paid; but I must say I am quite unaware of the amount he has claimed, and am pretty sure that unless he claims a very small amount, it will not be granted.

Public Works, New Brunswick.....$29,450 00

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Bathurst post office, custom house, &c., will cost in all $31,000; the Newcastle post office, custom house, &c., will cost, when completed, $43,000; the St. Stephens' post office, custom house, &c., will cost in all $30,000.

Public Works, Quebec.....$106,750 00

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The $2,000 for Hull post office and inland revenue office is for heating purposes. With regard to the new drill hall, Quebec, $15,000, the Quebec Government have also contributed $15,000. The Sorel public building will cost, altogether, $40,000. The St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary, $19,500, is the ordinary vote.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What do you mean by that. Is it an annual charge?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is the same charge as last year, and so far as that goes is an annual vote. The convicts there are employed as they are in other penitentiaries, as in Kingston. For example, they were employed in erecting certain buildings and in erecting the stone fence as well. Here it is for the same purpose. For example, they have the wooden fence to enclose a portion of the property of the penitentiary, $1,575. Then there are the general repairs to some of the buildings, $750; cement and sand, $800; wood for burning bricks, &c., $800; quarrying tools, $150, fuel for heating the buildings, $3,900.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Ought not these kind of things to be rather placed under the head of the ordinary expenses of the penitentiary than charged in public works?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. They have been so charged for several years. Last year I know it was so, and I would not be surprised if we found it in the previous year, when the amount was much larger than this.

Mr. WELDON. From the Auditor General's report, it appears to be $28,037 for 1884-85.

Mr. DAVIES. If the hon. gentleman examines the items I do not think he will find they are covered at all by the items for which he asks the vote now.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I was stopped; I have a number of other items.

Mr. DAVIES. It seems to me that the tools and so on for the use of convicts in construction have nothing to do with the items that cost $28,000 in 1884-85.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Perhaps not. Then there is blacksmith's coal, $200; tools for stone-cutters and other trades connected with the building, $1,000; tools, iron, steel, powder, &c., for quarrying, $300; fodder, harness and vehicles for the horses in the service of the Department of Public Works there, $1,000; then the salary of the clerk of works, the three trade instructors and the superintendents of stores, $3,900; piggery, twenty styes, $1,600; erection of dwelling house for keeper, $600; superintendence and contingencies, making altogether, $19,500.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How much does the hon. gentleman expect to spend on St. Vincent de Paul before turning it out complete?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That I am unable to say, because I do not know what may be the requirements of the Department of Justice. They did not give me a statement of the requirements of the penitentiary, what they require to complete the buildings. We have erected certain buildings, but I am pretty sure, from the number of convicts that are there, that we will have to extend them. Then the fence will have to be built in stone. We have, I think, only a wooden fence all around that penitentiary. Last year we purchased a piece of ground, as the hon. gentleman remembers, authority having been given by Parliament, to complete the grounds of the penitentiary. That will have to be fenced in wood for the present, because it will require a large sum of money to build the wall in stone.

Mr. DAVIES. I see already a quarter of a million has been spent on the construction of St. Vincent de Paul—$250,674 for construction alone.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes, it has been expended from year to year. Previous to 1878, from the beginning of the institution, the Government had expended $122,000; in 1878, $7,000 was expended; in 1879, $11,000; in 1880, $9,000; in 1881, $15,000; in 1882, $16,000; in 1883, $19,000; in 1884, $20,000; in 1885, $28,000; and now $20,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How much are the Montreal armories, for which $45,000 is now asked, going to cost?

Mr. FISHER. On what details is this vote going to be laid out?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Perhaps the hon. gentleman is not aware that we called for tenders for that work, and that the contractors are Messrs. Shirley, Brannen & Starrs. The amount of the contract is $15,617. That is for a portion of the work. Then we have to put on the roofs and complete the interior of the next building, the drill hall. This amount I think will suffice to complete, with the exception of about $4,000.

Mr. FISHER. Is this going to put down a floor in the drill hall?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No, I do not think there is a floor. I think it is the soil.

Mr. WELDON. $92,000 have been already expended.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think so.

Mr. VAIL. How much did the city of Montreal pay towards that?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. They provided the grounds.

Mr. VAIL. I thought they agreed to pay a certain amount towards the building.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No.

Mr. VAIL. They offered to at one time.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No, the drill hall is a separate building.

Mr. VAIL. Will the amount of $5,500 complete the Quebec immigration building?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No; we shall require $3,500 more, and I think we shall have to ask for it in the Supplementary Estimates, because the work is proceeding fast and will be completed before the end of the year.

Public Buildings, Ontario..... $104,500 00

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the $1,500 complete the Amherstburg post office, custom house, &c.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is completed. This is for some wooden outhouses.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What was the total sum spent there?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. $33,000. The $3,000 for the Berlin post office is to complete. The total cost will be $36,500. The contract was for about $24,000.

Mr. TROW. What was the price of the site of the post office in Berlin.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. $3,000. It was purchased from Mr. C. Heller.

Mr. WILSON. I would like to ask the Minister how it is that $1,500 are appropriated for the completion of the work at Chatham. I understood that building was completed a year ago.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We had to have a tower in that building, and this is to put in a clock.

Mr. WILSON. The $1,500 is to build a tower, and put in the clock?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No, the tower is there, I understand.

Mr. WILSON. It seems to me that $1,500 will purchase a pretty good clock.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It will be a striking clock.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the $28,000 for the Hamilton post office and custom house complete the building?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. How much has that cost?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We have paid $268,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then $92,000 in the current year, and $28,000 besides?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. A portion of the $92,000 is expended. The total cost will be $351,000.

Mr. O'BRIEN. That is a lot of money to spend on Hamilton.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Hamilton, Toronto, Montreal, Quebec, St. John and Halifax, are large cities.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not see the hon. member for Hamilton present. I have no doubt he would fully appreciate the gentleman's putting Hamilton first. But really I think, although it is quite right that we should put a respectable building at Hamilton, I fail to see that the amount of business done there, can require $350,000 for a post office and custom house. It seems to me to be an enormous sum.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In these large cities we must make our public buildings correspond, in their architecture, to the street in which they are placed and the buildings around them. For example, in Montreal the post office is a beautiful building, and it must be so because it stands alongside the Bank of Montreal and other beautiful buildings. In Quebec we have not so fine a building, because in Quebec, although the buildings are good, their architecture is not so fine as in Montreal.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works to apply the same rule to the Supreme Court House in this city. This court is now housed in a miserable little building, altogether out of proportion to the importance of the work that court performs, and to its position at the capital of the Dominion. I think if he is going to lay down that rule with regard to the post office at Hamilton, he should, on some future occasion, apply it to the Supreme Court of this country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have a strong impression on my mind that a good many hundreds of thousands of dollars are thrown away in erecting these public buildings for the supposed comfort and convenience of the public, which might just as well be saved. It seems to me that an immense deal of money is wasted in filigree work, that does not add much to the dignity and importance of the building, in a great many cases.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In large cities the Dominion should have its public offices built on a scale commensurate with the wealth and extent of the city. It is hardly dignified for the Dominion to have its public offices in a rented and poor building in large cities. If a stranger goes to the post office, and finds it in a miserable little building, it gives him a poor idea of the country. I have not seen the Hamilton building since its completion, but I am told it is a beautiful one, and a credit to the Dominion. I hope it will give sufficient revenue to recoup us for its erection. I am told the revenue from customs and post office is very large.

Mr. VAIL. It is an exorbitant amount to pay for a custom house and post office. When the building for custom house and post office purposes was taken by the Dominion Government at Halifax, at a cost of $80,000, it was considered exorbitant; and yet three or four times that amount is expended on a building for Hamilton, which city is about the same size as Halifax.

Mr. McMULLEN. While the Dominion should erect respectable buildings that would to a certain extent be creditable to the country, we should economise as much as possible. The amount invested in the Hamilton custom house is exorbitant. When the Mackenzie Government was in power strong efforts were made to induce it to erect a much larger building as a post office at Guelph than that which was erected. Mr. Mackenzie, however, refused to erect a larger building than was necessary for the accommodation required, without regard to adjacent buildings. Of course, in Hamilton there are respectable buildings, but the Mackenzie Government refused to spend enormous sums in putting up buildings much larger than were required. The Guelph post office is only two storeys high, being lower than many of the adjoining buildings.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No doubt, the member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) did all he could to save money to the country, as we do. When the St. John custom house was burned, Mr. Mackenzie gave to that city a very beautiful building, which is a credit to the Government and the country. I will give a few figures to show the importance of Hamilton. The postal revenue, last year, was $62,000; saving's bank deposits, $281,000; money orders issued and paid, $497,000; customs duties, $668,000; other revenues collected, $4,499; value of exports, $470,000; value of imports, nearly $4,000,000; excise, $275,000. So the hon. gentleman will see that if we have expended a large sum, we have a large revenue.

Kingston Penitentiary..... $17,000 00

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. For what is this amount wanted?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. For a number of small items in connection with buildings and repairs.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is there telephone communication between Kingston penitentiary and the city.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is necessary to have such communication for in the event of any lamentable outbreak such as occurred in another penitentiary lately, it might be of very great service.

Mr. WILSON. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will make some explanation in regard to payments made to Mr. Bowes?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Bowes is architect of the penitantiary buildings, and his headquarters are at Ottawa.

Mr. WILSON. There are hotel expenses at $3.50 a day for 41 days, amounting to $143.50.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Those are expenses incurred by this officer when visiting the penitentiaries.

Mr. McMULLEN. There are also two trips costing $149.50.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No doubt he was paid that amount.

Mr. WILSON. What about an item of $5,500 for Orangeville post office, &c.?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That is to complete the building.

Mr. McMULLEN. I see the architect is down for nineteen days at $10 a day, in connection with this post office, and also this Mr. Armstrong, $10. Then there is Mr. Robert Hewitt, two months, $150. Who is he? Does he live in Orangeville?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. He is clerk of works.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But there seemed to have been no work going on that year?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Most likely the work began during those two months and continued the following year, and he was paid for the work the following year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. With regard to the public buildings at Peterboro', I understand that the necessities, shall I say, of the public service have required, that whereas in all other cases the post office and custom house were put together, in Peterboro' they are rather widely separated, and two distinct sites have to be paid for. Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to tell the House what has been paid for sites, and where, and wherefore?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I explained the other day, on a question being put by an hon. member that two sites had been bought, the one being the Sawyer lot, I think on Hunter street.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the religious persuasion of the Sawyer lot?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I never knew that a lot had a religious persuasion, and therefore I am unable to answer the hon. gentleman. That lot was purchased because it was near the village of Ashburnham which is next to Peterboro'. There is a bridge between the two, and that bridge leads to this street, and the post office will serve the requirements of both places. This lot was considered not a proper site for a custom house and inland revenue office, and we thought that, under the circumstances, another lot should be purchased in the interior of the town, in another place. That lot is called the Phalen lot, near the station, I believe, though I have not been there myself. Tenders have been called for the two buildings, and instructions have been given to the chief architect to prepare his plans and specifications in such a way that the cost of both buildings would not exceed that of one building, if we had erected only one.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the price of the Phalen lot and what of the Sawyer lot?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think one lot cost $6,000 and the other something like $3,500 or $4,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the total cost of the buildings to be?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. About $30,000, each.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Peterboro' is a considerable town, and one which, if it does not now rank as a city, will soon rank as a city, and all the arguments advanced by the hon. gentleman recently as to erecting imposing buildings in towns of importance would apply very strongly to the erection of an imposing and useful building for the town of Peterboro'. The hon. gentleman will hardly himself maintain that a very much better building could not have been put up for $60,000, one which would be a much greater credit to the town of Peterboro' than the two buildings costing $30,000 each. Moreover, in all cases before this where the town is of considerable size, I think the custom house and post office have been combined. I think that has been the invariable practice of the Department in considerable towns.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Not everywhere.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where are the departures?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Winnipeg, London, Toronto, Montreal, St. John, Quebec.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Most of those are very large towns.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I thought the hon. gentleman was trying to erect Peterboro' to the same rank?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Wherever they were of a size under 15,000 or 20,000 people, that was the custom, for the reason that you could erect a very much more imposing building for $60,000 than by dividing it into two buildings of $30,000 each. How far are these two lots apart.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I cannot say, but I know the Phalen lot is near the railway station, and near the market, whilst the post office is in another direction.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has the hon. gentleman got possession of these two lots?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understand the hon. gentleman has completed purchase and paid for both.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman know whether there is any qualification in the deeds of these lots—whether they are deeded to the Government for a particular purpose in either case.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes. In the deed for the purchase of the Phalen lot, the words "for post office and other buildings," were inserted. That was done without the consent of the Government. According to the Order in Council, it was for a public building; it did not mention a post office; and as soon as the deed was sent to me I sent it back in order that the matter might be investigated. I have not yet been able to ascertain how those words came to be put in the deed. I stated to the proprietor of the lot, who wished the post office to be built there instead of at the other place, and declared that he would never have sold it for the price paid, $3,900, if he had known it was not to be for a post office, that the Government were ready to return the lot to him provided he gave back the money, so that he would not suffer any loss from the sale. He has refused this, and has told me he would make a claim for damages. Under these circumstances, perhaps the hon. gentleman will not ask me to make any further explanation on that point.

Mr. McMULLEN. If I am rightly informed, the Government, in the first place, bought the Phalen lot, with the intention of erecting a post office and custom house on it. But there was a quarrel between the parties, as each wanted to sell his lot to the Government, so the Government thought to patch up the quarrel by buying both lots and putting up two separate buildings. I am quite satisfied that if an investigation were held, the statements I make could be proved. One of the men was down here, since Parliament has met, to demand that the Minister of Public Works erect the building on his lot. It is outrageous that the money of the country should be wasted in this way. That is the truth, and I challenge the Minister of Public Works to deny it,

Mr. THOMPSON. In regard to the conveyance, perhaps I might explain that the conveyance is not limited to the purpose mentioned, but there is a recital that the lot has been purchased for that purpose.

Mr. WILSON. Has the lot for the Prescott public building been purchased yet?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We have not purchased the lot yet. This is an appropriation which has not been used.

Mr. WILSON. I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to a representation I made to him some time ago. I stated that the Government had led the caretaker of the St. Thomas public building to understand that rooms would be fitted up in the building in which he might live. Since last summer he has been compelled to rent a house at his own expense at some distance from the building. He is a very efficient and reliable man, and whereas in other places a caretaker and an engineer are employed for public buildings, he is obliged to act both as caretaker and engineer. In a town or city, the expense of living is high, and it is unfair that he should be obliged to take $150 for rent out of his salary of $400. I requested the Minister of Public Works to put a vote in the Estimates for fitting up rooms for him in the building; but the Estimates are down, and no vote is in them. Very likely the Government will allow the present state of things to continue until the building is burned down owing to the absence of the caretaker. I therefore think that the Minister of Public Works ought to put a reasonable amount in the Estimates, and allow the amount he has paid for rents during the time he has been kept out of these buildings.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Last year I put in something for this purpose, but the hon. gentleman, speaking of the expenses, frightened me so much that I dared not put in an amount this year. His manner, however, is so encouraging I will really have to take this into consideration.

Mr. WILSON. No doubt the hon. gentleman was considerate in reference to the expense of the building at St. Thomas, because in 1884-85 he paid the architect 3 per cent.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I do not think the hon. gentleman ought to raise that question now. He expects something in the Estimates of 1886-87, and if it appears there he will have the opportunity of saying that the Minister of Public Works has listened to him, and if not he will have the opportunity of referring to the grievance he wishes to bring up.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the $12,000 for Toronto examining warehouse close it?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It closes it for the present. In 1884-85, we decided to have a larger examining warehouse, and then asked the money to build a third of it. We are going on with that. Afterwards we had to add a building, which will be a portion of the second third for the hoisting apparatus, and this amount is to erect this building. If next year we are flush of money, we may go on with the balance.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT What does that cost altogether?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. $100,000, when completed.

Mr. VAIL. I would point out that the Minister of Public Works mentioned that the amount received for Customs at Hamilton was so large that it justified the expenditure of $300,000 on the custom house. Well, I find that, compared with Halifax, the amount is not large. While the Customs receipts from Hamiltom are $660,000, the receipts from Halifax are $1,363,000, and the custom house in Halifax only cost $80,000.

Mr. BOWELL. When was it built?

Mr. VAIL. In 1867.

Mr. BOWELL. That alters the matter, but the new warehouse we have rented there and are about preparing is costing quite as much in proportion as the Hamilton building.

Public Works, Manitoba..... $90,000 00

Mr. WATSON. I see there is no amount placed in the Estimates for the Winnipeg drill shed, although Colonel Houghton reports that a floor should be placed in it.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That matter has been brought to my notice lately, and I think to-morrow I will have to look over all these matters.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How much has been expended on the Manitoba penitentiary and Winnipeg post office.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The amount expended from the beginning is $291,000, and on the post office, $150,000. About $8,000 more will be required to complete the post office, and this year I believe it will be completed, as I understand the post office authorities have directed that the post office be removed there. The present temporary post office will be fitted up for the Department of the Interior.

Public Works, North-West Territories $31,000 00

Mr. O'BRIEN. I wish to say a word or two with regard to one item which is not included in the Estimates, that is the Industrial School at Qu'Appelle for the training of Indian boys. Having had an opportunity of visiting that school several times, I must say that if there is anything on which we can congratulate ourselves, it is the attempt being made in the North-West to educate the youth of the Indian tribes. It is quite evident we cannot do anything with the old men or the young men who have attained the age of maturity. Our only chance is to endeavor to educate the youths, the young boys and girls who are growing up in the different reserves, with them we may possibly do something. I admit that experience is not altogether favorable, for I found there, and we know in fact from our own experience in the Province of Ontario, that the Indian boys and girls who are trained with the greatest possible care at our various industrial schools or other institutions very often, after they have obtained a great deal of instruction, turn out to be after all mere savages; but at the same time the only hope we have, the only prespect we have, the only inducement we have to spend money upon the Indians is based upon the fact that upon the young, caught young in fact, we may possibly hope to obtain some influence which may be of benefit in future years. I took several opportunities of visiting that school at Qu'Appelle, and I was very much pleased with what is going on there. The expenditure in establishing that school has been very great. The buildings have cost a great deal of money, but I think they are worth all they have cost, and I desire to express my sense of the very great service the fathers in charge of that institution are giving to the people of the country. I am sure they are doing a great work. Among others there, I saw a grand son of Sitting Bull, a little boy, a bright little fellow, of just the class from whom the people of this country may hope something in the future. I hope the Indian Department will endeavor to encourage and develop these institutions, and I think the country will not begrudge any reasonable expenditure in developing them. I think they are the only hope we have of obtaining in the future anything like a grasp and a hold upon the Indian population. If we can give them some notion of our ideas of civilisation, some idea of cleanliness, of good clothing, of everything that we believe makes the benefits and comforts of civilisation, the country should not begrudge the expenditure; and, in regard to this particular institution, I beg to express my extreme sense of what this country owes to the clergy who are in charge of that institution and the excellent work they are doing in the management of it.

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. gentleman will see that, on a following page, there is a vote of $41,836 for day schools and $52,500 for industrial schools, together making an increase of $31,700 over last year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What will the Regina goal and lunatic asylum and the post-office and custom house cost when they are finished?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The goal and lunatic asylum will cost $52,000. It will require $7,000 more to complete. The post office and custom house will be about completed with this sum of $3,500. At Prince Albert, there is a contract for the building of the court-house and goal for which this $15,500 is asked. The contractor is T. Doddridge, who is represented by Mr. Jellie, of Winnipeg.

Public Buildings, British Columbia..... $55,500 00.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is this $50,000 to complete the penitentiary?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No; it will not complete. That institution is increasing in regard to the number of convicts.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Under the National Policy?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes; under the National Policy, whilst the population is increasing.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are you going to build the Vancouver quarantine station at all? I see this $5,500 is a revote.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The note I have here is this: "This is to make provision for the undermentioned works suggested by the agent under date of the 20th September and February, 1885, as being necessary to render the new quarantine buildings erected at Albert Head, suitable for the purpose for which it is intended."

Public Buildings generally..... $15,000 00

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That is the ordinary vote.

Mr. KIRK. Where are the buildings?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is general. It is for the buildings of the whole Dominion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is the usual vote.

Mr. KIRK. Is it the intention to erect a custom house and post office in Guysboro' out of this vote?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That is a good idea.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). As the Minister of Public Works states that the Supplementary Estimates are to be considered in his Department to-morrow, I would mention one item to him. I mean the revote for the Joseph Brant monument of $5,000. It will expire in July, and I suppose the hon. gentleman will not pay the money before October, when the monument will be erected, so that it will be necessary to take a vote for it in 1886-87.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We can carry it for three months, or we can revote it. I thank the hon. gentleman.

Resolutions to be reported.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has our resolution been communicated to the Lord High Commissioner yet?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes, it has gone; and I have no doubt the members of the House of Commons have received it, and are now considering it.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 12:05 a.m. (Saturday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 10th May, 1886.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS—TIMBER LIMITS.

Mr. COOK. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to make a statement. On the 4th May the Minister of the Interior, speaking to the motion of my hon. friend for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), made this statement, speaking of the Scotch company in which I was interested:

"They seemed to prefer to take his recommendation, and they gave him an enormous sum of money in advance, as they thought he had a title. Now, that was a transaction where the money really passed."

I was in my seat, and I rose and said:

"I just wish to correct the hon. gentleman. The statement that he is making is false."

The same evening, after I had left the Chamber for a short time, the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) had the presumption to make this statement:

"He stated that parties who got timber limits from the Government never intended to work them."

That is, referring to myself, that I had stated that other parties had got timber limits, and had not intended to work them. He went on to say:

"They could not do worse than did that hon. gentleman himself, if they sold them to some foreigners and cheated them out of a large amount of money. The poor unfortunate Scotchmen in Glasgow who paid him $450,000 have a lively recollection of the hon. gentleman and his timber limits."

This is a serious charge, and dare not be made by any responsible party outside of this House. It will be my duty now to repudiate the statement made by the hon. gentleman in toto, and to give a brief synopsis of the conduct of the Scotchmen in connection with this company. The company was formed in 1880. I was appointed its general manager. Mr. Lockie, the late manager of the Bank of Commerce in Toronto, was appointed the financial manager. For the first year I had unlimited control of the company's operations, and succeeded to the extent of making a profit of $137,000. The financial manager, immediataly afterwards, seeing that the company was likely to be a great success, interfered with my duties to such an extent that difficulties arose between us. I resigned my position as general manager of the company, and my resignation was accepted. The capital of the company was $1,000,000; $500,000 was held by gentlemen in Scotland and $500,000 was held by gentlemen in Canada. The $500,000 of shares held by the gentlemen in Scotland were termed "A" shares, and ranked as preference dividend to the extent of 10 per cent. "B" shares, held by Canadian gentlemen, were deferred to the extent of 10 per cent. dividend. The constitution of the company provided that any shares being transferred were not eligible to be voted on for seven weeks after the transfer. It also provided that a general extraordinary meeting could be called within forty days. Up to the time of my resignation I held $250,000 worth of shares in trust for other Canadian holders, which were all the shares held by me. Some time after my resignation and when I had nothing more to do with the company, I transferred the $250,000 worth of stock to the parties to whom it belonged. Immediately after this transfer the Scotch gentlemen called a general extraordinary meeting of the shareholders, with a view of passing a by-law to water the "A" shares to the extent of 50 per cent. This meeting convened in Edinburgh, Scotland. The Canadian shareholders sent a representative to the meeting, and stated to the gentlemen in Scotland that they were taking an unfair advantage of the Canadian shareholders; because of their inability to vote upon the $250,000 of shares that I had transferred. The Scotch gentlemen, no doubt expecting large returns from the company, attempted to swindle the Canadian shareholders to the extent that I have mentioned. Instead of having an equal proportion with the Canadian shareholders, they had, by this watering process, increased theirs to $750,000, and the Canadian shares were left in the same position as before; so that, before the Canadian shareholders could obtain any dividend at all, the company would have to pay the Scotch shareholders a dividend on $750,000 instead of $500,000. It also gave them complete control of the company, which control was placed in the hands of the financial manager, who knew nothing about the lumber trade whatever, and who was the cause of the disastrous results to the company. The disaster to the company was brought about directly by the action of the gentlemen in Scotland in taking out of the hands of practical lumbermen in Canada the management of this company. They did not alone injure themselves, but they injured the Canadian shareholders, and I may state here for the information of the gentleman who seems to take such a deep interest in this company, for the purpose of injuring me in the eyes of the public, that one of the principal shareholders—Cook & Brothers—put in $300,000 cash. I trust that these short explanations will be sufficient to satisfy my most bitter political enemy that he cannot make any capital against me on this charge. I would not have referred to the speech made by the hon. gentleman, but he is not known so well in the country as he is in this House, and bearing as it did the malicious and despicable utterance made by the Minister of the Interior in connection with this very same matter, when I characterised it at once as a false statement, I should have thought this would have been quite sufficient for any hon. gentleman in the House. I did not happen to be in my seat when the member for East Grey made his statement, or I should have characterised it there and then as I characterised the utterances made by the Minister of the Interior.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, oh.

Mr. COOK. I make this statement, and the hon. gentleman need not screw up his face or laugh. I am prepared to prove the statement I have made. I make this statement consciously, knowing what I am doing, and everyone who knows the Minister of the Interior as well as do some hon. members in this House, will not place a great deal of confidence in what he says.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order, order.

An hon. MEMBER. Take back that statement.

Mr. COOK. I take back nothing.

Mr. SPROULE. I should like to say, in regard to the remarks of the hon. gentleman, that I made a statement which was current in our part of the country. It was generally known, it was generally believed, that Cook Bros. took out of that transaction $450,000, for which those gentlemen gave little or nothing in return, and when they left the company Cook Bros. took out about all the good timber. As to the reference made about the hon. member for East Grey not being so well known in the country as in the House, I suppose the reverse is the fact. But I can only say that in the hon. member's case, he is a good deal better known in the country than in the House, and those gentlemen who have had occasion to have transactions with him, know him, and will know him to their sorrow, no matter what is said by him. I am glad he has succeeded in getting some person to write out a plausible statement and read it to the House and the country, and I have no reason to complain if it satisfies his conscience and his constituents.

Mr. COUGHLIN. I am reported in the Ottawa Free Press of the 7th as voting against my own motion. The report is as follows:—

"Mr. Blake then moved in amendment to the main motion as amended, that Mr. Speaker be instructed to forward to Mr. Gladstone a copy of the resolution adopted by this House.

"Mr. Coughlin moved an amendment to the amendment, substituting the name of Mr. Parnell for Mr. Gladstone.

"While Mr. Coughlin was moving this amendment to the amendment, Mr. Curran was apparently seeking to obtain the Premier's consent. Sir John Macdonald appeared at first to consent, and it was not until he perceived that the substitution of one name for another in face of Mr. Blake's offer to accept Parnell's name in addition to Gladstone would be an insult, that

"Sir John then proposed in amendment that all the resolutions be forwarded to Gladstone, Parnell and Salisbury. This was ruled out of order, and a division forced on Mr. Coughlin's amendment by the Opposition, who declined to allow it to be withdrawn. Twenty then voted for the amendment to the amendment and 141 against."

I say this a malicious slander and falsehood, and the reporter must have known it.

INCOMPLETE RETURN.

Mr. MULOCK. In the absence of the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister), I beg to call the attention of the House to a return laid before the House on 21st April last. An Order of the House was passed on 2nd March, 1885, directing to be laid before Parliament a list of certain shareholders in certain companies, and the Order contained these words: "And the amount of stock held by each individually." In pursuance of that Order a return was laid before the House on the date mentioned, and that return purported to deal with the case of the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company; but I submit it does not comply with the directions of the House in regard to the list of shareholders. There is a statement in the body of the return of the names of certain persons as shareholders, and it concludes as follows: "The total amount of stock held by the individuals is $300,000, $6,000 of which is held by George C. Boulon (or Boulton), and the balance is divided, as nearly as possible, equally among the other eight persons." I submit that the words "as nearly as possible" render it impossible to infer that the balance of the stock, $294,000, is divided evenly between the shareholders in question, and I therefore submit that the Order has not been complied with.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I did not see the return, which came from the Railway Department; but I will call the attention of the hon. Minister to the statement of the hon. gentleman.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called I propose, first, to call the attention of the House to statements made by members of this House elsewhere, which, as reported in the Toronto Globe, reflect on my personal honor. In the second place, I desire to notice, by way of an explanation, some statements of similar import made during a recent debate on timber licenses in the North-West; and, Sir, allow me here to say, that my ideas are so old-fashioned if you will, that I make no distinction between political and personal honor, both of which have been unwarrantably assailed both in this House and outside of it. This conclusion will, I trust, be made clear before I close. The performance of this duty I consider imperative, not only in my own behalf, but equally so in respect of the important county which has honored me with its confidence, and of the integrity of this Parliament, which is of first public importance. In this connection I beg to draw the attention of the House to a short extract from the speech of the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) made at Wingham, as given in the Globe of 12th July last. I see that the gentleman to whom I have referred has left the Chamber, and I very much regret it. Before, however, entering upon the subject, I wish to point out that the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron), save the mark, made this statement in a previous speech:

"This indictment is a grave and serious one, and no public man should, either in his place in Parliament or on the public platform, make allegations of this kind unless he is in a position to prove them."

That is the declaration he made before making the charge at Wingham, to which I am about to refer. The heading of that portion of his speech at Wingham was: "Why Tory Members of Parliament support the Government." He said:

"I purpose now for a little to direct your attention to the corrupt means by which corrupt Tory representatives of the people are induced to support a corrupt Tory Administration. I shall deal only with the Conservative supporters of the Government from Ontario. The Conservative supporters of this Government from the other Provinces are bad enough. The supporters of the Government from Ontario are moved in their support by no honest restraints, influenced by no pure motives, and guided by no patriotic convictions. The support is largely given and received from purely personal, mercenary and corrupt considerations."

It will be noted with what gusto and relish the hon. member referred to uses the word "corruption" and rolls it as if it were a sweet morsel under his tongue, as if it were his ordinary diet. This was the conclusion which was arrived at, at any rate, by a full bench of judges of our land on a certain occasion. Under the heading to which I have referred follow the names of forty members of this House, but I shall, of course, refer only to my own case, as those other hon. gentlemen can defend themselves. My name is the eighth on the list and he honored me by referring to me in this way:

"8. Moss Kent Dickinson is the Tory member for Russell. He was first elected in 1882. I find the first thing a Tory representative does is to look out for 'Number One,' and just here I must do Moss Kent the justice of saying that with marvellous success and in a wonderfully short space of time he learned the first and prime duty of a Tory member of Parliament. On the 13th October, 1882, less than four months after his election, he applied for fifty square miles of valuable timber limits, and his son applied for two other limits. Now, gentlemen, you can hardly expect that Moss Kent can vote against the Government who have so generously provided for him and his out of the public domain."

It is to be noted that the gravamen of the charge appears to be that I received that limit from the Government after I was a member of this House. The hon. gentleman has, I presume, had no other source of information as to dates except the returns which were brought down to this House. He made this gross charge, not in the presence of those whom he maligns but in their absence; he has not even had the hardihood to repeat that charge in the presence of those whom he has maligned, and I challenge him now to find in the returns any such statement, as to dates, i.e., that I applied for a limit after I was elected As a matter of fact, I have never had the opportunity, or have never taken occasion to explain the matter, although on numerous occasions outside the House this charge has been brought against me. Now it will scarcely be credited that the application which he says was made on the 15th October, was really made on the 13th May, 1882—before the elections of 1882, as is well known. Not only so, but in my own case there was not the probability that I would be nominated as the candidate of the Liberal-Conservative party for the county, and the election did not take place until the 20th June. With respect to my son, to whom he refers as having got two limits, I would say that the hon. gentleman is also in error in that case, whether designedly or otherwise the House can judge, as his application was for one limit only, also made long before my election or nomination, i.e., 16th May. I presume, however, that his anxiety to multiply these cases of applications for timber limits was so great that a matter of one or two limits did not make much difference to him. Now, I think no fair or generous-minded man, no matter what his stripe of politics, would make any such falsified charge inside or outside of this House, for the mere gratification of obtaining, at the moment, perhaps, the cheer to the echo which, no doubt, the hon. gentleman received, from his deluded hearers, by making such false and calumnious statements with regard to fellow-members who were not present to defend themselves. I will now, with the permission of the House, refer to what took place on the 4th of May last, when this timber limit question was discussed in this House. The hon. member for North Norfolk, in his list of charges against members of Parliament in connection with timber limits, said that M. K. Dickinson, M.P., made application for G. L. Dickinson—to this I have already referred—and W. B. Dickinson. In respect to this case, I did not transmit the application. I will say nothing about the motives of the hon. gentleman. If I cannot find arguments in support of any position I take, I will never descend to tacitly acknowledge defeat by imputing motives. With a desire to magnify the territory covered by limits generally acquired either for or by the recommendation of members of this House, the hon. gentleman also mentioned that the application for J. J. Burrows was for fifty-six islands, whereas his application was for five small islands with a total area of fifty-six square miles, and was never made by me for him. I recommended it after my election, as he was one of my constituents, though he spent some time in the North-West; but until hearing the above statement, I never heard he had obtained a grant, and I had no interest whatever in it. Now, I will take the liberty of meeting the statement that has been so often made on the opposite side of this House, that the regulations under which the timber lands of the North-West are granted to applicants, are much less advantageous in point of revenue than the regulations prevailing in Ontario.

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope the hon. gentleman will confine himself to the personal explanation, and not go into the general question of timber limits.

Mr. DICKINSON. I will do so with all deference. Then, I have a further explanation to make with regard to a still graver charge that was made against myself during the recent debate. The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Cook) —pardon the misnomer—made the following comments with regard to myself. He started off with a grand sentiment as to the necessity of speaking the truth on all occasions. He said:

"It is highly improper for hon. members in this House to make statements that are false."

Now, Sir, before I sit down I think I shall prove that the statements made against myself are false. He said:

"Now, I only want to deal with one more gentleman. When the member for Cardwell vid Montreal, got up and attempted to attack me, he said it was a vile thing on my part to take a timber limit, but he turned around to his friend and said: 'My friend, Mr. Dickinson, who is an old-established lumberman, has a right to have timber limits.' Well, I do not know how long he has been lumbering. My impression is that he is not lumbering now. Are you?

"Mr. DICKINSON. Since 1852, unceasingly, more or less.

"Mr. COOK. The last time I heard of him he was lumbering in spools."

I do not think that a very grave accusation; it is not that I am referring to; but I will read until I come to a charge of a far graver character:

"I have no doubt that he is so wedded to the lumber trade that he will stick to it like old Mr. Marsh who had been a lumberman, and who was found one day shaving shingles."

The hon. gentleman used three words which the reporter omitted, but which I distinctly heard. He spoke of Mr. Marsh, who had been a lumberman, "who had failed." He went on:

"He was asked what he was doing now, and he said: 'I am in the lumber trade, and I am going to remain there even if I have to get down to wooden toothpicks.' I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has got down to wooden toothpicks yet, but he has two timber limits which are of wonderful value, for he professes that they have four hundred millions of timber on them."

The hon. gentleman is as much misinformed in reference to my being engaged in making spools as he is in reference to the more grave charges with which he has assailed me. I never made a spool——

Mr. COOK. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I wish to apologise. I take that back. It is not spools he is making; it is clothes-pins.

Mr. DICKINSON. The hon. gentleman is mistaken again; I have not made a clothes-pin, and have had no connection with clothes-pins.—

"Mr. COOK. That is the statement. He came to a party in Toronto to sell it, and when he was talking about the enormous amount of lumber on that limit—he was talking to a lumberman, mind you—when they saw Professor Macoun's report, which was given to him, no doubt, for no other purpose than to endeavor to sell his timber limit, stating that there were four hundred millions of timber on 100 miles—because he had to get one limit for himself of fifty miles and one for his son, he could not get it all in one, because Sir John had declared that he would not give more than fifty miles to one person, he changed that in order to get an excuse to cancel my timber limit."

On this latter point, it is pretty well known that there were other and better reasons for cancelling the limit referred to.

"He stated there were 400,000,000 on the two limits."

From my place in this House, recognising my responsibility, I say that I never made such a statement or anything approaching it, that I never attempted to give any definite idea or make any statement with reference to the quantity of timber upon that limit, either to the hon. member for East Simcoe or anyone else.

Mr. COOK. You got the limit, did you not?

Mr. DICKINSON. The hon. member for East Simcoe said further:

"Well, he stated there were 400,000,000 on the two limits, and when he said that that party in Toronto coolly said: 'I cannot have anything to do with it.' He was not talking to the marines."

I was not talking to the marines, but I apprehend that the conversation he refers to, is one he had with myself, and if he rests his statement upon anything I said, he is putting words into my mouth I never used. The hon. gentleman added:

"The statement was falsified, and he was going about with a false statement supplied by Professor Macoun of the Government here, of the Geological Department of this Government, he was going about trying to make people believe there was more timber on that limit than there was. He approached the hon. member for Welland; he went all the way to Niagara Falls to try to sell it. Then he said, if they would only take half of it, he would sell for $10,000. And it had 400,000,000 of timber on it. Why, if it was worth a cent, it was worth $400,000, and he was willing to sell one-half for $10,000"

This statement, containing a foul insinuation made against a most estimable and efficient public servant, that I was hawking about a false statement made up by Professor Macoun, would, even if I had no occasion to rise in my own self-defence, induce me to do so in order to resent that foul unfounded charge against Professor Macoun. There is not one word of truth in it, as I shall show before I sit down. The hon. gentleman continued:

"I would not refer personally to matters of this kind, but gentlemen say he is immaculate; he may have timber limits, he is a lumberman—in making spools; and then he tried to get rid of that limit by nothing more or less than a fraud, and I characterise it as such."

I desire that this last sentence be noticed particularly; and further, I claim that such a charge having been made by one member of this House against another, it is necessary, in the interest of the integrity of this Parliament, that it should be established beyond question whether myself or the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Cook) is the culpable party. If this charge be correct, I am Sir, unworthy of a seat in this House, but if the hon. gentleman has made an unfounded, slanderous charge, which I assert to his teeth he has done in regard to myself, he is unworthy of a seat in this Chamber. I am not well acquainted with parliamentary law or usage, but with all deference to the House, I solicit an investigation at the hands of this Parliament into this matter.

Mr. COOK. Move for a committee.

Mr. DICKINSON. I would not keep this seat for one hour if I were in a position of uncertainty as to my qualification to fill it, so far as personal or political honor is concerned.

An hon. MEMBER. Have you sold the limit yet?

Mr. DICKINSON. In reference to the charge against Professor Macoun, I desire, in justice to that gentleman, to make a simple, plain statement of all that occurred between him and myself. The hon. gentleman seems very much amused.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I am delighted.

Mr. DICKINSON. As I have already shown, I applied to the Department for this limit on the 13th of May, 1882. I received no information from any quarter except from the Official Report of 1881, containing Mr. Macoun's reports of his exploration in the North-West, on page 81. In describing the section in which the limit granted to me is situated, Mr. Macoun says:

"The character of the valley changed about four miles from the Etoimami, and fine groves of poplar with clumps of very large spruce, ranging from twenty to thirty-six inches, were frequently passed. As we proceeded up stream this changed, and the whole river valley for nearly eight miles was filled with the most magnificent forest of spruce. Fine, tall, straight trees, all growing, and often thirty-six inches in diameter, were standing close together, and did they extend any distance from the stream, would be invaluable. From my own cursory examination I was led to believe that this was the case, but later accounts show that the belt is less than half a mile wide for the most part."

I am more particular in respect to the charge against Mr. Macoun than I would be in regard to that against myself. It will be remembered that I read a statement made by the hon. member for East Simcoe in regard to Professor Macoun, whose report, he said, was false, that there were 400,000,000 of timber upon my own limit and that of my family. Let me say here that Professor Macoun never said anything of the kind, and that there was no examination of the timber limits granted to my sons. They were not referred to in any manner or mentioned in any conversation I had with the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Cook), if it is my conversation with him he refers to. Hence the hon. gentleman's statement in that respect is false, made entirely from whole cloth. With permission of the House, I desire to explain all and everything that Professor Macoun had to do in reference to the matter in question, and the circumstances under which I made the application to the Department. Then on calling at the Department and finding there were no applications in, covering the ground indicated by the paragraph I have just read, I put in my application for the same, and as I have already shown it was granted subsequently, upon the published conditions open to anyone who might apply for similar grants. Up to that time and until April of the following year, I had never met or had any correspondence of any nature whatever with Professor Macoun. During April of 1883, more than one year after obtaining the grant, I called on the professor, introduced myself, stating I had obtained the timber grant referred to, showing him the paragraph which I have read, and asked him if he could give any further particulars respecting the area of land which I described as embraced in my grant than that noted in his official report, and, if so, could he with propriety kindly favor me with any such in his possession of a practical character, obtained on the ground, in regard to requisite facilities for access and egress by water for the working and development of this limit. He stated he had made voluminous field notes while on the ground in respect to all his explorations made in the North-West and elsewhere, a synopsis of which was only practicable to include in his official reports, and had no doubt he would find he had done so in this case, and if he could give me any further information from his field notes on points I desired tending towards the settlement of our grand heritage in the North-West, he considered it was his duty to do so as a public officer. I gave him a memorandum of the several practical points, and subsequently he was kind enough to send me a communication of which the following is a copy. The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Cook), now acknowledges—or at least I understood him to do so by assent—that he is the person to whom he refers in connection with the statement he made to the House. What I will now take the liberty of reading to the House is the document, and the only one, which I had over Professor Macoun's signature, and no statement did I make, directly or indirectly, in contravention of this statement in regard to the quantity of timber:

"OTTAWA, April 13th, 1883.

"M. K. DICKINSON, Esq.

"DEAR SIR,—Regarding the timber supply upon Little Swan River, N.W.T., 'commencing four miles from its mouth and extending up a distance of eight miles or thereabouts,' as contained in my official report, I may state—

"1st. That in my opinion the best part of the timber will be found within a mile of the river on each side. Of this I am not certain, but it is my belief, judging from observations taken from tree tops, I believe I am correct."

Then he goes on to give the varieties of timber, and continues:

"As regards the quantity per acre and size of the trees, the following extracts from my journal, written on the ground, will give my estimate made without bias."

I will not read some of the clauses, as the time of the House is valuable, and I do not desire to trespass upon it any further than is necessary in the defence of my personal honor, and that I claim I have a right to defend, as I think will be acknowledged by every fair-minded member of the House.

An hon. MEMBER. Have you sold the limit?

Mr. DICKINSON. This is the principal point:

"Regarding the amount of timber on the fifty square miles, I could scarcely give an estimate. The above extracts would assist a practical man to arrive at an approximate conclusion."

Now, that is the only statement that Professor Macoun has ever made in reference to the quantity upon the limit referred to, and that only as a matter of opinion. In the face of that, this so called hon. gentleman rises in this House and makes a distinct positive statement that, according to Professor Macoun's report, there were four hundred million feet on the two limits, whereas I have shown that Professor Macoun never saw or heard, to my knowledge, that my son had a limit or had anything to do with one.

An hon. MEMBER. Have you sold the limit?

Mr. DICKINSON. I can only reiterate the suggestion that I have made in reference to what I conceive to be the duty of this House towards myself, particularly as I have contradicted from my place the charge that has been made, namely, that an opportunity should be given me to either be condemned or to be pronounced guilty.

An hon. MEMBER. Guilty.

Mr. DICKINSON. And, if it be the latter, I shall of course bow to the decision of the House. Mr. Speaker, I now beg to thank the House for its patient hearing, particularly the gentleman opposite, for the kind interest which he takes in what he seems to think a very laughable matter. When a member of the House is thus charged, those gentlemen value political or personal honor so lightly that they can make light of any gentleman who gets up to refute so serious a charge as that which I have explained has been made against myself.

Mr. COOK. I am sorry that the hon. gentleman's feelings have been wounded. If the hon. gentleman understands the constitutional way or method of obtaining what he says he desires, the means of having the thing investigated, he says he would be most happy to do so. Well, I will tell the hon. gentleman that the charges that I made on this occasion that he refers to, are true, and I can prove them under oath; and I would dare the hon. gentleman to ask for a committee of this House to investigate the matter. There is one thing I will take back. I stated that the hon. gentleman was lumbering in spools, and afterwards that he was lumbering in clothes-pins. I take back both these statements. What the hon. gentleman is lumbering in is barrel bungs.

Mr. SPEAKER. Orders of the Day.

THE WRIT FOR HALDIMAND.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I would like to enquire of the Government if a decision has been arrived at in regard to the Haldimand election?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman put that question the other day, and I asked him to be good enough to wait until the First Minister was in his place. Afterwards, when the First Minister was in the House, the hon. gentleman was not in his place. To-day he renews the question, and the hon. Minister is out out of the House. I think, if he will wait a few minutes more, the First Minister will be in his place, and may be able to give him an answer.

WHARF AT CAPE TORMENTINE.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The other day the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), wanted to have the plan of the wharf made for the Cape Tormentine breakwater, and I stated I would bring it down most likely on Monday. I have it here, and I called the attention of the chief engineer of my Department to what was said about the report of the engineer, and, without reading it now, I will lay upon the Table of the House this memorandum which he gives me, which covers not only what the local engineer may have obtained of data, but what the chief engineer himself has obtained after looking into the matter, so that this will cover the whole ground.

DREDGING THE KAMINISTIQUIA.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I wish also to correct a statement that was made, I think, by the same hon. gentleman, and by the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), about the price of dredging on the Kaministiquia. It was stated that the price was 23 cents per cubic foot, or $6 per cubic yard. Well, I was astonished at the price as mentioned by the two hon. gentlemen, but I was not in a position to give a negative answer to that statement. I called the attention of the chief engineer of my Department to that statement, and he gives me this memorandum:

"With reference to this, I find in that report of the Auditor General for 1884-85, at page 245, this statement: that 121,560 cubic feet of dredging had been paid for. This is simply a blunder on the part of somebody outside of the Department, as the work done was measured, returned and paid for in cubic yards. For dredging done in 1884, the Department paid 23 cents per yard, not per foot, and for that done last year, 1885, we paid 19 cents per yard."

I wish this to be corrected at once, so that there may be no misunderstanding about it.

THE WRIT FOR HALDIMAND.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I am not at all satisfied with the answer given by the acting leader of the Government to-day. A constituency has been open for some time. I think about two weeks ago I moved that you issue your warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, directing him to issue a writ for the election in the county of Haldimand. You, Sir, did your duty, as you generally do your duty, well, and you issued your warrant to that officer. That officer received the warrant nearly two weeks ago, and so far as I have been able to learn, the Government have not yet been able to arrive at a decision, or if the First Minister has arrived at a decision he has not taken his colleagues into his confidence, and imparted that decision to the House. I think it is not only trifling with the House, but it is trifling with the constituency that is unrepresented in this House, and is waiting the decision of the Government to bring on the election. I trust that the First Minister will have sufficient confidence in the acting leader of the Government to——

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think the hon. gentleman is in order, unless he is going to bring before the House some question of privilege, or is going to make a motion.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I can easily do that if it is necessary.

THE SHUSWAP AND OKANAGAN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. HOMER moved the second reading of amendments made by the Senate to Bill (No. 33) to incorporate the Shuswap and Okanagan Railway Company.

Mr. SPEAKER. The Law Clerk certifies to me that these amendments are verbal and unimportant.

Mr. MITCHELL. Might I ask whether in all cases of this kind the Law Clerk gives a certificate where amendments have been made?—because I think it very important that should be done. Your Honor will have in recollection a case, some couple of years ago, in which alterations were made and were reported as unimportant, and afterwards turned out to be very important, and the House had to cancel and reconsider the legislation, and we have had very little satisfaction out of it since. I mention this fact now because I think it is well that these changes should be certified by the Law Clerk. The case I refer to is that of the Grand Trunk, at the time they cheated us in that legislation.

Mr. SPEAKER. I hold in my hand the memorandum from the Law Clerk.

Amendments concurred in.

RELIEF OF FLORA BIRRELL.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 129) for the relief of Flora Birrell.

House divided on motion.

THE VACANCY IN THE REPRESENTATION OF HALDIMAND.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I would like to ask the First Minister if he can give me an answer with regard to the appointment of a returning officer for the county of Haldimand?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I told the hon. gentleman the other day that I would give him an answer on Friday last. When I was in my place he did not happen to be in his seat. Perhaps I sat up too long the night before. I was obliged to go home, and did not wait until his return, and so I did not give the answer then. The Government have not selected a returning officer. They do not think there is any very great hurry about it, and they will explain to the House why they think so. We have got a new franchise and the electors' lists are now being prepared, and there will be a very large addition to the electorate. There is no possibility of the member who is elected taking his seat during this Session—not the slightest, and therefore the election may as well stand over until the new lists can be used. There is an addition to the lists equal to 20 per cent. of the whole electors, I understand. In August the lists will be perfected and it would be rather absurd that a gentleman should be elected to represent in Parliament an electorate which is an effete electorate, based upon a voters' list which was abandoned a year ago. It would be well to postpone the election even if there were no new franchise, but when there is a new franchise and the electorate is largely increased, it would be something like an insult to those put on the list to find they were excluded from the election in their county of a member who is to represent their interest, after they have established the right to vote. That is the reason of the delay. If this matter is pressed I will ask the House for a resolution to suspend the issue of the writ.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT.

Mr. STAIRS asked, Have the proper authorities, whether magistrates or others, in those counties in which the Canada Temperance Act is in force, made returns to the Dominion Government of the amount of fines collected for infractions of the said Act? Has the Government received the half of such fines to which it is by law entitled? Is the Government aware that any such money have been used by counties for purposes other than those named in the Canada Temperance Act? and if so, what action does it intend to take thereon?

Mr. McLELAN. No returns have been made to the Dominion Government. There have been no money received. The Government is not aware that money have been used by counties for purposes other than those named in the Canada Temperance Act. It is intended to call on them to make their returns according to the Act.

FERRY BETWEEN NEW EDINBURGH AND GATINEAU POINT.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth) asked, Who was the lessee or lessees of the ferry between the village of New Edinburgh and Gatineau Point for the years 1881, 1882, 1883, 1884 and 1885? What was the annual rental? What amount of said rental was paid in each of the five years respectively? Is there any part of the rent in arrears? If so, why has the ferry been again leased for a term of five years? If so, who is the lessee and what is the annual rental?

Mr. COSTIGAN. P. H. Chabot was the lessee of the New Edinburgh and Gatineau Ferry for the years 1881, 1882, 1883, 1884, and 1885. The amount paid in those years was $230 for the year 1881. The balance due is $920. The ferry has been re-leased because the term of the old lease expired, and the law requires tenders to be called for in such cases. The present lessee is Thomas Mansfield, at an annual rental of $350.

LANDS IN NORTHERN AND WESTERN ONTARIO.

Mr. MILLS asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to acquiesce in the decision of the Court of Chancery and Court of Appeal in regard to the ownership of lands in the northern and western part of the Province of Ontario, or does it propose to further contest the question?

Mr. THOMPSON. The matter is still under consideration.

PRISONERS IN STONEY MOUNTAIN PENITENTIARY.

Mr. BERGERON (for Mr. DESJARDINS) asked, Whether the Government is aware that the health of several of the prisoners confined in the penitentiary at Stoney Mountain, for participation in the North-West rebellion, is seriously impaired? Whether it has been represented to them that further detention must endanger the lives of many of the said prisoners? And, if so, whether it is the intention of the Government to take steps to prevent that result?

Mr. THOMPSON. It was represented some time ago that the health of some of the prisoners was being impaired by confinement, and those in regard to whom that statement was made were released. I am informed that at a very recent date no such statement could be made in regard to those prisoners still confined. I think the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins), who placed the question on the paper, is somewhat misinformed as the number of prisoners still detained, because the hon. gentleman has said "many of the said prisoners." There are only four Indians, one white and one half-breed still detained. The answer in regard to their health is that no such statement has been made as that their health is being impaired; but, on the contrary, the information as to those who remain is that their health has not been impaired.

LANDS, TIMBER AND MINERALS IN NORTHERN QUEBEC.

Mr. MILLS asked, Whether the Government has claimed, or intends to claim, through the Indian title, the lands, timber and minerals in the northern part of the Province of Quebec, in the same way and for the same reason that it makes claim to the lands in the northern and western part of Ontario? If not, why not?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This question cannot be dealt with in the way indicated. There never has been a treaty with any Indians as to lands in the Province of Quebec, and there never has been any surrender.

POST OFFICES IN NORTH WELLINGTON.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, Whether any petitions have been received from the residents of North Wellington, praying for the establishment of new post offices? If so, when is it the intention of the Government to have an inspection made with the view of ascertaining whether the necessity exists for the establishment of more post office accommodation? If so, when, or have they decided to open new post offices? If so, where?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The statement I have obtained from the Post Office Department in answer to this question is as follows: Petitions were received at the Post Office Department on 18th May, 1885, and 3rd April, 1886, praying for the establishment of more post offices at Fitch and Olivette respectively, both in the north riding of the County of Wellington. The inspector in his report upon the former applications states that there is no sufficient case. In the latter, the inspector's report is now under consideration.

MUTUAL RESERVE FUND LIFE ASSOCIATION.

Mr. AMYOT asked, Is the Government aware that the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association issues certificates contrary to law, promising to pay an amount not exceeding "the sum mentioned in the certificate;" whereas the law says: "Every certificate shall contain a promise to pay the whole amount mentioned therein:" "There shall be inserted in each certificate a clause to the effect that no reduction shall be made, for any cause or reason whatsoever, on the amount of a policy lapsed through death?" Whether the Government is aware that the official report of the Superintendent of Insurance of the State of New York shows that the Mutual Reserve Fund Association has already diverted $78,657.12 of the funds derived from death assessments, in order to meet its expenses, contrary to the law in force in Canada; and is it the intention of the Government to take any, and if so, what steps to protect persons insured in Canada against such unlawful acts of the said association?

Mr. McLELAN. The Government is not aware that the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association issues certificates contrary to law. The words quoted in the second clause do not form a portion of the Statute relating to insurance, nor is it correct that there shall be inserted in each certificate a claim to the effect that no reduction shall be made for any cause whatsoever on the amount of a policy lapsed through death. The annual statement of the company is now before the Superintendent of Insurance, and is being examined with those of other companies; and sufficient steps will be taken to protect persons insured in said company in Canada, if anything should be found contrary to the Act.

WHARF AT LANORAIE.

Mr. AUGER (for M. BERNIER) asked, Has a contract been let for the construction of a wharf at Lanoraie, county of Berthier? If so, who is the contractor, and what is the contract price?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In answer to the hon. gentleman I will say that a contract has been awarded for the construction of a wharf at Lanoraie. The contractor is Mr. J. P. Dusablon, and the amount of the contract is $4,500.

MATHEW ROCHE, OF LINGAN, N. S.

Mr. BLAKE. I am sorry that so long a time has elapsed since the 2nd of April, when this motion was placed on the paper, before it was possible to reach it, because we have now reached a stage of the Session, in which it is difficult to hope that an enquiry can be made. If it had not been a motion of this particular character I should have proposed to postpone it, but I think that would not be reasonable, in regard to such a motion, and therefore I proceed to state: That I am credibly informed, and believe I can establish by satisfactory evidence, that at and for many years before the 3rd July, 1884, the date of the last election for Cape Breton, one Mathew Roche, of Lingan, was a voter for the district and was also a Government official, as a member of the Pilotage Board comprising Sydney, one of the greatest ports in Canada, to which were attached two comparatively unimportant out-ports; That during the election, Murray Dodd, Esquire, then and now a member of this House for Cape Breton, pressed Mr. Roche to vote for Mr. McDougall because he was the Government candidate, brought out and selected by them to carry the county, if possible, in their interest; and stated to him, as a reason for his so voting, that it was the invariable rule that where a Government officer voted against the Government candidate he ran the risk of being turned out, and warned him that, if he should so vote, such would be the consequence in his case; that subsequently H. F. McDougall, Esquire, then and now a member of this House for Cape Breton, and Mr. Dodd, M.P., proposed to the Government that Mr. Roche, who they believed had, notwithstanding such warnings, voted against the Government candidate at the said election, should be, in consequence of his vote, superseded in his office, and some progress was made in the attempt; that rumours got abroad, and the Government was made aware of the facts and of the rumours, and hesitated to act; That Messrs. McDougall, M.P., and Dodd, M.P., continued to press for the removal of Mr. Roche; and in the end a plan was devised for the accomplishment of their object, by the remodelling of the Pilotage Board, and the creation of a new board for the comparatively unimportant out-ports, on which minor board Mr. Roche was to be put without his consent, and the constitution of a board for the great port of Sydney on which Mr. Roche's name was not to appear; that having heard that he was by some such scheme to be turned out, Mr. Roche communicated with Mr. Dodd, M.P., who told him that the fact was so; reminded him of his requests and warnings about voting against the Government candidate, and told him that he must submit to the consequences; that the substance of this statement was communicated to the Government, which, however, proceeded to carry out the plan, and created the two boards accordingly; thus accomplishing the end sought of displacing Mr. Roche from the main functions of his office in pursuance of the threat of Mr. Dodd, M.P., and the determination of Mr. McDougall, M.P., to punish him for voting, as they believed he had voted, against the Government candidate. I beg to move:

That Mr. Blake, a member of this House, having made in his place the following statement:—

That he is credibly informed, and believes he can establish by satisfactory evidence, that at and for many years before the 3rd July, 1884, the date of the last election for Cape Breton, one Mathew Roche, of Lingan, was a voter for the district and was also a Government official, as a member of the Pilotage Board comprising Sydney, one of the greatest ports in Canada, to which were attached two comparatively unimportant out-ports;

That during the election, Murray Dodd, Esquire, then and now a member of this House for Cape Breton, pressed Mr. Roche to vote for Mr. McDougall because he was the Government candidate, brought out and selected by them to carry the county, if possible, in their interest; and stated to him, as a reason for his so voting, that it was the invariable rule that where a Government officer voted against the Government candidate he ran the risk of being turned out, and warned him that, if he should so vote, such would be the consequence in his case;

That subsequently H. F. McDougall, Esquire, then and now a member of this House for Cape Breton, and Mr. Dodd, M.P., proposed to the Government that Mr. Roche, who they believed had, notwithstanding such warnings, voted against the Government candidate at the said election, should be, in consequence of his vote, superseded in his office, and some progress was made in the attempt;

That rumours got abroad, and the Government was made aware of the facts and of the rumours, and hesitated to act;

That Messrs. McDougall, M.P., and Dodd, M.P., continued to press for the removal of Mr. Roche; and in the end a plan was devised for the accomplishment of their object, by the remodelling of the Pilotage Board, and the creation of a new board for the comparatively unimportant out-ports, on which minor board Mr. Roche was to be put without his consent, and the constitution of a board for the great port of Sydney on which Mr. Roche's name was not to appear;

That having heard that he was by some such scheme to be turned out, Mr. Roch communicated with Mr. Dodd, M.P., who told him that the fact was so; reminded him of his requests and warnings about voting against the Government candidate, and told him that he must submit to the consequences;

That the substance of this statement was communicated to the Government, which, however, proceeded to carry out the plan, and created the two boards accordingly; thus accomplishing the end sought of displacing Mr. Roche from the main functions of his office in pursuance of the threat of Mr. Dodd, M.P., and the determination of Mr. McDougall, M.P., to punish him for voting, as they believed he had voted, against the Government candidate;

A Select Committee be appointed to enquire into all the circumstances connected with the said charges, with power to send for persons, papers and records; and that the witnesses be examined on oath or affirmation, and that the committee do report in full the evidence taken before them, and their proceedings on the reference; and that Messrs. McCarthy, Davies, Colby, Cameron (Huron), Coursol, Langelier, O'Brien, Weldon and Townshend do compose the said committee.

Mr. DODD. I deem it my duty, before that motion is put to the House, to offer a few words of explanation. I have had this indictment hanging over my head for a period of four or five weeks; at last the shell has exploded, and I feel that I have not suffered very much from it. I am glad the time has arrived when I can state to my friends in this House and to my friends in the country that this charge is utterly unfounded. The hon. gentleman has prepared an indictment against me with my colleague, charging me, in the first instance, with uttering a threat. That I, in the clearest and most emphatic language, deny. Mr. Roche, the party mentioned in this charge, was a great personal and political friend of mine. In the election of my colleague in July, 1884, he spoke to me or I to him, I do not know which, in reference to his conduct in that election. I told him as a friend, as he then was a friend, and as he possibly may be still, that being a Government officer he might be subject to certain penalities, or might possibly imperil his position by taking an excessive, active part against my friend and colleague Mr. McDougall. Nothing further was done, so far as I am concerned or know of, for months afterwards. In the month of February, 1885, seven months after the election, during which interval of time Mr. Roche and I met and were the best of friends, he wrote me a letter, not stating that I had threatened or warned him, but in the most friendly terms asking me to become his friend here in case of the remodelling of the board which, for causes which I shall hereafter draw your attention to, was then contemplated. This letter is as follows:—

"LINGAN, 16th February, 1885.

"MR. MURRAY DODD:

"SIR,—It is rumored around here that you are going to remove me from the Board of Commissioners of Pilots, and I wish to lay a few facts before you. You are well aware that I always voted for you, and you also know that I got the ill-will of D. Link for doing so at recent last election, and if you consent to remove me without any reason, to please a few greedy grab-alls."——

I do not know who they were——

"I cannot help it, but it is more than I expected from you While on that board I acted fearlessly and without any favoritism, and I do not think it is right to dismiss a man without a reason. If you wish to find how I acted while on that board, I refer you to Mr. W. Purvis, and I consider him as good an authority as can be found. It seems that the whole trouble is that the pilots do not collect their pilotage. Sir, you will please look at the returns, and you will see that cannot be done very well. It is likely, if I could be twisted around by some of our nobility, there would be no complaints. Dear friend, there is not much gain in it directly; it is a little benefit to me in an indirect way. I never asked you for any political favor before now, and I ask you not to dismiss me when there is no reason on my part. If you do it is more than I expected from one of the Dodds.

"No more from yours,

"MATHEW ROCHE."

That is what I heard of this story. I told Mr. Roche what might be his danger, from what I conceived to be good authority. That I had foundation for making the statement, I will read a few extracts. The hon. gentleman who honors me by making this charge, the leader of the Opposition, is associated with a great party in this country; it has been a great party, and it is recognised by his followers as a great party; but there was a member of that party of the name of D. A. Macdonald, who was Postmaster General in the former Government, and who for his services to the party was afterwards made Lieutenant Governor of the great Province of Ontario. To the postmaster of Carillon he wrote in these words:

"You are reported to me as taking a very active part against the Government candidate for Argenteuil county. I will only add I think you are making a mistake. Government officials should not oppose the Government candidates."

That I conceive to be good authority for warning my personal friend that he ran a risk. But I do not need to go beyond our own Province for authority. The Hon. Wm. Ross, who was promoted for his services to the party to which the hon. gentleman who has made this motion belongs, the Hon. Mr. Ross, now the collector at Halifax, for whom I have the greatest amount of respect, writing, it is alleged, to a man by the name of Egan, at North Sydney, directly threatened him with dismissal from his office if he took an active part, in the election then being held, against the Government candidate, and instead of his action being condemned by the Government of hon. gentlemen opposite, he, in return for his activity, was made collector. We have further the judge in the county court in the county of Pictou, one of the ad hoc judges, as they were called, the hon. Mr. Johnston, in the trial of an election petition against Mr. Carmichael, then a substantional supporter of the hon. gentleman's party in this House, in which case it was proved that Mr. Carmichael had threatened the postmaster at Glengarry, held that the Government officer having been warned that in taking an active part in the election, he was liable to dismissal, that was not sufficient ground for the annulling of Mr. Carmichael's election; and hon. gentlemen opposite rewarded Mr. Johnson by promoting him to a permanent position as one of the judges of the county courts of Nova Scotia. There are instances of judges in Nova Scotia giving like decisions, in that ad hoc court, in the election campaign of 1872, and notably one in my own county. I suppose nobody will dispute my authority when I quote the Globe, which gives a report of a discussion that took place in this House in 1874, and I am glad the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) is here, because it is not reported that he denied the statements attributed to him by Sir Charles Tupper, according to the Globe report. Sir Charles Tupper then used these words:

"Mr. TUPPER went on to say that during the late Dominion elections the hon member for Halifax had said at a public meeting in the Temperance Hall in that city, that if any official of the Government voted against him, it would be at his peril, and that Mr. Annand had come down there and said that he had just been at Ottawa and seen Mr. Mackenzie, and that gentleman had told him the same thing; and Mr. Jones—the then Minister of Militia—did not deny this, but spoke upon his own responsibility."

Now the leader of the then Government (Mr. Mackenzie) is reported also, in the discussion which arose out of the dismissal of the Arnprior slide master, to have said:

"They—referring to the Opposition—had allowed that forbearance to go a great deal too far in protecting men who had used their offices in order to injure the Government they serve, but he could tell the hon gentleman opposite and all such office holders that that was at an end."

This, therefore, was recognised in Nova Scotia as the Mackenzie doctrine.

Mr. KIRK. No, it was never so recognised.

Mr. DODD. It was recognised by the supporters of the Mackenzie Government that an office holder who took an active part in elections was liable to dismissal, and I thought, and I still think, that I was simply acting the part of a friend when I warned Mr. Roche that if he took an active part in the election he was liable to dismissal. Let us come to the facts. Mr. Roche, according to the indictment of the leader of the Opposition, would appear to have been dismissed from a particular office; but he has never been dismissed from any office, as he still occupies the position he did at the time of the election, that of commissioner of pilots for Lingan. But I will tell you why the commission of pilots was remodelled. While I was in Ottawa that year, a difficulty arose. Mr. Livingstone, who had for years been the collector of pilotage at that port, was dismissed at a formal meeting of the board, at which three of the five commissioners were present, and the brother of one of the commissioners was named in his place. The pilots, Liberal and Tory, Protestant and Catholic, petitioned, to a man, that Mr. Livingstone should be reinstated. His dismissal annoyed the business men of the port to such an extent that the secretary of the board threatened to resign. Every business man connected with the industries of that great port,—and in that, I think, the leader of the Opposition will agree—the great port of Sydney, petitioned against his resignation and that he should retain his place, because he alone understood the business of commission. This was brought to our notice, and we found from the fact that the collector had been dismissed and a new one, the brother of a commissioner, appointed, it was essential something should be done. The commission combined in two great ports, two lesser ports in the harbor of Sydney with the two great ports of Sydney North and Sydney, and the outer ports of Caledonia, Lingan and Little Glace Bay. As regards the outer port of Lingan, where Mr. Roche lived, we decided that the better way would be, in order that there might be no clash of opinion between the parties living in the outer ports and those living in the inner ports, that the outer ports should be amalgamated into one pilotage commission, so that the commissioners should live at the ports over which they had juridiction; the pilotage Commission declared emphatically by by-law that disputes arising with masters of vessels should be referred to the nearest pilotage authority, as it was impossible to expect a shipmaster to travel twenty or thirty miles in order to have a dispute settled. They decided, in the interest of the trade and commerce, and in the interests of shipping, that it was right, perfect and just, two boards should be formed, one of five men having the exclusive jurisdiction of the two great ports of Sydney and North Sydney and the minor ports within the harbor of Sydney, and the other composed of men living at or near Caledonia, Glace Bay and Lingan; and, in remodelling those ports, we left Mr. Roche at Lingan, where his property and business are situated, because in attending to the important port of Sydney he had to travel twelve miles. It is quite true a moderate remuneration is attached to the work; I do not know how much. The Act specifies none, but an allowance is made for travelling expenses and a small fee is allowed, and Mr. Roche gets the same small fee now, I presume, as he got then, and exercises the same jurisdiction as he did then over the harbor of Lingan, to which he was specially appointed. He knows no more of the harbor of Sydney than any hon. gentleman opposite; he is simply appointed for the harbor of Lingan to see that the pilots there are competent to discharge their duties, and that power he is exercising at present. Such is the position of the matter, and I am astonished that the leader of the Opposition should state that Mr. Roche was removed, and removed in the manner he alleges. We have done nothing but what we conceived to be our duty, under the circumstances; nothing but what we considered to be our right, and if, on account of the exercise of a little chicanery, and because of a little annoyance at circumstances, of which I did not know for months afterwards, I wrote a hasty letter, as is alleged here, it was not in furtherance of a threat or to carry out a threat, but because there were circumstances brought to my mind, which are specifically proved, which justified the course I took, and I regret the hon. gentleman has not been able to get his committee; circumstances which would convince any man in this House and in the Dominion of Canada, that Mr. Roche's dismissal would have been the most justifiable act that this Government could have done, or that I could have demanded. A man who travels from one end of his section to the other with the view to influence in a highly improper manner, as I have been informed he did, men to vote, should be dismissed and should not be permitted to retain his office, if he holds one under a Government. He has no right to do so; and, sustained by the authorities which I have quoted, and of which the reports of the House of Commons debates are full, and which can be sustained by dozens of other authorities unnecessary to quote, I consider that, under the circumstances which I have detailed of the going to pieces of our board there by the dismissal of this man, I was only exercising my right and doing my duty. I may say to the hon. the leader of the Opposition that Roche is not the man who was dismissed. Another man was left off the board, who had appointed his brother the collector, and, if he could discover and had gone to the depths of this thing, he would find that the trouble does not arise with Roche, who is perfectly satisfied, occupying to-day the position he has always occupied, but that it arises from a source of which no mention is made in this indictment.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). I have nothing to add to what my hon. colleague has said except that, in any part I took in the matter, I acted for the best interests of the public. I felt that the conduct of certain members of that board was such as required the interference of the Government, and, in view of that fact, it became the duty of my hon. colleague and myself to make such a recommendation as we thought would best serve the public interest. We have done so, and Mr. Roche, in whose behalf the hon. member has brought up this charge, is occupying a position to-day fully as lucrative as he occupied before our interference. This is all I have to say except that I do not object to the leader of the Opposition obtaining any comfort or satisfaction he can obtain from an investigation by a committee of this House or any other committee in reference to the matter.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not intend to trouble the House at any length on this question, on which, but for some of the words used by the hon. member for Cape Breton who first spoke (Mr. Dodd), I should have not said anything. The hon. member has, however, stated some things which seem to require a brief reference from me. First, he has stated that Mr. Roche is perfectly satisfied and contented, occupying as good a position as before, and that this comes up not at his instance but at the instance of some one else whose name has not been mentioned. I have in my possession letters addressed to myself from Mr. Roche conveying his statement of the circumstances, and requesting me to bring them under the attention of the House, so that, whether Mr. Roche himself, as he states in his note, be the correct exponent of his own views, or the hon. member for Cape Breton, I am not to judge. All I can say is that I have heard from Mr. Roche directly in a very different sense from that which the hon. member for Cape Breton puts forward. Then the hon. member for Cape Breton says that he warned Mr. Roche that, if he interfered actively in the election, certain unpleasant results might possibly happen, and he quotes a number of authorities which he thinks justified him amply in making any such statement. I do not know that these are very good authorities for the hon. gentleman. They might have been had such been his statement, had such been the circumstances, had those who made the statements been still in possession of the Treasury benches, but they were not in possession of the Treasury benches, and it is the policy of the hon. gentleman's own friends and leaders, which is really important to be looked at by him, to decide what advice or admonition he might extend to his friend and supporter, Mr. Roche. However, the statement I have made, and which is justified by the information I have received, is not a statement that Mr. Roche was informed by the hon. gentleman that, if he interfered actively, and, as the hon. gentleman now states improperly —because he states that he interfered improperly to influence voters—he would run any risk; that is not the statement contained in the motion which is before the Chair. The statement is a statement with reference to the act of voting. That is the statement upon which the charge is based. Then, the hon. gentleman says that, after all, nothing was done, that the circumstances which took place were circumstances due not at all to this consideration of the action of Mr. Roche, whatever it was; that they were due to the necessities, the commercial and other necessities, of the ports, and to certain events in the conduct of the business connected with the proposed retirement of some of the officials, which had rendered it fit that a change should take place. As I gathered, the conclusion which the hon. gentleman desired to bring the House to, it would be that what was done in the case of the remodelling of the board had no relation at all to, was in no sense consequent upon, Mr. Roche's conduct in the election or the threats, or advice, or admonition, or counsel, or exhortation, or what you please which the member for Cape Breton had been good enough to extend to Mr. Roche, but that it was due in fact to a desire to comfort Mr. Roche, to place him in a good position, in such a position that he would not have to travel twelve miles in order to do his business, but would find his business at his door. Now, my principal information upon the point, as to the circumstances under which this change took place and the reasons for it, is derived from a letter which has been supplied to me, written by the hon. member, purporting at any rate to be signed by the hon. member, and I believe signed by him, and received by Mr. Roche, which letter is dated the 21st April, 1885.

"HOUSE OF COMMONS, OTTAWA, 21st April, 1885.

"TO MR MATHEW ROCHE.
"Lingan, Cape Breton.

"DEAR SIR,—It is quite true that it is in view to remodel the pilotage commission. You must remember that it is the invariable rule, where a Government officer votes against the Government candidate, as you did in the case of the election of McDougall and Mr. McKay, that he runs the risk of being turned out. Mr. McDougall thinks that a friend of his should have the position which you hold, and I cannot object to him placing him there, for the reason that I personally told you what the consequence would be if you voted against him, and further asked you to vote for him because he was the Government candidate brought out and selected by them to carry the county, if possible, in their interests. Knowing all this, you assumed the responsibility of the course you pursued, and having done so I fear you must submit to the consequence.

"Yours very truly,
"MURRAY DODD."

Mr. McCALLUM. Does the hon. member who has just taken his seat mean to say that is a corrupt act? I would like to know that.

Mr. BLAKE. I do.

Mr. McCALLUM. Then you are equally guilty. Do you not remember the case of John B. Smyth, of the Welland Canal, who was suspended from his position, and who waited for four years on the Government of that day to know what were the charges against him? We do not find that they cautioned him, or that they ever even told him what was against him. Of course, when the Government changed in this country, the present Government did justice to Mr. Smyth by reinstating him in his former position. I do not look upon this myself as a very serious charge.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Oh, no, certainly not.

Mr. McCALLUM. No, certainly not. They are not charges which should make it necessary for Mr. Dodd to get up in this House to defend himself against them, as you did in the Local Legislature—and I have got the evidence here in my hand—when you made charges and appointed your own commission. I refer to the time when Mr. Cameron got up in the House saying there was some undue influence brought to bear upon Mr. Wood. The hon. gentleman got up and amended his own charges. I will read what took place:

"The Hon. Mr. Cameron moved, seconded by Hon. Mr. Carling, That a select committee be appointed to enquire whether any, and, if any, what corruption, inducement or offer was made to the Hon. E. B. Wood, a member of this House, to induce him to resign his position as Treasurer of the Province of Ontario, by the Hon. E. Blake or any other member of the present Administration, while members of the Opposition in the Legislative Assembly, such committee to have power to send for persons, papers and documents, and to report thereon to this House; and that it be an instruction to such committee to return the evidence taken before it to this House.

"The motion as amended having been put,

"The Hon. Mr. Blake moved, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, That the words 'or any other member of the present Administration while members' be struck out and the following words be inserted in lieu thereof:"

You see what he wanted, he wanted to save himself. He would not allow it to cover other members of the Government. They might bribe as much as they liked. Then, Sir, he formulated charges against himself and he appointed his own judges. He is now very much offended because a man is being changed from one Pilotage Board to another. Oh! what a terrible charge. Why, Sir, I have known them to discharge a good many more members than that, but I do not think it is necessary to speak of it here, because they are not governing the country now. Of course when they were governing the country it was perfectly right to do anything at all, no matter whom they discharged. It is just as I said the other day: "purity, purity," when they are in Opposition over there, and practice "corruption, corruption" when they are over here in power.

Mr. McNEILL. Prior to the general election of 1882, Mr. Grange was Divisional Court Clerk in Paisley. He was informed by a gentleman who took a very leading part against me at that election that if he voted for Mr. McNeill he would be "looked after." He said that he intended to vote as he had always done, for the Conservative candidate. He did so. Within a few hours afterwards—I think, if my memory serves me aright, within two days afterwards—a gentleman was sent down to investigate the affairs of his office, and he was dismissed.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman for Monck (Mr. McCallum) has given a very little text and a great deal of commentary. The hon. gentleman promised to read the motion but did not keep his promise, for while he referred to the amendment moved by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition on that occasion, the hon. gentleman did not read the amendment. Now, Sir, it is perfectly clear to the apprehension of the House what the reason of the hon. member was.

Mr. McCALLUM. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. I did read it.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman did not. The hon. gentleman declared that my hon. friend moved to leave out certain names, but he did not finish reading the motion.

Mr. McCALLUM. Do you want me to finish it now?

Mr. MILLS. If any hon. gentleman in this House were to say that some hon. member had violated the law in precisely the same way that it was stated certain members of the Local Government had violated it, everyone would see how unreasonable such a proposition was. The leader of the Opposition, on that occasion, made a specific charge against my hon. friend. Did he object that there should be an enquiry? Did he contend that there was nothing in that enquiry? My hon. friend objected to that resolution so far as it related to other members of the Government, without specifying who those members were. And I say that was a reasonable objection, the reasonableness of which would be recognised if the House were to listen to the charge of the leader of the Opposition against the hon. gentleman in the motion of enquiry that is now before the House. What is the statement made by the hon. gentleman? That the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. Dodd) has warned a certain officer that if he voted in a particular way the result would be that he would be dismissed from his office. That is the statement. Now, what does the hon. gentleman say? First, he says the charge was unfounded, and in the next place he admitted the charge was true. He admitted that the letter had been written; he admitted that he warned the gentleman what would be the probable consequences of his action if he ventured to vote against the Administration. He told him that it was an invariable practice that when a man was entrusted with the franchise who, at the same time, was in possession of a Government office, that if he ventured to exercise his independence and to vote in accordance with his judgment, though he did not happen to be on the same side of politics, he was liable to be dismissed, and the hon. gentleman warned him that in all probability that would be the consequence of his action if he failed to vote for the Government candidate. Well, Sir, my hon. friend has read the letter written after this rumor went abroad by the hon. gentleman, and what does the letter show? Does it not show in the clearest possible light, that the statement is well founded, and that he did warn the man that if he voted against the Government candidate in all probability he would be dismissed, and that he could not interfere on his behalf, that he deserved his fate if the Government chose to remove him from office? Now, Sir, I say there is no practice better established than that when a Government or a candidate interferes with the freedom of an elector and uses undue influence and threatens him with dismissal if he votes in accordance with his convictions and against the Government candidate, it is an undue influence which, if brought forward in time and in the proper way, ought, at all events, to void an election. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman does not pretend to say that this charge is not well founded. His own letter shows that it is so. His own letter shows that this man Roche was practically removed from office because he ventured to support the candidate that was not the Government candidate.

Mr. McCALLUM. I would ask a question. What is the penalty if you prove all you say? Then why take up the time of the House.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman is one of the members of this House who think that it is right and proper that the officials of the Government should be entitled to exercise the elective franchise.

Mr. McCALLUM. No.

Mr. MILLS. Yes, the hon. gentleman supported that proposition last year, because that proposition was embraced in the Franchise Act which he supported. The hon. gentleman now says that those parties who hold office under the Government can only exercise their franchise when it is in consonance with the wishes of the Government, that they must support the Government candidate or they are liable to be dismissed from office. What chance is there in this city for the election of a man in opposition to the Government if every civil servant of the 600 entitled to the electoral franchise is told beforehand that if he votes against the candidate of the Government he will certainly be dismissed from office? That is the declaration which the hon. gentleman makes, and it is well the country should know the position which hon. gentlemen opposite occupy. What does the hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) say? The hon. gentleman says it is a right and proper thing to do, it is the proper policy to pursue, that there is nothing whatever improper in it. And the hon. gentleman may have in his constituency many Government officials, and he may think it is the proper way to march them up to the polls as the retainers of the Government. Those are men who are in the public service; they are the dependents of the Administration, they hold their office during the pleasure of the Administration, and they are warned beforehand that unless they record their votes in favor of the Government candidate they are certain to be dismissed from office. I say that is a doctrine which I trust this House will not support. I hope this House, in giving the electoral franchise to Government officials, did not give it with the expectation and determination that those parties who were dependent on the Government and liable to dismissal by way of punishment would invariably support the candidates of the Government. That is the gravamen of the charge made in this motion moved by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), and unless the Government are prepared to say that it is the right and proper thing to do, that those men who are dependent on the Government should be compelled to vote for the Govment and should not be at liberty to vote against Government candidates, they must dissent from the position taken by the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. Dodd), and must support the motion of the hon. member for West Durham.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The principle is a very obvious one. It was always understood that any civil servant and any officer of the Government should vote and should confine himself to a vote, that an officer of the Government should not be a political partisan and go electioneering. That principle is affirmed in the strongest way by the adoption of the vote by ballot. Everyone knows that an official goes and votes as he likes, and no one knows whether he votes for the Government of which he is a servant or against it. But that is not the case here. This man, Mr. Roche, held an office of no pecuniary value, except that if he drove up to Sydney and returned he got his expenses paid. While he had no salary attached to his office he had a very considerable amount of influence over the different pilots whose certificates he controlled, and the warning given by the hon. member was this: If you go electioneering, if you go working——

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is the statement of the hon. member. It is: If you go working and using the influence which this office gives you, judging from all the precedents, you are departing from the true principle laid down and you are running a risk. That, as I understand it, is the statement the hon. gentleman made in his place. The warning was given before the vote.

Mr. BLAKE. A warning after the vote would not have been beneficial.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, of course not. The warning was given before the vote, and the member for Cape Breton who spoke first, stated very truly that if the matter was looked into it would be found out, perhaps, that there was very strong reason for taking a stronger course with respect to Mr. Roche than was taken. Now, what happened? Mr. Roche wrote to Mr. Dodd as a friend. He did not feel he had been threatened by the hon. member, but he wrote him as a particular friend; he felt he had rendered himself liable, and he wrote him as a friend to save him, because, although it put no money into Mr. Roche's pocket, the position gave him a little consequence and a little standing. In regard to the course of the Government, my hon friend can explain it.

Mr. McLELAN. It would appear by the notice placed on the paper by the leader of the Opposition that the Government had taken this course with the sole view of displacing Mr. Roche. I beg to say I am responsible for the arrangement made, and I did it in what I considered to be the public interest. The hon. gentleman says that Sydney is one of the greatest ports in Nova Scotia; and so it is. There arose differences in the Pilotage Board of that port. The fact was brought to my notice. I found there were two collectors of Customs, brothers-in-law, upon that board. There was another gentleman, who had since his appointment changed his business in life and become a bridge builder, and was travelling round the country and was very seldom able to attend meetings of the board. There was one member of the board living at Lingan, 12 miles distant, and another at Cow Bay, one of the out-ports; and it was very seldom that all those gentlemen could meet together and conduct the business of the board properly. There had been a collector of the pilotage fees appointed in the port of Sydney, and a special meeting of the commissioners was called at which two or three attended, and they dismissed that officer and appointed another man. One of the members of the board resigned, Mr. Purves, and matters seemed to be at a standstill. I suggested that the outports be joined, and the large port of Sydney be independent, and that there be two boards appointed, one to look particularly after the port of Sydney, which includes North Sydney, and that the other board, with the members living at the out-ports, would be able to attend the management of the pilots of those out-ports. I mentioned to the representatives of Cape Breton that such was my view of the matter and it would be carried out; and I asked them to name gentlemen to constitute the Pilotage Board for the port of Sydney, gentlemen who would be able to attend the meetings of the board and look after Sydney's interest, and also to name a board for the outports. Two boards were appointed, and I believe they have been working satisfactorily. This was done in the public interest and not for the purpose of getting rid of Mr. Roche, or of inflicting any punishment upon anyone who took an active part in politics. I am not disposed to enter upon the question as to whether we should act upon the principle that hon. gentlemen opposite acted upon, as was shown by the hon. member for Cape Breton, that parties should be dismissed for political acts. But, as the First Minister has stated, if there are any men who should be dismissed for active political action, the men who issue certificates to pilots and are able to dismiss them or refuse to grant them certificates by which they earn their living, are those commissioners who ought to be prevented, if possible, from taking active political action. The First Minister has said he does not take any objection to a man voting, but the member for Cape Breton says he warned Mr. Roche that if he took an active part in politics, if he went into politics actively——

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. McLELAN. That is what the hon. gentleman stated.

Mr. BLAKE. Here is his letter.

Mr. McLELAN. His letter was written long after, and it is to this purport, that he had told him, that he had warned him that if he took an active part——

Mr. BLAKE. No, no.

Mr. McLELAN. He says now he warned him that if he took an active part in the election against Mr. McDougall, the Government candidate, he would be liable to be dismissed, because that was the policy which had been acted upon by the Mackenzie Government, and he supposed that policy was still in force and might be acted upon in his case. When Mr. Roche appealed to Mr. Dodd, after there were rumors that the pilotage commission was to be remodelled, when he appealed to him to save him upon the board, he replied in the letter which has been read by the leader of the Opposition, that he had warned him, and that he would not interfere in any action on his behalf. That is simply the ground for the charge—that he would not interfere. The whole charge seems to have dwindled, and have become nothing; it is all based on the letter from Mr. Dodd to Mr. Roche, that he would not interfere on his behalf, that he had warned him that if he took an active part——

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no; that is not the letter.

Mr. McLELAN—that he would not interfere in his behalf. I am surprised that so grave a charge should be made against hon. members of this House and against the Government, and held on the journals week after week and month after month, with the result that on reading the letter it simply amounts to this—that he had refused to interfere on his behalf. I took action on behalf of the Government as Minister of Marine and Fisheries in the public interest, and without reference to any political action that Mr. Roche had taken in the matter. The whole board of commissioners had become thoroughly disorganised, and I believed it was my duty to act, and that the best way to act was to divide the board and create a new one for Sydney and a new one for the out-ports.

HOME RULE FOR IRELAND.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I wish to say a few words respecting a conversation which took place to-day in the House when I was absent. I think the leader of the Opposition asked some question about the transmission of the resolution respecting Home Rule the other night. After the votes were taken in the morning I asked Reuter's agent here to transmit the vote——

Mr. MILLS. The Mail's agent.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. To send the whole thing, but lest there should be some mistake, I sent for him next morning, and he told me that he had misunderstood me. I meant that the Government should pay the expense, but he said that he had sent only the substance. I thereupon telegraphed verbatim et literatim the resolution passed in this House, and cabled also to Sir Charles Tupper to have it printed at once and sent to every member of the English House of Commons.

Mr. BLAKE. My understanding is, Sir, that when the House of Commons speaks, as it did on that occasion, it is under your direction and by your authority that the communication should be sent.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That may be, but the information was given perhaps more speedily than if it had been sent by the Speaker, who has no right to use the telegraph.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

INSOLVENT BANKS, INSURANCE COMPANIES, &c.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 15) further to amend an Act respecting insolvent banks, insurance companies, loan companies, build-ing societies and trading corporations.—(Mr. Edgar.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 2,

Mr. THOMPSON. I feel bound to call the special attention of the committee to this clause because it strikes me, in the absence of some explanation as to its necessity, as being an unwise clause to adopt, and one likely to operate unfairly on existing rights. The committee have already passed a clause giving clerks a preference in companies which are being wound up, and this clause makes that provision retrospective. I do not know what companies are being wound up, but without good reason I do not think we should take away the rights of creditors to give preference to others. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman who has the Bill in charge that it is at the least a very extreme exercise of the powers of Parliament, and probably an overstepping of our powers; because when we undertake to deal with the rights of two classes of creditors, and to say that one shall give way and that the other shall be paid, it strikes me that we are interfering with civil rights to a greater extent than we would be warranted in doing in legislating on insolvency or on the winding up of companies. For both of these reasons it appears to me that the committee can hardly accept that clause.

Mr. EDGAR. Of course, it has been decided in more cases than one in our Supreme Court that, in matters relating to insolvency, this Parliament has jurisdiction over civil rights. The case of Valin vs. Langlois, and more recently that of Shields vs. Peake, have decided that. The Committee on Banking and Commerce, who considered this Bill, did not seem to think this second clause was unreasonable. Take the case of workingmen whose labor increases the value of the property in the hands of the liquidator; they are allowed now to an extent of less than three months' arrears of wages. It does not look unreasonable, so long as the property is in the hands of the liquidators, and the final dividend is undeclared, that these claims should apply.

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not dispute at all that Parliament has the power to deal with civil rights in connection with the subject of insolvency. But the point I made was that this section, instead of dealing with the general subject, is dealing really with one or two cases, and is dealing with them only for the purpose of changing civil rights. But, apart from that, it seems to me that parties who are to get a preference under this clause can show no right to it and we may be interfering with vested rights of other persons. The second clause proposes to apply that principle in the case of all estates of companies that are being wound up where final dividends have not been paid; so that if existing creditors are entitled to a dividend of $500, it proposes to vote that money to persons who, up to this time, had no preference. Before we make a preference, some good claim ought to be estabilised on the part of those persons.

Section negatived.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I beg to move, that the said Bill be amended by adding the following section as section 3:—

3. Section eighteen of the said Act passed in the 45th year of Her Majesty's reign, and chaptered 23, is hereby amended by the addition of the following sub-sections:

(2.) Whenever the court is of opinion that it is just and equitable that the company should be wound up, they may make an order for that purpose upon application by petition on behalf of the company, or by any shareholder of the company, notwithstanding that such company is not insolvent.

(3.) When the application is made on behalf of a shareholder such application shall be made after notice to the company in the manner hereinbefore provided, and all the other provisions of this Act, so far as applicable, shall apply to the proceedings for winding up a company under this section.

(4.) Whenever the affairs of a company have been completely wound up under the said Act, the court may make an order that the company be dissolved from the date of such order, and the company shall be dissolved accordingly, and such order shall be forthwith reported by the liquidator to the Secretary of State (Imperial Act, 25-26 Victoria, chapter 89, section 111.)

(5.) The provisions of sub-sections, 2, 3 and 4 of this section shall apply to all companies now incorporated or hereafter to be incorporated under 'The Canada Joint Stock Companies' Act, 1877,' but shall not apply to any other companies or corporations.

I move these clauses because there is at present no Act under which the shareholders of an incorporated company desirous of having their business closed, can appoint liquidators, wind up their affairs and dissolve the company. The Imperial Act (25 and 26 Vic., chap. 89) provides for voluntary winding up as well as compulsory winding up. The Dominion Act (45 Vic., chap 43) known as the Act respecting insolvent banks, &c., only deals with compulsory proceedings, making no provision like the English Act, for winding up the company by means of liquidators under the control of the company. There are many cases where it is obvious the continuance of a company is useless, for instance many of the colonisation companies which have been established in Canada, many phosphate and mineral companies and such corporations. In numerous instances, too, the companies are not insolvent, because a large portion of the stock remains unpaid and subject to call, but there is no benefit to be derived from the companies pursuing their undertaking, because circumstances have made it obvious that they cannot now meet with success, and it is therefore desirable that an economical and speedy method of closing their affairs should be provided. It is true that the shareholders may, by resolution, wind up a company not desirous of continuing business, but they cannot thereby get rid of their corporate existence. The control of the company is liable, at any time thereafter, to pass into the hands of a few interested parties, who may act in a manner injurious to the others, and by injustice do a wrong under what has hitherto been considered a lawful Act. Under "The Canada Joint Stock Companies' Act of 1877," section 72, it is provided that:

"The charter of the company shall be forfeited by non-user during three consecutive years at any one time, or if the company do not go into actual operation within three years after it is granted."

Notwithstanding this enactment, no machinery has been provided by Parliament for declaring a forfeiture under this section. The words of the proposed amendment are the same as those used in the English Act, and my object in moving in this matter is that we may obtain the benefit of the decisions of the judiciary in the numerous cases that have arisen in England. In doing this, I propose to limit the power of the court to companies incorporated under the Joint Stock Companies' Act only; otherwise objection might reasonably be taken that the right of a shareholder to petition for the liquidation of a bank or insurance company not insolvent, might operate injuriously. The proposed amendment, therefore, deals only with companies incorporated under the Canada Joint Stock Companies' Act of 1877; and as Parliament, by section 73 of that Act, reserves power to itself to make further provision in respect of such companies any such objection must fail. Section 73 provides:

"The company shall be subject to such further and other provisions as Parliament may hereafter deem expedient."

It is clear, therefore, that it is quite within the competence of Parliament to deal with the matter. I followed as closely as possible the wording of the English Act of 1862, which provides, in section 79:

"A company under this Act may be wound up by the court as hereinafter defined under the following circumstances, that is to say:
"1. Whenever the company has passed a special resolution requiring the company to be wound up by the court.
"2. Whenever the company does not commence its business within a year from its incorporation or suspends its business for the space of a whole year.
"3. Whenever the members are reduced in number to less than seven.
"4. Whenever the company is unable to pay its debts.
"5. Whenever the court is of opinion that it is just and equitable that the company should be wound up."

For these reasons I ask the House to give statutory effect to the amendments now moved.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION.

House resumed the adjourned debate on motion of Mr McMullen, for:

Return showing the name and post office address of each person on the superannuated list of retired civil servants, on the 1st day of January, A.D. 1886.

Mr. McMULLEN. I should have very much preferred to have closed my remarks on this question when I had the opportunity of bringing it before the House, but, unfortunately, I was prevented from doing so under the rules of the House which did not permit me to go on after six o'clock. I then took occasion to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the Government, in 1884, had retired under the Act 49 civil servants, and that the amount paid out during that year was something like $140,000 over that which the service had paid in to the suterannuation fund. The country had thus lost that amount. I pointed out that, in 1885, we had lost over $150,000 in the same way; and I now want to draw the attention of the House to some facts connected with the working of the Act under the Government of the Hon. Alex. Mackenzie as compared with its working under the present Government. Out of 423 on the list on the 1st January, 1886, 342 have been superannuated by hon. gentlemen opposite, and the remainder, 81, have been superannuated by the Mackenzie Government. Since November, 1878, when hon. gentlemen opposite came into power, 453 have been superannuated by them, or an average of 65 a year, while the Mackenzie Government, during their five years' existence, superannuated 256, or 51 each year. This Government, in the first five years of their term of office, superannuated 351, or 95 more than the Mackenzie Government did in the same period. I want to draw the attention of the House to another very important fact in this connection. I claim that those who have been superannuated by hon. gentlemen opposite, cannot have been superannuated, owing to ill-health or old age, while those superannuated under the Mackenzie régime must have been, according to the facts before us now, superannuated for old age or infirmity. As I stated before, hon. gentlemen opposite have, since they came into office, superannuated 453, of which we have still on the list, on the 1st of January last, 351; so that only 25 per cent. of them have passed away. Take, on the other hand, the case of the Mackenzie Government, who were in power from 1874 to 1878. They superannuated 256, and on the 1st of January, as appears by the list, there were only eighty-one of those in existence; so that over 66 per cent. of them have passed away. That shows conclusively, that in their case the superannuations were on account of old age or ill-health, and that in the other case, they were to a large extent for political purposes, in order to make room for those anxious to get office. The average yearly allowance for each person on the superannuation list is $470. If you multiply that by 95, the increased number superannuated under the present régime, you will find the Government have added $44,650 to the annual charge of the revenue of the country; or, in other words, if the Mackenzie Government had remained in power the demand on the resources of the country, under the working of the superannuation system, taking the increases to the list in the same ratio as the increase during the time they were in power, would have been $158,000, while under the régime of hon. gentlemen opposite it is $203,000, a very decided increase. There is another point to which I wish to draw attention. During the time Mr. Mackenzie was in power, hon. gentlemen opposite abused him without stint, because of the number he had superannuated during his five years of Administration. The First Minister and his supporters took Mr. Mackenzie severely to task for what they called his extravagance; they vilified him without limit for the course he adopted, but if he was then liable to be called to answer for what hon. gentlemen called extravagance on his part in the working of the superannuation system, when he only superannuated 51 annually against 65 superannuated by hon. gentlemen opposite, and when the evidences I have given show that the superannuations in his case were mainly owing to ill health or old age; when, on the other hand, it is clear that those in the case of hon. gentlemen opposite were, to a great extent, the superannuations of people in the prime of health and quite capable of performing their duties, it will be seen that hon. gentlemen opposite have thus, out of their own mouths, fully condemned themselves. The Act was introduced in 1870 by Sir Francis Hincks, and, if it had remained as it was, when introduced, the drain upon the country's resources would have been very much less than it is at present. That Act provided for a deduction of 4 per cent. from all those civil servants who received a salary of $600 and over, and 2½ per cent. from those who received less than $600. If that Act had remained, we should have lost during the present year only about $100,000, whereas we have lost $150,000. In other words, notwithstanding the large number who have been placed on the retired list, the civil service would have contributed half the sum annually paid out, whereas now it only contributes 25 per cent. of that amount. The Act was amended by hon. gentlemen opposite. Sir Leonard Tilley, when Finance Minister, reduced the sum deducted from the salary of civil servants over $600 from 4 per cent. to 2 per cent. and from that below from 2½ per cent. to 1¼ per cent., so that the amount received from the civil service has been reduced one-half, while, on the other hand, owing to the abuses of the Act which I pointed out when I spoke on this subject before, the number placed on the list has been largely increased. There is no class of servants in the Dominion paid better than the civil servants, if you take the amount of salaries they draw for the duties they perform, both in the inside and the outside service. A system of this kind tends rather to induce extravagance than anything else. It has been vastly abused, not only by the Government but by the civil service, themselves, because, in place of living economically, living within their means and laying by something for old age and infirmities, the system has rather tended to induce extravagance and to lead them to depend upon being pensioners at the country's expense when it becomes necessary for them to retire from the service or if they should happen to get sick. It is an injustice to the laboring classes and to the farming community to be called upon to contribute towards the demands of these men out of the Dominion Treasury. The farming class have hard struggling to make headway under the disadvantages under which they are laboring now, and the farmer who takes up a wild lot and hews out a home for himself in the forest, deserves more sympathy and assistance, in his honest efforts to secure something for himself to retire upon in old age. It requires more energy than any civil servants possess, or those of any other calling in life. And where there are items that can properly be disposed of and that we can get along without, we should cut them off and stop the drain upon the resources of the people. In the first place, the system by which civil servants are hired and the manner in which they are allowed to live and perform the business of the country is a wrong one. I have no objection to the civil service examination, but, when a servant is installed in the office, he is permitted to remain there whether he performs the duties or not as long as he lives or until he is unfitted for those duties. Unfortunately, most of the civil servants are installed in their offices on account of political influence being brought to bear upon the Government of the day; and, when once they get the office, they hold it whether they are capable of performing the duties or not. I admit that some are granted a gratuity if they have to retire, but that is mostly on account of sickness and when they themselves apply to be allowed to retire. There ought to be a board of inspection in a position something similar to that of our Auditor General, who would have the supervision of the civil service in every Department. That board should closely and carefully inspect the manner in which the duties are performed by these officers at the different points, and their dismissal should entirely depend upon the report of that board. If the board reported that they were not efficiently and faithfully performing the duties devolving upon them, they should have the power of dismissal and other men should be engaged in their place. I have no doubt that in many cases men are installed through political influence who are nothing short of a nuisance to those with whom they are associated in the performance of their duties; they drag along a miserable time with them, and at the end of ten years—because they cannot be superannuated before—they are placed on the superannuation list and allowed to draw superannuation to the end of their days. Hon. gentlemen find it awkward to dismiss them because they have been placed there through political influence, and it might be a source of offence to those whose influence was used to put them there. There should be a board of inspection completely free from political influence, placed in such a position that they could not be removed except by concurrent action of both Houses, and having the right to enter every Department, every office, every place where a civil servant was performing his duties, and to closely scrutinise, examine and investigate into everything he does; and, if he is found not to discharge the duties efficiently, faithfully and in the manner necessary to their proper performance, so that they can pass their inspection as proper and right, they should have the power to dismiss him, and then the Government might appoint another in his place. The system of engaging men and when once they are engaged, allowing them to remain until they are superannuated or die in the service, is a wrong system. No business man conducts his business in that way. A merchant will have many clerks that do not suit his business, and, when he finds one, he dismisses him. It is the same with bankers and wholesale merchants. You find in no business the same system that we have in connection with the civil service, which is that, when once a man can bring sufficient influence on the Government of the day, to be appointed to an office, no matter how he may discharge the duties, if he has a relative who is a member of the House who can exercise his influence in getting him installed in a Government office, he remains there comfortable and secure as long as he can perform the duties, no matter how imperfect, until he dies in the service or gets superannuated. I am satisfied that there are many in the Departments today who are incapable of performing the ordinary duties devolving upon them. I am glad to believe that we have many men who perform their duties faithfully and ably, but we have many who are not capable of doing that, and the best evidence of it is that so many are placed on the superannuation list, because that appears to be the only door by which to let them out when they are incapable of performing their duties, and it is often used in order to get rid of them. If the system I have suggested were adopted, it would do away with the necessity for using this plan to get rid of useless, inefficient and incompetent officers. I have no desire to occupy the time further in the discussion of this question. I am extremely sorry that I did not get the opportunity of presenting the balance of what I had to say on the occasion when I made my opening remarks, but I felt it my duty to present the balance of my remarks to the House, and I shall feel it my duty to follow this question up from time to time until we can make an impression on hon. gentlemen opposite in favor of the abolition of this system which I am satisfied is seriously increasing the annual outlay, and which will undoubtedly grow to very serious proportions if it is permitted to go on from year to year.

Mr. McLELAN. There is no objection to giving the hon. gentleman the return he asks for, with the exception that it would be a repetition of a return that was brought down a few days ago, and upon which the hon. gentleman has founded his remarks. In that return he had the names of all the persons upon the superannuation list, with the date when superannuated the amount they paid into the fund from the beginning, and the amount paid to each person from the superannuation fund, and I think it would be an unnecessary expense to repeat all this again for the mere purpose of having the post office addresses of the gentlemen who are on the superannuation list. I think when the hon. gentleman moved for the return b fore, he should have added to his motion all the information that he wanted to obtain, so that one return would have answered the purpose. I suppose it was only for the purpose—I do not say it was for the purpose—but the hon. gentleman has made a very lengthy address upon the return which was presented to him. I regret I did not hear all his remarks, but he has wound up by expressing the hope that the system would be abolished. The hon. gentleman, on the day of which he commenced his address, took the ground that because the men superannuated had paid into the fund very small amounts, and some of them had drawn out very large amounts, therefore it was improper and the system should be abolished. In England, where the system is in operation, it is maintained because it is believed to be in the public interest, and that when an officer becomes disabled from any cause, as age or illness, and it is desirable to replace him by a more active person, the system of superannuation is provided to meet such cases; and they do it without calling on the civil servants to pay into the Treasury, from year to year, any money. They think it in the public interest to keep this system in operation without charging any tax upon the civil servants yearly. Now, the hon. gentleman, in his opening remarks the other day, pointed to a number of cases in which large sums have been paid out and comparative small sums received. He read over a number of those, and on one or two occasions I asked him to give the date. I find, from looking at the returns, that nearly all the large amounts mentioned there are for persons superannuated during the time that his friends held office, and I am sure that, if his friends sympathised with him, and if they believed with him that this is an improper system and should be abolished, they would not, in the year, 1875, when they held office, have used it to so large an extent. The hon. gentleman has given the figures of the total amount that has been paid to persons under the operation of this Act, amounting, as he said, to about a million dollars. Well, very nearly half of that sum has been paid to persons who have been superannuated by the hon. gentleman's own political friends. In going over the list roughly the other day, I calculated the amount that has been paid to persons on the superannuated list, placed there by his own political friends, at over $425,000. Some of these are for very large amounts. Nearly all the large amounts on the list are for persons superannuated by them. I find payments made to parties of the following amounts: $4,000, $18,000, $6,000, $24,000, $10,000, $13,000, $11,000, $8,000, $7,000, $18,000, $11,000, $16,000, all to persons superannuated by his own political friends. I do not mean to say that it was not in the public interest to superannuate these persons, because sometimes, under both Governments, it has been found that changes are necessary in the public interest, and that the services of an officer can be very well dispensed with and a saving effected by the change. I pointed out to the House some time ago that not only in the past year had there been a saving under the operation of this Act of $5,691, but if you go back to the date when the Superannuation Act was passed and take the case of every officer who has been superannuated, and the cases where the vacancy created by the superannuation has been filled by an officer at a less salary, and the cases, where it has not been found necessary in the public interest to fill the vacancy, taking all these savings up to the present time, you will find from the Public Accounts that they amount to an enormous sum. I may, perhaps, be allowed to repeat what I said on that occasion, that, taking every case upon the superannuation list up to 1882, there was a saving in the Finance Department of $18,540; Agriculture, $18,010; Inland Revenue, $42,570; Public Works, $21,014; Marine and Fisheries, $30,263; Secretary of State, $5,482; Interior, $6,893; Customs, $177,398, making a total of $350,183 of savings, against which in three Departments there was a loss, because all the vacancies created by superannuation it had been found necessary to fill again. In the Department of Railways and Canals there has been a loss of $23,000; in the Militia and Defence, $3,725; Post Office, $6,107 making a total loss of $22,857, which leaves a net saving, up to the 13th June, 1882, of $317,327. That was up to the date when the commission on the civil service made their calculation and went over the case of every officer that had been superannuated, and calculating all the saving and all the loss, they made the net result to be the sum I have stated. In my own Department I had the figures brought down to date, and the saving up to 18th March, 1886, was $40,553.51. So the hon. gentleman is entirely wrong in his statement that the Superannuation Act and the working of it has been nothing but a loss to the country. It is true that in some cases men have drawn pretty large amounts of money, those who have been superannuated from sickness or old age; and perhaps the hon. gentleman would sympathise with men in their old age and sickness and allow them a gratuity. On a consideration of the operation of the Act it is manifest there has been a large saving to the country. It would be a misfortune to the country and to the Government if this Act were abolished, and it was not in the power of the Government and the heads of the Departments, when they see that a change can be made so as to render the public service more efficient and a change made in the interest of economy, to effect this under the Superannuation Act. I hope the hon. gentleman will not press his resolution, because, with the exception of the post office address, which is not material, the hon. gentleman is already in possession of all the information asked.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have listened with some attention to the explanations given by the Minister of Finance in answer to the objections taken by the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution, and I will refer to one detail, that in which the hon. gentleman stated that a saving to the extent of $365,000 has been effected since the establishment of this Act. The hon. gentleman has enumerated a number of departments in which savings were effected. I have not the figures, and I have not taken any trouble about the matter, such as looking into statistics; but when the hon. gentleman states that a saving of $30,000 has been effected in the Department of Marine and Fisheries, I should like the hon. gentleman to give in detail where those savings have been made. That is a Department in which I think very few superannuations have taken place, and I am sure the Department is more expensive to-day than it was when the Superannuation Act came into effect; and, if those two statements are facts, I do not see where a saving of $30,000 could have been effected. However, the hon. gentleman has gone into the statistics and I have not done so; I did not intend to take any part in the discussion. But there is a principle involved in this matter, and the discussion has taken a shape to which I always objected. What is the answer to the objections taken by the other side? The reply is: You did just as badly when you were in power. Now, it is about time that kind of argument should cease in this House. There is an independent feeling growing up in this House—it will be still greater after the next election—which will not accept as a satisfactory explanation the statement: You superannuated a larger number and gave larger amounts. The Superannuation Act was brought in at a time when it was thought the public interest called for it. It was only intended to superannuate old and effete officers, and this was to be done in the public interest and not to be abused. I have no hesitation in saying that the Superannuation Act has been abused and used for political and party purposes to make vacancies in the Departments and to appoint other officers. I have read the debate on this subject and listened to a portion of it, and I cannot do otherwise than come to this conclusion, from information I have and from my knowledge of public officers superannuated, men in this very city with whom I am acquainted and men who are in Toronto enjoying their full bodily vigor and the use of their faculties, and who with the experience of several years in the public service, should have been still more useful than younger men. I know of many cases where great abuses have been perpetrated, I will not say by this Government alone but very largely also by the other Government—one is as bad as the other I presume—but abuses exist. An enormous liability has been incurred, and money is paid out from year to year which should not be paid. It is time these abuses should cease. What are the rumors floating about now? From my county come rumors of new superannuations that are going to take place. From other parts of my own Province I hear the same rumor. Letters come to me from officers; an officer in a very important position in the county of St. John is to be superannuated, and I hear two or three other superannuations are going to take place there of men just as competent as I am to perform public duty, and I do not think I fail in my duty when I am called on to do it in the public interest. If these abuses have occurred, as we know they have, and we hear rumors of many more about to take place, I feel that when such a discussion as the present is opened it is my duty to speak out plainly. Those abuses of the superannuation Act should be stopped, and no man fitted to perform the duties of his office should be superannuated. I mention this not for the purpose of protracting the debate or attacking the Government or the Opposition, but from a sense of public duty, feeling that those abuses do exist, that they are growing upon us, that I have seen no effort to check them, and hearing rumors of men likely to be superannuated who are as fit to perform the duty as any hon. Minister at the head of a Department. I hope that now the matter is before the House we shall hear less of the abuse of the system in the future than we have in the past. I am not one of those who have felt very strongly about the necessity of a Superannuation Act; but I admit there are cases where it is desirable that some method of giving relief to old and faithful servants should be provided by the public. At the same time it was never intended that the Superannuation Act should be used as it has been used during the last ten or fifteen years, as anyone knows who is acquainted with those superannuated and their capacity, and that many of them are occupying prominent positions before the public; it is time I say that those abuses were stopped.

Mr. McMULLEN. I desire to say a word in reply to the Minister of Finance. I was surprised to hear the hon. gentleman state that last year $5,000 had been saved under the operation of the Act. In my statement I showed clearly and distinctly the operation of the Act last year I showed that under its operation forty-nine officers were superannuated that drew an annual salary of $42,384.09. Prior to these being superannuated, I showed the hon. gentleman had engaged twenty-five new officers to fill a portion of the offices, to whom they pay $15,763.75. I showed there were twenty-four offices yet to fill; and I presume the way the hon. gentleman tries to show he has made a saving is by taking those offices as vacant, and consequently no money is paid in regard to them. What is the fact? Eighty-one officers of the Department in Ottawa drew last year $49,000 for extra work, or an average of $750. These amounts are not charged to superannuation. The hon. gentleman gets credit for the salary which would be paid to those who would hold the vacant offices, and in that way he tries to show that a saving has been made. Allowing that those twenty-four offices were filled at a reduction of 25 per cent. in salaries, the amount would be $12,146.25, and during the time those offices are vacant the Government are paying that amount to clerks in the Department in the shape of extra work. Then, again, if you take these two together—the $15,763.75 and the $12,146.25—you have a total of $27,910. Add to that the amount granted for superannuation, $18,360.62, add the amount you have granted in gratuities, $2,568.03, and you have the gross amount of $48,838.65. Deduct from that the amount of the salaries paid to those you have engaged to fill the offices, and you have a net loss to the country of $6,454.65, or a net loss every year, if you deduct the gratuities, of $3,986.53. But simply because the hon. gentleman does not charge the amount paid to the servants for extra work, owing to the fact that those in the office have been superannuated, he tries to show that they have saved $50,000. I challenge the hon. gentleman to give the whole statement to any competent actuary in the Dominion, and if he will report that his statement is correct, I was going to say that I would not again open my mouth on the question of superannuation, but I say that no competent authority will say that his method is the proper way of calculating the matter. I looked through very carefully the report of the committee appointed a few years ago to examine into and report upon the superannuation system, and I say that anyone who will look into the report with a desire to get at the bottom of it will say that it was more for the purpose of bolstering up the system than to closely and carefully criticise it. I say that the whole system cannot bear investigation. Take the case my hon. friend referred to. What was the effect on that Department last year? Hon. gentlemen superannuated the Deputy Minister of Fisheries, who was getting $3,200 a year. They allowed him $1,008 and they put in another man at $3,200 a year. There was no reduction, and now we are paying that Deputy Minister and the superannuated Deputy Minister $4,208, instead of $3,200; and if you follow out other cases you will find they work out in the same way. I admit that in some cases they do engage men for smaller salaries, but I do not see why the Dominion should not have the right to dismiss a man if he is paid more money than he is worth, just as any ordinary employer would. I would like to know why we should not do the same as any ordinary man, and give our public servants to understand that as long as they discharge their duties faithfully and efficiently they may expect to be retained, but that when they arrive at old age or become otherwise incompetent for their work, they shall be dismissed and others engaged. When you reach that point you will teach these men to provide for their old age, and not allow themselves to be a burden to the country. I am glad the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) has drawn the attention of the House to this subject, and I am satisfied it is one of those questions which, if probed to the bottom and thoroughly investigated, will convince any reasonable man that it is an actual fraud, so far as the country is concerned, that the people's money has been frittered away in providing for these men when they should be required to provide for themselves, and that the country should not be asked to support a system of that kind.

Mr. BOWELL. I have not given the attention to this question which is necessary, in order to discuss it fully, but I may say that if all the hon. gentleman's calculations are based on the same foundation as the one he made, when he addressed the House on the question the other night, I fear he has fallen into a number of errors. I think I heard him on that occasion instance the case of a superannuation that took place in Quebec, and he stated that a gentleman was superannuated who was receiving $1,600 a year, that he was retired upon an annual payment of $1,220, and that another gentleman was appointed to fill the position at $1,400. Now, that would leave the impression that the charge upon the revenue of the country, at the present moment, was the $1,400 given to the successor of the gentleman who was superannuated, and the $1,220 which he received. Now, what are the facts? They are that this gentleman was superannuated, and received an annuity of $1,220 per annum. He has been in the service over forty years, and was superannuated on account of his age. No new appointment was made, but another officer receiving $1,200 was promoted and given $1,400. I can give him the names if he thinks it necessary. A second was promoted who formerly received $1,000, and was given $1,200, and no new appointment was made. So that the whole charge upon the country, if you add the superannuation and the $400 given as an increase to the two officers promoted, was just $20 per annum; and yet, if my memory serves me right, he left the impression on the House and upon those who will read his speech, that instead of there being an addition of $20 per annum to the expenditure of the Customs Department at the city of Quebec, there was actually an addition of the difference between $1,600 and $2,600.

In other words, that $1,000 was added to the cost of conducting the Customs business in the city of Quebec instead of an actual additional outlay of $20. I give that as an illustration of one case with which I am familiar, and I hope that all his calculations are not based on such foundationless grounds as this one. I must confess that I am a little surprised at the remarks of my hon. and independent friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). He objected to the argument of the Finance Minister in referring to the superannuations which took place during the tenure of office of the hon. member for East York. I fear he was not present or else he forgot that the hon. gentleman who preceded him specially selected the superannuations which had taken place during the time the hon. member for East York was in office, justifying them on the ground that they were all made for the purpose of creating efficiency in the service and that they were superannuated either on account of sickness or old age. Well, I am not going to discuss that question just now. I quite agree with my hon. friend that it is no justification for this Government doing wrong that their predecessors did wrong; but I think it was quite justifiable for the Finance Minister to point out to the House that if there had been abuses in connection with this question they had existed to a greater extent under the reign of the hon. gentleman's friends than during the present Administration, particularly when the hon. gentleman selected that period and defended the superannuations which had taken place during the time the hon. member for East York was in office.

Mr. MITCHELL. All I objected to was that the Finance Minister should have mainly confined his answer to the statement: You are another; you did it. True it is, we are doing it, but——you are another. I admit that he went somewhat beyond that, but I should like to hear a more extended answer or explanation of the abuses existing than he has given. I object to their answering any charge of misconduct, or maladministration, or abuse of law, by saying: You did it before we came in.

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. I did not wish to justify what we did by what they had done alone. I said it was a proper thing to do. I said that the English Government did it without exacting any tax from the officer. I said the Mackenzie Government availed themselves of the Act to as large an extent as we had. I said that all three Governments availed themselves of it, and that it was in the public interests. I endeavored to show—and I think I did show, and what I said is corroborated by the instance mentioned by the Minister of Customs—that on the whole it was in the public interest and attended by economy.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should be sorry to have the practice in England set up for us.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am glad to hear the hon. Minister of Finance declare that he is not imputing any blame to the late Government, and I think wisely, because a comparison of their superannuations with those of their successors will not result to their disadvantage. However, it is useless to enter into a discussion on that subject, because no specific charges have been made against the late Administration. What I would like to know is how the savings the hon. Minister of Finance speaks of, were made? He did not elaborate that part of his statement in which he declared that they had saved $300,000 or $400,000—I do not know whether he meant per annum, or altogether.

Mr. McLELAN. Altogether.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should like to know, I confess, how that has been done when the total cost of the civil service at Ottawa has risen from $823,000 to $1,203,000 a year, and the other services in about equal proportion, and when the superannuation list has risen from $100,000 a year to over $200,000. The saving, if saving at all, I suppose, would be in the replacing of elderly gentlemen with younger and more efficient men at lower salaries; but I think, when the hon. gentleman puts together the superannuation allowance and the salary paid to the successor he can hardly show a saving. That point the hon. gentleman did not touch, and I think the House would like to have the process more fully explained.

Mr. MULOCK. The House is indebted to the hon. member for North Wellington for the attention he has given to this subject. It is quite clear that the Act is working against the interest of the country, not only in respect to the direct loss incurred, but having fallen into bad hands and being abused. It offers a direct temptation to members of the service to seek for superannuation. The sooner they get superannuated, the sooner they become secure in a certain income for life, while they are still able to pursue the calling of ordinary citizens. The hon. member for North Wellington has established beyond question that up to the present time we have disbursed under the Act about $1,250,000. In addition to that, we are now paying out annually about $200,000, and receiving in the way of insurance about $50,000, leaving a net loss to the country under the working of the Act of $150,000 a year. I think it is to be deplored under these circumstances that the Minister of Finance should defend the Act as he does, and that he is apparently willing to go further and adopt the Imperial Act, under which civil servants could be retired without paying anything at all.

Mr. McLELAN. I did not say that. I referred to the practice in England, where that was done.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman cited it with approval, so that there is but one inference to draw. Now, for my part, I never could understand on what principle civil servants are entitled to any better consideration than servants of individuals. Is there any person engaged in a business who deals with his employees on such principles? The salaries attaching to the various offices are quite equal to the value of the services rendered; in my opinion, in some cases, they far exceed it. Civil servants can be divided into two classes. One class discharge only the simplest clerical work—manual labor—as writers. There are a few others, such as deputy heads, pretty high up in the service, who have to bring a little more intelligence and education to bear in the discharge of their duties; but with the exception of these few, the vast army of the civil servants are simply engaged in manual work, and therefore should not come under any system of superannuation. Now, if it is admitted that the annual salary attaching to any office is equal in value to the service rendered, it follows that all we give in the way of bonus or gratuity is so much money paid in excess of the value of the service rendered. That being the case, if the Minister of Finance thinks that a civil servant should receive something when he retires, then deduct the money from his salary while he is in the service, and place it to his credit, and let him him have it when he leaves. In doing that, we would only be doing what he ought to do for himself, namely, laying up a portion of his income against a rainy day. I would like to know where men are as well paid as they are in the service of Canada. There are a few great prizes, of course; but compare the salaries paid today in the great monetary institutions with the salaries paid by this Government to their servants, and you will find that the latter compare most favorably with the former, and you will not find that the servants of these great institutions receive annuities at the expense of the institutions themselves. The experience of the working of the Act makes it imperative on the Government at the earliest possible moment to repeal it, and thus to some extent show their desire for economy. The Minister of Customs, in citing cases of economy, forgot to point out that in some cases the Government have not simply filled vacancies and made promotions. For instance, the Department of Marine under the late Minister was administered with one deputy head; but a short time ago the present Minister found it necessary to have two deputy heads, and I suppose each deputy will be trying to increase his staff so that he may shortly preside over an army of officials. Then, last year it was found necessary to have two librarians, and I see by the public press that these two gentlemen are to go on a trip through the United States to visit every library in the Union in order to inform themselves how best to discharge their duties. I do not know whether they are to travel at the expense of the country or not; perhaps we shall find that out when the Supplementary Estimates come down, or, perhaps, next year we shall see some little item of contingencies to cover that expenditure. Wherever we increase the staff, there is a further permanent charge on the revenue of the country, and I can only say that the duty of Ministers in this matter is, in my judgment, absolutely clear, and that is, at the earliest possible day, to repeal this unsound measure and place this branch of the service on a proper business like footing.

Motion negatived.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hastings) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 28) to amend the criminal law of Canada. He said: I do not know that I can add anything to what I said when I introduced the Bill. It is an Act to provide for the further punishment of a certain class of criminals known as burglars. There is at present a certain discretion given the judges, which allows them to punish these offences by sentences to imprisonment for periods varying from two years to imprisonment for life. This Bill is more stringent in its provisions. It provides that where parties are discovered having in their possession any implement known as a burglar's tool or any murderous weapon of what kind soever, he shall be sentenced to penitentiary for life, and further that if the accused is proved to have been already incarcerated for an offence of this character, and the second offence being proved against him, he shall be sent to penitentiary for life. I have also introduced the clause by which persons charged with the crime of burglary may be tried summarily before the senior, junior, or deputy judge of the county in which the offence has been committed. I think this measure is in the interests of the public, because the crime is on the increase, and it is necessary for the protection of our property and the lives of our families, that extreme punishment shall be meted out to these offenders. I am not aware of the opinion of the Minister of Justice on this subject, but I think the Bill is one that should commend itself to his consideration and that of the House, and therefore I ask that it should pass its second reading.

Mr. THOMPSON. Although the hon. gentleman has made plain his desire to promote this Bill, through the very laudible motive of suppressing what is undoubtedly a very serious offence, I think it is too stringent in its provisions. The great object of the Bill is to take away the discretion now vested in the judges, in imposing sentences for the offence of burglary. As it is sometime since the hon. gentleman introduced the Bill, the House may permit me to mention what the substance of the different sections is, for the purpose of seeing how radical a change it would make and how far such a change is demanded in the public interests. It is proposed by the first section that a burglar who has, at the time of committing the offence, any burglarious tools or any murderous weapon in his possession, shall be sentenced to imprisonment for life, and that the judge shall have no discretion. At present the punishment for that offence is a life sentence or any less term, in the discretion of the judge. It may be that the possession of a tool of that description at the time of the offence might be accounted for in some way consistent with an intent less criminal than what would be known as a murderous intent; but notwithstanding that, the hon. gentleman proposes to take away all discretion in the matter. Section 2 proposes to take away the judge's discretion, when the accused has been previously convicted of burglary. With regard to section 3, the existing law is this: That every person who is found with dangerous weapons, with intent to break into a dwelling house or other building and to commit any felony therein, or who has in his possession, without ample excuse, the proof of which shall be on him, any pick, lock, key or other burglarious tool, or is found with his face blackened or otherwise disguised, with the intent to commit felony, or is found in any dwelling house or other building, is guilty of burglary and liable to three years' imprisonment. It is proposed by this clause to take away the discretion of the judge and make the punishment a term of seven years. By section 4, it is provided that, after previous conviction of any such offence as that last mentioned, a prisoner shall be sentenced to ten years' imprisonment, without allowing the judge any discretion. I think it is not enough to induce the House to amend the law in so stringent a way, to say that crime of this description is on the increase. I presume there is no class in the community which could more accurately and efficiently judge of the increase of crime and the necessity of vigorous oppression, than the members of the judiciary, and I think I am correct in stating that the powers now given to them are not used to the full extent in any part of the country. If the hon. gentleman were able to show us that these powers had been exercised to their full extent, he would have made out a case, but I think it is unwise, in the absence of any evidence that the crime was so alarmingly on the increase, and that the powers of the judges are insufficient to deal with it, to take provisions which not only will enlarge the punishment, but which will take away the discretion of the judge. Under these circumstances I feel bound, as one, to oppose the second reading of this Bill as being not called for by any state of facts which have been shown to exist in any Province in the Dominion.

Mr. FAIRBANK. I am very sorry, indeed, at the conclusion the Minister of Justice has come to in regard to this matter. It is a notorious fact that this crime is immensely on the increase throughout Canada. It is a notorious fact that burglary has become a profession, and about the most unsafe place that a man can put his valuables in now is a safe. These professionals have become so expert that they defy the sheriff, the safemaker and the locksmith to safely keep valuables. Now, if this crime is largely increasing, is it not fair to presume that it is not being adequately punished, and the Minister of Justice has stated that the judges are not now exercising the law to the extent to which it is capable of being exercised. If that be so, it would be well to affirm the principle of the Bill, without perhaps carrying it out to the extent proposed, and so declare that the crime is not being adequately punished. We know that when crimes have advanced to an unbearable extent, an increased punishment has caused them almost to cease. When garrotting attained such headway in the Old Country, it was decided to punish it by flogging, and that caused it almost entirely to disappear. The crime of burglary is not disappearing, but is largely increasing, and I believe this is largely owing to the inadequacy of the punishment which is inflicted. I am very sorry the Minister of Justice has decided to oppose the principle of the Bill.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hastings). In view of what has been stated by the hon. the Minister of Justice, and the matter having been brought to the attention of the House, I hope that in future, if the Bill is declared lost, the judges will exercise their discretion by extending further punishment to this offence, as I do not think the punishment has been as severe as it should have been. I may probably take occasion to bring up this Bill at a future time if that has not been done.

Motion for second reading negatived.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. McCARTHY moved the second reading of Bill (No. 29) to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1874.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr McCARTHY. I thought my hon. friends would understand the nature of the Bill, which is not very long. The object is to lengthen the hours of polling in cities until 8 o'clock in the afternoon. That is the whole and sole object of the Bill. I think, however, that if the Bill is found acceptable to the House, it would be well to amend it in this respect, to prolong the hours of polling not only in cities, but also in those electoral districts of which cities form a part. Of course, in most places, the city itself is the electoral district, but there are some electoral districts in which the city forms a portion and the rest is a part of the county. As to the necessity for this measure, my own experience has been that the laboring man is under a disadvantage when he has to ask his employer for leave to go and record his vote. I think he ought to be relieved from any such disadvantage. I think he should be perfectly free and should be able to go and record his vote without asking his employer. All of us must have noticed, I think, that in going into a place where a number of men are employed, asking them to vote against the politics of the employer, the men feel under a disadvantage, they feel under a compliment, and sometimes they do not like to put themselves under that compliment, if they are going to vote, as they ought to be entitled to do freely, against their employer.

Mr. MITCHELL. Let them vote at the dinner hour.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is not always convenient. In large cities it cannot be done. In Toronto, for instance, men work at one end of the city and reside at the other, and it is impossible for them to record their votes without great inconvenience. I have communications from men employed by railway companies, and they find it almost impossible to get away during the ordinary hours of polling. This is not new or experimental legislation. Some years ago, a Bill of this kind was passed in England with regard to certain cities, and last year the hours of polling were made all over Great Britain to extend from, I think, eight o'clock in the morning until eight in the afternoon. I do not propose to go as far as that at present, but I do hope the House will accept the principle of this Bill, which has received the endorsation of the Labor Council of the city of Toronto and also, I think, of the city of St. Thomas.

Mr. GAULT. In the city of Montreal, no inconvenience whatever is felt. It all depends on the season of the year at which the elections are held. From nine to five is quite sufficient. I think the time given at present is ample to give the men the opportunity to vote.

Mr. MITCHELL. I object to the lengthening of the time for two reasons. In the first place, I think the reasons given by the mover are not at all applicable to the present condition of things in the labor market. If I know any thing about it, and I employ a good many hands, I find that the masters are under the control of their employees, and the employees are the people who dictate when they will work and when they will leave it alone. My hon. friend evidently does not represent a city. He has evidently never had anything to do with representing a city, or he would find that it is very difficult to keep men from going to vote if they choose to go and vote. They have more liberty than the masters have in that particular. Then look at the effect of this. An election occurs in the fall of the year, any time from October until March, and you get crowds of men collected in the streets and the polls, and perhaps a good deal of drinking going on, although it is prohibited by the Election Act; you get them excited, and you will find all kinds of troubles and disturbances and election riots will occur. I think it would be most impolitic to extend the hours of voting. Look at it from the standpoint of the candidates of their supporters and their friends. Anyone who has had anything to do with elections knows that they think it quite enough to be on the strain from eight o'clock in the morning until five. My hon. friend has been fortunate. He has gone in by acclamation all the time, I expect, and very likely they may let him do it again, if he and the hon. gentleman opposite meet at the same election. But at all events it does seem to me that no practical difficulty has arisen in relation to the present hours of polling, and that surely nine hours are long enough to keep the polls open. My hon. friend says, that men cannot go to their work, or that they are at their work. If he wants to extend the time, let him add another hour in the morning before the men go to their work, or when they are on their way to work. Then the dinner hour enables them to poll, and if they want to poll at any time of the day, they will leave their work and go and do it, whether their masters like it or not—that is my experience. Now he notes the experience in England. Sir, I think we have had experience enough to know better what will suit our condition of affairs in relation to elections than Englishmen. We go to England for too many of our precedents, and I, for one, am disposed to base our election legislation on our own experience in this Canada of ours, where we know just as much about it, I guess, as they do in England or any other country. I feel it my duty to oppose the Bill.

Mr. DESJARDINS. Besides that, only 200 electors are admitted to vote at the same poll; and I think nine hours are quite sufficient to allow them to register their names.

House divided on motion of Mr. McCarthy.

SUBSTITUTES FOR BUTTER.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Taylor for Committee of the Whole to consider a resolution declaring it expedient to bring in a Bill to regulate the sale of oleomargarine, butterine, and other substitutes for butter.

Mr. TAYLOR. When this matter was up before, the Minister of Inland Revenue stated that he would bring in a Bill dealing with the manufacture of this article. The House was then discussing the propriety of placing an import duty of 10 cents per pound, and an Excise duty of 8 cents per pound, on this article. Since then the Government have dealt with the import duty in such a way as to prohibit the importation altogether. In conversation with the Minister of Inland Revenue a few days ago he told me that after the action the House had taken to prohibit the importation, he thought it would be better to allow the Minister of Customs to deal in the same way with the manufacture. I have not understood from the Minister of Customs that it was his intention to do so, it is my intention to bring in a Bill, which I have prepared, to prohibit the manufacture and sale of the article in the country altogether. Since the last discussion I have received a large number of letters from different parties in the Dominion as well as in the United States, which I intend to read to the House, although I believe the opinion of the House will support the Bill which I propose to bring in to prohibit the manufacture altogether. The first article I will read is from the Journal of Commerce, an authority as good as any that can be found in Canada. In its issue of the 23rd April that paper says:

"BOGUS BUTTER

"The action of the Canadian Government in prohibiting the importation of oleomargarine, butterine and like substitutes for butter, is an important step, being calculated to materially benefit and protect the farming interest and to secure to consumers a healthful article of food. The amended tariff imposing a duty of 10 cents per pound on all imitations of the genuine article, was in itself practically prohibitory, and, under a rigid system of inspection, would doubtless have proved effective, but the feeling of the House was in favor of even more decisive measures, and we fancy there will be little opposition to the final decision of the Government, which prohibits importations under a penalty of $200 for each offence.

"Two good and sufficient reasons have all along been advanced against the sale of artificial butter—firstly, that it is impure in most instances and deleterious to the public health, and, secondly, that it is fraudulently sold as an honest article, and therefore enters into unfair competition with farmers in the production of butter. Both these contentions have been combatted in the United States by the wealthy manufacturers of bogus butter, who have fought the representatives of the legitimate dairy interests even at their National Conventions, on the floor of Congress and in the columns of commercial journals, which claim to take the highest rank. To such an extent is the influence of these men felt, that few publications are found willing to expose them. The N.Y. Commercial Bulletin, replying to the charge of a correspondent, that instead of being a staunch friend of the dairy interest, it had, in a quiet way, supported the artificial butter makers, thus describes its dilemma:—'Between the two sides to the hotly contested competition betwixt butter and oleomargarine, this paper finds itself in a singularly unfortunate position. Both parties appear to think they are entitled to our warm espousal of their cause; and because neither get such support, both suspect us of sympathy with their enemy. Because we claim that oleomargarine should be sold on its merits, and simply for what it is and no more, the dairymen charge us with befriending the makers of that product. Because we protest against the oleomargarine makers mixing their article with butter and selling a spurious butter as genuine, the oleomargarine men charge us with being in league with the butter men. Will both sides please understand that the real purpose of this paper is not to please either one, but to get fair commercial justice for both; to protect the dairymen and public from spurious butter being sold as genuine, and to secure to manufacturers of oleomargarine their unquestionable right to make that product and to sell it for what it is.' This statement reads fair enough, but in view of the injurious substances generally used in manufacture and the frauds undoubtedly practised in selling the product as butter, at a price double its real value, would it not be more in the public interest to condemn its manufacture and sale outright?

"There is now a Bill in the hands of the House Committee on Agriculture at Washington which proposes to tax imitations of butter and cheese and give them a distinctive mark, and from the evidence of Dr. Taylor, the microscopist of the Smithsonian Institute, before this committee, and from the registered claims of various patentees, the constituents of oleomargarine, &c., are sugar of lead, bisulphate of lime, borax and boracic acid, salicylic, benzoic, sulphuric, nitric and other acids, cotton seed, almond, peanut, sunflower and mustard seed oils, flour, caustic potash, slippery elm bark and corn starch, stomach of pigs, calves and sheep, and the udder of cows, dry blood albumen and gastric juice, besides sundry others of allied nature, added to and compounded with the fat of various animals, with which is mixed a small quantity of genuine butter, and enough coloring matter to give the whole the necessary rich appearance. This mass is manufactured at a cost varying from eight to twelve cents a pound, and probably sold at twenty-five cents or even higher. In view of these facts, it must be admitted that the various agricultural and dairy associations throughout the United States, which are seeking to secure the taxing and branding of spurious butter and cheese, are, while working in their own behalf acting in the best interests of the public.

"The fraudulent disposal of the stuff is attested to by the evidence before the aforesaid congressional committee of Mr. Joseph H Reall, President of the American Agricultural and Dairy Association. He stated that all imitation butter, amounting now to 200,000,000 lbs. annually, was sold fraudulently, and that in three years, unless the sale of the bogus article was regulated, the production of genuine butter would be stopped. The question, he said, affected all the Northern and Western States, where dairying was a leading interest, while consumers everywhere were being humbugged and swindled. In conclusion he remarked: 'We want imitation butter under national law, because every rogue has a wholesome fear of the police power of the National Government. We want a tax of ten cents per pound put on imitation butter, because it costs twenty cents per pound to make good butter, while they can make butterine for ten cents, the price of lard and little butter added. State legislation has proved ineffective. Twenty States have laws against its manufacture and sale, but they are grossly defied. Fines of $100 are imposed, but dealers say they can pay this sum every month and go ahead with good profit, and many do it.'

"When such is the state of affairs in the United States, the Canadian farmers and dairymen, and consumers likewise, will appreciate the forethought of the Government in discouraging the importation and manufacture of bogus butter in Canada."

I may draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that at a meeting of the dairymen in your own county very strong resolutions were passed, and I presume they were sent to you to hand to the Government as expressing the opinion of the dairymen of the important county of Frontenac. I will read what was said on the subject:

"At a meeting of the Frontenac Dairymen's Board of Trade held on Saturday afternoon, the president in the chair, the question of the importation and manufacture of oleomargarine was discussed. Mr. Henry Bawden introduced the subject of the importation and manufacture of oleomargarine as one of the utmost importance to farmers. He referred to its having been placed upon the list of prohibited articles for importation to this country and stated that this was a step in the right direction and should be endorsed by the farmers. They should go further and demand that its manufacture in the Dominion should be prohibited. He alluded to a recent report to the English dairymen's association made by Mr. Barnum, a scientist, who had made a study of the subject, by which it was seen that in 1885 one-half of what went into England as butter was this spurious stuff and that the amount of oleomargarine that went into England and Scotland was equal to the produce in butter of 180,000 cows. It has also been reported that the manufacture of oleomargarine in the United States had driven out a number of butter makers, and that whereas there were 25,000,000 cows in the United States before the introduction of this substance there were now only 15,000,000. He advocated a motion, to be forwarded to the House of Commons, approving of the course they had already taken, and asking that the manufacture of oleomargarine be prohibited. Mr. Burrows claimed that the stuff was bad, not only for the farmers, but it was detrimental to health. He agreed with Mr. Bawden that the Legislature should prohibit the importation and manufacture of the stuff."

Resolutions were then passed by the meeting. An hon. member speaks of "beer and wine." Never mind beer and wine. It is as important to the farmers, the laboring classes, the mechanics and merchants, and the people generally that they should have good butter to eat as bad beer to drink. It is all the same whether they die from eating bad butter or drinking bad beer or whiskey. When we get through this Bill we will deal with the whiskey Bill. I will thank the hon. member for East Toronto to allow me to proceed. On Saturday evening I received a communication from a gentleman who now resides in Chicago, and was formerly book-keeper in our establishment. He writes me as follows:

"4057 SOUTH HALSTED STREET,
"CHICAGO, 3rd May, 1886.

"GEO. TAYLOR, Esq., M.P., Gananoque.

"DEAR SIR,—Having seen in papers just received from home that you are having quite a struggle in the House on the matter of butterine and oleomargarine, I could not resist the temptation to write you on the matter. I have been employed here in a business that enabled me to see more, perhaps, of the manufacture of the stuff, than probably any of your constituents, all of whom I am quite certain were they in my place would not only thank you for the stand you have taken, but pray to Heaven that they might never be compelled to eat it. I have for some three months been almost every day through Armour & Co., and Fairbanks' packing houses, and also at different times through Swift & Sons, they three being the principal manufacturers of oleomargarine and butterine here. I have also been more or less through the following packing houses here, viz., The International Packing Co., W. H. Silberhorus, Jones & Styles, Hat-ly & Co., Morrell & Co., Botsford & Co., Fowler Bros., S. H. Oppenheimer, Johnston Packing Co, and nearly all the other smaller ones in and about the Union stock yards of Chicago, and I may say the modus operandi in all is very much the same, but carried out probably in a more systematic and extensive scale by Armour & Co. than any of the others. Butterine and oleomargarine is manufactured by them in three different grades called oleo., dairy and creamery, and retailed here at prices from 14 to 22 cents per pound, depending very much in price as to what part of the city it is sold in. I have seen it in the first three named places in almost every stage of its manufacture, and when I tell you I do not nor have not eat any butter on my bread for months, you may know what my opinion of it as a table luxury is, as here you cannot tell if it is butter or dead hogs' grease of the dirtiest and filthiest kind that you are eating. It is composed of all the worst kinds of dirty grease from the cutting floors and other parts of the packing house, melted down in large iron tanks.

"I have seen a small sized hog that died either in the pen or was suffocated or frozen to death, just ripped open and thrown into the tank, without even the hair being taken off or the inside removed, and boiled down with the rest. It is then run out into other tanks and there put through a course of purifying, but when it comes to the churning process, before being classified, it looks more like a huge kettle of rather light colored soft soap, and almost of that consistency. When it comes from the tanks purified it resembles a light colored oil, something like salad oil, but rather thicker; it is then ready for mixing, I believe, with genuine butter, a portion of which is used to give it a taste. It is also colored with carrots and other coloring matter. It is then run into the cooling room, which is a huge refrigerator, and kept over night to cool; the next morning it is taken out and packed in all shapes and sizes of packages. But I assure you if any farmer had seen it made once and thought that was the kind of butter his good wife was making for him to eat, he would take the first through fast train for Chicago and apply for immediate divorce on the ground that his life was in danger and you bet he would get it quick if his case could come before a jury in the same position as himself.

"I could go on and write you a thousand and one other things about what we eat from these packing houses, but think I have said enough on the subject to convince the most skeptical that total prohibition for oleomargarine and butterine, also whiskey, is the best thing that could possibly happen to the Dominion of Canada. I trust I have not tired you with this lengthy epistle, and that you will excuse the writing."

That is all he says with reference to this question, but I may say that he occupied the position of book-keeper for us and I can rely on all his statements. I may just read another letter which I received from a gentleman with whom I am not acquainted, but I presume there are hon. members in this House who know him, and know that he is a gentleman of standing and knows whereof he speaks.

"COUNTY MONTMAGNY,
"CAP ST. IGNACE, 3rd May, 1886.

"—— TAYLOR, M.P.,
"Ottawa.

"I have just read with great pleasure your speech in the House, in relation to the butter and cheese industry. I beg to offer you my most sincere thanks and those of my fellow-farmers.

"I trust your most accurate and practical views on this most important question may receive the support of all the friends of the farmer in Parliament.

"According to my idea such high duties should be imposed as would render it almost impossible to manufacture or import artificial butter or cheese. Let each butter or cheese factory be compelled to have a trade mark showing the quality and place of manufacture, so that when any article is exported to a foreign country the purchaser may be certain as to what he is buying. Inspectors should be appointed.

"Is it not deplorable to see Montreal exporters of butter and cheese, calling themselves Canadians, purchasing butter and cheese from the State of Illinois, and other places in the United States, which are quoted 20 to 30 per cent. lower in the English market, and shipping the same to England as Canadian product. It is highly important that the Government should at once take steps to put a stop to this abuse, if we do not want to lose the reputation of our cheese in the English market.

"As to the letter you quoted, from a farmer, I think he should have signed himself a speculator; for no farmer would entertain such views on the subject.

"I hope, Sir, that your efforts may be crowned with success, and that all true friends of the farmer will assist you to make a good law to protect us. You will thus be entitled to the gratitude, not only of the farmers, but of all the inhabitants of the Dominion.

"With cordial respect and gratitude of a devoted farmer.

"I am, &c.,
"C. SOLYME GAMACHE."

My hon. friend who represents that county says that this gentleman deals in butter as a business and knows whereof he speaks. I can only say that after having had this correspondence and after having read a great deal on the subject since the discussion came up, I am more convinced that ever that the question should be dealt with, and dealt with so that these articles should not be manufactured or sold, and as the importation is already provided for, I trust that when this discussion is over the committee will pass the Bill unanimously.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). If I understood the hon. gentleman aright he said he proposed to bring in a Bill, founded on the resolution which he has been speaking to, to prohibit the manufacture of these substitutes for butter. It seems to me rather inconsistent that the hon. gentleman should have submitted to the House a resolution declaring that it is expedient to regulate the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine, butterine and other substitutes for butter, and then coolly to tell us that the Bill he proposes to introduce is to prohibit it altogether, and to claim that that was his intention at the first. The hon. gentleman, in reply to the hon. member for East Toronto, who interrupted him by a remark with reference to a resolution pertaining to the liquor traffic, said it was time enough to deal with that by-and-bye. I would ask the hon. gentleman what he would think of an hon. member of this House, a prohibitionist, introducing a Bill to regulate the manufacture and sale of liquor. I think he would be considered rather a strange prohibitionist, but still that is the position in which he finds himself with reference to the article now under discussion. The fact of the matter is that the proposition of the Government, and the hon. gentleman expressed himself as being in the same line with them in reference to this matter, was to encourage the manufacture of this article in the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Yes. There was 10 cents import duty on it, and 8 cents Excise, and therefore there was 2 cents protection to the article to be made in this country, sufficient to induce the manufacture of it and to a very great extent. We know also that when the subject was under discussion on my amendment to prohibit its importation, the Minister rose and said that whilst they were prepared to consent to that, and to yield to the motion I offered on that occasion, they did not say that it necessarily followed that they would prohibit its manufacture. In fact the Minister of Customs, who was prominent in the debate, said he had no desire to prevent its manufacture in this country, provided it was exported out of the country. He did not think we would be justified in preventing its manufacture for exportation. The hon. Minister of Inland Revenue expressed himself in the same direction, and the resolution of the hon. gentleman which we are now discussing would also lead in the same direction. True, he says, that he intended introducing a Bill to prohibit it altogether, but that is entirely different from his resolution. I am entirely in accord with the proposition to prohibit its manufacture. But the hon. gentleman is taking a serious responsibility, because he is bringing in a Bill which, of course, the Ministers will not support, and I notice that not many motions in this House are carried without their support. He brings it in in direct contradiction to the Bill now before the House for several weeks, introduced by the Minister of Inland Revenue, in which provision is made for granting licenses and giving permission to manufacture these articles and to deal in them—permission even to deal in them without manufacturing them here for export alone. Therefore the hon. gentleman may find that he may not be able to carry his Bill, inasmuch as the Ministry will, in order to be consistent with their own Bill in the House, have to vote against it. But he may rely upon it that he will receive the support almost unanimously, and I believe unanimously, of hon. gentlemen on this side for the Bill which he now intends to introduce, though differing from the one of which he gave notice.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) should be the last one to complain because the hon. member for Leeds goes a little further in the right direction.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I am not complaining.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood him so, and he should not complain, because he himself introduced an amendment even going further, and prohibiting the sale of these articles altogether. Since this question was before the House before, I have had occasion to visit my constituents and to consult with some——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is not in order; he has spoken already on this question.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the hon. member for Brant also spoke twice.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). No.

Mr. HESSON. I think the hon. member for Grey did not speak after the hon. member for Brant made the motion.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That has nothing to do with this.

Mr. HESSON. He spoke upon the introduction of the resolution, not after the amendment was proposed.

Mr. SPROULE. I can only say that if I am violating a rule of this House, I am doing what a number of others have done before. I think the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) spoke twice.

Mr. BLAKE. The question is whether the hon. member spoke on the motion of the hon. member for Leeds.

Mr. McCARTHY. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. SPROULE. I was going to say, when you ruled me out of order, that since this measure was introduced into the House, I have visited my constituency and consulted some of the leading agriculturists in that part of the country with reference to it; and the consensus of opinion was that this is one of the most important measures that has engaged, or can engage, our attention during the present Session, and that the Government should not simply regulate the manufacture of this article, but entirely prohibit it. There are two phases of this question that ought to engage our attention. First, there is the interest at stake—the existence of this article detracts from the profits of the agriculturists of this country, who represent a very large number of the people. The products of the agriculturists of the Dominion last year represented some $35,000,000, which is an indication of how important is any question that affects their interest. We know that for some years past the dairy products of the country have been going down rapidly in price, and it is curious to notice that the reduction in price just about corresponds with the amount of oleomargarine or butterine sold in this or the Old Country. It is becoming a very extensive industry on the other side of the line, and it operates against the interest of agriculturists in both countries. Twenty-one States have already legislated on this question, and have attempted in various ways to regulate it; but finding that useless they have gone further, and have endeavored to stop its manufacture entirely, though in that they have not quite succeeded. England, also, is to-day dealing with this question. Not long ago a Bill of similar character to this was introduced into the House of Commons. I think, therefore, it is not to be wondered at that we should attempt either to regulate or prohibit the manufacture of it in Canada. Then, another phase of the question, which I apprehend is equally, if not more important, relates to the health of the people. It is a fact known to medical men that one common source of disease is the kind of food taken into the human economy. Without wholesome food, it is impossible for people to be healthy, and I think if we medical men paid more attention to the analysis of food, we would find that a much larger percentage of the diseases of the country than we know of to-day are attributable to the kind of food that people eat. Why are analysts appointed to-day to examine the food we eat? We have them all over the country in order to prevent the adulteration of food. It is not because the adulteration is spurious, or because the adulterated article is cheaper than the pure article, but because the mixture is usually found to be injurious to health. It is generally known that if there is any line of food directly injurious to health it is that which contains some taint of putrefaction. It is utterly impossible, in the process that oleomargarine goes through, to eradicate from it those organisms that develop disease in the human economy; and when this is the case, how important is it that we should step in and prevent the production of that which must lead to the deterioration of the public health. Statistics show that a large number of diseases, not only zymotic but other classes, are attributable to these animal organisms, and analysis proves that they largely abide in these articles of food. I saw an analysis of butterine some time ago, which showed that there was not only in it the peculiar animal organism of one class, but many kinds which develop diseases to which the human family are subject; and the chemical ingredients usually employed to destroy disease-producing animalculæ, had no effect on those. Although immersed in them for twenty-four hours, they were moving around with all the evidence of life they had before. This being the case, how important is it that we should consider well before we allow the manufacture or the introduction into this country of an article of food so destructive to the human system. There is another reason why we should deal with this question at the present time, that is, because, so far as known, it is not now manufactured in the country; and there is no time that you can deal so well with such a matter as before vested interests are established. If we allowed manufactures of it to be built up, we would find parties coming here after a while and claiming that they had established vested rights, which we could not take away. Therefore, how important it is that we should deal with the matter now. I am glad to find that the hon. member for Leeds, who has introduced this resolution, has decided to move, not simply to regulate the manufacture of oleomargarine, but to entirely abolish it in the country if it is being manufactured to-day, and to prevent its manufacture if it is contemplated. I have received letters from merchants and farmers in Manitoba, and in various parts of Ontario, and I think the consensus of opinion is that the Government should introduce a law to entirely prohibit the manufacture and importation of this article.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I have just a word or two to say on this subject. I know that there is a feeling on the part of some hon. members that gentlemen belonging to my profession ought not to say very much on subjects pertaining to the agricultural interests, on the ground that we are not supposed to know very much about them. But as I represent a constituency in part agricultural, I feel it my duty to add my testimony to the volume of evidence which has been given here against the manufacture of what is known as butterine or oleomargarine. I am bound to say, from the statements of my constituents and others with whom I have conversed on this subject, that the concensus of opinion, the weight of authority, favors the prohibition of this article in the country; and I do think, if it is found impossible to frame a Bill upon the resolution the hon. member for Leeds has now upon the motion paper, that it is the duty of this House to allow him to introduce his Bill, because that is the only way of surrounding the manufacture of the article with such restrictions as will practically prohibit it. Although the hon. member for Brant may be, strictly speaking, right in the objection he has taken to the resolution, that the hon. member for Leeds could not introduce a Bill to prohibit upon it, because it simply speaks of regulation, yet it is quite possible for such a Bill to be introduced and to receive the sanction of this House, as will, while regulatory in its nature, amount practically to be prohibitory. Now, I believe in the principle of prohibition in this case. If an excise duty of 10 cents is put upon the oleomargarine manufactured, it does not follow that the stuff will not be introduced, because it must be borne in mind that oleomargarine comes into competition with the higher grades of butter. It does not come into competition with the poorer grades of butter, and we all know that we have not yet established in Europe a market for our butter such as we would like. We have established a market in the Old Country, especially England, for our cheese, owing mainly to the fact that we have a uniform way of making cheese, but we have not a uniform system of making butter; and I must bear testimony, so far as my knowledge goes, to the good that the creameries are likely to do in this province. I have no hesitation in saying that the Government who originated that idea in Ontario deserve great credit. If once we can establish a uniform system of making butter, we can then hope to establish a good market for our Canadian butter in England. If you go into a store where butter is sold, and ask the grocer the price, he will not be able to answer you, without at the same time stating that there are different prices, and the price depends wholly on the quality of the butter. This is owing to the fact that few farmers make the same quality. A good article always brings a good price, 20 cents or more. If it is true, as alleged, that oleomargarine can be manufactured for 6 cents, I can see no reason for preventing the oleomargarine manufactured in the United states paying a duty of 10 cents import, and going into competition with the better grades of Canadian butter. If it is a fact, as alleged, and the evidence in every case is uncontradicted by anything we have heard, that oleomargarine is a dangerous article of food, it becomes our duty, not alone to regulate, but to prohibit its importation. I do not speak from any knowledge of my own as to the truth of the statements made here concerning the deleterious nature of the compound, but I have the right to pay a great deal of attention to the remarks of hon. gentlemen in the medical profession, such as the hon. member for Grey, the hon. member for Cornwall, and other gentlemen in this House, who, from their scientific knowledge, may be supposed to give a correct opinion on this important matter. I have also the right to attach great importance to the evidence given by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) who deserves the thanks of the farmers for his efforts in their behalf. Taking all this into consideration, I see no reason why this Parliament should not deem it its duty to prohibit the manufacture of the stuff here. If it be manufactured for 5 cents, an Excise duty of 8 cents can enable the manufacturer to manufacture it in this country. The objection of the hon. member for Brant is this: That, if we do not go on with the Bill my hon. friend proposes to introduce, founded on a resolution now before the House, it is too late this Session to introduce a resolution of a prohibitory character; and if this Bill is allowed to be introduced, we can hedge its provisions as to the manufacture of the article itself around with such restrictions as will prevent its being manufactured in the country. Having regard to the great importance of the subject, and to the fact that the interests of agriculturists outweigh by all odds the interests of all other classes combined, I believe it to be the duty of this Parliament not to hesitate, but to proceed with the Bill which my hon. friend proposes to introduce.

Mr. TAYLOR. There is a notice now before the House that the debate be adjourned. I would prefer that we carried that motion, and wait to see what action, next week, the Government will take in the tariff resolutions.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). Before the debate is closed, I would like to say a word or two in addition to what has been already stated. As far as I am personally concerned, I have no apprehension of the unwholesomeness of the food, as I never eat butter and consequently am not likely to be taken in by oleomargarine. To my mind, the most objectionable feature in permitting this article to be manufactured in this country at all, is simply this: Even if we hedge its manufacture with provisions, as was suggested by the Minister of Customs, and permitted the article to be exported, if you look at the export tables and see the quantity of butter we export and the grading which Canadian butter has acquired in the Liverpool market, you will find that only from 16 to 18 per cent. is graded No. 1. That is a sad commentary on the state of butter manufacturing in an agricultural country like Canada; and to allow any article to be substituted for or introduced with our butter, as a companion to it, would have the effect of still lowering its character. This should be regarded with grave apprehension. As to the nature of the stuff and its manufacture I can vouch, not from personal knowledge, but from the reliable testimony of butter dealers in this country, who have special knowledge of those manufactories in the neighborhood of Chicago and Boston. In the former debate I passed round a sample of oleomargarine, manufactured in and brought by a friend from Boston, of which he was offered any possible quantity, delivered at the line, at 7 cents a pound, and I may say, notwithstanding the precautions taken by our hotel caterers, that quantities of that article were sold in this city during this Session. I have that on the testimony of a butter dealer. To permit an article that can be so readily substituted for butter to be manufactured and put on the market is a dangerous policy. I go for complete exclusion and complete prevention; first, the exclusion, in order to protect our people from the deleterious effects upon their health, and then the prevention of the manufacture in order to prevent the deterioration of the character of our export butter. One reason why they are able to introduce butterine and to substitute it for genuine butter is that, when it is in this semi-fluid state which the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) has referred to, a portion of genuine butter is introduced before the oil congeals in order to give it the butteric acid odor, which is a principle that cannot be produced artificially; so, to further deceive the public and the consumer, a small portion of genuine butter is introduced to give that flavor which could not be given in any other manner. So they resort to all manner of schemes to cheat the public and the consumer. I claim that, if you allow it to be manufactured in the country at all, you can devise no system of branding to surround its manufacture for exportation which will prevent its being introduced into the consuming market of this country, and that is another reason why we should totally prohibit its manufacture. As to the reference which has been made to the diseased germs contained in this material, I believe that a large proportion of these minute, microscopic, germinating elements of disease from hogs and diseased cattle is carried through all the processes of its manufacture, and that they continue to germinate and increase in the oleomargarine. It is notorious that a large proportion of the Illinois and Chicago hogs die from hog cholera, and they are picked up along the way stations at from 1 cent to 1½ cents a pound, and dumped into the vats, and made into oleomargarine for the American market, for the Canadian public if we permit it, and for the British market as well; and I have no doubt that the diseased germs are carried through all the processes of manufacture. I think that in the interests of the community this article should be excluded; and that we should permit an article to be manufactured which would spread disease among our friends on the other side of the Atlantic, in whom we take so much interest just now, is neither humane nor patriotic.

Mr. BLAKE. I was rather surprised to hear the last proposal of the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor). He began by proposing that we should pass a law to regulate the sale and manufacture of oleomargarine, then he proposed to prohibit it altogether, and at a later stage he proposes that we shall take the third course, do nothing at all, because, if the proposition that the debate shall be adjourned, which was simply made in order that the member for Grey might have an opportunity of speaking twice on the subject, should be adopted, it is quite clear that he will be able to get no further.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I believe it would be well if we could establish the system in force in the Old Country, and, as Ireland is so prominently before this country just now, I may say that it makes the best butter in the world. The reason is that, when a man brings his butter into market, the gentleman who is appointed by the Government to test it goes around and marks it No. 1, No. 2, No. 3, or No. 4, which is according to the kind of butter, so that there is this protection, that they can get No. 1 quality at No. 1 price. But who is to go to the different markets in the different sections of the country to tell if we are to have this kind of butter or not? Who is to keep it out? Who is to watch it? Who is to test it? Who is to mark it? It is a matter the Government should take into their serious consideration. It is not a matter for a private member to deal with, but for the Government. The hon. member says that he is willing that the motion to postpone the Bill should be carried in order to see what the Government are going to do. It is a serious matter. If everything which has been said by different medical gentlemen is true, it is a matter that every member is interested in, irrespective of party or locality, and I think the Government should announce at once what they are going to do and how they are going to do it. It is not for members to do this as long as the Government is responsible for prohibiting it from being manufactured or from being brought into the country. I think the hon. gentleman is right to allow his Bill to lie over for the present to see what the Government is going to do; and members on both sides of the House and from each locality should impress upon the Government the necessity of dealing with it. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) who uses more butter perhaps than any other gentleman in the House——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Yes, I am correct. He uses more butter, I believe, than any other member in the manufacture of the goods he sells throughout the country, and he sells a great deal in Hastings. In speaking of that matter, the hon. member does not think I am saying anything unfair or unjust to him; but he made a motion. What did we find? It was that the Reform party were to take the wind out of the sails of the Conservative party, as if this matter was to be made a party question. I contend it should not be made a party question or a locality question, but the Government should take note of it in that way and in that manner and in that shape which will protect the agriculturists of the country and protect the people against using what is so injurious to health, according to what the doctors on both sides have said.

Mr. GUILLET. I sympathise with the remarks of the member for East Hastings (Mr. White), but I feel assured that the hon. member who has introduced this resolution has great confidence in the Government, otherwise I do not think he would have consented to the adjournment of the debate. This is a very important subject. We have a country which has unlimited resources for the production of butter and cheese, and the production of these articles is yet in its infancy, and we should be very careful in allowing the importation or the manufacture of such an article as we have had described on both sides of the House. It is well known that it is impossible to place around the manufacture of oleomargarine such restrictions as will protect the consumer from imposition. It has been suggested that in the neighboring States where the matter has been discussed in the Legislatures, in the Legislature of New York, it was proposed that butterine should be of a color different from the natural color of butter, that it should be colored pink or blue, or some color which is not the natural color. That would be a good precaution, but it would not be sufficient, because it is easy for the dealer to work the oleomargarine over and color it afresh after it comes into his store, and then the article would be sold as genuine. Even if you put it in peculiarly shaped packages, it could be removed from those packages, and in no way that I can see can you guard the consumer by any precautions which will prevent his being imposed upon. It is well known that our cattle trade has obtained its enormous dimensions from the fact that none of these new diseases among cattle have been discovered in this country. Now that has been a very important circumstance for Canada, and has been the means of largely developing our cattle trade. The Government have taken precautions to prevent the introduction of disease, and if we take similar precautions to prevent the manufacture and importation of such an article as oleomargarine it will tend to improve the character of Canadian butter abroad. No doubt it will improve, it is improving now, and by the operation of these creameries in the west, and by the operation of the agricultural establishments that are now being promoted by the Dominion Government, I have no doubt that one result will be the improvement of the quality of our Canadian butter. But, if in the meantime, we allow its character to be compromised by the manufacture of such stuff as oleomargarine, to be sold abroad as Canadian butter, the effect will be to make our butter itself suspected in the minds of people who may buy it, and it is already being compromised by the manufacture and importation of this substitute. We know that disease does exist, to a large extent, among American hogs, that the disease of trichinosis as well as hog cholera, prevail extensively in the west, so much so that the German Government has prohibited the importation of American pork, and that fact has compromised their trade very considerably in Europe. Now if it becomes known that such an article as artificial butter is being manufactured in this country, which may contain the germs of disease, as it is liable to be manufactured from diseased animals, then, of course, our butter trade abroad must be very seriously injured. I feel that I should be wanting in my duty to my constituents did I not raise my voice on the floor of this House and point out the danger to which our butter trade is exposed from this article. I do not think that I am more fastidious than other people, but since I have become acquainted with the character of oleomargarine, I have felt an irresistible suspicion, when butter was placed before me, that perhaps it was not after all the genuine article. It will really be a very serious annoyance when the people feel that they are liable to have such an article imposed upon them, and it will become a serious question indeed to our Canadian farmers, and will, I fear, prove very injurious to the public health, if such an article is made or imported into this country. I have much pleasure in supporting the proposition of my hon. friend, and I hope that if the Bill itself is not brought forward, some other proposition will be made by the Government which will exclude this article altogether from our commerce.

Mr. ORTON. I desire to endorse the action of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) to a large extent. I am prepared to state as a medical man that the process by which oleomargarine is made, does not prevent the possibility of germs existing after the manufacture of that article, but I think that upon the broad principle that the public health requires the protection of the purity of an article like butter, we are justified in excluding oleomargarine from the country. I think that the Government ought, simply as a matter of protection to our agricultural interests, to take action in this matter. I am rather astonished after the discussion that has taken place, that the Government have not expressed their views, or indicated the action they are going to take upon this question, and I hope before the discussion ends they will give us an expression of their views. For the protection of our agricultural industries we ought to prohibit both the manufacture and the importation of this article. I also desire to endorse the sentiments of the hon. gentleman for East Hastings (Mr. White) with reference to the importance of the inspection of butter. I think it is highly important to agricultural interests as well as to the comfort and health of the public, that there should be at all the great market centres an inspector of butter appointed by the Government, with certain reasonable fees, so that people may be sure of purchasing good butter. I think by that means a great deal could be done to improve the manufacture of butter in this country, and it is important that the character of Canadian butter should be maintained at the highest possible point.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). I am glad to see that the world moves in the direction it is doing now. I listened attentively to the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor), when he introduced this measure, when he, for the first time, brought the matter to our notice. If I recollect rightly, he congratulated the Government that they had taken steps to impose an import duty of 10 cents and an Excise duty of 8 cents per lb. upon this article, and I think he also told us that evening that he had previously waited upon the Government on behalf of some of the dairy associations, and proposed that they should put a uniform rate of 10 cents per lb., Customs and Excise, upon the article. I congratulate the hon. gentleman to-night that he has asked the Government to prohibit altogether the manufacture of this article. Whether that is in his original notice of motion or not, I think he is taking a wise step, and I think, after the graceful manner in which the Government conceded the entire prohibition of the importation of the article, it would only be a fair compliment to that action, for the Minister of Inland Revenue to put a prohibitory clause in his Bill, instead of the regulating clause they now propose.

Sir, we have heard a great deal to-night on this question from the farmers' standpoint. Well, that is an important side of the question, but if the statements of the medical men made here to-night receive the weight and influence to which they are entitled, I think it is plain that the health of the general public requires a little attention as well. There is no doubt that the manufacture of this article under hydraulic pressure, and at a low temperature, out of the—I shall not say polluted materials that have been referred to—but even the ordinary inferior materials that can be utilised in that way, I say that utilising that class of material at that low temperature, must give a product that will be a very unsatisfactory article of general consumption. One result will be, that oleomargarine made out of a really good article of fat would by no means be an unhealthy article of diet, but we all know by observation that it can be produced out of an inferior article so as to escape detection on the market, and you may be certain that the honesty and the prudence of some manufacturers in the country will be lost sight of in their anxiety to make money. We remember the efforts that are being made just now on the American side. It is not more than a fortnight ago that I saw in the Montreal Gazette an item setting forth that the Committee of Congress at Washington had reported another Bill imposing a license of $500 upon the manufacture of oleomargarine, and a license of $480 upon those who sell the article, with an addition of 10 cents per pound of Excise duty on every pound sent out of the factory; and that the importer should have to pay, in addition to the ordinary import duties on those classes of goods, internal revenue duty of 15 cents per pound. When we look at these restrictions imposed on the American side, I think it is wise for us to take a step in advance, and to prevent the article being manufactured in our midst. And there is this fact at the present moment that it seems to me makes it extremely desirable that the Government should take action in a prohibitory direction: The State of New York has been for the last 18 months making vigorous attempts to root out the manufacture altogether of this class of goods, and some of our dairymen have already received circulars from manufacturers over there offering to furnish them with the modus operandi by which they can conduct the manufacture of this spurious butter in their own domestic dairies and be able to turn it out as the finished article of good butter. In addition to that, those gentlemen whose factories have been stopped by the action of the State Legislature will naturally look round for a new field in which to embark their capital and continue their manufacture, and Canada will afford the readiest field for the development of their enterprise. For these reasons I think it would be wise for the Government on this occasion to accede to what is evidently the united voice of the House all round, without regard to political parties, and step out and entirely prohibit the manufacture of the article in our midst. It should be prohibited for the sake of the health of the citizens generally, as well as in the interests of the agriculturists; and not only should it be prevented from domestic consumption but also for export. It is unfair as a business principle that an article which we consider unhealthy for home consumption, should be encouraged to be manufactured here and placed on a foreign market. We talk about our relations to the British Empire, and on looking into this question only a few weeks ago I found that the British representative at Washington, in his correspondence with the Imperial authorities, stated that a large proportion of the 30,000,000 pounds of oleomargarine exported from the port of New York finds its way either directly to Great Britain to be manufactured into imitation butter, or to Holland, where it is made into butter and shipped to England. When we consider these facts it is not just to the people of the Mother Country, without speaking of the interest of the Canadian farmer, that we should allow the manufacture of a deleterious article of this kind for purposes of exportation, and it would be wisdom on the part of the Government now to yield to what appears to be the united opinion of the House, and make provision for the entire prohibition of the manufacture of the article in our midst. It will be found by experience, even when the article is prohibited, that the Customs Department will have considerable difficulty to prevent the introduction of the article in various forms into the country; and unless care is taken to exclude the finished oil as well as the mixed product, I fear there are still some men in our midst who will attempt to manufacture the article for the sake of the profits it will give them.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) may congratulate himself on having brought this subject before Parliament, and he may congratulate himself more particularly on the fact that his proposals have met with universal approval. Not only has the House approved of his proposition, but the opinion has been expressed in favor of total prohibition. If the hon. gentleman proposed, in the first place, to regulate its manufacture in this country, and to ask the imposition of a duty that would be tantamount to prohibition, and afterwards found that the feeling of the House had gone beyond that, he was not at all, to my mind, inconsistent in acceding to the general expression which has been given in the House and going one step further and asking for total prohibition. I am very glad the hon. gentleman has consented to the adjournment of the debate. Had not that been done I intended to move a motion myself and ask the hon. gentleman to wait and see the proposition which the Government intended to make in regard to this very question when they consider the balance of the tariff resolutions which are now before Parliament. And if the proposition of the Government does not then meet his approval and the approval of the House, then he will be in a position to take further action. But I can assure the House the Government have not forgotten the expression of opinion which has been given by nearly every hon. member who has spoken on this question, and when the Government made the proposition to impose a duty of 10 cents per pound and 8 cents per pound Excise duty, they were under the impression, and believed from the information they had before them, that, in view of the cost of the manufacture, it would be virtually a prohibition of the article. But the expression of the House, and we are bound to believe that the expressions of opinion are not only those of the farmers, but of all the electors of the Dominion, is so strong upon this question that I think the hon. gentleman will be quite satisfied when the resolutions come down to accept the proposition of the Government, and not push his motion any further.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The question we have been discussing is not at all a new one before this House. Many years ago it was taken up by the then member for Stormont and several discussions were had on this question and much information was adduced before the House by the hon. gentleman. That hon. member took much pains at that time to place his views before the House, and the Hansard of that day will show the steps he took. We find not only a change in the view of the hon. gentleman who moved this motion, but in the view of the Government also since the discussion has taken place. I have the Hansard before me and I will make a few extracts to satisfy the House as to why the change of attitude is made by the Government. After the discussion had gone on upon the resolution proposed, viz., that a Customs and Excise duty be placed upon this article, in which the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor), the Minister of Inland Revenue and the Minister of Agriculture took part, the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) forestalled me in moving a resolution prohibiting the manufacture and sale in this country of an article supposed to be so deleterious to health.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman is referring to the tariff debate.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I agreed with your ruling, Mr. Speaker, to-day, and as I have the Hansard in my hand I will read what I am referring to. I find that Mr. Taylor moved "that the House proceed to consider the following resolution declaring that it is expedient to bring in a Bill to regulate the manufacture and sale of the article used as a substitute for butter."

Mr. SPEAKER. That is quite right, but the hon. gentleman was referring to the amendment of the hon. member for South Brant, and that was moved during the tariff debate.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The point I am speaking to is the previous discussion on this adjourned debate. The hon. member for South Brant moved a resolution prohibiting the manufacture and importation of this article, which is regarded by medical men as injurious to public health.

Mr. TAYLOR. Not a word about manufacture.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, I said manufacture.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I intended to move in the same direction, but the hon. member for South Brant relieved me of that duty. The hon. member (Mr. Taylor) who moved the resolution is reported in Hansard to have said:

"The Bill which I wish to introduce is intended to protect the agriculturists of Canada from one of the most glaring frauds ever perpetrated in this country. While it is intended to afford protection to the farmers and dairymen, it will not in any way injure the consumers of butter and cheese."

In another part he says:

"I asked, at the same time, that an Excise and Custom duty of 10 cents per pound be placed on all oleomargarine, either imported or manufactured in the country; and I am glad to say that the Government, true to its protective policy—the National Policy—came down with a resolution placing a Custom duty of 10 cents and an Excise duty of 8 cents per pound on all these substitutes. For this act I am sure they will receive the thanks of every farmer in Canada."

And having allowed for the fostering of this languishing industry, this foul industry, in this country, the Government are deserving, so the hon. member says, of the thanks of the farmers and the people of this country. I say that in placing this resolution, it was intended—I have heard it stated, by those who pretend to know—with a view of establishing a company to manufacture this deleterious article, and that it was for this purpose that the resolution was introduced.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Further on I find the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) said, in speaking of the duty:

"I believe they are in the right direction, and if there are those in the country who wish to buy and use oleomargarine and butterine instead of butter, I think they should have the right to do so, but let it be distinctly understood that they know what they are buying."

In concluding his speech he said:

"I hope the resolution will be adopted, and that such a Bill will be introduced and passed as will give the necessary protection to the large class engaged in the manufacture of butter in the Dominion."

This again shows that it was the intention of the hon. member and of the Government at that time to place a duty on this article and protect this infant industry. The hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Hickey) speaking on this question said:

"I think, therefore, the Bill is of great importance to the country, and ought to meet, as I believe it will meet, with the concurrence of the House and the assistance of the hon. gentleman in making it as perfect as possible."

That is a Customs and Excise duty he proposes would meet with the concurrence of the people of this country. The hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, who was one of those who should receive the thanks of the country for trying to foster the manufacture and sale of an article which the medical men of this House who have examined the subject, as well as others who have given a vast amount of information upon it, have pronouced injurious to health. And I would ask what can be more important to this House and the country than the preservation of public health; a question which has engaged a vast amount of interest and attention in this and every other civilised country? They pronounced strongly against it, and what did the Government through the Minister of Inland Revenue say:

"I might, while on my feet, state that the Customs duties have been imposed on the foreign article and the Excise duty on what may be manufactured in the country."

There you see that the policy of the Government was declared—that there was to be a Customs duty imposed on it, and an Excise duty on the article manufactured. Then the Minister of Agriculture who, he says, takes a deep interest in what relates to the farmers, made the following remark:

"The matter now before the House is one that has been fully considered by the Government as a whole, and I think they have shown that they take an interest in it by imposing a duty of 10 cents per pound, and an Excise duty of 8 cents per pound."

Then the hon. member (Mr. Taylor) in closing his remarks, after consenting to the adjournment of the debate, said:

"In the Bill that I purposed presenting I had made provision that not only the manufacturers and dealers, but hotel keepers and others who served this article of food on the table should serve it as some other article than butter, that parties dealing in it should give it some other name; but I am willing to accept the suggestion which has been made, and leave it to be dealt with in the Bill which the Minister will bring in. All I desire is to fully protect the dairy interests of the country."

Now it is gratifying to me to notice the revolution in the sentiments of the hon. gentleman who introduced the resolution, as well as in the members and supporters of the Government who have spoken upon the question, and that the amendment proposed by my hon. friend for Brant has been the means of creating a more healthy tone with regard to the manufacture and sale of these deleterious compounds.

Mr. TAYLOR. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman states that the resolution of the hon. member for Brant referred to both the importation and the manufacture. Now here is the resolution and it does not say a word about that.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You might have risen to a point of order when the hon. member for Brant spoke.

Mr. BLAKE. That is not a question of order.

Mr. TAYLOR. You are not stating the facts.

Mr. BLAKE. That is not a question of order.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The facts stated by the hon. member for Brant I will just as well believe as the statement you make.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. Hon. gentlemen will please address the Chair.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I beg your pardon, Sir, but it was a digression, and I am hardly responsible for it. It appears that the Government who have fully considered this question, after the information given by the hon. member for Cornwall and others with regard to the manufacture of this article, and the ingredients which entered into its composition, that it was deleterious to the public health, that it was being unduly brought into competition with the farmers of this country, that it was placing an unhealthy article of diet before the people of this country—the Government states that their proposition was to build up the manufacture of the article in this country. I am glad to see a change in the sentiments of the Government after they had heard the views expressed on this side of the House.

Mr. COCHRANE. Speaking on behalf of agriculturists of this country I am sorry to notice that when a question of this kind is brought before this Parliament the hon. member for South Grey should endeavor to treat it in a way to make a little mushroom political popularity for himself. He says he is glad to see signs of a change of sentiment on this side of the House, but I think I see indications of change on the other side. For instance, I think the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) was in favor of the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine and he condemned the Government severely for interfering with it. I think the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Jackson) expressed himself in favor of its manufacture, and I do not think any man on this side went so far as he did, for he had the audacity to state in this House that he fed these compounds to his lumbermen. So it appears that there is a wonderful change of sentiment among hon. gentlemen on the other side. Now this is an important question, and I do not think we should drag party politics into it. I do not care what it is manufactured of, if it comes in competition with the butter of the farmers. I am a protectionist and I believe in giving protection to the farmers; and if such vile stuff is manufactured and brought into competition with the products of the farmer, I am opposed to it, and I think the Government should take a stand on this question and put on a Customs and Excise duty which would not only prevent the importation but the manufacture as well. Now if the statements and figures of the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) are correct it is rather an alarming consideration that the number of cows in the United States has been reduced one-fourth by the manufacture of this stuff. If 20,000,000 lbs. of oleomargarine are manufactured in the United States, it not only injures the farmers of the United States, but those of Canada, because it comes into direct competition with the butter manufactured in the two countries, and drives that quantity of butter out of the market. This is a question upon which I think we should throw politics overboard, and legislate for the best interests of the country. I am in favor of prohibiting the manufacture of the article altogether.

Mr. JENKINS. I think the hon. member for South Grey has been what sportsmen call "running a back scent." He has made a very loud and energetic speech, but like a hound that goes over a back scent, it leads to nothing. I think my hon. friend's speech had no point whatever. If this House legislates on the subject at all, there is only one direction in which as an intelligent and enlightened body it can go, and that is in the direction of total prohibition. The object of legislation has been not to license or regulate the manufacture of adulterations in food, but to put a stop to them, and I do not see why the House should make any exception of oleomargarine. It is known to be a spurious and adulterated article; it is proved to be unwholesome; and it comes into competition with the wholesome product of the farm. Last Session we voted public money to encourage the better manufacture of butter; and having done that we should prohibit the manufacture of this spurious article, which comes into competition with butter. I think there is only one course we can pursue, and that is in the direction of total prohibition.

Mr. FAIRBANK. I wish only to detain the House a moment, to express my satisfaction at the assurance we have received from the Minister that this matter is to be dealt with in a manner that, no doubt, will meet with the approbation of both sides of the House. I feel great satisfaction in knowing that we are not to be deprived of the luxury of butter; for since the discussion of this subject began in the House, I have hardly been able to look an honest cow in the face. The importance of our exportation of butter has already been touched upon, and it might be dealt with at greater length. As to the germ question, I leave that entirely to the doctors. I only hope the resolutions promised will be brought forward quickly, and I deem them of such importance that I hope when they are passed they will be telegraphed to the High Commissioner for the information of the butter makers of England.

Mr. PLATT. I shall not prolong the debate, because I do not intend to add anything to the general argument. I think enough has been said to convince the Government that it is their imperative duty to act promptly and effectively. I think it would be unfortunate if this Session should close without such legislation being had as will effectually prevent the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine into this country. As the hon. member for North Wentworth (Mr. Bain) has said, the prohibition of this article on the other side of the line will tend to encourage its manufacture in this country. In proof of that I have only to state that the Canadian manufacturers of butter are already in receipt of numerous circulars from the butterine makers on the other side of the line, offering inducements to them to go into the manufacture of oleomargarine in this country. A sample of such circulars I hold in my hand, and I will read it for the benefit of the House:—

"To Creamery Men:

"Having retired from the manufacture of creamery butterine, I offer for sale the formula of manufacturing butterine from cream, same as I have been using for the past two years. Will sell the same reasonably, and warrant it O.K.

"I invite your correspondence on same, and can start you very reasonably. All the machinery you will need is a barrel churn and three tanks, with jackets in the tanks. They all will not cost over $60 to $65, and then you can make an article superior to any Chicago manufacturer. It will also enable you to pay up for cream, as when I was manufacturing, I paid as high as 35 cents per inch for cream. Will also give you points, by corresponding with me. I will guarantee the formula O K.

"I also have a cream preservative which I will sell, reasonably, and put you on the track of doing the cream butterine biz correct. I am the only originator of the manufacture of butterine from cream, and can and will fix you up in good shape, reasonably.

"All correspondence relative to same will be attended to promptly."

Such circulars as this are being sent to the creamery men in this country. I think enough has been said to convince the Government of their duty, and I hope they will perform it this Session.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I would like to know in what position we are in this matter. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) has changed his mind very often. He introduced a resolution to regulate the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine, and when the discussion goes on he states his desire to go further and prohibit its manufacture altogether. Now, however, we find him seconding the proposition that the debate be adjourned, the effect of which will be, as he knows well, to render it impossible for him, in all probability, to reach it this Session. It will therefore be impossible for him, if the debate be adjourned, to introduce a Bill prohibiting its manufacture. He consented to the adjournment of the debate before we had any announcement from the Government that they had altered their mind in the slightest degree. What is the policy of the Government? We have it embodied in their Bill. Is it that we should prohibit the manufacture of the article? No, Sir; it is to allow of a license being granted to any person, who has conformed to the provisions of the Bill, to manufacture oleomargarine. That is all the announcement which the hon. gentleman has as to the policy of the Government when he proposes to adjourn the discussion. True, the hon. member said he had been impressed, to some extent, by the statements made, but then the hon. member for Leeds had not even that assurance when he consented to an adjournment. Unless the Government are prepared to prohibit the manufacture of this article, it is the duty of the hon. gentleman to go on with his resolution, and obtain, if possible, permission of the House to introduce a prohibitory Bill and go on with that Bill. I have prepared an amendment which I am ready to move when the Government Bill comes up, to strike out the clause permitting the manufacture of oleomargarine and insert instead a prohibitory clause, and I have another one prepared, with the same object, in case the tariff amendments come up first. The hon. gentleman states that I said nothing about the manufacture of this article when I made my motion on a previous occasion to prohibit its importation, but if he will refer to the Hansard, page 802, he will see that I stated clearly that I could not move to prohibit its manufacture then, but that, as soon as I reached the item relating to its manufacture, I would deal with it. With reference to the statement of the Minister of Customs to-night that the imposition of 8 cents Excise duty was equivalent to the prohibition of its manufacture in this country, the hon. gentleman knows it would do nothing of the kind. Does he not know that if he imposed a duty of 20 cents a pound, that would not interfere with its manufacture, because the article, when exported, pays no Excise duty. Therefore this Excise duty would have no effect as regards the manufacture of oleomargarine for export, and we would still have the English market flooded with this false product, to the ruin of the butter trade of this country. There is only one sensible way of dealing with the question, and I propose, on the first opportunity, to move that we should deal with it in that way, and that is that the manufacture, as well as the importation of this article, should be entirely prohibited.

Mr. HESSON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Return showing who are the persons who respectively owe the balances on account of the slides and booms in the district of the Saguenay, to the amount of $5,850.54, as appears in the Report of the Department of Inland Revenue for the year 1885, at page 18?—(Mr. Casgrain.)

Return showing who are the persons who respectively owe the arrears of $43,860 95, which appear to be due according to the report of the Department of the Interior for the year 1885, at page 28?—(Mr. Casgrain.)

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 12 o'clock, midnight.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 11th May, 1886.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

Mr. BERGIN moved the adoption of the Fourth Report of the Joint Committee of both Houses on the Printing of Parliament.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This report looks very like a censure on the Auditor, because he was not able to agree with the committee as to the terms on which he should sign a certificate; and I really think a censure on that officer should not be inflicted without very grave ground indeed. So far as I can understand the report, it appears that the accounts of two years have been mixed up together a good deal, and that the Auditor simply recommended that each year should be made to pay its own way. If that be so, I think the demand of the Auditor was a reasonable one, and there ought to be no ground for refusing to continue the audit by the public officer. I suppose the hon. Minister of Finance has examined the report.

Mr. McLELAN. I understood from the Auditor that there was merely a misunderstanding between himself and Mr. Hartney with regard to certifying the accounts—that he expected, having met the sub-committee, that the accounts would be sent to him to be examined and certified, while Mr. Hartney expected that he would come over to his office and examine and certify them there. Through that misunderstanding a neglect occurred, and the accounts were not certified. I understand that there is no disposition on the part of the committee to censure the Auditor. I think they are perhaps a little hasty in making this report to take the matter out of his hands. I understand that some time ago a joint report of the Committee of both Houses recommended that the accounts of the Printing Committee should pass through the hands of the Auditor and be audited by him, and I understand from himself that he does not object to examining the statement prepared by Mr. Hartney and certifying it. He says:

"My report shows that the money voted by Parliament for the printing expenditure has been expended, and for the purposes intended. If the suggestion made by me in the letter printed in the report of the committee were adopted there would be no reason for my modifying Mr. Hartney's statement before signing it. In fact there would be no reason for Mr. Hartney making such a statement, as my report would contain an identical statement."

It seems that the difference has arisen wholly through a misunderstanding between Mr. McDougall and Mr. Hartney as to the mode of procedure.

Mr. BLAKE. I am very glad to hear the explanation of the hon. Minister of Finance, for I can hardly conceive it possible that there should have been any intention on the part of the Auditor General to decline to discharge his duty with reference to any matter that this House, or the Joint Committee on Printing, may send to him. We have been gradually endeavoring to include within the domain of the audit everything possible. The accounts of certain matters which were not specifically included, have, from time to time, by virtue of resolutions unanimously adopted by the Committee on Public Accounts, been sent to the Auditor General, and it is obviously highly important that every money transaction should be submitted to the same audit and the same rules. The reason for the passage of the Statute relating to this officer applies very largely to these cases. Now, after the statement of the hon. Minister of Finance, I do not think we ought at all to concur in the report of the Printing Committee so far as it proposes to deal with the question of audit for the future. I think the audit for the future, as was proposed by the Committee on Public Accounts and agreed to by the House, ought to remain with the Auditor General. The misunderstanding that exists between these two functionaries is no reason why a matter of public policy which we have decided upon should be departed from. Whosoever fault it is, it will, no doubt, be settled by two sensible persons; whoever has been at fault or made a mistake will, no doubt, remedy that, and the duty that requires to be discharged will be discharged according to the public interest. In no case can I agree to the House rescinding the resolution of the Committee on Public Accounts at the instance of another committee. I think the only way we can deal with this matter, if we are to put it into a train of further enquiry, is to refer that portion of the report for the consideration of the Committee on Public Accounts, which is the Finance Committee of the House. There is nothing special in the printing accounts which renders them more difficult to be audited by the Auditor General than any other accounts, and before the decision of the Public Accounts Committee is reversed, I think we ought to have the views of that committee before us. But after the statement of the hon. Minister of Finance, that this whole difficulty has arisen from a misunderstanding between the two gentlemen as to which should go to the other, I think there can be no reason at all for our even making such a reference. If I thought there was reason for the matter going further, I would suggest such a reference, and if it is to go further I hope some hon. gentleman will suggest such a reference, rather than we should decide as to whether the system of audit should in this case be departed from or not. I can hardly see any necessity for that after the statement of the Minister of Finance, and the best course would be to withdraw that portion of the report which gives this recommendation, or see that it be negatived.

Mr. McLELAN. I find I have a copy of a letter addressed by the Auditor General to Mr. Hartney upon this matter which is not among the papers brought down. The following is the letter:—

"AUDIT OFFICE, OTTAWA, May 1st, 1886.

"SIR,—I observe by a report of the Printing Committee, now before the House of Commons, that my position with reference to the certifying of your statement of last year's printing expenditure was misunderstood by the sub-committee before which I appeared to make an explanation. I thought that I was understood by the sub-committee to promise to do two things:

"(1.) To send a letter of suggestion as to the means to be adopted to enable the Queen's Printer to pay in each fiscal year for the parliamentary reports distributed by the Departments during that year.

"(2.) To certify the statement of printing expenditure with certain modifications.

"My letter of the 12th ult. carried out promise (1). With reference to promise (2), I expected you to send me the statement for my certificate. You apparently expected me to send for the statement. Please send it to me now that I may make the certificate.

"I have the honor to be,
"Your obedient servant,
"J. L. McDOUGALL,
"Auditor General.

"H. HARTNEY, Esq.,
"Clerk, Printing Committee,
"House of Commons."

Mr. BERGIN. The Auditor General appears to have given his version of the difficulty to the hon. gentlemen who have just addressed the House, but forgot to explain to them that it was not so much a misunderstanding between him and Mr. Hartney, an official of this House, as a refusal to obey the orders of the committee, or rather a refusal to meet the suggestion of the committee that he should certify to the correctness of an account which he admitted to the committee was correct. It had nothing whatever to do with the misunderstanding between Mr. Hartney and the Auditor General, but, when the clerk of the committee presented his account and reported that he had been unable to obtain a certificate of its correctness from the Auditor General, showing, at the same time, a letter which he had written to the Auditor General asking him for a certificate, the committee adjourned from the Tuesday to the Friday following to enable the Auditor General to make that certificate. The Auditor General, instead of certifying the account, instead of replying directly to the letter which was written by the clerk, at the direction of the committee, put a memorandum on the back of the account saying that he would be present at the meeting of the committee and explain. He did attend the meeting of the committee on the Friday following. The question was put to him whether the account was correct or not, and he admitted that it was, and expressed his intention of signing the certificate. Did he sign it? On the contrary, a few days afterwards he sent a letter, which the Minister of Finance has just read, declaring that it was a misunderstanding between him and the clerk of the committee—that he thought he was understood by the sub-committee to promise to do two things:

"(1) To send a letter of suggestion as to the means to be adopted to enable the Queen's Printer to pay in each fiscal year for the parliamentary reports distributed by the Departments during that year.

"(2) To certify the statement of printing expenditure with certain modifications."

I beg to say that the committee did not understand that he intended to send any such letter or suggestion. He did give them to understand that he would like to attach to the certificate an explanation of the reasons why there should be a change in the manner of making the account; and instead of giving the committee to understand that he would certify to the statement of expenditure with certain modifications, expecting the clerk to send him the account to be certified, he gave us to understand he would certify it immediately. If you will refer to the report, you will find that on the 12th April—the committee meeting, at which he was present, was held on the 9th—he writes:

"OTTAWA, April 12th, 1886.

"SIR,—I beg to call the attention of the committee to the insufficiency of the vote for miscellaneous printing, controlled by the Queen's Printer, to meet the cost of printing the portion distributed by the Departments of the departmental reports submitted to Parliament.

"I would suggest that the committee request the Secretary of State to make a recommendation to the Government for an additional estimate, so that the $9,454.83 now charged to the vote on account of last year's printing, and the whole of the cost of this year's printing, may be met by the whole appropriation. I presume that an additional estimate of $16,000 for this year, and about $6,000 for next year, would be necessary."

This was not an answer to the question of the committee or certifying the account. It was entirely ignoring the request of the committee, and leaving the account in its uncertified condition. The committee, finding he declined to certify the account, made the recommendation contained in this report. Since this letter of the 1st inst., which has just been read by the Minister of Finance, Mr. McDougall, the Auditor General, has written a letter to the clerk of the committee, attempting to explain the differences between his mode of making up the accounts and Mr. Hartney's; and yesterday he certified to the account. I saw no good reason, and the committee saw no good reason, why the Auditor General should not have certified the account as well before the report of the Printing Committee was made as to certify it only yesterday. I have not failed to observe, and I admit there is a good deal of force in the remarks of the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Blake), that a careful audit should be made of the accounts of this House, an audit as careful as that of any of the Departments of the Government, but I would remind hon. gentlemen that this does not come directly under the Audit Act——

Mr. MILLS. It ought to.

Mr. BERGIN—and that the auditing of the accounts of this House by the Auditor General during the last two or three years was the result of a motion made in the committee, which was submitted to this House and approved; but I do not suppose that because this House approved the report of this committee, that that report was sufficient reason why, when an officer of the Government refuses to pay attention to a committee of this House, and to do that which he admits it was his duty to have done—that is, to certify to an account which he admits to be correct—we should not determine to act without the Auditor General's certificate for the future.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is evident that there has been a misunderstanding, because I do not suppose that the Auditor General would have wished to offend a committee of this House and fail in his public duty by not obeying the orders of the committee, which are equivalent to the orders of the House. Therefore, I think, first in reference to the audit, that, though the law does not put the accounts of this House under the Auditor General, nevertheless, the Public Accounts Committee having reported in favor of that course and the House having assented to it, that is as good. As far as we are concerned, it is law, because it is our own free will. No doubt we could to-morrow change it and decide that the audit of these accounts should be made by a sub-committee of the Public Accounts Committee or of the Printing Committee, but I really believe that, having the Auditor General as the officer appointed by law to audit the accounts of all the Departments of the Government, it is only a natural consequence that the same officer should audit the accounts of this House. I cannot find fault—far from it—with the committee for having reported as they have reported, because there is no doubt that, up to the time that the committee reported, the Auditor General had not complied with the wishes of the committee, but it appears since, by the letter that the hon. the Minister of Finance has read, that the Auditor General either saw that he had not complied with the orders of the committee or that he had neglected it—at all events, he saw that he should go further, and I am informed now, and I think the hon. member who has just spoken has stated so, that, since then the Auditor General has given his certificate, and therefore has declared that the accounts of the officer of the Printing Committee are correct. Under those circumstances, I would suggest that, inasmuch as these matters have occurred since the report was laid before the committee, the motion of my hon. friend should be withdrawn, leaving it to the committee to examine the matter with the new light that must be thrown on the subject by that letter and by the certificate, and thus be in a position probably to come with an additional report to modify this one. I, therefore, suggest to my hon. friend that he should not insist on his motion to-day.

Mr. TROW. I think the suggestion offered by the hon. the Minister of Public Works is the proper course to pursue. There is not a member of the committee, as far as I am aware, who has any desire to censure the Auditor General—far from it; we consider him a worthy and efficient officer. Yet, at the same time, we were distinctly under the impression—at least I was, and I think other members of the sub-committee were—that the Auditor General intended and stated that he would certify to the report. I heard him say distinctly several times that the accounts were correct in each and every particular. Then why not certify them? It became imperative for the committee to report, and without the accounts being properly certified we could make no report, and the committee adjourned from day to day to get the Auditor's certificate. I do not consider that we have done any harm. I think we have done a little good. There is something unreasonable with some officials about this establishment, and I think we have done no harm. I think the suggestion of the Minister of Public Works is proper under the circumstances, and it is to be hoped that hereafter we shall have no unreasonable stiffness on the part of our officials, one to the other, but that they will be more reasonable and will certify to accounts when they find them correct.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I quite agree with the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Finance that, as there seems to be no substantial difference at all now between the Auditor and the committee, the best thing is to remodel the report; but the House will do well to remember that the whole value of the Auditor General depends upon his being an independent functionary. We have hedged round that office with every precaution with the view to make him independent, and we ourselves, either directly in the House, or through a committee of the House, ought to be the last people in the world to interfere to prevent his exercising an honest judgment on the accounts which are submitted to him. If you have an Auditor General who holds office during good behavior, you ought to take all pains to make him perfectly independent, and I say, with all due submission to my friends of the committee, that it is better that there should be occasional differences of opinion between the Auditor General and ourselves even, or between the Auditor General and the Departments of the Government or the Departments of this House, than that he should cease to be an independent functionary, acting as we have directed him to act, acting for the purpose that we created him for, for the purpose as far as possible of having a perfectly independent audit and a perfectly independent judgment passed on the items submitted to him. From what I know of Mr. McDougall, I am quite sure that he could have no sort of desire or intention to act with any disrespect to the Committee on Printing. Now, it appears that no substantial difference exists. It must be remembered, as mentioned by the hon. gentleman, that a large and important committee of this House, the Committee on Public Accounts, was the committee which expressly requested this audit.

Mr. HAGGART. While we are on that question, let me draw the attention of the House to the two sets of returns that are now printed, one by the Auditor General and one by the different Departments—the Public Accounts. The accounts are supposed to be precisely similar, one set drawn out one way by the different Departments, and one another way by the Auditor General's Department, but both showing the same result. I think the publishing of the two sets of accounts, the Public Accounts and the Auditor General's report, is a useless expenditure of money. If the accounts in the different Departments are not kept in the manner in which they ought to be, the Auditor General should have them corrected and published in the manner in which they should be, and we should not have two different accounts showing the same result but drawn out differently.

Mr. McLELAN. I have discussed that with the deputy of my Department, and we expect to reduce the size of one of the volumes by next year.

Mr. BLAKE. No doubt the hon. gentleman from Lanark (Mr. Haggart) is perfectly correct, that with the growth of the minuteness of detail and classification of the audit report, it is unnecessary for the Public Accounts to contain all the details which have been usually printed in them; but, from my view, it will be very useful to continue the Public Accounts themselves upon another system, giving more general information, in the view of the Departments themselves, but it is not necessary that these minute details should be doubled over.

Mr. BERGIN. I do not feel that I can withdraw the report as suggested by the Minister of Public Works, without referring it to the committee.

Mr. BLAKE. The only way is to refer the report back to the committee, and then they will deal with it as they see fit.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I thought my hon. friend would leave the report before the House, but withdraw his motion to adopt it until he had consulted the committee.

Mr. BERGIN. With the consent of the House, I beg leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion withdrawn.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS BY MEMBERS.

Mr. SPEAKER. Before proceeding to the Orders of the Day, I desire to call the attention of hon. members to a practice which has been growing up which I fear, if not checked, will have a tendency to degrade the character and lower the dignity of the proceedings of this House. I allude to the abuse of the privilege accorded to hon. members of making personal explanations. These statements should be short and simple statements of fact or denials of any charge made, but should be couched in parliamentary language. Unfortunately, hon. members on both sides of the House have indulged in personalities and recriminations against other hon. members which are altogether out of place, and I feel myself that I have allowed too great latitude in this respect, but it was from a desire not to interrupt hon. members who were making statements when they felt personally aggrieved. I hope, however, that in the future I shall have the assistance of both sides of the House in confining hon. members who are accorded the indulgence of the House—because it is an indulgence—strictly to the rule.

PRIVILEGE—TIMBER LIMITS.

Mr. GAULT. I wish to correct a statement, made a few evenings ago by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who said that I had applied for two townships in the North-West. I immediately wrote to the Department, and received the following reply: —

"In reply to your note of the 4th inst., I beg to say that a careful search through the records of this Department discloses no application made by you on your own behalf for a colonisation tract, but I enclose herewith a copy of a letter addressed by you to the Minister of the Interior, dated the 25th of March, 1882, applying on behalf of Mr. J. C. Norsworthy and friends, for two certain townships for colonisation purposes. I may add that no grant was ever made to Norsworthy."

Here is the application I made on the 25th March, 1882, to the Minister of the Interior:

"I beg leave to apply for J. C. Norsworthy and friends, for two townships under plan of your regulations for colonisation purposes, viz., 23 and 24 in the 27th range, west of the 22nd meridian."

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I was in Ingersoll and was introduced to Mr. Norsworthy, and had not ten minutes' conversation with him, and why he sent this application to me I never could tell. But the moment I received that letter—there were so many other letters coming from all quarters—I immediately sent them to the Department, and never had a reply and never thought any more of the matter. I never was an applicant myself for a tract of land in the North-West.

An hon. MEMBER. Why should you not be?

Mr. GAULT. Why should I not? I had no interest whatever in the matter, but I do not see why I should not have applied as well as any person else. The lands were open to the public, and I do not see why members of Parliament have not a perfect right to apply like any other individuals.

PENSIONS TO VOLUNTEERS IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the hon. gentleman who is leading the House, whether the particulars of the pensions assigned to parties who have served in the North-West, have yet been brought down? He may recollect that he said they would be laid on the Table at an early date, together with the rules and regulations.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. So far as I can recollect, my colleague, the Minister of Militia, stated they would be brought down in a day or two. He will be here in a short time, and then I will be able to answer the hon. gentleman.

GOVERNMENT MEASURES.

Mr. BLAKE. I would call attention to the Government notices on the paper. April the 16th, notice was given of a Bill entitled: "An Act further to amend the Supreme and Exchequer Court Act." Several days ago I enquired of the Government when they were going to introduce the Bill promised in the Speech from the Throne with reference to the trial of causes against the Crown, and the Minister of Justice answered that the Bill of which the notice was on the paper, was the Bill, and it was prepared, but he was waiting for the money resolution, I understood him.

Mr. THOMPSON. I was speaking on the resolution with reference to the North-West judges.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman stated this was the Bill, at any rate.

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. We are now very close to the end of the Session, and I was told yesterday that a Minister had stated that the Government intended to prorogue in a fortnight, and still we have not got that important measure promised in the Speech from the Throne, and which was in such a state of forwardness last Session that it was actually introduced, and went, I think, to a second reading under the guiding hand of the Minister of Public Works. Then there is an Act to amend the Franchise Act, a very important measure of which notice was also given as long ago as the 16th April, but with which no further progress has been made. Then we find the Bill respecting the Department of Public Printing and Stationery, promised in the Speech from the Throne, which still remains as a notice on the paper. I think it is time for these measures to be brought before us, if we are to have a reasonable opportunity of considering them during the Session in which it is expected they are to pass.

PRIVILEGE—TIMBER LIMITS.

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to disclaim any intention of doing injustice to the hon. member for Montreal West (Mr. Gault). My statement was copied from the Sessional returns in which his name appears as an applicant for two townships. In the report of the proceedings I see that he stated: "My name is found nowhere on the books." Well, Sir, I made the statement and I repeated it as I found it in the Sessional returns. But the hon. gentleman's explanation, of course, shows just what connection he had with the application.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 122) for the relief of the corporation of the Town of Cobourg.—(Mr. McLelan.)

MANITOBA CLAIMS SETTLEMENT.

Mr. McLELAN moved the third reading of Bill (No. 123) to explain the Act 48 and 49 Vic. chapter 50, intituled: "An Act for the final adjustment of the claims made by the Province of Manitoba on the Dominion." He said: Hon. members opposite asked for some figures respecting the accounts of Manitoba during the past year. The amount paid to them last year under the old arrangement was $229,858. They have since drawn an additional sum from their capital account, which would reduce it by $4,700, which would leave them, providing no change had been made in the terms, $215,000 as their revenue. I gave the hon. gentleman the other day the amount of the capital that had been drawn and which should be deducted from the amount given in this Bill.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman also promised to inform us what is the present income allowed by the Dominion to Manitoba.

Mr. McLELAN. That cannot be ascertained until there is a settlement between the two Governments of the amounts that may be chargeable to the Government of Manitoba for local services; but the hon. gentleman will see, that it would amount to about $270,000. The charges apart from the capital sum would give them $270,000. Then, assuming there would be three millions and over, there would be $150,000 or so to add to that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. About $430,000.

Mr. McLELAN. Yes.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time, and passed.

THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. McLELAN moved the second reading of Bill (No. 131) further to amend the Act respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time on a division, and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 7,

Mr. DAWSON. As the Algoma branch, to which this clause of the Bill now before the House refers, will be entirely within the constituency which I represent, I shall, with the leave of the House, point out a few of the advantages sure to arise from the passing of this Act. It will, in the first place, be of material advantage in enabling the Pacific Railway Company to raise the funds necessary for the completion of this Algoma branch of 200 miles, and its being put in operation means the development of a very important and extensive section of the country, a section rich in the natural resources which give traffic to a railway, such as valuable minerals, pine forests of vast extent, and valleys which from their fertility must prove attractive in a high degree to the agriculturist. The line will, for a considerable distance, run along the coast of Lake Huron, crossing rivers which have their sources among the pine forests of the interior, and it will pass in front of the Manitoulin group of islands where settlement is advancing so rapidly that their traffic will of itself be a matter of no small importance to a railway. The growing settlements on these islands have hitherto been shut off from the outside world in winter, but the railway will bring about a new state of things, and from Manitowaning on the east, to Sault St. Marie on the west, an impetus will be given to development which must result in the country north of Lake Huron, and the beautiful and fertile islands of the Manitoulin in front of it, becoming one of the finest districts in the Dominion of Canada. But it is not alone in the development of eastern Algoma that this railway will be of advantage, for it will bring a stream of foreign traffic through the country, the magnitude of which it would be difficult to estimate. At Sault St. Marie it will connect with a United States line, now being constructed, and through it with the railway systems of the Western States. It will thus be in connection with the railways traversing the wide and fertile States of Minnesota and Dakota, and among these with the great Northern Pacific, now extending from the head of Lake Superior to the Pacific Ocean. It is well known that the States of Minnesota and Dakota are among the finest wheat-producing countries on the continent, and the wheat of these vast regions must necessarily seek the shortest and cheapest route to an ocean port, and the shortest will be by way of Sault Ste. Marie and the Canadian Pacific system to Montreal, and the company will, no doubt, find it to their interest to make it the cheapest. What this traffic means may be imagined when it is considered that the surplus produce of the vast wheat-producing regions lying between Duluth and the Rocky Mountains, considerable as it is already, will, in a few years, as these regions become more and more densely peopled, tax the capacity of all the railways likely to be constructed to carry it to the ocean. But there is a traffic, and a very important one, in which, at certain seasons, the Algoma branch and the Canadian Pacific will be absolutely without competition, and, to make my meaning in this regard clear, I may say that in the fall the water-borne grain from Duluth must find its way over the railway from Sault Ste. Marie eastward. In the fall the navigation is first interrupted by the freezing over of the narrow and shallow channels in the upper waters of Lake Huron, eastward of Sault Ste. Marie. Lake Superior remains open long after these channels have closed. In fact, that great inland sea is open, as a general rule, all through the winter, except in the bays. At all events, it is as open all through December as it is in June, but hitherto its navigation has of necessity closed with the freezing up of the channels in Lake Huron, to which I have referred. But the Algoma branch, when opened, will render it possible to bring grain by water from Duluth to Sault Ste. Marie, and have it there put on cars for Montreal, long after the navigation of Lake Huron shall have closed. Indeed, as I have said, Lake Superior, with its 400 miles of navigation, is open throughout the greater part of the winter. The importance of the growing trade of Duluth may be gathered from an official return from which I shall quote:

"The shipments of grain, by water, from the Lake Superior port of Duluth, Minn., have been as follows, during the last six seasons:—

	Bushels.
1880	1,453,674
1881	2,865,536
1882	3,235,498
1883	4,586,908
1884	11,488,497
1885	14,049,897

This shows a very rapid progressive increase in the shipments of grain by water from Duluth, and the cause is evident in the increased area brought under cultivation from year to year in the great prairies to the westward of that place. That this progressive increase will go on there can be no doubt, and that the Canadian Pacific Railway will derive a large traffic from this source may be regarded as a certainty; more especially, in the fall, after the closing of the navigation, to the eastward of Sault Ste. Marie. In the summer months it is quite likely that the bulk of the grain may go by the great lakes, but for such of it as is destined for Montreal, it is just a question whether a railway a little over 600 miles in length may not successfully compete with a navigation of nearly double that distance, and a lockage of 600 feet. In order that the railway may have the full advantage of the Duluth traffic, the Algoma branch should be extended to a point on the St. Mary's River, about six miles west of Sault Ste. Marie, where there is an excellent harbor; but this is a matter to which the company will, no doubt, give due attention. Taking this Algoma branch, all in all, its completion will be a fitting sequel to the great railway which, with its extensive branches and connections, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have now or soon will have in operation. It will, in the not distant future, be the means of bringing through the country a traffic equal to that anticipated for the main line itself. It will, in the first place, serve as a colonisation railway, developing the resources and leading to the settlement of a most important section of the country, and in the next it will be an international highway bringing through the country to Canadian ports an immense volume of foreign traffic. That this important work will be carried out with the energy and foresight which have hitherto characterized the operations of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, I have not the least doubt.

Mr. BLAKE. I shall not enter into the larger questions which have been dwelt upon by the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson), but I want to call the attention of the Minister to the fact that the provision is, according to the language of the Bill, it would include the power of declaring that the amount of those bonds now to be issued, equivalent to the portion of the road already built, should be appropriated to that purpose. Now, what I understand is the real intention is that so much of that branch having been already built, the bonds should be issued on the road completed and to be completed, and the proceeds are to be devoted to the work on completion and equipment, and not to be set against the work already done. Therefore, if for the word "construction" you would insert the word "completion," I think it would carry out what the intention and understanding of Parliament was. I also call attention to the fact that in the last line of the page the intention of the draughtsman evidently has not been carried out, and that the word "on" should be substituted for "of" before the words "such rolling stock."

Mr. McLELAN. I do not think the words "construction" and "completion" differ very much; it is for the completion of the whole branch. I may say I have obtained a rough estimate of about ninety miles that we have not yet surveyed. It is only an approximate estimate to finish the part upon which the contract has already been let. It is as follows:—Ballasting, bridging, widening roadway and buildings required, $450,000; extension to the Sault Ste. Marie River, in sidings and buildings, about 100 miles, at $30,000 per mile, $3,000,000; at the Sault, bridges over the river and canal, and approaches, $650,000; equipment of the entire Algoma branch, 196 miles, at $3,000 per mile, $588,000; making $4,688,000; in addition to which there are several tracks to be laid into the mines which are now being worked. These will be in various lengths of from three to six miles, so that the margin left after these estimated expenditures would be very small.

Mr. BLAKE. What is the bonding power?

Mr McLELAN. I have no figures of that.

Mr. BLAKE. It is upon that that the question of margin depends. The whole mileage is somewhere about 200 miles.

Mr. McLELAN. Yes, exclusive of the branches into the mines.

Mr. BLAKE. If the bonding power is $30,000 per mile, that would be $6,000,000, in round numbers. My apprehension is that unless the word "completion" is substituted for "construction" it would be possible to issue, for example, the two and a half millions that are authorised, and then set them against the work which is so far done, whereas the intention is that these bonds are to be applied to the further work to be done, in completing the branch, both the portion partially constructed and that remaining to be constructed, and, of course, the bridges, &c.

Mr. McLELAN. There can be no objection to the substitution of the word "completion" for "construction," if it carries out the idea in any fuller sense.

Mr. BLAKE. The latter part of the clause seems to me to be a very curious way of dealing with such an important subject as the allocation to a particular security of the rolling stock, plant, tolls and revenue. The proposition is that by-laws should be passed by the company which will define what rolling stock appertains to the branch, and is so covered by the mortgage, and also what portion of the tolls and revenues. That is, in truth, a transfer by by-law, for the purposes of a mortgage, to the mortgagees, of the rolling stock. I think the proper course would be that there should not be merely a by-law of the company declaring what rolling stock belongs to the branch, but also some instrument of the hypothecation of that rolling stock. There remains also the objection I took at a former stage to this clause—leaving it so that it is permissible for the company to appropriate some portion of the rolling stock to the branch, as between the branch and the main line, the effect of which will be to derogate to that extent from the existing security of the mortgagees of the main line.

Mr. McLELAN moved the insertion of the word "upon" instead of "of" in the last line of the first page.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McLELAN moved that the word "completion" be inserted on the fifth line of the second page, instead of the word "construction."

Amendment agreed to.

On section 4,

Mr. BLAKE. This clause seems to me not to carry out the agreement made by the company as to the limitation of the security, in which it was stated that the rate for the land was not to exceed $2 per acre. This is an unlimited power altogether.

Mr. McLELAN. I think it is an omission by the printer.

Mr. BLAKE. Well, let us put it in. Although the continuance of the arrangement about a reserve might be calculated to raise some suspicion, I think the clause, as amended, practically removes the objection which was raised as to any apparent intention to interfere with the position of the holders of outstanding bonds who do not wish to have them redeemed. I think it right to mention that, as I raised the objection before.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 6,

Mr. BLAKE. This is a wholly new clause, about which we have heard nothing or seen a single paper to show what the Government have done with the money and the authority granted to them to enable them to carry out this arrangement. I think we ought to have a statement as to what was done by the Government with the public funds entrusted to them with which to obtain possession of the North Shore Railway, and as to what the arrangement was, and we ought to have the documents before us which were executed in order to carry it out.

Mr. McLELAN. I do not know that that is very material just now. The instructions given by Parliament last Session were acted upon, and were not exceeded, and all the papers connected with the transaction will be submitted to the House.

Mr. BLAKE. But the hon. gentleman has not given any reason for the passage of this clause.

Mr. McLELAN. The principal reason, and the reason which I think the hon. gentleman will accept, is that it is desirable in the interest of the whole country that the North Shore Railway should form a portion of the Pacific Railway, so that there may be one perfect system from Quebec to the Pacific Ocean. That was the object the House had last Session in granting power to the Government to enable us to complete the system.

Mr. BLAKE. I understood that the Government asked from Parliament all the powers they thought necessary in order that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company might become the owners of the North Shore. Now, the hon. gentleman asks for some more parliamentary authority to complete the arrangement. In whose hands is the stock now, what price has been paid for it, what interest have the company in it, and what is necessary to be done now?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The stock is in the hands of certain trustees. The easiest and best way by which the North Shore Railway may become a portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway is by the stock being acquired by the company, and for that purpose this clause is inserted here. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company, not having authority under their charter to acquire that stock, ask us to give them this authority. Then the North Shore will become legally, as well as in fact, a portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. BLAKE. Then the arrangement made by the Government did not include the possession by the Government, in behalf of the company, of the stock of the North Shore; or has the price of that stock been paid by the Government, and is this clause merely to get rid of the legal technical difficulty in the absence of power?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Simply that.

Mr. BLAKE. Then the stock has in effect been purchased by the Government?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is so understood.

Mr. BLAKE. And the transaction is already closed, and this is simply to clothe the Canadian Pacific Railway Company with power to complete it?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. I really think we ought to have the documents brought down, so that we might see what the nature of that transaction is.

On the schedule,

Mr. BLAKE. In the third clause the hon. gentleman will find a provision that the excess of the land grant bond shall, under certain circumstances, be cancelled, and then there is a provision that the debenture stock of the Ontario and Quebec Railway shall be returned to the company. The hon. gentleman has taken express power to cancel the land grant bonds, but he has taken no express power to deal with the debenture stock, which I understand is under pledge to the Government. I do not know whether that method of distinguishing between the two classes of securities held by the Government may not lead afterwards to some confusion.

Mr. THOMPSON. I would call the hon. gentleman's attention to the first section, which ratifies the agreement, and authorises the Government and the company respectively to perform and carry out the conditions thereof.

Mr. BLAKE. I am aware of that, but I understood that there was a specific agreement made as to part of this.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE FOR ONTARIO.

Mr. THOMPSON moved the second reading of Bill (No. 125) to amend the law relating to salaries of certain judges of the Supreme Court of Judicature for Ontario.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 2,

Mr. THOMPSON. The object of this is to repeal the Act providing for the salaries, superannuation and travelling allowances of certain judges of certain provincial courts. The first section provides for the salary of the additional judge.

Mr. BLAKE. With reference to an observation I addressed to the hon. gentleman some time ago, that there exists a considerable amount of inconvenience, both in reference to the discharge of the appellant functions and certain functions in other branches, I have received from persons qualified to judge statements corroborative of my remarks. There are a considerable number of cases which have been before the Court of Appeal for a very long time, and which cannot be tried for the want of what are called ad hoc judges. They are cases in which one or more judges of the court were concerned in the earlier stages of litigation, in their official capacity, and in which, therefore, it is not possible for them to sit. The addition proposed will give another judge to those out of whom the selection of ad hoc judges can be made. With reference to the work in the High Court of Justice itself, I have been informed by practitioners of wide experience that there exists great difficulty in procuring judges to do the work. It is true the particular judge now to be appointed will belong to the Chancery division, but it is expected that his appointment will assist in the freeing of other judges. Amongst the cases presented to me as a practical instance of the difficulty, is this: A man had been arrested and was confined, and had pleaded for bail. His application having been refused before the master or judge of primary jurisdiction, the practitioner endeavored to procure a judge to hear the appeal, but he was unsuccessful, as the pressure of other business was so great that it was impossible for the judges to attend, and his client was confined pending the possibility of obtaining a judge. Under these circumstances, as the vacancy is now being filled, though not in the court in which the vacancy has occurred, and as there exists great inconvenience, no time should be lost in filling the vacancy.

Mr. THOMPSON. I had no such information when the hon. gentleman put his question, but one or two members of the House connected with the Ontario bar represented subsequently the inconvenience, and I presume the difficulty arose to a great extent from the long continued illness of Judge Morrison, and not through delay on the part of the Government in filling the office, because it was impossible to fill it until the vacancy occurred which was caused by the lamented death of Mr. Morrison, two or three months ago. There was no provision on the Statute-book to provide a salary for a judge or supply his place. The legislation in Ontario which enables us to add this judge to the Chancery division, was passed in the Session of 1885.

PUBLIC LANDS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 120) to make further provision respecting the administration of the public lands of Canada in British Columbia.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BLAKE. I would ask whether the effect of extending the jurisdiction of the Dominion Lands Board is generally to extend the whole jurisdiction and system, and what change precisely will be made? At present these lands are under the charge of an official of the British Columbia Government, Mr. Trutch.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The lands at this moment are under charge chiefly of Mr. Trutch, the agent of the British Columbia Government. Now that there is railway communication, it is thought more desirable the lands should be more directly under the charge of the Dominion Board. Mr. Aikman has been removed to Westminster, where his office will be, and Mr. Trutch's services are to be dispensed with as regards our own land.

Mr. BLAKE. Mr. Aikman is to be under the control of the Dominion Land Board, and Mr. Trutch is no longer to have control?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Just so.

Mr. BLAKE. What is to become of Mr. Trutch, because I believe his services are very dear to the people of that Province, as we know they have been to the country. Is he to be superseded altogether?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I think the hon. gentleman will have to give notice of that question.

Mr. BLAKE. This will include, in addition to the 40-mile railway belt, the lands given in the Peace River district?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). It will embrace all the lands of the Dominion within British Columbia.

Mr. BLAKE. And, is it quite clear that, notwithstanding the completion of the railway, the distances will be such as to render this arrangement practically efficient, that the Dominion Lands Board can be at all fairly a local authority to administer these lands promptly?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I think so.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to ask the Minister of the Interior whether there is any provision in the Bill for the pet of the Administration who has conducted the Dominion lands there up to this time, the Hon. Mr. Trutch, because I think it would be very unfair, after he has been petted and pampered by the Government so long, that he should not be provided for.

Mr. BLAKE. He will be.

Mr. MITCHELL. No doubt.

Committee rose and reported.

CROWN CASES RESERVED.

Mr. THOMPSON moved the second reading of Bill (No. 126) to amend the law respecting Crown cases reserved. He said: As I explained the other day, the Speedy Trials Acts are applicable to Quebec, Ontario and Manitoba, and in 1875 an Act was passed enabling the judge in Ontario who administers that law to state a question for the opinion of the justices of the superior courts who have jurisdiction in Crown cases reserved. An application has been made by some members of the judiciary of Quebec asking that the same power be extended to that Province, and the proposal in the Bill is that—

"Any judge, within the meaning of the Speedy Trials Act, trying any person under such Acts, may, in his discretion, reserve any question of law arising on such trial for the consideration of the justices of the court having, within the Province in which such trial takes place, jurisdiction to hear Crown cases reserved."

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. WELDON. Is it intended to extend that to the Lower Provinces?

Mr. THOMPSON. I have not considered that question.

Mr. WELDON. I think the practice should be uniform in the different Provinces.

Committee rose and reported.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICIATURE FOR THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. THOMPSON moved that the House resolve itself into committee to consider certain proposed resolutions (page 1015) respecting the appointment of judges in the North-West Territories. He said: One of the objects of the present measure is to establish a Supreme Court for the North-West Territories by organising the present judges in the Territories, who are called stipendiary magistrates, into a court of appeal. Power is proposed to be taken to appoint an additional judge for the Territories. Representations have been made, partly on account of the growth of business in the Territories, and partly on account of the great distances these judges have to travel, it would be desirable to appoint an additional judge. We propose to fix the salaries at $4,000, and to provide that the travelling fees shall be such as shall be fixed by the Governor in Council. As the House is aware, the salary at present allowed is $3,000 per annum. There is in addition to that an allowance of $1,000 to each judge for travelling expenses, and a further allowance to nearly all the judges of a sum in lieu of house rent. Mr. Rouleau was in occupation of a house which was erected at the public expense, and which was destroyed in the troubles of last spring, but the other judges were allowed $500 each in lieu of house rent, except Mr. Travis, who was made no allowance, though he claims he should have it made him in order to put him on an equality with the other judges. So that, while we are establishing the salaries permanently at $4,000 per annum, we are really making no substantial increase of the expenditure in connection with the judiciary of that country. So far as the emoluments allowed to the judges are concerned, it will be provided in the Bill that these officers shall hold no other office of emolument. Then it is proposed in these resolutions to enable the Governor in Council to divide the Territories into five judicial districts,and to appoint for each a sheriff and a clerk of the court. At present, there is but one sheriff for the North-West Territories, with deputies in each of the districts, and the emoluments allowed to that officer at present are equal to the expenditure which will be necessary to carry out this resolution. The officer receives $1,200 per annum, and an allowance of $800 per annum for travelling expenses, making $2,000 in all, and we propose that the sheriffs shall receive $500 each for their services, as a salary from the Government, and such fees as the Lieutenant Governor prescribes. When I said it made no increase, I was speaking as far as the present four districts are concerned. We propose to increase the number, and therefore there will be an addition to the expenditure in consequence. The clerks are at present appointed and dismissed by the judges, and it is proposed that they shall be appointed, like the other officers in the Territories, by the Governor in Council, and that they shall be paid by fees to be fixed in like manner to those of the sheriffs, and shall depend upon those for their emoluments.

Motion agreed to, and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On resolution 1,

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman says representations have been made as to the necessity of another judge. Would the hon. gentleman state where is to be the headquarters of the fifth judge?

Mr. THOMPSON. That will depend, to a great extent, on the division of the districts.

Mr. BLAKE. From what quarter do the representations come as to the necessity.

Mr. THOMPSON. Specially from Alberta.

Mr. BLAKE. The intention is to repeal the law under which the stipendiary magistrates hold office. Is it the intention to reappoint these four gentlemen as judges?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. Is it the intention that they should hold office during good behavior?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE, Well, there may be a good deal to be said as to the propriety in all cases of appointing gentlemen who at present occupy benches as the permanent judges,holding their tenure during good behavior, which I quite agree is the proper tenure for a judge, and I think that subject ought to be considered to some extent. The hon. gentleman said something about appellate jurisdiction. Is it the idea that each of these judges will have separate jurisdiction, and that they will combine for a court of appeal?

Mr. THOMPSON. It is proposed to provide in the Bill that justice shall be administered by a Supreme Court in the North-West; that each of the judges, within his district, shall exercise the power of that court and that the court shall sit at certain periods for the despatch of appellate business.

Mr. WELDON. Where would the Supreme Court Appellate sit?

Mr. THOMPSON. At the seat of Government. The Bill states further on that the court shall sit in banco at the seat of Government in the Territories.

Mr. BLAKE. I entirely approve of the general spirit of the proposition that the people of the Territories should have, as one of the prime necessaries of good government, a supply of the best judicial power that we can give them. My own impression is that it is extremely difficult to forecast where the centres of population may be, and where the wants of the judicial power may most be found, to such an extent as to render it impossible to organise a very rigorous system there. I think we ought to keep our hands as free as possible, and to a certain extent await events. The proposal of the hon. gentleman is one which involves a very considerable expense for a very small population, but for my part I do not grudge any expense which may be necessary in order that the people of the Territories may have justice. I think, however, that the Government had better very fully consider before they decide how they will fill these offices, having regard to the existing tenure of office of the judges, of persons who now occupy these stations, before they give them permanent appointments.

Mr. THOMPSON. I meant to say that it is not intended by this Act necessarily to supersede persons who are now holding these offices, but I do not wish it to be understood that it would be the policy of the Government that these persons shall necessarily be appointed. In respect to one of the magistrates, as I stated to the House a short time ago, an investigation is now proceeding.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course, it is necessarily involved in the Bill that their present functions cease, because the hon. gentleman proposes to repeal the law which gives them an existence; therefore, they will cease to be stipendiary magistrates. He proposes to create a new office, and the question is, who shall fill that office? I suppose, therefore, that we are to understand that it does not necessarily follow that they will not be appointed to the new office, and there is a certain probability that some of them will be appointed to the new offices. For my part, I must confess that before some of these gentlemen are appointed, I think some explanation should be given of their conduct. For my part, I was very much pained to read an account of the course pursued by one of these learned judges upon the occasion of the late outbreak, when, at a time which certainly required a certain amount of ability and staying power on the part of those who occupy the very high position of heads of the judiciary, we find a very sudden flight on the part of that gentleman from a post of danger, and a very effusive telegram announcing his arrival with "God save the Queen," I think, at the end of it, whom I think he would have been much better prepared to save if he had stayed at his post, instead of running away to a post of safety.

On resolution 2,

Mr. MILLS. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that after these parties were made judges of the Supreme Court, they could not be members of the North-West Council.

Mr. THOMPSON. I did not state that.

Mr. BLAKE. But the hon. gentleman did state that they would not be entitled to hold any other office of emolument, therefore, if they are members of the North-West Council, they could not be salaried members as at present.

Mr. THOMPSON. They do not receive salaries at present; one of them does, however, as law clerk of the North-West Council.

Mr. BLAKE. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I think he will find, in the last Public Accounts, that more than one received salaries as members of the North-West Council. I think he will find Judge Richardson's name as a member of the North-West Council, as well as law adviser.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think not. But it is not material to the present enquiry.

Mr. BLAKE. Then there is to be no allowance for house rent, as I understand. The hon. gentleman made a statement, which did not coincide with my recollection of the Public Accounts, that there was an allowance for house rent for all of them, with the exception of Judge Rouleau, who had a house. That would make allowances received by Judge Richardson and Judge McLeod. I do not remember the latter's name appearing as a recipient of an allowance for house rent. In what quarter was he stationed?

Mr. THOMPSON. At Fort Macleod.

Mr. BLAKE. Did he not live in the public buildings?

Mr. THOMPSON. No; he received an allowance of $500.

Mr. BLAKE. The arrangement is to be that there will be no such allowances made, but there will be travelling allowances, of course? Is there any proposition to alter the scale of travelling allowances? I believe it is fixed at $1,000 a year.

Mr. THOMPSON. The present scale is $1,000 a year. I am not at liberty to say that there has been any policy adopted, but it is proposed that the travelling allowances should be the same as in Manitoba, which are, in addition to moving expenses, $5 a day while travelling.

On resolution 3,

Mr. BLAKE. It is understood that there is but one sheriff at present, and he is in receipt of a salary of $1,200 a year and $800 travelling expenses. There will be five sheriffs, each receiving $500 and such fees as the Lieutenant Governor prescribes. Are those fees to be paid out of the public chest?

Mr. THOMPSON. They are to be paid such travelling allowances and fees as are collected from suitors in the Provinces.

Mr. BLAKE. There is certain criminal business to be discharged. For example, we know that the execution of a capital sentence is a very expensive operation. In earlier days it cost I do not know how much to hang an important man there.

Mr. THOMPSON. There will be of necessity some expense in connection with the administration of criminal justice, but the allowance will be as nearly as possible the actual expenditure.

Resolutions reported.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 124) respecting experimental farm stations.—(Mr. Carling).

Mr. MILLS.

INLAND REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved the second reading of Bill (No. 101) in amendment of the Consolidated Inland Revenue Act, 1883, and the Act amending the same.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 7,

Mr. COSTIGAN. I move to strike out the words "each case of removal or delivery" in the fourth line, to meet some objections which were raised by hon. gentlemen.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 8,

Mr. COSTIGAN. I move to add the following words at the end of the section "provided no increase of duties shall accrue therefrom.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 12,

Mr. COSTIGAN. The following clauses were introduced when it was thought necessary that my Department should take steps with regard to oleomargarine and other substitutes for butter. I therefore propose to strike out the remaining clauses.

Mr. DAVIES. Does the hon. gentleman propose to prohibit the manufacture?

Mr. COSTIGAN. That will be dealt with by another measure.

Mr. DAVIES. Which the hon. gentleman intends to bring in this Session?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I had framed an amendment to prohibit the manufacture of these articles, but I understand the Minister intends to introduce a prohibitory Act.

Mr. COSTIGAN. No I did not say that I intended to introduce such a measure. I said that question would be dealt with by another measure, and then the hon. member for Queen's asked me if it would be brought in during this Session, and I said we proposed to deal with it during the Session.

Mr. MILLS. The striking out of these clauses will not prohibit the manufacture of oleomargarine in the country. It will leave every person free to manufacture as if the hon. gentleman had proposed nothing, but I think it is due to the House that the hon. gentleman should inform us what his intentions are. We know that some time ago the hon. gentleman proposed to put a tax on the importation of the article and an Excise duty on the article manufactured in the country. Now the policy of the Government, owing to the pressure from this side, has been changed, and there is to be an absolute prohibition instead of taxation. We are anxious to know whether the hon. gentleman and his colleagues propose to deal with the manufacture of the article in Canada in the same way; whether instead of imposing an Excise duty they propose to prohibit the manufacture. He has given us no information on this subject, and as it is late in the Session and as we are not anxious to protract it beyond what is absolutely necessary, it is important that the hon. gentleman should avail himself of this opportunity and communicate the intentions of the Government to the House. The House were invited by the Government to consider the question. The Government have struck out the clauses of the Bill dealing with this particular subject, and, having done so, I think it only respectful to the House to say what they intend to do. The hon. gentleman says it may be dealt with by another Bill.

Mr. COSTIGAN. It will be.

Mr. MILLS. And this Session?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes.

Mr. MILLS. Then the hon. gentleman should say whether it is to be a regulative or a prohibitory measure.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I understood that the Minister of Customs, at the last sitting of the House, stated that it is the intention of the Government during this Session to submit to the House resolutions to have the effect of prohibiting the manufacture of oleomargarine and butterine. Of course, the importation was also referred to at the same time.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It was not so stated by the Minister of Customs or the Minister of Inland Revenue. If the Minister of Public Works had not made the statement he has just made, I had intended to move an amendment, and I do not know that it would be improper that we should now adopt such an amendment and affirm the principle instead of striking out these clauses by adding the following to section 12:—

"The manufacture within the Dominion of Canada of oleomargarine, butterine and other substitutes for butter, is hereby prohibited."

Mr. COSTIGAN. I do not think a resolution of that kind should be adopted when we are dealing with the Bill now before the committee. The very fact that the clauses dealing with the re-manufacture of that article in the country are to be struck out, is a proof that the manufacture is not intended to be allowed in the country; and I do not think the hon. gentleman should go so far as to press the resolution, before it has been decided in what particular way the Government shall carry out the prohibition once they have announced their intention to do so. I think the House will be willing to leave the matter in the hands of the Government.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Yes, on the statement of the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. BOWELL. I am somewhat surprised at the statements made by the hon. member for Brant. I certainly stated last night, as plainly and clearly as I could, that this question would be dealt with to the satisfaction of the House. I stated that, immediately after the remarks of the hon. member for Leeds, in which he advocated the total prohibition of both the manufacture and importation of this article. I went further, and said that when the Government proposed to impose a duty of 10 cents on the imported article, and 8 cents on the manufactured article, they considered that that would be tantamount to prohibition. I think I was sufficiently explicit, and I am very glad my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works has been still more explicit, if that were necessary. It certainly must be amusing to those who listened to the first debate on this question to hear the remarks made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), who certainly took exception to interference with trade in matters of this kind, and who ably assisted my hon. friend from Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor), when he made one of his most effective speeches on this question. On any question before the House, no one can misapprehend what that hon. gentleman says or means; he generally speaks straight to the point, and I certainly understood the hon. member for Bothwell to approve of the remarks made by my free trade friend, not only in theory, but, perhaps, I might add in practice also. To hear him tell us now that we have been obliged to accede to the demands of the hon. gentlemen on that side of the House, I think was, not to be disrespectful, somewhat cool.

Mr. MILLS. If the hon. gentleman looks at what I said on that occasion, he will find nothing in consonance with the observations he makes now. I advocated prohibition in this case but I do not think I said anything inconsistent with the principles of free trade. The question before us has no connection with the freedom or the bondage of trade. It is a question with regard to a certain police regulation. The hon. gentleman knows that the objection to the production of oleomargarine has been based on the theory of the public health. Our laws relating to the adulteration of food do not touch the question of the freedom of trade; they simply relate to the protection of the public health. It is on that ground that our proposed policy with reference to this article is based, and not on the theory of free trade or the theory of restricted trade.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). If the hon. Minister of Customs or the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue had made a statement as explicit as that of the hon. Minister of Public Works, I should, of course, have received it with the same credence; but I maintain that neither of those gentlemen made so explicit a statement. The hon. Minister has repeated the words he used last night, that he thought the hon. member for Leeds would find that the Government would take a course which would likely meet his views; but the conflicting part of his remarks was what he has alluded to, that the Government thought they would accomplish prohibition by the imposition of the Excise duty. The House were likely to infer that their proposal might be to increase the duty from 8 cents to 50 cents a pound; but as I pointed out, it could not be accomplished in that way, because if they increased the duty to even $1 a pound, the article might still be manufactured and exported to a foreign country, because the duty in that case would not be paid. The Minister of Public Works, however, has spoken plainly and clearly, and his announcement is quite satisfactory.

Committee rose and reported, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the second reading of Bill (No. 115) respecting the representation of the North-West Territories in the Parliament of Canada. He said: I mentioned, when I introduced this Bill, that its purpose was to give representation to the North-West Territories. It is proposed that Assiniboia, having the largest population, should have two members, and Alberta and Saskatchewan each one. The population would scarcely allow of so many members, but, although the settlers are very few in number, the country is large and has many different interests requiring different legislative measures, and, following the example set by giving representation to the Province of Manitoba, many years ago, when it had a very slight population, we propose to give those districts the representation I have mentioned. Under the Act giving power to the Dominion Parliament to make Provinces out of Territories, while we have the power to create Provinces and give them representation, we have not the power—in the absence of any statement, at all events—to give representation in the Dominion Parliament to Territories before they are established Provinces. There was passed, therefore, a resolution for an address to Her Majesty, praying that she should be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the Imperial Parliament granting us that additional power, and no doubt it will be granted. As to the nature of our recommendation, it should be seen that the Imperial Parliament did not pass an Act otherwise than for that special purpose, and I would mention to the House the suggestion I made of a Bill which might properly be submitted for that purpose to the Imperial Parliament:

"Be it enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords, Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same as follows:—The Parliament of Canada may, from time to time, make provision for the representation in the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, of any Territories forming, for the time being, part of the Dominion of Canada, but not included in any Province thereof.—Those are the words of the address already passed by this House—

"Any Act passed by the Parliament of Canada before the passing of this Act for the purpose mentioned in the next preceding section shall be and shall be deemed to have been valid and effectual from the date at which it received the assent, in Her Majesty's name, of the Governor General of Canada."

That is the sole content of the measure suggested to Her Majesty's Government. Several clauses of the Bill have been carefully prepared by the law clerk and assistant law clerk, for the purpose of applying, as far as possible, the elective system which obtains in the rest of the Dominion, with respect to the franchise and the mode of holding elections there. The Bill adopts the system which obtains there now for the election of the North-West Council. They, of course, know the circumstances of the country better than we possibly can, and have prepared the measure under which they now work, and which seems to work satisfactorily for representation in the North-West Council, which, I hope, will soon become a Legislative Assembly. I think they have 16 members elected, and as soon as they have 21, under the Bill of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), each nominative officer will drop out, and there will be an elective Assembly like the other Provincial Assemblies.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I must say that the hon. gentleman's explanations have neither been very full nor very clear. The only thing he has made clear is that it is proposed to add four members to the representation in this House. To that proposition nobody has any objection. I have very strongly advocated it in the past, and I am in favor of it now. For the last three years I have been constantly pressing on the attention of the Government the necessity of granting to the people of the North-West Territories, in the interest of the peace and harmony, the progress and prosperity that ought to prevail there, representation in this Parliament. I urged these views in the House, on more than one occasion, on the attention of Parliament, as best I could, and I pressed this question on the attention of the Government in every way known to the practice and the law of Parliament. I pointed out, on more than one occasion, to the Government the fact that the people of the North-West Territories, the representative bodies in the Territories, the press published in the Territories, and the leading men of the Territories, were pressing upon the Government, for two or three years, the absolute necessity of granting them representation in the Parliament of Canada, and I pointed out to the Government, two years ago, on different occasions, the absolute necessity of yielding to what I considered the fair and reasonable demand of the people of the North-West Territories. I say that for three years, on this side of the House, we pleaded with the Government, and, I regret, pleaded in vain, to grant to the North-West Territories representation in this Parliament. I pointed out the serious consequences that would be likely to ensue if this reasonable demand of the people was not acceded to; I pointed out that dissatisfaction and discontent prevailed to a large extent in the North-West Territories, that they had no representation on the floor of Parliament to express their views, formulate their complaints, and ask redress for the wrongs under which they contended they were suffering. On the 2nd March, 1884, I introduced a Bill to grant representation to the people of the North-West Territories. I then discussed the principle of the Bill, I discussed some of the details of the proposition I then submitted to the House, I asked the Government to deal with the matter in the interest of that peace and harmony which ought to prevail, and of the justice that should be dealt out by this Parliament to our fellow subjects in the North-West

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Territories. How was that proposition met? Was it met, as it ought to have been, by hon. gentlemen opposite in a spirit of fair play and an earnest desire to do right and justice to the people? No, it was not. The hon. gentleman who led the House answered, in his own peculiar style, my speech, and he is reported in the Hansard for 1884, at page 602, to have met the demands of the people of the North-West Territories for representation in this Parliament, in the following language:—

"It can answer no good purpose to discuss this subject until we see the hon. gentleman's Bill. Of course, we grant him the usual courtesy of introducing it, though from its terms, as the hon. gentleman substantially states, it is a measure which must be under the guidance of the Government of the day. However, when the Bill is introduced we will see what its provisions are. I merely wish to add, Mr. Speaker, and call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to this—we do not know that it is in the Bill or not—but from the remarks of the hon. gentleman it is quite clear that he intends to be the next Minister of the Interior. He says he is strongly in favor of the Minister of the Interior living up there. Now, my hon. friend has made large investments in the North-West, and I am glad to learn, proper investments, and it is therefore quite clear that my hon. friend is going to live there. We must therefore consider this measure of his as an insidious attempt to take possession of the ground, and to cut out any of the hon. gentlemen opposite from the chance of being the next Minister of the Interior. I hope he will be as fortunate as any of my hon. friends on the other side. I wish him all prosperity when he is there. In the meantime we will consider my hon. friend's Bill."

I submitted seriously a proposition of the first possible importance to the Parliament of Canada, pointing out the necessity for making provision for the representation of the people of the North-West Territories in this Parliament, and the only answer I received, was the bantering answer I have just read, from the First Minister. That was not all that was done during that Session. On going into Supply, I moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole to consider the grievances of the people of the North-West Territories, and Manitoba. On that occasion, I pointed out again the necessity for this representation. I specially drew the attention of the Government to it. I think I quoted a minute of the North-West Council. I referred to public meetings that had been convened for the purpose of considering this question, and to remonstrances that were made to the Government by the people of the North-West Territories, but I failed to move the Government in the matter. The matter ended, for 1884, with that resolution, which, of course, was voted down. In the Session of 1885, I again introduced a Bill for the representation of the Territories in this Parliament. The House met, I think, on the 29th January, and on the 17th February I presented my Bill. On the 11th March, I moved the second reading, and I then took occasion to discuss at length the principle of the Bill and many of its details. The Government had then had twelve months to consider the whole question. The Government were perfectly aware, as we all were, of the uneasy, dissatisfied and discontented condition of the people in the North-West Territories, and their persistent demands for representation in this Parliament. A large portion of this discontent would, I believe, have been allayed by the granting of representation in this Parliament, where the representatives from the North-West Territories, conversant with the wants, the necessities, the claims and the demands of the people of the North-West Territories, would have had an opportunity of expressing their views. How did the Government act upon that occasion? Did they, as sensible, reasonable men ought to have acted, deal promptly with the matter that they must have known at no very distant day would become an absolute necessity? No, they did not so deal with the matter. The hon. the Minister of Public Works, who then led the House, in reply to my remarks upon that occasion, made use of the following language, which will be found in the Hansard of 1885, page 495:—

"I would have wished that the hon. gentleman, when he introduced this Bill, had favored us with the remarks which he has made this evening, as I would have then been prepared to answer the able argument he has just made. Under these circumstances, this being an important measure, I would beg to postpone my remarks to another day, and beg, therefore, to move that the debate be now adjourned."

When that motion was made, it was quite manifest, in the condition of public business then, that it was impossible to reach the discussion of this Bill during the Session of 1885, and so the propositions contained in my Bill were not disposed of by the Government. They expressed no opinion upon the question. They did not hold out the least hope to the people of the North-West Territories, that the Government of Canada were prepared to accede to their demands. Later on in that Session, and after fuller and more careful investigation of the whole question, the whole position, the mode in which this representation could be granted, I came to the conclusion that others came to, that the Parliament of Canada had no power by Bill to grant representation to the Territories. The object of my Bills of 1884 and 1885 was simply to draw the attention of the Government to this important question. I had doubts then, and these doubts were subsequently removed, as to the power of the Canadian Parliament to deal with the matter by Bill; but my main object was to draw the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to the necessity, the absolute necessity, of granting this representation, and granting it promptly. Now it is quite clear, I think, it is admitted now, that the power to grant representation to the Territories is not vested in the Parliament of Canada by the Union Act, or by the Act of 1871 amending the Union Act. The first section of the Act of 1871, which gave the Parliament of Canada the power to grant representation to a Province carved out of a Territory, is in the words following:—

"The Parliament of Canada may, from time to time, establish new Provinces in any Territories forming, for the time being, part of the Dominion of Canada, but not included in any Province thereof, and may, at the time of such establishment, make provision for the constitution and administration of any such Province, and for the passing of laws for the peace, order and good government of such Province, and for its representation in the said Parliament."

But there is no provision in that Statute enabling the Parliament of Canada to grant representation to a Territory, and so, with these difficulties staring me in the face, and staring the Parliament of Canada in the face, and yet with the absolute necessity of granting this representation to the people of the North-West Territories thoroughly impressed on my own mind, on the 15th July, 1885, I moved, on going into Supply, the following resolution:—

"To leave out all the words after 'that,' and insert the following instead thereof: 'It is expedient, that at the earliest moment, provision should be made for the representation of the North-West Territories in the Parliament of Canada, in such manner as shall to that Parliament seem expedient; that it is doubtful whether the Parliament of Canada has power to provide for such representation, so long as the said Territories are not formed into Provinces, or otherwise than in the hitherto accustomed method; that, unless Imperial legislation is obtained, additional delays may take place in the granting of such representation; that it is expedient to address Her Majesty the Queen, praying that she may be pleased to move the Parliament of the United Kingdom to pass such legislation as may remove the doubts as to the Parliament of Canada to provide for such representation."

The Minister of Public Works, who then led the House, declared in his place in Parliament that this motion was premature, that I was proceeding entirely too rapidly, that we ought to wait until the census of the people of the North-West Territories was taken, and then it would be time enough to ask the Imperial Parliament to vest in the Parliament of Canada the power to grant representation to those people. Now we observe that the First Minister is doing to-day what I asked the Government to do twelve months ago, and which if the Government had done twelve months ago, the hon. gentlemen would not now be occupying the humiliating position they do occupy of asking the Parliament of Canada to pass a Bill to grant representation to the people of the North-West Territories in this Parliament which they have no power to do. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that the Bill he is asking the assent of Parliament to is not worth the paper it is written on. He knows that this Parliament has no power to grant representation to the Territories, and the hon. gentleman is asking the assent of Parliament to this Bill in the expectation and in the hope that the Imperial Parliament will sanction or confirm or affirm this illegal legislation which he is now proposing. But, although the hon. gentleman has put the cart before the horse, although he is passing his Bill before he has the power to pass it, although he is depending entirely for the validity of this legislation upon the good will and sanction of the Imperial Parliament, still the Bill is before Parliament. The Bill is here, and we are now asked to sanction it. After reading over the Bill and examining its principles with some care, I must confess that I am a little amazed at the Bill itself—not at the provision granting representation, but at other provisions which the hon. gentleman has introduced. Now, Sir, we who have some knowledge of hon. gentlemen opposite, of how they gained and retained their places in Parliament and upon the Treasury benches in the past, have not much reason to hope that, when the reprsentation of the people in Parliament was to be added to, fair play and justice would be meted out to the electors. It looks marvellously like as if the rights of the people had to yield to the necessities of the party, and I think I can show you that such is the case in a moment or two. This Bill is entitled "A Bill with respect to the representation of the North-West Territories in the Parliament of Canada." I say that is a mistake; whoever drew up this Bill, whether it was the law clerk or a Minister, commits an entire mistake. This is not a Bill to grant representation to the people of the North-West Territories in the Parliament of Canada, it is a Bill to enable the Government of Canada to appoint four members to the Parliament of Canada to support the Government. That is the object of the Bill. It is a Bill to destroy the representation of the people in Parliament; it is a Bill that will take away from every honest voter the power and right to vote; it is a Bill to enable an individual called an enumerator to send to Parliament four members to support this Administration. Now let me consider some of the principles upon which this Bill is based. First, as to the qualifications of the voters, you will find in section 4:

"The persons qualified to vote at the election of such members shall be the bonâ fide male residents and householders of adult age who are not aliens or Indians, within the electoral district for at least twelve months immediately preceding the writ of election."

Here you will observe that the right to vote is limited to those who are male residents and householders of the Territory. Both conditions must exist, being a householder and being a resident. That is a different franchise to any that prevails in any other Province. A man may be a resident landholder in the Territories, yet if he is not a householder he cannot vote under this Bill. A man may own and pay taxes upon 20,000 acres in the North-West Territories, yet if he is not a householder, although he may live there, he is deprived of the franchise by this Bill. A man may have a house worth $10,000 in the North-West Territories, but if he is not a permanent resident there, he cannot vote. He cannot go from Manitoba or elsewhere and vote there, although he may have a house worth $10,000; he must be a resident householder before he is entitled to vote. Now, I say there are hundreds of men in the North-West Territories who have a freehold, who have valuable properties, yet who are disfranchised under this Bill. I say that is not fair to the people of the North-West Territories. Then you will find another objectionable principle in this Bill, in section 28, referring to the mode in which the voters' lists are to be prepared. Now, I look upon that as one of the most important things that exists with respect to representation. It is known that during the last Session of Parliament an Act was passed appointing a revising officer to prepare the voters' lists in the older Provinces. Where the revising officer is a barrister, but not a judge, there is an appeal from his decision, but where he is a judge, there is no appeal; and it was argued with some appearance of fairness that the judges in all cases would do right. Whether they have done so or not, I am not going now to discuss. But under this Bill the Government undertake to appoint an individual who will discharge the duty of preparing the voters' list. Section 28 provides:

"The Governor General may appoint enumerators to make lists of the electors in the electoral districts; and if such appointments have not been made, the returning officer conjointly with any two justices of the peace, or with one justice of the peace and a notary public, or with any one of the residents in or near the electoral district and two electors of such district, neither of the number being a candidate, shall appoint under their hand a competent and reliable person to be enumerator for anyone or more polling divisions of such districts; and the returning officer shall see that no polling division is omitted to be included."

You will see that the Bill provides for the appointment by the Government of an enumerator whose business it is to prepare the voters' lists. Section 29 provides:

"Each such enumerator, immediately after the nomination day, if a poll is granted, shall carefully compile a list of the persons qualified as electors to vote at the election then pending, for the polling division, or each of the polling divisions, for which he has been appointed; and he shall make three plainly written copies of the same with the names of the voters alphabetically arranged, giving the occupation and residence of each voter, in the form J in the schedule to the Act."

Now, Sir, under the Franchise Act of 1885, the revising officer was the machine by which the Government intended to capture the constituencies one year afterwards, and under this Bill the enumerator is the officer which the hon. gentleman has selected for the same purpose. It is perfectly clear that the revising officer, and the machinery employed under the Bill of last year, is found to be cumbersome, and expensive, even to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House; and so, under the present Bill, instead of a revising officer, the hon. gentleman selects an enumerator to discharge the duty of preparing the lists in the North-West Territories. Now, looking at the clauses of the Bill, I must confess that I rather admire the plainness, and the simplicity of the machinery adopted by the First Minister for the purpose of attaining the object that he has evidently in view. There is no mystery about it, it is open, it is above board. It does not possess the merit of originality, because this Parliament has more than once seated a gentleman without the formality of receiving a majority of the votes of the electors. This proposition, however, has the merit of effecting the purpose for which it was designed. The Government appoints the enumerator, and the enumerator prepares the voters' lists, in other words, the Government, through the enumerator, appoint the member. The canvassing by the candidate, the nomination and the polling, are wholly superfluous. They serve no purpose, they waste time, they involve expense for no practical purpose, and that you will see clearly by referring to section 31:

"If any enumerator, at any time after posting up any voters' lists and before the polling day, is fully satisfied, from representations made to him by any credible persons, that the name of any qualified voter has been omitted from the voters' list of the polling division to which such voters belong, he shall add such name to the copy of the list in his possession below his own signature and shall attest such addition by his signature. If the enumerator, in like manner, is fully satisfied that there is on the list the name of any person who is not qualified as a voter in such polling division, he may draw erasing lines through such name and write his own initials opposite thereto in the column for "remarks;" and if the enumerator finds the occupation, addition or residence of any voter to be inaccurately stated in the list, he may make the necessary alteration and affix his initials thereto in like manner."

You will see, Mr. Speaker, at once the simplicity of the machinery provided by this Bill for the purpose intended. The Government appoints the enumerator, the enumerator prepares the voters' list; in other words, he elects the candidate. Under section 29, he cannot take the first step towards the preparation of the voters' list until after the nomination of candidates. The moment the nomination takes place he must set to work and prepare the voters' list. After having prepared the list, under section 33, if any person represents to the enumerator that there are names on the voters' list, 10, 20, 50 or 100 names, which should not be there, the simple formality of drawing what is called an erasing line through the names is gone through and the names disappear. There is no notice given, no evidence taken, no trial, no formality whatever, the names disappear. This is a proposal to place the sole, the supreme, the absolute, the unlimited power in the hands of the enumerator to do what he likes, when he likes, how he likes. Under the same section if it should turn out that any person informs the enumerator that two, ten, fifty, or 100 names, or 500 names ought to be upon the list that are not on the list, the enumerator does not hold any investigation, does not give any notice or take any evidence, but he simply places them on the list as a matter of course, especially if doing so would help the Conservative candidate. Here is an official appointed by the Government, and, of course, he is a friend of the Government, and desires to do all he can to benefit them, and help to secure the object the Government has in view, who is vested with power by this Bill that enables him, without notice to those affected by it, to manipulate the voters' list as he sees fit. If it should appear that there is a majority of Liberals on the voters' list, all some Conservative has to do is to tell the enumerator that certain names should not be on, and the enumerator is clothed with absolute power to strike every one of the names off the list. If it should turn out that forty or fifty or 100 or 200 names are required to be added to the voters' list, in order to effect the purpose in view, and make the election of a Conservative beyond all doubt, all any Conservative has to do is to tell the enumerator that those names should be on the voters' list and he can place them on it. That is an extraordinary provision of the law. I care not whether it is the law respecting the election of members to the North-West Council or not; I say no enumerator or officer of the Government should be vested with such wholesale and unlimited power as this enumerator has under the provisions of this Bill. Why, under this Bill all the securities, the safeguards that men usually have for the protection of their rights and property are absolutely swept away. The right a man has of voting, which is a right dear to every British subject, the right of the people to send representatives to the Parliament of Canada to represent the majority of the electors of a constituency, is under this Bill treated as a relic of a past age, the safeguards are all gone. An enumerator has the power vested in himself under section 33 to select, nominate and appoint and send to this Parliament just whom he pleases. That is not all. One would naturally imagine that under the provisions of this Bill, already referred to, the power would be unlimited enough to effect the purpose intended, but there are still further powers given to this enumerator. Under the provisions of this Bill, as I have explained, the enumerator cannot take the first step until the nomination, and he is bound between that time and polling, to prepare the voters' list. The provisions of the Bill go a little further. As I have said one would naturally imagine, under those provisions of the Bill to which I have referred, that ample power was given to the revising officer to effect the work intended to be done; but still there might be a bare possibility that the enumerator had not satisfactorily completed his work between nomination and polling day, and so, under another section, the enumerator is given power up to eight o'clock on the morning of polling day to add to or take from the voters' list just such names as the enumerator might see fit, and this also without notice, evidence or trial. That is a power no Minister should ask Parliament to sanction. But that is not all. Under another section another officer, called the deputy returning officer, is vested with equally unlimited power. If the enumerator does not do his duty, if he does not do it so as to satisfy the Conservative candidate, the deputy returning officer is placed in a position where he can supplement anything which the enumerator had omitted. And so under section 44 of the Bill the deputy returning officer can record the votes of men whose names are not on the voters' list, whose names were not there, and whose names had never been put on it. So those two officials have thus unlimited power to return to this Parliament four representatives, and return such only as will support the Government. There are other objectionable features in this Bill, but I do not propose to discuss them until the Bill is in committee. So far as I am concerned I may say that I rose, from the examination and consideration of the provisions of the Bill, thoroughly impressed with this conviction, that hon. gentlemen opposite have now arrived at a point when they do not find it necessary to conceal the object they have in view in ambiguous language, for it is put in the plainest language that their object is not to grant representation to the people of the North-West, but to send from the North-West Territories four men apppointed by the enumerator and the deputy returning officer to support this Government. I say again that, in so far as I am personally concerned, I am strongly in favor of the representation of the Territories. I believe they should have had it years ago. I believe now we should give them representation, and give it to them promptly. I am in favor, therefore, of granting them representation; but I am not in favor of putting it in the power of an enumerator, an official appointed by this or any Government, to nominate exactly whom he likes and send to this Parliament exactly who he likes, and under this Bill that power is undoubtedly placed in his hands. I am now and I always have been in favor of representation being granted to the people of the North-West Territories, but I want it granted to the people and not to an enumerator appointed by this or any other Government; and unless the hon. gentleman sees fit to amend this provision of the Bill, so far as my humble ability goes, I shall oppose these objectionable portions of the Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman says we have introduced a Bill which is only waste paper. A little while before that he stated he had introduced a Bill, and I do not think there was any greater validity in his Bill than the one we have now before us. The hon. gentleman, after making that simple remark—I do not mean it satirically—that mere remark, attacked the qualification of voters. Well, they have got a qualification for voters up there now. They have a qualification for election to the Council. The qualification in the Bill is the same that enables the people to vote for a councillor to sit in the legislative body of the North-West Territories, and that clause was, after full consideration, inserted in the Act of 1875 by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). This is his clause copied word for word. In the Statute 38 Vic., chap. 49, passed in 1875, the hon. gentleman will see that this is the clause:

"The persons qualified to vote at such elections shall be the bonâ fide male residents and householders of adult age, not being aliens, or unenfranchised Indians, within the electoral district, and shall have respectively resided in such electoral district for at least twelve months immediately preceding the issue of the writ."

That was introduced when electoral institutions were to be provided for the North-West. That was the Bill introduced by the late Government, and I have in this case simply followed the precedent which was set then, and have provided in this Bill for the qualification which has existed ever since. This Bill of 1875 was consolidated and amended in 1880, and the same clause was continued by the Government of which I was a member. I did not find then that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) or the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) made any objection to this clause, and I have not heard from any portion of the North-West any objection to this qualification, or any expression of a desire for the extension, the limitation or the alteration of it in any way whatever. I think perhaps the hon. gentleman was not aware of the fact when he made that statement; I am sure he was not, or he would not have so attacked the franchise. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will say on recollection—I dare say he will, that he was aware of it.

Mr. MILLS. Order.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am not out of order. Now that it is recalled to his recollection he will say so. But I do not think there is any change between 1875 and 1880, and between 1880 and 1886. Then the hon. gentleman objects to the mode of election. Well, if the hon. gentleman will look at the note at the head of the Bill and at the references at the end of each clause, he will find that these clauses were prepared by the Local Assembly or Council. They, living on the spot, knowing the difficulties of collecting the suffrages of a people scattered over an enormous territory, they themselves, of their own mere motion, from the knowledge they acquired of the difficulties, and for the purpose of giving an opportunity to every man having a vote, they have provided this rough and ready way of doing it. There was no means of preparing voters' lists; there was no means of introducing the complicated machinery that exists, the perfect machinery, the organisation which exists in the other Provinces, so they themselves have provided this system, and in order to prevent any man from losing his vote they provided in a very unscientific way—it does not suit the ideas of the hon. gentleman—they provided a means by which a man, who may have to travel several hundred miles to vote, can come on the morning of the election and say to the deputy returning officer, "Here, I want my vote put in." This is their own system, adapted to their own circumstances, and until the circumstances change, until they have become an older settled population, until they have become Provinces, I had the humility to think they were much better judges of the best means of getting the suffrage and polling the votes of all the people in the North-West Territories than we were here, and that we would be defeating the great object they had in the drafting of their election ordinances, we would be defeating all we desired to have, if we laid down machinery which would prevent one-quarter of the votes being brought out. These people would not take the trouble of travelling 200, 300 or 500 miles for the purpose of having their names entered on the voters' list. The adoption of a system at all equivalent to the system which obtains in the other Provinces would be simply cutting off fully one-half of the persons who have a right to vote. I hope by-and-bye—I am sure that by-and-bye—when the population gets extended, when the different sections have a better organisation, municipal and otherwise, that by degrees a more complete system will be introduced. Now, these four gentlemen who are to be elected to Parliament will be able on the floor of this House to point out the defects of this law. They will ask for alterations in this law, and I have no doubt that Parliament will alter the law from time to time, according to the representations of these people, and that by degrees, as the country requires it and as they become ready to adopt it, perhaps the present system, the present qualification of electors and the present mode of holding elections in the older Provinces will be adopted.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman's observations are strangely at variance with the observations he addressed to this House twelve months ago, when the Franchise Bill was under discussion. He was then a great stickler for the sacred principles of uniformity.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Not of pedantic uniformity, I said.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman denied altogether that the people, through their representatives in the different

Provinces, were better qualified to judge of the qualification of voters in those Provinces than the hon. gentleman and his colleagues were in this House, and he insisted during last Session that the representatives in this House were better judges as to the qualification of voters in the distant Province of British Colombia, than were those who represented that Province of the Local Legislature. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman lays down a wholly different principle, and he declares that while he could not trust the conclusions reached by the people's representatives in the different Provinces he is quite prepared to trust the conclusion reached by the members of the North-West Council. It must be remembered that a considerable number of the members of that Council are not representative. The hon. gentleman alluded to the steps he had taken at an earlier stage of the Session to give these people representation in this Parliament. He has admitted that this House is not competent to pass such an Act as this unless it is sanctioned and made valid by an Act of the Imperial Parliament. that being so, and the attention of the hon. gentleman having been called to this matter last Session, how is it that he has waited until this Session before inviting the Imperial Parliament to legislate on the subject? The course taken by the hon. gentleman seems to me somewhat extraordinary. We do not trust to the Administration of the day the ordinary matters of legislation; and yet the hon. gentleman without inviting the House to express its opinion as to the character of the legislation required, asks us to ask the Imperial Parliament to legislate on this subject? The hon. gentleman takes a course like that which he took in 1871. It was objected to; and the Government at that time found it necessary to bring down to Parliament specific resolutions, setting forth in exact terms the kind of legislation which was sought at the hands of the Imperial Parliament. The position then taken was that we would not consent to an alteration of our constitution by the Imperial Parliament simply at the instance of the Executive; yet the hon. gentleman now proposes to ask for Imperial legislation, as to the character of which we have very imperfect information. The hon. gentleman spoke two or three years ago about the sacred principle of representation by population; but in the representation of the North-West Territories, he proposes to depart from that radical principle of our constitution. I am not objecting to this, because it was done in the case of Manitoba; but while Parliament might safely give to the people of the Territories a larger representation than they would by population be entitled to in the first instance, it seems to me that Parliament ought not to have the power to increase or vary that representation at any subsequent period. If I understand the clauses which the hon. gentleman has read, the principle of representation by population will not apply to those Territories under this Bill until they become Provinces, and it would be in the power of the Government, after such legislation has been adopted, to double the representation in any one district—in fact, to increase it to an unlimited extent; and if the Government were a weak Government, or expected a small following from the other Provinces, there might be a strong temptation to give to those Territories undue representation, knowing to what an extent they would be dependent on the Administration for the time being. I would like to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fourth clause of the Bill, which I apprehend does not create the qualification he intends. I do not agree with the observations made by my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Cameron) as to the effect of this clause. It says:

"The persons qualified to vote at the election of such members shall be the bonâ fide male residents and householders."

Here are two distinct classes of electors. If the hon. gentleman intents to give the franchise both to residents and householders, the word householders is surplusage, because a man could not be a householder without being a resident. Do I understand the intention of the hon. gentleman is to create two qualifications—that of simple residence, and that of householders?

Sir JOHN A MACDONALD. My intention is to carry out the words of the Statute, which the hon. gentleman has just defined and explained; and I quite agree with him that the hon. gentleman who spoke before him on that side was in error in his construction of this clause.

Mr. MILLS. Then I would call the hon. gentleman's attention to the schedule, which exactly conforms to the construction of my hon. friend. The hon. gentleman must alter either his schedule or the clause. Form No. 1 reads:

"You do swear that you are a bonâ fide male resident and householder within this polling division of this electoral district?"

According to the oath, the elector must be not only a resident, but a householder. But according to this section, it is sufficient if he is one or the other. It is clear that a person who might be a resident, without being a householder, would be entitled to vote under this clause. The hon. gentleman referred to the Statute as mine; he is mistaken. It was carried through in 1875, when my predecessor, Mr. Laird, was in the Government; but I know very well the principles that were before the mind of the party who drew up that Statute. The difficulty was that there were a large number of Americans engaged in trading in the country, and the object was to create a qualification which would exclude a class of persons to whom it was not desirable to extend the franchise. The hon. gentleman has spoken of the difficulties of framing a voters' list; and the very difficulties he has mentioned, and the loose provisions he has made, show that the qualification adopted is not a desirable one, unless the hon. gentleman were to declare that the qualification prescribed and the voters' list prepared for the election of members of the North-West Council shall be the qualification and the voters' list for the election of members to the House of Commons. If the hon. gentleman were to adopt that provision, then all these clauses relating to the preparation of voters' lists by a Government officer would disappear; but if the hon. gentleman is disposed to create a distinct list, I think the only proper qualification is that a man shall be a subject of Her Majesty, shall be twenty one years of age, and shall be a resident of the Territory. We should then have a simple declaration and qualification which would prevent fraud and would enable the young men of the country, the class of men most desirable to secure in that country, to exercise the elective franchise. Certainly, there is no necessary connection between men's interests in the conduct of public affairs and the qualifications which the hon. gentleman proposes; and the very provision which the hon. gentleman has suggested in this Bill, with regard to the preparation of the voters' lists, shows conclusively that it is impossible to form such a list upon this basis, to serve the ordinary purposes of a list. Why, if the hon. gentleman provides that a man may suggest to the officer who prepares the list or the enumerator, that such a party has left the country and his name should be struck out, or that another party is in the country and his name should be put on, up to the last moment, practically you have no list at all. There would be no object served by the list, no restraint upon the admission of parties to the polls who are not qualified, nothing that the enumerator requires which can be a test of a man's qualification when he puts in his appearance at the poll to vote. There is no more restraint on the admission of persons not properly qualified, by any provision the hon. gentleman has made, than there would be did no list exist. The third clause is objectionable and wholly inapplicable to that Territory. I would call the hon.

gentleman's attention to section 18 with regard to the deposit of $200 before a man can become a candidate. Now, whatever may be thought of the use of such a qualification in preventing parties coming forward who have no chance of being elected, in preventing bogus candidates being put into the field in counties in the older Provinces, no such use is likely to exist in the North-West Territories. The hon. gentleman admits the sparsity of the population and the difficulties of the case, and he does this by providing in the 17th section that it is only necessary to obtain the signature of four qualified voters to the nomination paper, while at least twenty-five are required in any one of the older Provinces. He next provides that a deposit of $200 shall be made. It may often occur that persons in tolerably good circumstances in the North-West, living far away from any banking institution, will have difficulty in finding $200 to deposit in an election contest, and the hon. gentleman ought not to insert such a provision. That glorious principle of uniformity for which the hon. gentleman proved such an extraordinary stickler last Session, that he kept the House sitting six months, is abandoned. He admits he cannot adhere to it; he admits that the qualification he has adopted for almost every Province he cannot apply in the North-West Territories, and he has admitted with regard to the nomination paper, that he cannot require the same number of signatures to it as is demanded in the Provinces; he admits the circumstances of the population are different by providing differently for them in the nomination paper; he admits it in the qualification of voters and in the preparation of voters' lists; and I think his proposal to require a deposit of $200 would simply be to declare that nineteen-twentieths—yes, more than that, 99 per cent.—of the population found in any one of these districts shall not be eligible for election, no matter what the other electors may think of their fitness. It is not a desirable condition of things. He feels it is necessary to leave the people, in a large degree, to themselves, to decide who is and who is not qualified to be a candidate; and that being the case, he ought not to insert a disqualifying provision of this sort. Now, the hon. gentleman has justified this appointment of enumerators, and I think it is a most serious objection. He has referred to the fact that a similar provision is made with regard to the elections to the North-West Council, and the preparation of the voters' lists for the North-West Council. But the hon. gentleman must see that the conditions are altogether different. The Government here are 2,000 miles away, and can exercise no power of supervision over their enumerators. They do not know how well or how badly these enumerators discharge their duties; they will not know whether the enumerators have or have not abused the authority with which they are vested. However desirous the Government might be to secure a full and fair representation of the people of those Territories, it will be beyond their power to do so under these circumstances; and I dare say there may be many members in the House who believe that matters would not be much improved if it were in the power of the Government to exercise supervision over the conduct of their officers. I think that the qualification of the voter is not such a one as is required in the North-West Territories; I think that the preparations of the voters' lists are exceedingly defective, and, in many respects, highly objectionable, and I believe that when this Bill comes into committee, radical changes will have to be made in it in all these particulars.

Mr. MULOCK. It is somewhat difficult to discuss section 4, as there appears to be different opinions as to its true meaning. It appears to me, if we read the section as it is drawn and interpreted by the schedule, it is necessary that an elector should be a householder. As the hon. member for Bothwell has stated, that qualification is quite inapplicable to the case of the North-West, and, I think the language of this section has been taken from an old law without reference to altered circumstances and the change in public opinion since the law on which it was based was framed. I do not know how far back we can trace this provision, but by the foot note to the section it appears it is based on Statute 43 Victoria, passed five years ago. It is possible that the language of that Statute was taken from some earlier Statute, before we adopted the principles of manhood suffrage which now prevail—I refer particularly to the farmers' sons vote and the votes of owners of real estate—and had that point been considered when the draftsman had the Bill in hand, it is possible the word "householder" would have been left out. If we look to the condition of the people, we will find in the North-West a great many who are not householders, but who ought to be entitled to vote. A great many young men have gone to the North-West and clubbed together; one owns the house and the others are living with him. Which of that group is to be entitled to vote? They ought all to be equally entitled to vote. The right of the franchise should not be limited to one who happens to be owner of a house. There are great many men who are simply lodgers, but are practically the heads of families, because they individually are the sole members of their respective families, so that I trust the limitation will be removed, and, in discussing this question, I would submit also whether the provision of this section, extending it in the way I indicate, might not, to the advantage of the people, be extended to the older Provinces. When we look at the Franchise Act we passed last Session, we find a most complicated system of qualification, complicated and expensive——

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must confine himself to the North-West Territories.

Mr. MULOCK. I intend to confine myself to the North-West Territories Bill, but I suggest whether, when this Bill is in committee, or at a later stage when we are discussing some other measure, we could not extend this provision, and practically adopt it throughout the whole of the Dominion. I agree with the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) in regard to the deposits. It would be almost impossible to comply with that provision in the North-West, for the Act requires that the deposit should be made in legal tender or in gold. Now, while the candidates may be well worth the necessary amount, it will be practically impossible for them to comply literally with that law. No doubt that matter can be well dealt with in committee, but in regard to the qualification, I think that a great many persons who ought to have a vote will be deprived of a vote unless this clause is amended. In fact, it will limit the franchise so much that giving representation to the North-West will be almost illusory.

Mr. WATSON. I call the attention of the Minister who has charge of this Bill to the qualifications that were extended to the voters in the added territory of the Province of Manitoba in the election of 1882. The qualification was ownership of real property and three months' residence. It appears to me, when that qualification was given to persons who were entitled to vote at the last Dominion election in the western portion of the Province of Manitoba, it would be acceptable to the residents in the Territories. In that part of Manitoba they had no voters' list, and none was asked for.

Mr. ROYAL. In preparing this measure, the Government had either to devise a system of their own to carry out the object of the Bill, without having the facility to consult the opinion of the people in the North-West, or the Government had to take legislation already existing on the Statute-book, and so far not having been opposed in any way by the people interested. I think the Government have done a wise thing in taking the second course, and it will be time enough, when the representatives of the North-West Territories have a seat in this House, for them to place before the House the requirements of their own people in the matter. The Government have taken from the Statute already existing, provisions with regard to the mode of holding the elections. The Government have taken from the old Statute that has been in existence for many years the qualification of the voters. There were elections in the Territories last year in the fall, and in no instance in that country or in their papers was any objection made to this portion of the law regulating the representation and the mode of representation of the north-western people in their own Council, and I believe quite properly so. On the one hand, some hon. members complain that this law is too perfect. In fact, the clause that requires the deposit of $200 is considered, I suppose, the very perfection of our legislation in this matter. The Government have retained that clause, and it is too perfect in the eyes of hon. members opposite. On the other hand, they say the law is too crude, too imperfect. Well, we have had some experience in that matter in the Province of Manitoba, and I suppose it is within the knowledge of every hon. member of this House that the Legislature of Manitoba has been perfecting its legislation in that respect for the last fifteen years. In fact, the mode of election was voluntary with the elector, whether to vote with the ballot or to give an open vote, and it is only this year, I believe, that the one mode of open voting was dropped. It shows that, in a new Province, or a new country, and especially in the North-West Territories, where the extent of the Territory is enormous, where the population is very sparse, how important it is, if you want to do justice to that people, not to give them a too perfect mode of registering voters or making the electoral lists. As was stated by the right hon. the leader of the Government, the present mode is, I believe, the most feasible and the most simple one. It is not very easy for these people, who may be otherwise occupied, to travel a distance of twenty-five or fifty or 100 miles, perhaps, with their own vehicles, their own modes of transport, because there is only one line of railway, to see that their names are properly registered on the list of voters, while the opportunity is given them, when they come to register their votes, to have either their names added or their qualifications properly stated on the electoral lists. Last year and the year before, the papers were filled with grievances from the North-West Territory. One of the demands made by the people in that part of Canada has been that it should be represented in the House of Commons, but in no instance was there a voice raised, or an article written in a paper, complaining of this very mode for the registration of voters. On the other hand, if municipalities were existing, generally speaking, in a new Province or a new Territory, where the population commenced to flow in, the municipal list would be generally the basis of the electoral lists, either for the Legislature or for this Parliament. You know that it is only very recently that a general Municipal Act was adopted for the North-West Territories, and that, so far, very few localities have availed themselves of the law. It shows that, however rudimentary this legislation is in the North-West, on account of the condition of the population there, they have not been able to avail themselves of that opportunity. Therefore I believe that this measure has been very wisely devised to meet the chief want, the chief requirement, the chief demand of the people in the North-West Territories—that is, to give them representation in this House. After their members have been returned, it will be time enough for them to place before this House their peculiar requirements and to perfect legislation in the matter of registration of voters and the mode of conducting the elections in those Territories. I believe the measure, as it is, is perfectly suitable for the present requirements of the people.

Mr. MITCHELL. It strikes me there might be very great improvement upon that Bill in one, to my mind, very important principle. It is a principle which I pointed out when the Franchise Bill was passed last year, and, instead of limiting the franchise more than we have done in our own country here, we should give to these people in that country, a great many of whom are not householders but intend to become householders, who have gone there for the purpose of taking up lands and making it their home, a large majority of whom are young men who have not houses, but who live in tents or in a variety of ways, still further advantages. I think we ought to extend the franchise to manhood suffrage, or something equivalent to it. That would simply simplify the thing very much, and, if the Bill were amended in that particular, it would be much more acceptable to the people. It will bring up a much larger constituency, and it will give to the class of people who intend to make it their home a right to take part in the government of the country. They will become taxpayers, and as such will necessarily have a right to the distribution of the taxes, and I think it will give greater satisfaction to the country than the particular limitation of the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the House resolve itself into Committee.

Mr. MILLS I do not think we ought to go into committee now. There are important matters that require careful consideration, and I do not think the measure will be delayed if the hon. gentleman gives us a little time to consider it. Most of us have been pretty busy—too busy, to have considered the Bill with the attention that it deserves. I would like to call the hon. gentleman's attention to a matter intimately connected with this Bill, which he discussed the other day, that is, an address to Her Majesty asking for certain changes in the British North America Act, based upon an address. I could not find, at the moment, the action of this House in 1871 with reference to that matter, but I have turned it up, and I now refer to it. At that time, it was proposed to confirm the Manitoba Act, and to make provision for enlarging or altering the boundaries of certain Provinces. It was proposed at that time, that we should proceed just as the hon. gentleman now proposes to do. Objection was taken; it was then stated in the House, that no change ought to be made by the Imperial Parliament in the constitution of the country, so far as it relates to this Parliament, except on the advice of this Parliament, and this position was accepted by the Government. But before the matter came up for discussion I think the hon. gentleman left for Washington as High Commissioner, and Sir George E. Cartier was at the time leading the House. He admitted the soundness of the principle, he admitted there ought to be no change made in our constitution upon mere motion of the Ministers, that Parliament itself should control any alteration or amendment in the constitution, and so, instead of proceeding by an address simply there was an Act framed. I have the Act before me, which will be found to be word for word the same as the Imperial Statute. A resolution was adopted embracing this Act, the terms and provisions of which are set out, and then another resolution is added:

"That this House is of opinion that a measure embodying the provisions contained in the said proposed Bill should be submitted to the Imperial Parliament, and that a humble address be presented to Her Majesty in conformity with the foregoing resolution."

Now, that is precisely what I think ought to be done in this case. The hon. gentleman admits that we have not the power to give representation to the Territories in this Parliament, and he proposes to ask for Imperial legislation,

Now, I think it right and proper that he should propose to do that by Bill. He brings down his Bill here; we settle here, not in the Imperial Legislature, where they have no interest or concern in the matter, the terms and provisions of that Bill, just as we did in 1871, and then we embrace that Bill in an address to Her Majesty, asking that legislation should be had. Now, I do not know whether the hon. gentleman remembers what was then done, but I will send him over the Votes and Proceedings. I think exactly the same course ought to be taken here before we carry this Bill, we ought to settle on the terms and provisions of that Bill. The hon. gentleman proposes to give four representatives to the people of the Territories. Now, I am not objecting to that, although it may be, for the time being, at variance with the principle of representation by population, but it is absolutely necessary that the Imperial Act should provide that we should not have power to increase that number, and that these people should not receive additional representation until they are entitled to it by an increase in population—we should do precisely what we did in the case of British Columbia and Manitoba. I think it is clear that the rule we laid down in 1871 is a sound one; I think the House ought not, under any circumstances, to invite or to permit the Ministers to invite, the alteration of the constitution without the House itself determining the character of that alteration, and the provisions that are to be embraced in that Act, which are to become part and parcel of our constitution.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think it necessary to enter into a discussion upon that. There has been a joint address to Her Majesty praying that she will be pleased to submit a measure to the Imperial Parliament. Well, that has gone.

Mr. MILLS. I do not think that prevents the House from dealing with the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion to go into committee.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I do not think we ought to go into committee to-night. This matter requires a great deal of consideration.

Mr. CASEY. I hope the hon. gentleman will pay attention to one point that, I think, has the greatest weight with him. Many hon. gentlemen have not studied the matter thoroughly, are not thoroughly familar with the Bill, and they will probably take a great deal more time to thresh it out in committee, and ask a great many more questions about it and delay the House much longer, if we are obliged to consider it in committee to-night than if we are given more time to study it. I think the hon. gentleman has found that to be his experience on former occasions, and I think he will find it so now.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If there are any clauses likely to cause a good deal of discussion, we can let them stand over and make some progress in the Bill. At this period of the Session, perhaps, it would be as well to dispose of the clauses on which there will be no discussion.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 2,

Mr. MILLS. How will the population be divided as to members? We have not before us any statement showing what will be the population of each of the two districts into which Assiniboia will be divided.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Saskatchewan and Alberta districts each have one.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the present population of each of these?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Judging by the average population in the older Provinces of the Dominion, we give them a very large representation. Assiniboia has 16,794; Saskatchewan has, of whites, 4,486; Alberta, of whites, 4,871.

Mr. CASEY. How do the population of the two ridings in Assiniboia compare?

Sir JOHN A MACDONALD. The population is 16,794, but there is not an equal division.

Mr. CASEY. A question might arise as to whether it would not be wiser to divide the Territory so as to give an equal population in each electoral division, without regard to the lines of the provisional district.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am under the impression that the hon. gentleman will find that the white population of Saskatchewan is only 1,792, in place of 4,800 as he has just stated. The population of Alberta, as I have it, is about 4,800, Assiniboia 16,408 and Saskatchewan 1,792

Sir JOHN A MACDONALD. No. The white population of Saskatchewan is as follows:—Carrot River 197, Prince Albert, 3,628, Battleford 661, making about 4,400.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is that the white population?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not observe a foot note which says that in the Saskatchewan district half-breeds were included with the whites.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then my calculation is correct, that Saskatchewan contains only 1,792 whites?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That must be so. There are 4,486 whites and half breeds and 6,200 Indians in the Saskatchewan.

Mr. MILLS. The difficulty I see in the way of the representation proposed is that the people will be scattered over an immense area where there is no municipal organisation of any kind and where the district itself may be unsurveyed. Does the hon. gentleman propose that all those people should be included in the electoral district, or does he intend to confine the right to vote to districts where organisation is practicable.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No. I propose that every man in any part of the three districts shall be qualified to vote, whether organised or not.

Mr. MILLS. Suppose half a dozen persons should be settled hundreds of miles away, how would they vote; is it proposed to appoint a returning officer? What is the provision with regard to the polling of votes? The hon. gentleman will see there may be practical difficulties in the way. That matter I know was considered at the time the North-West Territories' Act was framed, and I do not know how far the hon. gentleman has considered it in preparing his Bill. Inconvenience may arise, from the attempt to allow everyone who may be entitled to vote far greater than will arise from his exclusion, and the confining of voters to particular districts where there may be a certain population.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The whole of the machinery is adopted with a view to give everyone a vote. If settlers are too far away and cannot enter their names, we cannot help it; if they cannot get their names before the enumerator or deputy revising officer it is their misfortune. I hope the hon. gentleman will not try and restrict settlers in the outskirts from coming to vote if they choose to undertake the labor of coming down and polling their votes.

Mr. MILLS. In the representation of the North-West Territories there must be a certain number of settlers within a prescribed area. The Act states what the area is to be. If there are any persons scattered outside that prescribed area they are not voters in the North-West Territories at the present moment, unless there are provisions in the Act of which I am not aware. I think there must be a certain population in so many square miles, otherwise the same population scattered over four or five times that extent of territory would not be embraced. There would be a very great convenience if the hon. gentleman would provide that the area of a district should be limited by the area of the district embraced in the representation of the North-West Council. Take, for instance, the case he has mentioned. Suppose persons live a very considerable distance away. It cannot be maintained that polling divisions can be placed in those outlying portions to suit their particular requirements. If you say those persons can travel 200 or 300 miles and record their votes, how are you going to determine that they are British residents or that they do not reside in Montana? And it must be remembered that the enumerator can insert their names on the voters' list on polling day. You would have no means of knowing that the votes of a large number of persons were not recorded who were living altogether outside the Territory.

On section 3,

Mr. MILLS. Are the districts very nearly equal in population?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is a very considerable difference in the population; District No. 1, which is the western district, containing 5,700, and District No. 2, the eastern district, 11,900. The eastern portion is the thickly settled portion of Assiniboia, but it is much smaller in territorial area. The western portion is very large, extending from the 104th meridian to the boundary of Alberta, and, for the future, there is no doubt that the western district will fill up rapidly, and will soon come up to the population of the eastern district. The reason why the line was taken there is, that there are different interests, or supposed interests, between the Qu'Appelle Valley and the Regina and Moose Jaw country, and the people desired that each section should have an opportunity of pressing its views upon this Parliament, and, as we are endeavoring to please them, we have provided that the whole of the Qu'Appelle district shall have one member, and that the whole of the rest of Assiniboia shall have another.

On section 5,

Mr. CASEY. So far as I can see, this does not provide that the elections shall be held simultaneously with those of the rest of the Dominion, or within a specified time after them, as in the case of other outlying districts. I think the relation, in point of time, of these elections to the elections in other parts of the Domiaion, should be stated.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Perhaps not in this clause, but we will see about it afterwards.

On section 6,

Mr. MILLS. If the hon. gentleman were to provide that elections should be held on the same day as in the other electoral districts of the Dominion, I think he would meet the case in this clause. Now that there is telegraph communication with those districts, there is no reason why the election should not be held on the same day.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman, and I have taken a memorandum. Perhaps we had better allow that section to stand.

On section 18,

Mr. CASEY. Why is it required if he is in the Territories and not when he is outside? I think inconvenience will be experienced when an outside candidate does not run. It would be better to require it in all cases.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is simply the present election law.

Mr. MILLS. I think the hon. gentleman would better serve the interests of the people by not requiring a deposit. There is really no applicability of that principle to that section of the country. There may be, for example, a man in these sparsely settled districts whom the people in his own particular settlement would like to make a candidate. He may be put in the field, and he has not the support of the people in any other district. The result would be that he would be defeated and would be mulcted if he were required to make the deposit, which would be extremely inconvenient apart from that altogether. It might be, and probably would be the case, that a man could not be found in the district who could make the deposit required by the Statute, because legal tender notes would be objected to, and it might not be possible to obtain gold.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I fear the hon. gentleman does not read the newspapers up there, or he would find that there is going to be as great an interest taken in electing members there as there is down here. There will be a great many more candidates than there are seats. As to the difficulty of getting money, that is all over now; they can get plenty of money, and they have plenty of money. I fancy they have more money there than we have down here.

Mr. MILLS. If beaver skins were made a legal tender in the district of Alberta, perhaps the deposit might be made. I do not think the hon. gentleman has taken the trouble to inform himself of the condition of things in that country when he tells us that money is so abundant. I do not know where he has got his information. My information is wholly different. I think there have been representations sent to the hon. gentleman within a very short time, telling him that the people find it impossible to get bank branches established in many of the settlements of that Territory.

Mr. CASEY. People may very well pay without having $200 in legal tender notes. If the hon. gentleman had been in that country, he would know that it is not always easy to get cash, and in a particular form. It has been easy to get cash this year, but it is to be hoped we are not going to have a rebellion every year.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If the candidate knows that he has to put up $200, he will take care to have the money ready, just as the candidates do down here.

On section 51,

Mr. MILLS. Why suggest open voting when the ballot is adopted everywhere else. Why depart from the settled rule?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I endeavored to explain on the second reading that the Local Legislature of the North-West Territories had decided that it was practically impossible to adopt all the intricacies of the ballot, and of their own free will they chose open voting. I therefore desire at present, with the assent of the House, to meet the well understood wishes of the people so far as expressed. I do not suppose hon. gentlemen are much frightened at the great influence of the Government in the Territories.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman refused to listen to the views expressed by the representatives of 2,000,000 in Ontario, yet he would have the 206 representatives of 5,000,- 000 people listen to the representation of the North-West Council. He appoints a certain number of representatives to sit in that Council, because he thinks the representatives of the people are not to be trusted with the management of their affairs, but now he tells us he has so much respect and defers so largely to the views of the representatives of the people in that Council that he is prepared to depart from the settled rule of this Legislature, and interfere with the great rule of uniformity by providing that in the North-West there should be open voting; not because the representatives of the people in this Parliament say so, but because the representatives of the people in the North-West Council say they find open voting very convenient.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. These people have no voice here, and the only way we can get at their opinion is by talking it from their Legislature. Ontario is otherwise situated, it is represented in this House; and on looking at the Votes and Proceedings, it will be found that the majority of the representatives of Ontario voted for the Franchise Bill.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman put forward the sacred principle of uniformity as the principle upon which he pins his colors, yet now he hauls down his colors because the North-West Council say we do not want your principle.

Mr. CASEY. The Council of the North-West do not represent the North-West, only half the members are elected.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Sixteen.

Mr. CASEY. And the remainder represent the Government here and not the people at all.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. But the sixteen do not.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman had not an opportunity of seeing all those members, but takes his impressions from those he met, and he does not tell us whether they were nominated members or elected members. In every case we have to consider in regard to the propriety of the ballot something more than the opinion they entertain at the time. I am willing to go as far as anybody in giving them anything they want in the way of rights and privileges, but, if it is merely a question of convenience, I think we should not abrogate the principle of the ballot for such a reason. In any case, most of the inconvenience would fall upon the Dominion officers, and not upon the people. It is just as easy, and easier, for the voter to vote by ballot as by word of mouth. The hon. gentleman said he supposed we would not be afraid of the influence of the Government upon the electors there. I think, if there is any place in Canada where the influence of the Government and Government officials, and the influence of the railway and railway officials, is likely to be felt, it is there. The people are likely to be as independent in the North-West Territories as elsewhere, but I think more influence can be exercised upon them than elsewhere. I think the clause should stand for the present, as well as the one in regard to open voting.

Mr. ROYAL. I do not think it would be wise to alter the legislation of the North-West Territories which they have passed themselves. With reference to open voting, we have the experience of Manitoba. Open voting as well as the ballot has been kept in existence until this year, and, when the ballot was first introduced in 1876 or 1877, it remained in existence only for one year. We had two or three elections under the ballot system, and I believe the population of Manitoba then was as intelligent as that of any older Province, but, after the experience of those two bye elections, the Legislature decided to abrogate the legislation and reinstate open voting. It is very likely that the same reasons which led the Legislature of Manitoba in that instance have led the people of the North-West Territories to so legislate in their own matters, and I believe it is very wise, having no other way to consult the wishes of that population, to copy their own laws which have been passed by themselves.

Mr. MILLS. The views expressed by the hon. gentleman, if logically carried out, and the views of the First Minister, would lead to this: that every electoral division ought to decide for itself what mode shall be adopted of holding the election, open voting or the ballot. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman proposes to adopt that or not, but that is the practical effect of his proposition. He says certain parties whom he has consulted are in favor of open voting. I do not know whether Mr. Jackson is one of them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I sometimes have heard from Mr. Jackson.

Mr. MILLS. It may be that some members of this House have expressed a preference for open voting, and I do not know whether he is going to allow them to have their way, or to see that the minority should abide the decision of a majority of this House. If that is the case, I do not see why the people of that Territory should not follow that rule as well as others. If the hon. gentleman could show that there would be great inconvenience from the adoption of the ballot system, that it would not be applicable to that country, that would be a reason, but, when he says that certain people there prefer open voting, he says what is true of every portion of this Dominion. There are some people in every part of this Dominion who would prefer open voting. I do not know how the hon. gentleman is going to please everyone. He may be in the position of the old man who tried to carry the donkey.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not say I had seen any members, either nominated or elected, on this matter. My hon. friend opposite misunderstood me. I said that, if he would look at the proceedings of the Council in the North-West, he would find that the elected members as well as the nominated members were in favor of this, that is what I intended to convey. The elected members and the nominated members concurred in making a practical working ordinance for that Territory. The hon. gentleman from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says that logically every section up there ought to act for itself if my Bill is adopted.

Mr. MILLS. All over the Dominion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman is intensely logical, and I am intensely practical. That is the difference, but somehow my legislation generally gets through.

Mr. CASEY. Yes, it does, but sometimes it takes a very long time. I hope this will not take quite so long. Perhaps, if the hon. gentleman had been a little more logical in his explanations on a former occasion, that might have gone through a little sooner. That legislation has turned out to be intensely practical, I must confess. I refer to the Franchise Bill of last year. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal) proposes that there should be open voting because they have that system in Manitoba for local purposes. Did the hon. gentleman last year urge, when the Franchise Bill was under discussion, that the elections in that Province should take place by open voting?

Mr. ROYAL. I believe the hon. gentleman forgets that we are dealing with Territories, not Provinces, and, until the members are returned here to express the wishes of the people, we should copy their own legislation.

Mr. CASEY. I am perfectly aware that we are dealing with Territories, but I say the hon. gentleman's position is extremely inconsistent.

Mr. ROYAL. Not at all.

Mr. CASEY. He should have asked for open voting for Manitoba. If it should be adopted in Dominion legislation, it should be adopted in Manitoba as well as in the North-West Territories. There are parts of Manitoba which are quite as thinly peopled as the greater part of the North-West Territories. If the ballot has not worked badly in Manitoba, and no complaints have been made yet, why should it not be adopted in the North-West Territories? I had understood the hon. the First Minister to say that this Bill was settled with the North-West Council or some of its members, that he had advised with them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. CASEY. Then I misunderstood him. He was basing his view, then, upon the Bill which was framed by the North-West Council for their own elections. In that case, his remark loses all the weight it had, because it does not follow, in the North West any more than in Manitoba, that we should adopt a different principle of voting from that which is in force in the rest of the Dominion.

Mr. WATSON. I think this clause ought to stand. There seems to be considerable difference of opinion. As to the elections in Manitoba, they elect the Dominion members by ballot; but for the Local House the Premier of that Province and the Local Government have only seen fit to adopt the ballot after two-thirds of the residents of the Province have signed petitions in favor of it. It is not at all the representatives of the people who desire it, as they would rather have open voting and all the influence they could bring to bear, but they are forced into adopting the ballot by the numerous petitions from the people.

On section 52,

Mr. CASEY. Stand.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, not this clause.

Mr. CASEY. Is the hon. gentleman going to depart from the understanding that clauses which would provoke discussion should stand over?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I certainly never agreed to that, whenever an hon. member said "stand," the clause should stand. There is no reason in the world why section 52 should stand over.

Mr. CASEY. By this section the poll clerk is ordered to make erasures in the voters' list when directed by the deputy returning officer, which he can only do by section 44, which was allowed to stand.

Mr. DAVIES. It is a question whether we should not alter the phraseology of that clause. It gives an arbitrary power to the deputy returning officer to strike off such names as he pleases.

On section 62,

Mr. CASEY. Is it necessary to allow the posting of written proclamations? One would judge from the number of newspapers that come to us from the North-West Territories, that such things as proclamations, which could be prepared sometime beforehand, all but the exact date, might be easily had printed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They know very well up there. That is their provision.

Mr. CASEY. We are discussing the provision for ourselves There is no reason why we should adopt, in all the details, the rude methods adopted by the rudimentary North-West Council. A written proclamation might be so insignificant as to escape the notice of every body in the neighborhood, and might perhaps, in some cases, be intentionally so. There is certainly no difficulty in getting proclamation printed in the North-West Territories.

Mr. MILLS. They may be all printed, or partly printed and partly written. We might leave out the words, "or written," because a written proclamation would hardly attract attention, and if the hon. gentleman's statement is at all accurate—and I have no doubt that he has information that the newspapers circulate there very widely, that they have great printing facilities—if that is the condition of things, there is no reason for making this provision.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will give an instance that occurs to me. Suppose the person sent out to put up these notices travels 350 or 400 miles, and runs out of printed notices, is he to go back and leave the rest of the country without notices? All he has to do is to write them.

Mr. CASEY. Supposing a messenger is sent out that cannot write, he would have no authority to write the proclamation and put it up. These proclamations might just as well be all printed here and sent up there for the dates to be filled in.

On section 63,

Mr. MILLS. This is a most extraordinary section. It provides that a returning officer shall not delay proceeding with an election under this Act, notwithstanding that he discovers a mistake in the steps prescribed by this Act, or that there has been a want of qualification in any person signing that nomination paper. The hon. gentleman proposes by this clause that the returning officer shall decide whether there has been an election or not. That is such an extraordinary provision that I am surprised the hon. gentleman should have proposed it. It seems to me that the returning officer should state clearly what are the necessary regulations, and if there has been such a departure from what is right and proper as would void an election in any other portion of the Dominion, it should void an election there.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He reports the whole thing, and Parliament deals with it.

Mr. CASEY. That is what we object to. That is not a case with which Parliament should deal, but it should be left for the electors to deal with. We object to these questions being brought here for Parliament to decide by a partisan majority. This section would undoubtedly place the power of remitting any election in the hands of the returning officer.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We will not discuss it to-night.

On section 67,

Mr. CASEY. We should have an opportunity of comparing these details.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It has been very carefully done. We have taken the Dominion Election Act; no doubt it is all right.

On section 70.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman makes provision that nothing contained in his Act shall repeal or modify section 11 of the Electoral Franchise Act. The hon. gentleman has not incorporated it here, and we have not had an opportunity of looking at it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have had the fear of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson), and the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), before my eyes. I will explain. It provides that no Indian in the North-West or British Columbia shall have a right to vote.

Mr. PATERSON. That is want of uniformity again.

Bill reported.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider a certain proposed resolution (page 1143) respecting the fees and expenses in connection with the electoral franchise in the North-West Territories.

Motion agreed to, resolution considered in Committee and ordered to be reported.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11:05, p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 12th May, 1886.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PRINTING AND STATIONERY BUREAU.

Mr. CHAPLEAU moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 132) respecting the Department of Public Printing and Stationery. He said: I suppose that, at this stage of the measure, I need not give any lengthy explanation about the Bill than this: The object of the Government, by this Bill, is to give power to the Government to establish a Printing Bureau and Stationery Office, that is to say, to adopt here the system which has been adopted and practised so successfully in the United States, so far as the printing of the Government and Parliament is concerned, and to adopt, as far as possible, the English system in relation to the stationery supplies of the different public Departments and both Houses of Parliament. As to the latter part of the proposition, I may say that we have accomplished a good deal of progress in the Stationery Office, and when the time comes, when I am called upon to give detailed explanations, I shall be in a position to give statistics showing the savings that have been effected and the progress we have made in the direction of economy, by the establishment of a stationery branch attached to the Department of the Secretary of State. As to the other part of the proposition, the object, as I said, so far as the Government and public printing is concerned, is to adopt, as far as possible, the American system, which also pravails in almost all other countries, except in England, where, however, there is a movement in the same direction. I shall give some statistics on the subject when the Bill is up for the second reading.

Mr. BLAKE. I am not quite certain whether I gathered the hon. gentleman's expression correctly, but it seemed to me rather that he was proposing to ask Parliament to empower the Government to establish this system. I trust, however, it will not be proposed to ask Parliament to empower the Government to establish this system, but rather that the system itself will be propo ed to Parliament for its consideration. The question is one of very great consequence both in its principles and in its details; it is one upon which we should have very full information, in order to put ourselves in a position to form a judgment whether the proposed change is a desirable one. I regret, Sir, that, as to a measure so important as this practically is, the hon. gentleman should have found himself unable to take the first step until so late a day as the 12th of May. I trust we shall have at an early day those full details which the hon. gentleman promised us, and without which it is impossible to appreciate the benefits of this proposal.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I think the subject of the measure is not a novel one, or one which will take Parliament by surprise. Reports have been presented to this House emanating from the Department of the Secretary of State, mentioning the detail of the two different systems, the printing by the Government, or the contract system, the latter of which has been followed heretofore, and pointing to the advantages which might arise from the adoption of the system which we will ask the permission of Parliament to adopt. As I said before, the system is not a novelty, nor is it, I think, one which will take Parliament by surprise. The statistics in detail, when they are presented, can be easily considered by Parliament in support of or against the measure to be introduced

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

IMMIGRATION FROM DAKOTA AND TEXAS.

Mr. ROYAL asked, Whether the Government is aware that a considerable number of settlers from Dakota and Texas are just now commencing to move to Manitoba from across the line?

Mr. CARLING. Yes; the Government is aware that a considerable influx of settlers from the States named has commenced to move into Manitoba. The Department has not, at this moment, the figures of numbers, but they will be ascertained as far as possible.

DEEP-WATER NAVIGATION OF MANITOBA WATERS.

Mr. ROYAL asked, Whether the Dominion Cabinet have received from the Provincial Government of Manitoba a copy of the following resolution and prayer, passed by the Legislature of the said Province on the 6th May instant, viz:—That whereas the council of the city of Winnipeg and the Board of Trade of the said city have appointed a joint delegation to proceed to Ottawa to lay before the Government of Canada the question of deep-water navigation from Lake Winnipeg and to the interior of this Province; whereas it is of the greatest importance to this Province that the navigation of the Red River at the place known as the St. Andrew's Rapids be so improved as to render such deep-water navigation possible; and whereas, if a greater depth of water was obtained at said locality, it would enable vessels of lake draught to proceed without interruption long distances into the Province and across the border into the United States as far as Fargo and Moorhead; therefore be it resolved that this House cordially endorses the action of the Winnipeg City Council and the Board of Trade in sending a delegation to Ottawa for the purpose of urging on the Government of Canada the importance of the improvement herein suggested, and the desirability of having a sum placed in the Estimates of the present year for the purpose of carrying out the same; and this House would add to its prayer that the request of this delegation be acceded to by the Government of Canada? What is the intention of the Government in regard to this matter?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have received a copy of the resolution and prayer passed by the Legislature of the Province of Manitoba as mentioned in this question. This was delivered to me by the deputation that came from Winnipeg the other day with reference to the improvement of the navigation of Red River. The intention of the Government is to cause an examination to be made, in order to have the data necessary to examine the question, and then decide.

SAVINGS BANKS DEPOSITS.

Mr. JACKSON asked, Has the $19,154,598.50 deposits in the Government Savings Bank on March 31st, 1886, and also the $16,954,243.21 deposits in the Post Office Savings Bank at the same date, been invested in paying securities; and, if not all, how much has been invested, and what are the securities?

Mr. McLELAN. There has been no special investment made of these sums. They form part of the general debt of the Dominion.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. THOMPSON moved:

That the order for second reading of Bill (No. 22) An Act respecting Interest in the Province of British Columbia (Mr. Baker, Victoria), be placed on Government Orders.

He said: I may explain that the hon. introducer of this Bill stated to me, on the day I gave the notice, that he expected to be obliged to leave for home in consequence of important engagements, and was afraid that the Bill would not be reached before his departure, if left on the list of public Bills and Orders. The other evening that Bill was called, but in consequence of my having given the notice, the hon. gentleman did not move it.

Mr. BLAKE. I have no objection at all to the motion, but I move to add these words:

And that the order for second reading of Bill (No. 92) entitled: "An Act further to amend the Canada Temperance Act, 1878" (Mr. Jamieson), be placed on the Government Orders.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think the hon. gentleman will have to give notice of this.

Mr. BLAKE. It is a very pertinent amendment.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It may be pertinent, but I think it is contrary to the rules of the House to move it without notice. I ask, Mr. Speaker, if that is so.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is an amendment.

House divided on amendment of Mr. Blake.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. KRANZ. I move in amendment to add the following words:—

And that the order for second reading of Bill (No. 104), entitled: "An Act to amend the Canada Temperance Act of 1878" (Mr. Orton), be also placed on the Government Orders.

Mr. BLAKE. If the House had agreed to place on the Government Orders the other Bill, I should very gladly have voted for this as an additional amendment, so that both of these propositions might have received the consideration of the House this Session. But I think it would be scarcely reasonable that this proposition should be the only one submitted to the House this Session, and as the House has declined the other amendment I propose to vote against this one.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think the hon. gentleman's position is one which will stand the scrutiny of the public, however much his own followers may approve of his conduct. If it were right in the abstract that the proposition which has been moved as an amendment by my hon. friend to my right (Mr. Kranz) should have the consideration of the House, it is just as right that it should have it, even though something else which my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has moved did not get that consideration. Right is right, whether on the banks of the Saskatchewan, the Red River, or anywhere else, and if it is right that this proposition should be considered, it is right that it should be considered now as well as before.

Mr. BLAKE. But right is not always right when one gets on the right side of the Speaker.

Mr. MITCHELL. As I intend to pursue a different, or rather the same course on this amendment as I did on the last, that is to vote for it, I wish to give my reasons. I voted for the other because it was upon a question which has been before the country a long time, and which has occupied a large amount of the time and attention of this Parliament, and deservedly so, in order that it might have the fullest and freest discussion. We have heard that the question was to be brought up this Session, and we have been looking forward—the friends of temperance on the one hand, the friends of wine and beer on the other, and the opponents of both—in expectation of one or the other of these Bills coming up, when we should have the opportunity of discussing the question. But it is evident that the Government, in taking away all the days of private members, have destroyed the possibility of reaching these measures, if they are left among the Bills in the hands of private members. There are few questions of greater interest than the question of temperance, and as I voted for the other amendment in order that the question might come up for discussion, I intend to vote for this one for the same reason.

Mr. CASEY. My hon. friend has given a logical reason for the course he has chosen to take; I do not intend to criticise his remarks. But my hon. friend the Minister of Marine thinks my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition will not be able to defend his position before the public; he thinks he stands in a very peculiar position before the public of Canada. I think, if anybody stands in a peculiar position before the public of Canada in regard to the late vote, it is the hon. Minister himself. That hon. gentleman has been one of the foremost, one of the ablest advocates of temperance——

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. CASEY. Well, one of the most prominent advocates of temperance. I am not discussing the question of how much it was worth or how much he got for it; but he owed his prominence in this House to the position he took on that question.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is not the hon. Minister's character we are discussing, it is the question of the amendment.

Mr. CASEY. We are discussing the hon. Minister's speech. He said the position of the hon. leader of the Opposition was indefensible before the country, and I am showing that his position is indefensible. If you rule that in that I am out of order, the hon. Minister was out of order in attacking the position of the hon. leader of the Opposition; but if I am not allowed to show how inconsistent that hon. gentleman is, I am sure the country will be able to draw their conclusion without any assistance from me. As to the merits of this particular motion before the House, I agree with my hon. friend from Northumberland that there is room for argument that both motions should be supported; but, speaking for myself, I must say the motion which the House has voted down was a motion to put on the Order paper a Bill proposing to make the Scott Act workable. It has been maintained for a long time that the Scott Act, in its present form, is not workable, but that it requires amendment to enable it to be enforced at all. I maintain that having such an Act, we should put it in a workable shape, so that the question of prohibition may be fairly tested and the opinion of the people arrived at. The Scott Act being a Government measure, the Government themselves should have taken it up and done their best to make it workable, or repeal it altogether. Now, seeing we have been refused the opportunity of providing machinery to make the Act workable, it is proper we should refuse to consider any other Bill proposing to make a change in the principle of the Act itself or to weaken its effect. Had the Government been willing to allow us to discuss amendments to the Scott Act, we would have been willing to discuss any changes in the Act itself which might be proposed; but when they refuse to allow us to improve the machinery of the Act, it is perfectly logical and fair on our part to say we will refuse to consider any Bill proposing to make changes in the principle and essence of the Act itself. That is the reason I will vote against the resolution now before the House. I do not think such favoritism could be shown as to put a wine and beer measure on the Government Orders when the House has refused to put the other measure on the Orders. Therefore, without pronouncing any opinion on the wine and beer measure, I am prepared to vote against the resolution before the House.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I must assume that the hon. member for West Durham, in making his motion, was moved by a bond fide desire to bring before the House the subject of temperance, but if he had wished to carry the votes in his favor upon that motion, he should, at least, have proposed it in a manner to make it fair to both sides. He ought to have embodied in his motion the two other Bills which appear on the Order paper in the hands of private members, one from the Senate, which has already received the sanction of that distinguished body, the Bill in charge of my hon. friend on my right with reference to druggists, and the other, the Bill in the hands of the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Orton). If the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Blake) had moved that all these Bills should be placed on the Government Orders, so as to ensure their being passed upon during the present Session, I should have had pleasure in voting in favor of his motion; but when he made a motion to give precedence to a Bill in favor of what may be called the Temperance side of the question, and excluded from that precedence the other Bills before the House, the one, neither temperance nor anti-temperance, and the other in favor of wine and beer, proposed by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Orton), I think he brought his motion before the House in a manner which made its defeat certain; and he must have known that would have been the result, and his action certainly affords ground for suspicion, as it did, on a recent occasion, when he tried to make himself agreeable——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). Well, I will confine myself to saying it was evident on this occasion he tried to make himself agreeable to a particular class of voters, namely, the Temperance party, and with that view brought forward his one-sided, unfair motion.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The hon. gentleman must confine himself to the question, which is, whether this order shall be placed on the Government Orders.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). On that my opinion has always been so plainly expressed that, as a matter of course, I shall vote in favor of the motion of the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Kranz), if that motion stands alone; but I do think that the course I have suggested should be adopted, and, with the permission of the House, I would beg to move, in amendment to the motion of the hon. member for Waterloo:

That Bill 92, to further amend the Canada Temperance Act, 1878; Bill 99, relating to Druggists; and Bill 118, amending the Acts respecting the sale of Intoxicating Liquors, be also put on Government Orders.

Mr. SPEAKER. With regard to Bill No. 92, the motion to put it on Government Orders has already been negatived.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). Bill No. 92 by itself was voted down, but I submit whether it is inconsistent with that vote, that Bill No. 92, in conjunction with the two others, be placed on the Government Orders. A great many members of this House might be, as I am, unwilling that Bill No. 92 alone be put on Government Orders, while we might be willing that that Bill, in conjunction with the other Bills, should be put on the Government Orders. The proper and legitimate way to bring the matter before the House is that all the Bills affecting, directly or indirectly, the Temperance question, be placed on the Government Orders, so as to ensure during the present Session a disposal of the subject.

Mr. MILLS. There was a way in which the hon. gentleman might have accomplished the object the hon.

gentleman has in view, and that was by voting for the proposition of my hon. friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake). If the hon. gentleman had voted for that proposition, he might, with some show of reason, ask to have the other Bills put in precisely the same position. Not having done that, he is not now in a position to propose to reverse his vote, and ask the majority of this House to stultify themselves. The hon. gentleman has taken a course which makes it impossible for the majority of the House to support his proposition.

Mr SPEAKER. I do not think that the hon. member can add Bill No 92. The House has already passed upon that. If that amendment had been carried, the House could have adopted a motion to add the other Bills, but the House has already passed upon that Bill, and refused to add it to the Government Orders.

Mr. McCARTHY. I would draw your attention to the fact that the other evening, after voting down a motion that the resolution should be sent to Mr. Parnell, it was moved that it should be sent to Mr. Parnell and Mr. Gladstone, and no one deemed that to be out of order.

Mr. BLAKE. That is not the same at all.

Mr. MITCHELL. We were in a difficulty then.

Mr. McCARTHY. Now we have voted to refuse to advance one of the Bills, but we might be willing, as my hon. friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake) was willing, to advance the both. I am unwilling to advance one, but I am quite willing to advance both. It seems to me that the motion is clearly in order.

Mr. BLAKE. The cases are by no means parallel. The proposition voted down the other night was to substitute the name of Parnell for the name of Gladstone. We said we declined to strike out Mr. Gladstone's name to insert Mr. Parnell's name. If the motion had been to add Mr. Parnell's name, and that had been voted down, and then it had been proposed to add that name and another, the case would have been more analagous. The view of the Chair is that, though these three Bills are coupled together, there is practically in the one proposition a proposal that Bill A, and Bill B and Bill C shall each be added. If my proposition had been carried, the majority of the House would have been in order afterwards to add other Bills, but it was voted down. I think your ruling is quite correct against that part of the motion adding the Bill which I proposed to add.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). While I respectfully dissent from your decision, as a matter of principle, and while I desired that the whole question, including the Bill of my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Jamieson), as well as the other Bills, should be given prominence on the Orders, still, in view of your ruling, I beg leave to strike out that Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER. With regard to the motion the other night, the proposal was to strike out all the words which provided that the resolution should be sent to Mr. Gladstone, and to state that it should be sent to Mr. Parnell. Therefore, the hon. gentleman will see that it is not at all the same case. This is in the nature of a complex question, and any hon. member can ask that each one of these Bills be put in a separate motion, because some members might wish to vote for one Bill and against another. Any member can ask that it should be put separately, and, if it were put separately, the hon. member will see at once that Bill No. 92 has been already passed upon by the House.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron) stated that he would withdraw that.

Mr. BOWELL. I ask for information; I understand your ruling to be that, if the motion of the hon member for West Durham had been to have these two Bills added, any member could have demanded that they should be put separately?

Mr. BLAKE. Yes, to divide the motion.

Mr. BOWELL. I am asking the ruling of the Speaker, not the opinion of the member for West Durham. I will put my question again. If the hon. member for West Durham had placed a motion in your hands asking that two separate Bills should be placed on the Government Orders instead of one, would it have been within the province of any ndependent member of this House to have them separated?

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. BOWELL. Or to ask your ruling to have it ruled out of order?

Mr. SPEAKER. It is what is called a complex question, and any member could ask that each Bill should be put separately.

Mr. McCARTHY. Then, I suppose, this can be done now?

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. Certainly, take them one by one, which is the way I did. One thing at a time is a very good rule.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is a poor rule that will not work both ways, though.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). In deference to your ruling, I must amend my motion by striking out that portion of it relating to Bill No. 92, but, if my hon. friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake) had not so strenuously supported your ruling, I think it not impossible that the motion he made in favor of having Bill No. 92 added might practically have been carried, and the whole subject might have been brought before the House; but I am afraid that, in the one-sided shape, as some may suppose, in which it is now placed, he and my hon. friends who supported his motion may now vote against it. I move that Bill No. 99, relating to druggists, and Bill No. 118, amending the Acts respecting the traffic in intoxicating liquors, be also placed on the Government Orders.

Mr. JAMIESON. I am glad to see that the House is waking up to the importance of temperance legislation. There are indications to-day of quite a revival of temperance sentiment in the House. Perhaps it is all for the best that the Bill of which I have the honor to have charge was not introduced so early in the Session, because, if it had been, we would not have had this manifestation we have had to-day. Whilst very anxious to press my Bill on, because I believe it is a necessary and proper piece of legislation, still I am not disposed to sail in the boat with wine and beer, neither am I disposed to sail in the boat with those who are in favor of an amendment permitting druggists to sell liquor in Scott Act counties in a way which I believe will have the effect of largely destroying the effectiveness of the Canada Temperance Act. Therefore, seeing that the amendment to give precedence or a place on the Government Orders to Bill No. 92, of which I have charge, has not received the approbation of the House, I do trust that the amendment and the amendment to the amendment will receive the same fate, that they will not receive the sanction of this House. I have not yet lost hope that, in the ordinary course of the procedure of the House, we will reach the Bill of which I have charge. I do not think the Government intend to take Monday, and I hope on Monday evening next I shall be able to reach that Bill in the usual course. It was reached within one or two Orders on Monday evening last, and I trust that on Monday evening next we shall be able to reach it and to dispose of it, and that it will receive the sanction of the House. I think it is highly important that all necessary legislation should be given for the purpose of perfecting the Canada Temperance Act. However, I am not disposed, on a motion of this kind, to enter into the merits of the question. I may say, whilst disposed personally to thank the leader of the Opposition for the interest he has taken in my Bill, I really think it would have been better, perhaps, and more advisable if I had been spoken to in the matter. It may be said that I, a supporter of the Government, was placed in an awkward position by having to vote against the Government on this question. However, I deemed it advisable to do so because I thought that the Bill I had in charge was a necessary one, and I was very anxious it should receive the attention of the House. I am, however, very determinedly opposed, and I use that strong expression, to the legislation proposed by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Orton), and which has been taken in charge by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Kranz). I am also opposed to the amendment of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron), though I am glad to see he is improving, since he shows a kindly regard for the Bill I have in charge. However, I am more than suspicious of his motives.

Mr. BLAKE. I may say, in reply to the hon. member for North Lanark (Mr. Jamieson), that it was not until the House met that I noticed the motion on the paper of the hon. Minister of Justice, which gave an opportunity for this step, and upon noticing it I searched for the hon. member for Lanark, and was unable to find him, as I desired that the step which I deemed it necessary to take should be taken effectively. I may further point out to the hon. member that even if his pleasing anticipations should be realised, of its getting a second reading on Monday next, it could not get a third reading until the following Monday, and what is going to happen on the following Monday?

Mr. HACKETT. Although I am not aware that the Bills referred to in the motion of the hon. member for Victoria will impair the working of the Scott Act to a great extent, I still feel it my duty to oppose his motion that these Bills be placed on the Government Orders. The county which I have the honor to represent was one of the first counties in Canada to adopt the Scott Act; it was in force there for three years, when a second election was held, and it was again carried by a large majority, and the Act is in force in that county now for a second time. It is also in force over the whole Province from which I come, and the people of that Province feel that some amendments are necessary to make it more effective, as it is very defective in some regards. I was willing to support the Bill of the hon. member for Lanark, and in consequence I support the motion of the hon. leader of the Opposition. I may say that I supported the amendments of a similar character last year; and I support these amendments for the reason I now give, viz.: That I believe they are very necessary to the working of the law; and as the people of the county I represent have twice voted in favor of that law, I feel it my duty to carry out their wishes and make the Act as workable as possible. While doing that I was very much surprised to find that one of the temperance organisations of Prince Edward Island thought it necessary, at a meeting held by them, to censure me in a very severe manner. In the month of August the Grand Division of the Sons of Temperance, of Prince Edward Island, held their meeting at Eldon in that Province, and passed the following resolutions:—

"Mr. Rogers moved, and Mr. James Wall of 'Rising-sun Division' seconded, a resolution condemning the action of our representatives, Yeo and Hackett, for having shirked the vote on the Scott Act amendment"——

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The hon. gentleman must confine himself to the question.

Mr. HACKETT. That is the question. I am on the subject of the Scott Act amendments.

Mr. SPEAKER. No; the question is whether we will put certain Bills on the Government Orders.

Mr. HACKETT. Yes, I understand that is it. The question is as to whether a certain Bill amending the Scott Act should be placed on the Government Orders, and that is what I am speaking to precisely. I am speaking with regard to Scott Act amendments, and I am showing you that while I supported these Scott Act amendments last Session, I was censured by a representative body of people in my county. I just want to say that that resolution was not correct, that I had voted and did not shirk anything.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order, order.

Mr. HACKETT. I will take the responsibility.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order, order.

Mr. BLAKE. Chair, chair.

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope the hon. gentleman will confine himself simply to the question of whether these Bills shall be placed on the Government Orders.

Mr. HACKETT. That is what I intend to do, Mr. Speaker. I think it would be very unwise that these should be transferred to the Government Orders, as we have just voted down a motion having reference to a Bill of much greater importance; and I was referring to the fact that I supported these amendments last year.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order, order. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. McCARTHY. I understand your ruling is that each of these Bills are now to be put separately, or can be put separately, upon the demand of any member. Now, there are three Bills, as I understand.

Mr. SPEAKER. They are all on one side of the question.

Mr. McCARTHY. There are no sides to the question. There are three Bills, and it has been moved to place them upon the Government Orders. One is "Bill (No. 99) An Act respecting Druggists;" another is "Bill (No. 104) An Act to amend the Canada Temperance Act of 1878;" and the other is No. 118. Now I ask, has a member, in accordance with your ruling that these Bills be put separately, a right to move that the question be put separately as to each of these others? For my part, while I was quite willing to put upon the Government Orders the Bill in charge of my hon. friend to amend the Canada Temperance Act, 1878, I am not willing to put on that measure alone. I am anxious to see this Bill regarding druggists put on also, as it has come from the Senate, and should have a chance of receiving the consideration of this House. It has been passed by the Senate and is very important in the interests of the druggists, and is not at all calculated to destroy the Scott Act in those counties where it may be enforced, and I think it ought to have an opportunity, at all events, of being brought to a second reading here.

Mr. COOK. My hon. friend from North Simcoe states that the Bill regarding druggists is very important to the druggists. Well, it is not in the interests of the druggists that we are legislating here, we are legislating for the interests of the people, and I regret exceedingly the conduct of my hon. friend in connection with this whole transaction. Of coure, when I look back and remember that the Mc Carthy Act was once in force in this country——

Mr. SPEAKER. Order, order.

Mr. COOK. I will say that on a former occasion I voted in favor of the Bill being put upon the Government Orders so as to receive the attention of this House at an early date.

I oppose the motion of my hon. friend from North Victoria because it tends in an opposite direction from temperance, and I shall therefore give it my opposition.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Having voted that the Bill of my hon. friend from Lanark be placed upon the Government Orders, so that it may be discussed and a decision arrived at this Session, I feel disposed, at the same time, to extend the same courtesy to the other Bill on the same subject introduced by my hon. friend from Wellington. I think that is a proper course to take, so that the question may come before the House, and a decision be arrived at before the close of the Session. I shall, therefore, vote for the motion of the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Kranz).

Mr. SPEAKER. In reference to the question which the hon. member for North Simcoe has just put, about dividing the question, I am afraid I may have been misunderstood when I stated that this was a complex question, and that when a complex question is put any member has a right to ask that it be divided. A member has a right to ask that it be divided, and it is for the House to order that by motion. The rule is laid down in May, 9th edition, p. 309, as follows :—

"If a question is complicated, the House may, if it think fit, order it to be divided, so that each part may be determined separately. A right has been claimed in both Houses, for an individual member to insist upon the division of a complicated question ; but it has not been recognised, nor can it be reasonable to allow it."

A member has a right to ask that it be divided, but it is for the House to order it. In the present case the hon. member will see that if the House votes against this amendment where three Bills are combined, then he can move that one of these be put separately afterwards. The House may refuse to put it on in conjunction with other Bills, and that it will be in order for him to move that it be put on by itself.

Mr. McCARTHY. Then, if I understand your ruling, Mr. Speaker, the reason you gave for ruling the motion out of order falls to the ground.

Mr. SPEAKER. No.

Mr. McCARTHY. I may be wrong, but saying "no" will not make me right. As I understood, it was on this ground: That because this was a complex question, because a member of the House could insist on this question being separated and the matters in question put separately, therefore the motion made by the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron) was out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. No; I said that the House had refused to place Bill No. 92 on the Government Orders, and therefore I did not think that question could be submitted again to the House. That was my ruling.

Mr. McCARTHY. The ground taken on this side was, that both those Bills being put as a substitute was not the same, but a different question from putting one Bill alone. I may have misunderstood your ruling, but I understood the ground was that this was a complex question. That was the ground we here all understood to be taken. It is very important that the ruling should be definite, and that we should understand the grounds of it, because it will form a precedent in other matters.

Mr. BLAKE. So far from that being the case, you, Mr. Speaker, had ruled before mention was made as to its being a complex question. That was additional proof adduced. You referred to the fact that this was a complex motion, and that the placing of each of the Bills would be an independent motion in point of fact. Although I do not say which way I will vote, as the subjects are different, if the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) will move that the questions be put separately, I am disposed to assent to the motion for my part, although your observation, Mr. Speaker, is perfectly correct that the motion put in its present form cannot by any means debar an hon. member from subsequently moving that any one of the Bills be placed on the Government Orders, because it is a different thing placing three or two or one of them on those Orders.

Mr. McCARTHY. I will move, seconded by the hon. member for West Durham, that the questions be put separately.

Mr. BLAKE. I will not second that proposition.

Mr. McCARTHY. I move that they be put separately.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman can attain the object he desires by moving, if the amendment is lost, that the druggists Bill be placed on the Government Orders.

House divided on amendment to the amendment of Mr. Cameron (Victoria.)

Amendment negatived.

Mr. HICKEY moved in amendment that Bill (No. 99) relating to druggists (from the Senate) be also added to the Government Orders. He said: This Bill affects the entire college of pharmacy and deals with an important interest in this country. Besides, I do not think there is a single provision in the Bill to which the most zealous friend of temperance could seriously object.

Amendment negatived, and main motion agreed to.

PUBLIC LANDS OF CANADA IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) moved third reading of Bill (No. 120) to make further provision respecting the administration of the public lands of Canada in British Columbia.

Mr. MILLS. Will the hon. Minister state whether the Government are carrying out the rectangular system of survey in British Columbia. I judge, from information that has come before us that such is the case. There was a good deal of discussion over this subject of the application of the rectangular system to mountainous districts at the time the State of California was being surveyed, and the Government of the United States came to the conclusion that the system could not well be carried out; that, in fact, it would seriously affect the public interest to adopt that system in districts that are so rough and mountainous as are some portions of California. That being the case, the same rule would apply in British Columbia. In fact, in the larger portion of the country, if it is to be adapted to settlement at all, the physical features will have to be followed and not mathematical lines drawn on the earth's surface. Large portions will be rendered unfit for settlement if the lines are drawn due north and south and east and west. No doubt the subject has received the attention of the Minister of the Interior, and I think it desirable before the third reading of the Bill is taken that the hon. gentleman should inform the House as to what has been done in that respect in regard to those lands.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The information I have from the Surveyor General is, that there are no serious difficulties in carrying out the method of survey adopted in the North-West, and as far as possible he is carrying out that method.

Bill read the third time and passed.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 125) to amend the law relating to the salaries of certain Judges of the Supreme Court of Judicature for Ontario.—(Mr. Thompson.)

Bill (No. 126) to amend the law respecting Crown cases reserved.—(Mr. Thompson.)

Bill (No. 101) in amendment of "The Consolidated Inland Revenue Act, 1883;" and the Act amending the same.—(Mr. Costigan.)

APPOINTMENT OF JUDGES IN NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. THOMPSON moved that the report of Committee of the Whole on resolution respecting the appointment of judges in the North-West Territories, be read the second time and concurred in.

Resolution concurred in.

Mr. THOMPSON introduced Bill (No. 133) further to amend the law in respect to the North-West Territories.

Bill read the first time.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved that the report of Committee of the Whole respecting fees and expenses in connection with the electoral franchise in the North-West Territories, be read the second time and concurred in.

Resolution concurred in.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Bill (No. 115) respecting the representation of the North-West Territories in the Parliament of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

REVISED STATUTES OF CANADA.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 9) respecting the Revised Statutes of Canada.—(Mr. Thompson.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. BLAKE. I wish to say, with reference to this Bill, that I have been told that the Statutes which it is proposed to make into law are, in several material respects, and with reference to some recent Statutes, changed. Now, for example, with reference to the Franchise provisions, I am told that the provision as to the electoral oath, to be administered, is altered. It seems to me that this is a very improper method of disposing of questions of this description. I think, if it is proposed to make changes in material parts of the law, it would have been proper to introduce fresh Bills into Parliament which might receive the judgment of Parliament as Bills, and which being passed into Acts could have been then consolidated, as the Acts of this Session, with the revision of the Statutes. But to make changes in the law, under the theory of a revision and consolidation, is to make those changes without giving Parliament and the country an opportunity of pronouncing upon the expediency or fitness of those changes; and for my part, I said before and I repeat that we have got to take very largely upon trust—even the select committee had to take very largely upon trust—the work of the consolidators. But if such changes of the law as I have referred to are introduced into the revision, we really do not know what changes we are making. Now, with reference to this question of the oath, if my memory serves me aright, during the discussions on the Franchise Bill last Session, it was pointed out that the oaths would no longer be suitable, having regard to the new franchise, and a pledge was made that this Session a Bill would be introduced to amend the law in this particular, and to make provision for that defect. I do not consider it a fulfilment of that pledge that the revision of the Statutes should contain such an oath; I think that pledge could be fulfilled only by our having in the ordinary way a Bill for consideration touching that question. I do not know whether there are other particulars in which the same process has been adopted, but if there be I can only say that I regret it very much.

Mr. WELDON. It strikes me, with regard to the Bill which was passed last Session, that in part of the consolidation relating to the franchise, the sections are totally transposed, and the alterations are such that it will be very difficult to know what their effect will be. Sometimes a section of the law is controlled a good deal by the context, and it also happens in this case that certain portions of the Act are transferred into other Acts. Now, that is a matter as to which we should proceed with a great deal of caution. Last Session, when the revised Statutes were introduced into the House, a joint committee of both Houses was appointed to go through the Acts, and compare them as far as possible. That, of course, was a task which would be utterly impossible for the whole committee to undertake, so the committee was sub-divided and certain portions were given to each sub-committee. So far as the sub-committees were concerned, they went through the portions allotted to them, and it was found in some cases that several mistakes were made which might have been very serious. At the same time, I felt that that was the only course which was open to us, as otherwise it would be impossible ever to have revised Statutes. A commissioner attended the sub-committees and explained the various changes, and, of course, a great deal had to be taken on the responsibility of that commissioner. But with regard to the amendments made in the Act of 1885, there has not been that care taken of them, although those Acts have been changed to a large extent. For instance, the sections are entirely transposed and new language is used which sometimes makes the construing of them very difficult; because every person who is familiar with the construction of the Statutes, knows that a change of a few words will sometimes make a considerable alteration, and cause a different construction to be put on the Act. In the Franchise Act there are many verbal changes made, some of them immaterial, but others, which I am not prepared to say without consideration, may not be a variation of the sense. We find sections taken out of the Franchise Act and transferred to other Acts, for instance, to the Dominion Elections Act. It appears to me that a distinct Bill should be brought in to make these changes, which could be incorporated in the consolidation when the final volumes are published. Any person who has had experience in regard to the consolidation of Statutes, knows that it is a matter which should be proceeded with with a great deal of caution. In the consolidation of the Statutes of New Brunswick, very serious changes were made, which were constantly turning up. In one instance the whole principle of the descent of real property was reversed, and a clause was inserted which had an ex post facto operation of fifteen years, and which seriously disturbed titles.

Mr. THOMPSON. It was not intended that the revisers should make any material changes in the language of the Statutes, or indeed any changes except such as were necessary to harmonise the Statutes, and I understand that is all that has been done in connection with the Franchise Act. Of course, as it is an Act in which a great deal of interest was taken last Session, and in regard to which there was considerable feeling, I am not surprised that any change whatever in it, even a verbal change, should excite comment; but I would ask hon. gentlemen who have made comments to point out any instance in which the revisers have taken an unwarrantable liberty with the text. If they have simply made the Franchise Act harmonise with the Election Act in respect of the oath of qualification, or in the phraseology of any of the sections, it seems to me that they were strictly within the line of duty, and within the line which they followed with regard to other Acts, in respect of which their conduct has not been criticised. If they have done more than that—if they have made a change against the policy of the Act or the wish of the House, now is the time to mention the particular instance.

Mr. BLAKE. That is just what we complain of. I maintain that changes in the law ought to be made by Parliament, and not by the revisers. For example, it may be a very serious question what sort of oath we should have. The oath proposed by the revisers is practically a new oath, and it is not, to my mind, a satisfactory one; it is too general; but I have no opportunity of moving an amendment. The hon. gentleman says now is the time to point any change out. How is the House going to remedy them? The House cannot remedy them.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have attached to the Bill a schedule of alterations to be made, and one value of that is that if a mistake was made, and the attention of the House called to it, we could correct it there.

Mr. BLAKE. But the proper way to make a statute is not to alter in Committee of the Whole something the revisers have set before us, but to have the proposition brought before us in the regular way.

Mr. THOMPSON. That is another question. I thought the hon. gentleman was under the impression that we could not amend anything here.

Mr. BLAKE. As the Bill came before the House we could not. What opportunity is given in this mass of Statutes, filling two volumes, to make amendments? I do not think it is a satisfactory or proper method of making them. It was pointed out last Session that the alterations we were making in the law would involve further alteration in the election law, and we were told that a Bill would be brought before us this Session with that view. It is no redemption of that pledge to adopt such an oath as the revisers may think a fit oath, which they have presented to us in several thousands of pages of different Statutes, and to say to us, point out anything in the Committee of the Whole, and the necessary changes may be made. We have not that Act before us; what we have before us is a Bill to make that Act law. A measure of that kind is one in regard to which it is very important that we should have the practical experience of those engaged in the conduct of elections, active politicians throughout the country, who have had to do with the various devices which have to be guarded against for the introduction of spurious oaths. We have not that advantage. We adopt the view that the public have some interest in our legislation, and have some right and duty to make suggestions in regard to it, and in that view we establish certain intervals between the stages of Bills, print them and distribute them. We have none of these advantages now, but we are asked to swallow this holus bolus.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). As a member of the committee to which was referred this consolidation, I gave considerable attention to it, but, I must admit, not such attention as to make me feel thoroughly certain as to the changes proposed and the consolidation made. That was utterly impossible without giving the matter a great deal more time than we had at our disposal. But, still, those matters to which the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) has referred came up before the sub-committee of which I had the honor of being chairman, and they were satisfactorily explained to us as not interfering in any way with the Act. For instance, if hon. gentlemen will look at the Franchise Act, page 47 of the draft, they will find the parts that are to be consolidated. For instance, it mentions all except section 2, section 10, and sections 15 to 32, both inclusive. Those were left out because, as understood by us, and I have no doubt by those who consolidated the Statutes, they were of no effect, being virtually repealed. I think all the sections from 15 to 32 refer to the preliminary preparation of the list. That work having been done, it cannot come up again.

Mr. WELDON. That is just the question—has it been all done?

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). The preliminary part has been done.

Mr. WELDON. But you eliminate the final revision, which has to come.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). The reason we omitted that is that this consolidation will not come into force until after a proclamation is made, and that proclamation will not be made until after the time has elapsed for the final revision of these lists, and therefore all these sections are unnecessary. I give this example to show that there was no intention of changing the Act in any material respect, because being convinced that it was not changed in any material respect, the change consisting only in the striking out of things which were unnecessary, we made our recommendation that it should be adopted.

Mr. EDGAR. It is not so much what has been left out of it as what has been put in. In the first volume of the Revised Statutes, at page 119, we find, as a schedule of the Election Act, an entirely new form of qualification. It is necessary, in view of uniformity, that there should be one oath for the whole of the electorate, instead of, as formerly, using the oaths provided by the different Provinces; but I protest against the form of oath adopted, because it is an absolutely new form; it is absolutely new legislation on a vital point. The oath which we have been using in the Province of Ontario and at the Dominion elections, up to this time, is to be found in the Ontario Revised Statutes, vol. i, page 152. When a voter comes up to be sworn, surely, if the oath is meant to be of any utility as a prevention of fraud, he ought to be made to swear that he has got the necessary qualification. Now, the Ontario Act makes an elector swear:

"That on such a day you were actually, truly and in good faith possessed for your own use and benefit, as owner, tenant or occupant, as the case may be, of the real estate in respect of which your name is entered on the list of voters, and as such are entitled to vote at this election."

This provision of the oath is entirely left out in the new form; and I think the House should not be asked to pass such an oath without some explanation. Further, in the form of the Ontario oath, the voter is obliged to swear that he is of the full age of 21 years. Under the new franchise, which has set the qualification as to age at 21, as it was before in Ontario, the form of oath given does not contain this declaration. This is either a gross piece of negligence on the part of whoever prepared this form, or it is the result of design. I have heard that all through the country, boys are being put on the voters' list of sixteen years of age, and when they come to vote they will not be called upon to swear that they are of the proper age; consequently their votes will be taken. We should not be asked to pass measures in this loose way.

Mr. WELDON. This point is very important, because the first qualification, under the Franchise Act, is that the voter should be of the age of twenty-one, and be a British subject, by birth or naturalisation. The form of oath given does not contain the important statement that the voter is of the age of twenty-one; therefore, if persons under that age should get on the list, they will escape penalties, though they have not the proper qualification. The hon. member for Kent says the changes which have been made are changes which do not affect the Statutes, but he must know that we cannot in a moment decide whether the changes are such as he describes them to be or not, particularly when the sections of the different Statutes are transposed and numbered differently to what they are in the Statutes at present. For instance, section 55 of last year turns out to be section 15 in the consolidated edition. When the commission was first issued during the Session of 1884, the Revised Statutes were laid on the Table, and hon. members had a whole year to examine them. In the Session of 1885, they were referred to a committee, which took the whole of the Session to go through them carefully, and then they stood over another year. There should be no difficulty this year; because there has not been ample time to examine them, yet mistakes have been found. I pointed out a serious mistake in regard to navigation in Canadian waters. Here we find that the Statutes passed last Session are published in the Revised Statutes, as they were in 1885, but so transposed that it is utterly impossible, in a cursory examination, to find them.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). The object of a revision of the consolidation of the Statutes is to do what has been done here. All the Acts on a particular subject are consolidated, carefully eliminating the portions repealed and harmonising those remaining, so as to give a perfect Act. The consolidation of the Acts passed last year has been done in the same way as the consolidation of the Acts of previous years. That was done in the way I have mentioned, by consolidating into one Act everything that belonged to one subject, it did not matter in how many different Statutes it might have been found. No one found fault with that last winter, but the fault now found is, that the Acts passed last winter have not been put into this new consolidation—to use a common phrase—holus bolus, without any regard to what applied or not, but exactly as they passed last winter. As I understand, hon. gentlemen say that should have been done. For instance, the Franchise Act should have been put in as it passed, without consolidating it, without eliminating any of those sections which have virtually become effete and no avail, but put in exactly as it was. It appears to me that the object and aim of the consolidation would have been lost sight of if that had been done. The question is, is that fairly and honestly done, has the meaning and intention of the Act been changed? If so, it would be a wrong thing, which ought not to have been done, but I do not think it has been. I do not say positively that it has not, but my conviction, from the cursory observation I was able to give to it, is that the law has not been changed materially. I admit frankly that we had not the time at our disposal to enable me to speak positively on it, but I believe firmly that it is a consolidation that we could properly recommend, and that this committee could easily adopt, without any fear of the laws having been changed in any way. As to the oath, it may have been better that that oath should be brought in by a special and particular Act, but it is a mere technical objection.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). Hon. gentlemen may say not, but if this is adopted now, will not this be the law?

Mr. EDGAR. It is new law and it is bad law.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). If they say it is bad law, the simple way is to move to amend that law and make it good, according to their views. My opinion is, that it is a reasonable and fair oath to take under the Franchise Act, and that it meets the different sections of the Act as it exists. I do not profess to judge for others, or to be infallible in my opinion. I may be entirely wrong, but I think, upon a fair reading, we shall find it to be so. Take the oath itself. The comments made on the fact that the elector is not asked to say positively that he is twenty-one years of age have no effect, for this reason. The elector swears that he is the person named, or purporting to be named on the list of voters shown to him. The law is certainly very strict, that no one shall get on but those who are twenty-one years of age, and the voter swears that he is the person who is on the list. We must take it primâ facie that he is properly there, and has been put there before a proper court.

Mr. WELDON. Why is it necessary that he should swear that he is a British subject?

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). It may not be necessary that he should swear to that.

Mr. BLAKE. Why should he swear to anything except to his identity, according to your theory?

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). Because it goes further, and he swears that he is entitled to vote at this election. He must be a naturalised subject, he must have the qualifications under the Franchise Act. If he swears to this, he is covering the whole ground.

Mr. MILLS. Then why is he required to swear anything more?

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). It is necessary for him to swear he has not voted before and that he has received nothing and paid nothing to anyone to vote or refrain from voting. That is necessary because, if he had, it would not take his name off the list, but would disqualify him. That is absolutely necessary under the sections which prohibit the bribing of individuals for the purpose of getting their votes. So all this oath is necessary, except perhaps the declaration that he is a British subject.

Mr. WELDON. Read sub-section 6.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). That declares that he is a resident with his father, or, if his father be dead, with his mother, upon the farm in respect of which he is to vote. That may possibly be also necessary; I do not know. It is suggested by my hon. friend beside me (Mr. White, Renfrew) that he may have become disqualified by having left his father since he was put on the list. I do not know if that would disqualify him, but it might. So, if he was a British subject, he might have become the subject of another power in the meantime. But, at any rate, these are the only two things. It is my conviction that in other respects the oath is a proper one, but, if hon. gentlemen object to it, they have their remedy now. It may be difficult to see through the draft, it is so voluminous, but every change is noted at the foot of the section in which it is made. It is either set down as "re-drafted," if it has been re-drafted, or as "new," if it is new. I am not sure whether the changes as to numbers of sections are noted, but wherever the wording is different it is noted at the bottom of the section. Hon. gentlemen may say they have not the time or the leisure or the disposition to go over these two large volumes to see whether they are right or not, but hon. gentlemen will find that the sections in which the wording is noted to be "new" or "re-drafted," are not very numerous after all; and I think, whenever hon. gentlemen think it is not right or proper law to be enacted, they should move that it be amended in some way. In regard to the reference made by my hon. friend from the city and county of St. John (Mr. Weldon), to the important matter of which he has spoken, I think he will find a recommendation on the part of the committee that that shall be amended, and that in the schedule it is amended according to the views he put forward, which are very proper indeed, and which it was a very proper thing to point out.

Mr. MULOCK. The discussion, so far, has been principally confined to the alleged defect in regard to the oath for the qualification of voters. If an oath was necessary under the old law, I submit that it is doubly necessary under the new. Under the old law, the officials charged with the business of comparing the lists were able to have some personal knowledge of what they were engaged in doing. Speaking of the practice prevailing in the Province of Ontario, we know that the first step in the way of the preparation of the list was assessment. That assessment was made, not for the purpose of giving a vote to the person assessed, but for the purpose of taxation, and was made by persons having an actual knowledge of what they were engaged in doing. It is all changed now. The revising officer prepares the list, but he does not prepare it on any knowledge of his own whatever; and each revising officer having the power to receive just such information as he desires, to accept such evidence as he chooses, is in a position to make a list on absolutely unreliable testimony. I know that, in some ridings in the Province of Ontario, revising officers placed names upon the list on information and belief, on the affidavits or statutory declarations of third persons on information and belief. I would be glad if the Minister of Justice would understand the point I am making, because I am sure he has a desire to have this made right, and I want to point out this very serious matter to him. A vast number of names have been placed on the list in Ontario simply on evidence on information and belief. Now, the deponent may have sworn correctly, but his information may have been inaccurate, so that there was really no legal testimony before the revising officer when he accepted the name and placed it on the list.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). It can be struck off afterwards.

Mr. MULOCK. It may be struck off, if it is found out, but, if it is not struck off, should the man have a vote if he is not entitled to a vote? Should we not perfect this system so that no person should have a voice in elections without the statutory qualification? I presume that is what we are calling for. It is not intended that Parliament should represent persons who are not electors, or that the results of the elections shall depend upon persons who have not the necessary statutory qualifications. Now if it is admitted for a moment, as it must be, that the list to-day contains the names of persons who really have not the qualifications, surely we ought to provide a further test in order that our whole system of election shall not tend to be a mere farce.

Mr. THOMPSON. By changing the nature of the oath?

Mr. MULOCK. Yes. I think if we had the oath presented to the electors at the polls that he is possessed of the qualifications which he claims, it gives him a vote. I fully understood, speaking for myself last Session, that such was to be made law this year—I fully understood so from the Premier, and I fancy it is only by an oversight that matters are in their present condition. If it is the intention of the Government or the will of the House, that there shall be this final test submitted to every person claiming to be entitled to vote, I have no doubt that the committee who had revision of the list, could, in a very short time, bring in the necessary forms to be attached to this Act, or the Act it is intended to bring in.

Mr. MILLS. It appears from the consolidation of the Franchise Act that there are some twenty clauses left out, and the hon. gentleman from Kent, N.B. (Mr. Landry), says that it is unnecessary that they should be embraced in the current list, and that the list shall be completed before this consolidated body of law goes into operation. Now, it seems to me that it is an elementary principle that where you repeal a law, everything that rests upon it, that has a legal origin in the law repealed, falls with it. I would like to know by what authority the list is upheld, unless there is a special provision—unless there is some new legal basis given to the list—upon what principle the current list could be upheld? Now, these lists will be the lists for the election for twelve months, possible for two years to come; they will be the lists in operation, that is, they will have legal effect and validity until the new list is prepared, until they are superseded by another list; but if you repeal those sections of the law, by the authority of which those lists are formed, and are made the election lists, then they disappear as effectually as the provisions of the law upon which they rest. I would like to know by what authority the lists that are now being prepared, are to remain the voters' lists, if you repeal the sections of the Act which makes them voters' lists, and substitute nothing else in their place. These Consolidated Statutes provide that at some period a proclamation shall issue bringing them into operation. Supposing that is issued twelve months hence, what will be the effect upon the existing lists? You repeal every section upon which these lists rest, and you repeal every provision of the law which authorises these lists to be framed, and having done that the lists disappear along with the provisions of the law upon which they repose. I say there is nothing clearer than that when the sections from 11 to 31 or 32, are repealed, when they disappear from the Statute-book, the voters' lists throughout Canada, which have been created by the authority of these sections, disappear with those sections. By what authority? Why, by the authority of the law which you have repealed, and which is law no longer. That being the case, I think it is clear as noon-day that not one voters' list in ten would exist if that consolidated body of law were brought into operation within the next twelve months, as it stands, without any provision being made for the perpetuation of these lists; there would be no voters' lists in existence, and no elections could be had until new lists could be prepared. I think that would be the legal effect. The hon. gentleman shakes his head. I would like to know by what authority these lists would remain the voters' lists. The hon. gentleman knows that there are certain sections of the Act which provide that revising officers shall be appointed who shall prepare certain lists, that they are prepared in a particular way, and it describes every step which shall be taken, and the hon. gentleman proposes to introduce a Bill by which all these provisions of the law shall be repealed. I say that being the case, unless there is some positive legislation for the purpose of perpetuating those lists, they disappear with the law.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent.) It seems to me the hon. gentleman's argument is very specious, because, if it is correct, we may go on a little further and say that everything that has been done even on those lists, would also become illegal. For instance, this House of Commons would have no authority to sit here; we would no longer be a House of Commons, because the franchise upon which we are elected was repealed last winter, and that everything that has been done under that law is wiped away by the fact of its being repealed. It appears to me that the amendment carried out to its logical conclusion leads to that result. The hon. gentleman shakes his head. If certain things have been done under an existing law, those things are legal; they are accomplished and fixed by law; but if the hon. gentleman is correct, all those things become illegal if we repeal the law under which they were done. Have we not been elected under a certain law? Will the hon. gentleman say that everything we have done is illegal because we have wiped away that law by the Franchise Act? This shows how ridiculous is the argument of the hon. gentleman.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. THOMPSON. One of the principal objections made by the hon. member for West Durham was that a promise was made last Session that matters would be dealt with by substantive legislation, and as of course an opportunity will present itself for that I will, therefore, for the present drop the form of oath altogether.

Mr. DAVIES. Suggestion was made that the form of oath should contain a substantive declaration of the age of the elector claiming to vote. In regard to farmers' sons it is also desirable that such should be done and that a person claiming to vote has been residing with his father twelve months previous to the date of the election.

On section 2,

Mr. THOMPSON. Section 2 provides that "the Governor in Council may cause such Acts of the present Session as he thinks proper to be inserted in this consolidation," and at the end of that clause I add a few words in accordance with the report of the committee providing that alterations made in the schedules to this Bill shall be made before publication. An error is mentioned by the sub-committee, and it consists of the unnecessary repetition of a clause. It is due to the revisers to say that it was not originally their mistake. They incorporated it with the law as it is, and the law contains that error.

Mr. MILLS. There are voters' list now being prepared, and I understand by the revision of the Revised Statutes it is proposed to repeal the sections under which those lists are being prepared.

Mr. THOMPSON. Not exactly. That has simply reference to some preliminary work, but the provisions under which the lists are prepared are continued.

Mr. EDGAR. In the Franchise Act proper, which is consolidated here, in almost every paragragh there is some change, some adaptation we are told. It is objectionable that we should be called upon to rush through with this Bill, while I see on the notice paper a Bill to amend the Franchise Act standing in the name of the Minister of Justice. If that Bill is before the House and any amendments are made which may be considered necessary to facilitate the working of the Act or to recall what we may pass over to-night in a lump, can those amendments be introduced into the law ?

Mr. THOMPSON. It is fully intended that the Acts of this Session shall be embodied in the consolidation in the same way as were the Acts of last Session. I hope to be able to introduce the Franchise Bill to-morrow or the next day.

Mr. WELDON. I am afraid this Act tends to take power to legislate out of the hands of Parliament and place it in the hands of the Government. The revised volume will be a large one without embodying the Acts of this Session,and it will be the better course to bring the Revised Statutes down to a certain period than to embrace the Statutes of this year.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think it is very desirable to bring the consolidation down to as late a period as possible. It is only intended to cover cases of that kind.

Mr. WELDON. I know that a similar Act is in the consolidation of the New Brunswick Statutes, but I have heard complaints that alterations were made. It seems to me that you should bring the revision down to where you get the Statutes and then start again with the Acts passed this Session. When we give power to a body outside of ourselves to say that it is to be the effect of language as to which lawyers and judges differ, it would be far better to bring the Revised Statutes down to this Session, and let the Acts of this Session remain as they are.

Mr. THOMPSON. That would be losing a year, and, as I said before, this course has been pursued in all other consolidations and without any question, I think, having been raised or any charge made that the Acts had been changed by the revisers. Besides that, hon. gentlemen will remember that we are passing this Session some Acts for the purpose of taking their places in the consolidation; for instance, that in relation to summary convictions, where we have the case of clauses in phrases altogether different from that which they would occupy if they were substantive Acts.

Mr. MILLS. I think it is very clear, if that was the intention of the Government, that instead of proposing simply an amendment to the Act, the whole Act relating to the particular subject ought to have been consolidated, and all other laws on the subject repealed, and afterwards it might have been incorporated in the Revised Statutes. But that has not been done. For instance, we had an amendment to the land law, and it was open to the Government to supersede the existing law altogether and consolidate the law, propose a measure to the House and carry it through. It might then have been incorporated in the Revised Statutes. But the hon. gentleman proposes, after the work of revision has been completed, in so far as it may be said to have been completed at all, that the Government shall have the liberty of consolidating the law after Parliament rises. That is practically the proposition. Now, I do not think that ought to be the case. I think it would be infinitely better that the Government should propose to reintroduce those measures and to re-enact them this Session than to do what the hon. gentleman proposes. Certainly the work of consolidation, when it is done, will be in part undone from the first Session after the work is completed, and that first Session might just as well be this Session as next Session. There is no advantage in postponing it. The ten years which usually run before revision takes place, would expire one year sooner. It seems that this course is an unusual proceeding, because, although the work of consolidation is usually carried down to the close of the Session in which the Acts are carried, it is not carried down in the way the hon. gentleman proposes. Take for instance the land Bill amendments which were introduced. If the Government intended to do what the Minister of Justice now says was their intention, why was not the whole law brought before us, so that it could take its place in this volume? What the hon. gentleman proposes is that Parliament shall in part abdicate its function and hand them over to the Executive.

Mr. MACMASTER. In the consolidation of the Statutes of the Province of Quebec certain amendments were made while the Code was before the House, and the committee which was entrusted with the consolidation of the laws was also entrusted with the incorporation of the amendments made by the House with the original Statutes. It seems to me that the course the Minister is now pursuing is perfectly analogous.

On section 5,

Mr. WELDON. The time mentioned in the third subsection seems to be very indefinite, and the matter would depend entirely on the action of the Local Legislature.

Mr. THOMPSON. In some cases legislation has been carried forward which would require the action of one of the Local Legislatures. A few cases of that kind are provided for. It is proposed, when the proper Legislature makes provision for the punishment of an offence by fine or imprisonment, that the former provision should stand repealed. These are matters in respect of which the repeal could not be made by the Local Legislature now, but the repeal must be made here, because the offences are now criminal offences.

Mr. WELDON. If the Local Legislature had no power to repeal an Act passed before Confederation, how could they deal with it ?

Mr. THOMPSON. The subject matter of the legislation is with them, but as the offences are now felonies or misdemeanors, the provisions making them so are within our jurisdiction.

Mr. MILLS. I think the rule laid down by the Judicial Committee is that where the subject-matter is under the jurisdiction of the Local Legislature, and there is no fine or punishment attached to it, then the offence is under provincial jurisdiction, and I do not think there is any limitation as to how the Local Legislature may characterise that offence. If the principal subject matter of which the crime is an incident, or the regulation for the enforcement of the law on that subject, is clearly within local jurisdiction, then it seems to me that the offence is under local legislation even though the law were passed before Confederation. There was a division of Statute-Law made by the Act of Confederation, and the Local Legislatures are just as competent to repeal what they would have the power to enact, even though it was passed before Confederation, as they would be if it had been enacted by themselves.

Mr. THOMPSON. I cannot fully agree with my hon. friend, that because the Local Legislature has power to legislate with regard to coroners' inquests, it would have a right to say that a person committing a breach of the peace, while an inquest was proceeding, would be guilty of a felony. We are not interfering with the legislation here; we are providing an effective rule for repealing Acts which it is not competent for the Local Legislatures themselves to repeal.

On section 11,

Mr. DAVIES. I do not know whether the Minister of Justice has given full consideration to the question, how far we have the right to declare that this or that shall be evidence in all courts. I think the preponderating opinion of the lawyers of this House is, that we have not that right,

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not think that arises. We are only professing to speak of what is within our own jurisdiction. When we say that copies of these Acts shall be evidence in all courts, we mean, of course, so far as we have power to make them so.

Bill reported and read the third time and passed.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. CHAPLEAU moved the second reading of Bill (No. 106) to amend an Act to restrict and regulate Chinese Immigration into Canada. He said: As I stated when introducing the Bill, it is the same, substantially, as that of last year, with the exception that a better and more practical mode of registration is adopted, and that the working of the Bill is put entirely under the control of the officers and the Minister of Customs. Another feature of the Bill is that merchants who were exempted from paying the entrance fee of $50 on arriving are no longer exempted. Another clause of the Bill, which is only a matter of detail, assimilates the bringing in of Chinese immigrants by rail with those coming in by steamer, at the same time providing that Chinese immigrants, passing through the territory by rail, if their intended destination is outside the Dominion, may be so transported without payment of the fee mentioned in the Act. There are no other special provisions differing from those of the Bill of last year.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 2,

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I propose to amend sub-section c to read as follows:—

The expression "Chinese" means any person born of a Chinese father.

Mr. WELDON. No matter what nationality the mother is?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. If born of a Chinese father he will be excluded.

Mr. GORDON. Will not this lead to litigation?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It is intended to prevent litigation.

Mr. GORDON. He may say he has an English father in order to save the $50.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It will be for him to prove that. He might say the same if the expression were "of Chinese origin."

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman has altered the first part of sub section c, but not the second part which says:

"The expression 'Chinese immigrant' means any person of Chinese origin, &c."

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Yes, I think the same change should be made.

Mr. WELDON. Make it "any Chinese entering Canada," as we have already explained what a Chinese is.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Yes, that will do.

On section 3,

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I must express my disapproval of that. So far as I have seen the working under the charge of the Customs Department, it has not been at all satisfactory, and, when this Bill was before Parliament a year ago, it was distinctly understood that a person was to have that position as controller, and that the Customs Department would not have charge of this particular Bill or the working out of it. I referred to that part of the Bill at that time, and said that, so far as the port of Victoria was concerned, the Customs Department had sufficient to attend to without having charge of the working out of the provisions of this Bill, and the Minister of Customs endorsed what I said. I am satisfied that, if in the future it is to be worked out as in the past, it will be a very unsatisfactory piece of business. So far as the port of Victoria is concerned—and that is the only place I refer to—the Customs Department have not carried out the provisions of the law. They are not in sympathy with the Bill in any shape or form. Mr. Hamley was controller last year, but he took no interest whatever in seeing that the provisions of this law were enforced. It was left to his deputies to attend to that, and I can state for a fact that he knew of provisions of the Bill being violated and refused to have the guilty parties brought to justice and have them punished. I am satisfied, unless some person is appointed who is in sympathy with this Bill, and desires to see its provisions carried out, it will be a farce so far as enforcing its provisions are concerned.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I do not know whether an officer of the Customs Department has been guilty of negligence of his duty. All I know is that the Bill as it was, and especially as it is, provides sufficient means to have the execution of this Act performed to the satisfaction of all. I might tell my hon. friend, who knows it, I suppose, that the Bill is restrictive enough, and has worked so well that, for the last two months, during which generally a large influx of Chinese immigration used to come to the Pacific coast, not a single entry of a new Chinese immigrant has been made. The law as it is proposed, with respect to registration, is so very stringent upon the officer that, unless there is gross negligence—and in that case he should be reported to headquarters—the Bill can be worked very satisfactorily.

Mr. GORDON. I quite agree with the remarks of the Secretary of State. Last year I was of opinion that such an Act would require a special department, but after seeing its operations for one year, so far as our port is concerned, I think it has worked well, and has almost amounted to an absolute prohibition of Chinese immigration. I am satisfied that there is no mode of enforcing that Act so economical as to have it carried into effect through the Customs Department. Every officer of Customs has access to every steamer, steamship and vessel of every description entering our port, and if the controller appointed was not in connection with the Customs, he would have to go to the Customs officers at the different ports in order to get information to enable him to prevent the Chinese entering the port. That is the conclusion I had arrived at, and I quite justify the Government in giving the administration of that Act to the Customs Department.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think the objection taken against this is very extraordinary. I am against this whole Chinese Bill, myself, but of course we are not discussing that just now, but I do think the proposition to appoint a party outside the Customs Department to superintend this thing is simply ridiculous. I cannot at all sympathise with the vague charges made against the Customs officers of not doing their duty. I notice, in a subsequent part of this Bill, that an officer is to be appointed with a salary of $3,000 a year. To that I certainly would object. If I understood the hon. gentleman who last spoke, he said the practical effect of the Act last year was almost to exclude Chinese immigration altogether. Well, if that is so I do not see what we want with a $3,000 appointment. But leaving that point for the present, I think that if the hon. gentleman in my eye who made the objection to the Customs officers, has any charge to make against them, he should make it to the head of the Department.

Mr. SHAKESPERAE. I know whereof I speak, and the charge was made to the Customs Department against the officer for not doing his duty, and I know that the Customs officer failed positively to do his duty.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then why do you support a Government who retains a Customs officer that fails to do his duty?

On section 6, sub-section 2,

Mr. CHAPLEAU. This is a consolidation of the Act. We might leave that in suspense. I move to strike out the next paragraph after the paragraph concerning the $3,000.

Mr. MITCHELL. I object to the $3,000 paragraph. I do not see what we want of that officer. If the statement of the hon. gentleman in my eye is correct, that this almost excludes Chinese immigration, I do not see why we want to pay a man $3,000 a year for the purpose of interpreting for half a dozen immigrants who come in. If Chinese immigration is almost excluded, I do not see why we should require to appoint an officer at $3,000 a year and incur the other expenses, when there is nothing for him to do. Besides, there will be a lot of clerks to provide for, and I do not think the Government ought to press a policy of that kind upon the House.

Mr. GORDON. The cessation of Chinese immigration may be only of a temporary character. Before the Canadian Pacific Railway was completed, a great many Chinese were thrown out of employment, and that would naturally deter their countrymen from coming over. But the dulness incident to the completion of that road, I hope, will not continue very long, and as soon as times get brisk, as soon as our mines become developed, the Chinese will return in as great numbers as heretofore.

Mr. MILLS. What do you want them to come for?

Mr. GORDON. We do not want them to come, but if they do come we intend that Canada shall derive a proportionate revenue from them, and that is the only mode of getting the revenue which they should contribute to the Treasury of Canada.

Mr. DAVIES. The whole ground on which the Act has been justified was that it would be virtually prohibitory of the entry into this country of a class of people that those hon. gentlemen say it is not desirable to have here. Now if the Act is already effective you appoint a sinecure office with a salary of $3,000 a year, and if the Act is not effective then its object ceases altogether and it should be repealed.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. We want to make the Bill provide for an officer whose salary has been already voted by Parliament. But if there is no need of that officer he will not be employed this year, any more than last year. I think the Government has given, this year, the measure of its discretion in using the credit given last year; if they do not make the appointment, the money will not be expended. But we ought to provide for a possible influx of Chinese immigration, and if we want to prevent frauds we must have an officer who is qualified, so that we may not be obliged to choose from those places where prejudice may exist; but we want to choose a man who will be trained in the language, so that we may avoid difficulties and litigation.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman declared the object of the Government when this law was first proposed. It originated with the people of British Columbia; they were opposed to Chinese immigration. They desired that the Mongolians should be kept out of the country. They said they prevented the settlement of British Columbia by Europeans, that they interfered with the labor, and that it was impossible to secure the settlement of that Province with a desirable class of population, if effective measures were not taken for the exclusion of Chinese. The hon. gentleman appointed a commission. The hon. gentleman proposed a law for the purpose of accomplishing that object and complying with the wishes, with the prejudices if you please, of the people of British Columbia. Now, a representative of British Columbia assures us that it is quite possible there may be, at some future period, when the country is in a more prosperous position, a large influx of Chinese immigrants. That is an extraordinary declaration by the hon. gentleman. Why, I thought British Columbia was to be made a paradise by the exclusion of the Chinese, and now that hon. gentleman tells us it is not so prosperous as it might be, that possibly, in the future, British Columbia's prosperity will revive, and there will be a large influx of Chinese population, and that that class may then become necessary. If the Government intend the measure to be effective, and, I suppose, unless they did intend it to be so, they would not propose these amendments, then this officer and this salary are altogether unnecessary; and if they are necessary, then the hon. gentleman ought to repeal this law and remove the obstacles in the way of Chinese immigration.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The hon. gentleman is mistaken on two points, and they are the only two points in his remarks. The Government did not introduce the law to prohibit Chinese immigration. The hon. gentleman must remember the remarks with which I introduced the Bill last year, when I said it was not to prohibit but to regulate it and to prevent too large an influx of Chinese immigrants, and especially that kind of immigration which should not be encouraged. We know very well that a large portion of the immigration coming to California is of an absolutely pauper class. Some were very good and were profitable to California as they might be to British Columbia, but a large class were paupers, and they had been prevented from coming to British Columbia by the large duty imposed and the restrictions imposed, and the large percentage of tonnage for each Chinese immigrant brought into the country. This is only the repetition of a clause of last year which did not evoke discussion.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not think the reasons given by the Secretary of State are sufficient to warrant us in passing this clause. We have a pretty expensive staff of officers in British Columbia, considering the population.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. We contribute more in proportion than any other Province.

Mr. MITCHELL. You are a pretty expensive item to the Dominion, and we do not want to appoint and pay any more officials. You have an expensive luxury in Mr. Trutch, who is a pet of the Administration and has been foisted on the country, and who is kept there because he has certain friends. I suspect he has been studying the Chinese language, and perhaps the Government make this proposal in the Bill to provide this salary for Mr. Trutch as an interpreter to the Chinese. I do not say it is so; but perhaps the hon. Minister will state whether it is so or not.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It is not so.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think we have already a sufficient staff to attend to this matter. One of the representatives of British Columbia has told us that Chinese immigration has almost stopped there. The Secretary of State has informed us that the immigration has pretty well stopped, and that the object of the Bill is to prevent an excessive immigration coming in. I do not think there is any very great danger of a large immigration of Chinese into the country, and if trade and commerce progress so that the immigration of Chinese labor is necessary, I do not think it will be any very great curse to Canada and to British Columbia if it does come. Our country is suffering from depression of trade, and there are very great complaints of improvements required not being carried out, and yet it is proposed that we should pay a tax of $3,000 a year for an interpreter, as an addition to the expenses of the country.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I object entirely to the remarks made by the hon. gentleman who has last spoken, with respect to the tax on this country. There is no tax whatever, for the Dominion is drawing a revenue by the enforcement of this law. At the port of Victoria alone the Government have received over $9,000, and the cost to the Dominion has not been more than $1,000. So I would ask where does the taxation come in.

Mr. DAVIES. The commission cost more than that.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. That is charged to capital.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. We have nothing to do with that now. The people of British Columbia consider they know whether they want the Chinese or not as well as does the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. I want to tell this House, and especially the hon. gentleman, that the people of British Columbia and the people of Canada do not want the Chinese. The hon. gentleman himself may want them, so that they may supersede white labor. There is no tax to the Dominion for the enforcement of this law. It is essentially necessary that officers of our own should be appointed who understand the Chinese language so as to interpret and explain it. It is very difficult to deal with those people. Everyone knows, who has had anything to do with them, that it is difficult to understand what they say, and if you have to depend on one of their own people they will deceive you before your own eyes. Hence you must have a man who understands their language to explain it to you.

Mr. DAVIES. Who is the interpreter now?

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Trutch.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. There has been a person employed temporary who came from China and who was born there.

An hon. MEMBER. Did he pay duty?

Mr. SHAKESPEARE No, he is a white man, and he understands the language thoroughly, and the judges of British Columbia have given him a good character in that respect. It is absolutely necessary that an interpreter should be appointed for the proper enforcement of this clause.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The young man employed now is one who is attached to the Department of Customs. It is not intended to spend the whole sum of $3,000 if the work can be done for a less amount.

Mr. VAIL. Is it proposed to continue the same person?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It is, if we can secure his services.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move that $3,000 be struck out and $1,000 inserted. The Secretary of State has informed us that the gentleman at present performing the work is attached to the Department of Customs, I presume at a very small salary, and an addition of $1,000 will be quite sufficient. It seems an outrage that an interpreter attached to the Customs Department should receive as much almost as a deputy head of a Department at Ottawa, and nearly half the salary of a Minister of the Crown. It looks to me very much as if it was a salary provided for a place for some gentleman in British Columbia.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It is not provided for that. I do not think the hon. gentleman is serious in his objections. In the limited confidence which that hon. gentleman gives to this Government, he might allow to pass this year what he was willing to allow to pass last year without a word.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman speaks of the limited confidence; I give them all they deserve. I have given them a great deal more than they deserve; I have given them a generous support, and on many occasions I have failed to express my opinion on questions coming before this House, out of sympathy with the Government. I talk in this House, as a rule, according to my convictions, and when I do not it is out of the generosity of my feelings towards the Government.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is quite clear that the hon. gentleman has little confidence in the Government——

Mr. MITCHELL. Not much.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is equally clear that the hon. gentleman has a good deal of confidence in himself.

Mr. MITCHELL. You bet I have—more than I have in you.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman says he always votes according to his convictions, and therefore his errors are not sins of commission, but sins of omission. He says he has often, out of generosity, refrained from voting against the Government when he ought to do so, if it were not for the generous support he was anxious to give them. He says Mr. Trutch is a pet of mine.

Mr. MITCHELL. Of course he is; everybody knows that.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Perhaps the hon. gentleman is in a pet; he has lost his temper lately, I do not know for what reason.

Mr. MITCHELL. I know.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We would like to hear. I have only one thing to say about Mr. Trutch. I will not discuss his services——

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish you would.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. When the proper time comes I will.

Mr. MITCHELL. All right. I will have something to say about that.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman talks about his large salary. He knows, or he ought to know, or else there is a failure in his memory, that Mr. Trutch was a gentleman holding an office before the Union of British Columbia with Canada.

Mr. MITCHELL. He got well paid for it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He was paid a salary, and the British Government insisted as one of the terms of the union between British Columbia and Canada, that certain pensions should be paid. Mr. Trutch was the Minister managing the public lands of the Province of British Columbia—holding an Imperial commission, like other gentlemen in British Columbia in those days. He and several others received pensions, but it was provided that if their services could be used that they should be at the service of the Canadian Government, and the only salary he got from the Government is the difference between his pension and the full salary he had before.

Mr. MITCHELL. I happen to know a little about Mr. Trutch as well as my right hon. friend. I happened to be a member of the Cabinet, of which the right hon. gentleman was leader, when Mr. Trutch was one of the delegates from British Columbia who came here when we proposed to bring in British Columbia into the Confederation. I happen to know that one of the conditions upon which he consented to come into the Confederation was that his salary should be provided for, his pension provided for——

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is not so.

Mr. MITCHELL. I tell you it is so.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is not so.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have as good a memory as the right hon. gentleman. Mr. Trutch took very good care before he came ——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MITCHELL. What is the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. I think the whole discussion is irregular.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have a right to explain. I have a right to follow the right hon. gentleman in the statement he made. It is not right for him to make those statements without reply——

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It was not right for the hon. gentleman to speak as he did at first.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not speak improperly. I say that Mr. Trutch has taken good care of himself. I repeat what I said before, that he is a pet of this Government. When he came here he was made a senator, and after that he received the governorship of British Columbia.

Mr. BOWELL. Mr. Trutch never was a senator.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, he was made Governor of British Columbia; perhaps you will deny that. He got a pension anyway; then he was appointed an agent of the Government—general agent of Canada, controlling the affairs, controlling the expenditure. There are queer stories told about Mr. Trutch.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am speaking within my right. I am discussing the question of salary, and if Mr. Trutch is a candidate for this office, all I can say is that he is pretty well taken care of. The right hon. gentleman has said that he would be prepared to discuss the question of the remuneration of Mr. Trutch and some other pets of his. Well, he will find me prepared to take up and deal with him.

Mr. DAVIES. I cannot see that the House will be justified in paying this enormous sum for an interpreter, in face of the assurance given us by the Secretary of State that the amount paid the interpreter during the past year did not exceed one third of this sum. An employee in the Customs Department last year discharged the duties for a sum a good deal below $1,000, and what justification is there for voting $3,000 to this officer—a larger sum than is paid to some judges? There is no justification for it whatever. I think the sum is extravagant; it is beyond what is required to be paid for the proper discharge of the duties of an interpreter.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. My hon. friends are really unreasonable. What I stated was that we asked that a salary not exceeding that amount should be allowed. I have told my hon. friends that the Government have been careful not to expend any sums uselessly, and I said that the time might come when we could not have the services of an employee as an interpreter, such as we had last year. We say that it may be necessary, and we ask that provision should be made in case we have not a chance of obtaining the services of an employee, who is a skilled scholar in the Chinese language. I think my hon. friends should be satisfied with the explanation of the Government that, if the salary is not needed, or is needed only in a small measure, only the amount actually required will be paid. It may be found necessary to pay $3,000, and I think Parliament should give that amount of confidence to the Government.

Mr. DAVIES. That would be simply asking Parliament to delegate to the Government the power of fixing any salary. We have certain information before the House and I do not think anybody objects to an amount being appropriated for the salary of this officer. The question is to what extent shall this be done, and, so far as the information we have obtained is concerned, I do not think the House is satisfied that $3,000 will justly be required.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. If we require to take a gentleman from China we might not be able to get his services for less.

Mr. DAVIES. Still the hon. gentleman says that an employee discharged the duties last year for $600.

An hon. MEMBER. Quite accidentally.

Mr. DAVIES. He was appointed to a position in the Customs office, and he discharged the duties of interpreter besides his other duties.

Mr. GORDON. He discharged them very indifferently, and the necessity arises that a competent person should be placed in the position of interpreter, not only in connection with the Chinese Bill, but in connection with the Customs Department. I have no doubt the Customs Department feel the necessity for an interpreter in many cases. They felt such a necessity in San Francisco, that they have a Chinese interpreter there in connection with the Customs Department, and it is only reasonable to expect that if you are to get a qualified man you will require to pay for him. There have been a number of cases in which it was found that a native interpreter could not be depended on, and the interpretation has been regarded as very indifferent until the present interpreter came in.

Mr. DAVIES, I leave the hon. gentleman who has just sat down to reconcile the discrepancies between the remarks he has just made and those which were made by another hon. gentleman from British Columbia, who, if I heard him correctly, said that the judge had certified to the efficiency with which this young man performed his duties.

Mr. MITCHELL. To test the question I propose that in sub-section d of section 5, the sum of $1,000 be substituted for $3,000.

Sir JOHN A MACDONALD. Lost.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, we will have it put on record anyway.

Mr. WELDON. I see that the collector gets $3,800 and the chief clerk only $1,600, while it is now proposed to give the interpreter $3,000.

Mr. MILLS. I think it is rather an unusual mode of proceeding for the Government to ask us to give them a very much larger sum than experience shows they require. It would be time enough to vote the very large sum asked for by the Secretary of State when the necessity should arise. That necessity does not exist at the present time. If there is any matter in which Parliament has the right to exercise control over the conduct of the Administration it is with regard to the expenditure of public moneys. If Parliament gives to the Government three or four times the amount they require Parliament is actually abdicating its functions. The hon. gentleman, in asking us to do this, is asking us to depart from the well recognised principle of parliamentary government of control by the representatives of the people over the public expenditure. Suppose every other public office was dealt with as the hon. gentleman proposes we should deal with this one; we should to-day be called on to vote $90,000,000 and to place it at the disposal of the Government, instead of the $30,000,000 odd which they actually require. The hon. First Minister made a statement with regard to our obligations to certain officers in British Columbia, which is an erroneous statement, and I would like to correct it. The amount to which we are placed under obligation to Mr. Trutch and others was the amount that was to be paid to them by the Government of British Columbia in consequence of the abolition of the offices which they held. Mr. Trutch held two offices. I think he held the office of stipendiary magistrate, which was practically abolished, and he held the office of Land Commissioner, which was a provincial office and which was continued, and the hon. gentleman proposed to pension him in regard to both, which he was not called upon to do. I make this statement because otherwise the erroneous statement made by the hon. First Minister would go uncorrected.

Mr. ORTON. I think it very important that there should be a proper Chinese interpreter at the present juncture. We all know that at present there is a reason why we may expect a very large influx of Chinese into British Columbia. It is well known to persons living in British Columbia that Chinese have for some years been washing out gold in some of the gold diggings of that Province. It was only last fall that it was found that Chinese had for two or three years been washing out gold in some very rich deposits, and had been disposing of it in the country and keeping the matter a secret. Owing to the large expected immigration of Chinese, it is highly important that there should be an interpreter, and that the Government should have sufficient authority to pay a man to efficiently discharge his duties.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is useless, with the servile following the Government have——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The CHAIRMAN. Order; I cannot hear a word the hon. gentleman says.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is useless, with the following the Government have, to attempt to defeat them on this question; but I give notice to hon. gentlemen that I will get their names on record when we come to the motion for the third reading of this Bill.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. MULOCK. I am unable to see on what principle the Government are proceeding in assigning so large a salary to this office. When we look at the salary bill of this country, I think it ought to suggest to the Government that they should pause before adding so large a sum as this to the permanent cost of management. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) pointed out the other evening the rate at which the cost of conducting the public service has been increasing in various ways; and with that warning before them, it appears to me unaccountable that the Government should on this occasion ask for authority to pay an interpreter who has to discharge comparatively minor duties, a higher salary than that of the deputy heads at Ottawa. We are told that the deputy heads practically govern the country, and we have deputy heads getting less than $3,000 a year. If we compare the duties discharged by other officials with the salaries paid to them, can you point to a single instance of a public servant getting the salary proposed to be given to this officer who discharges such minor duties? You are going to offer to this officer a higher salary than is given to the professors of the learned institutions of the country. For what reason is this amount put in? There is something behind it, and I think it must be a great secret, or we would have heard it. It cannot be in the public interest that the salary is fixed at the figure proposed.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. With respect to the mystery, what the hon. gentleman has said has already been said by other hon. members in this House.

Mr. MULOCK. I have the right to say it, too.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Yes, and he has the right to get up and say it half a dozen times if he likes.

Mr. MULOCK. What is the secret?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I might tell the secret perhaps, but the hon. gentleman would prefer that I should not say it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. At any rate, it does not appear to me that any sort of reason has been assigned why $3,000 a year should be paid to an interpreter of this kind. I venture to say that this is one of the most extravagant salaries ever proposed to be voted in Parliament, and no sort of excuse has been given for it. I have no doubt an interpreter could be got for one-third of that amount, $1,000.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Last year the salary was voted without hon. gentlemen saying a word about it. What I have said is that if we were obliged to have a man brought from a foreign country as an interpreter, we could not get him for less than $3,000; and I have said that from information I have derived on the spot from people who could advise me. I have stated that up to the present moment we have not been obliged to spend that amount of money, and we might not be obliged to do so; but for the collection of this large duty, which might be considerably increased in another year, we ask from Parliament the sum of $3,000. That is the only reason, and I think it is a good reason, for asking it. The clause of last year was this:

"The Governor in Council may engage and pay an expert skilled in the English and Chinese languages, at a salary of not more than $3,000, to reside in the Province of British Columbia, and also to assign to him such duties as he deems fit."

Mr. MITCHELL. What amount of revenue is there from Chinese this year?

Mr. BOWELL. The revenue collected from the immigration of Chinese in Victoria, was $9,534; in Nanaimo, $54; in Winnipeg, $15.50; in Montreal, $55.50, less refund made to an Englishman who brought his Chinese wife and children to Victoria, and who paid $50 a head for them, of $400, the amount paid on the children, making the total revenue $9,158.50.

Mr. MITCHELL. And for that duty performed by the Customs Department, and for which a subaltern got $600 a year, you are going to tax the people $3,000 a year.

Mr. MULOCK. The Secretary of State intimated he had good reasons to offer, but for certain reasons he did not choose to inform the House of them. I submit that the House is entitled to know the reasons. They may be very good reasons, but I have not that confidence in the Secretary of State, in his official capacity, which would justify me in becoming an endorser for him, without knowing the size of the paper beforehand.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. My hon. friend was joking, and I joked a little at his expense, in connection with that secret reason for the payment to the interpreter.

Mr. DAVIES. The fact that the House voted the amount without question last year is no reason why we should do so this year. I do not know what an interpreter can be procured for, but I think he can be procured for less than $3,000.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. How can you know?

Mr. DAVIES. We have that on the statement of the hon. gentleman himself, that the duties were discharged by a young man in the Customs Department who received about $600.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I said that the salary paid was not $3,000, but I do not know whether it was $1,000 or more. My hon. friend has not the right to misquote me, but of course he does not do so intentionally. I say it was only by accident that we paid less last year. We wanted an interpreter, and were fortunate in finding one at the moment in the Customs Department, but we might not have one on hand at all times. To provide for the cases in which we are obliged to engage a skilled man in the Chinese and other languages, we may have to pay this amount.

Mr. MULOCK. What steps has the hon. gentleman taken to procure officials with these qualifications? Has he advertised?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The hon. gentleman might advertise if he were on this side, and had charge of the administration of the Bill, but I was in San Francisco and made enquiries, and was told we could not procure the services of a skilled interpreter for less than $3,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That may be true as regards San Francisco, but I am sure that in the British treaty ports of China, men thoroughly acquainted with the English and Chinese languages can be got for a considerably smaller sum. Some years ago, qualifications of that kind were at a scarcity price, but if the hon. gentleman had made enquiries in Hong Kong and other Chinese ports, thrown open to British merchants, he would find competent interpreters for a smaller sum.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The information I had from people coming from those ports was that to get a competent interpreter we would have to pay the sum I mentioned.

Mr. MITCHELL. I understood the objection to the Chinese was Chinese cheap labor, but at the rate of $3,000 a year the labor is no longer cheap.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. We do not want to take a Chinaman for that.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am not aware that there is any great difficulty in getting a Chinese interpreter. There are lots of people willing to take the position.

Mr. BARNARD. Many of the gentlemen who have spoken on this question have spoken without a knowledge of the circumstances. If they had resided in Victoria, they would never have raised the objection as to the salary. I do not believe that in the city of Victoria at present, more than one or two men could be found to take that position at all. It would never do to take a Chinaman, because you could not rely on his giving a correct version of the evidence. No one Chinaman has respect or has confidence in another. They have a rule by which they can protect themselves, but they cannot go beyond that. If an interpreter were advertised for, there would not be more than two or three applicants for the place.

On section 8,

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I propose, in sub-section d, to strike out the word "merchant," and in the third line the word "occupation." The clause will read:

Tourists, men of science, students who are bearers of certificates of identity specifying their object in coming to Canada, or other similar documents issued by the Chinese Government.

Mr. DAVIES. Why strike out the word "merchants." It seems unreasonable that merchants who come for purposes of trade should be subject to the penalty of $50 a head.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The representatives of British Columbia have urged the necessity of this upon the Government. There is great difficulty in distinguishing who is a merchant and who is not, and it is deemed necessary that a man who comes here to speculate should pay $50.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I am very glad that the Minister has decided to strike the word "merchants" out of that clause. It is essentially necessary that it should be struck out, because, in coming into the country, they pass themselves off as laborers while it is well known to the people of British Columbia that they are merchants. Here is a case in point. Ah-kim came over as a laborer from Puget Sound to Victoria with an American certificate. He then went to the American side and came back with a certificate representing him as a merchant, with the British Consul's stamp. That is the chief reason why the word "merchant" should be left out of this Bill. The laborers represent themselves as being merchants, and they have done that in several cases, and if you leave that word in they will be imposing upon the law continually.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman's reasoning does not convince me. The object of the Act was, first, to prevent the influx of Chinese laborers who might compete unfairly with our laborers; and, secondly, to prevent the influx of persons of a low order, who were addicted to vices which it was not desirable to introduce into this country. Those were the statements which justified the Minister in bringing in the Bill, because the Bill, on principle, can hardly be justified or defended at all. If the hon. gentleman says: You must take out the word "merchant," because we have had false certificates, does he not see that the same thing will continue, but these men will be certified as tourists, men of science, students, and in many other ways. It seems to me that, if there is a class of respectable Chinamen—and we know that they have merchants as respectable as the merchants of any other nation in the world—for this Parliament to subject a respectable merchant of China to a penalty of $50, because he enters this country, is not creditable. Whatever arguments may be used in favor of excluding a lower and vicious order of people, cannot be extended to the class known as merchants; and, as for false certificates being imposed upon the interpreter, they will continue to be imposed, upon the ground of the people being tourists or something else.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. My hon. friend is mistaken in one thing. We want to prevent hordes of paupers coming into the country and impose a tax upon them. We do not prevent men of means coming, and if they are men of intelligence as well as of means, they will understand having to pay the small duty, in comparison to their means, of $50, which is imposed by the Government, owing to the difficulty of ascertaining from other Chinese immigrants their real occupation. They will understand that it is the fault of their own fellow countrymen that the duty is imposed upon men upon whom the Government perhaps would not be disposed to impose it, because of the difficulty in distinguishing between merchants and those who are not merchants.

Mr. MULOCK. I think this section is rather loosely drawn. It is quite possible under this for the whole object of this Act to be defeated. The Chinese Government will be quite interested in unloading its pauper people on the Dominion of Canada, and will not be very particular when asked to certify. They may furnish certificates which will enable that class of people to come in under the term "tourists," and the Government cannot exclude them. Under this clause, if any immigrant presents a certificate stating why he has come into Canada, the tax cannot be collected. If the Chinese Government certify that Ah Sin is a tourist and has come into Canada for the purpose of visiting Canada, you cannot collect the tax. You do not reserve any power to yourselves to decide whether the certificate shows good reason or not why the man should be exempt.

Therefore I think the clause will simply enable the Chinese Government to be a little lax and to dump its pauper immigrants, its surplus population, on Canada.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I am afraid my hon. friend has come into the House too late to read the Bill. He has read six lines of the clause, but, if he had read the continuation of the clause, he would have seen that his remarks are not à propos. He is wrong in two ways. He should know, knowing history as he does, that the policy of the Chinese Government is against immigration, and, if people are coming to British Columbia, they are coming there against the desire of the Chinese Government. Further, he will see by the continuation of the clause that that certificate to tourists, men of science and students, is not a thing that the man will put in his pocket according to the demand of the Chinese Government, but that certificate must be either in the French or English language, it must be examined and must have been endorsed, visé, by a British consul or chargé d'affaires or other accredited representative of Her Majesty at the place where the same is granted or the place of departure for Canada. I presume the hon. gentleman does not think these people will conspire to give bogus certificates.

Mr. DAVIES. It was just that which induced me to oppose striking out the word "merchant," because the argument of the gentleman from British Columbia was that certain people came with certificates as merchants who were really laborers. His argument implied a charge of fraud against the British consul. Now, the merchants, men of science and students are all classed together, and, if one requires a certificate in English or French endorsed by the British consul, the other requires it, and yet the hon. gentleman says there is no fear of any fraud being practised because of the high character of the officials. In that case, there is no reason for striking out the merchants. The word "merchant" as defined in this Act does not include everyone engaged in every species of trade, but only those engaged in the higher classes as the merchants. Is it creditable to this nation to say that a merchant engaged in the higher branches of trade shall not come into this country unless he pays $50 head money? I say it is discreditable in the extreme, and I cannot understand the policy of the Government. I can understand their policy in excluding laborers, because they say, whether rightly or wrongly, that Chinese labor is coming into competition with labor in this country, and I can also understand it in regard to those who are addicted to unnameable vices; but I cannot understand their policy in regard to the exclusion of, and the infliction of a penalty on those Chinese gentlemen who are engaged in the higher classes of trade.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. Striking out the word "merchant" will tend to keep out the laboring class.

Mr. DAVIES. No, it will not.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. Certainly, because those attempt to come in as merchants who are not merchants.

Mr. DAVIES. They must have a certificate from the British consul.

Mr SHAKESPEARE. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIES. Will he be a party to a fraud?

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. They must have a certificate, of course, from the British consul, and there is no doubt that that has been done. They have obtained certificates from the British consul representing themselves as merchants, when it is well known that they were laboring men.

Mr. WELDON. That is a charge against the consuls. If the consuls are guilty of fraud, they should be dismissed from their positions. That is not a charge against the Chinese but against the English consuls. It seems to me we should leave out these restrictions, if we are going to have the great Indian trade by the Canadian Pacific Railway, which debar merchants from coming in there. We know that no men are carrying on commercial operations to a larger extent than the Chinese themselves, and they stand as high as any other merchants. Those who have been in China know that some of the wealthiest merchants in the world are Chinamen, and to debar Chinese merchants from coming into the country by such restrictions, as are provided here, seems to me a relic of barbarism.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am sorry the statement made by the hon. gentleman, reflecting upon British consuls in Canada, was not made in the presence of the right hon. Premier, who has such an admiration of British officials everywhere.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I beg leave to correct the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am sure if he had been present the statement would have met with a prompt contradiction. I for one have no hesitation in saying that I do not believe that any British consul who represents Her Majesty in Chinese ports would give a certificate that he did not believe to be true.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I never said so.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman said that persons representing themselves as merchants got certificates from consuls, and arrived at Victoria as merchants, when, in fact, they were not merchants. Where did they get them, he asked? They must have got them from the place from which they sailed in China, I presume.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. No.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is where the Chinese come from, although some of them may have come from San Francisco and some other ports in the United States. Are these to be debarred? Let him distinguish, don't let him cast reflections upon a class of British servants that stand as high as any others of their class in the world. If he did not mean British consuls, he should have stated who he did mean.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. If the hon. gentlemen are so fond of encouraging Chinese immigration let them move an amendment, if they like, in favor of it.

Mr. MULOCK. I would like to ask the Secretary of State if there is anything in this Bill that would prevent any persons of this class that are alluded to from coming in on a certificate and changing their minds the moment they arrived in the country and had passed the Customs, and becoming residents. They come in free if they produce a certificate that they are tourists; the certificate may be given to them honestly, but once they have escaped the Customs they are within the Dominion and can become settlers. Is there any provisions whereby, if they change their minds and become residents, they are liable to be taxed?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. There is none.

Mr. MULOCK. There ought to be, I think.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. Secretary of State says we are anxious to encourage Chinese immigration. I, for one, have no hesitation in saying that so far as the mercantile class of Chinese are concerned, I am desirous of encouraging them, and I think that subjecting Chinese merchants to a penalty of $50 per head on entering this Dominion is an unfortunate prelude to the opening up of the Canadian Pacific Railway, by which we expected to obtain such a large part of the Eastern trade as we are promised. I hope the hon. gentleman will withdraw his motion, for I am strongly opposed to it.

Mr. GORDON. So far as British Columbia is concerned, I am satisfied that no Bill ever passed this Parliament that has given such general satisfaction as this Bill to restrict Chinese immigration. As to Chinese merchants, the people of Prince Edward Island have never seen any. The Province of Prince Edward Island has never been invaded by Chinese immigrants, for if it had been the hon. gentleman would sing a different song to-night. I am very much mistaken if the people of that Province do not see the danger that is in store for them by hon gentlemen objecting to every measure pertaining to unlimited Chinese immigration.

Mr. DAVIES. I did not say so.

Mr. GORDON. This Bill has received the approbation of the Chinese merchants, in British Columbia, as well as of the white people, for the reason that a large number of the people had been deceived in coming to the Pacific coast, and on the termination of these large works, many of them were thrown out of employment, and became a burden upon Chinese merchants in British Columbia. A Chinese merchant assured me personally that he was not only opposed to Chinese immigration being continued, but he was opposed to any more Chinese merchants coming in. A Chinaman also informed me that there were over 500 Chinese out of employment, between Nanaimo and Victoria, and had been for months. Now, if hon. gentlemen opposite desire to see the Chinese come into the Dominion, let them proclaim it to their own Provinces, and make an effort to bring them to their Provinces.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman is entirely wandering from the question before the House. The question was not whether there should be an indiscriminate influx of Chinese into the country, and whether there should be a provision to prevent it; the question was, whether a particular class of Chinese, which had been admitted last year without paying head money, should now be excluded until they had paid that head money. The only argument the hon. gentleman gave for it was that a very respectable class of merchants there now held the monopoly of the Chinese trade, and they wished to exclude other Chinese merchants from coming there to trade. That may be a good argument for the hon. gentleman to use, who is a monopolist, but as I am not a monopolist, I am opposed to this provision.

The CHAIRMAN. It is moved to amend the clause by striking out the third sub-section.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. With respect to the first clause of section 7, I ask that $100 replace $50.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The hon. gentleman has already had a concession made in regard to merchants.

Mr. DAVIES. This cannot be done except by resolution.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. It is in accordance with the wishes of the people of British Columbia that the amount be increased to $100, similar to the amount in the Australian Colonies. Not only do the people of British Columbia ask it, but many of the people of Ontario have expressed themselves in the same direction.

Mr. VAIL. The hon. members for British Columbia have stated that this Act amounted to almost total prohibition for the last year. If so, why increase the fee. If $50 is sufficient to make the Bill of a prohibitory character, why increase the amount?

Mr. DAVIES.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. This is not the season of the year when Chinese come into the Province. It is an erroneous idea to suppose that because few Chinese have come there within the last few weeks Chinese immigration has ceased. They come in larger numbers late in spring and during the summer months.

Mr. DAVIES. Is it in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The clause is carried.

On section 16,

Mr. DAVIES. This is a new clause.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It is exactly the same thing as in the Bill, but it is to provide for certain cases not provided for last year.

Mr. BOWELL. It is for the purpose of allowing the railways and steamboats to carry Chinese from one port through the country to another. I will give the hon. gentleman an illustration. A number of Chinese were coming from New York or Boston to San Francisco, via Suspension Bridge, and thence by the Grand Trunk or Canada Southern through to Detroit, and there was no way of manifesting them, if I may use that term. This provision of the Bill is to enable them to be manifested through to the point of exit.

An hon. MEMBER. They go through in bond.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes; literally they go through in bond, because the railway is responsible for the $50 on each Chinaman they do not land at Detroit or other outward points.

On section 19,

Mr. DAVIES. This seems rather an unreasonable clause.

Mr. BOWELL. Why?

Mr. DAVIES. There are two or three objections. In the first place the Chinese are here; we must put up with them. And yet you levy a special tax on them, and for what reason? Why are the poor fellows to be subject to a per capita tax of $1? Besides, this is imposing penalties, so the clause should initiate in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman will understand, if he has paid any attentton to the laws providing for the registration of the inhabitants of a country, that you must impose some penalty for non-compliance with the law if you wish to fulfil the conditions of the law. I do not know how it is in the Province from which the hon. gentleman comes, but in the Province of Ontario, in the case of every child that is born, the parents, the nurse, or some one else, is obliged to report it to the registrar in order that a correct registration may be kept; and it was found necessary, if you desire to keep a record of the exact number of Chinese now in the country and of those who arrive in the country, to have as perfect a system of registration as it is possible to make. If you enact a law declaring that every child born of Chinese parents shall be registered, without imposing a penalty for non-compliance with the law, of course the committee will see that it would be impossible to carry it out.

Mr. DAVIES. That may be some reason for exacting a penalty at the time of registering, but it is no reason for imposing a per capita tax of $1. I do not see on what ground that tax is justified.

Mr. BOWELL. It may be a question as to whether it is too large or not, but I know in the Province of Ontario they have to pay a fee in connection with the registration.

Mr. WELDON. Persons coming in should pay, but I think it would be unjust to make those who are residents pay such fees.

Mr. BOWELL. That would meet the case. Of course a Chinese immigrant who comes into the country pays $50, but the object of this clause is to compel those now in the country to become registered, in order that we may be able to follow them.

Mr. WELDON. I have no objection to have a penalty for non-registration, but why impose a tax of $1 each?

Mr. BOWELL. You cannot expect books to be furnished and kept without cost. If the amount is considered too large, I have no doubt my hon. friend would reduce it.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I propose to amend the clause by making it 50 cents, as it was last year.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 26,

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The 26th clause provides that any Chinese person wishing to visit China and to return within a year might ask a certificate on leaving, and when on return he presented that certificate, he would obtain his entry free into Canada. Representations have been made to us that this system leads to great abuse. The Chinese who intend leaving the country for good, ask for a certificate, and on arriving in China sell it to somebody else; and as there is great difficulty in distinguishing one Chinese immigrant from another, a good many frauds are committed. To meet this difficulty, I have amended the clause so as to make it read:

Any Chinese person who wishes to leave Canada, with the declared intention of returning, shall give notice of such intention to the controller at the port whence he proposes to depart, and surrender to him his certificate of registration, receiving in lieu thereof, on payment of $1, a certificate of leave to depart and to return."

This obligation is in order to get correct statistics of the number of Chinese in the country. It may appear extraordinary that we should oblige them to register on leaving, but it is necessary in order to have accurate statistics—

And the person to whom such certificate is granted shall, on presentation of the same, on his return within one year from the date thereof, and on proving his identity to the satisfaction of the controller, be entitled to receive from the controller, the amount of the entrance fee paid by him on such return and have his certificate of registration returned to him. If he does not return within one year, the original certificate shall be cancelled.

The Chinese take certificates to leave and return. The master of the vessel is responsible for the entrance fee, and pays the full amount for the number of Chinese he brings in. Among them there may be one or more who have certificates to leave and return, and on proving identity to the satisfaction of the controller, the immigrant who returns with his certificate will be remitted the amount of his second entrance fee.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. Throwing the responsibility on a Chinaman to prove anything is a small matter to him, for he will prove anything. That is our experience. The clause seems to me to be a little complicated, and I fear will not work satisfactorily. It would be far better to do away with the certificate entirely.

Mr. WELDON. And make them pay when they come back.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. Why not, if they want to come back. As it is, they have been selling the certificates and making money out of them. I am desirous of having that certificate business done away with entirely. So far, it has proved very unsatisfactory; in fact it has proved a fraud. There is no difficulty in the world in those Chinese getting all the certificates they want and still remaining in the Province, while they send the certificates to China or the United States and sell them at $25 a piece. As they pay only a $1 they make their profit, and those who purchase them are saved $25 on their entrance fee. It is impossible to carry out that provision of the law. The only way we can meet the case is to strike out the clause with regard to the certificate entirely. It is the unanimous wish of the people of British Columbia, who have to come in contact with these people in the way of labor, that the certificates should be abolished, for the simple reason that the Chinese will defraud the Government and violate the law.

Mr. GILLMOR. I am sorry my hon. friend seems to have a sort of hydrophobia about Chinamen. He would not allow the poor Chinaman, who wants to return home, to come back again without paying $50 each time.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. My hon. friend says: I want him to pay $50 for coming back to his home. British Columbia is not his home. He does not bring his family there, but comes there with the intention of returning to China.

Mr. WELDON. Dead or alive.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. Dead or alive.

Mr. GILLMOR. I think this fee should be struck out altogether. It must be degrading to the kind sentiments of the Secretary of State. The whole thing must be painful to him, because no man could have written and consented to the very humane and sympathetic report which he wrote, and yet bring in this legislation. My hon. friend does not believe at all in the report submitted to Parliament, but that investigation which was so thorough was, I believe, proved. My hon. friend does not believe a word about the character given to Chinamen in that report. He says there is no honesty or morality in them; but the report proves they are as moral as the hon. gentleman's white brethren and much more so. The trouble with my hon. friend is that they have no votes. Then again I believe the people are not so unanimous in Victoria with regard to this Chinese affair.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. Yes.

Mr. GILLMOR. Not by any means so unanimous.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. Prove that they are not.

Mr. GILLMOR. The report shows it. These merchants bear the very highest character for integrity, honesty, punctuality, and so do the Chinese as a class bear that character, and here is a man who would not allow his brother fellowmen—does my hon. friend consider them as his brothermen? Does he not have any feeling of that kind towards them? That shows how far politics will blind a man's morality and a man's feelings.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. Ditto.

Mr. GILLMOR. I do not think you will find a Chinaman who will express sentiments more degrading than those. If so, they are worse than I think they are.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. As my hon. friend has appealed to my personal feeling and opinion, I may say that, if it was a matter of personal feeling and opinion, I might not be altogether sympathetic with the legislation we passed, but the Government passes legislation for the country and in accordance with the expression of the feelings of the country.

Mr. GORDON. As one of the members from British Columbia, I should like to see the clause granting the Chinese certificates to return struck out of the Bill. The collector at Nanaimo is a New Brunswicker, and I do not know but that he is intimately acquainted with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gillmor) or one of his nearest neighbors on that side of the House, and, in the only cases in which Chinese have applied to him for certificates to return, they have first asked if they could get them to send to their friends, in order to bring their friends into Canada and avoid the $50 penalty. The collector told them they could get the certificates on the terms named in the Act, and, when he proposed to examine them, to examine the marks on their bodies, they became perfectly indifferent as to whether they had the certificate and paid the 50 cents or not. Now, if the hon. gentleman from New Brunswick had that class of people in his county, his humanity would change its form before the next election in the interest of his own people and of those people from his native Province who are scattered all over this Dominion, and are making this Dominion what we hope it is to be. It is that competition that is standing as a bar to the people of his own Province and of all these eastern Provinces, preventing them from approaching the Pacific coast to earn their livelihood at ordinary labor. For these reasons, and in order that the Act should be carried out, and should effect what it is intended to effect, I should prefer to see the 25th and 26th clauses, and the 24th clause from the word "Act," in the tenth line, struck out of the Bill. I do not wish to insist upon this if the clause the hon. the Secretary of State has provided will meet the case.

Mr. MILLS. The observation made by the hon. the Secretary of State, in reply to my hon. friend, is a frank confession that the sentiments expressed in the Bill before us and the legislation of last year do not express the personal sentiments of the Secretary of State. He declares he has a much more favorable opinion of the Chinese than is indicated by this legislation, and that, in promoting legislation of this sort, he is rather acting in consonance with the views of the supporters of the Government than with those which he himself entertains.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I did not say that. I have made my confession, but I do not wish it to be distorted.

Mr. MILLS. I think I have fairly stated the effect of the hon. gentleman's remarks, which remind me of what was said by Mr. Pulteney, an English statesman, on one occasion, when he said that the heads of a party were sometimes like the heads of snakes, driven along by their tails.

Mr. HACKETT. I am sorry that the opposition to this Bill should come from the eastern Provinces. I notice that the opposition all comes from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

Mr. DAVIES. There never was any opposition to the Bill.

Mr. HACKETT. There has been a great deal of opposition. We have taken the greater part of the afternoon in discussing a Bill which has been for the greater part law for a year.

Mr. MILLS. It is to perfect it.

Mr. HACKETT. The hon. gentleman does not appear to desire to perfect it, but his whole idea seems to be to obstruct it in every possible way. As I understand it, the object of this Bill is the protection of white labor in the Dominion of Canada. The people of British Columbia have suffered exceedingly from the influx of Chinese labor into that Province, and it is the duty of the representatives of the people from the eastern Provinces to support the representatives from British Columbia in the protection of the people of that Province. What do we find this evening? We find hon. gentlemen from the eastern Provinces, because they think they are out of the reach of Chinese immigration, obstructing the passage of this Bill. Are they out of the reach of Chinese immigration? We know that these people swarm over the whole country, that they are not confined to any locality, that, when once they get a footing, you find them spreading from one end of a country to the other, and now, with the opening of the Canadian Pacific Railway, we may find that the Provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island may be invaded by these people, and what may be the effect? We have very large industries there in connection with fishing. We have people engaged in the canning of lobsters and mackerel and fish of that kind, and, if we get this cheap labor, our sons and daughters may be driven out of the country to a foreign country to make way for these Chinese; and yet we find hon. gentlemen opposing this Bill in order to allow the Chinese to come Scot free into the country to drive out our labor. But how silent are the hon. gentlemen from Ontario and Quebec. What are the knights of labor doing in this country now? They are fighting a hard battle against capital, and they have passed resolutions objecting to Chinese labor; but, where those knights of labor are strong, where you find labor strong, as in the cities of Toronto and Montreal, you find the representatives of those cities do not stand up advocating the Chinese, but the representatives of the Maritime Provinces, where they expect to be free for some years from the influx of Chinese immigration and Chinese labor, to advocate them and believe they are acting in the interests of their people. I am in the interest of the people of British Columbia in this matter, and I believe the interests of all our people will be served by keeping out Chinese labor. I think the member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) has insulted the white people of this country when he says the Chinese are as moral as the white population. To say that these people, who are shown by the strongest evidence brought out in the United States and in Canada as well, to be the most immoral of all people, are to be compared with the people of Canada, and to say that they are more moral than the people of British Columbia or of any other part of the country, is an insult to the people of this country. I hope this Bill will go through without any further opposition, although there may be an organised opposition and it may be agreed upon that gentlemen from Ontario and Quebec shall not oppose it, but that the opposition shall be confined to the members from the Maritime Provinces. I hope that the opposition will not succeed, and that the good sense of the House will stand by the people of British Columbia, and exclude from this country the people of China as much as possible, consistent with our duty to all the people of Canada.

Mr. DAVIES. I hope the Secretary of State will take to heart the lecture he has received, and inasmuch as the hon. gentleman from Prince (Mr. Hackett) is altogether in accord with the members from British Columbia, that the Secretary of State will endorse the suggestion made to him, and withdraw this section at once.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Between the two I will keep the Bill as it is.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I would like the clause to be amended by reducing the time from one year to six months. I hope the Minister will consent to that.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It is so far from British Columbia to China. In China they are obliged to go on foot.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I move to strike out the words "one year," in the 23rd line of the 26th clause, and that the words "six months" be substituted in lieu thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. I declare the amendment lost. Is it the pleasure of the committee that the clause as amended be passed.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. Yeas and nays.

The CHAIRMAN. It was declared lost. Is it the pleasure of the committee that the 26th clause do pass?

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I want that question settled, and I want the House divided upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. I declared that lost, and I gave plenty of time.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. You did not look up. A dozen members were on their feet, and you were looking at your paper at the same time.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. This could not appear at all in the Votes and Proceedings. The hon. gentleman can move it when the Speaker is in the Chair. Of course, I understand the hon. gentleman's object, and I do not blame him for it.

On section 33,

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I propose to put the word "fees" before the word "duty."

Mr. MILLS. This seems to me at variance with the terms of Union. You pay to British Columbia a certain subsidy, and if this is properly collectable by the Parliament of Canada, and forms part of the Consolidated Revenue, there is no more reason for paying it out to British Columbia, in addition to the subsidy to which she is entitled, than to pay it out of the Customs duties.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. The Provincial Government may be of considerable assistance at different times to the Dominion, in enforcing this Act, and it is not unfair, I think, to allow the portion mentioned in the Bill, to go to the Province. We want all the help we can get to enforce the provisions of the law.

Mr. GORDON. Seeing that British Columbia suffers the most from this scourge, she ought to be entitled to some remuneration.

Mr. HESSON. If Chinese are to be permitted to come in under a license, it is but right that the Province should obtain some compensation.

Mr. DAVIES. Compensation for what?

Mr. HESSON. It is provided that they shall come in under certain regulations, and it is only fair that the Province should have something to say as to the distribution of the fund arising out of their coming in. Certificates are to be issued to certain parties on certain payments, the Government receives the money, and if the effect to British Columbia is as damaging as the members represent it to be, it is but fair, if we insist that Chinese shall be allowed to come in, that the people of British Columbia should have some compensation. I think the proposition a reasonable one.

Mr. WELDON. On the same principle the people of the Maritime Provinces should be allowed compensation for the duty on flour.

Mr. HESSON. The people of the Lower Provinces can get good flour without paying any duty. We are able to furnish them with the best flour, and I hope the trade will develop.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. This is a clause a little outside of the general run; still, in prosecutions, part of the fine is always given to the local authorities. In this case, we have necessarily the assistance of the local officers of the Government, and there is no provision to indemnify them for their assistance given in carrying out the Act. This Bill has had the assent of public opinion in British Columbia, as had the Bill of last year, and it is not desirable to make any change this year, at all events.

Committee rose and reported.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 13th May, 1886.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FOURTH REPORT OF PRINTING COMMITTEE.

Mr. BERGIN. I move, seconded by Mr. Trow, that the fourth report of the Joint Committee of both Houses on Printing be adopted. In moving the adoption of this report, I think it well to state that the discussion in this House upon this report the other day was brought before the joint committee this morning, and the committee resolved, without division, to press the adoption of the report upon the House. The committee felt that they would not be true to their own dignity did they consent to the suggestion offered that this report should be revised by the Committee on Public Accounts. We did not feel that any committee in this House ought to place themselves in a position to have their work revised by another committee. The only authority to revise the report of a committee, to approve or condemn it, is the Parliament of this country, not any of its committees. The committee still adhere to their opinion, and they are the more strengthened in it, because they believe that although the Committee on Public Accounts were acting within their province when they recommended that the accounts of this House should be audited by the Auditor General, and although this House approved of the recommendation of the committee at that time, still, to give it the force of law, it was necessary that the Audit Act should be amended. For all these reasons, the committee felt that their report should be pressed upon the House, and they do not admit that the suggestion that this difficulty was due to a mere misunderstanding between two officers of this House moved them in any way, or at all entered into their consideration.

Mr. BLAKE. The adoption of this report cannot be moved to-day without notice. I had certainly some reason to hope that a different view would have been taken by the committee, and as they have determined to press the adoption of the report, I think the House should have some information as to the reasons for a decision of such serious consequence. I, therefore, object to the motion without notice.

Mr. SPEAKER. Of course, it is a motion requiring notice.

Mr. BERGIN. I do not think the objection taken by the hon. member for West Durham is well taken. It was perfectly understood at the time I withdrew the motion that it should be considered there was sufficient notice.

Mr. BLAKE. I must deny that statement. When in the world was the notice given? The question is, have the members of the House had any notice that this motion was to be made to-day?

Mr. BERGIN. The motion was withdrawn in order that the report might be submitted to the committee, and that the opinion of the committee might be given as to the propriety of the suggestion that was offered.

Mr. SPEAKER. A motion for the adoption of a report requires notice like any other motion, unless it is dispensed with by the unanimous consent of the House. If the objection is taken, of course it must go over.

Mr. BERGIN. It is very late in the Session, and I can quite understand that the hon. member for West Durham is taking advantage of the rules of the House to throw this over. I do not think it is very courteous.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not think it is in order to impute any such motive to me. All I can say is, that that observation is perfectly baseless.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman gives notice for to-morrow, I have no doubt both sides of the House will consent to the report being considered then.

Mr. BERGIN. If the House consents to take it up to-morrow, I am willing to withdraw the motion.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will withdraw the baseless observation before he asks us to consent.

Mr. BERGIN. I have no objection to accept the statement of the hon. member for West Durham that he had no such intention, but I think he will give me credit for the fact that the appearances justify——

Mr. BLAKE. I will give no credit for any such fact.

Motion withdrawn.

IMPROVEMENT OF RED RIVER.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew), (for Mr. SCOTT) asked, Is it the intention of the Government to place a sum in the Supplementary Estimates for the purpose of improving the Red River at St. Andrew's Rapids, so as to make the river navigable for lake vessels?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Though I partly answered this question a day or two ago, on a question that was put by another hon. member from Manitoba, I may say that during last season we had a survey made of that portion of the Red River known as the St. Andrew's Rapids, extending for a distance of about ten miles; that the assistant who made the examination gave the quantity of dredging that would have to be done; that it would cost a very large sum of money, over $500,000; then it is suggested that instead of that we might construct locks and dam on the plan adopted by the United States Government. To take that up, and have an examination and estimate, we would require an additional examination to be made of the river during next season. After that the matter will be laid before the Council, and, of course, I am not in a position to say what may be the result of their deliberations.

MANITOBA CENSUS.

Mr. SCOTT asked, Is it the intention of the Government to have a census of the Province of Manitoba taken this year?

Mr. CARLING. It is the intention of the Government.

TÊTE DU POINT BARRACKS AT KINGSTON.

Mr. GUNN asked, Is it the intention of the Government to sell the property known as the "Tête du Point" Barracks at Kingston? If so, whether it is to be sold by tender or by public auction, and whether full notice of the same will be given by advertisement?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is not the intention of the Government to sell that property.

EXPORTS AND IMPORTS.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, What is the total value of all goods, being the produce of Canada, exported during the period from 1st July to 1st April in the fiscal years 1885 and 1886 respectively? Also, what the amounts of goods entered for consumption during the said periods of the said years?

Mr. BERGIN.

Mr. BOWELL. The total value of goods exported for the nine months ending 31st March, 1885, is $59,782,676; the total value of goods exported for the nine months ending 31st March, 1886, is $57,098,674. The total amount of goods entered for consumption, exclusive of British Columbia, for the nine months ending 31st March, 1885, is $73,665,255; the total amount of goods entered for consumption, exclusive of British Columbia, for the nine months ending 31st March, 1886, is $72,856,598.

WINDSOR BRANCH RAILWAY—NOVA SCOTIA.

Mr. KINNEY asked, What was the arrangement with respect to the "Windsor Branch," finally settled by the Dominion Government with the Government of Nova Scotia, and referred to by the Premier of that Province in his address to the Legislature on 4th inst. as "not unsatisfactory to the Government of Nova Scotia?"

Mr. THOMPSON. In the absence of the Minister of Railways, I may state that no arrangement was finally settled by the Dominion Government with the Government of Nova Scotia with reference to the Windsor Branch. I have not seen the speech of the First Minister of Nova Scotia in which he refers to that subject, but I presume that his reference was to the Order in Council which was sent to the Government of Nova Scotia, after having been adopted here, and the substance of which is, that if satisfactory arrangements should be made by the Nova Scotia Government for the consolidation of the western railways, by which the Western Counties Railway shall be acquired and completed and the Windsor and Annapolis Railway acquired, the Windsor Branch might still be ceded to the proprietors of the consolidated road or the Government of Nova Scotia; and that, in lieu of the release required by the Statute to be given by the Western Counties Railway Company, the Government might be willing to accept the indemnity of the Nova Scotia Government.

SHORT LINE RAILWAY—MONTREAL TO SALISBURY.

Mr. KIRK asked, Has a contract been entered into by the Government with any person or company for the building of the Short Line Railway from Montreal via Fredericton to Salisbury? If so, with whom? Will the contract be laid before the House this Session?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, a contract has been entered into with the International Railway Company, of which Mr. Duncan McIntyre is president. I understand it will not be laid on the Table this Session, unless asked for.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. CHAPLEAU moved third reading of Bill (No. 106) to amend an Act to restrict and regulate Chinese immigration into Canada.

Mr. MITCHELL. I object to that Bill being read the third time, as it stands, and I gave notice to the House that when it came up for third reading I would propose an amendment. I beg to move in amendment:

That the Bill be not read the third time, but be referred back to the committee for the purpose of having sub-section "D" of section 5 amended, by leaving out the "$3,000" and substituting "$1,000."

As there may be some hon. gentlemen here who were not present during the discussion, I may briefly state that the objection I have to this sub-section is that it provides $3,000 per annum for a Chinese interpreter. As the object of the whole Chinese legislation is the exclusion of Chinese from the Dominion, I think the sum provided for the interpreter is entirely out of proportion to the work. It is nearly the sum given to a deputy head of an official Department which controls hundreds of thousands of dollars expenditure; it is one-third what a Cabinet Minister gets; it is entirely out of proportion to the duties to be performed, and it was admitted by one of the Ministers that these duties had been performed by a clerk in the custom house who receives a salary of $600 per annum. Why the law should be amended so as to give the Government power to appoint a Chinese interpreter and pay him $3,000 per annum, is almost unaccountable. There may be the intention to provide a place for some Government attache whom they desire to locate safely and comfortably for the rest of his life; but, looking at the financial condition of the country and the enormous expenditure that is going on, we must conclude that such an officer is almost entirely unnecessary, especially in view of the fact that our intention is to exclude these people.

Mr. SPEAKER. Call in the members.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is surprised——

Mr. MITCHELL. I rise to a question of order. Have not the members been called in.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. Minister rose before I called in the members.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The hon. gentleman is surprised, and asks why the Bill of last year should be so amended as to put in a clause providing for such a salary for this officer, the Chinese interpreter. I did not ask to amend the Bill in this manner. The measure before the House, which is a consolidation of the Bill of last year, does not amend anything in that respect, as the same amount was voted last year, so that it is not new legislation or new expenditure. I could understand this part of the hon. gentleman's argument, where he said that it has come out in the debate that during last year the services of an interpreter were performed by an employee in the Civil Service, an officer of the Customs Department, and that his services did not cost more than a few hundred dollars besides his salary. I am informed by the Minister of Customs that, accidentally, an officer of the Customs Department was appointed at a salary of $1,500 in the Customs, doing the duty of interpreter, because it happens that he can perform that duty at the present moment. Can he do it thoroughly? Can he do it completely? Can he continue to do it? We do not know. We say that, in case the Government should require—and the Government may require at any time—the services of an interpreter, the salary should not exceed the sum of $3,000; that is to say, that a salary of not more than $3,000 be put on the Statute-book, and the Government may appoint an officer at any lower salary, as the happy accident of last year gave us the power to do. If the Government are obliged to secure the services of an interpreter coming from China, according to the information we have, we do not think that the sum of $3,000 is excessive to pay for those services. It is very easy to say that an interpreter could be got for less, without taking the trouble of ascertaining the facts. The figure was put at $3,000 because, according to the information which I was able to gather myself, that it was not excessive, and we could not get a good officer for a less salary. If we can get one for $1,500, the Minister of Customs is not known to be extravagant in the expenditure of his Department, and he will get one for $1,500, or for less if he can. I have only to add, if my hon. friend was pleading against the Chinese influx into this country, and if his motion was made as a kind of reflection upon the Government allowing Chinese labor to come here, that empower the Government by this clause to secure a good interpreter, a good officer, to prevent frauds which have been discovered, I believe, in the dealings of the immigrants with the authorities in British Columbia; it is for the safety of the working man, it is for the safety of the public in British Columbia that we think it necessary to secure the services of a perfectly competent officer. I do not know whether we could get an officer for a less salary. I hope we will, and, if we do, according to the confidence which was given to the Government last year, we will do it for a less sum. I hope my hon. friend will not ask for a division of the House on a matter of this kind.

Mr. BLAKE. I thought last year that this was an extravagant sum. I am confirmed in that view by the events which have followed the vote of last year, and I shall, therefore, have to support the amendment.

Mr. DAVIES. I do not think the Secretary of State is justified in more than insinuating that the gentleman who is now discharging the duties is not a competent official, because the House had the statement last night, made deliberately by the hon. member for Victoria, that the efficiency of that gentleman had been certified to by the Judges of the Supreme Court, and that he was a thoroughly competent man. Last year there might have been some justification for the House tacitly assenting to this enormous salary of $3,000 for an interpreter, because we acted upon the assurance of Ministers that a competent man could not be obtained for less. The events which have transpired since have shown that a competent man can be, and has been, obtained for a much less sum, and I do not think the House is justified now in voting a sum three times as large as the experience of the year has shown to be enough to pay a competent interpreter. The amount of the salary does not affect the policy of the Act. The policy of the Government and the effect of the Act were stated to be the absolute exclusion of these Chinese altogether, and the work to be done will be very slight indeed, and, as was very well remarked by the hon. member for Huron last night, if the present incumbent chooses to resign his position, and the Government cannot get a good man in British Columbia, there could be no difficulty in obtaining such a man from any of the treaty ports in China.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. Secretary of State——

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. MITCHELL. Am I not allowed to reply?

Mr. SPEAKER. No.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am sorry for it.

Mr. BOWELL. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that it is utterly impossible to obtain the services of a competent interpreter at the amount that is contained in the amendment just moved by my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). When the work of putting into operation this Chinese Act was placed on the Customs Department, I was under the impression that it could be worked by the customs officials without any additional officers being appointed. Under the authority given by that law, I issued an order that all collectors of customs throughout the Dominion should be considered as controllers. I instructed the collector at Victoria to appoint a clerk to assist him in the work that fell upon him in connection with Chinese immigration, the granting of certificates, and to assist him as interpreter between the Chinese and customs officials. I found, however, that that would not work satisfactorily, and that it was necessary to appoint an interpreter, and I found that the cheapest man who could possibly be obtained, who had the necessary qualifications, was at the sum of $1,500 per annum. But fearing, at the same time, that there would not be sufficient work for him to do as Chinese interpreter solely, I made it a portion of his duty to act as customs lerk, to deal altogether with invoices arriving from China and with all business transactions with Chinese merchants and others importing from that country. If the amendment is carried it would necessitate the dismissal of this man, and it would be impossible—I say impossible, because I made every enquiry in order to procure a competent person, and the cheapest man we could get, who was at all fitted for the work, a man of education and who understood the language, was for the sum of $1,500. When the House reflects that all the operations to be carried on under this Bill will not cost the country annually more than three or four thousand dollars at the outside, I think hon. gentlemen might allow the Government some discretion, might allow them the same discretion that they have given them in the past, and allow the motion to carry. I can assure hon. gentlemen that there is no desire to increase the expenditure, nor am I aware that there is any Government official, or any person connected with the Government, or any other person, in fact, who is applying for that position, or for whom the Government desire to provide a place.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is not Mr. Trutch applying for it?

Mr. BOWELL. No, he is not.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am glad of it.

Mr. BOWELL. Nor am I aware that Mr. Trutch is capable of acting as an interpreter. Mr. Trutch has never, to my knowledge, been an applicant for that position, and I repeat that I am not aware that he has the necessary education or qualifications to fill that office, if he were appointed, or if he were to apply for it, which it is not at all likely he will do.

Mr. VAIL. I think if this amendment should pass I could suggest a way of getting out of the difficulty.

Mr. BOWELL. By appointing you?

Mr. VAIL. Well, probably I understand as much of Chinese matters as my hon. friend.

Mr. BOWELL. If you do not know any more about them, you would not be fit for the position.

Mr. VAIL. If this gentleman who has been acting is to act in a dual capacity, I think the better way would be to give him $500 from the Customs Department, and the $1,000 that it is proposed to vote now as interpreter for the Chinese. Now, I do not suppose that there are a great many vessels arriving from China with immigrants during the year, and I should not suppose that this interpreter would have a great deal to do. Why, Sir, the sum of $3,000 that it is proposed to vote, is more than the county judges of the Provinces get, as a rule, and I think the sum is excessive, and may fairly be considered so. It is within $1,000 as much as the Judges of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia get at present, and is out of all reason in comparison with the duties this officer will be called upon to perform. I have no desire to reduce the amount below what is actually necessary for the Government to have in order to procure a competent man; but I say we are adopting an absurd custom in this House of voting twice or three times as much as is actually necessary for the payment of the service, and to place it in the hands of the Government and say: Oh, we have perfect confidence in you; we do not suppose you will spend any more than is actually necessary, and we will vote three times the amount you require. Now, I think that is a very wrong custom, and the sooner we abandon it the better. I shall certainly vote for the amendment upon the clear understanding that a competent man, in the first place, should be employed, and in the next place he should be paid a fair remuneration for his services. I think we may reasonably expect, if this Act is to be of any service at all, that the number of Chinese coming into the country in future will be very much reduced below the number entering last year, before this duty was placed upon them. Last night several hon. members, in speaking of this question, stated that the number of Chinese immigrants had been greatly reduced in consequence of the Bill we passed last year—in fact that for the last two or three months there has been no immigration at all. Under these circumstances, I think the Secretary of State ought not to press for this amount.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister of Customs has stated that an interpreter cannot be obtained for less than $3,000.

Mr. BOWELL. I did not say so.

Mr. MULOCK. But the Secretary of State does not back up his statement with any evidence showing that this $3,000 is necessary. He does not say it is not enough, or that it is too much, but he simply asserts that he has made enquiry at a place where interpreters cannot be obtained—he has not made enquiry where interpreters can be obtained—and I think, without any evidence, he asks the House to declare that $3,000 are necessary. Now, the Secretary of State says: I do not know whether $3,000 are necessary or not, but trust us with the money, and we will be as economical as we can. Is his record such as to justify his claim to be economical? Last year he asked us to give him a little authority, when he was presenting to this House a Bill to give him power to appoint a lot of examiners and so on, in connection with the Civil Service Act, and what has he done? During the year he has spent all the money we voted him, and more too, and to-day he is asking for more. Now, he asks us to trust him. Well, I will not trust him in anything, if he has not been true in one thing. The Minister of Customs says, perhaps this will cost $1,000, perhaps $2,000, perhaps $3,000, perhaps $4,000, and Parliament, on such testimony as that—not testimony, but vague statements, is asked to hand over the public money to the Government. For my part, I think the proposition is wholly unjustifiable, and it proves beyond all question in what a crude way legislation is pitchforked into this House by the present Government.

House divided on amendment of Mr. Mitchell.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I beg to move that this Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to Committee of the Whole for the purpose of amending the same by striking out clauses 24, 25 and 26. These clauses refer to the granting of certificates to Chinese who signify their intention of leaving the country. It has been found that the common practice is to get those certificates, not for the purpose of leaving Canada, but for the purpose of trading with them. People have been in the habit of going to the customs officer and procuring a certificate for $1, and selling it for $20 or $25 to a friend in the United States or in China. So the person purchasing the certificate makes $24 or $25 also out of it. This practice has proved to be nothing less than a fraud, and it is useless to have such a clause in the Bill unless it can be made workable, and I am certain from past experience it is impossible to deal with the Chinese in the way proposed by those clauses. It is for that reason I move an amendment to strike out those clauses, so that no certificates shall be issued to Chinamen who signify their intention of leaving Canada, but that they shall all be placed on the same footing, by which arrangement all who come into Canada will have to pay $50 each.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The hon. gentleman will see at once that his proposal will do injustice. There are a number of Chinese resident in Canada who are engaged in commerce. It might be necessary for one of those to visit China for his legitimate business; to another it might be necessary that he should go there to bring back some of his family; and those Chinese who have acquired the freedom of the country and require to go abroad for a few months on legitimate business would be placed under the necessity of paying a second tax although they are residents or citizens of Canada, if the amendment were adopted. Any Chinese resident who is entitled to remain here and who wishes to leave Canada is obliged to register himself before leaving; in default of registering, his certificate will be cancelled and he will be again considered an alien. But after having registered he cannot be absent more than twelve months, and when he comes back—and this shows how strict the measure proposed is—even within the twelve months, and he has his certificate to return, he is obliged to pay when he re-enters Canada. If, after his return and that second payment, he goes before the controller and proves his identity, he will be entitled to be returned the fifty dollars that he will have paid a second time. The hon. member says there is a great deal of personating in the exercise of the privilege of obtaining certificates to leave the country. But now the different restrictions, and the different modes of ascertaining the identity of immigrants are so very strict, that it would be almost impossible for frauds to take place, and the onus probandi of proof that the party is the same person who left the country within twelve months, will fall upon the immigrant; the officer will have to be satisfied that the person arriving is the same person as mentioned in the certificate before returning him the fifty dollars. I hope the hon. gentleman will not press his amendment; at all events, I do not think it can be granted.

Mr. GORDON. On the first reading of the Bill I was of opinion that it might be amended with advantage; but after hearing the amendments made by the hon. Minister last night, I am prepared to support it, believing that it will have the desired effect. If a Chinaman is able to recover his $50 from the custom house officer, he will do well, as commercial men find a great deal of trouble to get $50 or $10 returned by the Government. I will, therefore, support the Bill as proposed by the hon. Minister, and I ask my hon. friend to withdraw his amendment.

Amendment negatived on a division, and Bill read the third time and passed.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 94) further to amend the Dominion Lands Act, 1883.—(Mr. White, Cardwell.)

RATE OF INTEREST IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. THOMPSON moved the second reading Bill (No. 22) respecting interest in the Province of British Columbia.

Mr. BLAKE. Explain.

Mr. THOMPSON. The Province of British Columbia is without any law regulating the subject of interest. This Bill, as I am sure the House is aware, from the circumstance which took place the other day, was introduced by one of the members from that Province, and it proposes that the rate of interest shall be established where no rate has been agreed upon. The proposal which has been made is somewhat exceptional. It is made in view of what is taken to be the exceptional position of the affairs of that country, because it proposes that the rate shall be 8 per cent. in the absence of any agreement; and that when judgment is recovered upon any contract in or by which interest at a higher rate than 8 per cent. per annum has been agreed in writing to be paid, the amount awarded by such judgment shall bear interest at the rate agreed upon, not, however, exceeding 12 per cent. per annum. These are the provisions of the Bill, and inasmuch as it seems reasonable that some provision should be made with regard to this subject, the motion was acquiesced in that the Bill should take its place on the Government Orders. As to the particular rate specified in the Bill, that is a matter of detail which can be explained in committee.

Mr. MILLS. I think there is here a departure from that sacred principle of uniformity, of which we heard so much last Session. It provides that where the rate of interest is not agreed upon, it shall be 8 per cent. per annum—2 per cent. more than it is elsewhere in the Dominion.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria). In the Province of British Columbia, as I think everybody here knows, everything is much higher than in eastern Canada, and 8 per cent. in British Columbia is really equivalent to 6 per cent. in the eastern Provinces.

Mr. MILLS. How is that?

Mr. BAKER (Victoria). If the best commercial men in that Province go to a bank they cannot get an over-draft at less than 8 per cent. per annum. It frequently happens that one gentleman may accommodate another by overdrawing his account, and letting him have a certain sum of money which he may have to sue for afterwards, owing to adverse circumstances on the part of the borrower. I think it is only reasonable, in such a case, that he should get the same rate of interest on his judgment as he has to pay the banker from whom he got the money.

Mr. BLAKE. There is a horrible suggestion of 12 per cent. further on.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria). Clause 2 is to provide that when a judgment is obtained it shall not carry with it a higher rate than 12 per cent., although a higher rate may have been agreed upon—the rate agreed upon may be 16 or even 24 per cent., as they sometimes charge in British Columbia.

Mr. BLAKE. Do they?

Mr. BAKER (Victoria). Yes. I should like to see some of you gentlemen out in British Columbia.

Mr. BLAKE. If we have to borrow money to pay our travelling expenses, at the rate of 24 per cent., how will we ever be able to get home again?

Mr. BAKER (Victoria). You will have to live on the interest of the amount you spend.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. BLAKE. I may say that when we adopted somewhat similar regulations in the old Province of Canada, the condition of things was a good deal like that which the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Baker) has represented to be the case in British Columbia. The rate of interest which was usually charged was very much higher than 6 per cent., and there does not seem to be any very serious difficulty caused by adopting the same limitations in those cases in which there is no bargain as are adopted in other cases. All that will be necessary is that the people will have to bargain for the rate they want more than 6 per cent., and it is certainly inconvenient that there should be different laws regulating the interest in the different Provinces. It seems unreasonable, if there are to be mercantile transactions between two Provinces, that people should have to enquire what is the rate in one Province, as contra-distinguished from the other Province. Besides, the hon. gentleman must recollect that the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the influx of all good things which are going in and are to go in with it, including capital, will soon relieve that Province from the famine as to capital which has so much to do with the rate of interest. If the rate is to be higher, let the parties contract for that, but let the rate be the same as elsewhere.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria). I can give no better reason for this provision than I have already given. I think I know better, perhaps, than any hon. gentleman in this House what we require in British Columbia in this connection, having had a good deal to do with commercial transactions for the last fourteen years; and by my connection with the Board of Trade of that Province I think I know our requirements pretty well. If I had not a pretty good idea that 8 per cent. in British Columbia is about equivalent to 6 per cent. in Ontario, and if I had not thought that the explanations I have given would convince the House, I would not have introduced the Bill. At the same time I do not want to force the matter, and if hon. gentlemen are averse to putting British Columbia financially on the same footing as the rest of the Provinces, I must bow to their decision, though I do it with a bad grace.

Mr. THOMPSON moved that the word "eight" in the first clause be struck out and "six" inserted.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. THOMPSON moved that the words "in writing" in the ninth line be struck out.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 2,

Mr. BLAKE. What is the general law about this?

Mr. THOMPSON. The present provision which it is proposed to repeal is that the court may allow such a rate of interest as may appear to be just and reasonable, but the rate must not exceed 1 per cent. per month.

Mr. BLAKE. What is the provision in the other Provinces.

Mr. THOMPSON. Six per cent.

Mr. BLAKE. So that we have the same question here—why should the unfortunate judgment debtor pay more in British Columbia than he has to pay in the other Provinces? Is the hon. gentleman particularly anxious that he should pay up to 12 per cent.?

Mr. BAKER (Victoria). If the judgment debtor has agreed to pay more than 12 per cent., this provision is intended to let him off with 12 per cent. in any case.

Mr. THOMPSON. The object of the clause is to reduce the rate where a higher rate has been agreed upon.

Mr. BLAKE. In the other Provinces there is no such provision.

Mr. THOMPSON. No, I think not. I mistook the question.

Mr. BLAKE. In the other Provinces they stand by the contract, whatever it may be. What has the hon. gentleman to say as to this exceptional provision for cutting down the rate in British Columbia?

Mr. THOMPSON. I understand that the difficulty there is, that very high rates are agreed upon in some cases, and this is to prevent their being enforced.

Mr. BLAKE. This is raising the whole question of the interest law, because very high rates are agreed upon in parts of the Dominion and are enforced.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I venture with very great diffidence to offer an opinion on so purely legal a matter; but I was under the impression, which perhaps the legal gentlemen here can confirm or not, that in Ontario, at any rate, our courts would not enforce an excessive rate of interest on a judgment debt.

Mr. BLAKE. What is excessive interest?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think I have heard of cases in which very high rates, up to 15 or 20 per cent. were not enforced.

Mr. THOMPSON. It seems to me reasonable to make such a restriction as this. In the Province of Nova Scotia there is a restriction up to 10 per cent. Except in the one provision, that in the absence of a contract the rate shall be 6 per cent., there is very little uniformity in the interest law in the several Provinces.

Mr. BLAKE. The existing Statute in British Columbia provides for 1 per cent. a month, which is 12 per cent. a year, which is the provision proposed. What substantial change is there?

Mr. THOMPSON. The present provision is that in the absence of any contract the court may award damages at a rate not exceeding 12 per cent. This provision is to make it 8 per cent.

Mr. BLAKE. But there is a provision for 12 per cent. also. What is the existing law in British Columbia as to judgment in a case in which more than 12 per cent. has actually been stipulated for?

Mr. BAKER (Victoria). Whatever has been stipulated, if it is 24 per cent., it bears judgment.

Mr. ORTON. As I understand it, this is an attempt to make the law there somewhat similar to our law in Ontario, where, if there is no stipulation of interest, the rate shall not be more than 6 per cent. Why should it be 8 instead of 6 in British Columbia?

Mr. MILLS. In order to make this section conform to the one we have already amended, I suppose it would be necessary to change 8 in the second line to 6.

Mr. DAVIES. Then you will have the anomaly, that if a man gives a note for 20 per cent., that can be recovered up to the day of judgment, but after the judgment it will only bear 12 per cent.

Mr. THOMPSON. After judgment is recovered the rate will only be 6 per cent. I move that in the second line 8 be struck out and 6 substituted.

Mr. MILLS. After judgment the interest is collected on the judgment and not on the contract. This clause as it stands would give a party whatever rate of interest is agreed upon up to 12 per cent., making, I think, a wholly different rule from what exists in any other Province.

Mr. BLAKE. We have to consider this general question, whether we should, in this Parliament, adopt a rule for one Province for the adjustment of the rate of interest on judgments, which we do not propose to extend or apply to any of the other Provinces. Why should we do so? Why should we not decide on the same principle of action with reference to the rate of interest on judgments, for all the Provinces?

Mr. WELDON, In nearly all the Provinces the amount is recovered at the rate of interest agreed upon in the contract. The amount of damages includes that rate of interest, but after judgment the amount only bears 6 per cent. The effect of this will be that, supposing the rate agreed upon was 12 per cent., the party would recover by the judgment the amount of principal with interest at 12 per cent., and then receive 12 per cent., not only on the principal, but also upon the interest, or compound interest, which is contrary to all principle.

Mr. LANGELIER. There are two very serious objections to this. First, it will introduce a principle which is new to two of our most important Provinces. It is a principle entirely unknown in the Province of Quebec. There, when a rate is agreed upon, whether it be 20 or 25 per cent., if judgment is given, the interest on the whole amount must be calculated at that rate. Another grave objection is that it will encourage parties to go to law. If a debtor paid before being sued, he would have to pay the full amount of interest agreed upon, but if he waited to be sued and judgment was given against him, he would only pay 12 per cent.

Mr. BLAKE. I would ask the Minister of Justice to consider how far it is reasonable we should lay down for one Province a rule as to the rate at which interest should be computed after judgment, without considering whether it be not a fitting rule to extend to all the Provinces. No doubt, the exercise of our power to deal with the question of interest was given us, because it was thought the commercial relations of the Dominion required one uniform rule. Now we are providing a rule for one Province which will not affect the others. It seems rather a retrograde step to take.

Mr. ORTON. I differ from hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to the advisability of continuing the present law. A judgment was given by the late Judge McDougall, with reference to a gentleman in Ottawa, known to be a great usurer, who had lent money to a civil servant, and had received back three or four times the original loan. He sued the employee for a further sum of three or four times the amount of the loan. The case was brought before the late Judge McDougall, and he refused to give judgment in favor of this usurer, on the ground that he had not an equitable or just right to his claim. I think this is a step in the right direction, and the hon. gentleman will deserve great credit if he limits the rate to 12 per cent., which is high enough, in all conscience, for any usurer. If the law be so altered, judges will have a legal reason for giving judgment against usurers.

Mr. BLAKE. The effect of providing that in one Province not more than 12 per cent. may be recovered, will be to take away in other Provinces, where there is no such law, any ground for exercising equity, which is the principle the hon. gentleman desires should be exercised. While he would benefit Victoria, he would inflict injury on the rest of the Dominion.

Mr. ORTON. I think the law should apply to the whole Dominion.

Mr. BLAKE. That is what I say. Let us have one law, whatever it may be. Will the Minister of Justice say whether he thinks it reasonable we should have different laws?

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not think it desirable at all, but, unfortunately, we have different laws in all the Provinces, except Ontario and Quebec, which have the one law. It is undesirable that should continue, and I was anxious, personally, to deal with the whole subject, but could not do so this Session. In the meantime I do not see why, when there exists no uniformity, we should not give to British Columbia the law she desires. We are only proposing to allow British Columbia to continue the system which exists there at present.

Mr. BLAKE. That is exactly the point. British Columbia has a system which the Minister proposes we should by legislation here continue. But the laws in the other Provinces are not Canadian laws; they were laws passed before Confederation.

Mr. THOMPSON. I beg pardon; the law in Nova Scotia was passed since.

Mr. BLAKE. I think the bulk of the laws which regulate interest were passed before Confederation, and we have not had a common Canadian law passed yet. Now, after eighteen or nineteen years, it is proposed that we should legislate partially on the subject of interest. Since British Columbia is satisfied with the existing law, why ask for legislation here; but, if the law in British Columbia is to be changed, I contend it should be changed for the whole of Canada. If we are to deal with interest at all, we should deal with it for the whole Dominion, and not for a particular Province. I do not say that the principle of uniformity is inexorable. The hon. gentleman may find grounds for the opposite principle, and I should be sorry if such could be found; but, as the hon. gentleman thinks the question ought to be dealt with as a whole, and that he had hoped to deal with it this Session, would it not be better not to take any action this Session, but to pass a general interest law next Session?

Mr. THOMPSON. We are not changing the law. In British Columbia they have no Statute, but it is the practice of their courts to allow the rate proposed. And it is proposed to continue by this clause what is now the practice of the courts in British Columbia.

Mr. BLAKE. According to that statement, the practice in British Columbia has at this moment no legal authority. There is no Statute under which interest can be recovered at this rate, and it is now proposed to make lawful what is not lawful.

Mr. THOMPSON. This will suit the circumstances of the country, and the courts have adopted it, and we should make it lawful; and as there is no uniformity, we cannot apply the law of another Province to British Columbia.

Mr. MILLS. We had a question similar in principle under discussion some days ago with regard to maritime jurisdiction, in which the hon. gentleman laid down principles strongly at variance wtth the doctrines he has just proclaimed.

Mr. THOMPSON. Not in the slightest degree different from the principles I lay down now. That was a subject in respect to which it was not supposed there would be any difficulty in making the whole law uniform.

Committee rose and reported.

WORKS OVER NAVIGABLE WATERS.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the second reading of Bill (No. 130) respecting certain works constructed in or over navigable waters.

Mr. WELDON. This Bill makes a very serious alteration in the law, and interferes with the Local Legislatures, and it will also have a very serious effect as far as regards the Maritime Provinces. The hon. the Minister of Public Works proposes by this Act not only to include what was in the former Acts, but to include wharves, docks, piers and other structures, and to make all which are now constructed interfering with navigation not lawful works. The result will be that any wharves in any Province which are constructed in water which can be navigated would be illegal. Speaking of the wharves in the Province to which I belong, most of them are built where they certainly do interfere with navigation in the legal sense, though practically they do not, but this Bill would leave them entirely at the mercy of persons who might wish to interfere with them. The tenth section says that:

"Nothing hereinbefore contained shall apply to any work constructed under the authority of any Act of the Parliament of Canada or of the Legislatures."

But, in New Brunswick, the wharves, except in the harbor of St. John, are not, I think, built under any Act of the Legislature, but by individuals. The only way in which they have been recognised by Acts of the Legislature has been where grants have been given for the purpose of erecting these wharves or piers for the public benefit. This is a very serious matter, and would seriously affect us in the Lower Provinces. I also observe that there is the following section introduced:

"Any local authority, company or person, may proceed in like manner to obtain the approval of the Governor in Council of the site and plans of any work heretofore constructed."

I suppose that is, to a certain extent, to bring up the question which arose between the Local Government of New Brunswick and the Dominion in reference to the erection of the bridge across the St. John River. The 45th Vic., chap. 37, contained a provision that that Act should not authorise the construction of any bridge across the River St. Lawrence or the River St. John. After that Act was passed, the Government of New Brunswick undertook to build a bridge across the River St. John at Fredericton, which has been erected and is of great importance, and one of the most valuable works ever undertaken by any Government in that Province. Correspondence ensued between the two Governments, which was brought down last year under an Order of the House, under which very serious questions in regard to the Provincial rights and the rights of the Dominion were discussed in the Minute of the Executive Council of New Brunswick, in which they contested the right of the Dominion to interfere with them; and they went on to build the bridge. During the last Session of Parliament an Act was passed, at the instance of the Minister of Public Works, by which that portion of the Act 45th Vic., chap. 37, which prevented a bridge being built across the River St. John, was repealed, thus, to a certain extent, recognising the position taken by the Local Government of New Brunswick, with regard to the rights of the Province in relation to building the bridge in question; but the effect of this Act is to compel the Provincial Government, with regard to any bridges heretofore built, to obtain the authority of this Dominion. Then, there are very large bridges built over the rivers throughout the Province, particularly on the north shore, running from Westmoreland to Restigouche, and under a clause of this Act, if they are undertaken to be rebuilt or repaired, the approval of the Governor in Council must be obtained. I think that will hamper the Provincial Legislature very much with regard to the means of communication over the great rivers of our Province, and I submit that the effect of this will be, not only to interfere with the rights of private individuals, but to a great extent with the rights of the Province, and with the autonomy of the Governments of the Provinces with regard to their great works which are necessary, and which, by the British North America Act, are exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Provinces. The booms, which were brought up some years ago when a question arose in regard to the navigation, stood in a very different position from what is intended to be included in this Act—wharves or docks. I think this matter ought to be considered before the Act is passed, an Act which apparently will tend to bring the Provincial Governments and the Dominion Government into conflict. As I have pointed out, in one case already a conflict arose between the two authorities, upon which a discussion ensued, which, I think, was to a certain extent avoided by the amendment last year.

Mr. VAIL. Perhaps the Minister will explain the object of this Bill?

Mr. THOMPSON. As regards the objection taken by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Weldon), I do not understand that this Bill will make any change in the existing law.

Mr. WELDON. Oh, yes.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think not. I think it is simply declaratory of the law. It has already been decided repeatedly that any work, whether it be a bridge, boom, dam, aboiteau, or wharf, dock, pier or other structure, which has been erected and interferes with navigation, is not a lawful structure. That has been decided by the Supreme Court of Canada as well as by the courts of the Provinces, and the result was in one case that it was held lawful to pull down a wharf which was being built for the convenience of proprietors in the same way as every wharf in the harbor of Halifax has been built. As to bridges over streams, precisely the same thing has been held, that the Provincial authorities have no power by Statute or otherwise to cause a bridge to be erected over navigable streams in such a way as to impede navigation. That being the settled law, we propose to provide means by which any structure which has been erected and which it is desirable to continue, or which it is desirable to re-erect, or in respect of new structures for legalising these structures.

Mr. VAIL. That would be right enough, perhaps, if the Minister would confine it to harbors and rivers. But we have a great many large bays, as the Minister knows, in Nova Scotia. Take the county, for instance, I represent. We have a great many breakwaters on the coast of St. Mary's Bay, a bay which is from three to ten miles wide. There are a great many breakwaters erected on the shores of that bay, and some people might say that these structures interfere, to some extent, with navigation, because they do certainly cover water over which vessels might sail if the wharves were not there. I do not think this Parliament should place it in the power of the Government to say that such wharves or structures are an interference with navigation, or that we should put them under the control of the Government in any way, where they have been built by private persons. Again, I object to the Bill because it requires everybody who is situated on the shores of this bay, if they raise money to build a structure of that kind, to send plans thereof to the Minister of Public Works and ask for the Government's approval before they can erect a wharf or breakwater. I can see no necessity for that whatever. Again, if the Bill is good for one place it is good for another, and if there is any part of the Dominion in which structures of that kind might be considered an interference with navigation, it is the River St. Lawrence, and that river is to be exempted from this Bill. I cannot see why that difference should be made. It seems to me that, as the matter stands now, it is all right enough, with the exception, as the Minister says, that it might be necessary for us to legislate in the direction of obliging persons when they propose to erect wharves and piers in the harbors and rivers, to submit their plans for the approval of the Minister of Public Works. I am aware that a difficulty arose in the port of Halifax with regard to a structure that was in course of erection, where a wharf was cut away, and a lawsuit occurred, and, according to the decision in that case, the party had no right to erect a wharf. It is quite proper that a person should be prevented from erecting a wharf where it is likely to impede navigation, but that is a very different thing from obliging a man to remove a wharf after it has been built. This is certainly a very arbitrary power to place in the hands of the Government.

Mr. DAVIES. I do not intend to oppose the second reading of the Bill. It is a very important one, and, so far as it relates to the future construction of wharves and bridges, I do not know that I have any opposition to offer. But the hon. gentleman knows that the Bill will have most important bearings, particularly in the Maritime Provinces. Last year the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) introduced a Bill which was referred to a select committee, and that committee reported a Bill which preserved all rights of wharf owners with respect of wharves built before the passage of the Act. The hon. gentleman knows that in the Province of Prince Edward Island it is absolutely essential that very long piers should be built in order to reach the navigable waters of the harbor. Sometimes they extend nearly half a mile out. Now there are riparian owners who have been compelled, ex necessitate, to build wharves for the last hundred years, and those wharves have always been recognised as legal, and although their existence might, perhaps, contravene the well established rule that any interference with navigation is a nuisance, still they have been legalised, so far as judges' law can do it, by the decisions of the Supreme Court, which have declared them to be necessary, and it would be a fatal thing to pass any legislation which would affect the legality of existing structures. My objection to this Bill is so far as it has retroactive effect, and affects bridges and wharves already built, and I think some provision should be made to protect existing rights. It would never do to compel a wharf owner who has had his wharf for fifty, sixty or seventy years, to remove that structure, to say to him: Your structure is no longer legal unless you come with plans and surveys and get them approved of by the Governor General in Council. It would not only entail an enormous loss and expense upon these people, but it would cast doubt upon the legality of their structures which would be very prejudicial to them. When an Act was passed relating to booms, bridges, dams, and aboiteaux, there was a section put in protecting the rights of existing wharf owners and bridge owners. The 96th section of the Act says:

"This Act shall not affect any bridge constructed before the 17th day of May, 1882, which hereafter requires to be rebuilt, or repaired, if such bridge, when so rebuilt or repaired, does not interfere to a greater extent with navigation than on the said day or theretofore."

Under the present Bill it will be impossible to rebuild any bridge at all, even if you built on the existing lines, and did not interfere any more with navigation than the old bridge did, without coming to the Governor General in Council and getting a permit. When we go into committee I shall be able to show the hon. gentleman the absolute necessity that exists, that, in so far as this clause of his Bill is retroactive, some provision should be put in which will protect the existing wharf owners and release them from the necessity of obtaining the authority of the Governor in Council in order to justify the existence of their wharves, which has never heretofore been disputed. The Bill last year, which was introduced by my hon. friend from Pictou, created quite a sensation down in our Province. A large memorial came up from the wharf owners and other proprietors against it. On their representation the Bill was amended in committee, and it was provided that proprietors of existing wharves might apply to the Governor General in Council to get their structures legalised, and that nothing in the Act should be construed in any way as declaring them to be illegal.

Mr. MITCHELL. I endorse every word that has been uttered by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Davies). The county I have the honor to represent has the second largest river running through it in the Province, and on that river, I suppose I am within the bounds in saying, that probably there are 100 to 150 wharves, many of which have been there forty, fifty, sixty or seventy years. Now it would be a great hardship if persons who are in occupation of those wharves, and who own them, or have purchased them, were to find that a law was passed by this House which renders illegal wharves that have stood for half a century or more, and have, while interfering more or less—because all wharves that have been built out into a navigable river do interfere more or less with navigation, but they do not interfere with it detrimentally—I say it would be a great hardship if these persons were obliged to go to the expense of getting plans and specifications of their structures made, and submit them to the Government for the purpose of getting them sanctioned. The Bill is quite open to an abuse of that kind, and I think it is a Bill which is not called for. I have heard no necessity stated for it, and as we have gone along ever since Confederation without it, I do not see why it is necessary now. The third clause is especially objectionable. It says:

"No work heretofore constructed shall, so far as the same interferes with navigation, be a lawful work, unless the site thereof has been or is approved, and such work is maintained in accordance with plans approved by the Governor in Council."

Any man who owns a wharf along any of those rivers, except the St. Lawrence, will have to come and apply to the Governor in Council to get his sanction for it. That is a provision that the people ought not to be called upon to comply with. The people in my section will object to this Bill, and to that clause particularly, as being an interference with trade. I do not propose voting against the second reading of the Bill, if the Government thinks the Bill necessary; but, I hope when it goes into committee the third clause will be amended in such a way as not to have retroactive effect and not to interfere with existing structures.

Mr. BURPEE. This Bill may have some friends, for I suppose there is some good cause why it should be brought in; but it will certainly have a damaging effect on some rivers in the Province of New Brunswick. The River St. John is navigable for large steamers about eighty miles. In the course of that river there are perhaps forty wharves. These were built partly by private enterprise and partly by the Local Government; in some cases wholly by the Local Government, and in other cases wholly by private enterprise. Those wharves have been constructed and have been in operation for a long time, and the farmers depend entirely on them for the shipment of their produce in the summer season. To bring the whole of those wharves under the operation of this Act would be a gross injustice to the people living on that river. It would entail an amount of expense, trouble and confusion, which I do not think is anticipated by the Government bringing in this Bill. I think they have not fairly considered the situation, as regards the whole of the Provinces, or they would not have brought in a Bill so sweeping in its character as the present one. A reconsideration of the Bill is necessary. I hope the Government will not press the Bill without further modifying it, so as not to interfere with all those wharves, for those wharves that will come under its operation do not obstruct navigation, and do not require to be interfered with.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I desire to ask the Government whether the operation of this Bill can be made to apply to obstructions spoken of in a previous discussion. In my constituency there are several villages, not very large, it is true, but of considerable public importance, where the people are unable to get goods brought to them in consequence of obstructions to the rivers by the running of sawlogs. I do not speak in the interest of steamboat owners, but in the interest of the public, whose business is sorely interfered with. I see the Bill uses the term "booms." Could not the Minister of Justice extend the provisions so as to have power to make regulations for the running of sawlogs on navigable streams so that vessels can pass through and by them. It can be done, because I know in some cases it is done; but in some cases the selfishness of the lumbermen is so great that they will not make the necessary provision for the passing of vessels. The village of Nipissing, on Lake Nipissing, is so situated that for two months to come it will be impossible for a vessel to reach there with goods for the village and surrounding country. Consequently, the goods will have to be teamed for several miles, at the expense of the consumers. That would be avoided if the lumbermen knew there was a power existing somewhere to compel them to make provision for the passing of vessels. It can be done, because it has been done at the river at Bracebridge, where the public interests compel the lumbermen to make the necessary provision, and they did make it. Where they can do it once, they can do it again. I desire to ask whether the Government can alter one of the clauses so as to make it apply to the passage of logs down navigable streams; I only speak of streams properly navigable.

Mr. THOMPSON. What the hon. gentleman desires could be accomplished more effectually by an amendment to the Statute relating to the protection of navigable waters. However, there will be full opportunity to consider the hon. gentleman's suggestion and see what can be done in regard to it. The object of the present Bill is entirely misunderstood by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) and by one of the hon. members from his Province on the other side of the House, because they seem to suppose that the object is to create an illegality in regard to existing structures, both as to bridges and wharves. The object of the Bill is simply this: The position of those structures having been brought before the highest court of the country, they are declared to be illegal, so that they may be removed by anyone, public or private, even by a private individual without any interest in the property. That being the case we propose to take power to remedy that grievance and enable existing structures to be legalised in so far as we can consistently legalise them in the public interest. It is not considered desirable at all to interfere with legality where it has been established. In Prince Edward Island there is a course of decisions which affirms the legality of those structures it is said. It is not desirable to disturb that line of decisions, if such there should be, and it would be desirable that it should not apply to any such structures as have been legalised by competent authority. But as regards existing structures we propose to take a power which does not exist now.

Mr. MITCHELL. The structures to which I refer include from 100 to 150 in my county, and the legality of those structures has never been questioned. I do not know a single instance where the legality was questioned, that is in regard to structures which people built out on their own foreshores, and the third clause of this Bill compels those persons to come to the Government and get them legalised.

Mr. THOMPSON. There are wharves at Halifax which had existed 100 years without anyone questioning their legality. But a year or two ago a gentleman considered it a fine amusement to pull down the wharf of a neighbor, and he did so. The Supreme Court of Canada gave a decision that he had a right to do so, because the wharf, however long it might have been there, and although erected upon a piece of property, granted to the person erecting it before the Union of the Provinces, was an illegal structure. Under the provisions of this Bill, we shall be enabled to legalise such structures. It is true that in regard to the vast majority of wharves this question has never been raised; but under this decision anyone is invited to question their legality, and this may cause very serious private injury, and in many respects public inconvenience. The hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) said it is giving very extreme power to the Governor in Council to declare wharves illegal. The decision to which I have referred declares that anybody, not the Governor in Council, but any person, has a perfect right to destroy them.

Mr. VAIL. That is, of course, in case of extending those wharves beyond where they were built. There is no right to destroy structures built twenty-five or forty years ago.

Mr. THOMPSON. It does not deal with rights acquired by user or prescription. It is not intended to countervail any principles of law by which time has cured the illegality, but in respect of all other works which the court has decided to be illegal, the Act simply declares the law and provides a remedy for future cases. I do not think it would be desirable, in the case of bridges, to allow them to be rebuilt without having the plans submitted. It might be if the proposition was to rebuild them exactly as before, but we know that even slight alterations may be made which may seriously affect the facilities for navigation, and I think in these cases the plans should be approved. With regard to the seventh section, the exception there is simply as to the site or plans of any bridge over the St. Lawrence, and that is the existing law at present; we only introduce it here because we are embracing the whole subject in one chapter. As regards the structures which the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) referred to, and the inconvenience of sending plans here in relation to bridges, that has to be done now in relation to breakwaters, &c. The party has no right to erect them at all according to the tenor of those decisions.

Mr. DAVIES. I wish the hon. gentleman simply to consider one point. I understand that his Bill does not deal with public harbors, the control of which the Supreme Court has already declared to be vested in the Dominion alone, as well as questions as to all navigable rivers, bays, &c. In the Province from which I come, if the riparian owner wants to build he applies to the Lieutenant Governor in Council. This is practically a repeal of that provision, and he would now have to come to Ottawa. I am not disposed at present to concede the point that the Dominion Government has a full control over the building of wharves along the inland rivers of the Dominion; I think it is very questionable. But, as the hon. gentleman does not propose to go into committee to-day, perhaps he will consider that point.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

REPRESENTATION OF THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES IN PARLIAMENT.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 115) respecting the representation of the North-West Territory in the Parliament of Canada.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

(In the Committee.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The fourth clause of this Act was one which stood over. It is the one which provides for the qualification of electors to vote under this Act. As I mentioned when this clause was before the House before, it is copied from the old Act which was passed years and years ago, and has been in force ever since as the law under which elections are held and the qualification provided in the North-West. It will be remembered that the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron), who is not now in his place, held that the grammatical and legal construction of the clause was that no resident could vote unless he was also a householder. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) took a different view of the clause, and I, looking at it grammatically and trying to give it a legal construction, agreed with the hon. gentleman. I, however, at once communicated with Judge Richardson, at Regina, to know what was the construction which always had been put on it in the elections there, and he says all the elections were held upon the idea that only those residents should vote who were householders as well. I have also had the advantage of seeing a member of the North-West Council, who is now in Ottawa, and he too says that such is the case. The schedule alluded to seems also to support that view. I thought, however, that if there was nothing else in the clause to support the view which I took, and which the hon. member for Bothwell took, the word "respectively" conclusively shows that a resident who is not a householder can vote. However, the principles upon which this Bill is submitted to the House is to have the same qualifications here as they have in the North-West. The member of the North-West Council who is here informs me that the whole subject will be up at the next Session of the North-West Council, and probably there will be a complete revision. I am, therefore, desirous of including this clause until they have declared their will to the representatives of the people there as to what they think ought to be the amendments, if any, in the qualification that should be adopted. So I propose to alter this clause, and put it beyond a doubt that the party must be a householder as well as a resident. A male must be a resident householder. He must be a resident for twelve months, but not a householder for twelve months. If he has been resident for twelve months and is a householder immediately preceding the issue of the writ, he has a vote. In order to render the clause plain, I propose to substitute the following for that now before the Chair:—

Every person qualified to vote at the election of a member under this Act shall be a bonâ fide male resident and householder of adult age, who is not an alien or an Indian, within the electoral district, and who has resided within said electoral district for at least twelve months immediately preceding the issue of the writ of election.

Mr. MILLS. If the hon. gentleman's intention is to require both qualifications, of residence and householder, the matter would be expressed with more clearness if he declared that the party should be a householder and a resident for twelve months, qualifying the word householder by a statement of the time during which he is to be a resident. But I must say, I do not like the qualification. A considerable population is now going into that country, and the reasons that prevailed when that qualification was adopted no longer exist. It was adopted to prevent a migratory population who came in from the United States in considerable numbers for the purpose of carrying on trade in the country, from undertaking to control the election of members to the North-West Council. Many of the present population are young men, who are not householders, but who are residing in the families of others. For instance—and I believe there are many cases of the same sort—a man goes into the North-West and takes possession of a lot of land. His family are with him, as well as a considerable number of young men from the same locality, who take lands or are employed in the district. They do not build, but they are boarders in the house. Everyone of those young men would be disqualified under the hon. gentleman's franchise. Now, I think there is a simple qualification which would exactly meet the case of the North-West Territories, and would prevent any fraud in the preparation of the voters' lists; that is to declare that every male resident who has been in the country for twelve months, who is twenty-one years of age, and who is a natural-born or naturalised subject, shall be entitled to exercise the elective franchise. The hon. gentleman knows that the Canadian population who go there are not an ignorant or dissipated population; they have gone there for the purpose of bettering their condition by honest industry, and not to indulge in any wild speculation; and where is the danger to the public service of entrusting those persons with the elective franchise? If there is any class in the whole country who may safely be entrusted with it, it is the young men who have gone to the North-West for the purpose of establishing by their own industry homes for themselves; and I do not think it is well to declare that those parties who in some other part of the country would be entitled to the franchise as wage-earners are to be denied that privilege because they have gone into that country. The position the hon. gentleman takes to-day is an extraordinary one, considering the position he took thirteen months ago. He says this is the qualification that exists there now, and we intend, with the utmost—servility, shall I say?—fidelity, to adhere to that qualification; and just as soon as we learn that it is the intention of the North-West Council to adopt a different qualification we are ready to follow their example. Why does the hon. gentleman take that position? The hon. gentleman says that the people of the North-West Territories are without representation in this Parliament, and that the North-West Council must speak for them until they have representatives here; but if they were here, those four representatives could be voted down by the other 211 members in the House. The hon. gentleman has not adopted the principle that the House is to be divided into different political groups composed of the members from the different Provinces, and that those members are to decide what shall be the electoral qualification in their own particular Provinces. That is not the principle he laid down last year. This House voted, notwithstanding protests from many hon gentlemen on this side of the House, for his principle of dealing with the elective franchise as if this country was a unit, as if there were no separating lines between one section and another, and adopted what he called the sacred principle of uniformity, to which, however, he made some exception, no doubt in order to prevent it being what he designated a pedantic uniformity; and now he proposes to follow a franchise which was adopted eleven years ago on account of the peculiar circumstances of the country at that particular time and regardless of its changed condition. Now that will be an extremely limited franchise, far more so than that which exists in the other Provinces of the Dominion; and if there is any section of the country that ought to have a more extended franchise than another, it is the North-West Territories. Why, Sir, we want people to go there; we want the young men of the country to settle there instead of in the United States; and what inducement does the hon. gentleman hold out to them? He tells them that if they go to the North-West they will be disfranchised—that they will not enjoy those political privileges which they enjoy in other portions of the Dominion. I say this much in order to bring before the committee the importance of adopting the principle of manhood suffrage in those Territories at the present moment. And if hon. gentlemen do not accept that position, I shall, on the third reading, move that that be the franchise for the election of members for the House of Commons, in the four districts the hon. gentleman proposes to create.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). This clause is, perhaps, the most important in the whole Bill. It is quite clear that the North-West Council are not satisfied with the franchise which now exists; for the hon. gentleman intimates that they propose dealing with the whole question at an early day. Yet the hon. gentleman proposes that we shall continue the law laid down for the North-West Council with regard to the franchise many years ago, and at a time when the circumstances of the country were different. It is manifest that if this clause passes as it stands, scores of men entitled to the franchise will be deprived of it. The class of men to whom my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) refers, men who have gone to the Territories with the bonâ fide intention of remaining, who have taken up and settled on lands, who have made improvements, who have cultivated their lands for a year or two, will be deprived of the franchise unless they have erected dwellings on their land. By law they are not bound to do so, for a time at all events; their claims to the land will be recognised, although they may not have erected houses, and there are scores of young men who have cultivated their lands, but have not erected houses, and have lived with their neighbors. Scores of men, who have come from the same locality in the older Provinces, have settled on lands in the one district, and the younger portion of them, instead of building houses for themselves upon their holdings, board with their neighbors in adjoining sections or a mile or two away; every one of these will be deprived of the franchise under this Bill. Why should the hon. gentleman deprive of the franchise a man who has gone there with the bonâ fide intention of living there, a man who has cultivated his farm but who may not have the means to build a house? Admitting it is advisable to follow the North-West Bill, as nearly as possible, we should not follow it when it inflicts an injustice on a large class of settlers, and we know that if this Bill passes, it will do an injustice to a large class. We ought to have judgment enough of our own to adopt a franchise that will reach every settler in the Territories, and that will not deprive scores of our best young men of the franchise altogether. Only the man who, in the technical meaning of the phrase, is a householder will be able by this measure to exercise the franchise. It is the simplest thing in the world to give the householder, although he may not be the owner of the house, the right to vote provided he has been in the locality twelve calendar months, and there is no reason why we should not go an additional step and give the owner of the land, although not a householder, also the right to vote. He is surely as much interested in the country as the householder, for the house may not be worth $5 and the former be the owner of real estate to the value of $50,000. This clause is unfair, unreasonable and unjust to the settlers of the North-West Territories, and I trust the hon. gentleman will see his way to give the franchise to those who are living in the Territories and own property there, but who are not householders in the technical meaning of the term.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The present Council is elected under this clause, and they will, I understand, deal with it at an early day, most probably this autumn. This is simply a temporary measure. I am desirous we should have the advantage of their experience as exhibited in their legislation in the next Council. It would, I think, be rather unfortunate that we, in our comparative ignorance of that country, should alter the franchise, and then find that when they meet in the fall it did not at all suit their views; but that we, in our ignorance, had adopted a franchise which was not, in their opinion, adapted to that country. It is much safer to keep the clause. I think there is no doubt this Parliament, on the authoritative expression from the Local Legislature of the North-West, as to what they deem most advantageous to the North-West, will adopt the law they may propose. I am desirous of not introducing any new franchise which may be rejected by the Local Legislature.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Why should we deal with the North-West Territories in a way different from that in which we deal with other portions of the Dominion. We have not in a single Province adopted the provincial franchise; we have a Dominion franchise and local franchises. Is there any reason why, with respect to the North-West Territories, we should deal with them as we deal with other Provinces? The real question is not what the North-West Council has done or what we have done for them, but what this Parliament should do with respect to its own franchise. If the Council had the power to do so, and thought fit to disfranchise thousands of people, that is no reason why we should do so. Our object should be to extend the franchise as far as possible. If we have a property qualification well and good, but let it be as generous and liberal as possible. Do not cut out of it men who have a stake in the country, who own land and pay taxes upon it. The hon. gentleman limits the franchise to the resident householders. As I have said, the householder may be worth practically nothing, but still he will be entitled to vote. One man has a house and half an acre of land; another may own a dozen sections, but unless he has a house he is deprived of the franchise, though he may have been in the country for years. That is not right, and I am perfectly satisfied that the owners of property in the North-West Territories will not be satisfied with the hon. gentleman's proposition. It is not a fair one, and ought not to prevail. Because the North-West Council have a franchise adapted to their wants, that is no reason why we should not have a different franchise here.

The committee rose, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee.

Mr. WATSON. In my opinion, this fourth section will not be fair to a great majority of the settlers who may be in the North-West at the time of an election. I think the qualification of a householder will deprive a large number of people residing there of a vote, who ought to have a say in the election of a member to represent them in this House. The qualification, to my mind, ought to be simply residence, and I think all male residents, twenty-one years of age, should have a vote in the Territories. They have no system of voters' lists, and cannot possibly have it with any enumerator it may be proposed to provide in this Bill. I would not go so far as to require twelve months' residence. I believe that three or six months' residence is sufficient, because there may be a number of people with a stake in the country who have not resided there twelve months previous to the election, and I would be in favor of going further than my hon. from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) who has intimated his intention of moving an amendment. I think the qualification of residence and householder is absurd. There are a great many in the Territories who would be well qualified under the residence clause who might not be householders. I have been in communication with some members of the North-West Council as well as the First Minister, and I find that those gentlemen do not wish for such a stringent election law as this. It would be much better to adopt the franchise as provided under our own Dominion election law than to have a householder and twelve months' residence franchise. I think the ownership of real property and three or six months' residence should be the qualification.

Mr. WELDON. It seems to me that this is reversing entirely the conditions under which the Franchise Act was passed last year. If we look at the circumstances of the Territories as compared with 1875, when this description of suffrage was first introduced, we shall find that they are very much changed indeed. The difficulty with regard to householders will be that you will have a man who has been a resident of the Territory, living on land he does not own, and who has put up something to live in, having a vote, while the person who owns the land will not have a vote. It is difficult to define what a householder is. He may have put up a hut a week before the election, but, if he has lived in a tent or boarded anywhere in the Territories until a month or six weeks before the election, and then puts up a shanty, that gives him a vote, though it may be on some one else's land, while the person who owns the land will not have a right to exercise the franchise.

Mr. ROYAL. It struck me that the persons who are most interested in looking after their own laws, that is to say, the people in the North-West Territories, have not touched that law, which has been standing now in their book of ordinances for ten years; and I believe it should have been those people who should have shown the first example, while, as a matter of fact, they have never changed this part of their law. It remains as it was in 1875. It is true, no doubt, that within a short time, when they have a more dense population than they have now, very likely they will see that their laws are perfected, but I believe it is a danger to give to a sparse population, to a country which is just developing itself, too perfect a law. In fact the experience is there to confirm this assertion. On the other hand, the North-West Council, which is now composed of a majority of elected members, men of intelligence, men who have been in politics in other Provinces before they entered the Council at Regina, knows perfectly well that the electoral law is susceptible of improvement, but so far it has not touched it. I do not see why we should do it, why we should pretend to know the requirements of those people more than they do themselves. Therefore, I believe, in regard to this law, which, I suppose, will be changed next year after the first election, that it is quite logical to take their law as it is and wait until their representatives are on the floor of this House to change the law, to listen to their requirements, and to be guided in our legislation by their experience. Therefore, I believe in the wisdom of preserving the law as it is.

Mr. WELDON. Why did not the hon. gentleman do that last year?

Mr. WATSON. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal) thinks there is a danger in giving new countries too perfect a law. We wish to simplify the law, and he is in favor of not having the restrictions and qualifications too great. I for one, who have had some experience in elections in that new Territory, feel that the law is too perfect and that it ought to be made as simple as possible, that everyone who has resided in the North-West Territories ought to have a vote. He says he has no doubt the North-West Council will change this law as soon as it has an opportunity. If so, and he knows the imperfections of the law, he ought to give them the benefit of his experience and to change the law here, because we know it would be more simple to have not altogether manhood suffrage, but three or six months' residence with a property qualification.

On section 6,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It was mentioned by some hon. gentlemen that, under the altered circumstances, we might have the general elections on the same day. I find that cannot well be done, but I shall move an addition to this clause which will provide that at any general election the nomination days shall be the same. Although, just directly along the line of railway, people can easily get to the poll, that is a very small portion of that enormous country, and between the nomination and the election there the lists are made up in fact, and the time will vary in different parts of the country. I am going to move that in addition to this clause there shall be the proviso:

Provided always, that, in the case of a general election, the day so fixed shall be the same as that fixed for the nomination of candidates in the other electoral districts of Canada.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 15,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In the next clause, 15, eight days is the term fixed in the ordinance for the municipal elections, but the municipal elections are for districts of a smaller area than in this case, and therefore eight days will not be sufficient. I move that the blank be filled with fifteen.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 26,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The ordinance provides in the second week, but I think that is too short a period. It is almost impossible to compare the lists for the whole provisional districts, and I think we will fill up the blank by making it four weeks.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I think four weeks is about the right time, but then the nomination is not to take place until fifteen days after.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In the case of a general election the nomination will be fixed on the same day as it is all over the Dominion.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 28,

Sir JOHN A MACDONALD. Some hon. gentlemen spoke against enumerators being appointed by the Government on account of the chance of political influences being at work in the selection of enumerators. I do not think that will apply. The doubt is whether there is any use for the enumerators at all, because men can go and enter their names at the time if they choose, whether there is an enumerator or not. That was mentioned to me to-day by a member of the Council, but I think we will keep the clause as it is now. The enumerators will be appointed and they will make the lists more or less perfectly, and in case of any imperfection, a party wishing to vote may go to the poll and can always correct the omission of his name by taking the oath of qualification and proving his right to vote. That is the system which has always existed, and I think it is well not to alter it. We declare that the polls are open to everybody who chooses to go and vote and can swear in his vote. I think it is well to have an enumerated list, though it must be imperfect from the enormous areas to be gone over, and the manner in which the sparse population is scattered over that country. If there is anything like political partisanship which has kept people off, men can always get on beyond a doubt by their claiming the right to vote and proving the right to vote, before the deputy returning officer.

Mr. WATSON. I agree with the remarks of the First Minister when he stated that the enumerators might be done away with altogether. I believe they would simply lead to confusion. Persons who had not their names put on the lists by the enumerators might be under the impression that they had no right to vote. If you cannot have all the names put on by some special provision, I think it is better to drop the enumerators altogether.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I agree with the remarks of the last speaker. If the franchise were to obtain in these Territories as is provided by sections 44 and 45, then it appears to me the appointment of the enumerators would be unnecessary and lead to useless expenditure. The enumerators' list is in no sense binding, anybody whose name is off the list, has a right to go to the polls and take the oath and have his name recorded as an elector, therefore there is no practical use for the enumerator. As I understand this clause, the Government have a right to appoint any number of enumerators in the electoral district, even one for each polling sub-division, so that there will be a large class of officials to be paid for work extending over four weeks. If an enumerator is to be appointed at all and the voters' list is to be made conclusive, I think there ought to be an appeal to a stipendiary magistrate. That is not provided for and therefore I do not see any practical purpose to be served.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Members of the North-West Council must have thought it of very considerable importance from the great attention given to the settling of this clause, because it provides as follows:—

> The Governor General may appoint enumerators to make lists of the electors in the electoral district; and if such appointments have not been made, the returning officer conjointly with any two justices of the peace, or with one justice of the peace and a notary public, or with any one of them resident in or near the electoral district and two electors of such district, neither of the number being a candidate, shall appoint under their hand a competent and reliable person to be enumerator for any one or more polling divisions of such district.

The Council were so anxious about the matter that if there was a failure on behalf of the Government to appoint an enumerator, then the revising officer and two justices, and if not two justices then a justice of the peace and a notary, and if those could not be found then two electors in the district not candidates, were to be appointed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Does the hon. gentleman know if it has been utilised in the North-West to any extent? I am told it has not.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am not aware. I am afraid, from our imperfect knowledge, we cannot make any change now. There can be no doubt, from what has been said, that we will soon have a direct expression of opinion from the representatives of the North-West upon this and other matters.

On section 31,

Mr. WELDON. This clause gives great power to the enumerator. A man's name appears on the list, and, without any notice being given him, it may be subsequently erased by the enumerator.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If the enumerator erased a man's name, all he would have to do would be to present himself and make affidavit.

Mr. WELDON. Where a man's name has once been placed on the list, some notice should be given before it is removed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You could not give notice.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). This is a very large power to give the enumerator. A man's name appears on the voters' list, and it may have been on the North-West Council list for years, for it is from that list that this new list will be largely made up; and without any notice or any investigation, the enumerator can simply draw an erasing line through it, and that is the end of it. If a man finds his name is not on the list, he may still go to the poll, tender his vote and, on taking the necessary oath, can vote. If the hon. gentleman could in any way lessen the arbitrary power given to the enumerator, it would be in the interest of the electors to do so. It would be better if the whole clause was struck out. As the hon. gentleman has well said, any person, whether his name is on the list or not, has the right to go to the poll and tender his vote, and if he takes the oath he has a right to vote and the deputy returning officer cannot prevent him. Under this clause a difficulty might arise. What purpose is served by enabling the enumerator to strike off and put on? The object is to enable the enumerator to make up a list as perfect as may be. It cannot possibly contain all the names, but there is the check that when they go to the poll an oath is administered. The clause is wholly unnecessary.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Under this system there are no means of revising the voters' lists as prepared by the enumerators. If a name is put on, no matter how erroneous it may be, the man has a right to vote. There is no means of objecting to his name; there is no court of revision.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Yes, when he goes to the poll.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If he is an unqualified person and his name is on the list returned by the enumerator he has got to vote. The enumerator is in fact a court of revision to try the matter himself. The hon. gentleman will see that the means which we have of correcting the list is sufficient for that purpose in the older Provinces; but here it is different; and if a name is put on by the enumerator how is it to be removed? The returning officer and the deputy returning officer cannot take it off, and there are no means by which an opposition candidate can dispute the qualification of those on the electoral list, and therefore the enumerator is made as it were an independent court to review his own decisions. If he is satisfied that a certain name was wrongly inserted he has power to erase it; if he does so, the party displaced can go and make affidavit at the polls.

Mr. WELDON. If the enumerator places a name on the list, will that person be entitled to vote under any circumstances?

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that if the enumerator places a name on the list, the name of a man who really has no right to vote and possesses no property qualification, that vote cannot be challenged at the polls, and he is not bound to take any oath. As I understand the law, it is not so; but from the hon. gentleman's interpretation of it, it is so. If it is not so, it ought to be provided in the law that the oath should be administered, otherwise the whole election will be in the hands of the enumerator.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Not at all.

Mr. MILLS. He may put on as many names as he likes, but unless you can administer the oath the vote goes in good or bad. Now, it can hardly be the intention of the hon. gentleman to put this absolute power in the hands of the enumerator. That I do not understand to be the provision of the law, and if it is, it is a very bad one.

Mr. DAVIES. It is quite clear from the 45th section that even if a man's name is not on and he tenders his vote, he can be required to take the oath, if it is questioned at the polls. Now, there can be no reason for allowing the enumerator to strike it off, because a man can get up and tender his vote and if he takes the oath he can vote. I think giving the powers to the enumerators to erase a name confers a power which may be used in an arbitrary way, while it can do no possible good. It may mislead the electors into the belief that he has no vote, whereas, as a matter of fact, he had the right to go and tender his vote and, if required, take the oath.

Mr. WATSON. I think that some safeguard should be provided in this clause, and I would propose that the person making such representations to the enumerator be required to do so under oath. Certainly, if the enumerator looks over the explanations made by the First Minister as to his powers, and takes that view of them it may lead to great injustice.

Mr. MILLS. I would ask if it is the intention to give the enumerator power to strike off names on representation without notifying the party and giving him an opportunity of showing that he has a right to be on the voters' list. I would also ask the hon. gentleman whether, before adopting this franchise, he has ascertained, through the census takers, the probable number of persons who would be entitled to vote. I suppose they ascertained the number of householders.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; it was merely a numerical census.

Mr. MILLS. I think it would be of very great importance to know how many parties would be qualified to vote, and how many disqualified.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If it had been a census in the ordinary acceptation of the word, as we understand it, instead of being a mere numbering of the people, we would not have had a chance of introducing this Bill this year, and perhaps for a long time. We wanted to find out what number of people were in a given district. Whether they are electors or not they have interests to be protected, and we wanted to know what the population was—whether aliens, or whites, or mixed breeds, or Indians. Well, we have got that, and we can only make the usual calculations as to the number of householders.

Mr. MILLS. The census takers must have gone to the dwellings of these people to ascertain their number, so it would not have been very difficult to have ascertained the number of householders.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. At all events, it is only a numerical census we have got.

Mr. WATSON. The form for the census shows the householders in the Territories.

Mr. DAVIES. I have not heard the hon. gentleman express his assent or dissent from the suggestion made that the enumerator, while having full power to add to the list on the best evidence he can get, shall not have power to erase a man's name, because it can do no possible good except to place in his hands an arbitary power which he may misuse.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, I am rather afraid to alter it as it is the law up there.

Mr. WELDON. Under this provision a man may go to the enumerator and say: I believe A.B. has not a house, and simply upon that the name is stricken off. That seems to me contrary to all principles of justice.

Mr. MILLS. I would also call attention to the other fact that, if these parties whose names are struck off can swear in their votes, why not depend upon an oath properly framed to protect the election.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If we were really considering a Franchise Bill for the North-West Territories, all these observations would receive full consideration. But, as I told the committee before, the scheme is to adopt, with as little alteration as possible, the law which has worked well up there, and I do not like to alter these clauses because I do not think there has been any abuse, or that there will be any abuse. Therefore, I desire to adhere to these clauses, without entering minutely into a discussion of them, as if we were introducing a Bill having no special object, like the object I have now, of assimilating the law here as the law there. With the permission of the committee I will go back to the 28th clause. My hon. friend for Montreal East called my attention to the fact that the enumerator was not sworn, although the other officers were. I wish, therefore, to move the following as paragraph 2:—

The enumerator shall, before acting as such, take the oath of office, in the form I 2 in the schedule to this Act.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 58,

Mr. WELDON. This clause gives the returning officer as an elector a right to vote, and also the casting vote in case of a tie.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have not really been able to discover what alternative we have. I think we should give the returning officer the casting vote whether he is an elector or not.

Mr. MILLS. The returning officer might not be a resident of the district at all; he might be sent in from another district. In that case, it would be reasonable to give the clerk the casting vote.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am sure the hon. gentleman, if he were a Minister, would not do such a thing, and I am sure we would not.

Mr. MILLS. I think the returning officer ought to be a resident of the district; and if the hon. gentleman would make that provision, the section will be all right. The hon. gentleman has carried the clause for open voting. I understand the North-West Council are a unit in favor of the ballot.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A member of the North-West Council has told me he hopes to introduce the system of ballot. If that is done and I continue to have influence over the House, I shall ask the House to adopt the system.

Mr. MILLS. Would it not accomplish all the hon. gentleman has spoken of, if he were to provide, as we did in 1874, that the qualification of voters and the mode of voting in the North-West Territories for the election of members for the House of Commons shall be the same as for the election of members for the North-West Council. Without altering the law, the hon. gentleman would then accomplish his purpose, both with regard to the qualification of voters and the mode of voting. The hon. gentleman says, if he continues to lead the House, he will adopt the law passed by the North-West Council. It would be just as well to provide so now, and save the necessity of further legislation. We may have new elections here before another Session.

Sir JOHN A. MACDNOALD. I do not suppose that is very likely, but although I have great confidence in the North-West Council, and believe it will adopt a system of voting by ballot that will be all right, still I see no necessity for agreeing in advance to whatever legislation they may adopt.

Committee rose and reported.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 134) to amend "An Act respecting a Reformatory for certain Juvenile Offenders in the County of Halifax, in the Province of Nova Scotia"—from the Senate.—(Mr. Thompson.)

Bill (No. 135) to amend "An Act respecting Offences against the person"—from the Senate.—(Mr. Thompson.)

SUPPLY—SEIZURE OF SCHOONER DAVID J. ADAMS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. MITCHELL. As this is the only opportunity that a private member has of getting information from the Government, I beg to call the attention of the Government and the House to a very important event which has recently occurred—the seizure of the American schooner called the David J. Adams. The public have various accounts of the offence of which the parties on board that vessel have been guilty, and the press has also different statements about the charges for which the vessel has been seized. I notice that the seizure of the vessel has created very considerable commotion amongst our neighbors in the United States. That a member in the Senate of the United States has moved for a Bill of a retaliatory character, and that a member in the House of Representatives of the United States has done the same thing, and that the subject has been a matter of discussion in those two eminent bodies, and has been brought under the notice of the Cabinet of the United States and probably by them under the notice of the British Government. Now, I do not propose to evoke an extended discussion upon this matter. I think it would probably be indiscreet to do so at this time while matters of so great moment to the nation, to ourselves, and to our neighbors are pending between us; but it is evident, from the excitement that exists, that the public mind is a good deal agitated about it, and I think the Government might very fairly adopt a course which has been adopted by Mr. Gladstone and other Premiers of England when important international difficulties existed, such as the Eastern question, which has for some months agitated the mind of Europe, and in reference to which Mr. Gladstone has had occasion many times to make statements to Parliament. The same thing was done in reference to the Russo-India boundary difficulty, and our own Government did the same thing when the Riel difficulty was up last year. I do not ask the Government to make any statements or give any information that will at all impair our public interests. I know, as an old Minister, that Governments exercise great discretion in that matter, and I for one will not find fault with the Government if they do not go as extensively into it as, perhaps, many of us would like, because I know their responsibilities, and I think they should be the judges of what they think it right, at a crisis like this, to disclose, and of what they think it is not right to state. But there are some things they can state. They can set the public mind at rest as to the facts in connection with the seizure of the vessel, as to the offences charged against the vessel, as to the particular Statute or treaty under which she has been seized, and as to the particular offences for which she is libelled, and is now in the court. These are facts which they may fairly state and which will be looked for with interest, not only within our own territories, but on the other side of the line, and even in Europe. I have no doubt the matter has occupied the attention of the Government, for it is a very grave one, and I have no doubt it has been a matter of correspondence, perhaps remonstrance, and a good deal of negotiation with the Imperial authorities. I feel it would be unwise, unduly to press the Government for any extended information, but I would ask, and I think the country would expect, that any information which the Government feel they can give to this House, ought to be given, to set the public mind at rest as to the actual position of a matter of such vital importance, both to our own country and to our friendly neighbors.

Mr. FOSTER. I quite agree with my hon. friend that this is not a time for any extended discussion, and I shall content myself with a very brief and plain statement of the facts of the seizure, for which the hon. gentleman asked, and also of the charges which are to be made in connection with the seizure. My hon. friend has asked for no information which the Government may not give. He, himself, has been a Minister of the Crown and has, in a very responsible position, quite similar to that which I find myself in now, had to do with this vexed question of the enforcement of our rights under the Convention of 1818. A great many statements have been made in the newspaper press. Some of them have been fairly true; others of them have been far removed from truth. I am sorry that to-night I shall have to content myself with a briefer statement than I could otherwise give, from the fact that I have had nothing as yet but telegraphic despatches of the seizure, the full report not having yet come to hand. The schooner, David J. Adams, a fishing vessel owned in Gloucester, was in Digby Basin on Thursday and Friday of last week, according to the information which I have, with her port of register and name concealed, if not for the whole of the time at least for the greater part of the time that she was in. She was buying bait in contravention of the terms of the Treaty of 1818, and the Imperial Act of George III, which was founded upon that treaty; she was violating the Customs Law of the Dominion of Canada in that she came into port and remained there for twenty-four hours or more without reporting herself to the Collector of Customs; and Captain Scott, who had charge of the police vessel, the steamer Lansdowne, the only one which we have as yet fully equipped and in those waters, having been apprised of these facts by the Collector of Customs at Digby, went from St. John, where he happened to be at that time, and, after what seemed to him proper examination, determined to seize the vessel. This he did, and reported the fact of the seizure to the Department at Ottawa. I instructed him to retain the vessel which he had seized at Digby, where the offence was committed, and where the vessel had been seized, but, before that telegram reached him, being late at night, he had made for St. John, to which place he towed the vessel. So soon as I could reach him the next day with a telegram, I asked him to take the vessel back again to Digby, and hold her there. This he did, delivering her over to the Collector of Customs. The offences, as I stated before, of the vessel were that she violated the Customs Law, that she violated the Dominion Fisheries Act of 1868 in buying bait, which was held by the Vice-Admiralty Court of Nova Scotia, in Halifax, to have been preparing to fish, and that she violated the terms of the Convention of 1818. Legal proceedings are now being undertaken; the vessel will be libelled or has been by this time libelled in the Vice-Admiralty Court, and the question will be fairly tried. I do not think I can make any fuller statement at the present time than this which I have made.

Mr. VAIL. I was in hopes that the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) would ask for a little fuller information. Parliament has been in Session now for a considerable time, and this question is of such magnitude and is so very important to the interests of the Dominion that I was in hopes the member for Northumberland would have asked for a little more information, and I was in hopes that, notwithstanding he had not done so, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, or the Government, would have given the House fuller information on the subject. I am not disposed to press the Government one whit further than we have a right to press them in a matter of this kind. I know, to some extent, what their responsibilities are, but I think, now that Parliament is likely to prorogue very soon, Parliament ought to have had a fuller explanation of the position of this matter. The fisheries are a very important part of our commerce, and, coming as I do from one of the Maritime Provinces, and one that is more interested in the fisheries than any other Province, it is only natural to suppose that I and the people I represent would like to get all the information possible, with a due regard to the public interest. The exports of fish in Nova Scotia in 1870, amounted to $3,500,000. In 1883-84 they had reached nearly $9,000,000 — $8,600,000 or $8,700,000 — and we have at the present time about 30,000 people employed in the fisheries. The whole value of the fisheries the year before last was some $18,000,000, and after agriculture and the forest, the fisheries are about the most important of our exports. This matter has been presented to us in a very interesting light within the last few days. We find that the seizure that was made in the harbor of Digby was, of course, at once taken notice of by the United States, and certain resolutions have been introduced into the Senate, which shows plainly that this matter has attracted a good deal of attention. As the subject concerns so intimately the interests of the fishing community, I hoped that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries would have said something about the instructions that have been issued to the commander of the fleet for the protection of the fisheries, that the people may know what his authority is. I hoped further that he would be able to tell us how many vessels had been chartered for the protection of the fisheries, also how many had been commissioned, and, if it was compatible with the public interest, what the understanding is between the British Government and the Dominion Government with reference to any assistance the former may be disposed to render us by furnishing vessels to assist in the protection of the fisheries. There is a good deal of information which, I think, the Government should have furnished to this House without in any way making public any portion of the correspondence that might at the present time be considered private. I think from the present state of affairs the House is entitled to have a copy of the instructions furnished to the commander of the fleet for the protection of the fisheries, laid upon the Table for our information. And besides that, I think the Government ought to take the House into its confidence so far as to inform us in what state the correspondence is, and if any steps have been taken by the Imperial Government and the Dominion Government in respect to this matter. Of course I do not expect the Government to give us any information which it might be injurious to the public interests to divulge. As I said before, I know the difficulties of the situation, but at the same time I would like the Government to take the House into their confidence so far as they can consistently with the public interest, on the several points I have named. I am not going to say much about the bait question, which is in controversy at the present time. I will say this, however, before sitting down, that if the American fishermen are to be permitted to come into our harbors and take bait without reporting at the Custom house, I am inclined to think that we will be in a very awkward position before long, because we shall then find that we are opening the door for vessels to trade from one port to another in the Dominion, and that is a matter which ought to be handled very carefully. There is another point which we might consider. If vessels are to be allowed to come in and purchase bait for fishing even outside the three-mile limit, they have great temptation, when they have the bait and are passing through our waters, to fish within the three-mile limit, and that may make trouble in the future. Of course all these things have to be considered. I do not see that there is much difficulty in deciding what is a fishing vessel and what is a trading vessel, and if trading vessels come into our ports for the purchase of bait, they must enter at our Custom housest he same as any other vessels, and clear in the same way. That would be a different thing altogether from fishermen coming in to purchase bait. But I do not wish to say more than is absolutely necessary in order to point out to the Government the position we occupy at the present time and the necessity of giving our people to understand that their interests will be protected.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am sorry the hon. gentleman did not follow the course adopted by the hon. gentleman who very properly asked this question of the Government, because, unwittingly, at this moment he has unfortunately brought up incidentally a matter which ought not to be discussed or considered as doubtful in this case, and although his remarks were rather indistinct, unfortunately he has given away a portion of our case.

Mr. VAIL. Not at all.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will not argue it, because I would only be doing the same thing for which I am rather reprehending, so far as I venture to do so, the hon. gentleman. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), as an old Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and having had, I hope, a more difficult task than this to arrange, and greater responsibilities than this case involves—he was well aware, he knew the limits within which he could properly make enquiries; and I would ask this House on both sides whether my hon. friend, the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries has not made a full and clear statement in answer to the question put by the hon. member for Northumberland. He told them the circumstances under which the vessel was seized, he has told them the grounds for the seizure, he has told them the Statute under which the seizure was made, and he has stated that proceedings are being taken in the courts for the purpose of procuring a conviction. That was a clear statement, and ought to be, I think, satisfactory to the House. I have no idea that we will have any trouble with the United States. I believe the Government of the United States are animated by the most friendly feelings towards England and towards Canada. I believe the relations between England and the United States were never more agreeable than they are at the present moment. Of course when we look back, having memories, to the time when the hon. member for Northumberland was in the Government, and when seizures were made before, we saw the excitement under which the fishing interests labored along the American coast. They shared certain advantages, and they are annoyed because they believe they will be deprived of those advantages. They made a great noise before the last treaty, before 1871, and they are beginning to make a noise again, and politicians, of course, will make speeches in the line in which we have often seen done in this Legislature; a member will occasionally make a speech which he thinks will be agreeable to his constituents. But as regards the negotiations which may be going on between the Governments, in consequence of any real or alleged infractions of our laws, as regards any question arising out of them, I am quite satisfied that the United States Government and the United States Congress will give full freedom to the justice and impartiality of our tribunals in case of a conviction for any offence against our laws respecting the fisheries.

Mr. DAVIES. I regret the Government have not seen their way clear to accept the invitation which this debate offers them to make a plain and distinct statement to the House, such, I think, as the House is entitled to, of the view they take of the present grave crisis. The incident of the seizure of the David J. Adams is a very grave one, and hon. gentlemen will allow me to state why I think so. It may result, though I am sure we hope it will not, in a cessation of those friendly relations which have heretofore so happily existed between ourselves and our neighbors to the south. That seizure, we know, has been discussed at great length in the public press. The public are not ignorant of the alleged grounds of that seizure, and it does seem to me an anomaly that the press and people of the Dominion should be discussing that seizure and our right to make it, and the circumstances under which it was made, and this Parliament should sit quietly by and not say anything about it or give any expression of their views. We know that in regard to this matter we are face to face with the fact that the old treaty has expired. We are face to face with the fact that the United States Senators, and a very large section of their people, hold and have expressed very strong views with regard to their rights in this matter. We are face to face with the fact that they have taken the responsibility of declaring in their Parliament, that they intend to come into our waters to purchase bait, tranship their cargoes and ship their crews, and that they propose to do those acts as a matter of right. We know they have laid down the reasons why they think they have that right. They declare that owing to the repeal of the navigation laws, the passage of more favorable laws between the two nations than formerly existed, the restrictions of the old treaty have been more or less diminished. And they have sent that vessel in, and we have seized the vessel. What I contend is that we should have a statement as to the policy of the Government at this early stage of the proceedings. Certainly the Government have had plenty of time to make up, and they must have made up their minds as to a certain policy. It will not do to say that Parliament is not to discuss the question. Parliament has a right to demand, I think I am within my right in saying that Parliament has a right to insist that in the presence of grave complications that may follow from the seizure of that vessel, the Government should state to Parliament what views they hold upon the question, what its policy is to be, and whether it has given instructions to its officers to carry out that policy. I am perfectly aware that when the Government gave instructions to their officers to carry out any business of a delicate character, such as Captain Scott is entrusted with, they do so with great care and furnish secret instructions. We do not ask that those secret instructions should be submitted to the House; but we ask that the general instructions should be stated, that we should be informed what the policy of the Government is with respect to the presence in Canadian waters of American fishermen and the latitude to be allowed to them in obtaining bait and transhipping crews. The Government must have come to a policy; the Government must have instructed their officers who are going to act on those instructions, and this Parliament will be face to face with the result of that action; and are we to wait till the action has taken place without knowing what the policy is? Does the hon. gentleman deny or dispute that a vessel has been seized for breach of the Customs Law and also for violation of the Fishery Act? We have a right to know whether, in the opinion of the law officers of the Crown and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that American vessel has been guilty of a violation of the Fishery Convention; whether it is the intention of the Government to pursue the policy which apparently their officers have pursued or not; whether we are to hear of any other vessels being seized or not; whether the policy has received the approval of the Imperial Government. We know that in a matter of this kind any policy we may adopt, if the seizure can be taken to foreshadow a policy, we must have the approbation and approval of the Imperial Government; and I would like to know whether any correspondence has taken place between this Government and the Imperial Government on the subject, whether any correspondence has taken place between this Government and any official, indirectly, with the United States Government, and whether the hon. gentleman is in a position to inform us that the United States Government share or contend for the propositions which were laid down by Senator Frye in the Senate and by Mr. Dawes in the House of Representatives. The hon. gentleman says, and says correctly, that members of Parliament sometimes make use of expressions in their places for which the Government are not responsible, and I do not assume that because Senator Frye made a fire-eating speech in the Senate, the United States Government are responsible for all his utterances. But we cannot lose sight of the fact that leading gentlemen in both branches of Congress have given notice of their intention to introduce Bills which, if carried, will seriously interfere with our trade. The question has arrived at that stage when the Government should take Parliament into its confidence, and state whether they have decided on a policy, and, if so, announce its nature. Parliament will be prorogued, we all hope, in a very few days, and in my judgment it would be unfortunate if Parliament prorogues without the Government having taken us into its confidence, and asked for our support. I submit that an opportunity is afforded now for doing so. This is no time to enter into a lengthy discussion, to rake up the whole fishery business, or to weaken the Government's hands, and I would be the last one to do so on this occasion; but, as a representative of the people, I have a right to ask the Government to give a declaration to the House; a fuller declaration of the position of the matter; a general idea of the correspondence; a statement of the policy they have adopted, and the policy which they intend to carry out, and the general nature of the instructions given to the officers charged with carrying out that policy. It is not fair that Parliament should be left entirely in the dark on this question, and it is of no use to say that it is not in the public interest to give information. I say it is not in the public interest that the press should be discussing this matter and making positive statements from day to day, telegraphed from the scene of action on the responsibility of United States consuls and Dominion officials, and that Parliament should be kept entirely in the dark. The hon. gentleman who opened the conversation did so very temperately, and I understood him not to press for the minutiæ of the policy or the details of the correspondence; but I understood him to desire that the general nature of that policy and of that correspondence, and of the action the Government intend to pursue, should be given to the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In other words, the hon. gentleman wishes us, when negotiations are going on, to show our hand while the United States are not doing so.

Mr. DAVIES. If I understood the statement made by the Minister of Fisheries, he showed his hand.

Mr. MILLS. I do not admit the proposition or the doctrine laid down by the First Minister. I think it is for Parliament to say what the policy of the Government shall be on this as on every other important transaction. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has not asked, the hon. gentleman who introduced this subject has not asked, the Government to give the particulars of the correspondence that has taken place; there is nothing of that sort desired; but we desire to know what policy the Government are pursuing in maintaining our rights with respect to the fisheries—whether the Government are intending to adopt the policy of restriction on this question of the fisheries, or whether they are seeking through that agency to protect our inshore fisheries, or what they are aiming at. It is a matter of very great consequence to this House to know the aim and policy of the Government, and they cannot contend that they are going to keep from the United States what it is they are aiming at in dealing with this important subject. The United States Government have from a very early period made propositions we have always refused and have put forward as legal rights those which we were right in resisting. We were simply assuming under the Convention of 1818 within certain waters the same rights that the United States Government made with regard to waters on their coast. But when the hon. gentleman proposes to adopt very stringent and special commercial regulations with respect to the fisheries, it is important for us to know precisely upon what lines the Government are acting. Surely that is not a matter which can in any way damage any negotiations, or in any way weaken the hands of the Government in dealing with the Government of the United States.

THE NORTH-WEST DISTURBANCE—GENERAL AMNESTY.

Mr. LAURIER. There is also another question of great practical interest, which, in my opinion, should receive the attention of the House. Early in the Session the Government were asked whether it was their intention to grant some general measure of amnesty to the parties connected with the late rebellion. The Government replied that the question was one of great delicacy, and that it was under consideration. So far as we know the consideration of the Government has not reached any conclusion; nothing so far has been done in the matter. Now we are fast approaching the end of the Session, and I submit that it would be fitting that the voice of the House should be heard in the matter. Whatever may have been the individual opinion of every one of us as to the causes which led to the rebellion, as to the circumstances which accompanied and followed it, now that the rebellion has been quelled for almost a full year, now that peace has been restored for almost a full year and harmony prevails everywhere, we can I think all unite in prayer to His Excellency to grant pardon and oblivion to all offenders, and for all offences connected with the late rebellion. This is not an occasion, Mr. Speaker, to recriminate, nor do I desire, in any way, to recriminate. I desire, on the contrary, to approach this subject in as moderate a spirit as possible; but I must express my surprise that the advisers of His Excellency have not yet recommended the course which I have just suggested. Hon. gentlemen on the other side have always taken the ground that Louis Riel was the sole author of the rebellion, that to his influence and to his influence alone the uprising was due. Well, if such was the opinion of gentlemen on the other side, the only conclusion of such an opinion must have been that Louis Riel alone should have been punished, and that the offences of everyone else connected with the rebellion should have been long ago forgiven and pardoned. Moreover, the fate of the country is to some extent already pledged in that direction. In the month of February last Mr. Dewdney, Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories, conveyed a promise of amnesty to some classes of offenders in the late rebellion. On the 16th of February last Mr. Dewdney wrote as follows to the Indians under his jurisdiction:—

"As the spring is coming on the Government is doing all it can to provide seed grain, for all the land you can cultivate, in order that you may put in a good crop for the coming season. Large quantities of wheat, barley, oats and potatoes, as well as garden seeds will be sent to your agents, and it will therefore be necessary for you to make every preparation to begin work as soon as the weather will permit.

"The knowledge that soldiers are coming to the country has, I have no doubt, already reached you; and you have already been told by people who want to do you harm, that your arms are to be taken from you, and that arrests are to be made of those who took part in the troubles of last spring.

"This is to notify all Indians that such is not the case. No Indians will be disarmed who behave themselves and attend to what the agent tells them; neither will arrests be made of any who took part in last year's troubles. The soldiers who are coming are for the purpose of keeping the peace, and while here will endeavor to stop horse stealing both from whites and Indians, and arrest any found so engaged. They will also assist in putting a stop to whiskey smugglers coming across the line."

He concludes as follows:—

"I send you these words for your good, and hope you will take my advice and that of your agents and instructors, and not listen to men who, for selfish motives, wish to see you discontented and in trouble."

It is true that on a late occasion the Prime Minister, in answer to a question by my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, stated that this letter had not been authorised. Well, if not authorised before publication, it has not been disavowed since, and if it has not been disavowed it meant approval. If the Government did not intend to abide by this letter, I submit that their duty was then to have disavowed it. But they have allowed it to be circulated amongst the Indians and in the press, and in my judgment, if now the promise of that letter were not to be carried out, it would be a breach of faith on the part of the Government. On the same occasion the Prime Minister said:

"But with regard to certain half-breeds in the vicinity of Turtle Mountains, on the other side of the line, who, it has been represented strongly, were simply misguided, and have not been guilty in any way except in joining in the outbreak, he has been authorised to say that if they return and behave peaceably and loyally they will not be disturbed."

Well, the course which was then suggested by the Government and to be taken with their approval was certainly very proper. It was proper to induce those men who had been breakers of the law, who had fled from the country to avoid prosecution, and who had been simply misguided in their actions, to come back, and induce them to become subjects of Her Majesty. But it seems to me, and I think it will strike everybody, that if those who have broken the law and fled to avoid prosecution earned their pardon by simply coming back, then surely those who remain were more, or just as much, entitled to the same privileges and should have received pardon. I am aware that some individuals have been granted pardon, and that some prisoners have been released. But that is not sufficient. Mercy should be the rule and not the exception; severity only should be the exception. Apart from those who were arrested, tried and convicted, and who are now undergoing sentence, apart from those who fled from the country, there are also large numbers of those who were engaged in the rebellion last year—in fact the bulk of them—who are at large, and whose liberty is in danger; they are living under constant apprehension that they can be instantly arrested. Now, I claim, and I think everybody will admit, that it is not humane that those people should ever remain in constant fear of arrest So far as my opinion goes, I can see no reason, taking the view which the Government took all along, why a free pardon should not be granted to everyone connected with the rebellion; Gabriel Dumont, now a fugitive; to Michel Dumas, also a fugitive; to Monkman, Lepine and the others confined in the penitentiary. I can see no reason, so far as I am concerned, why a free pardon should not be granted to every one of those men. But if the Government for reasons they consider adequate, and of which, I admit, they are the best judges, think that some exceptions should be made, let the exceptions be made, but at the same time let a general amnesty be granted to the whole population. Whatever may be the reasons for making exceptions in the case of some few individual persons, there certainly can be no reason whatever why the arm of the law should forever be suspended over the heads of the whole population. Such was not the course followed in the United States. Less than six weeks after the capture of Richmond the President of the United States issued a general proclamation of amnesty extending to the whole population, from which only a certain class of the principal offenders were excepted. Well, I suggest that the same course should be adopted here. The course adopted there was eminently wise and useful. It afforded at once security and confidence to the whole population of the south. I claim that some such course should be adopted here. The country is at peace; harmony prevails over the length and breadth of the land; those who were last year engaged in rebellion are now living quietly, and their only thought, so far as we know, appears to be to repair the injury the war inflicted on their country. But it is manifest that their energies must be dampened by the thought that they are never sure of a second moment of liberty. As I said before, I desire to approach the subject in as moderate a spirit as possible, and I only ask that a general proclamation of amnesty should be made for the whole population, leaving the Government, if they see fit, to make some exceptions. Such an amnesty would afford relief to the minds of the whole population, who are at present living under constant dread of arrest; and if this is done, those people will be given cause to bless and love the laws and institutions of their country. Without saying any more, I beg to move, seconded by Mr Blake:

That all the words after "that" be left out, and the following substituted:—That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying for the exercise of the royal prerogative, for granting a free pardon, indemnity, and oblivion for all crimes, offences, and misdemeanors connected with the late unhappy troubles in the North-West, to all of Her Majesty's subjects, in so far as the same may be compatible with the safety of the Crown and the security of the Dominion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I fully appreciate the tone with which the hon. gentleman has made his motion. I quite agree that everything he has said has been worthy of the occasion. He has in no way attempted to make it a matter of political excitement; he has pleaded the cause of those who were unfortunately concerned in the outbreak; and I can assure the hon. gentleman freely that he cannot go substantially further in the direction of the resolution than the Government have already determined to go. We all know that the majority of those who were concerned in the outbreak, those who took arms under Riel and his immediate lieutenants, were misguided, were misled; and so far as the Indians are concerned, we must look upon them as having had their savage nature roused by the prospect of war and by the hope of getting that warlike distinction, the traditions of which rest among them, and which always excites the Indian tribes, and especially the younger warriors, when there is anything like warfare in their vicinity. So that I say the Government are quite prepared to deal with this subject in as large a sense as this resolution conveys; and I hope that the hon. gentleman, when he hears what I say, will be satisfied with it, and will not at this moment press this resolution. The resolution asks for an amnesty, in so far as it may be compatible with the safety of the Crown and the security of the Dominion. Well, the Crown is safe, and the Dominion is secure, I have no doubt; and that exception means a universal amnesty. I do not suppose any of us believe, or anyone in the North-West can feel for a moment, that either the safety of the Empire or the Crown, or the security of the Dominion, could be in any way affected, whether an amnesty were granted or not; but there are cases which I think, and which the House I am sure will think, ought to be made exceptions, and we cannot make individual exceptions by name, because the evidence is of all kinds, some primâ facie, and some amounting to moral certainty of guilt, and guilt, of what kind? of murder, atrocious murder. Well, a general amnesty would pardon all such persons. I had before me only yesterday a statement of a person who is now on the other side of the line, who boasted that he had shot a white man from a river bank while he was in his canoe going down the river. It was during the outbreak, and the murderer was an insurgent, but it was not in battle or in any way in hot blood. Now, I take it that the American Government ought to be asked to surrender that man. With respect to those parties, if there are any, and I know there are some, who have been guilty of other murders—murders in cold blood, though committed during the outbreak—they ought not to escape, because their offences are not in any true sense political offences merely. True, in all rebellions and outbreaks, there are atrocities; and in the case of this outbreak—it ought not to be dignified, really, by the name of rebellion—we pardon everyone whose only offence was to take up arms and assist in the outbreak, even if it was proved that in any contest that took place he had shot down some of our troops. It is a consequence of all warfare, whether civil or with foreign nations, that there is bloodshed and death; and the fact that one man more skilful, perhaps, as a marksman than another has killed his opponent, does not make him any more guilty than others who fired with the same intention, though not with the same success. Then, there is another point, which is of some considerable importance. We have very good evidence that there was at one time a very formidable conspiracy fomented on the south of the line by interested parties, whom I do not choose to designate more particularly, for the purpose of having an Indian, a savage invasion into our country. That evidence was so strong, and came from so many sources, that the Government felt it their duty to make some preparations; and hence, as we intimated in that statement of Mr. Dewdney, the Government were prepared to send a moveable column in case of any invasion from the south, especially in the vicinity of Calgary, in the Blackfoot country, so as to be prepared with a force to repel any such invasion. While I stated that that proclamation was not authorised and was not seen by us, we knew Mr. Dewdney had represented, as others had, that it was of great consequence, if new troops were sent in to the country, that they should be sent in in such a way as not to alarm the Indian tribes; so as not to make them believe, as interested parties would make them believe, that this additional force was sent for the purpose of renewing the war and of shooting and putting them down. It was with that view Mr. Dewdney made that announcement, which he did on his own responsibility. After the question put by the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Blake), I ascertained from Mr. Dewdney that, knowing the excitement which existed among the Indians, especially among the Blackfeet, Bloods and Piegans, he thought it was well to come out with that proclamation. Since that time, I need not say, we have been in constant communication with the North-West; we have been watching the frontier, we have been watching the varying feelings of the Indian tribes, we have been watching the movements to the south of the line. Formidable the feeling was at first, but by degrees better counsels prevailed, and I hope and believe that the decidedly hostile feeling, which some few months ago existed south of the line, has to a great extent disappeared; and I may say this, as another reason why I should ask the hon. gentleman, after this statement, not to press the resolution, that I am aware, from credible evidence from a person, a refugee himself, whose respectability is vouched for, that those, the Metis especially, who are refugees from justice, are now signing a petition addressed to Her Majesty or the Governor General, praying for pardon and stating the reason why they desire to return. It is of very considerable importance we should get that petition, that we should get them to declare their submission to the laws and desire to return to the country. It is of the greatest importance to the future of the country that such a petition should be presented; and, if I am not mistaken, some very important refugees are at the head of the movement to petition the Governor General or the Queen to permit them to return to Canada. One thing more and I shall sit down. A general amnesty, not excepting those who have committed the atrocities to which I have alluded, would greatly irritate settlers in the North-West. I have had occasion, as it is my duty, to watch the public sentiments of the settlers in the North-West, so far as they can be ascertained from their newspapers, and there are some very respectable, well conducted journals in the North-West. The feeling that we can gather from those papers is that the Government have gone too far in the release of convicted prisoners. Some very respectable papers speak strongly on that point. They do not all say so, but the majority of the papers speak in that direction, that the sentences have been too short, and the imprisonments too short; and if an amnesty be given without exception, and the parties who committed these atrocities do take advantage of the amnesty and come into this country, the consequence would be, I fear, these men would be shot down by the friends or the relatives of those who suffered. Therefore, there must be exception. Those who have committed the kind of crimes I have mentioned, should, at all events, not be amnestied now. I hope and believe the petition to which I have alluded will be presented ere long, and I can only repeat that the Government are sincerely desirous to have the whole outbreak forgotten; they are sincerely desirous to have a wet sponge passed over the crimes, so far as they are political and not accompanied with atrocious murder, and that every man would feel secure against the possibility of being brought before a tribunal for any offence connected with the rebellion. I do not believe there is any apprehension or any serious apprehension among the Metis, who still remain in British America, or among the Indians, that any of them will be punished. I have not been able to discover that there is, because all the accounts go to show that white men, half-breeds and Indians are busily employed this season, to an extent that has never existed before in the North-West, in the cultivation of their grounds, and in a desire to support themselves and improve their lands. The Government will wait until they receive this petition which I have mentioned. They will be then prepared to grant a general amnesty, and they will only make exceptions of those against whom the evidence is strong, and with the reservation, the necessary reservation I think, that should any future evidence arise of actual complicity in any of the murders that occurred—murders as distinguished from bloodshed in honorable warfare or from combat in battle—the Government will be prepared to recommend to Her Majesty, to His Excellency the Governor General, the issuing of an amnesty.

Mr. BLAKE. I am very glad to hear the last statement of the hon. gentleman, to which I think no exception can be taken, from my point of view at any rate. As I understand the hon. gentleman, his statement is a declaration on the part of the Government that, upon the reception—which, I suppose, will be at comparatively early day—of some declaration or petition from certain half-breeds south of the line, they are willing to issue a general amnesty, affecting all the cases concerned in the outbreak, with the exception of those the hon. gentleman may believe—because, of course, it is impossible to say with a certainty what a trial would give—to be guilty of atrocities, and I suppose he refers to those in the Territories, who, as an expression of opinion, he thinks should be brought to trial, and to those out of the Territories, with respect to whom the hon. gentleman indicates he proposes to apply to the Government of the United States for extradition.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In the one case I have mentioned.

Mr. BLAKE. In that case. These cases, therefore, will be dealt with in course of law, and as to all the cases which will not be dealt with in courts of law—that is to all the cases except such as there are well grounded reasons for believing have been guilty of cold-blooded murder, as distinguished from death from battle-field or combat—we shall have a general amnesty. I have felt it was absolutely necessary we should have a discussion on this subject, so that the views held on this side, which I am glad to see approximate so closely to those on the other side, should be stated, because the condition of things as it stood appeared to me to be very unsatisfactory. The hon. gentleman will have observed that, so long ago as the 16th February, the Indian Commissioner made a proclamation to the Indians inside the Territories which was, so far as it could accomplish that result, a general amnesty to them without exception. Now, I find it difficult to concede that the Indian Commissioner should have taken that step—of course, he did take that step, after what the hon. gentleman has said, without any communication with the Department or the Government here—when the telegraph could have conveyed his views of the urgency of the occasion, and would have procured the authorisation of the Department for a step so important. I find it still more difficult to understand how, if some very sudden emergency necessitated the issue of that statement, it came to pass that the superintendent should have thought it consistent with his duty to leave the Government here in entire ignorance of his having taken that step, to such an extent that it was not until my calling attention to the subject on the 5th May—so long a time from the 16th February to the 5th May—that the hon. gentleman had to enquire of him what he had been doing up in the North-West in this matter. It seems to me a very extraordinary state of things that a course of this sort should have been pursued by that official. I think, unless he can show that there was some pressing emergency which disabled him, in his view of the public interest, from communicating what he was about to do before acting, he is blameable for not having communicated before acting. If there was such an emergency as justified him in acting before communicating, he is blameable for not communicating what he did do upon the doing of it, so that it might be understood here and the course of action consequent upon it might have been adopted. I think the hon. gentleman will agree with me that, according to their well known views which I have heard him often enforce in reference to the Indians, with regard to promises and pledges, it would be only under the most extraordinary circumstances that the Government would feel itself in a position to do otherwise than literally comply with that statement in the letter of the gentleman who was representing the Government and the Queen; and the fact that it was, although taken upon the official's own responsibility, practically irrevocable, that it could only be violated at the cost of a breach of faith, renders still more cogent the observations I have made. That being the state of things, it is the fact that on the 16th February there was practically, though unauthorised, a general amnesty to the Indians who were in the Territories. Then you come to another class of persons who have been in an informal manner amnestied also. The hon. gentleman informed us on the 5th May that Mr. Dewdney was not authorised to make the statement to which I have referred, but he added this:

"With regard to certain half-breeds in the vicinity of Turtle Mountains, on the other side of the line, who, it has been represented strongly, were simply misguided, and have not been guilty in any way except in joining in the outbreak, he has been authorised to say that, if they return and behave peacefully and loyally, they will not be disturbed."

I dare say these are the same persons to whom the hon. gentleman has referred this evening as the persons who had signed the petition.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. BLAKE. Oh, these are other persons? Then we find that a certain number of the insurgents who fled to the United States and were on the other side of the line have been, by the authority of the Government, told that if they return they will not be troubled; so they have been, though we do not know who they are, yet a body of half-breeds who have left the lines have been, told that they will not be troubled. Then, it seems there is a third class of half-breeds who are outside the lines, who are not embraced within the limits of this message of peace, who are, the hon. gentleman says, now in process of signing some declaration to which the hon. gentleman attaches very considerable importance, and for the signature of which he proposes to wait some time before extending the royal clemency. Then you find the case of the half-breeds in the Territories. It hardly appears to me to be possible to contend, in fact it has not been contended, that they should be placed in any worse position than the Indians, and that it would be possible, after having amnestied, as it is admitted now we have practically amnestied, the Indians, that we should delay very long to amnesty the half-breeds. And then there is the great case, you know, of the whites of Prince Albert. We were told by the hon. gentleman that they were the persons who had really caused the rebellion. We were told by the Minister of the Interior that they were the persons who caused the rebellion. These alarming statements in regard to these public enemies were, to my mind, considerably mitigated by a statement I was glad to hear the new Minister of the Interior had made when in that neighborhood, whether it was made under some friendly pressure or whether it was that in an enemy's country like that, he thought he had better adopt a little policy; but I was glad to see that he declared to the inhabitants of Prince Albert, when he was amongst them, that he had never doubted their loyalty; so we may as well, in a friendly spirit, pass the sponge—to use the hon. gentleman's phrase—over these violent utterances with reference to the whites of Prince Albert, particularly as, after the very diligent search for public enemies which was made under the instructions of the Government, the result was, I am glad to know, and I am sure hon. gentlemen must be glad to know, attended with so little success that he was not able to find a very great many public enemies whom he might bring to trial, public justice and condemnation. There you have all the classes of the political offenders. Under those circumstances, I felt, as I showed by making an enquiry at a very early period of the Session, that it was absolutely necessary that one of two courses should be adopted; that the Government should make up their mind, if the public interest, in their view, the safety of the Dominion or the interests of public justice, required that any further prosecution should take place, to prosecute; and that if they felt, as I am glad to feel, that, with a very few exceptions, from the statement of the hon. gentleman to-night, the public interest did not require that, it was fitting that the sponge should be passed over all other events, and that an amnesty should take place. Now, as I understand it, that is practically the hon. gentleman's statement. For my own part, I shall not express an opinion contrary to the hon. gentleman's, with reference to the petition or declaration to which he refers. I do not myself attach a very great deal of importance to such petitions or declarations made under such circumstances. I do not think that they are extremely cogent bonds for good behavior in the future. I think we have to trust to the past and to the future rather than to any declarations which may be so made as of any practical importance, but, still, the hon. gentleman attached importance to them, and he says no long time will elapse before the result which he desires to attain will be attained, and that then, with the one or two unhappy exceptions to which he refers, and with respect to which I do not desire to say a single word dissenting from his conclusion upon them, ignorant as I am, of course, of the particulars, but taking his description of the offences, the sponge is to be passed over these transactions so far as it is possible for us to pass it. Under these circumstances, I should think the object of my hon. friend's motion has been attained, and, as far as my voice would have any effect, I would suggest to him to adopt the suggestion of the hon. gentleman and withdraw the motion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am glad to hear that statement from the hon. gentleman, as I think it is the proper course to pursue, but I must ask the permission of the House to make one remark, as I am afraid, from the imperfection of my statement, I have rather made the hon. gentleman misunderstand what I desired to say. The hon. gentleman's question put the other day was specific. There was, I think, an announcement about the Indian arms being taken away.

Mr. BLAKE. That was another question. I put two questions. The question I put was this:

"Whether Mr. Dewdney had been authorised to inform the Indians of the North-West Territories that no arrests will be made of any who took part in last year's troubles."

Copied from Mr. Dewdney's letter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. At that time I was not aware of that. I made this statement:

"Mr. Dewdney has not been so authorised; but with regard to certain half-breeds in the vicinity of Turtle Mountains on the other side of the lines, who it has been represented strongly, were simply misguided and have not been guilty in any way except in joining the outbreak; he has been authorised to say that if they return and behave peaceably and loyally, they will not be disturbed."

When, as I have already stated, we were informed by the evidence before us that there would be an invasion, we made an arrangement to send up an auxiliary force to the force then there. Representation was made, not only by Mr. Dewdney, the Lieutenant Governor, but by others, that the Indians would be alarmed, and he asked in his correspondence, which was very full, that great care should be taken when the troops went up there that the Indians should not be disturbed or alarmed, but that they should be informed that it was not for the purpose of affecting them or their security. Mr. Dewdney, in that portion of the notification that was read, certainly has learned from me that the force would not be sent directly among the reserves to frighten the Indians, and that he should take every step in his power to let the Indians know that the force was not sent with any hostile intent, but to keep the peace along the frontier, and for the purposes mentioned in that statement. That was an open and general correspondence between Mr. Dewdney and myself, and that was carried out. Then with respect to the few half-breeds that were allowed to come in from Turtle Mountains, they were permitted to come in in consequence of strong representations made by Father Hugonard, who was in that vicinity, and who asked that these men, for whom he vouched as being respectable and peaceable men, who had been misled—he pressed very strongly, for particular reasons applicable to each case—that they should be allowed to come in. Well, the agent was sent to inform them that they might return, and if they behaved themselves well they would not be disturbed, but there was nothing like a formal amnesty. I will only say further that I am very glad that we agree upon this matter, and I can only repeat that I think we are for once in accord on both sides of the House with reference to the position of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. LAURIER. I ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment withdrawn, and motion agreed to.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Repairs, Furniture and Heating, &c., of Public Buildings $408,000 00

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The first item for repairs, furniture, &c., $175,000, is the ordinary amount. The second item, grounds and public buildings at Ottawa, including Major's Hill Park, $9,500, shows a difference of $2,000 more. As I stated the other day, there was an arrangement made with the city about taking Major's Hill Park under the control of the Government, and that arrangement involves an additional expenditure of $2,000.

Mr. VAIL. Will it require $2,000?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It may not always require that, but it does this year. Removal of snow, public buildings, Ottawa—that is the usual amount. Heating the public buildings, Ottawa, $53,000, that is the amount of ordinary years. Gas, public buildings, Ottawa, $23,000; that is the same. Water, public buildings, Ottawa; we require $1,000 on account of having leased certain buildings in the city for Government purposes. Then the allowance for fuel and light, Rideau Hall, $8,000; that is the amount paid to the Governor General every year. Telephonic service, public buildings Ottawa, $3,000, instead of $6,000 last year. We have made a new arrangement with the telephone company by which we have the same service for half the price. The salaries of engineers, firemen, caretakers of Dominion public buildings, $37,000. There is an addition of $2,000 on account of new public buildings having been erected in different parts of the Dominion, which require additional engineers, firemen, &c. Next, heating Dominion public buildings, fuel, &c., $50,000. That is in accordance with the extension of public buildings throughout the Dominion, and the amount was not sufficient to meet the ordinary expenditure under that service. Lighting Dominion public buildings, hitherto paid by the various Departments occupying the offices, $25,000. This is a new item. The Government thought it was better that the lighting of the Dominion public buildings should be under the control of the Department of Public Works, instead of being scattered through all the Departments, and we believe from experience that the service will be better performed.

Mr. VAIL. This is the amount that it cost before?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes. Guided by the experience of the different Departments, we added the sums together, and we thought it would be about $25,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where was that entry previously?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It was paid under departmental contingencies. We have thought that the matter should be attended to by the Deparment of Public Works, and we therefore place it there instead of scattering it through the different Departments.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that this sum of $33,000 was charged in 1885-86 under the item for departmental contingencies, $186,000?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In that case it would follow that instead of a net increase in departmental contingencies of $5,670 the increase would be $40,000. My impression is that the hon. gentleman's memory is incorrect and that lighting and water were never paid under item 21: Under the head of departmental contingencies no such entries appear. Where were they charged?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman understands that the two items are for the outside service.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They are not charged to departmental contingencies.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The amount is not paid by my Department.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is practically a deduction from the usual charges for Customs, Excise, Post Office, and other Departments of the Government.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that in addition to the amount of $53,000 for heating public buildings at Ottawa there is an amount of $50,000 for various public buildings we have obtained possession of in Ottawa for Government purposes or is it for buildings all over the Dominion?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There are two items. The first is for public buildings at Ottawa, and the second is for public buildings all over the Dominion.

Harbors and Rivers, Nova Scotia..... $2,000 00

Mr. KIRK. Have the harbors for which amounts were voted last year all been completed?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman must see that in these estimates they are without exception votes in connection with harbors already began. Any amount for new works must appear in the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. KIRK. Is it estimated that the $2,000 now proposed for Mabou will complete the work?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The engineer's estimate is that the total amount required for repairs is $2,000.

Mr. VAIL. Hon. members will notice that only $2,000 appears under this heading for Nova Scotia, as compared with $11,500 for Prince Edward Island, $63,750 for Quebec, $43,500 for Ontario. I hope the Minister of Public Works will take note of this fact and remember Nova Scotia in the Supplementary Estimates. I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works what is the position of the Digby pier at present.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We are making some temporary repairs in order to allow the steamers to land their passengers and goods. But as to the extent of the larger work I cannot say now; I must reserve my remarks on that head until we come to the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. VAIL. The reason I have referred to this matter is that I have received a number of letters from people in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick as to the disadvantages the people are laboring under in being obliged to land from vessels in scows. Steamers run from Boston and also daily from St. John, New Brunswick, and the people are subjected to great inconvenience. I hope the Minister will take a note of the matter, and will see that the work is pushed as rapidly as possible.

Harbors and Rivers, Prince Edward Island..... $11,500 00

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. For repairs to breakwaters, piers, &c, acquired from the Local Government we require $2,000; for the New London breakwater $2,500; for Cascumpec, removal of rock, $5,000, and for repairs to the Souris breakwater, $2,000.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's). I hope the hon. gentleman will remember that $2,000 is not a sufficient sum for repairs to the Souris breakwater, and that, as a good deal of damage has been done last season, he will bring down in the Supplementary Estimates a sufficient sum to repair it.

Mr. McINTYRE. I regret that the sum appropriated for repairs to Souris breakwater this year is only $2,000. As far as I am able to judge, it will require at least $8,000 or $10,000 to repair the damage which was done there last fall. Last year the sum of $3,000 was granted, and the work was farmed out to three or four individuals, and the expectant candidate for that portion of the county gave orders to his friends, who were of course favorable to the Government, and those were the only ones who could receive any work during the time the work was in progress. There were no tenders asked as there should have been. The proper way, I think, in the construction of works of this kind, is that they should be let by public competition, and then let the contractor get his material at the usual rates. Whilst this work was in progress a storm came up and a large amount of damage was done to the breakwater; a large portion of the eastern wall was driven in, and it has remained so all the past winter. In fact, it is a matter of surprise to the people how the work stood it at all. It was in that condition when I left home, and I do not know how it has been since. They did not commence work on the breakwater until late in the fall, which is not the proper time to do work in such an exposed position. The work should begin in the summer when the weather is calm, because in the fall it is not possible to continue the work steadily; they may work one day and be off for the next three or four days. Whilst I am on the subject I would draw the attention of the Minister of Public Works to another work in King's county, to which I directed his attention some three years ago. I refer to the breakwater at the mouth of St. Peter's harbor. The hon. gentleman will remember that the contract was given out in 1882 or 1883, that the contractor did a certain part of the work and then withdrew, taking a portion of the money coming to him for that year. The hon. gentleman will remember that in the Session of 1883 I drew his attention to the condition of that work, to the fact that it was in a state of disrepair, and that the harbor was likely to be destroyed unless the work was prosecuted. The hon. gentleman promised on that occasion that in the succeeding spring the work would be prosecuted to the satisfaction of the people, but that promise has not been carried out. The balance was carried over for a couple of years, but now I see that it has disappeared altogether. Now it would be satisfactory to the people there to know if that work is to be completed, for if the harbor is to be left in its present condition it will be completely ruined.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It was not in the Estimates last year; for, if so, it would have appeared in italics in the adjoining column of this years' Estimates.

Mr. McINTYRE. Well, it was in the year before.

Mr. VAIL.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That statement of the hon. gentleman, therefore, is not correct. The hon. gentleman says that the work on Souris breakwater was begun too late in the year. Whose fault is that? I could not begin until the money was at my disposal.

Mr. McINTYRE. You had the money in July.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman does not suppose that after having been six months in Session we could begin immediately. We had a great many works to proceed with, and we had to prepare plans and specifications. This work may be very important, but I could not abandon all the other works, some of which were quite as important as this, in order to carry it through immediately. Instructions were given to take them as fast as we could go on with the works. This year I hope the Session will finish this month, and then we will have nearly two months more than we had last year, and we will be able to begin our work earlier, and thus meet the wishes of the hon. gentleman who says that these works should begin earlier. I am perfectly with him in that, but I cannot begin to work unless the money is voted, and as the Session finishes generally about May or June, we cannot begin at the very beginning of summer. When the money is voted and is put at my disposal, instructions are given to the engineers or architects to prepare their plans and specifications. In this case the hon. gentleman says no tenders were called for. It is not usual to call for tenders for small works. We generally do these things otherwise, by having a clerk of works or engineer on the spot, because these specifications could not possibly cover the whole ground. Sometimes we cannot know exactly the quantity of work to be done, and therefore we could not call on a contractor to give us a tender for it, as it sometimes turns out to be double or treble what it was thought to be. That is the reason why small works of this kind are performed by days' labor under the supervision of an engineer or a clerk of works. With regard to the other pier the hon. gentleman spoke of, if he will be kind enough to put a question on the notice paper, I shall be able to answer it in forty-eight hours.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman says that small works he adopts the system of performing by days' labor instead of by tender; but I think nearly all the building of piers and breakwaters in Prince Edward Island is done by days' labor, which is not thrown open, as it ought to be, to the general public, but the money is sent down to a little clique who simply employ men who are known and recognised as wearing the ribbon of the party: "No other person need apply." These breakwaters are built in exposed places, and there ought to be a survey to ascertain minutely the quantity of work to be done, and then it ought to be done by contract. I have warned the hon. gentleman of this before. He knows, if he has examined these works, that the plan of spending $1,000 in one year and perhaps $1,500 in another, and placing that money in the hands of such people as he dignifies by the name of clerks of works, is really and truly throwing money away. Last year we voted $1,500 for the New London breakwater; this year the hon. gentleman is asking for $2,000 more. What is that but mere patch-work? The money is sent to a little clique who spend it among their friends; and I warn the hon. gentleman that the public interest is not being served by a system of that kind. There is no class of work that should be so efficiently built as breakwaters, and if, after careful examination and after specifications prepared by a competent engineer, they are built under contract by the lowest tenderer, they will be useful to the public and will reflect credit on the hon. gentleman's Department. I suppose we may expect in the Supplementary Estimates large sums for other breakwaters, because we are instructed that the elections are not far off, and the surest evidence of that is in the votes in the Supplementary Estimates.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman's remarks would frighten a Minister of Public Works if I were more disposed to be frightened than I am. If we were to bring down large sums for these works, he would say, you are bringing them down for the elections. Therefore, I take the hon. gentleman's warning that we should not bring down large estimates for Prince Edward Island.

Mr. DAVIES. I do wish you to bring large sums for the Island.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Fortunately for me, I am not in the habit of consulting the hon. gentleman about the estimates to be brought down. The hon. gentleman says that in voting $2,000 or $3,000 this year, and as much next year, we are squandering the money. But unless these works are built at a cost of five or six times as much as they now cost, we cannot do otherwise than repair them as the damage occurs. The great difficulty in the Maritime Provinces is that sea worms destroy the wood in these works in three or four years, and all at once a work that seems to be solid crumbles, or is carried away by a storm. The only way to remedy that effectually would be to build the works in a more substantial way, with stone slopes to protect them, which would cost a very large sum of money. We have done that in the case of works of great magnitude; but I have instructed my chief engineer, that whenever practicable, it is better to wait for three or four years, if the work can stand it, instead of repairing it from year to year and spending small sums upon it, so as to accumulate larger sums to protect the work in the way I state. But these small works cannot be done otherwise than by days' work; and in that case the work is best done under the supervision of an officer. It is quite possible, in so many extensive works from one end of the Dominion to the other, that some negligence will occur on the part of local officers. The hon. gentleman complains that the men employed are friends of the Government. That is one of those accidents that occur under every Government; the hon. gentleman knows they occurred under the Government who preceded us, and I have no doubt they will occur under Governments who will follow us.

Mr. HACKETT. I desire to say that the allegations of the hon. member for Queen's are quite incorrect. I do not know much about the breakwater to which he refers especially, but with regard to the gentlemen appointed to superintend these works, they are honest, conscientious men, and the money entrusted to their charge is as faithfully expended as it can be. I am not aware that any man having control of this work is in any way open to the imputation of jobbing. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that because a small sum of money, amounting to less than $1,000, is placed in the hands of men in Prince Edward Island, it would be thrown away? He is quite incorrect. The people of Prince Edward Island are as careful of public money as the people of any other Province, and the hon. gentleman, when he speaks in that sense, is reflecting on the people of his own Province. The people of Prince county, at least, are quite cognisant of the fact that public money for the building of breakwaters is of great advantage to them, and any amount, be it ever so small or so large, is ever gratefully accepted by them, and is expended in the most careful and economic manner, under the management of the Minister of Public Works, and the able engineers and gentlemen he controls. It is a reflection on our people to say that you cannot send down to Prince Edward Island $1,000 to expend in an emergency—the end of a breakwater may be carried away or the approach to it—but you must take another man from another Province to control that expenditure. I am glad to state the hon. gentleman is quite incorrect, and that the money that is expended is expended in the very best direction. The hon. gentleman, when he says the money at New London was wasted, is passing a reflection on a very important section of his own county.

Mr. DAVIES. I do not expect my criticism to meet the approval of the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Hackett). With reference to the item:

Balance of re-imbursement to the Government of Prince Edward Island, in settlement of their claims for the construction and maintenance of harbor and river works of Federal importance, 1st July, 1873, to January, 1883, $24,240 00.

Is that in full settlement of claim, or is the claim still open?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is in settlement of the claim.

Mr. DAVIES. There is no claim preferred by the Government of Prince Edward Island for another sum?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. When the claim was made in the first instance by the Government of Prince Edward Island, they claimed a much larger sum. Then we granted after examination $53,000 or $54,000 for a number of wharves or piers, and afterwards, on their asking us to reconsider the matter, saying there were certain piers that were of the same Federal importance as those we had accepted, the matter was reconsidered, and finally this sum of $24,000 was voted with the sanction of Parliament in settlement of the claim.

Mr. DAVIES. When the $53,000 was voted, it was made a condition in the Order in Council that the Government of Prince Edward Island should give a receipt in full. They would not however give the receipt, but pressed their claims for a further and larger amount. The hon. gentleman yielded to their pressure to the extent of $24,000 and paid it. Was that money accepted by the Prince Edward Island Government as a settlement in full?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. As far as I can recollect, it was a final settlement.

Mr. DAVIES. There is no application pending for a further sum?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I cannot recollect.

Mr. HACKETT. I do not know why the hon. gentleman should be so persistent in wanting to know whether it is a matter open between the Government of Prince Edward Island and the Dominion. I think it is our interest that the matter should be left in such a state that the Prince Edward Island Government can advance their claim at any time.

Mr. DAVIES. When the hon. gentleman becomes a minister, I will address my questions to him. In the mean time, I will address them to the Minister of Public Works.

Public Works, New Brunswick..... ..... $41,500 00

Mr. WELDON. Is the Negro Point breakwater, St. John harbor, under contract now?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes; the contractors are Rhodes, Curry & Co.

Mr. WELDON. Have they not failed? And it is not a man named Harrison who has the contract.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The statement that I have here shows that they are the contractors. The date of contract is August, 1885, so they must be new contractors. The work will be completed 30th September, 1886.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How comes it to be that there is so large a revote?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I suppose it is on account of the work having been stopped. We had to call for new tenders.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is estimated to be the total cost?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The works were re-let to Rhodes, Curry & Co., on the 12th August, 1885. Their contract is for $60,000, and $25,000 to $30,000 will be required to finish.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the total cost?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Previous to 1878, $145,000 had been expended. Each year from that, there was expended $30,000, $16,000, $5,000, $2,000, $5,000, $30,000, $41,000, $19,000, $6,500, $35,500, respectively.

Mr. VAIL. It is about time the work was completed. It has been a drag on the Treasury for years, and I hope it will be rebuilt in such a way that there will be no danger of its being carried off again.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman knows how it was damaged by the storm.

Mr. BURPEE. Perhaps the Minister will give us some idea of the expenditure on the St. John River. The amount is small, it is true, but it is said that it is frittered away and does very little good. I should like to know what the money is for, how it is used, and whether there is any contract. It is said it is given to some two or three parties, and they expend it as they think proper with very little advantage to the river. We have the same amounts year after year. The amount appears to be divided into three parts, although two of them run connectedly from Fredericton to River des Chutes. The other part is above Grand Falls.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The first amount of $1,000, Bear Island to Fredericton, the chief engineer states is required to continue the improvement of the navigable channel of this river by removing boulders, snags, and other obstructions. This amount was expended last year, and I think a similar sum was expended the previous years.

Mr. BURPEE. Is it by contract or days' work?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think it was under the supervision of some officer of my Department. Then the vote of $3,000 for the River St. John above Grand Falls, and the River Tobique, is put in for the continuation of the improvements of the navigable channel of the River St. John above Grand Falls. I have not been there myself, but I have understood from different parties for the last three years that these sums were well employed and did good service to the navigation.

Mr. WELDON. What was done with it?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Last year, the sum of $2,743.55 was applied to the repairs to a breakwater on the east side of Grand Falls, and towards the construction of a wharf on west side, $900; improvements between Woodstock and Grand Falls, blasting rock and removing sand bars at various places. Then the other sum is from the River des Chutes to Bear Island. That is to be expended in continuing the improvement of this river by removing the boulders and other obstructions.

Mr. GILLMOR. Will the hon. Minister explain about this expenditure on the Madawaska River?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There is no item this year for the Madawaska River.

Mr. IRVINE. Of course, it is not well for any person to find fault with money expended in his own constituency. It seems to be something out of the usual course, and I do not wish it to be understood that the observations I make are in the shape of fault-finding with the expenditure of the money, but numerous complaints have been made to me since I have been a member of Parliament, that the money expended on the River St. John, above Woodstock, is practically thrown away, that it is done by days' work and in a very improper way, so much so that I have been solicited by several in my own county and in the county of Victoria, which the Minister of Inland Revenue represents, to ask for a detailed statement showing how the money has been expended for three years past. I have not done so, but if I have the fortune to be here another year, I may be obliged to do so. No steamboat runs on the River St. John above Woodstock since the construction of the railway and since the river has been bridged. There are four bridges above Woodstock, and there is no steamboat navigation. There are some tow boats running there, I think, but the public who live on both sides of the river think a large portion of this money is very uselessly expended. So far as the Tobique river is concerned, it may be a necessity to expend it, because they have no means of communication except by the river or by road, and there is a great deal of lumbering done there. I have been asked to direct the attention of the Minister to one point where some benefit might be done. That is at Hartland. There is a station of the New Brunswick Railway there and a very large amount of business is done, and they have to cross from one side of the river to the other, but the only means of communication is a wire ferry. At Florenceville, above, and at Woodstock, below, they have bridges, but there they have nothing but a wire ferry, and I am told there are impediments, in the shape of boulders, which it would be of service to the people at that point to have removed.

Mr. WELDON. Is no contract let for any of this work?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is done by days' work.

Mr. WELDON. Who had charge of that?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Those works are under the charge of the clerks of works and superintendents that were appointed for that purpose.

General repairs and improvements of harbors and rivers of the Maritime Provinces $12,000 00

Mr. VAIL. I have before called the attention of the Minister of Public Works to this vote, which is largely expended for travelling expenses of the engineers in charge of all the works in the Maritime Provinces. I think it would be better to charge that sum to salaries instead of public works. Probably not one-third of the amount goes to general repairs and works.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This sum covers the travelling expenses and salaries of those engineers who are sent to make examinations and surveys, and they must be paid in some way. This is the ordinary vote for that purpose.

Mr. VAIL. I would ask if there was an engineer employed last year to survey the works in Nova Scotia with a view of deciding what portion of the works would be considered Dominion and what Local. I know an engineer went through the Province, but whether he was employed by the Dominion or Local Government I could not say.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think we had an engineer employed there, the Provincial Government made a claim in that direction, and we could not take it up until we had procured some information, and we had an engineer who went round. I do not know how far his work has been done.

Harbors and Rivers, Quebec. $63,750 00

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Etang du Nord, $7,000. That is at one of the Magdalen Islands, and is a harbor of refuge; $5,000 will be required to complete it. I am sorry the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Fortin) is not here, for he could explain this item. It is for fishing boats, because there is no shelter on that coast.

Mr. LANGELIER. Is this work done by contract?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think there is a contract. The difficulty was that it is far out of the way.

Mr. LANGELIER. I would ask also if the work at Ste. Anne de la Pocatière is done by contract?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes. Only $750 are required to complete.

Mr. LANGELIER. There is nothing provided for the wharf and pier. Is it not to be lengthened?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes; there will be something in the supplementaries.

Mr. LANGELIER. Is the work at Château Richer also being executed by contract?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman knows that there are boulders at Château Richer. We have been clearing away the boulders, because boats go there to trade and to the quarries, and they are very often wrecked or damaged. We have been clearing a channel, and I think this amount will complete the work.

Mr. LAURIER. Will the sum of $9,000 complete the works near Nicolet?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think there is something else in the Supplementary Estimates. At the entrance to the mouth of the river where the harbor has been made, we require to complete one side by putting brushwood and stone. We have a portion of the material on hand, and this is for the purpose of using it and completing the work.

Mr. LAURIER. Does that mean completion during the year?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. From July to July. That is done by contract; R. P. Cook is the contractor.

Mr. LANGELIER. This $3,000 for Lanoraie, is that for the same pier built many years ago by the Richelieu Company?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No, it is another one.

Mr. BERGERON. (Translation.) I see there is nothing for the St. Louis River. I presume the hon. Minister has forgotten these works.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) That is so; I see there is nothing.

Mr. BERGERON. (Translation.) Can the hon. Minister tell us whether there will be anything in the Supplementary Estimates?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) I am unable to tell that now; the Supplementary Estimates are not yet passed in Council.

Mr. BERGERON. (Translation.) Just a moment ago, I heard the hon. gentleman tell the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Langelier) that there would be in the Supplementary Estimates an amount for Trois Pistoles. It is so near the St. Louis River in the present Estimates that, if the Supplementary Estimates are already prepared for Trois Pistoles, the Minister ought to know whether there will be an amount for the St. Louis River.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) Unfortunately, Trois Pistoles is not quite so near as that to the St. Louis River. With regard to Trois Pistoles I knew that the Supplementary Estimates had been passed in Council, and that is the reason why I have been able to give an answer to the hon. member for Megantic.

Mr. BERGERON. (Translation.) The hon. gentleman will allow me to remind him that a delegation from Beauharnois waited upon him and asked the Government through him, whether these works were to be continued. The Minister knows perfectly well the importance of these works which were begun about three years ago. The owners of the river frontage on both sides have greatly suffered from the construction of these works, still they felt satisfied when they thought of the benefits which would result from their completion. If they are abandoned now the money expended up to this time will not be of much use, while a very small sum would complete them. This would be exceedingly important, not only for the town of Beauharnois but for the whole district.

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) With regard to this item of the St. Louis River, if I understand the nature of the works, it was intended to deepen the river-bed, and these works are not yet completed.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) Some of the works were not completed but they are completed now.

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) With regard to the taking up of anchors and chains from the bottom of the St. Lawrence, the hon. Minister stated a moment ago that these works were not intended to take place in the Quebec harbor. The Quebec Harbor Commissioners have an apparatus made for the special purpose of taking up anchors and chains, by which an immense quantity has been taken up from the Quebec harbor. Is it intended to use this apparatus for the purpose of taking up these anchors and chains or to have them taken up by day's work? In the latter case the work would be very costly.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) That apparatus does not belong to the Harbor Commissioners; it belongs to the Department of Public Works. It is by means of this apparatus that the chains and boulders have been taken up. It is quite possible that, after this year, when the work referred to will be completed, that this machine will be transferred to the Quebec Harbor Commissioners to whom it will be more useful than to the Department.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) Is this work of the same nature as that which has been performed last year with regard to the taking up of chains and anchors? I understand that a man by the name of Fradette has been employed in taking up chains and anchors at various places near St. Jean d'Echaillons.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) It is not the same thing. At St. Jean d'Echaillons, the work was done under a contract with the Department of Marine to take up the wreck of the steamer Ottawa. Mr. Fradette had a contract, but he was unable to carry it out, as he had not the necessary appliances and the price was not sufficient. The Department asked for tenders for the clearing off of the whole wreck, and Mr. Fradette happened to put in the lowest tender. I understand that since then the contract has been given to him, and that he will commence his work as soon as the water will be warm enough to allow him to dive. I believe a sum of $12,000 or $15,000 will be required for that object.

Mr. AMYOT. Besides the present amount?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) Will this amount be expended by day's work or under contract?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) It will not be by contract but by means of the lifting barge which will take up the boulders and chains. A crew is put on board and the work is done by that crew.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) I desire to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works on the repairs of the St. Michel's wharf. I see there is nothing this year in the Estimates for these works. Last year, the Government has expended $1,000 to repair the wharf at St. Michel, and I believe the reports of the officers of the Department state that the work has been exceedingly well done. With the $1,000, work was done which is worth at least $3,000. If the Government do not wish to see these works carried off by the next storm, they must cause these repairs to be continued towards the shore. This is one of the most useful wharves to navigation. Very often vessels of a high tonnage, go there to seek a refuge against sudden storms. All those who are conversant with the subject, have remarked that if the parish of St. Michel had not built these works the Government would have been obliged to build them. Until now, all that has been done by the Government has been the taking up of a few stones opposite the wharf, and the repairing of the wharf last year. The country feels grateful towards the Government for that much, but that should not be the end of it. I am free to inform the hon. Minister that the continuation of these works will not diminish the chances of the Government at the next general election. It will be considered as an act of justice which will cause the electors to be favorably disposed. Moreover, public interests demands that the Government should see to it. There is another question with reference to the amount due on the wharf. Perhaps this is not the proper time to deal with the question. Still, as the Dominion Government is on very fair terms with several of the Local Governments, they might possibly agree with the Local Government to settle this question. It will be remembered that this wharf was built with money borrowed when the Government issued debentures. The parish had borrowed this money at the suggestion of the hon. Minister, and it had been stated that that money would never be refunded. The parish acted in good faith. Since then the parish sustained heavy losses. It is not a wealthy parish, and although the whole district uses this wharf, the parish is obliged to pay it in full. All we have to do is to cross the river to see that the principle which I desire to apply to St. Michel is applied on the other shore on the Island of Orleans. The fact that a river separates the two places is no reason why the same principle should not apply. The hon. Minister of Public Works knows the question perfectly well, and with his knowledge of business and his knowledge of the locality, I am sure that he will finally accede to my demand. For this year, I will ask the hon. Minister, in the name of public usefulness, to be pleased to put something in the Supplementary Estimates to maintain this wharf, because if it should be carried away by the waters, we would be face to face with a loss which would require an expenditure of $20,000 or $30,000 or, perhaps, $40,000 to rebuild it. We can maintain this wharf by repairing it, and I hope that the well-known spirit of justice which animates the hon. Minister will induce him to take into consideration the details which may facilitate the settlement of this question.

Mr. LAURIER. (Translation.) With regard to the Yamaska River, is this sum intended to complete the works?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) Yes.

Mr. AUGER. (Translation.) What is the nature of these works?

Mr. AMYOT.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) It is a deepening at the head of the St. John's Island at the shoals below Cardin's Island, at the lower entrance of the lock and at the rapids of St. Aimé.

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) Is the work done by contract?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) Yes.

Harbors and rivers, Ontario $43,500 00

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. For what purpose will $4,000 for Cobourg harbor be expended?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. On works in connection with the extension of the eastern pier.

Mr. CHARLTON. How is it proposed to expend $2,000 at Little Current, Lake Huron?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is a work that has been going on for several years; it is dredging and blasting rock to improve the steamboat channel. This will complete the work. I understand the work has been very well done, and is much appreciated by steamboat captains and mariners.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is proposed to do with the $1,000 for Port Hope harbor?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is proposed to add a further length to the breakwater.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. For what is $4,000 required at Kingston?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is for work on the shoal.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then as to the $10,000 or Midland harbor?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That amount has been revoted three times. A deputation from the municipal council and the railway companies waited on the Government, and it was understood they were to proceed with their part of the work. They are to construct the cribs, and the material from the dredging will be thrown into them, so that a double object will be served: the crib work will be filled in and there will be an increased depth of water obtained.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I observe that the vote for the improvement of the channel of the River Ottawa above Pembroke has been dropped this year. I desire to draw the attention of the Minister to the fact that a statement has been made to me by steamboat owners and others interested in the navigation at that particular point, that an expenditure of between $2,000 and $3,000 is necessary to complete the improvement of the channel at that point, and, unless such expenditure is made, the previous expenditure of $5,000 or $6,000 will be practically lost. I would ask the Minister to consider the question with a view to placing an amount of say $3,000 in the Supplementary Estimates.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Is that at the same place?

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Yes.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I was not so informed. I will make a note of it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What about $4,000 which it is proposed to expend at Sault Ste. Marie.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This is a very important work. The steamers that go to Lake Superior, when they reach Sault Ste. Marie, do not stop on our side because there is not sufficient depth of water and they cross over to the American side. We think we should give our own people a chance to have the steamers stop there, and I am informed by the engineer that $4,000 will go a long way towards remedying the evil complained of.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I called the attention of the Minister of Public Works early this Session to the condition of Bayfield harbor, where the work which had been done had been completely torn up last autumn. He forwarded me a photograph of the work, and I understood him to say that orders were given to construct the crib work of sufficient solidity to resist the storms there. But I have a letter from the reeve of Bayfield in which he mentions that unless some dredging is done there the harbor will be perfectly useless. Is that being attended to?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes. As the winter has only just closed we could not do it before, but the intention is to do it now?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think there is a dredge in Goderich.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And probably two or three days' work would be sufficient to clean out the sand and make the harbor available both for a harbor of refuge and for general harbor purposes.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is true there is a drêdge at Goderich, but she is in great demand. I have given orders that she shall go from there in order to clear the entrances of two or three or four other harbors.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether the sum appropriated for Bayfield harbor has already been expended, and whether the work intended to be completed at the north pier has been completed? My recollection is that $4,000 was voted for the purpose, and I would like to know if the money has been expended and the work done to the satisfaction of the Department. The information I get from Bayfield is of a very unsatisfactory character. I was not in the House when the hon. gentleman answered the hon. member for South Huron. If I had been I could have satisfied him that the statements he received where wholly unreliable. I am prepared to say that the larger portion of that money was absolutely thrown away, that it was worse than wasted because it was improperly done. Some of the piling was done in such a way that when they struck a boulder they would cut it off, and when a storm came a large portion was carried away and was afterwards used for fence posts, when they were thrown upon the bank.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is quite possible that there may have been something of that kind, and that some of the piles were not put down far enough to be protected in case of a storm. But I understood from the chief engineer that it was not so, that the work was proceeding well, and was well done. The objection which the hon. member for South Huron made the other day, and to which he called my attention, was that we had not been dredging, and that the entrance was not open. He was perfectly right in that. The idea was not when they began to dredge to open the channel altogether. It was purely and simply, when the work was going on, to give facilities for the smaller boats to go in, leaving a good deal of the work to be done afterwards, when the pier where the gap had occurred would be completed, leaving the water to scour and work out a portion of the accumulation of sand and débris which was found there. The photograph which I showed the hon. gentleman was only to show that the work was progressing well. I was glad the hon. gentleman called my attention to it because, after all, there might be negligence somewhere, and I am always glad when hon. gentlemen call my attention to anything of that kind, and I investigate it at once. But I understood from the engineer that the work was progressing well, and that he was waiting for the spring to go on with it.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Has the break in the north pier been repaired?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. So I understood from the chief engineer.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). It is beyond a doubt that a large portion of the piles driven in there were not over 6 or 8 feet in length.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. When?

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Last year.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That is repaired.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). True, but that money is all wasted. Nothing but the grossest possible negligence could have caused it. What I complain of is that the money voted by Parliament was wasted, simply because there was not proper superintendence. It is unreasonable that a man should be employed as clerk of works who lives at a long distance from the place, when there were an abundance of the hon. gentleman's friends near the place. He came from Goderich, and there was no reason why that should be. There was the expense of bringing the men and supplies from there, and there is actually a charge for travelling expenses. He should have employed a man who lived near the place and took an interest in the work, and he could thus have got supplies cheaper and avoided the cost of transport. As I know the hon. gentleman takes an interest in the charming little harbor of Port Albert, and as I believe a delegation from that place waited upon him and that he received them, as he always receives everybody, courteously, and as there were hopes that something would be done, I should like to ask him about that work. I may say that, although I am opposed to doing this kind of work by day work, by employing some person as superintendent who goes and gets his own friends to do the work, yet, I must say that in Port Albert the work has been very well done. I visited the place and I think the work was fairly well done; I do not think there was any ground of complaint. It will require a little more—not very much—to make it a very convenient harbor. The sum of $1,000, $2,000 or $3,000 expended there would be money well expended, and would be of the greatest possible advantage to the locality. It is one of the most important harbors we have on the shore of Lake Huron. A large amount of lumber, wood, grain and other articles are shipped from that port, and if the hon. gentleman could only see his way to expending a couple of thousand dollars there, I am satisfied that when he next comes to the locality he will come to the conclusion that I have come to, that the money was well expended.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman say that in one case the money was well expended.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I am always willing to give credit where credit is due.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman said that only my friends were employed.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). No; I said the superintendent employed his friends.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I was going to say that I had to employ my friends rather than my opponents.

Mr. WILSON. Early in the Session I presented a petition from Port Stanley, from a very influential deputation, who came accompanied by a resolution of the county council, asking that a certain appropriation should be made to Port Stanley harbor. I would like to ask if the Minister has given the matter his consideration or not.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That has been looked into, but I have not yet come to a decision about it.

Mr. WILSON. I think I had an equally gratifying answer last year. I was led to hope until the Supplementary Estimates came down; and when they came down, I was told to wait until next year: but hope deferred makes the heart sick, and I am getting a little tired of waiting so long. I think the Minister is well aware that that harbor is not safe, and that owing to its defective condition many lives have been lost. Perhaps he may say that the Government have not the control of the harbor, but that it is controlled by the Grand Trunk Railway. Still, I think it is the duty of the Government to see that the tolls collected by the Grand Trunk Railway are expended in repairing the harbor. Perhaps they have been; but I moved for a return a short time ago, and I found that that company had even neglected to return to the Government for a number of years the amount they had received as tolls, and the amount they had expended on the harbor. Therefore I say, that when the Government have deliberately neglected to enforce their agreement with that company, it is their bounden duty to see that the harbor is put in such a condition as will prevent such wrecks and serious losses of life as have taken place there. I still hope the Minister may put a small item in the Supplementary Estimates for Port Stanley. I must say that I am afraid he is injuring the prospects of the Government candidate in the next election; it is a good Tory preserve, having a large majority of Conservatives, and it would be to the interest of the Government to improve that harbor.

Mr. McCRANEY. I would like to call the attention of the hon. Minister to Oakville harbor. I believe there was a deputation from Oakville down here two or three weeks ago to see the Minister, and I understand from those gentlemen that he received them very kindly, and led them to hope that something would be done. I suppose it is in the recollection of some hon. members that on the 5th of April, the day of the great storm in Lake Ontario, Oakville harbor was nearly entirely destroyed. At any rate, the east pier and lighthouse was entirely swept away, and it was supposed the loss was from $20,000 to $25,000. I understand that since that time the Minister has sent up his engineer to survey the harbor, and I trust that he has already made a report. I may say that Oakville harbor is one of great importance; it is the principal harbor between Toronto and Hamilton, it has a good depth of water, and it is the only safe harbor between these two places for vessels in a storm. I was there shortly after the great storm, and again a few days ago, and in the interval damage has been done fully to the extent of $1,000; so that delay is dangerous, and whatever is done should be done at once. The town has done all it could do for the harbor. It has expended upon it during the last ten years about $10,000; and having involved itself in debt for public improvements, it is not in a position now to rebuild the harbor, although it is quite willing to do all it possibly can to assist in that work, but unless the Government do something towards it, I am afraid the harbor will not be rebuilt. Therefore I hope the Minister will see his way to put something in the Supplementary Estimates for that purpose.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This matter has already received my attention. I was waited upon by a deputation some time ago in reference to it; the hon. gentleman, I think, was not present; but I was told that if the Government found that they could recommend to Parliament a vote of a certain sum of money for this work, the town would contribute one-half of the expense. That is certainly an encouragement; but I am not in a position to inform the hon. gentleman what we can do.

Mr. McCRANEY. I am very much pleased to hear the hon. Minister say that, and I am satisfied the town will be willing to contribute one-half.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN.

Mr. LISTER. I am not going to ask the Minister for any assistance for the harbor I am about to refer to; but I have a grievance to lay before the House from the people of Sarnia. We have a harbor there on which not a dollar of public money has ever been spent; it is a natural harbor, and the moment vessels get into the river they are protected from storms. But during the past year the Government for some purpose, thought proper to appoint a harbor master for the town of Sarnia. He left this Province and went to the United States, and representations were made to the Government by their own friends and by the people of Sarnia generally, asking that no appointment should be made to the vacancy; but in spite of the protestations of the people, the Government have appointed a harbor master to fill his place. For many years past American vessels, on their way to Lake Huron and Lake Superior, have been in the habit of touching the town of Sarnia and buying their supplies there, and the harbor master, appointed a year or two ago, collected fees from those vessels. Port Huron is situated immediately opposite the town of Sarnia. The result of the collection of these fees by the harbor master is that the town has completely lost the trade it had from vessels which were in the habit of calling there. American papers in Detroit, Port Huron, and the ports along the lakes had articles pointing out to American shipowners the consequence of touching at Sarnia, and speaking in harsh terms of the Government for the appointment of the harbor master. It is the only town where public money has not been expended, in which a harbor master has been appointed. The people are unanimous, regardless of politics, that there should be no harbor master there, and they have sent representations to the Government to that effect. Every wharf in Sarnia is owned by private individuals, and there has been no difficulty heretofore which it required a harbor master to settle. Windsor is in the same position as Sarnia, the wharves there being owned by private individuals, and Windsor has no harbor master. This appointment is a drag on the shipping and trade of the town; and if the Government will only cancel it, they will meet with the hearty approval of the people, because this appointment means the loss of thousands of dollars every year. The American vessels which formerly stopped at Sarnia are now stopping at Port Huron. American shippers feel that they have no harbor officers in their ports, except in Detroit, and that consequently our vessels are not charged harbor dues in American ports, it is not right that American vessels should have to pay harbor dues in Sarnia. For instance, I might cite the instance of a barge tow which had come there for supplies, and had to pay $30 in fees. The Americans look upon it as a swindle, and will not come unless the Government abolish these fees, and if they should do so they will be complying with the wishes of the whole people.

Mr. McLELAN. Last season, representations were made for the appointment of a harbor master in the port of Sarnia, on the ground that the river was often obstructed by rafts of timber and logs, and thus made unapproachable to vessels. The only dispute was as to who should be appointed, but on all sides there was a demand for a harbor master who would regulate trade and traffic and prevent the river being obstructed. The hon. gentleman gives as a reason for the cancellation of the appointment that no money has been expended there; but in Halifax, where no money has been expended, a harbor master is necessary.

Mr. LISTER. They have vast shipping.

Mr. McLELAN. Sarnia has also a great deal of shipping; and whether it be a natural or artificial harbor, if there is a large amount of shipping a harbor master is necessary. The Minister of Marine is absent, but I believe a proposition was submitted to him that no fees should be charged.

Mr. LISTER. American traders feel very bitterly on this subject. True, there was a petition from the people asking for a harbor master, but it was owing to a difficulty about the ferry, and that petition was got up by one of the persons interested in the ferry matter. He had an idea that if a harbor master was appointed, he would get the ferry to start from his own wharf. People signed that petition without knowing the consequences, and since then a petition has been sent to the Government, asking for the cancellation of the appointment. So far as the obstructions were concerned, they were not obstructions in the harbor at all, for the north harbor is a bay which is not navigable and people having lands adjoining the bay, have loaned it for the purpose of booming logs; but it was mentioned as a ground for the petition. There is not more than five feet of water there at the most. The object of the petition was that the ferry should be forced to leave the dock of the principal mover of the petition.

Harbors and Rivers, Manitoba.....$1,000 00

Mr. WATSON. I am sorry to see there is not a larger amount voted for harbors and rivers in Manitoba. Is it the intention of the Government to spend any amount on the Water Hen River?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No.

Mr. WATSON. I regret there is not an amount placed in the Estimates for improving Water Hen or White Mud Rivers this year.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Those rivers were not mentioned last year, and therefore, no matter what may be the decision of the Government, they could not appear in these Estimates. They could only appear in the Supplementary Estimates.

North Saskatchewan River, British Columbia.... $15,000 00

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not object to the vote for North Saskatchewan River, but I would like to know what the hon. gentleman proposes to do with it.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman sees we had another sum of $10,000 last year. As promised, there was a survey made of the river, the result of which is that the Chief Engineer has suggested that $15,000 should be applied in improving the North Saskatchewan River at Cole's Falls, some nine miles above the forks, by removing boulders, &c., so as to secure a depth of four feet or more at low water. Cole's Falls is said to be the worst part of the river east of Prince Albert. There is $5,000 of a re-vote and $10,000 of a new vote, and the estimate of the engineer is that it will cost $15,000 to improve the river.

Harbors and Rivers, &c., British Columbia.....$10,500 00

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will this amount of $8,500 do the work of removing the Dredger Rock in Victoria harbor?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes; I think that will complete the work.

Dredging.....$139,000 00

Mr. KING. Will the hon. gentleman say where the steam dredge will be employed during the summer in New Brunswick?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I cannot say.

Mr. KING. Does the hon. gentleman mean to do anything on the Grand Lake?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I cannot say where the dredging will be done. The hon. gentleman knows probably that the $30,000 we have for these Maritime Provinces is to work the dredges and the tugs, and so on, and the dredges are sent where they are required.

Mr. KING. I would remind the hon. gentleman that a survey was made at one point some years ago and $5,000 was voted, but very little of that has been expended up to the present time, and the necessity of dredging there is much greater now than it was when the survey was made.

Mr. VAIL. The vote for the other Provinces for dredging is separated, but there is only one vote for all the Maritime Provinces. I should like to know what portion is going to be expended in Nova Scotia and where?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If the wants of Nova Scotia are greater than those of New Brunswick or those of New Brunswick greater than those of Nova Scotia, a little more may be expended where it is needed than the exact proportion of, say, $10,000 in each of the three Provinces. If it were divided, we might not have enough to work a dredge in one Province where it was required, while we might have enough if the vote was taken for the three together. It is for the advantage of the service to take it in this way.

Mr. VAIL. But Nova Scotia has ten times as many harbors as any other Province.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I do not think Nova Scotia is neglected in dredging.

Mr. BURPEE. I think I have to complain of the dredging on the River St. John. Before Confederation we had a dredge specially built and appropriated to clear the channel between Fredericton and St. John. When we went into Confederation that dredge was taken charge of by the Dominion, and another dredge, a superior one, no doubt, was put in her place, but this dredge, instead of being employed on the river St. John as the intention was, has been employed about the wharves of St. John and Fredericton and other wharves. Some points on that river which required attention have been neglected because of the pressure of parties representing the cities at each end of the navigation of this river to employ the dredge continually around those wharves. I do not see what object they can have in clearing the channel around the wharves, if the channel on the river, which gives them employment, is allowed to be filled up. I know that, in one case, the dredge was taken from the principal shoals on the river to dredge out a channel to a private cove. The shoal at Oromocto, as is well known, when a dry season occurs, like last year, there are numerous vessels, both from the United States and from St. John, carrying lumber that have to unload part of their cargo and tow it, in order to get over the shoal, and then reload. That causes great inconvenience. I hope the Minister will make a note of this. Mr. Perley, his chief engineer, knows what is needed very well, and knows that, in the time of the late Government, a work was commenced to put more water into the channel to keep it clear, but there has not been a sufficient dam made up to this time to keep it clear, and it requires dredging.

Mr. WATSON. Where will this $10,000 be expended in Manitoba?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In the same way that we expended the vote of last year, that is, in working the dredge and the tug at the mouth of the White Mud River.

Mr. WATSON. I hope it will be used better than it was last year. Last year the tug on the White Mud River was not worked at all. Two years ago there was $10,000 voted for the improvement of the Water Hen River. The engineer made a survey and laid out the money. He built a couple of scows and a small dredge at Westbourne, on the White Mud River. Now these dredges have lain there ever since on the banks of the river. Of the whole $10,000 voted not five cents worth of improvements have been made on the White Mud River, or on the Water Hen River, or on the lake. I would like to see some portion of this money, or another sum in the Supplementary Estimates, to operate this plant that is lying there idle.

Slides and Booms..... $16,800 00

Mr. CHARLTON. I would like to ask the Minister whether any portion of this appropriation is to be used to improve the Quinze Rapids. I may say that a moderate sum of money would improve those rapids and make them passable. There has been some work done there, I believe, but the company has failed.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That is for the Ottawa works.

Roads and Bridges..... $19,500 00

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This $11,500 for bridges over the River Ottawa at Ottawa city, and over the Rideau Canal looks like a new work.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This is to put these bridges in order once for all, and then we will only have to keep them up.

Committee rose and reported.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 12:45 a.m., (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 14th May, 1886.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 22) respecting interest in the Province of British Columbia.—(Mr. Thompson.)

WORKS IN OR OVER NAVIGABLE WATERS.

The House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 130) respecting certain works constructed in or over navigable waters.—(Sir Hector Langevin.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. LANGELIER. This Bill provides that no work heretofore constructed shall, so far as the same interferes with navigation, be lawful work, unless the site has been approved by the Governor in Council. This interferes with the Quebec Harbor Commission.

Mr. THOMPSON. I propose to strike out clauses two, three and six, which will remove the objection of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DAVIES. That declaration, to a large extent, removes the objections taken against this Bill. The hon. gentleman sees that, in the Maritime Provinces, which are intersected with bays, creeks and rivers, there are many hundreds of bridges which have been built heretofore without any direct legislative authority, in the sense of an Act being passed. They have been built under the direction of the Governor in Council of the several Provinces, on votes of money given by the Legislatures, without pointing out a specific place where they should be built. In the old Act, there was nothing to affect these old bridges, and they were not obliged to come in to the Lieutenant-Governor in Council with plans and specifications in order to render those bridges legal. If I understand the hon. gentleman aright, this will go further and will compel the local authorities to obtain from the Governor in Council a legislation of their existing bridges, and that seems to me an evil.

Mr. THOMPSON. It does not compel the legislation of the existing bridges, but it enables the Governor in Council to legalise them. It will compel them to obtain legislation if they have to be rebuilt.

Mr. WELDON. Rebuilt or repaired.

Mr. THOMPSON. No, I do not think it goes so far as that.

Mr. WELDON. There might be a nice distinction drawn between rebuilding and repairing.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think, where the old bridge has gone down and there is a new one to be built, there ought to be some control to see that navigation is not interfered with by the new bridge to any greater extent than by the old. I know of some cases where there could not be any ground for disputing the lawfulness of the old bridge, but a new bridge is built, perhaps, with lower passageways or narrower passageways between the piers. I think there ought to be some control as to that. If not, wherever there has been a bridge built under supervision, not interfering with navigation, a new bridge substantially interfering with navigation may be lawful.

Mr. DAVIES. But the ninth section provides for that, because it says the Act shall not affect any bridge built before the 17th May, 1882, which hereafter requires to be rebuilt or repaired, if such bridge does not interfere with navigation to any greater extent than before. The law already provides that, if any such bridge is repaired in a manner to interfere with navigation, the authority of the Governor in Council must be obtained, and, if that is retained, any old bridges which are repaired in such a way as to interfere more than they formerly did with navigation, will require the authority of the Governor in Council. It does not appear to me to be judicious to go further. In the Province from which I come many of our bridges are built of timber which requires to be replaced every five or six years. We have not introduced stone bridges to the extent that other Provinces have, and it would be very hard if, every time a bridge is to be repaired, plans have to be submitted to the Governor in Council, although the repairing does not cause any greater interference with navigation than before.

Mr. MITCHELL. If I understood the Minister of Justice aright, he proposes to strike out the second, third and sixth sections of this Bill, and by that means to leave existing structures free from its operation.

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, it will not declare those structures to be illegal, and, if they are illegal at common law, we have power by this Bill to declare them legal.

On section 4,

Mr. LANGELIER. It is in this clause that the amendment I suggested in the interest of the Quebec Harbor Commissioners should be introduced. At present, if any work of that kind is to be built within the limits of the harbor of Quebec, no application has to be made to the Governor in Council. The only authority which has to be resorted to is the harbor commissioners. The Governor in Council has nothing to do with the construction of any wharves or piers, or anything of that kind, within the limits of the harbor of Quebec.

Mr. THOMPSON. They do that under a special Statute, and I do not think this clause interferes with that.

Mr. WELDON. The harbor of St. John, under an old Statute, is the property of the corporation. It is not a public harbor in the sense that other harbors are which have been transferred to the Dominion, but it is entirely private property and belongs to the corporation by Royal charter, confirmed by an Act of 1784. The corporation have always taken the power to have a wharf built by a harbor line defined by the Legislature of New Brunswick. I think there ought to be some reservation of the rights of that corporation, because the question might be raised. My hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie) says we could not touch private property, but a nice question might arise, and I think those rights might be reserved.

Mr. THOMPSON. I propose to add to this clause the words: "For which no sufficient sanction otherwise exists." If there is no sufficient legal sanction for the work otherwise, they may come to the Governor in Council. That will save the rights of everybody, and will only include in the scope of this jurisdiction those works in respect of which there is no means now of making them lawful.

Mr. TUPPER. Would not that follow from the striking out of those other clauses? I think that would meet the difficulty of my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Weldon).

Mr. BURPEE. The question raised by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) is partly met by striking out those sections, but not the whole. As I explained yesterday, these wharves are for the accommodation of the farmers generally, in moving their agricultural products, and in some cases they are also for the purpose of securing the banks of the river from being washed away by freshets. Every year new constructions are being made for that purpose. They are generally inexpensive, ranging from $100 to $1000. I take it that if the construction is required, the party requiring it would still have to come to the Government for a permit, even though it might not cost more than $100.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think not, for the reason that the words I have introduced now save all rights, whether private rights or those conferred by the Statute; so that the application to the Governor in Council is only to be made in respect to those structures for which there is no legal sanction. If the private proprietor, in such a case as the hon. gentleman speaks of, has a right to erect a wharf, he need not come here to get it confirmed; but if there exists no law for it, and it is an unlawful structure at common law, then the Bill requires him to come to the Governor in Council for permission.

Mr. WELDON. In common law any erection built where the public right of navigation exists, is illegal. Now, these small wharves on the St. John are built in some cases for the purposes of protecting the banks from freshets, and may not extend more than twelve feet into the water, being simply an abutment, the water being deep, for the purpose of facilitating the landing of produce and cattle going up and down the river.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is very undesirable that we should interfere with these, or be troubled by them, but I think when we have inserted the words which exempt from the operation of the clause all those structures in respect to which there are legal rights, there would be no difficulty.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) I see this clause sets forth that duplicate copies of plans and specifications have to be registered in the county or district of the different Provinces where they belong. Now, in my Province we have no registry offices for deeds in each county, and there might be a difficulty unless the word "district" would include the whole Province; otherwise it needs to be worded a little differently.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman is right, as we have but one registry office for the island—for the Province, not for the county.

Mr. THOMPSON. I move to amend the twenty-fourth line, by striking out the word "or" and inserting the words "county or Province."

Mr. TUPPER. I would suggest whether the word "duplicates," in fourth line, should not be "duplicate." The plural word might be construed to require parties to deposit duplicates of the plans and duplicates of the descriptions. In the Bill which the select committee prepared last Session, the words "duplicate thereof" were used, instead of the present expression, "duplicates thereof." I understand it is not the intention to require a duplicate of the plan, but only of the description.

Mr. THOMPSON. We might make it read, "and duplicate of each of them."

Mr. WELDON. With regard to the St. John River, there are large alluvial lands at its mouth. The river is deep, and the small wharves erected on each side are useful for protecting the banks as well as for affording conveniences for shipping. I think these wharves should be exempted from the operation of this Act. My hon. friend from Sunbury (Mr. Brupee) has five of them opposite his place on the river bank.

Mr. THOMPSON. Could such structures be said to interfere with navigation at all?

Mr. BURPEE. Not at all.

Mr. THOMPSON. Then they would not come under the Bill.

Mr. BURPEE. The Local Government, in such cases, go to half the expense of building those wharves, and the people or the locality interested pay the other half.

Mr. DAVIES. If the structures interfere with navigation they are illegal, and can be removed on a complaint made by any one. We do not propose to legalise them or to declare them illegal; they take their chance as before, except that after this Bill passes the Governor in Council can make them legal, and this is the only way it can be done, because the local authority cannot do it

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

REPRESENTATION OF THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES IN PARLIAMENT.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the third reading of Bill (No. 115) respecting the representation of the North-West Territories in the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. MILLS moved in amendment:

That the Bill be not read the third time, but that it be referred back to Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of so amending the same as to provide that every male person of twenty-one years of age, who is a natural-born or naturalised subject of Her Majesty, and who has been a resident for twelve months in the Territories, shall be entitled to vote for the election of a member of the House of Commons.

Amendment negatived on a division.

Mr. MILLS moved in amendment:

That the Bill be not read the third time, but that it be referred back to Committee of the Whole to amend the same by striking out that part of clause 18 requiring a deposit of $200 on the part of any person becoming a candidate for an election to the House of Commons.

Amendment negatived on a division.

Mr. WATSON moved in amendment:

That the Bill be not read the third time, but that it be referred back to Committee of the Whole to amend the same so as to protect voters against the undue influence of Government officials by providing for voting by ballot.

Amendment negatived on a division.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

HALIFAX REFORMATORY FOR JUVENILE OFFENDERS.

Mr. THOMPSON moved the second reading of Bill (No. 134) to amend an Act respecting a reformatory for certain juvenile offenders in the county of Halifax, in the Province of Nova Scotia.

Motion agreed to. Bill read the second time.

OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON.

Mr. THOMPSON moved the second reading of Bill (No. 135) to amend an Act respecting offences against the person. He said: This is a Bill which was passed in the Senate for the purpose of removing a doubt which has existed, principally, I believe, in the Province of Ontario. It has been held there that in the case of the desertion of a wife by a husband the wife is not competent to testify against the husband, and this Bill is to remove that doubt Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

SUPPLY—CONSTITUTION OF THE SENATE.

Mr. McLELAN moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. MILLS. I propose, Sir, to move an amendment as to the desirability of amending the British North America Act so far as it relates to the constitution of the Senate. I think that the experience we have had during the past ten years shows that in that particular, at all events, our constitution is seriously defective, and that the purpose which a second Chamber was intended to serve in our parliamentary system has not been secured by the Senate as it is now constituted. It is not my intention to detain the House at any length in the discussion of this question, because I have no doubt we shall, at no distant day, be called upon to consider the question at the hustings, and whatever conclusion we may reach here to-day will not be a final settlement of this very important question. My first objection to the Senate as at present constituted, is, that it is inconsistent with the federal principle of government with which we have set out. In the preamble of the British North America Act we declare that we organise our union on a federal basis, and we provide in our constitution for the appointment of a second Chamber, to protect in some degree the interest and the authority of the various Provinces and their powers against encroachment. At the same time we do not allow the Provinces in any way to exercise any control over the appointment of the second Chamber, but we provide that it shall be appointed by Her Majesty's representative upon the advice of the responsible Ministers of the day; and while we make that provision, we practically appoint the Senate without reference to the views that may be entertained, or the interests that may require to be guarded, on the part of any of the Provinces of the Dominion. Our Senate as constituted is not consistent with any recognised principle in any well-considered system of parliamentary government. A Senate, if it is to protect or guard Provincial rights or Provincial interests, should in some way be controlled by the Provinces. If it is to be simply an ordinary national institution, there ought not to be any Provincial control over the appointment of Senators, and there ought not to be any limitation as to the number of Senators; but when we declare that there shall be a fixed number of Senators from the respective Provinces, who shall be residents of the same, it is clear that we are recognising the Senate as in some way a protector of Provincial rights and Provincial interests; and yet it is quite possible that the Administration which enjoys the confidence of this House, as a whole, may not be possessed of the confidence of the majority of the representatives of all the Provinces. Now, Sir, we remember very well that in 1867, at the first meeting of Parliament held after the Union, the Province of Nova Scotia sent here but one member supporting the Administration; and the Senators who were to protect the interests of that Province were appointed by a Government which enjoyed the confidence of only one representative out of the nineteen from the Province. It is, I think, clear that in this particular the Senate is not in harmony with the federal principle of our constitution. There are, no doubt, other features of the constitution which are a departure from the general principle on which it is based. There is the provision with regard to property and civil rights. It is within the power of the Local Legislatures to give their assent to legislation on those subjects by this House, and thus practically to transfer their power to this Parliament; but so widely at variance with the federal principle of Government has that provision of our constitution been regarded, that it has never been acted upon, and, in fact, it is a dead letter. Then, there is the power of veto which is given to the Federal Government over Acts which lie wholly beyond its province, and within the exclusive province of the Local Legislatures. It never was intended that that power should be exercised by the Federal Government, except to disallow Acts which are ultra vires of the Local Legislatures. But there is no such limitation laid down in the British North America Act, and it is plain, from our experience, that in every instance in which the federal principle has been departed from, mischievous consequences have been the result. And our experience with reference to the constitution of the Senate shows that it is not an efficient second Chamber—that while it may offer no serious obstacle to the conduct of public affairs, so long as those who are in political sympathy with the majority of that body control their administration—yet, if there was a change of Government, and the administration of public affairs should pass into the hands of those not in political accord with the Senate, it is plain, I think, that we should have a deadlock in our legislation and our administration. In fact, in the Senate, as at present constituted, there are no means of adjusting it to the public opinion of the country. In England, if the House of Lords puts itself in opposition to the views of the majority of the House of Commons, it is in the power of the Executive to increase the number of Peers until the second Chamber is brought in harmony with the first. It is a common saying that under the English constitution you have a system of mutual checks and guarantees. The arbitrary power of the Crown is checked by the power of making or controlling money appropriations in the House of Commons; the arbitrary power in the House of Commons is controlled by the power of dissolution vested in the Crown; and the arbitrary power of obstruction, in the House of Lords, is controlled by the power of creating new Peers. In fact, the existence of that power renders its exercise almost altogether unnecessary. There is no such check in our constitutional system; there is no means of bringing the Senate into harmony with the House of Commons or with the settled opinion of the country. We know, looking at what has already transpired, that the ordinary life of the Senate is twenty years, while the ordinary life of the House of Commons is but three years; so that it would require half a generation to bring the second Chamber into harmony with the first. This is an age of very great change and very rapid progress, and it is clear that the Senate, as at present constituted, would provoke a revolution in this country if it were to exercise its power, as it undoubtedly could exercise it, in seriously opposing the wishes of the majority of the House of Commons and the views of the country. It seems to me that it is very important we should seek to make such changes in the constitution of the second Chamber as will bring it more under the immediate control of the public opinion of the country. There are many ways in which this might be done. In fact, if we were to seek to frame a system which would embrace a second Chamber that would be, in the smallest degree possible, beneficial, I do not think a system better calculated to accomplish the object could be devised than the one which already exists. Why, there is no motive to action on the part of the second Chamber. There is no useful purpose that a second Chamber may serve which the second Chamber in this country has served. I believe it is a fact that the gentlemen who compose the Senate are infinitely more interested in occupying what is called the Senators' gallery in this Chamber, than in occupying the seats which belong to them, in the discharge of their duties, in the second Chamber. That is an unfortunate condition of things. There is a score of useful enquiries conducted almost every year by Committees of the House of Lords, not one of which is undertaken by the second Chamber here. There are many and important duties that the second Chamber might undertake. Valuable information that might be collected, important conclusions that might be reached, and which would greatly facilitate Parliament in the discharge of its legislative functions, and the Government in the discharge of its administrative duties, which are wholly unattended to, because this House is far too busy, in the discharge of the duties that already devolve upon it, to undertake them, and because the Senate has no intention or inclination to undertake them. The Senate is in no way amenable to public opinion; it is not controlled by the intelligent public opinion of the country, and the majority of the Senators are best pleased when they find they have little or nothing to do. In fact, they adjourn from time to time because they claim they have nothing to do, and yet there are many very important and highly useful enquiries which might be undertaken, but which are wholly neglected by that body. We know that there is a tendency in every legislative body to extend its authority beyond the constitutional boundary. There is a disposition in men in every sphere of life to arrogate to themselves a greater amount of authority than is actually necessary in the discharge of the duties assigned to them. This Parliament is, perhaps, no exception to this rule; and the very notion of giving to the Provinces representation in the Senate Chamber, as Provinces, in theory at least, was intended to make the Senators the special guardians of Provincial rights and interests. But on what occasion has the Senate ever come to the rescue of the Provinces? On what occasion has it upheld the authority of the Provinces against parliamentary or ministerial encroachment? We know what has been done in the way of disallowing Provincial railway charters and of interfering with measures which are specially under the control of the Local Legislatures, as, for instance, the Streams Bill; we know that the Government, in many cases, have arbitrarily gone beyond their proper constitutional sphere by interfering with the duties devolving on another Legislature, and for which another Government is responsible to the people of the Province, and yet, so far as I know, there has not been a single instance in which the Senate has remonstrated or undertaken to protect the interests of the Provinces of which, it was supposed, when our constitutional system was adopted the Senators would be the special guardians. It requires no examination in detail of the work done by the Senate to say that it has altogether failed in its duties in this particular; it requires no examination in detail of the work that has been done by the Senate to show that it has not performed any of the important duties which specially belong to it. The work which we supposed it would have done, it has left undone; and many of the things which it has done, are things which it would have been better, in the public interest, to have left undone. Then we supposed the Senate would represent he settled, progressive opinions of the country. It is not supposed to be subject to popular impulses to the same extent as the more popular Chamber. We know this is the experience of the United States. We know that, under the constitution of the United States, the Senate, while it has resisted those short-lived popular impulses which have sometimes moved the House to action, has, nevertheless, been under the control of public opinion. Where the public have had time to reflect, and where they adhere to their conclusions, upon an important question of public policy, the Senate of the United States represents the opinion of the country upon such questions quite as decidedly as do the members of the House of Representatives; but this cannot be said of our Senate. We supposed the Senate would stand up for popular interests, especially where moral considerations were wholly upon that side of the question. Yet have the Senate done so in any important public question? How did the Senate act upon the subject of the gerrymander? Why, the hon. gentleman himself, who was leading this House in 1872, laid down an important rule of public policy, and that rule was assented to by this side of the House; there was no difference of opinion with regard to it. The hon. gentleman said it would be wholly contrary to his opinion of what was right and expedient to undertake to form a constituency out of parts of different counties. The people were in the habit, he said, of acting together in their agricultural meetings, in their municipal meetings, in their political meetings, and in meetings for judicial and other purposes. That a man sometimes entered into the township or village council, he became a leading and influential man, he became known to his people and enjoyed their confidence, and rose from the township council to the county council, and from the county council to Parliament; and yet, if you take off the township in which he resided and put it into a county to which he was a stranger, you will destroy his opportunities of promotion and of public service, those opportunities of public service which those who knew and trusted him would permit him to exercise; and yet we find the hon. gentleman, for the purpose of securing a party advantage, ten years later, wholly abandoning that position and taking up a wholly different line. There was an opportunity for the Senate to stand by a well-settled principle and an accepted doctrine, a principle of right and justice, of fair play and political decency, and to maintain it against the views of a simple mechanical majority in this House, the views of a majority who were looking to their own interests and not to the general well-being of the country. We know that the hon. gentleman who leads the Government has always favored a legislative union. He declared himself in favor of that at the inception of our federal system. He declared himself as preferring a legislative union at the very time that the Quebec resolutions were under discussion in the old Canadian Parliament. The hon. gentleman has done so on more than one occasion since. Yet I apprehend that there are certain important reasons why our federal system should be fairly carried out, and, in order to fairly carry it out, it is important that the constitution of the Senate should be changed, and the Senate made amenable to public opinion, and subjected to popular control. The position of the Senate at the present time is one that is very far from satisfactory. Those hon. gentlemen are not under the control of public opinion; they are not called upon to pay any regard to popular wishes or popular prejudices. They are not in a position to acquire that knowledge of public questions which belongs to members of this House. I think it may be laid down as a sound political axiom that, in order that men may be in accord with the country, and in order that they may rightly apprehend the spirit and tendency of the day to which they belong, they must in some degree be dependent upon their fellow-men throughout the country. We know, if we look at the progress of the Mother Country since the beginning of this century, the great progress that has been made politically, materially and socially, by the people of the United Kingdom, has been made in spite of the prejudices and the opposition of the more cultured, the better informed, and more wealthy classes. The movement of society has been from beneath and not from above. The intellectual light of the superior classes has not been that by which the progress of the nation has been guided. We know that, in order that men may fairly represent the community, it is necessary that they should be a portion of the community, they should not stand apart, they should not stand aloof, they should not be an isolated or separate class, having no points of contact with the public at large. The House of Lords, no doubt, is far better informed, far more enlightened, far more cultured in the aggregate, than the masses of the people of the United Kingdom; and yet the masses of the people of the United Kingdom, for the past seventy-five years—the majority of them, at least—have been right, and the majority of the House of Lords has been wrong. There can be no doubt of that. So that, in order that a body may be a useful body, in order that it may reflect public opinion, in order that it may be in sympathy with the age, in order that it may legislate in harmony with the requirements of the country, it is necessary that it should be an integral part of the country, and this you do not have in a Senate, a nominated body, the members of which receive their appointments from the Ministers of the Crown, and receive them for life. I dare say, even if we were to give the hon. gentleman the power of naming a House of Commons, he might find, perhaps, a larger number of highly cultured and intelligent men to compose the House than those who compose it at this moment, but he could not constitute a more influential body, he could not thus create a body which would have as much influence with the public, a body in whose deliberations and discussions the people would take the same interest; and precisely so it is with regard to the constitution of the Senate. In the constitution of a second Chamber, it is important that all classes of the community should be represented; in fact, it should be the community itself in miniature, and, if it is defective in this respect, I do not care how intelligent the members may be, I do not care how assiduous they might be in the discharge of their duties, and we know they have not been that in the Senate as now constituted, the public would take very little interest in what they do. Every man in public life looks at the public questions that come before him, in a great degree, from his own standpoint; he does not take an exhaustive view, he does not consider the question from every possible point of view; it is, in the nature of things, impossible for him to do so; human capacity is limited, and the result is that he succeeds in interesting in the views which he expresses and the opinions which he entertains, but a fraction of the community. Now, in order that we may have a second Chamber fairly representing the opinions of the country, capable of holding in check this House when it is wrong, capable of co-operating with it when it is right, capable of preventing mischief, and capable of defending that which is in the public interest, it is necessary that such a Chamber should enjoy the confidence of, and stand in sympathy with, the great mass of the population of the country. In order that this may be done, it is necessary that the Chamber should emanate from the people themselves, and feel its responsibility to them. I do not propose that a second Chamber should be created as a rival to this House, and if you limit its numbers there is no danger of its being so. I say that one important thing to give a legislative body a very considerable influence in the country, is, that it should be a pretty numerous body. A second Chamber, in order to become a rival to this House, would have to be a large body. I do not propose that we should create a second Chamber that is anything like as numerous as this House. I believe that half the numbers of those who now compose the Senate would be large enough. A Chamber in which you would return from Ontario half the present number of Senators, that is, twelve; twelve from the Province of Quebec, twelve from the Maritime Provinces, and a proportionate number from the other Provinces to the west, would be a second Chamber capable of discharging those duties which it is important that a second House should discharge. It has been well observed by Mr. Mill, in his work on Representative Government, that one House, where the powers it possesses are large and embrace a great number and variety of important subjects, can never well be entrusted with parliamentary authority. It has no second body to consult, it feels under no restraint, and the tendency is to use arbitrarily the power which belongs to the majority. Now, Sir, that is one of the evils we have experienced in this Parliament, and which has been exhibited during the past seven or eight years, and it is due to the fact that, so far as the present Administration is concerned, we are without a second Chamber. The Senate has taken a long holiday. It has done nothing. Why, the vast majority of those who occasionally, by fits and starts, sit elsewhere, when it suits their purpose, have been appointed by the hon. gentleman; they know that they owe their positions to him. As an eminent Irish statesman and jurist once said of the Irish peers, "they are the sheep of his pasture." It is he who has made them, and not they themselves. They feel that if they were not to-day precisely as he desires, they would be ungrateful, and they would be exhibiting the absence of some of those qualities of mind that do most to dignify human nature. So the hon. gentleman has the Senate in his keeping, and if the hon. gentleman were out of office and was sitting on this side of the House, the Senate, which at present is wholly useless, under those circumstances would become mischievous, and if it were not mischievous it would be owing to the hon. gentleman's forbearance. Practically, as the Senate is at present constituted, in case a Reform Administration were in power, we have a body which would place the power of veto in the hands of the minority of the House of Commons, that is to say, entirely in the hands of the hon. gentleman for the next ten years to come. Now I say that is an intolerable condition of things. I need only state that fact to show that the present system ought not to be perpetuated, that it ought to be changed at the earliest possible moment. Sir, I am not going to detain the House unnecessarily in the discussion of this question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLS. I know those hon. gentlemen who have given their minds no trouble, who have never thought upon the subject of our constitutional system, who are quite content if the Government will give means for building a dock or a harbor in their county, and thus enable them to come back again—I know they will listen with impatience to any discussion of this sort. They think matters as they now stand are well enough, and they would like to let that well enough alone. But I believe the majority of us—the whole of this side, and I trust the majority in the country, are inclined to take a different view. They regard the second Chamber, as it is now constituted, as a nuisance which ought to be abated. They regard it as a wholly unnecessary element in our constitutional system; they regard it as a dead shoot that ought to be eliminated. Sir, I think that a second Chamber is necessary. I think the events that have transpired in this House for the past six and seven years show that a second Chamber is necessary. I think that arbitrary and uncontrolled power ought not to be in the hands of any party or any man, and it is because I think so, that I am in favor of changing the constitution of the Senate. I will therefore move:

To leave out all the words after the word "That" and add the following instead thereof:—The present method of constituting the Senate is inconsistent with the Federal principle in our system of Government, it makes that body independent of the people and the Crown, and is in other material respects defective, and that appropriate steps should be taken to secure such amendments of the British North America Act as to make the Senate directly responsible to the people in the several Provinces of the Dominion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I propose to say but a very few words in answer to the speech of the hon. gentleman. It is quite evident, from the time it is proposed, and the manner of its proposition, that the hon. gentleman does not expect, could not expect, and knows, that there can be no satisfactory or full discussion of this question in this Chamber during the present Session. If the hon. gentleman really desired to have a full discussion, a full deliberation, and to get the opinion of this House as representatives of the people, as to the constitution of the Senate, he would have moved it after due notice, he would have moved it early in the Session, he would have moved it so that it could be discussed as a substantive proposition But everyone knows that not only the hon. gentleman, but other hon. gentlemen on the other side, are desirous of airing their opinions in order that they may go to the country. It is quite evident that the hon. gentlemen opposite have an uneasy suspicion that there is going to be an immediate dissolution, an immediate election, and they are exceedingly anxious, and they are very much afraid.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. EDGAR. Come on.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am bound to believe that the hon. gentlemen are not afraid of it, still, they are preparing for it; and the hon. gentleman has aired this subject at the eleventh hour of this Session, not for the purpose of any man, woman or child being able to make up their mind on the proposition, but simply as a little kite or balloon thrown up for the public to look at. This is one of the great questions, among many other great questions, brought up during this Session for consideration at the polls. The hon. gentleman stated in his resolution, and in the beginning of his speech, that the constitution of the Senate was contrary to the federal principle of our constitution. Well, we have got the federal principle, certainly. Every Province has given contributions of its own, given power of its own, and, Mr. Speaker, quoad the Dominion Government, the principle on which this Parliament was formed, and the Executive is formed, and the powers of the Crown is administered, is not on the federal principle, but on the principle of the British constitution, and it is so declared in the preamble of the British North America Act, which says:

"Whereas the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have expressed their desire to be federally united in one Dominion under the Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with a constitution similar to that of the United Kingdom."

Not any other principle, not the principle stated by the hon. gentleman, but "with a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom." Well, Mr. Speaker, we have the British constitution, so far as the Senate is concerned, and the Executive is concerned; and on the other side of the line there is another constitution, a very good constitution, a noble constitution, Mr. Speaker; but it is not our constitution, it is not the British constitution. They are both good, they are both excellent in their way, but we must have one, or we must have the other, it appears to me.

Mr. MILLS. No.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We cannot have hermaphrodite.

Mr. MILLS. That is what we have got.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We must have one or the other. The majority of the people of the Dominion draw their inspiration and their constitutional principles from the example of the Mother Country, from the constitution of the Mother Country, from the constitution of Great Britain and Ireland, and they do not draw them from the United States. The hon. gentleman objects very much to the Upper House, on the ground that they are useless. If they are useless it can do no harm. What complaint, then, can there be against the House of Lords if they do no harm? There is no principle of government in which civilised countries which desire to have a constitution, more fixed than that where a country has an established constitution; there must be a wrong shown before there should be any alteration made in that constitution. If every person chose to theorise as does the hon. gentleman, to say that this will be better in my opinion, and that will be better in my opinion, here a little and there a little, there would be no finality, there would be no fixity of the constitution. Our constitution is a good one as it is and it is satisfactory for all purposes; the country is going on well; the laws passed by this House are good laws and are not objected to by the other House; the country is developing very rapidly. And why this uneasiness to alter the constitution?

Mr. MILLS. Why did you alter it last year?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman says the Upper House is at my beck and under my control.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, how are they under my beck and under my control? I am here holding my present position as having the confidence of a majority of the House.

Mr. HESSON. And the confidence of the people.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman says I have the confidence of the country too. I believe the majority in the House truly represent the feelings, wishes and opinions of the majority of the people in the Dominion. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) objects that the Upper House, during the time I have been here enjoying the confidence of a majority of this House, did not oppose the feeling, and wishes of a majority of this House, and therefore oppose the feelings, wishes and opinions of the majority of the people themselves. They are in harmony with this House; this House is in harmony with the people. And what objection can there be to that? Does the hon. gentleman want to have one House set against the other? The hon. gentleman, as a Liberal, as an extreme Reformer, objects because the Upper House agrees with the wishes and feelings of the majority of the people. The Reformers in England attack the House of Lords because the majority is opposed to the opinions of the majority of the people. I believe in the case of the House of Lords, no Liberal Government, except in very special cases, has found any difficulty in getting on with that body.

Mr. MILLS. The Government have power to increase the number.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This has been the experience of Mr. Gladstone. The hon. gentleman knows, and this House knows, that for very many years Mr. Gladstone has been at the head of the Liberal Administration; that the Conservative Administrations in England have been few and short-lived; that really England has, ever since the Reform Bill was passed, except during six or seven years, or perhaps a little more, been governed by a series of Liberal Administrations. And yet those Liberal Governments have hitherto found no difficulty in governing the country, and in those few cases in which the House of Lords has differed from the House of Commons, in which they have shown their independence of principle, whenever a measure, after once passing the House of Commons, and after being rejected by the House of Lords, was again sent to the Upper House, the House of Lords have never, after ascertaining that the Bill was in accordance with the wishes of the people, I do not remember now an instance, rejected the measure on its second return in a subsequent Session.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How about marriage with a deceased wife's sister Bill? They have rejected that, I think, several times.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is a question of morals. Under our constitution we have responsible government. Do we wish to surrender responsible government? Do we wish to adopt the American system so far as that is concerned? If the hon. gentleman wishes to adopt the American constitution then I can quite understand a second Chamber being constituted with powers equal to those of the Senate of the United States. Surely we represent the people, surely as representatives of the people we ought to have the initiatory power on most subjects of legislation; and so long as we have responsible government this House can at any moment, as representing the people, dismiss the Ministers, and consequently obtain other Ministers more fully representing the opinions and wishes of the people to take their places. But if the Upper House is to be altered according to the American system and be elected by the people, as members to this House are, they must have the same powers; and substantially the Senate of the United States at this moment has the same power as the House of Representatives, and is a portion of the executive, and is undoubtedly more powerful than the House of Lords. Indeed, the House of Representatives is a comparatively unimportant body in comparison with the Senate of the United States. Do we wish to diminish our position and authority, to alter the principle that Ministers must be responsible to this House and not to the other, and have a check in the shape of another branch of the Legislature claiming in the same way as we do have a right to claim to represent the wishes of the people. Although in imitation of the British constitution, all matters connected with the expenditure of money must initiate in the House of Commons, the Senate can amend our money Bills; they can destroy them in fact, and they do use that power without any hesitation. Do we want to adopt that principle and that system? You cannot avoid this dilemma: If you wish to adopt an elective Senate, no matter what may be the process of election, you must give them the same power as this House possesses, they will claim it, they will take it, and you cannot resist it. Therefore you cannot have responsible government and have any government that will last any time, if the Ministers must be responsible to this Chamber, and at the same time responsible to the other Chamber, You cannot have the two.

Mr. MILLS. How was it from 1854 to 1867 in Old Canada. There were two elective bodies.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The experiment was so unsuccessful that the leader of the hon. gentleman's own party, the Hon. George Brown, voted for the abolition of the elective Senate and favored the nominative system. It has lasted ever since.

Mr. MILLS. The Hon. George Brown never favored an elective second Chamber. He opposed it at the time.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I know he was always opposed to it, and a majority of the representatives of the people found for once that the Hon. George Brown was right, and that Chamber, after having been tried for two Parliaments, was found to be so utterly unworkable that with his consent it was abolished. More than that, the Hon. George Brown was one of the founders of the present constitution—one of those who worked very diligently, very zealously and with great ability in the direction of this constitution of 1867; and it was a fixed principle with him, in the settlement of this constitution, that an elective Upper House should be done away with, and that we should return to the old system in which we should have a Chamber, not controlling this House, but acting as a court of supervision, acting very much as the House of Lords does in England—acting and protecting people from the chance of surprise. I must say, with all due deference to the opinion of the hon. gentleman that I think the Senate has performed its functions well, has performed them not in a partisan sense. The hon. gentleman says that the majority are of one way of thinking. Well, that is so, I believe. But when hon. gentlemen opposite were in the Government, although they found a difference of opinion in two or three cases, I think the main current of the administration of the laws, the current of the legislation under the guidance of my hon. friend for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) was not impeded or obstructed in any way by the Senate. They acted, I think, with that prudence, that discretion and that absence of violent partisanship which should be maintained and should obtain in a second body of that kind. I shall not occupy the time of the House any longer. I can only say, however, that there is no cry in the country for an alteration of the constitution. We do not hear of any petitions; we do not see any petitions. We have a great many political meetings through the country. We have political speeches, and perhaps, now that the hon. gentleman has set the ball rolling, for the next few months we may have the Senate aired, and the speech of the hon. gentleman will be the text from which his friends will preach. But we have had no real feeling in any part of the country in favor of an alteration of the constitution. I do not know that it was mentioned at any one of the speeches during the contest of 1882. I do not think it was made a matter of party conflict in 1878. I do not think it was made a question of discussion in 1874. I do not think the question of the Senate was brought up as a matter upon which the parties fought, or upon which there was any difference of opinion, in any of those elections. To-day the hon. gentleman broaches it. He has always been a theoriser. He has studied constitutional questions; he has studied them well, as I have always said and admitted; but the whole tendency of his mind is to theorise and philosophise, but not, I think, in such a way as to lead to any practical legislation or any practical conclusion. An hon. friend has just handed me the exact words of Mr. Brown on the question to which I have just been alluding. He said:

"I have always held that two elective Chambers are inconsistent with the right working of the British constitution."

I, for one, am not content to alter our constitution, so far as it assimilates to the British constitution.

Mr. MILLS. You denied that, and resisted it in 1854.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, I know. In 1854 an elective Upper House was carried; an elective Upper House was thrown on the country. But there was a strong feeling in both Canadas, and certainly in French Canada, at that time in favor of an elective Upper House. It is not so now. There is no feeling expressed there, there is no feeling known or heard of in favor of such a change in the constitution as the hon. gentleman desires by this resolution. And although there was a great feeling in favor of an elective Senate, and although it was made the programme of the party in Lower Canada headed by Mr. Morin, the same representatives of the people from Quebec and from Upper Canada that voted originally in favor of an elective Upper House, almost unanimously—unanimously, I believe, so far as Lower Canada was concerned—voted for the abolition of an elective Chamber, and for the substitution of peers for life, which our senators really are. I would only say in conclusion that the hon. gentleman while making this his political move will not, I think, gain anything by it. The object is so clear and unmistakeable that the country will see that the hon. gentleman did not hope, expect, or desire, that there should be a full consideration, a full discussion, of the great question, the enormous question, of asking the Imperial Parliament to alter our constitution on such an important point. The hon. gentleman has chosen by his motion and by the manner in which he dealt with the subject that he does not wish or desire to have the opinion of this House; he merely wishes to throw it in the baldest way before the people. The people will understand that, and I am quite satisfied that at the polls they will express the opinion that they would rather have a constitution according to the constitution of our forefathers than to have an American constitution foisted upon us, and have an alteration in the constitution without any wrong, or injury, or grievance, or prejudice to the development of the future of this country by keeping it as it is.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat states that this is an inopportune time to introduce a resolution of this kind. Those who have been in Parliament during the last few days will have noticed that that is the exception he has taken to other motions made on this side. The fact is that we would almost despair of finding a proper time to introduce certain motions that we feel it our duty to introduce. Now, what argument has the hon. gentleman advanced to prove that this motion is not brought forward at the proper time? Is it because the Session is, as he supposes, so near at an end? If so, I might reply by the argument which he used last year. When the hon. gentleman introduced the Franchise Bill at a late period of the Session, and when we pointed out that it was a measure which would require a whole Session to discuss it, he replied: Well, what is the necessity for the House coming to a close? Why not discuss it; we can remain here and discuss it? Well, certainly, we are in the same position here to-day. The hon. gentleman cannot shelter himself behind a pretence of that kind. Parliament has not to be prorogued on a particular day, and we are here ready for a full, free, and exhaustive discussion upon the subject, if hon. gentlemen opposite are likewise prepared. Then the objection is raised that it is introduced as an amendment to Supply. It is true, on certain questions, a motion introduced in amendment to the motion to go into Committee of Supply might not receive the favorable consideration of the House, because it cannot be amended; but that argument fails in the present case, for this reason: Suppose the motion was introduced as a substantive motion susceptible of amendment, the question would be before us in all its length and breadth. This is a plain question. The hon. member for Bothwell asks the House to vote that it is desirable to have a change in the constitution of the Senate. The hon. gentleman says: No; it is ideal prefection as it is; we have received it from our forefathers; it has done well, and has done no injury, while the system you propose is impracticable. I submit, if this question was introduced in a substantive motion, no amendment could be offered that could give a freer range of discussion than we have under the present motion. There are the two opinions on the subject; the sides have been taken; the hon. member for Bothwell expresses himself in favor of a change in the constitution of the Upper House, and the hon. First Minister says we want no change, because the Upper House, as at present constituted, is properly constituted. What is to prevent us, under these circumstances, having a free and full discussion of the question? Now, I desire to deal with a few of the arguments the hon. gentleman used in answer to the very logical and temperate speech made by the hon. member for Bothwell. He said, in the first place, that the hon. member for Bothwell had argued that the Senate was doing no good, and therefore he said it was incapable of doing harm; and if it does no harm, why not let it remain as it is? Well, that is rather a poor argument, I think; and a very obvious answer to it —one which, I grant, would point in the direction of the abolition of the Senate altogether—would be that on the ground of expenditure alone, it is a serious matter to keep a body for which all that can be said is that it is doing no harm. The hon. gentleman said further, that the Senate was modelled after the English House of Lords, which has existed in England for a very great length of time, without producing any evil results; Liberal Administrations, he said, had conducted the affairs of Great Britain for many years, and had experienced no difficulty with the Lords. But the hon. gentleman knows very well, what he did not choose to state to the House, that there are powers of check which can be exercised over the House of Lords that cannot be exercised over the Senate of Canada; and it has been the knowledge of that power which has led the House of Lords, on many occasions, to recognise the popular will, and to move, however reluctantly, in the direction of that will. But what power is there to control the actions of our nominated Senate? Why, Sir, the very authority which created the members of that body is powerless over them. True, out of a feeling of gratitude, they have too often been found ready to be at his service, and to forward his wishes; but, if they saw fit not to do so, but to resist the legislation of this House, what power have we over them? Suppose they set themselves as a block against the legislation of this House, and refuse to allow the popular will to be carried out, could you create a number of new Senators holding views in accord with those of the majority of the people who would bring them to terms? No, Sir. They are a power greater than the hon. gentleman, who has brought most of them into existence as legislators. That institution is an anomaly. I am glad to know, however, that in that House, constituted as it is, there are men of sufficient public spirit, sufficient grasp of mind, and sufficient knowledge of what an Upper Chamber ought to be, to have recognised the fact that, as at present constituted, it is not in harmony with the spirit of our institutions. This question has been introduced and debated in that Chamber, and one of the most eminent men in it has openly declared that it is idle for anyone to suppose that the people of this country recognise them as at all in harmony with the popular sentiment, and has pointed out, what is the fact, that the great Province of Ontario, in which the two political parties number about half and half of the electorate—or did at the last election, though no doubt there is to-day a majority in harmony with the Liberal party—that great Province has at present in the Upper Chamber only four representatives who are in accord with the Liberal party; and if the hon. First Minister retains power much longer, as time is doing its work with us all, he may have to fill vacancies caused in the Senate by death, and the discrepancy will become still greater. To talk of the Senate as at present constituted being a guardian of the rights and interest of the different Provinces, is absurd, for we see that it has utterly failed. The hon. gentleman says, and says truly, that the Senate is intended to guard provincial interests; and that is the strongest argument for its maintenance—that the different Provinces have representation in it in greater proportion than they have in this Chamber. In that respect we have in a measure adopted the principles of the American constitution, which gives the small State of Rhode Island as great a voice in the Senate as the large and popular State of New York. But our Senate, constituted in such a way that it necessarily takes a partisan feeling, constituted in such a way that it seems impossible for many of its members to exercise their functions in a judicial spirit, has time and again lost sight of its duty with reference to provincial rights. Many members have failed to recognise the rights of their own Province and all the Provinces, and every onslaught made by the hon. First Minister on the rights of the different Provinces of this Dominion has been aided and abetted by the majority of the members of the Upper Chamber. When he sought to take from the Provinces the licensing power—a power which the highest court of this country and the Privy Council of England have pronounced to be within their right—when he laid his hand on that power and sought to wrest it from them, was any objection raised to his act by the Upper Chamber? Were the members of that body, whose peculiar duty, according to the hon. gentleman, ought to be to guard the rights of the different Provinces, found maintaining those rights on that occasion? No, Sir; they were found to be just as docile and tractable as the gentlemen who sit behind him in this House; and as his supporters in this House must have been overwhelmed by the humiliation that came upon them in that matter, so must the members of the Senate have been overwhelmed because they cast in their lot with them. I do not know that I could point to any act of that House that could commend itself to our approval. I do not deny that there are good men in that House; there are no doubt good men in it; but constituted as it is at present it tends to dwarf the energies of the very best men you could put into it. The hon. gentleman stated further that the present constitution of the Senate is in accordance with the principles of responsible government, because, he said, I nominated most of the members of that Senate, and I am here because I am supported by a majority of the representatives of the people in this House; and, therefore, he takes for granted that he is supported by a majority of the people of the country, which is rather doubtful, seeing that that majority was secured by peculiar means, But, he says, he is supported by the majority of the country, and therefore in nominating the Senate, it was really the people who nominated them. If we are to admit the correctness of his position in reference to that matter, I would say if they had been nominated by the hon. gentleman, with the provision that when he lost the confidence of the people, the Senate would be assumed to have lost it also, there would be some argument in his pretension. It is not sure that the hon. gentleman will hold the confidence of the people for all time to come; he has held it, by one means and another, quite too long, and the time will certainly come when the confidence of the country will not be accorded to the ruling party in this House. When that time comes, how will the Senate stand then? Why, these gentlemen whom he named, and claims he was carrying out the principles of responsible government in nominating them, will still remain. They are nominated for life, and there they will remain for life in the preponderance in that House, ready, with the feelings they have too often exhibited, to stand in the way and thwart the desires of public men. Therefore, the argument of the hon. gentleman does not hold good. He cannot claim that the ideas of responsible government are being acted upon, while we maintain the constitution of the Senate as it is. I remarked a short time ago, that while there are many capable and clever men in the Senate, the very constitution of that body dwarfs the energies of these men, so that we do not get the benefit we should of their intellectual powers. When the hon. gentleman stated it would be impossible to have two elective Houses to carry on legislation in this country, he was reminded by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that we had already tried that experiment, and it was more than an experiment, for several years. I tell the hon. gentleman that in my opinion, and I believe that opinion is shared by the people, the ablest men in the Senate to-day, men who have sat there since Confederation, are those who were marked out by the people as men fit to be representatives. Those men are the ablest there to-day, and have ever been so. What has been, in many cases, the principle upon which the First Minister has acted with reference to filling vacancies in the Senate? Did he take those who received the approval of the people? No, Sir. Too often, the principle he has acted upon has been that when a gentleman has appealed to a constituency and been rejected by the people and his opponent elected, the hon. gentleman has, immediately after his rejection, appointed the defeated candidate to a seat in the Senate, where he can use his power in vetoing Acts passed by the men elected by the people. That is the way in which the hon. gentleman has succeeded in bringing the Senate into disrepute. No better test of the value of the House, that I know of, can be made than to examine into the work they do. What have they done? We know that in this House, when there is legislation to be done, and you, Sir, know it very well, for you have had practical experience of it, we have sat from day to day, from week to week, every day until two or three o'clock in the morning, in order that each subject might be properly discussed before becoming law, and if such prolonged sittings are necessary here, why should not the same attention be necessary in the other Chamber whose duty it is to supervise our legislation? Let me give you a record of the time spent by these hon. gentlemen in the Senate, and let the country judge whether it is possible for them, in the space of time they give to their duties, to efficiently discharge them. I have a record of the last three Sessions which I have summarised. I could give each day's sitting, but that would take too long, so I will simply give a résumé of the sittings. Take the Session of 1884. In the first 16 days the Senate sat 14 hours; then they were very tired, and, as a matter of expediency, they took a holiday for 2 weeks, adjourning till 13th February. At the end of February, when this House had been in Session 44 days, including Sundays, they had sat altogether 31 hours and 5 minutes. Then they sat during March, except during the holidays, from the 21st to the 26th; and at the end of March, their record shows, for the 75 days from the opening of the Session to the 1st of April, sittings covering in all 70 hours and 50 minutes. They had to work a little harder in April, because it is an actual fact that on the 2nd April they sat 7 hours. Their debate was on the second reading of the Vancouver Island Railway. Then they sat for 2 nights subsequently, one sitting lasting 7 hours and the other 6 hours and a quarter. On both sittings they had a great discussion over the Scott Act; whether they helped it or impaired it, I will not say. That brought up the average. We find at the close of the Session, that the Session had lasted 94 days, including Sundays, during which the Senate had sat altogether, supervising the hasty legislation passed in this House, 115 hours and 40 minutes; and the cost of this to the country was $133,576 or over a $1,000 an hour. Then we have the Session of 1885, which opened 29th January. The Senate sat the 2 days in January, and 13 days in February, in which time they had sat altogether, 13 hours and 40 minutes. They then adjourned until the 20th February, and at the end of February, had sat altogether, since the opening of the Session, 26 hours and 15 minutes. Then, in March, they sat 54 hours and 55 minutes. Now you will see that is pretty hard work, averaging 2 hours a day. Therefore you will not wonder that they took a rest from 29th March to 8th April, and sat in all, in April, 49 hours and 20 minutes. The first 8 days of May they sat 17 hours, 35 minutes, and then rested from the 8th to the 20th, and in the whole of May their sittings amounted to 32 hours 55 minutes. From 29th May they rested until the 2nd of June. On that day they sat for 2½ hours, then took 8 days' rest. Who will begrudge it to them? On the 11th they felt tired again and rested until the 15th; then they worked from the 15th to the 19th. That completely overpowered them, for they rested from the 19th June to the 2nd of July, having sat, in all June, 10 hours and 30 minutes, in revising the hasty legislation of this House. In the twenty days of July, they sat 48 hours and 10 minutes, and their total record, for the long Session of 1885, in which this House sat from hour to hour, from day to day, from week to week, discussing the great questions of the country, the Session lasted 173 days, including Sundays, and the hours they sat numbered 222 hours and 5 minutes. Look at the present Session. The House opened on the 25th February. On the 25th and 26th they sat 5 hours; down to the 9th March, they sat 16 hours and 25 minutes, then they took 2 weeks' holidays to the 23rd March. Who will begrudge them their holidays? Who will say they were not entitled to 2 weeks' rest? Their record, to the end of March, was 23 hours, 55 minutes for that month, and their record for the month of April, was 25 hours to the 15th. Then they took 2 weeks' holidays, and by the end of April, they had sat 30 hours and 35 minutes in that month, and down to the 7th May, which is the latest my figures go to, we find the Session had lasted 72 days, including Sundays, from the 25th February to the 7th May, and they have sat 74 hours and 20 minutes. Will any gentleman tell me that, with a record like that before us, that Chamber has demonstrated that, constituted as it is at the present time, it is fulfilling the purposes for which it was created, that it is acting as a judicial body in any way, that it is revising hasty legislation passed in this House? Can they rise in the face of this authentic record of the time they have taken and pretend to say that is so? Why have they adjourned? Because there was nothing for them to do? Not so. Their powers are not so circumscribed, but, as I stated before, the way in which they are constituted dwarfs their energies. They are not responsible to the people. One of the ablest Senators in that House, in discussing the question, used these remarks, and I give them as pertinent, and as the key to the explanation of the reason why we have work of so little avail in that Chamber. One of the ablest members of that Chamber said:

"We can do as we please. Not a word can be breathed against us. We care not for the people. We can order those doors to be closed. We can exclude the reporters, and the people need know nothing of our work. We can pass orders and make decrees; perhaps a madcap king of Bavaria may do freaks, but even he is called to account now and then; but this Chamber has no check on its powers; we are absolute, we do just as we please."

And the inevitable result of that is that you will have work performed, with your Chamber constituted in that way, you will have such work in the future as you have had in the past, and the people themselves will be the judges whether that work is satisfactory to the people of this country or not. I have told you that, in 1884, it has cost us for the work they had done $133,576. The work in 1885, the record of which I gave you, cost $175,508. The people of this country will say whether that is money properly expended or whether it is not. But it is the very fact that they are not responsible to the people and that they do not feel that responsibility that dwarfs the energies even of the able men who are in there. There is an atmosphere that seems impossible for those who would desire to do otherwise to rise beyond—a Government soothing influence that seems to pervade the body and makes them incapable of fairly and properly criticising measures that come from the hand of the man who called them into existence as a political power. But there are men there who recognise the importance of their duties, and one of those, one of the most active members of that body, in protesting against the two weeks' adjournment, asked whether they should adjourn when there was so much of public importance demanding investigation and enquiry at the hands of the representatives of the people in this House. He said: You propose to adjourn for two weeks, and you have been sitting for an hour or two a day, and there is the great cause of the late rebellion in the North-West, that caused the loss of life and the sacrifice of millions of treasure; why cannot we sit? Why should we adjourn? Why cannot we sit and investigate into the causes of that late rebellion?

An hon. MEMBER. Who is that?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). One of the most active members of that body, a Conservative who has become disgusted with the manner in which the business is done, and who desires now, as the Liberal members desire, that there shall be a reconstitution of that House, that there shall be some movement, some response, to the wishes of the people. He said, secondly, that they might profitably employ their time in ascertaining how the millions expended in suppressing that rebellion had been expended, and who will say there is not a field for enquiry worthy for that body to take hold of? I remember when they had a committee investigating the expenditure of a few thousand dollars on the Kaministiquia River, when they sought to find fault with my hon. friend from East York, who was then in power, and to make out that a job had been perpetrated, and to-day we find that that has been adopted by the railway authorities. At that time, acting in a partisan spirit, they could find time to sit on a committee, but it is different now when there have been millions upon millions of the people's money expended, and it has been charged in the public prints, with what truth I will not say, that there has been extravagant expenditures in connection with that. Has there been a committee appointed by the Senate to look into that matter? No, but they coolly propose to adjourn for two weeks then, and subsequently for another two weeks, in face of the protest of this able member, who pointed out that they might discharge that duty in the interests of the people. Thirdly, he said they might have an enquiry as to how the $1,000,000 annually expended upon the Indians is expended. Who will say, in the light of the revelations given to us by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron), from the departmental blue books and other sources, that there is no room and no necessity for an enquiry there. That was pointed out by this honorable Senator, but it had no avail with them. Another subject he suggested was the investigation by a committee of the timber limits improperly given away in what he called the disputed territory. Is that not a thing in reference to which some care should be exercised by those who are elected to look after provincial rights? Here the rights of one of the Provinces were being sacrificed, but the representatives in that Chamber who are supposed to represent that Province were averse to remaining, and they are almost wholly of one political party, they were unwilling to remain to give any investigation to this subject. They preferred their ease, and why not? because, if fault is found with them, who shall say anything to them? They are, as properly stated in the remarks which I have read, above and beyond the people, and they may do as they please. He also suggested that it would be proper and profitable to enquire into the question of timber limits and coal land leases. Would not that be desirable, in the face of charges which have been made and denials of charges which we hear and see made in the newspapers and which we hear on the floor of Parliament? What better time would there be for that body to take that into consideration and examine into it fully? And, sixthly, he says: We ought to remain here, it is imperative that we should remain here, and should have an ample, full, free discussion as to how we can build up in the Maritime Provinces that great interest, the sea coast fisheries. But their holidays are of more value to them than the interests of the Maritime Provinces. What to them is it whether our fishing industries languish or not? They are off on their two weeks jaunt, only on their return to sit for a few hours, and then to adjourn for two weeks more.

Mr. HESSON. Louder.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) is unable to hear me, apparently. I venture to say he will not find it so difficult to hear me as to answer me, when he may have an opportunity to do so perhaps on the public platform, if he does not choose to do so on the floor of the House. In the seventh place, that member of the Senate suggested an investigation into the many wasteful expenditures of this prodigal Government, and who will say there is no room for that House to have given its attention in that direction? But that seemed not to have any effect on them either. Then another subject suggested was that it was desirable in the interests of this country, and who will say it is not, that the Senate should take up and enquire into the important question of widening the provisions of the extradition treaty. Is that not an important subject? Might they not have given their attention to it? But was that attended to by them? No, their minds were bent upon a holiday, and upon a holiday they went. Ninthly, he suggested that they should have a discussion upon the experience of the working of the tariff, and some of its ill-effects. Was not there a field upon which to have their view? They could have investigated all the depressed industries in the country at the present time, and ascertained what the cost was and how the tariff was working injuriously in one direction and beneficially in another. These, Sir, are the nine reasons that that member of that honorable body gave when he protested against the adjournment of two weeks they were making, and he pointed out to them that their duty was to look after the public interest. But, Sir, it was of no avail, and hon. gentlemen opposite cannot fail to see, the country, at any rate, Mr. Speaker, will not fail to see, that when you have a Chamber constituted as that is, nominated by the First Minister of the day, nominated for life, when they are placed in that position by the power that creates them, utterly beyond the control of the people in any sense, you cannot have more efficient legislation from that branch of the Legislature in the future than you have in the past. Sir, I am not extreme in my views, I am not desirous, as the First Minister said, of tinkering at the constitution all the time; that is not to be desired; but, Sir, we have had eighteen years' experience of the working of that body, and I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to rise and deny, if they can, that during the whole course of that eighteen years the tendency of legislation in that House has not been in the direction which I have indicated at the present time. If there was better legislation and more useful legislation in that House in the early days of Confederation I believe it was due to the fact that the House was then more largely composed of representatives who had secured the confidence of the people of this country, than it is at the present time. Holding the views that I do, I am in accord with the motion of the hon. member for Bothwell, because I believe that experience has demonstrated that it is desirable in the interests of this country that some change should be made in the constitution of the Senate, and that regard should be had to the elective principle.

Mr. FOSTER. I have listened with pleasure to the speech of my hon. friend for Brant (Mr. Paterson). I do not intend to speak long, I shall try to finish by six o'clock. I merely wish to take up two or three points in the remarks he made in the way of friendly criticism. In the first place, I wish to notice the great change that has come over the hon. gentleman's mind, and over those who so loudly applauded him in the opening part of his speech. Sir, if I do not misremember, I think that hon. gentleman took up a good many hours of last Session, and I think his brother members opposite took up a good many hours of last Session, in ponderous and wordy declamation, to prove that at that stage of the Session when the Franchise Bill was brought in, there was no proper time for its discussion. Yet, the hon. gentleman has so far turned round that although it has been stated on both sides of this House that the Session is probably within eight or ten days of its close, when hon. gentlemen on both sides are anxious to get away to their homes, the hon. gentleman gets up and states: We have any amount of time for full discussion; we have the proper range and the proper latitude, and the question can be thoroughly discussed. Thus we see how easy it is for that hon. gentleman to change his point of view, to change his position, where principle is not at stake, and where some party advantage only is looked for. Now he made another rather odd assertion. He found fault with the Senate because it was too much under the power of the Government. He says it is appointed by the Government, it is the creature of the Government, and the members of that body are placed there to do the work of the Government, yet he drew a contrast between our Senate and the House of Lords in Great Britain, to the detriment of ours, by saying that the House of Lords was much less under the influence of the Government of the day than our Senate is. Why this Senate is free, and it has its complement, is complete, as he stated. But if the House of Lords does not do what the Government wishes, the Government forces it by adding a certain number to the House to make it do its work. So in the House of Lords, if it does not do what the Government wishes, the Government has enginery by which it can bring the House of Lords to its will by the creation of more peers, and yet my hon. friend declares that the House of Lords is superior in this respect to our Senate. This is an anomaly, which my hon. friend may be able to reconcile, but which I cannot. He says that the Senate is partisan. Has he offered a single remedy to cure partisanship? Is there not partisanship in this House? Does not partisanship exist on that side of the House? Is not partisanship found in the speeches, in the reasoning, in the mind of my hon. friend who has just spoken? Does he propose any remedy by which there can be a Senate or House yonder, which will be bereft of all partisanship and will come up to that high ideal of a legislative body, which will discuss everything from the ground of right reason and practical result. I think the hon. member before he urges as an objection to the other body that it is partisan is bound to show to this House that he has some method for placing a legislative body there which will not be a partisan body and so to cure that evil. The hon. gentleman says that provincial rights are relinquished by gentlemen in the other House. I have seen him rise in this House and declare in language as loud as that of any other son of thunder that this House has deserted provincial rights, this House which comes from the people, and therefore if it is an objection to the other branch of the Legislature that it deserts provincial rights, on his own ground and from his own argument and from the assertions he has made here hundreds of times if he has made them at all, the very same objection lies against this House, because he himself has stated over and over again that this House, the creation of the people, has ignored provincial rights. He says: It may be all right now when the gentlemen in the other House are of the same political opinion as the gentlemen here, and all goes on well; but when a change takes place, how will it be then? How will it be under any method which the hon. gentleman may suggest? How is the hon. gentleman going to elect the Upper House? Is he going to have the same length of term as here? If that is his proposition—I do not say that it is—what is the use of having two elective bodies co-terminus with each other, beginning from the same public sentiment and ending with a similar public sentiment and in the same phase of it. The hon. gentleman does not propose anything to cure the evil. If he is going to have the period of election for the Upper House longer than the period for this House, you will elect its members at a certain phase of public opinion that will be in accordance with public opinion as represented by the members of this House. This House dies before the other. Public opinion will have changed, and you will have a set of men in this House with different opinions and holding different political maxims from those in the other House. Will they not be opposed to each other? The hon. gentleman has not proposed any method by which to overcome that strong objection. The hon. gentleman said we had an elective Senate once. So we had. The test of experience is a very good test. The people of Canada are fairly wise people, and the politicians of 1867 were quite as wise as the politicians of to-day; and looking over that experiment, which they entered on as an experiment, and looking at the results of it, when they came into this wider and greater Union, they said: We have tried an elective Senate; we do not believe it worked well. When we enter upon the new career of a great and wide confederation, we will build upon the old rock-bed of the contitution of Great Britain, and have a Senate appointed for life rather than an elective Senate, which we have tried as an experiment, and which has failed. The hon. gentleman further said, and his assertion is one of those wild assertions which hon. gentlemen cannot always substantiate, that in almost every case the appointee to the Senate was a rejected candidate; that he went before the people, who rejected him, and the moment they did so he was placed in the Upper House. I challenge the hon. member to take the list of appointees to the Senate, and prove that bold assertion he has made. I do not think he can do it. And again, the hon. gentleman said that measures ought to be more fully discussed in the Senate; that if we discussed measures the Senate ought to spend an equal time in discussing them. That does not follow. Does not the Railway Committee discuss railway measures sometimes for days and days, and yet when they come down to this House they are passed almost without discussion. It is a case almost parallel: This House takes up measures, introduces them, discusses them, places them in proper shape and sends them to the other body. If they have been well considered here, and if we have sustained our own dignity and done our own work, we must say they have been properly considered here and there is no necessity for an equal length of time being spent in considering them in the other House, which revises them. Let me now touch upon the last point that I will mention with respect to the hon. member. His general objection, if there was any point to it, was, that the Senate was a costly body, a useless body, that it sits a little while and then goes on long holidays, and that therefore it was a body useless, expensive, and which did little good. And what is the obvious conclusion? Sir, if there was any conclusion at all to be drawn from the hon. gentleman's remarks it was that the Senate, which is so useless, which has so little discussion, which did nothing, which was so costly and which was a burdensome thing should be swept out of existence entirely. Yet neither the hon. gentlemen who had spoken nor the mover of the resolution had the courage to come before this Parliament and the country in a straightforward manly way and place before the people the plain issue of the abolition of the Senate. They first pile up the cost and seek to show its uselessness; and they end by, what? They say: Oh, let us keep it by all means, but we will make some general confusing statement to the people on which we can go to them and say we are against the Senate, while we will not pledge ourselves to anything. That is the course pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite. From I do not know how far back down to the present time they have never gone before the people with a definite plain issue; they always take strong grounds in their speeches, but when they come to concentrate their speeches into resolutions they have only some misty, airy, cloudy, nebulous thing which no person on earth can materialize.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 86) to incorporate the North American Telegraph Company.—(Mr. Taylor.)

Bill (No. 65) respecting the Northern and North-Western Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Kilvert.)

SUPPLY—CONSTITUTION OF THE SENATE.

Mr. DAVIES. The resolution which my hon. friend from Bothwell has moved, involves, as the right hon. First Minister said, a radical change in our constitution, and should therefore be carefully considered. But it does not follow, because it involves that change, that we should be afraid to face it; and if the experience we have gained during the past 18 years of our political life convinces us that a change is required, we should have the manliness and the courage to say so, and to say so at the right time. In looking back over the history of this Dominion during that time, I can come to but one conclusion, that the constitution of the Senate, as it exists at present, is not in accordance with the spirit of the age, does not reflect the views of the people, and does not give effect to the measures the people desire to pass. I myself, if I had been in political life when our constitution was framed, would not have been averse to the adoption of even a more radical system than that proposed by my hon. friend. I am radical enough to believe that in this age and in this country, and with so intelligent a people, we should have got along well enough with one Chamber alone; but that was not the view of the fathers of our constitution; and the prevailing opinion seems to be that it is necessary to have some kind of a second Chamber. The question, therefore, before the House is, what character shall that Chamber take? Shall it be simply a nominative body, the members appointed for life, not changing as the desires and wishes of the people change, but remaining constituted as the Premier for the time being makes it? I do not think that is right. I remember, when our constitution, as embodied in the British North America Act, was under review in the English House of Commons, that great orator and tribune of the people, John Bright, gave his views on this particular feature of it. He then warned those who were promoting the British North America Act, that there was a radical defect in the constitution they were framing which consisted in creating a body composed of what he called stereotyped life peers; and he predicted that the time would not be long before the people of Canada would come to agree with him and be ready to make the change which he then desired should be made. I will, with your permission, read a few words which that right hon. gentleman uttered at the time upon this question, and I think he has a right to-day to say that his fears and his predictions have been fully verified. He says, referring to the promoters of the British North America Act and the people of Canada:

"They have established their House of Representatives directly upon the basis of representation. They have adopted the system which prevails in the United States, which, upon every ten years summing up of the census in that country, the number of members may be changed, and is by law changed in the different States and districts, as the rate of population may have changed. Therefore, in that respect, his friends in Canada have not adopted the principle which prevails in this country, but that which prevails in the United States. I believe they have done that which is right, and which they have a right to do, and which is inevitable there. I regret very much that they have not adopted another system with regard to their Council or Senate, because I am satisfied—I have not a particle of doubt with regard to it—that we run a great danger of making this Act work ill almost from the beginning. They have the example of thirty-six States in the United States, in which the Senate is elected, and no man, however sanguine, can hope that seventy-two stereotyped provincial peers in Canada, will work harmoniously with a body elected upon a system so wide and so general as that which prevails in the States of the American Union."

Sir, I venture to say that the prediction of that great orator and statesman has been verified. I venture to say that the vast majority of the people of this country believe that we have incurred the danger he predicted of making that Act work ill almost from the beginning. Our eighteen years' experience shows that, so far as the Senate have been able, they have contributed to the ill-working of the machine. I believe, Sir, in the people ruling. There was a time in the history of the world when kings ruled alone, when their will was law; there was a time when the Commons had no voice in the making or the execution of the laws which they were bound to obey. But the world progressed, and the nobles took a share in the work of government with the king. For a time they ruled, but not in the interest of the common people. The great mass of the people were little above slaves. But intelligence and education have been diffused so rapidly that in the Mother Country, the mother of Parliaments, a new era has dawned, and during the last forty or fifty years the common people have had their share in the government of that country. Sir, it is inevitable that the reign of the common people shall come, and shall come soon. I believe it is coming in this country of ours. I believe it is right that the common people, those who have been excluded from having a reasonable voice in the making of the laws, should have that reasonable voice given to them, and I believe that anything that obstructs the fair, honest views of the people from being expressed should be removed. I believe the Senate is an obstruction in that regard. The hon. gentleman who replied to the mover of the resolution recognised its gravity; he recognised that it was a great step in the direction of popular government, and he met it with a flat refusal. He is satisfied with the existing state of affairs, and well he may be; and why? Because the Senate reflects the opinion of the people? No; because the Senate reflects his individual whim—nay, his caprice; and that is inevitable, because he has had the appointment of the members of that body. While the theory at the beginning seemed to be very pretty and very good, that the best men from the different Provinces should be selected and should form a kind of high judicial court, removed to some extent from the whims and the caprice of the popular branch, which would maintain an equilibrium between political parties, what has been the practical working of that theory? What is that body to-day? We find that the Liberal party of Canada, who, I am bold to say, are in a majority in this country, although not in this House——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIES. I have not hesitated in expressing that as my individual belief, and that belief will be shown to be well founded when the people next go to the polls. How is that opinion reflected in our little House of Lords by those stereotype provincial peers, as the hon. Mr. Bright called them? We have been given very little more than a corporal's guard? Do hon. gentleman think that is right or proper? Suppose that the people in the coming elections should vote want of confidence, as I believe they will, in the right hon. gentleman opposite, what position will the country then be in? We will be in this position, that we will have an obstructive body, a partisan body, a body which has shown itself in time past to be bitterly partisan, to do what? To facilitate the carrying out of the wishes of the people? To advance liberal legislation? No, Sir; but to obstruct and do whatever they can to paralyse the power of the Government. The right hon. gentleman said that he was surprised and annoyed that my hon. friend should have moved this resolution in the way he did. I would be surprised if my hon. friend could move a resolution in any way, which would meet the approval of the right hon. gentleman. But if my hon. friend has taken the opportunity of proposing this constitutional resolution on the motion to go into Supply, he is only following the precedent established by the right hon. gentleman when he was in Opposition. When he wanted to move a resolution on a great constitutional question what course did he take? He moved his resolution when the House was going into Supply, just as my hon. friend has done. The proposition advanced in the resolution of my hon. friend is no new proposition; it is not the first time the hon. gentleman has moved a resolution in this House enunciating the same proposition. Hon. gentlemen know that the honored and respected leader of this party, the Gladstone of Canada, the future Premier of Canada—they know and the country knows that he has laid down, as a plank in his platform, the principles which my hon. friend has formulated in his resolution to-night. He has discussed them in his London speech and in other great speeches, and therefore we are not here moving a new principle with which to catch public opinion at the coming elections. We are, on the contrary, seeking to formulate and, if possible, to carry a resolution embodying the views of our party, views which will be endorsed by the people when they have the opportunity of expressing their opinion. It is a curious fact that hon. gentlemen opposite, in their minor organs, and when they are not face to face with the leaders of the Liberal party, are very fond of accusing that party of being without a policy. But those who have sat opposite to us for the last few years and have listened to the policy we have enunciated, from day to day, in the resolutions we have moved, know that we have a policy, a grand and noble policy, which will meet the approval of the people. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries who spoke—for what purpose I do not know, for after he had spoken I was unable to understand what idea he wished the House to gather from his remarks—characterised the resolution in a number of adjectives, as airy, nebulous, cloudy, misty, and incomprehensible. His remarks were excusable on one ground only, namely, that he never read the resolution at all. The resolution affirms two propositions: One, that the existing constitution of the Senate, by making that body independent of the people, is inconsistent with the Federal principle of our system of government. There is in that proposition nothing nebulous and airy, but, on the contrary, it is plain, practical and liberal. It affirms the principle that we do not believe in the existence of governing bodies independent of the people. The resolution goes on to affirm how that constitution will be changed:

"That appropriate steps be taken to secure such amendments as will make the Senate directly responsible to the people."

These are the two propositions affirmed in my hon. friend's resolution, which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries characterised as airy and nebulous. The hon. gentleman came out as the champion of the Senate, and I listened with great attention to ascertain why he championed this body so ardently. He is, or, I should say, he was—I must qualify my remarks—known as the great champion of total abstinence in this country, and perhaps it may be from the notable evidence which the Senate has given of their sympathy with his past views, that the hon. gentleman expresses his admiration for them to-day. The hon. gentleman justified the existence of partisanship in the Senate. On what ground? Because, he said, it exists in the Commons as well. But the reason for the existence of a second House, the justification of its existence, is that, as far as possible, partisanship should be banished from it, and that it should be a high judicial body, free of any such taint. If the House of Commons is partisan, the people have the remedy in their own hands. When the proper time comes, they can remove those whose partisanship has been inimical to the public interest, but if partisanship shows itself in the Senate, what remedy have the people? The people are powerless, the Senators are there for life, and, as my hon. friend, in quoting from the remarks of a distinguished Senator, said: "The Senate can remain and laugh at the people." This anomaly should not be allowed to exist in this free country where we profess to enjoy responsible government, and where we hope and believe the people govern. It is not proper that a body should continue to exist which is not responsible to the people, it is not proper that such a body should control the legislation and policy of this House, while is responsible to the people. I was amused at the apology which the Minister of Marine offered for the want of action and the want of work on the part of the Senate. My hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson) quoted at length the record of their proceedings, showing what a hard-worked body they are; and I wonder how some of the venerable old gentlemen who compose the Senate manage to survive the number of hours they put in during the three months. What did the Minister of Marine say? He said he was surprised that any complaint should be made that the Senate did not work harder. What need, he asked, was there for them to work, since the House of Commons did all the work. If that argument is worth anything at all, it is an argument for the abolition of the Senate. If we do all the work, if our measures are so carefully prepared in committee that there is no need for the Senate to work, why maintain the Senate at a cost of a quarter of a million to the country. But, I say, if the Senate would discharge the duties they are bound to discharge, they have a vast field in which to work. Why should they not initiate legislation? It is well known that a large majority of the members of this House are hard working men who find it very difficult indeed to give up time from their work at home and come here to discharge the necessary work of legislation. Are they assisted by the Senate? Have the Senate initiated legislation? No, Sir. What a grand field they had this Session. Here we were going to consolidate seventeen or eighteen years of Statute work; and what a grand opportunity this gave the Senate to give a reason for their existence, by appointing a committee to take that work in hand and thus relieve the Commons. We were working day and night, we were over worked, in fact, and unable to do this work as it should be done. Why should it not have been taken up by those gentlemen, who take their holidays and do not pretend to discharge any of the work they are supposed to discharge, and which, according to the constitutional theory, they should discharge. The right hon. the First Minister said very correctly, that we are enjoying a constitution which has existed for eighteen years, and should not seek hastily to change it; that no radical change should be made unless we could prove the existence of a wrong. That brings us to the question of fact whether wrong has been shown to exist or not. I do not wish to give my expression of opinion, but will give the House that of a gentleman who has sat in the Senate since its inception, who has taken an active and prominent part in its labors, and who has been the leader there of one of our political parties. Let us see what his opinion is after twelve years' experience of the working of the Senate, and let us see whether he believes or does not believe, after that experience, that a wrong exists.

Mr. McNEILL. Name.

Mr. DAVIES. The Hon. Mr. Scott. I find him saying:

"According to the history of the Senate, it is used simply for the political exigencies of the Government of the day. I quite appreciate the sentiment of the hon. gentleman who has spoken before me, but, if he had sat in the last Parliament, as I did, he would know that members of the Senate were not then quite so fair and reasonable; that this House, with its great Conservative majority, was used——"

I want to appeal to that gentleman with all his experience as to the use which is made of the Senate.——

"was used as an inquisitorial commission for the purpose of sending forth through this country damaging reports against the late Government—reports that to-day they would not endorse. They spent month after month procuring evidence to show how preposterous it was to make improvements on the Kaministiquia River, yet last year and this year there are votes for the improvement of that river. They said that a breakwater should be constructed at Prince Arthur's Landing, and to carry out the scheme they spent money there to no purpose. When we introduced a Bill for the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway, it was thrown out of this House, when the present Government introduced a Bill for the same purpose, it was carried here. When we introduced a Bill to right a wrong in the county of Huron, to reconstruct the ridings of that county as they should be, it was scorned and thrown out; when a Bill is introduced by the present Government to manipulate every municipality in Ontario, to 'hive the Grits,' as they say, to alter every constituency at the beck and instance of their friends in the other House, no attempt is made to stop it, or to see whether it is fair or in accord with provincial rights or not. When the present Government took the absurd position of fighting the Provinces——"

This quotation I am making is à propos to the defence of the Senate on the ground that they represent the smaller Provinces.——

"when the present Government took the absurd position of fighting the Provinces and attempting to deprive them of their rights, when they attempted to take the licensing power from the Provincial Governments which they had enjoyed for eighteen years, and when I raised my voice here against the Bill when it came up to the Senate, who listened to me? Not a soul."

Of the eighty independent high judicial functionaries, as they were supposed to be, who were appealed to at a critical moment to raise their voices on behalf of provincial rights, threatened by the Government of the day, how many listened to the hon. gentleman's appeal? Not one.——

"Sir John A. Macdonald has stated that the licensing power belonged to the Dominion, and so this House, at the beck of the Government of the day, at once accepted the proposition and would not listen to an argument against it for one moment. What is the position of this House on that question to-day? Does it occupy a good one on a question where it should stand up for provincial rights? On every measure affecting provincial rights it supported the Government. It was in the interests of the strong party in the House of Common that that view should prevail, and it did prevail. That was the way this Chamber manifested its independence."

Sir, there is the record, the matured opinion of a gentleman who has been in that Chamber, a very leading member of it, for the last twelve years, and I say, in the face of that record, there can be but one opinion as to the use of that body in protecting provincial rights at least. Now, if there are statements made by the Hon. Mr. Scott from his place in the Senate, which I have read, any of which are untrue, let us hear them challenged to-night. If they are true, they prove conclusively that the resolution of my hon. friend has not been moved a day or an hour too soon. The right hon. gentleman seemed to pooh pooh the idea that the Senators are at all under his control. I would not venture an opinion of my own, but I will refer him to the opinion of a gentleman who has long supported him in that Chamber, and not a week ago, when the question of the constitution of the Senate came up, what do we find him saying?:

"There is not a member here who has received his appointment from either Government that does not feel under more or less restraint and obligation to the party or the leader of the party that appointed him, and members are to that extent shackled and bound. In many instances, I am quite satisfied that hon. gentlemen here would take a different stand from what they do were it not that they feel they owe their appointment to the present Government, and consequently must support all measures introduced by them."

There is a splendid character to give to the body appointed by the right hon. gentleman, a body whose actions show they are here to register the decrees of the right hon. gentleman himself, and not to protect the rights of the Provinces, or to advance or promote the interests of the people. Now, the right hon. gentleman also did not scruple to say, that in his opinion, the Senate to-day truly reflects the voice of the people. He has had his answer from the mouth of my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson), who proved to him, that from the premier Province of this Dominion, a Province which I congratulate on having had twelve long years of Liberal rule, and which promises to maintain that rule for a long time to come, there are only four Liberal representatives in that Senate. It is a farce to say, that when Ontario has only four Liberal representatives in the Senate, that Senate truly represents the voice of the people. It is ridiculous; it is a travesty on the facts as we know them to exist. The hon. gentleman compared our Senate to the House of Lords in England, and led us to believe that it was modelled upon that body, and that it discharged the same functions and duties in this Dominion as the House of Lords discharge in Great Britain; but there is no comparison possibly between the two bodies. We know that the House of Lords is a venerable institution which has come down from antiquity, which preserves, and is maintained by those who are in favor of it in order that it may preserve and maintain the special interests of a particular class. Here in this broad Dominion, I am proud to say we have not and we ought not to have any special class or special interests which require a special body to preserve. We have no aristocracy, we have no landed interests, in the sense in which they have landed interests at home. We are a people to that extent, homogeneous that the interest of one class ought to be, and I believe is, the interest of all; and therefore the reasons for the continuance of the House of Lords—whether they are tenable or not is a matter which the English people will decide—do not exist here. But there is no parallel at all. The members of the House of Lords do not owe their position to the appointment of a Premier. The members of the House of Lords are such because they are sons of their fathers, because their fathers before have been members of that House. It runs in the family, as my hon. friend says, and while that may or may not be defensible, while they are there to defend the interests of their class, there is no parallel between such a body and this, appointed by the Premier and reflecting his will alone, nor is there any comparison between our Senate and the Senate of the United States. The hon. gentleman says we seek to introduce a body similar to the Senate of the United States. No, we do not. The Senate of the United States possesses powers by the constitution of that country with which it is not desirable that we should invest the Senate of this country, and I have never heard anyone on this side of the House propose to invest them with such powers. The Senate of the United States are so appointed that the smallest State has as great a representation as the largest. They are not only a legislative body but they are to some extent an executive body. Their constitution is entirely different from ours at present or from our proposed one, and no analogy can be drawn. I will not take up the time of the House further on this subject. I believe that it is proper and right that we should have placed before this House now, when we are, so far as we can gather, upon the eve of a general election, that we should formulate in a distinct way and in a distinct form the principles we hold in regard to the second Chamber; and, believing that the principles formulated in the resolution of my hon. friend will give to the people of this country a second Chamber far in advance of the one under which we now suffer, I will gladly support his motion.

Mr. McNEILL. I shall take up the time of the House only a few moments, but I do not feel inclined to vote on this subject without expressing my views. I think it is unfortunate that none of the hon. gentlemen opposite who followed the Premier ventured to grapple with the main argument which he advanced to the House which was, as I understand it, that the second elective Chamber we formerly had proved a failure, and that in point of fact the two elective bodies would be found to conflict with each other. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) seemed to be pressed with the force of that objection, too, before it was urged from this side of the House by the right hon. Premier, because he endeavored to guard himself. I see he shakes his head. I did him the credit to suppose that he had been aware of that objection and had been pressed by it, but I see that he denies that he was. The hon. gentleman said that it would be necessary to have a Chamber that would keep this House in check, and a little while afterwards he said that we would require to have that Chamber so constituted that it would not be a rival to this House. Now, that is just where the difficulty comes in. If you have two elective Chambers, either the second will be a rival to this House, or you will not have a second Chamber that is of any benefit at all. If you make that second Chamber weak, if you reduce its independence, as the hon. gentleman proposed, it will vitually amount to nothing and be no check. If, again, you have a Chamber elected by the people, the question is, upon what franchise is it to be elected? Is it to be elected on the same franchise as this House, or upon some other franchise? Is the property qualification to be higher than the property qualification for this House? If it is higher that will make a difference in the first instance but the result will be that we shall soon have an agitation to reduce the qualification. We shall therefore simply have what the hon. gentleman himself regards as a danger, we shall have a rival House, in short, to this representative Chamber. But, Sir, it is a most important fact that we find hon. gentlemen rising up in their places in this House and proposing, in the calmest way, without any warning whatever, such a radical proposition as has been presented to us to-night; we found hon. gentlemen getting up without a moment's warning the other night, and supporting a proposition in support of a policy which just a round dozen members of Mr. Gladstone's late Cabinet had declared to be most dangerous to the integrity of the Empire; we find the leader of the Opposition rising without a moment's notice to ask this House to support that proposition. We find to-day another hon. member getting up without a moment's notice, and in a calm kind of way, on a summer afternoon, suggesting that we should alter the British constitution; and we find the hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), saying that that is perfectly right, and just the sort of thing we ought to do. I think that is not the sort of thing we ought to have in this House of Commons. I think we ought to conduct our debates with greater gravity than that, and we ought not to approach a question of this enormous importance with such a light heart. I venture to think that it would be a very great loss, and a very great injury to the people of this country, if we were to attempt to substitute an elective body for the nominated Chamber which now exists. As I understand it, the weakness of this House is just where the strength of the other House is to be found. This House is weak because it is dependent upon the people, and, as I understand it, it is just because this House is intended to represent the people that it is weak; and on the other hand, because it has its sanction directly from the people, it is strong also. I say the weakness of this House consists in the fact that the members, because they know that their seats depend on the will of the electorate, are inclined often to do that which they think would be pleasing to their constituents, rather than that which they believe, in their hearts, would be in the interest of the country. But that is what we require, and what the British constitution requires—this British constitution which hon. gentlemen think is to be altered, as I said, in a summer's afternoon, this British constitution, of course, as we all know, has been produced without much thought by a parcel of men who do not know very much about what they were doing. Sir, this very characteristic of the British constitution is of all others, to my mind, one of those we ought to guard with the greatest jealousy. In the second Chamber are men who are not dependent for their seats upon the electorate, and therein I see one of the greatest safeguards to the interest of the country. When you find a sudden wave of excitement passing over the country, which may influence hon. members of this House to do this or that which they think may be pleasing to their constituents, we have no kind of guarantee that they will not give way to the pressure of this popular excitement. But you have in the second Chamber gentlemen who hold their seats for life, who are independent of the people, and who are able to approach a question calmly and to consider it upon its merits, without regard to the opinion of those outside upon whose votes they would otherwise be dependent. In that way they are able to stem the tide of public excitement until the people have time to reflect and recover their sober second thought. That is where we have the benefit of a Chamber which is not elective. But the hon gentlemen opposite desire to do away with that safeguard. altogether, and to have an elective Chamber which will be just as liable to be forced by popular excitement of any kind as is the House of Commons, and in that way they do away with one of the very safeguards which the men who framed the British constitution foresaw and provided against. But these hon. gentlemen treat the British constitution as if it was a child's toy, or a house built of cards, which they are to deal with just as they please. It seems to me that the House of Commons is strong just where the second Chamber is weak, and the second Chamber is strong just where the House of Commons is weak, and so you find that the one supplements or complements the other, and in these two together you have a most admirable combination. Suppose this House pass some crude and hasty measure, you have a second Chamber to counteract it. Suppose the House of Commons will not give way to the second Chamber, the Sovereign holds in her hand the key to the dead lock, viz., a dissolution and appeal to the people, then, if the elective Chamber is sustained the second Chamber will, of course, give way.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. McNEILL. It has always been found so. Hon. gentlemen may laugh, of course; it is well to laugh and to be theoretical. We have always found that to be so in practice. We have not found in England any difficulty of that kind. We have found that the House of Lords in England have frequently refused to sanction the legislation proposed in the House of Commons; but we have never found, with the exception of the one unimportant case mentioned by the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), that the House of Lords has persisted in its refusal to pass any measure of great importance when there has been an appeal to the people.

An hon. MEMBER. How about the Reform Bill?

Mr. MILLS. How about Jewish disabilities?

Mr. McNEILL. On the last occasion when there was a difference between the Lords and Commons, no doubt the House of Lords came out triumphantly. That was not because they went against the people, but because the House of Commons, represented by the Premier and the Government of the day, were afraid to appeal to the people on the question. The House of Lords begged that there should be an appeal to the people. Lord Salisbury and other leading statesmen requested such an appeal, but Mr. Gladstone feared to appeal to the people on the question, and he gave way, and the House of Lords prevented the House of Commons doing, what hon. gentlemen here would have objected to being done, making a re-distribution of seats without anyone knowing what the distribution was to be. But I venture to think that the people of this country have some respect for the constitution which has been provided for them through the wisdom of ages, and by the blood of their ancestors, and that they will guard that constitution jealously. I do not believe that hon. gentlemen opposite are going to make a great deal of political capital out of this attempt to substitute an elective Chamber for the present Senate. The hon. member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) seemed to see the difficulty of that position. He does not believe in a body of that kind, and he goes a step forward and says: Abolish the whole thing; do away altogether with the British constitution. It will, however, be some time before that comes to pass.

Mr. JAMIESON. Before I record my vote on this question, I think it advisable to offer a few remarks. On several occasions, both in my own constituency and elsewhere, I have expressed the opinion that in my judgment there was room for a change in the constitution of the Senate. I regret, however, very much that this matter has come before the House in the shape in which it has been submitted. Whilst I am in favor of the principle of the amendment, I at the same time have confidence in the Government.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. JAMIESON. It may seem strange to some hon. gentleman that I take that position. Had the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) moved it as a substantive motion, I for one would have been only too glad to have supported it to the best of my ability. But the hon. gentleman has moved it in such a way that, in my judgment, he will not obtain a fair expression of the sentiment of the House on this question, and I regret very much it should be placed before the House in that way. I have confidence in the Government, and I am not going to vote want of confidence in the Government on this question. I only regret I cannot say the same in regard to the Senate, that is, that I have confidence in them. This conviction in regard to a change in the constitution of the Senate has forced itself upon me in consequence of the events which have transpired since I have had a seat in this House. I think the action of the Senate during the last Session of Parliament was not only ill-advised, but very arbitrary; and if on no other ground than their action on the Bill to amend the Canada Temperance Act which passed through this House last year, I would be disposed to support any reasonable proposition for an amendment in the constitution of the Senate to bring it into harmony with what I believe to be the public sentiment of this country. I have no hesitation in saying that, in my judgment, the venerable gentlemen who occupy seats in the Upper House are entirely out of harmony and sympathy with the people of this Dominion. I trust if hon. gentlemen at my right, the friends of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), come into power—and I hope they will not, and I do not intend to help them to power even on this question—but if they do attain to power, I trust their record on this question will be better than it was during the time they were in power several years ago. I understand from the public records that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) carried through this House a resolution affirming the advisability and desirability of a change in the constitution of the Senate. However, no practical results flowed from that motion.

Mr. MILLS. Yes, and the reasons were given.

Mr. JAMIESON. I trust if those hon. gentlemen come into power this question will be treated by them in a practical way. I hope their policy on this question will not be one of masterly inactivity. Should I have the fortune or misfortune to be in this House when the hon. gentlemen at my right change over to the Treasury benches, and should they not take up this question, I will take an opportunity of reminding them——

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Of voting for it then.

Mr. JAMIESON,—of proving their honesty in dealing with this question in a practical way. It is not my desire to discuss this question at any great length. I may again express my great regret that it has not come up in such a way as to enable me to give it my support. It is a dangerous state of things to have in any country, a second Chamber not amenable to public sentiment. I have strong convictions on this question. I take no stock, to use a common expression, in the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill). It seems to me that the arguments made use of by that hon. gentleman, such as that the Senate, being appointed for life, is more independent than we who have seats in this House as representatives of the public sentiment of the country, are erroneous. If we carry out that argument to its logical conclusion it will tell diametrically against the principles of responsible government. I agree with the sentiment that we are representatives of the people and that the people in this country govern. The people are the sovereign Parliament of the country, and when we, the direct representatives of the people, pass on any question, while I concede the right of the Senate to discuss and modify such a measure, I do not concede its right, as it did last year in the instance I have referred to, to act in a manner directly opposed to the wishes of the people. Not only that, but after we had refused to concur in the action of the Senate on that question and sent the Bill back to them, they re-affirmed their position. What position are we going to occupy? The hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill) says that in the event of a dead lock the Queen's representative has the matter in his own hands. I should like to know whether the Queen or the Queen's representative can change the constitution of this country, the British North America Act. I understand that the number of Senators who constitute the Upper House is fixed by that Act and no power short of the Imperial Parliament can make any change in the Act. Nor could the representative of the Queen or even Her Majesty herself, without the concurrence of the Lords and Commons of England, make any change in the Act. Now, Sir, I do trust that in some way or other, from some party or other in this country—and so far as I am concerned, no matter with what party I may be allied, I shall give such a measure my hearty support—I do trust that some change in the constitution of that body will take place which will render it more in harmony with popular opinion and the sympathies of the people. It is said that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has had a wonderful effect already. I am told—whether it is a strange coincidence or not—that, just about the time the amendment was moved in the House, the venerable gentlemen in the Senate woke up to a wonderful extent. Perhaps if we move an amendment every Session, or once or twice a Session, it might have a very beneficial effect upon these gentlemen. I have expressed my views on this question in this cursory fashion. It was not my intention to speak, and in fact I was surprised when the question came up; but I regret very much that it has come up in the way it has. I desire to say that because I vote against this amendment in the shape in which it is moved, in the abstract form in which it has come before the House, that is not to be taken as an index of my opinion on the subject. I simply vote against it because it is a vote of want of confidence, and as I am a supporter of the Government, and have confidence in its judgment and ability in the Administration of the affairs of this country, I shall vote against the amendment on that ground. I trust, however, to see the day when a different state of things will prevail in this country, in reference to the constitution of the body known as the Senate.

Mr. MILLS. Perhaps the House will allow me to say a word by way of explanation. The hon. gentleman says I carried a resolution on this subject in the House in 1875, and that I took no further action. I stated at the time that I did not propose to go further than to get the House to express an opinion on the subject, with a view of making it an issue in the election. My opinion was then, and is now, that a change in our constitution, whether it is a change within our power to make, or a change which we may seek at the hands of another body, should not be made without popular sanction. That was the reason I did not then proceed further, and my desire now is to obtain from the House such an expression of opinion as that the country will understand precisely how hon. gentleman stand on this question.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down has given us a very frank and interesting account of the state of his feelings, and the tendency of his vote upon this question. He has told us that he agrees thoroughly with the principle of this resolution, but that he will not vote for it now, for fear he should seem to express want of confidence in the Government; but that if our friends come into power and do not reform the Senate, and the question should come up again, then he would be happy to vote for it. I fancy that is about the state of feeling of a great many gentlemen on that side, who are really with us in regard to that question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. CASEY. I do not mean those gentlemen who are crying "no." I do not suspect them; but there are gentlemen on that side who entertain similar views.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. CASEY. Then, as we seem to have a pretty unanimous denial from that side that they entertain the same views as the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, those who have been calling "no" will certainly not shelter themselves behind the plea that they are voting against this resolution, because it is a vote of want of confidence. As we have a nearly unanimous expression of opinion that they are against this motion on principle, then we should be justified in taking the vote which will take place on this motion as the real expression of the opinions of those gentlemen, and they will not be able to hide behind the question of confidence. Now, this habit of taking refuge behind the pretext of confidence or want of confidence, the habit of expressing blind loyalty to the Government as an excuse for voting against all sorts of resolutions, brought up in this particular form, has gone too far in this House. Such doctrines were ridiculed by the present leader of the House, when they were proposed in a former Parliament, when he was leader of the Opposition. Not long since, I had occasion to read one of his speeches on that point, in which he ridiculed the idea that an abstract resolution not expressing want of confidence in the Government, an abstract question of policy brought forward as an amendment to Supply, could or should be construed as a motion of want of confidence in the Government. And he ridiculed it properly, because it is a well known parliamentary practice, known to no one better than himself, that a motion of this kind is not necessarily one of want of confidence in the Government. It is not a motion of want of confidence unless the Government choose to make it so. It would not have been so on this occasion if the right hon. gentleman had not made it so; and if he has made it so, if he has laid it down as a policy so to regard it, it is for the reason that he wishes to have the motion defeated, that he does not want an open expression of opinion upon it by his friends, as well as those on this side. He has called upon the loyalty of his friends and backers to vote down this motion, although some of them, as we have already had proof, will give that vote, feeling at the same time full sympathy with the opinions expressed in the resolution. So, Sir, I say that pretext is worn out. Now, my hon. friend who preceded me certainly made one very important admission, and one which I think he honestly made. He told us the Senate were not in harmony with the opinions of the people of Canada. That is what we have been contending all this afternoon and for years back. That is what we believe to be the fact—that the Senate are not in harmony with the views of the people, and that, when an election comes round and the views of the people are expressed in the shape of an election of members to this House, it will turn out that the Senate is not in political harmony with this House either. Both the hon. gentlemen who have preceded me have referred to the motion carried in this House in 1875, affirming this principle, and almost in the identical words of the motion now before us. But attention has not been called to the fact that in 1873 a similar motion, almost in the same words, was proposed and defeated; that almost immediately after that Session there was a dissolution of the House, and that, although that question of the Senate was not a leading issue at that election, because it was overshadowed by the great issue of the Pacific scandal, yet the new House that was elected affirmed by a non-partisan vote the very principle which the members who sat here in 1873 had rejected. So we see that after this matter had been discussed in Parliament, after there had been an election, in which no doubt, this issue went for something, after a new House came back, the principle was affirmed. Yet I think my hon. friend for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and his colleagues were quite right in not pressing that principle into action until there was an opportunity to make it an issue at the elections. That opportunity did not occur. The issue was again overshadowed by one of those waves of popular enthusiasm which my hon. friend from Bruce referred to, the infatuation about the National Policy, and we have had no election tried squarely upon this issue yet. But I approve of the conduct of the Liberal Government of that time in postponing action as they did. If the present Government had seen fit to follow their wholesome example, and postpone the making of an infinitely more radical and revolutionary change which they did make last year in the representative institutions of our country, they would have gone much further towards performing their duty as responsible Ministers and representatives of the people. Now, the hon. Minister of Marine did make use of some arguments in the course of his remarks, most of which I think have been disposed of by my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies). That hon. Minister asks, how are we to get a non-partisan Senate? Would a Senate elected by the people be less partisan than the present? We never contended that it would be. What we have been contending is that the Senate should be in harmony with the people. If the people are partisan, if they are strong on one side, so should the Senate be, and so should be the House of Commons; if there are not strong party lines among the people, the Senate should reflect that state of things. What we claim is that the Senate should represent the people whether they are partisan or not; and I am afraid it will not be non-partisan until that millenium comes when party lines will disappear altogether. The hon. gentleman said that the House of Lords were more subject to the ruling party than the Senate. Of course it is in one sense, though it cannot be said that it is more docile—I have to thank my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson) for the word—in support of any Government than the Senate is in support of this Government. But we all remember the case, which has been alluded to more than once, of the great Reform Bill, which the House of Lords would undoubtedly have continued to oppose had it not been for the fear that the Tory majority in that House would be swamped by the elevation of others to the peerage. That is one of the wholesome checks which exist in England upon the action of the House of Lords. It is because the Government of the day can bring this check to bear upon political opponents holding hereditary seats, that the House of Lords is less dangerous to constitutional liberty than the Senate of Canada; for if it undertook to show open and dogged defiance to the Government of the day, it would be swamped by the elevation of the friends of liberty to the peerage. The Senate of Canada is dangerous to liberty, because the Government of the day, which represents the people, cannot in any way prevent it obstructing, if it choses, any legislation that Government may carry through the popular House, and any such obstacle in the way of legislation is dangerous to popular liberty. The comparison in other respects between the Senate and the House of Lords is one for which I think the members of our Upper Chamber will not thank the leader of this House. If there is anything calculated to bring ridicule on our worthy friends in that Chamber, which I would be far from doing, it is the attempt to institute such a comparison. We have the greatest respect for the individuals composing our Upper Chamber, whom the leader of the House called, in his amusing and humorous way, life peers; we have great respect for them personally, respect for their abilities, and often respect for their action; but it is the most unkind thing possible to ask this House to institute any comparison between that body and the English House of Lords. We all know that the English House of Lords represent a distinct interest; that the constitution of England has been dual from the first, one body representing the great land interest, land holders and aristocrats, and the other body representing the people, and that the House of Lords was not instituted, as our House was, for the purpose of acting as a check on the other body. Both bodies naturally constituted the Parliament of the realm, representing the different classes of the community. No such reason existed for the creation of a Brummagem House of Lords in Canada. As a matter of fact, the Senate, as constituted from the first, has merely been a means of pensioning off those members of the party in power who have been unable or have not taken the trouble to find seats in the popular assembly, and a means of finding a seat for a Minister when it has not been convenient to open a constituency and send him back for election; it has been used for these purposes entirely, and I think it cannot be pretended that the appointments, as a rule, have been made with any reference to the calm, judicial character of the appointees. If we took the thoroughly Tory view of my friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), that it is necessary to check and hinder the will of the people as expressed in the Lower House, then these appointments might seem to be made with regard to the fitness of things; but looking on them as a body of men supposed to be so superior in political training and knowledge, and in impartiality, to the members of this House, that they have a right to revise our legislation, and throw it out if it does not seem good to them, I think it cannot be pretended that the appointments have been made with a view to the fitness of the parties appointed. My hon. friend from Bruce (Mr. McNeill) asserted that nobody on this side of the House had grappled with the hon. Premier's argument that an elective Senate had been tried before in Canada, and had been found to be a failure. We did not grapple with that argument because there was no such argument. There was an assertion made by the hon. Premier that the experiment had been such a failure as to disgust Mr. George Brown with the principle of an elective Senate, an assertion which was immediately shown to be glaringly incorrect, because Mr. George Brown had always been a consistent opponent of an elective Senate. But we never did have an elective Senate. The old Legislative Council was partly composed of elective members; but I think we are all old enough to remember that the nominative members were not turned out to make way for them, and that there was always a large leaven of nominative members along with those who had been elected. Then again, Sir, as to the actual failure or success of the experiment. If the Hon. George Brown was right for once, as the hon. First Minister has told us, the right hon. First Minister must have been wrong, because he was a supporter of the principle which he says Mr. Brown opposed; and, in practice, I think, Mr. Brown's contention was maintained by the facts, rather than the contention of the First Minister. No doubt in the earlier years during which elective members sat in the Senate, that body did make one or two attempts to deal with money Bills, but they very soon found out their mistake. The point was given up; and had we an elective Senate for fifty years, it is not probable that this demand would be over repeated. There were no signs of it for years before Confederation, and I do not remember the slightest expression of opinion of any considerable number of electors in favor of the return to the nominative system. The great bulk of Canadians were surprised, and more than surprised, to find that we had gone back to the middle ages for our plan to constitute a second Chamber. The Premier says that the plan of an elective Senate is incompatible with responsible government. I suppose the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill), would call that another argument. But the right hon. gentleman gave no reason, I presume because there is no reason, for the assertion. I cannot imagine any reason why an elective Senate should be incompatible with responsible government. If there is, I hope some hon. gentleman will give it to us before the debate is over, but at present we have only the bare assertion to deal with. It is a fact that responsible government did exist for a number of years in Canada with a Senate in part elective, and which it was intended to make wholly elective. I take the other side, and argue that the existence of a nominative Senate is utterly inconsistent with responsible and representative institutions, because it is a standing and irremovable obstacle in the way of carrying out the will of the people. Then the Premier said there was no popular agitation in favor of this motion, there were no petitions and so on. Well, the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) has told us what view the temperance people take of the action of the Senate; he has told us that they have no confidence in the Senate. We did not need to hear that from the hon. gentleman, because we remember that at all the meetings of temperance associations since the action of the Senate last year, and at many of the meetings of the clergymen of different churches, resolutions were passed declaring the people had no confidence in the Senate, and that the constitution of that body should be changed. Nay more, we had petitions from the temperance associations laid before the House, in which the same sentiments were enunciated, so that the House is well informed of the sentiment of the temperance people, and of the fact that there has been and is a strong agitation throughout the country in favor of a change. Thus the hon. gentleman's plea that there is no agitation falls to the ground, in face of the fact given by one of his own supporters that there exists an agitation, and a powerful one, in favor of a change. We are charged with not having a definite plan to propose. I think it was the Minister of Marine made that charge. Well, I think the principle is as clearly and definitely laid down in the resolution as it could be. It would have been absurd for us to propose a definite detailed plan, involving all the machinery for electing the Senate, as a motion in amendment to the motion to go into Supply, and that just for the sake of trying to satisfy the Minister of Marine. Had we done that, we would have earned the reprobation of the country and justified the allegations of those who say such a resolution should not be brought up on the present occasion. The proposition is clear and definite, as to principle, and if the House should adopt it it will be the duty of the Government to work out the details. There is room for difference with regard to detail. There is room to argue in favor of election of the Senate by the Local Parliaments or by direct appeal to the people. I do not pretend to discuss these details, but I say the vast majority of the people, Liberal and Conservative, believe that some change is needed in order to do away with this clique of irresponsible life peers as I may call them, who form the Senate of Canada—not to do away with them in a personal sense, but to do away with the present constitution of that body, and give us a second Chamber, if we are to have one at all, which will be responsible to the people. Some of the arguments would lead us to believe there is no use for the Chamber at all. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries used a strong argument in that direction when he said the Senate need not discuss matters of legislation because they are fully discussed here. If the government would leave this an open question, and give their supporters liberty to ascertain the feelings of their constituencies, I am certain this resolution would be carried by a considerable majority.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), is asking us to do something which needs a great deal of explanation before it can receive the sanction of this House. I am glad the Opposition have brought this matter forward, but I regret that they should have brought it forward as an amendment to the motion to go into Supply. I regret this, not because I approve of the principle of an elective Senate, for I do not, but because I would like to see scope given for a fuller and freer expression of the opinion of the House, which would be given were the resolution brought forward as a substantive motion. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson), has evidently been making a mental caricature of the Senate, and some of his inferences are not only amusing but very misleading. He asked for a change on the principle that it was needed on the ground of economy. The hon. gentleman knows that in the country there is no stronger principle you can go to the people upon than any principle involving economy, but it was most remarkable that he should first give us the cost of the Senate during last Session and the preceding Sessions, but not tell us, what every hon. gentleman must know, that it the Senate were made elective it would add to the expenditure of the country. I do not think an election to the Senate could be carried on for much less than the expense involved in the election of members to this House; so that, upon the principle of economy, the motion is a failure. The people would have to pay more for an elective Senate than for the Senate as at present constituted. There is another principle enunciated, and that is that the Senate, as at present constituted, is not responsible to the people. We all know that it was designed the Senate as at present constituted should not be responsible to the people in the sense in which hon. gentlemen opposite endeavor to use the term. We know that with a Senate elected by the people, placed to some extent—to what extent we do not know, because the resolution only asks us to formulate the principle of an elective Senate—above this House, we would have one body elected, the outcome of the popular will sitting in judgment over another body, which is also the outcome of the popular will. No such anomaly exists in any country in the world, or could exist consistent with the legislation of the country's affairs. Now, so far as the independence of the Senate is concerned, it seems to me that, whenever the Senate does act, it is blamed, and, if it does not act as often as hon. gentlemen opposite seem to think it should, it is blamed also. I do not think the Senate has interfered with any measure passed by this House this Session without its being abused by the Reform press of this country. But, a day or two ago, it saw fit not to give its sanction to a Bill which had received the sanction of the majority of the members of this House. I myself voted against the principle of the Bill introduced by my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), though it received the votes of a majority of the members of this House; but, because the Senate did this, it is abused by the Reform press of this country. If we cannot agree with the Senate when it negatives the action of the majority of this House, it is not for the press to abuse it because it exercises one of the functions of its creation in doing so. Take the case of my hon. friend from North Lanark, the very ground upon which, if this were a substantive motion, he would support it to-night, that last Session the Senate added on the well-known amendment to the Bill which he introduced in this House. I understand it to be one of the functions of that body, that, if this House is compelled, owing to the strength of a popular wave passing over the country to pass legislation here which in our judgment we may not approve of, one of the duties of the Senate is to check that until the time that it becomes an assured fact that the popular will is right. It is just possible that the wave of temperance which is going over the country may not last. If so, do not blame the Senate for what it did, though you may disagree with it, though you may find it inconvenient in the mean time, but in that act the Senate was simply discharging one of its well known functions. So far as the Senate being independent is concerned, we have heard to-night that it cannot be independent of the man who creates it. It seems to me that hon. gentlemen give hon. members of the other House but very little credit for honesty and for intelligence. It seems tome that the hon. member for North Lanark (Mr. Jamieson), the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), and all who have preceded him might as well say, when the First Minister recommends the appointment of a judge to the bench, that he cannot be independent but must subvert his position, and remain the tool, if he ever was the tool, of the First Minister because he appointed him. I think the case is analogus, and there is one fact of which I wish to remind hon. gentlemen, and that is there is no doubt that a good deal of the opposition that they now manifest to the Senate is owing to the fact that the Senate is at the present time so largely composed of men whose politics are in unison with the majority of this House. I say there is no doubt of that; there is none in my mind. I may be wrong, but I give my reason why I make that statement. During the five years Mr. Mackenzie was in power, we saw not one honest effort made to alter the constitution of the Senate, if we except the effort which was made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), which proved abortive, and for which he got roundly abused by his own friends. During that time Mr. Mackenzie made many appointments to the Senate, and I wish to point out that, if the general elections of 1878 had resulted in the retention of Mr. Mackenzie and his party in office, the Senate to-day, with the number of vacancies that have since occurred, would be of a political complexion, different from what it is now. So that you see the lapse of time will undoubtedly cure the very evil of which these hon. gentlemen complain and will remove one of their chief obstacles to the present constitution of the Senate. It may be that the hope of altering the political complexion of the Senate in this regard is a forlorn one. It is not for me to speak as to that; that question will be decided by the people. But I do say that, if the Senate were made elective, as is proposed, I fail to see how, by any method that I have ever been able to hear or to conceive, it could be made practicable. If hon. gentlemen opposite would take up the question of the abolition of the Senate as contradistinguished from the election of the Senate, I can understand that there would be a great deal of force in what they say as to the results; but to come to this House with a simple principle, the principle of affirming the election of members to the Senate, is one that this House ought not to pass upon without the details, without the system, the plan by which it is proposed to make this important change in our constitution, being fully made known to this House. What would be thought of Mr. Gladstone submitting to the English House of Commons a simple resolution affirming the principle of Home Rule, without going on and presenting, as he did, in a statesmanlike way—however much we may disapprove of it—his scheme for the government of Ireland? For these reasons I shall oppose the motion of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills).

Mr. FISHER. I am glad to see that the hon. member who has just sat down has really come out squarely and fairly in favor of an irresponsible Senate. He says that he does not desire to see a Senate in any sense or in any way responsible to the people. There is a little difference of position between that hon. gentleman and what I understood to be some of the remarks of the right hon. the leader of the Government. I understood the right hon. the leader of the Government to say that the Senate was in sympathy with the people of the country, that, because it was in sympathy with him and he was supported by the majority of the people of this country, it was therefore evident that the Senate itself was in sympathy with the majority of the people of the country. I do not care just now to point out the fair conclusion which a juxtaposition of the hon. gentleman's argument with that of his supporter and friend from North Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) would lead to, because the hon. member for North Lanark said clearly and distinctly that the Senate was not to-day in sympathy with the majority of the people of the country. Perhaps I might be tempted to draw the conclusion that the right hon. the leader of the Government was not to-day in sympathy with the people of the country, but I leave that for these two hon. gentlemen to fight out between themselves. There are two main divisions of this question in regard to the Senate, and one which the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill) brought forward, I think the one which seems to influence the majority of the gentlemen on the other side of the House, I mean in defending the Senate because of its being an imitation of the English House of Lords. I think that, in this argument, the hon. gentleman has entirely misconceived the original object of the Senate in this country and he has certainly entirely misconceived the present state of the Senate. As I understand, those who dealt with the British North America Act and formed our Confederation did not form our Senate upon the model of the English House of Lords. As I understand, the gentlemen who did that work, they created the Senate for the express purpose of being a balance between the greater and the lesser Provinces of this country and for the purpose of defending and protecting the rights of the minor Provinces. But, Sir, supposing the Senate had been intended for a model of the English House of Lords, I am sure nobody who knows anything about the two Chambers but must see what a perfect travesty the Senate is upon its original. The Senate is in no sense the representative of a class; I say so, not because there is a class in this country which the Senate might represent, if there were such a class certainly the Senate could not be said to represent it, but I am happy to know that in this country there are no classes, in this country we are intensely and inevitably democratic, and there is no class of people who possesses an undue influence in the government of the country. The English House of Lords did demand and obtain a share in the government of the country at a time when a privileged class was able to impose itself upon the people and to assert its right to a large share in the Government; but in this country there is no such class, and no second Chamber is needed to represent it. The right hon. leader, in his reply to the hon. member for Bothwell, seemed to indicate that the latter was proposing, as a substitute for our present Senate, something in the form of the American Senate. I do not so understand the motion, and I do not think there is any hon. gentleman on this side of the House who desires to introduce into our country that portion of the American constitution. Here we have an executive government directly responsible to the Parliament of the country, while in the United States they have an executive which is not so responsible. The House of Representatives and the Senate have certain executive functions which are specially delegated to them, but which I do not think any Senate, whether appointed or elected, could possibly possess in this country. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has not fairly represented our position when he suggested that we on this side of the House are opposed to the Senate because the Senate is opposed to us. I do not think that is the feeling of anyone on this side, or that it influenced the hon. member for Bothwell in any way. We believe that the Senate is a menace to the rights and privileges of the people, and we believe that it does not matter one whit whether the Senate be in sympathy with one party or the other, because it is just as liable to oppose the behests of the people when one party is in power as the other. It is true that in consequence of the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite have held the reins of power for the greater part of the time since Confederation, their party is more largely represented in the Senate than ours. As a rule gentlemen who are appointed to the Senate, no matter from which side of politics, are intensely partisan before they are appointed. They are chiefly appointed in consequence of political services, and it is not in human nature when men have worked for years through campaign after campaign for one political party, that they should be able immediately to divest themselves of all political feeling and act in a judicial and independent spirit. The hon. gentleman has alluded to the judiciary of the country, and has asked why the senators should not be able to divest themselves of their political feelings like the judiciary. Sir, it is a very different thing. The judiciary have not to deal with political questions, they are not concerned in the political warfare of the country; but the senators are so concerned, and even though they may be independent of the people of the country, they will still have to pass upon the acts and legislation of the party which they opposed or which they favored before they became senators. The hon. gentlemen opposite have pointed to the difficulties which might occur in the case of an elective Senate. I am inclined to think the people of this country will be able to overcome those difficulties; I am inclined to think that our statesmen would be sufficiently wise and far-seeing to remove those difficulties, were they to arise. But there is still a more radical way of cutting that Gordian knot, and one which I myself would favor, and that is the complete abolition of the Senate. I am quite prepared to support the motion of the hon. member for Bothwell because I think it a step in the right direction, but I would be prepared myself, individually, to go much further than that, because I would like to see the expenditure incurred for the maintenance of the Senate removed from the Public Accounts of our country. In looking over the Public Accounts I find there is an average of something like $130,000 a year spent upon the Senate by itself, and I find there is also a portion of the general expenditure connected with the public buildings at Ottawa, which, added to that sum, I think I am safe in saying would amount to $200,000 a year. Now, I believe that the Senate is not necessary; I believe the amount of work which our Senate has accomplished, or which an elective Senate might accomplish, would not be a fair equivalent for this expenditure. When I think that, upon a moderate computation, this expense represents an interest upon $4,000,000; when I believe that by the removal of the Senate we could clear off so much of our public debt, and reduce our annual expenditure, I am convinced that the good the Senate is doing to-day, or that it is ever likely to do, is not equivalent to that expenditure. The First Minister said he did not think the Senate was of any great use, but he pointed out that it was doing no harm. I think the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution had pointed out that the Senate is likely to do a great deal of harm in certain circumstances. Instances have been brought forward where the Senate has opposed the will of the people. I was suprised to hear the Minister of Marine and Fisheries defending the existence of the Senate in its present form. I can quite understand that, as a Minister, he would not be prepared to accept that motion, but I was surprised to hear him say that the Senate did no harm, and that, as a matter of fact, it was not necessary for the Senate to discuss the Acts which come before it from this House. I think the most important instance which has occurred in the history of the Senate where that body has been an injury to the country and opposed the will of the people, is when it put an impediment in the way of temperance legislation, and I was surprised to hear the Minister of Marine overlooking that fact in his defence of the Senate. Sir, I think the hon. gentlemen who have opposed this motion to-night have not really undertaken to defend the present constitution of the Senate, they have only tried to point out what might be the possible weaknesses in an elective Senate. They have only tried to point out that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has not or could not remove the expense attendant on the Senate if an elective Senate were substituted for the present appointed Senate. In this way hon. gentlemen have given evidence of the necessity of something being done. I am glad to know that the hon. member for Bothwell has brought this question forward before the next elections, whenever they may come. I understand this motion to mean that the Liberal party of this country has resolved to try and bring about a change in the constitution of the Senate; and, if they do so, it is right to announce that policy on the floor of Parliament before going before the people. It is absurd to say that this question has not been before the people. It has, on several occasions, been discussed in Parliament and before the country by many of the leading members of the Liberal party; and I may tell the hon. leader of the Government, though he may not know it, there is a strong feeling in the country that the Senate has outlived its usefulness and does not accomplish the purpose which it was intended to accomplish, and that it can only accomplish evil and not good. And this feeling will be aroused and the attention of the people will be turned towards this matter by the motion of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) to-night. I think it is probable from what has dropped from the leader of the Government that the chances are that the elections will not come on immediately, but that perhaps a year may intervene, and during that time the people will have an opportunity of thinking over the subject before they are called upon to choose their representatives in the next Parliament. In considering the matter they will come to the conclusion that the proposition of the hon. member for Bothwell is a sound and just one, and one that will meet with the approval of the people of the country. I have therefore great pleasure in supporting this motion, although were I myself to choose in the matter I would perhaps go a little further and abolish the whole thing.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I deem it my duty to explain the vote I am about to give on the important question now under discussion. It is proposed by this motion to change the mode of appointment of senators, and a blow is aimed at the basis of the present system. When Confederation was accepted by the various Provinces, it was agreed that the senators would be appointed for life by the Crown. This was accepted in order to balance the powers of the State. It was then understood that at certain periods of crisis, at certain times of popular excitement, the policy of the Lower House might be warped so as to seriously endanger the interests of the future, and it was understood that such a body as the Senate, who, so to speak, would only be responsible to their conscience and to their God, was necessary as a moderating power. To-day it is proposed that popular passions should be called upon to elect this second House, and to disturb the stability of the established order of things. By the establishment of a Senate appointed for life we were offered a guarantee against popular effervescence, against certain principles which might prevail at a given moment, and imperil social order, and at the same time this measure propounded the wise principles which preside over the laws of well governed communities. The guarantees which were given to us ought to be maintained. People are complaining to-day that the great majority of the Senate is recruited among members of one distinct political stripe. Well, this is the necessary consequence of the system which prevails in this country, but that does not prove that the system is bad. The Grit or Liberal party, whatever we may choose to call it, having been in opposition for a long time, the consequence is that they have been unable to appoint senators. Let them obtain power and hold it for a long period through a wise policy, and then the Senate will be composed of more Liberals than Conservatives. Such is the working of parties. What is most important is that the Senate should always be composed of men appointed by a Government who are responsible to the people. Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the nature of the complaint? It is charged that the Senate has refused to pass a law on temperance. Well, if there is a reason which has, more than any others, convinced me of the usefulness of the Senate, it is this same reason. I have no hesitation in saying that if the majority of this House passed a law for the absolute prohibition of strong liquors, it would simply be an act of weakness, a concession to prejudices, and a concession unworthy of our enlightened and intelligent House. It is perfectly known, that, especially in northern countries, it is impossible to prohibit the use of alcoholic liquors; let the traffic be regulated, let it be endeavored, through wise legislation, to give good liquors to the trade; let light wines be introduced, and by degrees, two or three generations hence, this appetite of the people for strong liquors will disappear; but let it not be laid down as a principle, that it is wise to deceive people and to secure their confidence through false measures. Quite recently this House passed a law for which I have much respect—a respect, which however, would not involve the sacrifice of my convictions—to allow people who do not believe in God to obtain the confidence of judges, to influence the decision of cases without taking their oath. The Senate, very wisely refused to sanction that law. The Senate may do a great deal of good, and it cannot do any harm. It may do good by checking our laws or giving the finishing touch, and during periods of great popular effervescence, by putting back the car of the State on the right track. It cannot do any harm, because if it happened to pass laws which would not be just or beneficial to the country, the popular branch of the Legislature would be there to check it. From the standpoint of Conservative principles, from the standpoint of social order, in the name of the Government, of the family, so to speak, which the Conservative party tends to consolidate, both by the autonomy of the Provinces, and by due respect for the rights of each citizen, I object to the proposed innovation, and I very much fear that our friends opposite who desire to bring about this retrogressive measure, which is at the same time a sacrifice to popular prejudices, I very much fear I say that this measure will not bring the amount of support they expect from it. Let us make lasting laws. Let us have due regard to whatever compacts may exist between Provinces. We may, from time to time, differ on fiscal policy; we may have different ideas on certain legislation, on various policies of management, but there are great outlines which do not vary, and on which we can never hold different opinions. Let us construe the federal compact in such a way as to derive from it the greatest profit for the people, but let us not change the bases which have been adopted by the different Provinces at the time of Confederation.

Mr. LAURIER. (Translation.) I do not desire to protract this debate, but I should like to point out to my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), that he has misappreciated the principle of the resolution before the House. The principle of that resolution is not to abolish the Senate, but simply to adopt another mode with regard to its constitution. I perfectly agree with all he has said on the necessity of a second House as a means of balancing the powers of the State. On that point I am as much a Conservative as my hon. friend from Bellechasse, but he must see the difference between having a Senate which is not responsible to anybody whatever and a Senate which is responsible to the people. All that my hon. friend from Bothwell asks is that the Senate should be constituted as to not be, as it now is, a perfectly irresponsible body which can defy the power of the House, set itself against all legislation, and which cannot be brought to change its opinion. Our constitution has been compared to the English constitution. There is an immense difference between the two. In England, the House of Lords is not irresponsible; if it sets itself against legislation, against the will of the country, there is a way of changing its opinion. After all, our constitution is a democratic constitution. The power which ought to rule is the choice of the majority. I do not wish to say that it is always supreme wisdom which prevails, but everybody will admit that it is the majority which rules, while as regards the Senate, under our constitution, it is quite different. The Senate is composed of a limited number which can never be increased nor diminished. If the majority in this House enacts a law, and if the Senate refuses to adopt it, what is the result? Under our constitution there is absolutely no means of changing this state of things. In England, there is a remedy which lies in the Sovereign's power. The Sovereign himself has the right to add to the number of the House of Lords. It is a dangerous remedy, which has never been applied to my knowledge, but it was very near being applied. I do not remember just now whether it was at the time of the emancipation of Catholics, or in the case of the Reform Bill of 1832, but I know it was on one of these two questions—the Sovereign was very near adding a certain number of persons to the House of Lords in order to restore harmony in that House. Well, Mr. Speaker, the motion of the hon. member for Bothwell, has no other object but to bring the Senate to be more in harmony with the popular branch. If it was a question of abolishing the Senate, I would agree with the hon. member for Bellechasse, and I would vote against the motion of the hon. member for Bothwell; but on this point, I must make another remark, which, I am sure will meet the approbation of all the French members, and it is that an elective Senate is not at variance with Conservative principles, for it is a measure which has been urged for over fifty years by the French nationality.

Mr. FAIRBANK. I think the Senate does not occupy the position it should occupy. The First Minister has several times alluded to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) as being exceedingly theoretical. In the matter of appointments to the Senate, the Premier has been politically eminently practical. Allusion has been made to the British House of Peers. While our constitution is generally framed on British principles, there are many things in which the comparison is not a fair one. Even the popular branch of that Legislature is to-day struggling with questions which we have settled. I allude more particularly to the question of Home Rule. The nation is exercised to a very great extent to-day, on this question, a question which we, as Canadians, have settled, and the right to which we would not for a moment submit to be deprived of. It has been stated here, and I believe correctly, that the Senate, in many instances, has been recruited from defeated candidates. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries has particularly alluded to this. Let me refer to a single sample. It is about twelve years ago that, at the foot of Lake Huron, a gunboat arrived in port with the Premier on board. He landed amid the booming of cannon. There was a nomination going on. To his candidate he lent all the power of his personal prestige, and advocated his candidature. He spoke vigorously. He spoke for one hour. His candidate was defeated by 600 majority. Had he spoken for one hour longer I think he would have been defeated by twice that number. What was the first act following that? The representative of the people came to the House and was soon called to lead the Government. The defeated candidate was at once placed in the Senate. What was the chief act of the Senate soon after? Was it that of independence, that judicial position which is claimed for it in theory? By no means. If the theory was carried into practice in the selection of members of the Senate, and if the members of that body acted independently and justly, the Senate would possess very much more influence than it has to-day. It is stated that one of the objects of the Senate is to check hasty legislation. A Session or two ago we had an illustration of this checking of hasty legislation. In the last days of the Session, in almost its last hour, the celebrated McCarthy Act was introduced, and its 100 sections were considered and passed between Saturday evening and Tuesday morning. At 4 o'clock that morning there were not half a dozen members who were not asleep, and those who were passing the Bill moved about more like ghosts than representatives of the people. The Bill went to the Senate and they passed it through without reading it. The amendments were not printed at all—it was passed as a mere matter of form. And that is the way in which hasty legislation is checked by that body. Subsequently, the Senate found time to pass an amendment to defeat and kill a measure which had been introduced by the Senate known as the Scott Act, and which the people in many sections were, by vast majorities, using. Such are some of the actions of the Senate. The First Minister has asked, why should we object to the Senate when it is doing no harm? That is the best recommendation that can be given it; and we are asked further to understand that the meaning of doing no harm is, that it does not oppose any act of this Government. That is what is meant by doing no harm. When there was an Administration directing the affairs of this country adverse to the political feelings of the Senate, there was action then, strong, vigorous action too. There was the action of a "fishing" commission that sat for weeks to try and find something on which to trip the then Administration. One of the duties of the members of that committee was to examine the Kaministiquia River. Regardless of expense, one of them purchased a bed-cord, hired a canoe and took soundings of the river. One of the grave charges brought against the Mackenzie Administration was in regard to squandering money on that river, and wrongly locating the terminus of the railway. Events have revenged the ex-Premier. When I stood upon the same ground two years ago, I saw six pile-drivers working day and night preparing the foundations for an immense elevator for the Canadian Pacific Railway. A small elevator had been erected at the point where the opponents of the Mackenzie Administration claimed that the railway should terminate. Appropriations had been made to improve that harbor to the extent of a quarter of a million, but they found themselves under the necessity of adopting the view of those men whose views they condemned, and they are expending money to improve the navigation of the river, so that shipping may take advantage of the natural position of the waters. One-sixth of the amount expended in trying to place the harbor in the wrong place, is now found adequate to establish a harbor where nature intended it to be. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries has tried to defend the Senate, as he does all Government views. He has stated that the resolution is "airy, nebulous and misty." He pronounced with great emphasis, to the injury I fear of his knuckles upon his desk, that the Reform party has never given to the people any direct, square issue. Well, I believe the hon. gentleman is free from such a charge. I believe he went to his constituency with a clear and distinct issue—independence. We have seen the way it has been carried out. One hon. gentleman opposite has expressed regret that the motion come in a forms which he cannot support, although he is in favor of its principle. He admits to us that when he obtains his freedom, when the chains are stricken from him and the party on this side occupy the Treasury benches, then he will be glad to support this measure. We are glad to know where he stands. Much weight has been attached by the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) to the cost which would be caused if the form of the Senate is changed to an elective body, the cost of holding the elections. Since when have gentlemen opposite become so anxious about the cost of elections? This is a recent idea with them. Last Session they were reminded of the cost of certain changes relating to elections, a cost which has since been found to exceed all expectations. We hear nothing of all that. Supposing it did cost something we would get something for it. What are we getting now? We have had some discussion recently about superannuation. To the general principle of superannuation there may be offered many objections—at all events to the manner in which it is worked out. But as now constituted I believe the usefulness of the Senate is gone, and I think it would be a great economy in its present form if we were to superannuate that body.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Before the matter goes to a vote I crave the indulgence of the House for about five minutes. I intend to vote for the resolution of the hon. member for Bothwell, not because I am satisfied with it, but simply because it is a change, and, being a change, it must be for the better, because it cannot be for the worse. I wish to go a step further than the hon. member for Bothwell. I agree with the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) that the Senate is a useless body and ought to be abolished—that it is not only useless but expensive. If any evidence was required that we in this country are wise enough to govern ourselves by a single Chamber, I think it has been furnished by the example of the great Province of Ontario, which, for eighteen years, has been ruled by a single Chamber, and has never felt the least bad effect from it, or the least need for a second Chamber. The right hon. leader of the Government pleaded for a further lease of existence for the Senate in its present form, and the only argument he adduced that had any force was simply that it did no harm, and therefore, that it ought to be allowed to live. Well, Sir, it would puzzle a Philadelphia lawyer to find any good it did, and doing neither good nor harm, I think the most reasonable and sensible thing to do is to abolish it altogether. I was suprised to hear the Premier say that our constitution was not founded or modelled on the federal principle but on the monarchical principles of England and its constitutional principles. Now, it may be that he meant that the framers of the constitution tried to model it in that way, but if they did, and if they thought the Senate as now constituted was a reproduction of the House of Lords, they were miserably mistaken. It does not represent the House of Lords in one single respect, except that it is not responsible to the people. If we want to find the constitution of the House of Lords and compare it with our Senate we have to go back to the time when the House of Lords first came into existence. I need not tell hon. gentlemen that the time was when there was no Parliament in Britain, when the king was supreme. But that sort of thing could not continue longer when there were men nearly as powerful in the country, and even more powerful, than the king himself. The result was that the Lords time and time again claimed a share of the government. They got what they wanted, and it was a good thing for the country in many respects, although in others not so good. Still they succeeded in establishing their claim. That was the foundation of the House of Lords. It has come down to us modified, it is true, in many respects, but still the successors of the first barons of England. And we are told that in this new country of ours it was the intention of the framers of our constitution to model our Senate on the House of Lords of England. Why, Sir, is it not an absurdity, is it not an impudent thing, to say nothing of its grotesqueness for a young, struggling country like ours, scarcely 100 years old, to dig into the graves of by-gone years and array ourselves in the worm-eaten vestments of a thousand years ago? But I deny that the Senate of Canada in anyway represents the House of Lords of Great Britain. The House of Lords has some excuse for its existence in the past, but what reason have we for the existence of a Senate now? We all know that, as founded at first, the House of Lords represented the landed interests of the country, and that it represents those interests still. Added to that, in some respects it represents the moneyed interests of the country. I would ask if our Senate is any parallel to it in either of these two respects. If you take it as the representative of the landed interest, I am afraid that some of them would be able to say of themselves, in the language of Shakespeare, that they were:

"Lords of their presence and no land beside."

If you take them as representing the moneyed interest, I am afraid some of them only represent the money they expended in helping to elect Government candidates. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries, as well as the leader of the Government, admitted that the Senate was partisan, and claimed that it was right and proper it should be so. The Premier said: I represent the people of the country; my party has been elected by an overwhelming vote of the people of the country, and here the representatives of the party in the Senate, in upholding me and in carrying out my views, are representing the views of the people of the country. That may be as long as the present Government remains in power. But how would it be supposing that in a year, or two, or three, or four, or five years, when every man in that House has been appointed for the sole and express purpose of supporting the policy of the present leader of the Government, how would it be supposing the other party came into power? Whom would they be bound to represent then? I am afraid they would just do as they have done in the past, endeavor to carry out the views of the hon. gentleman to whom they owe their existence. I need not point out to hon. gentlemen that this was the case when the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie was Premier of the Dominion. We all know that the Province of British Columbia had cause of complaint; that a solemn agreement with them had been violated; and when Mr. Mackenzie, with his usual honesty of purpose, attempted to give that Province compensation, he was baulked by the Senate, no doubt at the express wish of the hon. gentleman who leads the Government now. But, Sir, we have been told by the right hon. leader of the Government that the Senate is a necessity for the defence of the rights of the different Provinces. Will any hon. gentleman on the other side be kind enough to point out when the Senate ever took such a stand? I appeal to hon. gentlemen, without fear of contradiction, to say if I do not speak the literal truth when I declare that instead of protecting the rights of the Provinces, there has never been an attempt made during the last half dozen years, by the party now in power—and there have been very many—to deprive the Provinces of their rights, when that Senate came to the rescue of the Provinces. I defy hon. gentlemen to point out one single instance. What happened when the right hon. leader of the Government tried to grasp the licensing power from the Provinces? If ever there was a dishonest attempt made to seize that which did not belong to the Government, that was the one. For seventeen years, the right of the Provinces to issue licenses had gone unchallenged; it was distinctly understood at the time of Confederation, that that right should belong to them; and yet, in order to advance some party purpose, in order to gratify a private pique against the Government of Ontario, the right hon. gentleman tried to grasp that power, at a grievous expense to this country, in money, besides loss of time and expense of energy by the Provinces in frustrating him. Did the Senate, then, in any manner attempt to prevent the wrong that was being done to the Provinces? It was a matter of notoriety that the Bill was rushed through the Senate in a few minutes, without even being read; it was taken on trust. A friend suggests the Gerrymander Act, as another instance, one of the most infamous attempts on the liberties of the people that was ever made. In that case or in the case of the Franchise Bill, did the Senate make any attempt to right the wrongs that were being done? No, Sir. I believe the time is fast coming when a change will have to be made in the constitution of that body. It may have been modelled after the House of Lords; but one thing can be said of the House of Lords, that they are wise enough to comprehend the drift of public opinion. It is true, they sometimes show a disposition to resist popular will, but they have always sense enough to know when they have gone far enough, and to pause before coming into direct collision with the people; and if the time should ever come when the House of Lords shall try to obstruct the popular will, that day their doom is sealed and I for one would be ready to stand over the wreck, and say: "So perish all such relics of barbarism." It has been stated that the late Hon. George Brown was one of the most persistent advocates of an appointed Senate. I know that he was, and he was a consistent advocate of it; he was always opposed to an elective Senate, and Sir, it was one of the mistakes of his life. We standing here, now, responsible to the country, and to posterity for our acts, are we to be guided in our actions by the opinions of any man of the past? No, perish the thought. It is our duty to do what we believe to be right. It is our duty, whenever we find anything that we consider defective, to endeavor in a constitutional way to get it corrected; and the motion of the hon. member for Bothwell, although not everything I could wish, is a step in that direction, and I feel bond to give it my support.

Mr. WELDON. I wish to say a few words on this question before the vote is taken. I do not think it necessary to discuss what system shall be adopted. The question is simply whether the present constitution of the Senate answers the purpose which it was intended to answer. Hon. members who made a comparison between it and the House of Lords, forgot that the principle on which the Senate is created is entirely different from that on which the House of Lords is based. The House of Lords is hereditary; its members take their seats in it by virtue either of their elevation to the peerage, which extends beyond life, or by succession. But the principle of life peerages, the principle on which Senators are appointed, is entirely opposed to that on which the House of Lords is based, and it has been so decided by them. When the late Baron Parke was appointed a peer for life, the House of Lords took the matter up, and decided that life peerages should not be created. One of the objections then taken to these peerages was that they would enable a Ministry to swamp the House of Lords with peers appointed for life. So that when we compare the constitution of the Upper Chamber of this Dominion with that part of the British constitution, we find that they are utterly opposed to each other. The principle of our second Chamber, I take it, is an entirely wrong principle. At the time of Confederation the attempt was made to adopt the system in vogue in the Provinces, that of the Legislative Councils. For 17 years that system has been tried, and I think the feeling of the country is that there should be a change. The right hon. Premier said no change should be made unless some wrong could be shown; but we know that great and serious changes have been made in our constitution already. By the Gerrymander Act of 1882, the constitution was changed, and 55 constituencies in the Province of Ontario were altered; and for that Act no reason was shown, nor was it claimed that any wrong was created by the division made in the British North America Act itself. The Franchise Act was another alteration in the constitution; and if the right hon. leader of the Government has felt it necessary to make changes with regard to the constituencies and the electorate, surely the fact that the Senators were appointed originally for life is no reason why, if we find that a change is necessary, that change should not be made. There is another distinction between the Senate and the House of Lords. I think, with the exception of the time my hon. friend for East York was in power, there has never been one measure proposed by the Premier thrown out of or amended by the Senate. We find that the House of Lords deal with Government measures, discuss them calmly and dispassionately, and make serious amendments which the Government are often compelled to accept. But in this House we find that, so far as the Government are concerned, they pay very little regard to the consideration of what action may be taken by the Senate, knowing well that they will take whatever action the Government may dictate. My hon. friend from Lambton has also spoken with regard to appointments. When we look at the appointments lately made, we cannot but help feeling convinced that the mode adopted is not beneficial to the country. The Senate is, in fact, made a refuge, a sort of cave of Adullam, in which many supporters of the Government find a comfortable retreat. With regard to the last appointment to the Senate made from the Province of New Brunswick, if the Senate, as has been pointed out, was established for the purpose of protecting provincial rights, we are entitled to claim that the men appointed should be residents of the Provinces they are supposed to represent. I make no objection to the hon. Senator who was last appointed from New Brunswick, either on account of his race or creed, but I protest against an officer of the House of Commons being pitchforked into the Senate as a representative of the Province of New Brunswick. If there were no other reason, that would be sufficient to make me favor the resolution of my hon. friend. There is another principle with regard to the Senate, which has been pointed out, and verified by the action of the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson). He has stated that he is in favor of the principle of the resolution, but because he puts party above principle he is going to vote against it. It is because the Senate put party above principle, that I support this resolution.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I must congratulate the hon. member for East Quebec (Mr. Laurier) for having pronounced himself in favor of the Senate. In so doing he agrees, not only with the whole Conservative party but also with the immense majority of the population of his Province. I have noticed during this debate that several of the political friends of the hon. member for East Quebec do not hold the same views as he does with regard to the Senate. I have noticed that the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) has positively declared that he would vote in favor of the resolutions moved by the hon. member for Bothwell, because these resolutions were only a step towards the abolition of the Senate. Another member of the Opposition has declared that he would vote for these resolutions because they would make the Senate elective, and so would render it useless, as he did not see the necessity of having two Houses elected by the people. In this the hon. member is perfectly consistent, and for my part I do not see the necessity of having two Houses elected by the people. And what guarantee would that afford to the hon. members who are now complaining against the policy of the Government and against certain measures which are pretended to be or really are centralising measures and which have been voted by the Senate during the two last years? Would not the Franchise Bill have been voted by a House elected by the people whose would necessarily have been composed of Tories or of Conservatives from the Province of Quebec, for the Senate having been elected by the people at the same time as the members of the House of Commons, or at about the same time, a number of Conservative senators proportionately as great as the number of Conservative members of the House of Commons would have been elected? And I now ask the hon. members who are now complaining against the Senate because they have not rejected the Franchise Bill whether a House whose great majority would have been composed of Conservative senators would not have adopted the same policy? Evidently it would, and that argument is valueless in my opinion. If we examine the present composition of the Senate we find within it men who have occupied in this House the position of Ministers, who have even filled still higher positions in their respective Provinces—the position of Lieutenant Governor. I notice that the ex-Lieutenant Governor of the Province of Quebec is now a member of the Senate; after having occupied the position of Minister in this House he went to the Upper House. Is it not to be supposed that the experience of such a man is very useful with regard to the legislation which will be adopted by this House, and which will have to be revised by the Upper House? Mr. Speaker, I have been quite surprised at the position taken by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson), to whom I might give the very honorable title of apostle of temperance. That hon. gentleman has stated, in the first place, that he was quite favorable to the principle of the resolutions moved by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and then he made another statement none the less surprising when he declared that his confidence in the Government was greater than his distrust towards the Senate. It is a very good thing for the Senate that the hon. member should have so much confidence in the Government as otherwise there would have been danger for the existence of the Senate. There are many other considerations in favor of the maintenance of a non-elective Senate, as several measures have been adopted both in the Dominion and Local Parliaments which have been defeated in the Upper Houses. To corroborate that statement I will mention the fact that, in the Province of Quebec, the Legislative Council has thought fit on a certain occasion to refuse to vote the supplies which had been submitted to the Council by the Legislative Assembly, and the position taken on that occasion by the Legislative Council of the Province of Quebec was fully sanctioned a few weeks later by the popular vote. A short time after the Cabinet was starved out and they resigned. Another Cabinet was formed and shortly after they appealed to the people; and the immense majority of the Province of Quebec supported this new Government and voted against the former Government to whom the supplies had been refused by the Legislative Council. This is a very strong proof in favor of non-elective Upper Houses. Besides, Mr. Speaker, the Senate is composed in great part of politicians who have been through the House of Commons and who have acquired in this House great experience as regards politics and the affairs of the country, and I do not see that men appointed by the Government should be less qualified to fill the position of senators, whether they are appointed by a Conservative Government or by a Liberal Government; for whatever party may be in power it is their interest to appoint to the Senate the men who have had the most experience and who are best qualified to fill this high position. Now, I believe that the party in power by choosing from among the most distinguished politicians, men who have made their mark in this House must necessarily make as good a choice as if senators were elected by the people, who would be sure to send to the Upper House men who would be more or less young and often less experienced than those appointed by the Government. Mr. Speaker, I believe it would be quite dangerous to alter the present constitution of the Senate, and to do away with that trinity which exists in our constitution. All nations who have not respected the ground works of their constitutions, have found it impossible to prosper, and to exist for a long time. I consider that we have elections enough under our constitution, that frequent elections are a cause of demoralisation for the people, and that after the elective Senate, it is likely that a measure, for the abolition of the Senate, will be proposed, if we are to believe certain hon. gentlemen opposite, who have stated that the proposed mode of transformation of the Senate is only a step towards the abolition of the Senate. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I deem it my duty to vote against the resolutions of the hon. member for Bothwell, and to agree with those who desire that the groundwork of our constitution should be respected, and that the guarantees afforded by the Act of Confederation to the minorities of the various Provinces, should be preserved.

House divided on amendment of Mr. Mills.

(In the Committee.)

Salaries, military branch and district staff..... $17,000 00

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The decrease is caused by the retirement of the Deputy Adjutant General.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understand that a good many of the officers, whose salaries are voted under this head, have received notice, which is almost equivalent to the statement that their services will not be required after the expiration of a year or so. The Minister should inform the House what the policy of the Government is going to be with respect to these gentlemen who have been employed, some for longer and some for shorter periods. If it be the intention of the Government to dispense with the services of any of these officers, it is desirable the House should know the reason why.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Under one of my predecessors, Sir Alexander Campbell, a general order was issued, based upon an Order in Council, making all the staff appointments for a period of five years. This term of office expired about seven or eight months ago. During the critical period of the trouble of the North-West, I thought it would be not only inconvenient, but almost impossible for the Department to make any change and to dispense with the services of any of the officers composing the staff. However, this year I felt it my duty, as the policy of the Government had been already announced by that Order in Council, to inform the different officers on our staff that after next year they must consider that the Order in Council and the general order based upon it, must prevail. That does not at all mean that the services of these gentlemen will be dispensed with, but if it should be considered necessary, from the standpoint of the Department, or of economy, to dispense with the services of any gentleman, they cannot complain of what has been done.

Mr. O'BRIEN. There is something in the policy the Government are pursuing with regard to the staff which is open to very serious question. In the first place, the rule that these staff officers are to vacate their positions at the end of five years is altogether erroneous, because in a large country district it takes a staff officer two years, at least, thoroughly to know the district, and by the time the five years have elapsed, and he is to be changed to another district, he knows his district thoroughly. The system of changing men every five years is open to serious question. It impairs the efficiency of the officers, because in a large district they cannot become acquainted with their duties, with their men, with the position of the various companies, until a considerable period has elapsed. Considering the small salaries these officers get, it is rather hard upon them to be compelled to make these changes. The period for which an officer in the position of a brigade major or deputy adjutant-general should remain in one place, should not be less than ten years, if it is necessary at all that he should vacate his position at the end of a definite period. This rule places officers in the uncomfortable position of being in a state of uncertainty as to their period of service. If they know that, as a matter of absolute necessity, they must leave their positions at the end of a certain period, and take them on that understanding, they cannot complain, but, I think, there is nothing worse than for a man to be in a state of uncertainty. I would strongly recommend to the hon. Minister that the present incumbents of office, especially those who have been in the service for a long period of years, the salaries of whom were not large enough to enable them to put aside sufficient provision, and who are beyond the possibility of finding other employment, should be dealt with liberally. I hope the Department will act generously towards them, more particularly as they have done so with regard to other officers who have held similar positions.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. When the Supplementary Estimates are brought down, possibly my hon. friend will see that the long and valuable services to the force of the officers to whom he refers have been recognised as well as those of others who have been retired before.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Let us understand what the policy of the Government is. As I understand the order to which the Minister of Militia referred, it was that, after the period of five years, the various officers should be shifted. There was nothing to my recollection in that order about dismissing them, practically, from the service. If he is going to lay down the policy that, after a period of five or ten years, the officers who have held important commands are to be dismissed, whether they are competent to serve or not, that is one thing; and if he is going, as has been done in the English and other services, to fix an age limit at which the officers will retire, that of course is also worthy of consideration; but it is due to the force and to the House to know what the policy of the Government is. Do I understand the Minister to say that, in the space of a year or thereabouts, any or all of these officers are liable to be dismissed? Is that the policy?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes, they are liable.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Without reference to age?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman, if he refers to the order which I have referred to, the one issued by Sir Alexander Campbell when he was administering the Department of Militia, will find that, as in the English service, there was a period of age beyond which an officer would be retired.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What age?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Sixty-three. Besides, by that order it was also declared that an officer belonging to the staff would not hold the appointment beyond five years. It did not make it imperative upon the Government to dispense with his services after five years, but it left it to the discretion of the Government to utilise his services beyond that period, and I think, in answer more particularly to my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), that there is a good deal of reason in the policy which was adopted by my predecessor. These apppointments are really prizes, and, in a country like ours, not having a regular army, they are prizes which are sought after and which should be distributed, as much as possible, among the men who take an active interest in the militia force. I know that the salaries are not very large, but these prizes are really sought after much more than one would suppose, and I believe that, after five years, when a man in the position of deputy adjutant general or a brigade major, finds it is deemed necessary to dispense with his services under that order, he would have no reason to complain of the action of the Government in retiring him. Notwithstanding that order, we have availed ourselves of the services of gentlemen long after that period, and I would not wish it to be understood that in every case it is the intention of the Government, after five years, to make a complete sweep, a complete change as far as the militia staff is concerned; but if it is deemed advisable to do so, the officers who hold those positions cannot in any way complain of the action of the Government.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is fair, I think, as regards all the officers appointed after that order was passed, but there were a great many other officers who were appointed prior to the date of that order and whose appointment was expected to be permanent so long as they remained efficient. I recognise fully the propriety in military matters of fixing a time limit. No doubt, once or twice, we lose the services of a very good and valuable officer, but generally, I believe, in all services, French, English and continental generally, they have laid down the principle that, after a certain period, military men must expect to be retired; but the point which I urge and which I think the Minister will see the justice of is that, in deciding who is to retire, a distinction may very fairly be made between the officers appointed before and after the promulgation of that order, because they accepted the offices under different conditions.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I fully recognise the propriety of what the hon. gentleman has said. In the case of Colonel Denison, which I believe my hon. friend was referring to, and in that of Colonel Milsom, I made that distinction. I recognised the fact that they entered the force before the promulgation of that order and believed it was a permanent appointment, and from that standpoint I thought it was necessary and right and proper to treat them differently from the five-year-term men, who accepted the position knowing that after five years it was in the discretion of the Government to keep them or remove them.

Mr. VAIL. Who is the deputy adjutant general it is proposed to remove?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Colonel Denison who has been in charge of Military District No. 2, and Colonel Milsom, who is well known in the section of country which the hon. gentleman represents, and who has been acting as brigade major in the same district.

Mr. CASEY. There are one or two inconsistencies in the expenditure in this branch of which I would like to ask some explanation. I find that Colonel Irwin holds a sort of dual position, that he acts as commandant of a regiment of artillery which is supposed to exist, but, as C Battery which is required to make up the regiment has never been brought into existence, there is really no regiment of artillery. He received $456 last year for acting in that capacity, and he also received $2,300 as inspector of artillery, making a total of $2,756. When we compare that salary with the salaries of the deputy adjutants general, who are only, I see, to get $1,200 this year, according to the Estimate, there is a very strange discrepancy. The deputy adjutants general have full control and command of all the militia in their districts during active service, their duties are very onerous in times of peace, and their whole time is occupied in the business. If $1,200 is sufficient salary for them, I fail to see why it required more than $2,700 to pay Colonel Irwin. I see this year the estimate for Colonel Irwin is $1,800 as inspector of artillery, and, if he continues to receive the same amount of $450 for commanding this non-existing regiment of artillery, he will receive $2,250 instead of $2,700, but even at that rate it is $1,000 more than the deputy adjutants general receive. His duties are only to inspect the artillery, only about 2,000 in all, while many adjutants general have to look after more, some over 3,000 troops. That is, the duties in regard to these artillery inspectors are only the same as those of the deputy adjutants general in time of peace. I would like to know the reason for this great discrepancy between the salaries.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I do not know how the hon. gentleman can arrive at the conclusion that there is no regiment of artillery because C Battery is not organised.

Mr. CASEY. Because it requires three batteries to make a regiment of artillery.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. But the number of men who compose the two batteries, A and B, are quite sufficient to form a regiment. The regiment may be more or less strong, but that does not prevent it from being the Canadian regiment of artillery as it has been constituted for two years. The hon. gentleman thinks that the pay given to Lieut. Colonel Irwin is larger than it ought to be, as compared with the pay granted to the deputy adjutants general. The hon. gentleman must remember that Colonel Irwin is inspector of warlike stores, as well as of artillery, for the Dominion of Canada. This is a very important position, and requires a great deal of military knowledge of that branch of the service, and calls for a great deal of responsibility from the person who occupies that position. For those duties he gets $1,800 and his staff allowances —for he has to travel a good deal—making altogether $2,300. It is one of the most important positions in the Department and in the service, after that of major general commanding the forces, and that of adjutant general. He is really in command. The hon. gentleman says that compared with a deputy adjutant general the number of men under his command would be very small indeed. But the hon. gentleman must remember that from the Atlantic to the Pacific Colonel Irwin is in charge of and responsible for the management of the artillery force. I think these facts justify the discrimination in his favor, possibly, as against the position held by the deputy adjutants general, a most responsible and important position, but not one that calls for the same amount of responsibility and travel and work as that incurred by the inspector of artilleries and warlike stores. He is at headquarters, where he has to direct; and is practically the head of that branch of the service.

Mr. CASEY. The Minister says that there are men enough in two batteries to form a regiment. When we established the regiment of artillery it was to consist of A, B and C Batteries.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The two batteries, A and B, have 150 men each, rank and file, and that makes 300 men, taking in the officers.

Mr. CASEY. Was there not some special authority given for constituting a regiment of artillery?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No. It was done by departmental regulation.

Mr. CASEY. Then the Minister thinks the duty of commanding this regiment of artillery is worth $1.50 a day.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. He is inspector.

Mr. CASEY. As commandant of the regiment of artillery he received $457.25 last year. Now, if he actually performed any duties as commander, I think he was underpaid; if the position is merely nominal, he was over-paid. I confess I do not understand what are the duties of commandant of this regiment of artillery. He was in command of the regiment in the field, I suppose. Were the batteries commanded by their own lieutenant colonels when they were on active service, or were they commanded by Colonel Irwin? In the first place I would ask, what are the duties of Colonel Irwin as commandant of the regiment of artillery?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I can only tell the hon. gentleman that as commandant his duties are to look after his regiment.

Mr. CASEY. Oh! but he does not.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Well, but he does.

Mr. CASEY. In actual service?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes, he does. The commandant may command his battalion and still not be on active service. His duty is at headquarters here, and all the regimental orders have to go through Colonel Irwin, just as every regimental order goes through the colonel of any other regiment.

Mr. CASEY. Do regimental orders emanate from him?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes.

Mr. CASEY. Does he issue orders to them in the field?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes, as commandant.

Mr. CASEY. Then, did Colonel Irwin, at headquarters, direct the movements of those batteries in the North-West, or were they commanded by others?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman knows that is too simple a question to require an answer. He must know that when the batteries were at the front they were under the orders of the Major General who commanded every regiment.

Mr. CASEY. I know it is too simple to ask seriously, and merely put it to bring out the statement that has been made. And Colonel Irwin made it his headquarters here, and having really nothing to do with the batteries, was practically, to all intents and purposes, an ornamental attachment. That is all I can make out of it. No one imagines that Colonel Irwin actually commanded those batteries, but as nominal commandant he gets $1.50 a day. Now as to the inspection of artillery. The Minister states that the inspector has serious responsibilities and valuable stores under his care which require him to travel all over the Dominion. But he has two assistants in the inspection of the artillery, Colonels Cotton and Montizambert, commanders of the batteries. So that Colonel Irwin does not have to go all over the Dominion to inspect the artillery. No part of this money, of course, goes for travelling expenses. If he travels of course his expenses must be paid. But, I fail to see that the Minister has made out any case why a thousand dollars difference is made in the salaries. I fancy that in the Toronto district, or Quebec district, or wherever there is a considerable amount of military stores, the deputy adjutants general have quite as much property to care for as the inspector of artillery. No reason has been given for this discrepancy. I find that Colonel Holmes got last year over $2,900 as commandant of C Battery, that is the battery which does not exist, which leaves the regiment of artillery incomplete. I find that on page 204 of the Auditor General's report.

Mr. MULOCK. He has a force, he has a sergeant?

Mr. CASEY. I believe he has, and for commanding that sergeant he gets $2,920. I have no doubt that in his case command is more actual than that of Colonel Irwin, because he has to superintend that large force. As deputy-adjutant of British Columbia he also gets $365. The Department evidently values the services of an adjutant general for British Columbia at $1 per day while it values the services of the commander of one sergeant at $2,920.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Has the Minister considered the case of those volunteers who fell sick at the annual drill at Toronto a few years ago. They suffered a good deal, and lost a great deal of their time and money. At that time the Minister, I think, did not consider all the facts of the case. Now that he has found out the value to the country of our soldiers I hope he will be prepared to make some compensation and will pay the volunteers that which they are justly entitled to.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. In regard to Colonel Holmes, who is the commandant of the military district in British Columbia, the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) seems to be blowing hot and cold. Some time ago he complained that the deputy adjutants general were not sufficiently well paid. Now he complains that Colonel Holmes gets more money than he should receive. The hon. gentleman should remember one thing, which has been explained already. Colonel Holmes was placed in command of Battery C, which is to be organised, and which, from the information which the hon. gentleman no doubt has received from official sources, is now composed of one sergeant only.

Mr. CASEY. I received it from my friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) to-night.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The British Columbia military district is a very extensive one, and it is of great importance to the Dominion on account of its strategic value. Colonel Holmes receives as commandant of the Artillery School, or C Battery, the same pay which is given to commandants of the other artillery schools in the Dominion; and he received it both last year and this year. He received besides a small payment to represent the extra work he naturally would be supposed to do as deputy adjutant general, for the formation of that school is not yet completed. The Imperial and Canadian Governments have been in communication, and the result of the interchange of despatches between the two countries is that that artillery school will be formed out of men drawn from the naval reserve in England and pensioners who receive pensions from the Imperial Government. The great difficulty the Department encountered in organising C Battery, in British Colombia, was the fact of the limited labor market there, and that it was almost impossible to get men for the pay given to regulars. From the fact that the Imperial Government has consented to allow pensioners who will become incorporated into our Canadian force to draw their Imperial pensions and become Canadian soldiers, under the command of Canadian officers will enable us to organise C Battery, and make it, I hope, as successful as either A or B Batteries. Moreover, it is of the greatest possible importance to have a force properly organised in British Columbia, the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and a Province far removed from the other portions of the Dominion. The position which Colonel Holmes now occupies is one of very considerable responsibility. It is true that for the last two years he has not been in command of a battery which is not complete, so far as numbers are concerned, but which will be completed in a short period. I expect in the Estimates we shall be called on to vote money for the purpose of erecting the necessary buildings in British Columbia. As to the question put by the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Landerkin) I have reconsidered it almost every year as the hon. gentleman in his zeal has brought it before the House. The conclusion at which I arrived previously was based upon the decision of the doctors who had been consulted in the case, and I thought I could not do better than follow their ideas.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister of Militia states that Colonel Holmes is in receipt of a salary of $2,920. It is not necessary for us to seek information from official sources. At page 204 of the Auditor General's report we are informed that Lieutenant Colonel J. G. Holmes received pay for one year at $8 per day, amounting to $2,920, for commanding a staff composed of Staff Sergeant T. Kinsella, who received 75 cents a day. T. Kinsella also received as compensation in lieu of clothing to the amount of $37.62. This force was for the protection of our coast in the west and the cost was $3,231. I am sure the country will feel absolutely safe that our western shores are in safe hands.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Could not the Minister give just a little from the salary of that officer and pay those volunteers.

Mr. CASEY. When we have again rumors of a Russian difficulty, and when we again hear that Russian cruisers have been seen in the vicinity of British Columbia harbors, we will put our faith in Col. Holmes and Staff Sergeant Kinsella. But it is a little odd that out of a total payment of $3,231, no less than $2,920 should go to the commanding officer and the rest to one sergeant. The Minister's explanation has not made matters any different. He has said I complained because the deputy adjutants general were not sufficiently paid. I did not. I complained that Colonel Irwin was paid too much, and I have the same complaint to make about Colonel Holmes. The Minister also said that Colonel Holmes was paid the same as the other commandants of batteries. Now, if I am not mistaken, Colonel Montizambert and Colonel Cotton were paid for all their duties, as commandants and as assistant inspectors of artillery, only $2,208 a piece, of which only $1,600 was for commanding batteries A and B. So that Colonel Holmes really gets $1,000 more for commanding a battery composed of one sergeant than they get for commanding full batteries, and, as the hon. gentleman said, large batteries of 150 men each. Now, he said in a very naive manner that for the additional duties of acting as deputy adjutant general Colonel Holmes got an extra allowance of $1 per day, or $365 per annum, in addition. I am not aware how many volunteers there are in British Columbia, but I believe there are at least three or four hundred, so that he gets about one eighth or one-ninth as much for acting as deputy adjutant general for those volunteers as for acting as commandant for that one sergeant. Now if Colonel Holmes is intended to be employed and paid as deputy adjutant general, then he should appear on the Public Accounts as such. Even in that case it would be absurd to pay him as much as the deputy adjutants general in the large districts of Quebec and Ontario whose duties are so much heavier. The whole arrangement seems to me so remarkably absurd and unfair that the Minister should give some explanation of it to make it less so, or else he should reduce the pay of Colonel Holmes so that it would be equal to that of these other gentlemen who really have some duties to perform. The hon. gentleman says the battery is growing though it is not completely manned. Will he tell us how many there are in the battery at present?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I shall give the hon. gentleman all the information I possibly can, and I have no doubt it will satisfy him. The extra amount he has referred to as being so extravagant is merely to meet the allowances which Colonels Cotton and Montizambert receive in the shape of fuel, barrack accommodation, &c., that is not to be found in British Columbia, because we have not got the school of artillery organised as we have in Quebec and Kingston. The hon. gentleman must know that, previous to Colonel Holmes being sent there, he had been a deputy adjutant general and was paid like other officers of that class in other parts of the Dominion. Moreover, Parliament adopted the policy of organising a battery in British Columbia. It was necessary to send another commandant to take charge of that battery, and I thought it was an economy to place the whole military district—as I had done the others—in the hands of the commandant of the artillery school. When the school is organised—which I hope will be within a short period of time—the hon. gentleman will find that the school is under the command of Colonel Holmes, and the military district will also be under his command. When barrack accommodation is given him, like the other commandants of military schools, he will receive, in the shape of fuel and light, and other allowances, the amount of money which is paid to him to meet his expenses which he is entitled to receive, as other officers in his position receive, from the Government. That is really the explanation the hon. gentleman asked me to give him.

Mr. CASEY. The question with which I concluded, was whether the Minister could tell how many men are in the battery at present.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am expecting the news every day. They are gradually increasing, but I could not tell the hon. gentleman at present.

Mr. CASEY. I do not think it is very hard to count them. The hon. gentleman's explanation of this increase of salary is simply, that because there is no barrack accommodation and no school of artillery to command, he gives Colonel Holmes as much, in addition to his regelar salary, as the other commandants receive in the shape of barrack accommodation, fuel, light, &c. I think it is the lamest and most absurd excuse that could be given. I would ask him if an armament has been obtained for Battery C?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. We have a large number of guns in British Columbia—much larger than are required to arm this battery.

Mr. CASEY. Field guns?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. We have all sorts of guns up there—field guns, garrison guns and pop-guns.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria.) Some of the big guns are over here just now.

Mr. MULOCK. For how long a time has Colonel Holmes been drawing this salary?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I think he was appointed about two years ago.

Mr. MULOCK. Was he appointed then as commandant of Battery C.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. And for two years he has been drawing this salary, and not discharging any of the duties of that office.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I have already explained the difficulty we had in finding men to organise the British Columbia battery at the time; but the school has now arrived at such a stage that I expect it will, in a very short time, be completed. When appointed, Colonel Holmes was appointed not only as commandant of that school, but as deputy adjutant general of the district. He is a very able officer, and has made very valuable reports, and I do not consider the salary excessive.

Mr. CASEY. The difficulty of getting men is a good reason for not filling up the school; but that was no reason for continuing the salary. If the Colonel's other duties require a salary, it should be given to him under that heading, and it is utterly misleading and improper to put items in the Estimates to pay a man for certain services when they are meant to pay him for services in another capacity. The people ought to know what they are paying for. The hon. Minister tells us that before this school was created, there was a deputy adjutant general in British Columbia who was paid as deputy adjutants general were in other Provinces. Why did he not revert to that plan when he found it impossible to get a school together?

Mr. MULOCK. I wish to ask the Minister of Militia when he proposes to bring down to the House the report of the board which was appointed to enquire into the war claims. I submit that that report should have been on the Table before we were asked to consider these militia estimates at all. The very first item in these estimates is the salary of General Middleton. That report has been promised to us, and although we are in the third month of the Session, we have not yet seen it.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I think the hon. gentleman will admit that we have done really more than could be expected of any Department. In the very middle of the Session we were still settling up claims. Every day since the unfortunate troubles in the North West closed, the commission was kept busy night and day investigating those claims, which had to be submitted for my approval before being paid. The whole history of that campaign is in this report. When an hon. gentleman asked me when it would be down, I said in a day or two, and since that time I have telegraphed to the printer, and I have ascertained that, although he is working on it night and day, it is impossible for him to hurry it. I hope it will be down in a few days, but I cannot be held responsible if it is delayed beyond the time I expect. Knowing how difficult and almost impossible it was for the commission to arrive at a conclusion before Parliament met, I say they have done very well indeed, and as soon as it is possible to bring down the report it will be brought down, probably in the beginning of next week.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where is this report being printed?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. In Quebec or Montreal, I cannot exactly say.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the object of printing it at Quebec or Montreal? This report, for which General Middleton is responsible, ought to be printed here, I should say.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The correction of the proof sheets required special supervision; and one of the members of the commission, Colonel Forrest, was charged with the correction of the principal and most extensive part of the report. That is the reason the Order in Council was passed allowing it to be printed outside of the Queen's printing office.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). Are the commission still in session, or have they closed their labors?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. They have not now and have not been for a long time, under pay, except the chairman, Colonel Jackson; but it will be necessary to call the commission again, because since they have sent in their report, we have received other claims which must be investigated; and that commission, being composed of officers who were in charge of the various departments during the troubles, and who are thoroughly acquainted with everything connected with them, will naturally have to investigate those claims. But there are very few, and I expect that a couple or three days will be quite sufficient to close the labor of the commission.

Mr. LANGELIER. At what establishment in Quebec is the report being printed?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It was given to the Quebec Morning Chronicle.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). Are they printing it?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I expect so. I do not know what arrangements they have made for the printing, but they are responsible to us.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). Perhaps the Minister will also tell the committee when the report of the field operations in the North West will be submitted, or is it part of the same report?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The report of the Major General commanding, and the reports of the commandants of the various columns, all form part of that report, which also includes all the war claims. I though it better to make one special report of all the transactions, including the field operations and the expenses of the campaign, and I hope it will be considered interesting.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It seems to me the House has not been treated well or fairly on this point. There are two distinct subjects included in this: One of very great general interest, not merely to this House, but to this country, the reports of the officers in command of the various columns. These could, with great ease, have been laid on the Table when we met, as they must have all been in before the 1st of January.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They ought to have been in before the 1st of January. There is no excuse, where field operations terminated at or about the 1st of August, why the reports of the various officers should not have been in the hands of the Department long before the 1st of January. These certainly ought to have been printed and laid before the House. Now, what is the result? The result is that we are not in the possession of the leading facts in respect to the operations and the war claims, which we require to enable us to discuss the matter intelligently. I cannot see why the Government could not have brought down these reports at the opening of the Session. If there were difficulties, as I can understand there would be, in settling the war claims, that is all the more reason why the other reports should have been disposed of first. What were the several officers who sat on the commission engaged in? Colonel Forrest was acting chief of the transport, but in what capacity were the other two employed?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Colonel Jackson was sent at the beginning of the outbreak and put in charge of the whole commissariat department at Winnipeg; Colonel Forrest was sent to the front and became paymaster for all of the columns that were sent to the front. After a certain period of time it became necessary to give to Colonel Jackson, who was overworked, assistance, and we sent up Colonel Whitehead, who became chief of the transport service particularly, and these three officers were selected to form a commission to investigate the war claims.

Brigade majors' salaries, transport service, &c... $12,700 00

Mr. MULOCK. I would like to ask the Minister of Militia when he will place the report in the hands of the printer?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I cannot say the day, but will be happy to give all the information on concurrence, if that will satisfy the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MULOCK. That will not satisfy me.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am sorry I cannot satisfy the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MULOCK. We are being treated in the most cavalier way by the hon. Minister. There is a well founded opinion in the country that the Militia Department, so far as the management is concerned, is broken down, and we want no further evidence of this than the fact that the hon. gentleman is now trifling with the House and country by withholding this important information. He admits he has taken the report of the general commanding and locked it up until he could couple it with the other reports.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I did not say that.

Mr. MULOCK. I take what the hon. gentleman has stated, and that proves the case against him. He admits he has done what any man would condemn as—shall I say, stupid? Or it was done by design to conceal the report. He is combining two reports which are in no way connected with each other, and therefore makes the one wait upon the other. What else does he do? When the report has to go through the printer's hands, he sends it to his own constituency.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is not my own constituency.

Mr. MULOCK. To his own constituent.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is not my constituent.

Mr. MULOCK. And he sends it there, he says, because he required the presence of a military man to correct the proofs. But why not have brought the military man up and let him correct the proofs here? When asked what he did with the report, he said he did not know; it might have been printed in Montreal or Quebec, but, on being questioned by the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Langelier), he said it was printed in Quebec. He remembered that very suddenly. Did he not remember, when first asked what he had done with that draft, where he had sent it? This transaction presents a most unsatisfactory appearance, and it is unbecoming the Minister of Militia, who has been treated with generosity in excess of his deserts, to treat the people of Canada in this way. He asks us, at the last days of the Session, to pass upon these estimates and let this House adjourn, without giving us the means of having a proper examination into the various matters which affect his Department. If there is a man in Canada who is bound to act in good faith, it is the hon. gentleman. Hon. members may laugh, but for a man who has received what the Minister of Militia has received from the Crown and the country—for him to have allowed his Major General commanding to suppress a report, to keep his report in private, or not discharge his duty of preparing a report during six months, and not laying it on the Table, shows that either the Minister or the Major General is incompetent, or that both are incompetent. A great many believe that both are incompetent. I am not one of those, I am not going to express my personal opinion as to the Major General, but I may say I have never recovered confidence in the Minister of Militia after the way he undermined and drove from the country, the officer who commanded our forces previous to the coming of General Middleton. He drove him in an unmanly way from the country, and on that occasion the First Minister——

Mr. O'BRIEN. I rise to a point of order. We are discussing the question of brigade major's salaries and transport expenses, with which General Luard has nothing to do. If anybody has been unfairly treated, it is the hon. the Minister.

Mr. MULOCK. It is all right for an officer to defend his Minister, but I have a right to discuss——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. You have the right to discuss only the item before the Chair.

Mr. MULOCK. When an hon. member addresses me in that way, I have a right to say why his opinion is what it is.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I raise the question of order. The hon. gentleman has the right to discuss the question of brigade major's salaries, and nothing else.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I have already said he is out of order.

Mr. MULOCK. I am not dwelling on the subject now. I was simply asserting, when interrupted by the hon. gentleman, who is in the service, and I cannot expect him to do otherwise than to defend his superior officer——

Mr. O'BRIEN. He is not my superior officer in any sense.

Mr. MULOCK. To come back to this question, the Minister of Militia, when I first asked the question, when we would have the report, said we would have it in a few days; but we have the announcement of another Minister that the House will prorogue in a few days. We ought not to proceed to discuss these militia estimates, involving so much that concerns the management of the Department and the campaign, without having the report before the committee.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). There is still further reason why the Minister should really not proceed with the estimates to-night. The ordinary report of the Department has been brought down to the 30th December last. It is clear that the operations which closed in the middle of the year should be before the committee to enable us to discuss the estimates with a full knowledge of details. There are facts in connection with the two items, the one just passed and the one under discussion, into which I would like to make further enquiries. Some of the gentlemen, whose names appear in the report of last year, have been mentioned here as having been at headquarters investigating accounts. I refer particularly to Lieut.-Colonel Jackson. He is permanently in the employ of the Militia Department as a deputy adjutant general, and I understand he is engaged on a commission examining the accounts that were contracted while the operations were in progress in the North-West, and that he was also employed during those operations. Did he draw any other pay than that of deputy adjutant general, during the time that he was so employed?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. He did receive extra pay.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). Was it his regimental pay that he drew?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). I do not know how the committee may look upon that, but I take decided exception to it. If the pay Parliament have provided for a deputy adjutant-general is not enough, it should be increased, but I have always assumed that the deputy adjutants general were in the permanent employ of the Government, just as those in A and B Batteries or in the schools, and that their services are available for any purpose the country requires. Making an exception of this kind is unfair to the country and to others similarly employed. I can understand any one in the civil employment of the Government, who is attached as a volunteer to any of the battalions, being also entitled when called out to draw the pay of his rank, but that is not the position which the country expected these men to occupy. When they were allowed their field allowance, in addition to the pay the House provided, that sum ought to have been ample. I gathered from the discussion on the appointment of a commandant to the school in British Columbia that it was the ultimate intention of the Minister to transfer the districts to the command of whoever happened to be the commandants of the permanent force in the particular localities. Do I understand that that is the policy of the Government in British Columbia solely or throughout the Dominion?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Lieutenant Colonel Jackson was receiving his pay as lieutenant colonel when he went up to Winnipeg. I think most hon. gentlemen will agree that, for the most extraordinary arduous duties which he was called upon to perform, it would be unfair to expect him to do the work without extra allowance. For weeks we expected almost to have to bring him back to his own district, from the fact that he had been worked to such an extent, sitting up night and day for weeks at a time, that his general health broke down. I for one would not have agreed to send him up to fill the very important and responsible position which he did fill, and filled very well indeed, if he had gone simply on the pay of a deputy adjutant general. I think he has not been paid too much for the services he has performed. The reductions made by that very commission of which he was president, have resulted in saving an enormous amount of money to the country. According to the reports contained in papers representing the side of politics to which the hon. gentleman belongs, it was probable from the great incapacity of the Minister of Militia, as the hon. gentleman so very courteously stated, or of those composing the Department of Militia, the amount of war claims would approach $10,000,000, but, by the exertions of men like Col. Jackson, and possibly by a little supervision on the part of the Minister, the amount has been reduced to a little more than $5,000,000; which very few people expected in view of the enormous expense we had for transport service and otherwise. It is the policy of the Department to do, as much as possible, what we have done in the district of New Brunswick, placing under the command of the commandant of our regular school or infantry corps or artillery corps, whatever branch of the service it may be, the command of the military district. It is far better that an officer who is continually attending to the military organisation of our permanent force should be placed in command of the military district. We sometimes have to add a lieutenant who helps him in looking after the correspondence, and so forth, which is required to administer the military district, but we have found the plan more economical and a great improvement on the old system. The reports are sent in regularly like the reports from the military schools, and the Department has found it an advantage to have the command as much as possible centralised in the hands of the commandant of the school.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the hon. gentleman be able to lay those reports on the Table before concurrence? Will he engage to do that?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I do not want to engage to do more than I have said. I telegraphed, and the answer was such that I expect they will be here by Monday or Tuesday, and as soon as they do come they will be placed on the Table. I have done all in my power to get them before. The report of the Major General only reached me in February, and there were several reports which came from the expeditionary column of General Strange which had to be deferred because these claims had to be investigated, and it was impossible to make any report until all the information was brought down. I hope in a day or two to have them, it may possibly be Monday, or Tuesday, or Wednesday, but I am doing all I can to hasten the production of the report.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. At any rate, the hon. gentleman expects them in the course of next week?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I do.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think we ought to have them before concurrence. Are any claims for losses by Indians or Metis included in these war claims?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No; those are entirely outside of my report. All the claims are for transport, and purchase of provisions, and whatever purchase we had to make in the shape of ammunition; but there is no claim whatever for any damage or loss caused in consequence of the campaign.

Mr. VAIL. While it was no doubt commendable of my hon. friend from Middlesex (Mr. Cameron) to ask the question, I must say that I have no fault to find with the Minister of Militia for the course he has taken in regard to Colonel Jackson. I do not think it would have been fair to take a deputy adjutant general from his district and send him to the North-West on active service, and call upon him to perform arduous duties there without giving him the same pay that other officers receive for a like service. In connection with the $1,200 reduction for the brigade majors, I understood the Minister to say that he intended to dispense with the services of Colonel Milsom, for the reason that he had accepted his position subsequent to the time this arrangement was made of transferring brigade majors from one part of the Dominion to another. I think that is hardly fair to Colonel Milsom. He is one of the oldest officers in the service, and was in the service in Nova Scotia for a long time before he was removed, against his own wishes, to Toronto. He was in military service before he joined the volunteer force, and I think it is hard that he should be cut off from service at his age. I think the Minister ought to consider his case.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am glad to inform the hon. gentleman that I did consider Colonel Milsom's position, and he has been granted a retiring allowance, and so far as I can judge from what some of his friends tell me, he is satisfied. The trouble was to discriminate in his case, he joined the service twenty-nine years ago. He must have expected that he could not have a permanent appointment, and I made the difference in his case and granted him the retiring allowance.

Mr. LANGELIER. Amongst those whose salaries are included in this and the following items, are Colonels Taschereau, Duchesnay and Forrest. It is to my knowledge that they occupy buildings belonging to the Government in Quebec, some of them worth at least $300 a year. They are very efficient officers and I have nothing to say against them, but I would like to ask if they get those buildings free, or are they included in the salaries mentioned in the report?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It has been the invariable practice, wherever we had military quarters, to give them to our officers for their use. We have done this in Quebec and Kingston and other places. In the case of the gentlemen mentioned by my hon. friend, they do occupy the military quarters in Quebec on the property which was handed over to Canada by the Imperial Government. I only regret that it is not possible for the department to give quarters to our officers in all the other districts where there is military property.

Mr. VAIL. In reference to Colonel Milsom, I think he has some claim upon us. He fought in the Crimean war, at the battle either of Inkerman or the Redan. He was sergeant, and every officer above him was killed, and he alone came out with his company. He has been a good officer, and has been in the service so long that he deserves favorable consideration.

Ammunition, clothing and military stores..... $205,000 00

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. A large sum of this is for the cartridge factory at Quebec. It cannot have escaped the attention of the Minister that there is considerable complaints as to the quality of the ammunition supplied. A good deal was said at the time of the operations in the North-West as to the inferior qualities of much of the gun ammunition as well as the rifle ammunition which was served out to the troops. A good many reports reached us from men who were in the field, tending to show that much of that ammunition was perfectly worthless. I would like to know what is the result of the manufacture of cartridges at Quebec.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. A few days ago I brought down the report of the commission appointed by the Department to investigate the whole question of the cartridge factory. This commission was composed of those most interested in rifle associations all over the Dominion, and from the character of those gentlemen their report can be implicily relied upon. The gentlemen on that commission were asked to visit the cartridge factory at Quebec, and to superintend the manufacture of the cartridge itself. Speaking from memory, I can say that the report found that the machinery was excellent, that all the different component parts of the cartridge, which were somewhat complicated, were perfectly manufactured. I need not explain that that ammunition is a test ammunition, from the fact that it requires the greatest possible accuracy in the manufacture of a cartridge for target practice. It was found that if any deficiency existed it was due to the powder itself. The powder was not as perfect as it might be, and the report goes into the scientific explanation of the powder, and the number of grains which are required to make the cartridge perfect. It was found that the powder furnished us by the Hamilton Powder Company was not as perfect as the powder which we used when the cartridge factory was first started, and which we got from England at the Waltham Abbey Royal Gunpowder Factory. On receiving the report I immediately gave instruction to get out from Halifax a certain portion of powder required, and I ordered a certain other quantity from England for the manufacture of the cartridges to be served out to our force for rifle practice and other purposes. The commissioners say that there is no reason why powder could not be manufactured by the Hamilton Powder Company, or any other Canadian company manufacturing powder; why that powder should not be just as perfect as that imported from England. The report also suggests that the powder should be manufactured upon a specification which is to be furnished by the Department. The powder was submitted to the anyalist at the Royal Military College, Kingston, and every effort was made to make that report one that could be looked upon as final in respect to the manufacture of our Canadian cartridges. When the hon. gentleman reads it he will find that in that experiment the cartridge factory has been a success; but I admit that in that particular detail, and a very important detail it is, it has not come up to the ammunition which we import from England or manufactured in Canada out of powder imported from England.

Mr. WATSON. I am glad to know that the Minister's attention has been called to the fact that the ammunition from the Quebec cartridge factory has not been as good as it should have been. That factory seems to have been a success—the only failure has been that it has failed to turn out good powder. The attention of the House was called to this a year ago, and it was pointed out that some of the ammunition was not good. I expected to see a report from Colonel Houghton of practical tests made with the ammunition, but I have failed to find such a report. The Colonel has complained of the ammunition for two or three years, although the complaint is not embodied in the reports laid on the Table. Last year, at the close of the shooting season, he made a practical test. I am not exactly sure of the figures, but the result runs in this way: Cartridge of 1879, that is, the old country cartridge, was placed at 10 per cent. discount. The cartridge of 1883, that is, the first cartridge made in the Quebec factory, was placed at 5 per cent. and the cartridges of 1885 at par. A man shooting had choice of ammunition, and those who took the 1879 cartridges, the old country cartridges, made the largest scores. I was a little surprised the other day to hear the Minister, in answer to a question regarding that report, state that it would be found that while the ammunition was not probably good enough for target practice, yet it would be good enough for field duties. According to my idea, the best ammunition is required to be supplied to forces in the field, and if this had been done there would probably have been fewer people killed in the North-West troubles. In fact, one person present at Batoche said that about 250 men were shooting at one Indian several times in the day at a range of about 400 yards, and I believe the Indian got away. This was on account of the inferiority of the ammunition. I am probably not a very good shot, but I have used some ammunition of 1879 and 1885 and I have done better shooting with the former. It appears, as the Minister stated, that the fault was that there was not enough force in the powder.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Too much force.

Mr. WATSON. With respect to the 1885 cartridges I have seen the powder was not sufficiently strong and was not at all even. If there is any defective ammunition as there appears to be, it should be destroyed and not placed in the hands of men who are risking their lives and expect to protect themselves by the use of it.

Mr. CASEY. I quite agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson), and I think the country will agree with me that the time when you require good ammunition is when you are risking your life. "Trust in God and keep your powder dry" is the old English motto. When our men were sent to the North-West and were called on to face men who were in some cases better armed, it was essential that their ammunition should be of the very best quality. The Minister said he thought the ammunition in question would do for use in the field, though not for target practice.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I never said that.

Mr. CASEY. If the hon. gentleman will look at Hansard he will find that his words were to this effect, that while the ammunition might not be good enough for target practice it would be good enough for field service. The service in the North-West largely consisted of potting at Indians who were under cover of bushes or the edge of a ravine, and it was of the utmost importance that the ammunition should shoot evenly and correctly. It did not matter so much whether the cartridges were strong or weak; we have often had a lot of weak cartridges and done good shooting with them after we have got the elevation, but they were uniform. The great fault with these Quebec cartridges was that they were not uniform. The Minister has correctly stated that this was due to the powder. It appears that this powder was obtained from the Hamilton Powder Works. The Department sent a sample of powder to Hamilton, with an order for similar powder to be manufactured, without sending any specifications. The powder obtained was a mixed grain powder. It was made of pretty good material, but it was all mixed and of different force and of different grain. The result of this difference in grain was that the powder did not explode evenly. It was good material, but it was badly compounded, and the saltpetre, sulphur and carbon burned separately instead of exploding together. Mixed with the coarse grains were fine grains, and these exploded more rapidly than the coarse grains. These imperfections were due to the carelessness of the authorities at the Quebec cartridge factory in not ordering powder according to distinct specifications. Since the report of the commission, the Department has ordered powder based on certain specifications, as it should have done at the outset. From having bad cartridges our volunteers in the North-West were unable to do as much execution amongst their assailants as they should have done, owing to the irregular and erratic action of their cartridges. I do not know whether Major Prévost communicated with the Minister before obtaining that powder. If he did, the responsibility comes further home, but if he did not, then it rests upon him. I must at the same time corroborate what the Minister has said, that the report does speak in the highest terms of the mechanical perfection of the metallic parts of the cartridges, with one or two slight exceptions. Now, Sir, that is the theory. As a matter of practice it was found, not only in the North-West, but on the ranges here, that this ammunition did shoot in a most unsatisfactory manner. I have copies of some letters which passed between the Militia Department and different volunteer officers and officers of rifle associations, with regard to this ammunition. I supposed that some of the officers on active service would have reported on this ammunition, but I have not found their reports here. One of the letters I shall read is from Captain Perley of this city. After some preliminaries, he refers to a letter of Major Prévost of the 20th May:

"I note in Major Prévost's letter of the 20th May, that he charges this splitting of the shells to defects in the rifles used, and further that the powder in the cartridges fired on the 14th of May was of English make. Be this as it may, the fact remains that many cartridges split, and in some instances split badly."

There are perhaps some gentlemen in the House who do not realise the effect of a cartridge splitting the chamber. In the first place, there is an escape of gas which weakens the discharge. In the second place, the split shell jams into the breech, and cannot be extracted without a ramrod to knock it out. He goes on:

"I have been engaged in shooting with the Snider-Enfield since 1874, and have fired and seen others fire many, very many thousands of rounds of English cartridges from rifles of all classes, that is from those of the special make"——

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I rise to a point of order. I would like to ask if the hon. gentleman is speaking to the question before the Chair.

Mr. CASEY. If the hon. gentleman will come a little nearer he will find that I am right on the bull's eye.——

"of a private manufacturer, to the old well-worn, badly used rack rifle of a battalion, and I can safely assert that during the ten years which have passed, I never saw so many split shells as I saw on the 14th May last.

"Major Prévost has stated that the cartridges used on the 14th May were filled with English powder. With all deference to this statement, I trust you will pardon my saying that I have my doubts respecting it, because I never saw English shells split as Canadian have done, and this splitting is entirely due to faulty powder, which that of English make cannot be called.

"That this splitting still continues I have been made aware, for I have been shown a number of shells which were fired during the matches held on the 29th June, ult., on the Lévis Range, which were split and ruptured in the same manner as those I saw taken from rifles on the 14th May."

He incorporates in his letter a cutting from the Montreal Gazette (and therefore quite correct), which gives the scores of some individuals on that occasion, over the same ranges on the same day and with the same rifles, but with English cartridges on one occasion and Canadian on the other. They are as follows:—

"The scores of the undermentioned shots at 500 and 600 yards were shown to be as follows:—

	Batt. match, Canadian powder.	Open match, English powder.
Wynne	36	58
Cooke	46	53
Smith	33	60
Hood	28	51
Dalrymple	32	59
Kambery	27	53

On the whole the shooting with this English ammunition averaged some 50 per cent. better than with the Canadian, and the test was made under absolutely similar conditions. Now such a degree of variation would be quite sufficient in the field of battle to turn the fortunes of the day and cause the loss of many valuable lives. I have besides this letter, one from Lieutenant Colonel Alger, of Toronto, who is, I think, secretary of the Ontario Rifle Association. He says:

"SIR,—I regret to have to inform you that complaints have been made to me of the strength of S. B. ammunition, supplied from Quebec. Toronto marksmen have spoken of it as very ineffective, and to-day I have received an application from the Victoria Rifle Club, of Hamilton, for 4,000 rounds, 'but not to send the Canadian made ammunition, as we find it very inferior, the gas on the explosion of the cartridge escaping at the breech.'

"English made ammunition is asked for to be used on the 1st July."

Then, Sir, there is the letter of Captain Adam, of Hamilton, to which Colonel Alger refers. He goes into some further details. He says he was disappointed in getting the Canadian instead of the English cartridges which he had sent for, and he goes on:

"I was surprised to find a mixed lot in it, a little No. 9 Old Country, which is quite good, a little of '84 issue Dominion, which is no good, but the most of it was 85 of the latter issue, which I had not a chance of trying before, so as I had seen in some paper that they had improved on their first issue, I retained it, but am sorry to say only to be disappointed again, it is no better, and we do not want any more of it, our money is just thrown away. I tested it on Saturday, which was a good moist day for shooting, but I could do nothing with it at all, neither can any of my men in the company. I think the company who manufacture it are very foolish in issuing it, until they at least have it as good as the English kind, because when the volunteers cannot use it to any advantage they will be naturally prejudiced against it, and although they may in time make it good, it will be difficult to remove the prejudice."

Now, I fancy that will hold just as true with regard to the Government as with regard to the company which he supposed were manufacturing the ammunition as an investment. He said the character of the goods was such that they would ruin the character of the company manufacturing them. He refers to the fact that the 1884 ammunition was bad, so that the Government were not without warning that something was wrong. They had complaints in 1884 and even as far back as 1883. The ammunition of 1884 turned out to be bad; the ammunition of 1885 turned out to be bad; and knowing that it was bad, they send it up to be used by our troops. I have a letter from Colonel Gray to Colonel Alger on the same matter, in which he says:

"SIR,—Complaints were made to me as the senior officer present at the practice over the rifle range here on Saturday, the 4th July, 1885, respecting the defective quality of the Snider ball ammunition now being manufactured at the Government cartridge factory, Quebec, and sold to the volunteers of this district for rifle practice. I have been in attendance at the ranges during the past four weeks and casually heard complaints, from different parties, on this subject, but did not deem it my duty to report until a formal complaint, based upon proper foundation, was brought under my notice. Col.-Sergeant Knifton, Q.O.R., had ten rounds from one package very carefully analysed, giving the following result: No. 1, 68½ grs.; No. 2, 68½; No. 3, 68; No. 4, 66; No. 5, 66½; No. 6, 68; No. 7, 68½; No. 8, 70; No. 9, 68½; No. 10, 69 grs., showing a want of care in the filling, that must prove detrimental to precision of fire. The powder in some cartridges was found to be damp and caked. A number of cartridge shells were also produced for my inspection; in several the percussion cap had been blown into the shell, and others were broken off at the junction of the shell with the base disc, rendering it necessary to use a ramrod for the purpose of expelling the shell from the bore of the rifle.

"On careful inspection it appeared as though the machine used in manufacturing had cut the brass covering, near the base disc, so that after firing, on attempting to extract the shell, only the disc came out. As this is a matter of grave importance, I trust you will immediately report to headquarters, for the information of the Adjutant General.

"I have the honor to be, Sir,
"Your obedient servant,
"JNO. GRAY, Lt.-Col.,
"Major Toronto Field Battery."

This inequality in the charges of the cartridges is another defect which has not hitherto been mentioned; but I find by the report of the board that it was established that the variation in the powder charge was much greater than it ought to be. The charge ought to be seventy grains in every case, and there were from sixty-eight to seventy-two grains, a variation of four grains, which is sufficient to cause a difference of very many yards in the range of the bullet. I have also here a letter from Color Sergeant Donnelly, of A Company, Queen's Own Rifles, to the Canadian Militia Gazette, of Ottawa, in which he says:

Mr. CASEY.

"Having seen an article in your Gazette, asking for views on the 1885 Snider ammunition, I, on behalf of a large number of the Toronto Rifle Club and also of the Queen's Own, wish to state that we think it is no good; there is something wrong somewhere."

Then he goes on to give instances in the same strain as those I have already read. These are not by any means all the criticisms which I could read to the House upon this ammunition; I have here a mass of correspondence which is nearly all concerned with the subject, but I do not wish to detain the committee by reading it. I would simply mention the names of one or two others who have sent in similar complaints—John B. Mitchell, of the Bowmanville Rifle Association, and Sergeant Currie, director of stores. I am also aware that complaints were sent in by some other parties in Toronto, though perhaps not officially, on the occasion of the rifle meeting there last fall. In response to those complaints, I believe the request of the parties in Toronto was granted, and a supply of old English ammunition was got in from somewhere for use in those rifle matches. Now, I think the country must consider very seriously the facts here revealed, that ammunition not fit for practice, rejected by riflemen all over the country, and characterised by Captain Adams as being of such a character as would ruin the reputation of a private firm manufacturing it, was put into the hands of our citizen soldiers as their only defence against their savage and half civilised enemies. And the responsibility for the loss of life in consequence must fall upon those who allowed this bad ammunition to be manufactured and sent off; because they had warnings for years before that it was not satisfactory, and they neglected the very simplest precaution for making it satisfactory—getting it made of proper materials, and securing proper machinery for putting into the cartridges the right charges.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister says this factory is working satisfactorily, and the only objection taken to its efficiency is as to the quality of the powder. I do not think the report of the board sustains that position. My hon. friend who has just taken his seat, has referred to a mass of correspondence of the military men of Canada to the Government, complaining of the quality of the cartridges furnished to them in the spring of 1885. At that time, it is to be remembered, the rebellion had not been entirely quelled; and I presume—although I am not informed on that point, on which the Minister will perhaps inform us—that a portion of this defective ammunition was supplied to our militia in the North-West. In the first week of June, 1885, the ammunition was distributed amongst our volunteer forces in Canada, and they entered on their target practice. Immediately after the department here was flooded with communications from the various rifle and volunteer associations, unanimously declaring that the cartridges were very inferior. Considering that our volunteers were at that moment engaged in quelling the rebellion, what ought the Minister to have done at the very moment he learned that this most important branch of the service had broken down? I suppose he woke up to his responsibility when it was too late, for we find towards the close of the year the board sitting, and the appointment of the board does not appear, but it began its sittings, according to this report, at the latter end of October, 1885. The Minister says that the only defect in the factory, in its workings and results, was in the character of the powder used. I do not think the report sustains that position. On page 9 it is stated:

"The board did not take evidence concerning the complaints which have been made respecting the supply of shells and rifles, because they were furnished with proof in the shape of bursted shells, which had been retained by several persons, and because each member of the board present, except Professor Bayne, had personal experience in the matter."

The Minister forgot to tell the committee that the cartridges were defective, not only in respect of the powder, but in respect of bursted shells.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The bursting of the shells was the fault of the powder.

Mr. MULOCK Not at all; but because of a defective machine used in connection with the filling of the shells.

Mr. O'BRIEN. That is not according to the correspondence here.

Mr. MULOCK. We will see about that. On page 10, referring to the split shells—as to which it was argued by some that the split was occasioned by our using defective rifles—the board reports:

"That this splitting takes place in perfect rifles the board are fully aware; and, as they have never known of such happening with English cartridges, they are forced to the conclusion that it is, or was, caused by the powder used, which they believe was too sudden or unequal in its action; and this conclusion has been strengthened by the fact that after the attention of the Department and the Superintendent of the factory had been drawn to this defect, an order was given to have the powder supplied sifted, so that only the coarser grain should remain, and thus its explosiveness reduced; and since last June, and up to the enquiry in October, only sifted powder was used."

I see the split was occasioned by defective powder; it was the defect in the rim I intended to refer to. On page 12, in reference to tests, they say:

"These tests, trials and analyses are set forth in detail, and go to show that the ingredients used are pure; that in their proportions they differ somewhat from the standard laid down, and that the residuum left after the 'flashing test,' is about four times longer than that left after flashing an equal quantity of Waltham Abbey powder; and this goes to show that incorporation is not perfect.

"The conclusion arrived at with respect to the powder examined is, that it is inferior in quality, and is not that which a perfect cartridge demands; but here the board deems it only right to remark that the Hamilton Powder Company are not to be blamed, for they could not supply a powder of the Waltham Abbey grade at the price they received."

I now arrive at a very important part of the report which discloses a very grave oversight on the part of the Minister or his subordinates. At page 13 the board reports:

"As previously stated no inspection on behalf of the Crown is made during process of manufacture."

The powder is furnished by contract. The whole usefulness of the school, and of the guns, and of the safety of the force has to depend upon the honesty, or otherwise, of the contractor, The board, of course, point out, as well as they can, what a grave oversight that was on the part of the Minister, and they recommend that precautions should be taken in the future, and that a Government inspector be appointed to see that proper powder is used. I do not know whether that part of the recommendation has been adopted or not. If not, the Minister differs from the board; and if it has been, he accepts their censure, by the adoption of their suggestion. Then the report goes on further to say, in reference to the business of the inspector:

"This, the board respectfully submits, is a duty which ought not to be omitted, and the board would go further in advising that in addition to inspection during manufacture, that all powder procured or supplied under contract should be tested at the Royal Military College, Kingston, in conjunction with the tests applied at the cartridge factory, which, with the exception of that for density, are purely mechanical.

"With reference to the tests for I. V., it appears that they are made with cartridges prepared and filled with carefully weighed charges of exactly 70 grains of powder. An examination of the details of the tests for the board, which are attached hereto, shows that the average I. V. of nine such special cartridges was 1,208 feet per second, whereas the average I. V. of ten cartridges which had been filled in the ordinary manner at the laboratory was 1,662 feet per second, or a difference of 464 feet in velocity. This difference goes to show that there must have been less powder in the laboratory filled cartridges than in those which had been specially prepared, because the powder used in both lots was of the same make and character."

That report shows not only defective powder, but carelessness in the filling of the cartridges. The mistake did not merely consist in the use of bad or unequal powder, but also in the want of skill in filling the cartridges. It cannot be said that the factory was doing its duty, even if it had good powder, if it filled the cartridges in this loose and careless way. In page 15, we find the result of tests as follows:—

"At the Lévis range, on the 14th May last, a number of the best shots in Quebec were engaged in a friendly competition, and a member of the board was also present. Canadian cartridges were used and the result, as regards accuracy, were bad; many bullets going over the target whilst others struck the ground many feet in front, and similar results have obtained in other parts of the Dominion."

On page 18, we find this further statement:

"The board made enquiry into the complaint that the bottoms of cap-chambers blew out, and ascertained that at first a punch die used in the 'pressing machine,' in which the case is rivetted together, made too square a bottom with sharp angles just where fracture took place; a change was made, and now the bottom has a dome shape and the sharp angles are avoided."

That shows a defect in the manufacture of the cartridge itself, although the Minister says there was nothing but the powder to complain of. On page 21 the board reports:

"The board are not satisfied with the powder examined by them, and they have to recommend that a powder of a higher grade and quality be obtained and used, to be manufactured according to a standard duly fixed, and that samples of Waltham Abbey be not used or provided as such standard. The board suggests that all powder be inspected and tested during manufacture by an officer duly appointed."

And further on:

"They also suggest that the working of the factory and the tests, &c., made thereat should be examined at stated periods by a board of officers."

It does not appear that there has ever been any inspection whatever. In fact, a more carelessly managed institution, on which so much depends, does not exist, I think, in the whole Dominion service. Then I find, on page 22:

"The best test to which a Canadian cartridge can be submitted is, will it satisfy the riflemen of Canada? Heretofore it has not done so, the tests and trials at the cartridge factory and the standards there laid down and fixed to the contrary notwithstanding."

Then I refer to statements on page 85, speaking of the result of a test.

"With the first round of Canadian make, I experienced a stiffness in extracting the shell, and out of the twenty rounds fired, one shell had to be forced out with a ramrod, two could only be extracted by striking the breech-block against the butt to start the shell, and two others required much force to extract. Of these five shells, the bottoms of the cap-chambers of two were blown out. It may, therefore, be seen that twenty-five per cent. of these cartridges were defective, and further that the splitting or bursting should not be charged to the rifle used."

Now, what does this show? This shows an entire absence of inspection of the working of the factory; it shows that the Government did not examine the machinery as the work went along; it shows that the Government did not examine the powder in the process of manufacture; that they did not watch the filling of the cartridges, the carrying on of the work; that they allowed defective machinery to be used in the manufacture of the cartridges, and I am told in regard to the powder, though this does not appear in the report, that, instead of the Government themselves seeing that it was manufactured under direct responsibility to them, they gave out the contract to a middleman, a particular friend, and without tender, and thus, in order to enable that man to make his commission and still to supply powder within the regular price; he was obliged to buy a cheaper powder, and thus the whole trouble has come upon us. That is the whole state of this institution which the Minister of Militia says is giving entire satisfaction to the country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I notice that $1,830 appears to have been paid to Mr. Watson for inspecting clothing. Who is Mr. Watson?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Watson is the Government Inspector who inspects for the Militia Department, and also for the Mounted Police Department. He is paid so much per day. Of course, the amount paid him here is much larger than usual, and the hon. gentleman will understand that, from the troubles in the North-West, our stores were completely depleted and we had to get new stores, and he was called into requisition oftener than at ordinary times, but he is the permanent inspector of the Government.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is his ordinary occupation?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. He is a merchant here. He is well known in Ottawa

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What position does he occupy in the Ottawa Conservative Association?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I believe he does not belong to it. His inspection might be more efficient if he did.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are you sure he does not belong to it?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am quite sure. I think he is a political friend of the hon. gentleman.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I doubt that very much.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). I see there is $3,400 paid for advertising. That seems out of proportion to the amount of $90,000 for clothing, and it is a large advance on anything spent of late years.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Is it the intention to provide the force with any additional equipments?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The equipment we had of course had to be used during the campaign. We have taken advantage of that, and all the new importation is on the most perfected plan, and is adopted in the English service. A change is being made, which the hon. gentleman himself suggested, in the color of the leather, which is to be brown instead of buff as it was before.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). We might hear from those gentlemen who were in the North-West as to the clothing, whether it was of a satisfactory character.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I think the Department would practice a wise economy if they were to provide the force with suits of clothing other than those they now issue. Of course we cannot keep up a force which is not attractively clothed —that goes without saying—but the Department loses by not providing the men with fatigue clothing. I have mentioned this before, and I am sure there would be a great saving in expense and a great addition to the comfort of the men if, in addition to the clothing which must be attractive and which I think cannot be improved upon, they had fatigue clothing. If you give one suit of clothes and send the men into camp and compel them to do all their work in that, you cannot expect it to last, especially on active service. I think the coats have worn well, but very many of the trousers have been very imperfect. I do not say they were imperfect in proportion to the amount paid for them, and they have been quite sufficient for the ordinary work of camp, but it would be a great point if the Government would issue fatigue clothing which would be available on active service and in camp.

Mr. MULOCK. What is the price per tunic?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Do you mean the blue or the green or the scarlet?

Mr. MULOCK. The dark.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. $6.64.

Mr. MULOCK. Do you know the price of that in England?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I will be able to furnish the hon. gentleman with that detail on concurrence.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). I see by last year's report that the price paid in England for the dark tunic was $3.34, while we paid $6.29 for the rifle, and $5.76 for the artillery tunic. I presume the two latter are manufactured in this country?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. All the dark tunics are manufactured in this country. The scarlet have been imported from England hitherto, but we hope to manufacture them in Canada. A factory has succeeded in manufacturing the scarlet cloth in Canada, and it seems to be a success. By way of an experiment we have ordered some, and I hope we will have all the clothing manufactured in Canada by Canadians.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). At the price English clothing has been bought?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I could not say exactly, but the advantages are so great of having it manufactured in Canada and keeping our money at home, that I think they compensate for any increase in the price, which cannot be much, seeing that Government imports without duty.

Drill instruction and drill pay..... $920,000 00

SIR RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How many troops is this intended to supply.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. 19,000 men and 1,607 horses. Twelve days' drill, city corps and brigades of garrison artillery. Drill at local headquarters. Pay by rank, without rations, 9,000 officers and men, at an average cost of seventy-two cents per day, twelve days, $77,760; 385 horses at $1, $4,620, total, $82,380. Field batteries—rural corps and brigade camps, with pay by rank, free rations, forage and transport of officers and men, at an average of $1 each, which covers pay for horses, 10,000 officers and men, and 1,222 horses, twelve days drill, $132,000; transport, say $3 per man, $30,000; camp contingencies, $5,620, making $167,620, and added to $82,380, makes up the $250,000.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I must take this opportunity of making some observations which I have already made on former occasions. In the first place, with regard to this $40,000 for drill instruction, I again desire to say that I think this money is badly expended. Under the present system, officers who are careless and inefficient, and who pay no attention to their duties, obtain precisely the same money as those who devote themselves in the most assiduous manner to the same work. I have pointed out to the Minister on previous occasions that, as a remedy for this evil, no money should be paid under this head except to officers who bring to the camp a corps which does possess a certain degree of efficiency, such a degree as will show that during the year the officers paid some attention to the work for which they are paid. Then with regard to the larger item for the annual drill in camp. I think it is evident to every one in this House that this country is making a great mistake in pursuing the system of drilling only one half of the men every year. If a man joins in a year in which the company does not drill, he does not get any drill that year; he gets drill the following year, and the third year comes round when his battalion does not go out, so that two years out of three he gets no drill. That is an absolute waste of money. This country, if it is going to make an efficient militia, must do one of two things, either reduce the active force to such a number as it is willing to pay for having properly drilled, or it must increase the grant and pay the whole force now in existence. I understand that the policy of the Government is to reduce the force. They find great difficulty in doing that for the reason that the country feels so much interest in this force; the various counties and cities feel so much interested that they spare no efforts to prevent the reduction being made. So we go on with the same system from year to year, drilling half our force and throwing away a large amount of money. Another point to which I wish to call attention is this: I think it is exceedingly unfair to the rural battalions that the city corps should be drilled every year and be paid for it every year. I think the experience of last year shows that the rural corps were got into the field as quickly and in as efficient a condition as the city corps. I know that my own battalion, gathered from two of the largest counties in Ontario, was very prompt. I got orders on the 30th March, and on the 2nd of April my battalion, fully equipped, was on the way to Carleton Place. Now I do not think that any city corps exceeded that one in point of rapidity of concentration. As regards efficiency, as regards usefulness, as regards every quality, I think a comparison would not be against the rural corps. Under these circumstances I think it is unfair to the rural corps that the city corps should be paid and drilled every year, and thereby be placed at a great advantge over the rural corps. It tells in many ways. It prevents the officers of the rural corps from keeping up the mess, band and everything else that they take a pride in. It makes it almost impossible for us to do these things, and the tax upon us is very much heavier than it would be if it were not thrown almost entirely upon the few who are willing to do the work. The only proper way is for the Government either boldly to put down their foot and say: We will reduce our force to 30,000, which will bring it within the present estimate; or else we will ask the country to give us another $300,000, that we may drill the whole militia force as it now exists. That is the course I should like to see the Government pursue, and I think they are needlessly afraid in doing it. I think this House would support the Minister in doing it. Either adopt the one course or the other, for I look upon the present system as most unsatisfactory and extravagant.

Contingencies, including grants to artillery and rifle associations..... $38,000 00

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This appears to be a very miscellaneous item. Perhaps, in connection with that, I may call the attention of the Minister of Militia to complaints which have been made by many members of the active force, as to the shabby conduct on the part of the Government in connection with the medals recently distributed. It appears that, contrary to the usual custom, these medals were handed over without being engraved, although, I suppose, the cost would not be great. I have always understood that when medals were presented, the Government had the men's names engraved upon them. It strikes me that when men went to the North-West, and most undoubtedly exposed themselves to very considerable hardship, and were then presented with a medal by the direction of the Government, the least they could do was to engrave the man's name upon it. It is a small thing in one sense, but these small things have a good deal of effect on the minds of the men. There is another matter to which I will call the attention of the Minister. It certainly has been unusual in the regular service that, in the case of men who have been actually engaged, besides the medal, a clasp or clasps have usually been added with the name of the particular engagement in which the individual was concerned; and I observe in one of the English official lists that something of that kind appears to have been recommended by the Major-General in command, because I saw in one of those printed statements that the Major-General had a medal and two clasps, one for Batoche and another for Fish Creek .So it is tolerably clear that the officer in charge of the force had recommended something of that kind. That also might very well have been done. It is natural enough that men who have been under fire should take a pride in having some little memento, and a bar, such as is usually attached to medals distributed in the regular service, would have cost the Government very little, and have gone a long way with the men. It is not too late to remedy these defects in the action of the Government.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am in a very unfortunate position. If I spend too much money I am fiercely attacked by hon. gentlemen opposite; if I do not spend enough I am also attacked. The hon. gentleman knows that the medals which were distributed to our volunteers were sent out by Her Majesty. We had nothing to say to them, except to hand them over to the officers who commanded the various corps engaged in the suppression of the disturbance in the North-West. The cost of engraving the medals would have amounted to $1,200. I had no appropriation, when the medals came to this country, out of which to take the amount for that expenditure. I venture to say, although I do not pretend to express an opinion on such matters, that it would be impossible to have obtained clasps to commemorate the different engagements in which the men had taken part, although such would have enhanced the value of the medals. Application was made to the Imperial Government, and it was decided that clasps could not be granted. To my mind it would have been almost absurd for the Canadian Government to have added to the medals sent by Her Majesty to be distributed to our force, and to have supplemented Her Majesty's grant by adding some clasps. As the medals were sent out so we decided to distribute them. I should like to have seen the names of the men engraved on them, and I understood when the medals were sent that they would be engraved. However they came out without the names being placed on them. It was a matter for consideration as to whether I was justified in making an expenditure to which I have referred. However, I think most of the officers commanding battalions have had the medals engraved with the names.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. At their own expense?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is a great credit to our volunteers that their action in the field should have obtained public approval.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman strains at gnats and swallows camels. The Government have not the slightest objection to spend under the Governor General's warrant a million and a quarter in the course of a year without having the faintest parliamentary authority for what they have done, and then come down, throw the papers on the Table and obtain the grant. But when it comes to a question of paying $1,000 or $2,000 which might very properly have been expended, the Government has conscientious qualms as to making payment. The hon. gentleman would not have received the slightest criticism for any expenditure of that kind from this side of the House, and if it be the case that officers have had to pay $100 or $200 out of their own pockets to have the medals engraved, the officers deserve great credit, but the Government that has allowed them to incur that expenditure does not deserve much credit.

Mr. FAIRBANK. The value of the medals would be immensely enhanced by the names being engraved on them. Without that I fail to see how there is any clue of the medals being in the hands of the original person. They will increase in value with coming years, and if they were engraved there would be less danger of the medals falling into the hands of the wrong persons. Without that, such liability would largely detract from their value. I do not think the Government could by any means have deserved censure for doing such an act, and they will not receive much credit for such an homœpathic dose of economy.

Mr. VAIL. I observe an item among the charges for contingencies which is irregular and I call the attention of the Minister of Militia to it. I refer to the payment of $450 to Major Macpherson of the Governor General's Foot Guards. I find that he was injured on 30th July, 1883, by a fall from his horse, and the claim for compensation for that accident does not appear to have been made until 26th June, 1884, nearly a year afterwards, and the Order in Council for the payment of that amount was not passed till 27th March, 1885. The regulations state that if illness is contracted in camp during any period of drill payment is limited to sixty days' pay. There is also a provision that in case of accident to an officer while on duty or drill in camp there shall be a full investigation at the time by a board of officers and evidence shall be taken in writing. Those established regulations were not acted on in this case. In a report made to the Cabinet by the Minister of Militia he states the circumstances in connection with this matter, and recommends the payment of $450 as a special case. In the first place there was no authority for a recommendation of that kind, and in the next place the regulations positively state that the pay shall not exceed in any case sixty days. I notice in looking over the correspondence that Major Macpherson states that he was placed at great trouble and inconvenience and loss of time by those circumstances, which is no doubt perfectly correct; but I observe that Major Macpherson is a member of the civil service, and that during those periods in question he received his salary. So that under these circumstances it seems to me that the order for payment is rather irregular. I have not the slightest doubt that Major Macpherson is a good officer and a competent man, and I have no objection to his getting any sum he is entitled to for public service. I think, however, that under the circumstances the payment is hardly justifiable, unless some further explanation is forthcoming.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is really a very exceptional case. The major has never recovered from the accident which he experienced, I may say, in active service, because he was drilling his battalion. He was put to considerable expense. He had to consult some doctors in New York, I believe, and for a number of weeks he could not use his arm. Even now, although it is better, he always will suffer from the accident he experienced. The correspondence will show that the matter was fully considered. In an ordinary case I might have acted on my own responsibility as head of the Department; but I looked upon this as a special case; I brought it before Council, and the Order was passed for reasons which were submitted to Council. Under all the circumstances, and having looked at it as closely as possible, I think it was a small amount of money for the injury experienced.

Mr. VAIL. I think that all payments of that kind should be brought before Council, before they are allowed. In this case, I must say that I do not think the explanation of the hon. gentleman furnishes any justification for the payment. I do not think he was any more entitled to this amount than any business or professional man who had not actually lost a large amount of money would be justified in receiving such a payment. I have known a Minister of Militia, under circumstances equally strong, refuse to admit such payments, and I think that one officer should be treated the same as others, under the same circumstances.

Mr. WATSON. I would ask the Minister if he intends to provide for the new rifle associations which are being organised in Manitoba and the North-West. According to Colonel Houghton's report five new companies are being organised in Manitoba, and a number of others in the Territories. I would ask if it is the intention to supply them out of the ordinary vote.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. A grant is made to all rifle associations. We have provided in this vote for all the associations whether in the North-West or elsewhere, in the various military districts that have been reported to us as properly organised.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). I see an item of contingencies last year amounting to $499.73 to J. J. Foote, for printing. Is that the same gentleman who is printing the report, the want of which the House feels so much?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The same one.

Mr. VAIL.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). It is rather curious that the hon. gentleman should give the printing of his Department to this gentleman, when, according to his statement, the report has been delayed, because he has telegraphed to him about it.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. That does not throw the blame on him. They had been working on it night and day, and I telegraphed to know when it would be ready.

Royal Military College of Canada at Kingston... $59,000 00

Mr. VAIL. How many cadets are there there?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Seventy-two.

Mr. FAIRBANK. What provision is made at the present time for supplying the cadets with horses? I understand that they formerly used the battery horses, but that they have not been available for some time past.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman is quite correct. We have been unable, since the time of the breaking out of the troubles in the North-West, to utilise the battery horses for the cadets of the college. When these troubles broke out, the horses had to be supplied, not quite completely, but almost completely. The troubles in the North-West reduced the number of horses at the disposal of the commandant of the Royal Military College, but not expecting that the batteries would be kept away as long as they were, we considered that it would be better not to incur the expense of getting a certain number of horses exclusively for the purposes of the college. I hope, however, before long, that the batteries will be returned to the headquarters, and that the cadets will have, in that respect, the advantages they previously possessed.

Mr. FAIRBANK. I think the hon. Minister will see that it is a matter of very much importance that these young men should be thoroughly trained in horsemanship; a military man's training is incomplete without it. It is well known that this institution is largely modelled on the Military Acadamy of West Point, and there nothing receives greater attention than the training of the cadets in horsemanship. I think these cadets, whose four years will soon be passed, should not be deprived of the benefit of such an important part of their training, which they could not obtain so well afterwards.

Mr. MULOCK. I would call the attention of the Minister to the mode of keeping the accounts of the college. It receives a certain amount from the cadets every year; last year it received $16,555. I would like to know by whom that is disbursed. The gross expenditure last year was $70,086, while the House voted only $59,000, so that I presume the staff has disbursed the fees mentioned. If so, it appears to me that they should be credited in the consolidated receipts, and the House should vote the whole amount necessary to maintain the institution.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The cadets pay a certain amount for their books, clothing, &c., and that amount goes to the credit of the vote.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not think that can be, as the expenditure was more than the House authorised.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think my hon. friend is right enough, and the attention of the Minister of Finance should be called to this. There is no doubt it is an irregularity. In all other cases the sum received is put on one side, and the sum disbursed on the other. We ought, I think, to have the demand made here for whatever sum is required, and credit the consolidated fund with whatever the cadets paid.

Permanent Corps—Pay and maintenance of A, B and C Batteries, Schools of Artillery at Quebec, Kingston and Victoria, B.C..... $172,700 00

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). The amount expended last year was $128,000, while we granted $172,000. I would like to know how the expenditure happened to be less than the vote.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Because C Battery was not provided for, but the vote was taken in anticipation of its being organised.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). The amount voted last year included the entire maintenance of that corps.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). Its maintenance is not included in the war expenses?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON, No.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). I suppose the same remark will apply to the infantry school?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Certainly.

Mr. VAIL. The expense at Kingston and Quebec could not have been the same, all the time while the corps were in the North-West.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman knows that we could not leave such places as Kingston and Quebec, with their valuable stores, without a large number of men to guard them. Whether we paid the substitutes of those batteries out of the war fund, or allowed the batteries to remain on the ordinary pay list, made no difference at all.

Construction and repairs of military properties....$75,000 00

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is an increase of $15,000 over last year; what is the reason?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is to meet the requirements of the buildings at Winnipeg; repairs to the infantry school and barracks. When the school was organised, the huts were in a frightfully dilapidated state, and it was necessary to provide for these repairs. There is a great deal to be done.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). Will the $25,000 voted last year complete the accommodation in London?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. If the hon. gentleman will allow me to suggest, that item comes up in the estimates of public works and can be discussed there, but I can tell him that the $25,000 will not cover the whole expense.

Committee rose and reported.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 2.25, a.m. (Saturday.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 17th May, 1886.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BILLS WITHDRAWN.

Bill (No. 63) to incorporate the Rock Lake, Souris and Brandon Railway Company.

Bill (No. 15) to incorporate the Medicine Hat, Dunmore and Benton Railway Company.

Bill (No. 31) to incorporate the Alberta Railway Company.

Bill (No. 55) to incorporate the Portage la Prairie and Lake of the Woods Railway and Navigation Company.

MONTREAL TO SALISBURY RAILWAY.

Mr. KIRK. In answer to a question asked by me a few days ago, the Minister of Justice said a contract had been entered into by the Government with a company to build the railway from Montreal vid Fredericton to Salisbury. He also said, if a motion was made, the contract would be laid upon the Table. It is too late in the Session to put a notice on the paper, so, anticipating no opposition from the Government, I move:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the contract entered into by the Government for the building of the Short Line Railway from Montreal vid Fredericton to Salisbury.

Motion agreed to.

FOURTH REPORT OF PRINTING COMMITTEE.

Mr. BERGIN moved that the Fourth Report of the Joint Committee of both Houses on the Printing of Parliament be adopted.

Mr. MILLS. I have not read the report, but I listened to the remarks of the hon. gentleman, and I do not think there is anything to warrant the censure of the Auditor General which the hon. gentleman asks the House to adopt. The intention of Parliament in appointing an auditor was that he should be perfectly independent, and, if he abuses his office, if he neglects his duty, there is a proper way of calling him to account; but for a committee to undertake to order and control the Auditor General, and then come to the House and ask for the censure of the Auditor-General because he does not comply with their wishes, I think is a monstrous proposition, and would be quite as great an abuse as to make him the mere servant of the Government. In fact, it is altogether contrary to the spirit of the law to do what the hon. gentleman asks the House to do. I trust that the hon. members of this House will not sanction the report proposed by the hon. gentleman. Certainly, if the hon. gentleman persists, I shall ask for a division on this question, and that the yeas and nays shall be recorded.

Mr. BERGIN. The hon. gentleman does not appear to apprehend the true state of the case. The hon. gentleman says it is a monstrous proposition for a committee of this House to censure an officer for refusing to do his duty. We were told the other day, from the other side of the House, that what this House required was an honest audit of the accounts. That is just what the Printing Committee of this House asked from the Auditor General and that he refused to do, and it was not until a month and two or three days had elapsed that he consented to do that which he himself admitted, the first time he appeared before the committee, that it was his duty to do, that he ought to do, and would do. As the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Trow) stated to the House the other day, no less than half a dozen times he stated to the committee that he would give the certificate. If I am correctly informed, the current account of this House, amounting to over $250,000, was laid on the Table without the signature of the Auditor General. Is that an honest audit, such as this House requires? The committee must not be misrepresented in this matter. The committee had no feeling whatever except to see that the duty of the Auditor General was performed. They took the most courteous way of procuring the performance of that duty by the Auditor General, and, if they refer to his refusal, it is because, by his refusing for a month to perform that duty, they were obliged of necessity to do so.

Mr. McLELAN. I think it would be better not to depart from the practice we have observed, that is, that all the accounts of expenditure in the public service should go through the hands of the Auditor General at some time or other. I think the difficulty has arisen from a misunderstanding on the part of the Auditor General as to what is required of him in this case. After a statement has been prepared by the clerk and submitted to the Printing Committee, there can be no objection to all the accounts and vouchers going to the Auditor General and passing through his hands, as all the other expenditures under the Government do. I think it would be a better check, and the proper course to pursue that there should be a particular audit of all the expenditure that is made in the Printing Committee in connection with legislation, that it should all be audited carefully by an officer who has more time and more leisure, and is, perhaps, more familiar with it than the Printing Committee can be. They take the statement of the clerk and look at it, but they cannot give it that time and attention which are necessary, and which would be satisfactory to the House and the country. I therefore move in amendment:

That the report be referred back to the Joint Committee on Printing, with instructions to amend the resolution on the auditing of the printing accounts, by providing that any statement of the accounts which may be required by the committee, be not submitted to the examination of the Auditor General, and that all accounts, vouchers, &c., required by the Auditor General for his examination under the third resolution of the First Report of the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts of the Session of 1880, be, as heretofore, sent to him for audit.

That is, that any statement that may be required be not subject to his audit, but that all vouchers, papers and documents necessary to a proper audit by the Auditor General should be sent to him, as heretofore provided by the resolution of 1880.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

FISHING BY FOREIGN VESSELS.

Mr. FOSTER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 136) further to amend the Act respecting fishing by foreign vessels. He said: The amendment is to section 3 of that Act, the latter part of which reads at present as follows:—

"And if such ship, vessel or boat, be foreign, or not navigated according to the laws of the United Kingdom or of Canada, and have been found fishing, or preparing to fish, or to have been fishing (in British waters) within three marine miles of any coasts, bays, creeks or harbors of Canada, not included in the above-mentioned limits, without a license, or after the expiration of the period named in the last license granted to such ship, vessel or boat, under the first section of this Act, such ship, vessel or boat, and the tackle, rigging, apparel, furniture, stores and cargo thereof, shall be forfeited."

The addition to the section is as follows:—

Or has entered such waters for any purpose not permitted by the law of nations, or by treaty or conviction, or by any law of the United Kingdom or of Canada, for the time being in force, or having entered such waters, has failed to comply with any such law of the United Kingdom or of Canada.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CARLETON AND CITY OF ST. JOHN BRANCH RAILWAY.

Mr. THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 137) respecting the Carleton and City of St. John Branch Railway. He said: Last year an appropriation was made for the purpose of acquiring this railway, and a large portion of the stock of the company was acquired. There is a portion of it still outstanding, and it is proposed by this Bill to provide a sum of money which shall be applied to the expropriation of the remaining stock, in the same way as land is expropriated for railway purposes.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PRIVILEGE—NORTHERN AND PACIFIC JUNCTION RAILWAY.

Mr. McCARTHY. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to rise to a personal explanation as a matter of privilege. The House will remember that in the discussion of the resolution of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), with regard to timber limits, certain charges were made against me with regard to the Northern and Pacific Junction Railway. I gave those charges a denial at the time, as I thought sufficiently explicit—at all events, as particular and minute as I was able to do at the moment, the charges having been sprung upon me without any notice whatever. I find, however, that notwithstanding the denial I made, the Globe newspaper has on two different occasions referred to the matter, and I desire to read what it has said upon those occasions, in order that I may give such an explanation or denial as the circumstances of the case call for. On the 8th of May the Globe had an article from which I take the following:—

"But while that part of the charge may be left for future consideration, the statement that Mr. McCarthy receives $5,000 a year as president of the subsidising company, stands good by his own confession. The money must go to him directly from the subsidy, because the road has yet earned nothing. This damning statement he endeavors to treat contemptuously in replying to Mr. Lister, but the effort was an uneasy one and did not succeed. Mr. Cook rose after Mr. McCarthy had spoken, determined to press home the charge, and succeeded completely, literally forcing an acknowledgment from his respectability's unwilling lips. Mr. McCarthy had to admit, in presence of the House, that he receives $5,000 a year from the subsidy which he, as a member, succeeded in obtaining from the Government."

I will read from Hansard what was said—and the report is a correct one:

"Mr. COOK. I much admired the ingenious way in which the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) answered the charges made against him. He said he could assure this House that he had sold no bonds, and had pocketed no money, but he did not say that he was a one-third shareholder in the stock of the Northern Pacific and Junction Railway, to the extent of $182,000 or $200,000.

"Mr. McCARTHY. If I did not say so then, I say so now.

"Mr. COOK. Well, Sir, your name is down; it is on a return brought down to this House a short time ago.

"Mr. McCARTHY. It is not correct.

"Mr. COOK. I will read the names of the parties on that return:

"'Samuel Barker, Adam Brown, C. J. Campbell, Wm. Joice, John Procter, Hon. F. Smith, John Stuart, Hon. James Turner, Hon. F. Smith, John Stuart, Dalton McCarthy'—

"Mr. McCARTHY. 'In trust,' read the whole of it, please.

"Mr. COOK. Not in trust.

"Mr. McCARTHY. Yes.

"Mr. COOK. It is not so stated in the return, it is very easy to have it in trust for yourself. The hon. gentleman did not say that he was not receiving $5,000 as president of this road.

"Mr. McCARTHY. I was not charged with it.

"Mr. COOK. He did not say that he was receiving money for being solicitor of this railway.

"Mr. McCARTHY. I am not the solicitor of the road.

"Mr. COOK. I did not say you were. I say it has been charged against you that you received money as president of this road.

"Mr. McCARTHY. I do not deny that."

The subsidy to this road was granted by Order in Council on 10th April. I was appointed the president of the road in the month of June after—the exact date I do not at the moment remember—I think it was 24th June. I was appointed president, as I then explained to the House, by an arrangement between the Northern and the Hamilton and North-Western Railways, which, under the power obtained that year, 1884, from Parliament, had purchased the stock of the railway and were solely interested in it. I was appointed as president merely to see fair play between those two companies and the two different cities they represented. The bonus I did explain very clearly, notwithstanding the statement in a newspaper, and I now repeat that explanation. The bonus was handed over to the contractors as part payment for their work. It was money earned under the terms of the subsidy upon ten mile sections of the road being completed, and that money is actually to-day and has always been received under power given to the company by the contractors on account of the contract money, and not one dollar of that money has gone, and not one dollar can go, either into the coffers of the company or into the hands of any one of its officers. And, therefore, I am able to give that charge again, as I did before, the most distinct and positive denial. However, the Globe has stated—or else I would not further notice the matter—in an article on Saturday headed, "McCarthy's Subsidised Impudence," as follows:—

"Mr. Dalton McCarthy receives $5,000 a year from a Government subsidy. It would be preposterous to allege that he earns the money by performing the nominal duties of president of the Northern Pacific Junction Railway. But he is too conscientious an individual to take so much cash without giving the Administration something in return. The Committee of Privileges and Elections now know what he does with his money. He has submitted to them a report on the White-Jamieson-Bowell-scandal, which, for downright perversion of the truth, and for cool impudence, surpasses any piece of paid advocacy that he can have admitted before a court. The concoctor of so remarkable a document may be worth $5,000 a year as a designer of political curiosities."

I take it that that is a very clear and distinct charge that I am receiving from the Government, or through the railway out of Government money, this $5,000 a year, to which charge I here give the most clear and distinct and positive denial. I have only further to add this: I had nothing whatever to do with the settlement of the allowance or remuneration or salary, or what you choose to call it, that I receive as president of that road. I was appointed under the circumstances I have mentioned, on 24th June, or rather on 4th June, and I left shortly afterwards for England. Mr. Chas. Moss was appointed president of the road during my absence. On my return Mr. Moss resigned, and I resumed my position. During my absence the allowance was settled, without any communication with me or without any reference to me directly or indirectly, and when I returned I was informed that the company had agreed that my salary was to be, not $5,000, a year but that my allowance was to be at the rate of $3,000 a year. During the period of my absence Mr. Moss received an allowance at the same rate or a little more, $1,000 for that period. I have simply to make this explanation, as I think it is due from me as a public man to state it in the House, because my conduct as a public man has been impugned. I have only further to add that so far as regards statements made outside I think I know how to protect myself. If these statements are repeated, I will see whether a public man is under the protection of the laws of the country, or whether he can be libelled with impunity.

Mr. BERGIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called I desire to direct the attention of the House to a misstatement made in the Globe with reference to myself, and which has been repeated by the Grit press throughout the country. The Globe does me the honor to represent me as having shirked the vote upon the Irish Home Rule question. Upon that occasion I was absent to do honor to one of the best Irishmen of my acquaintance, upon the eve of his departure for the North-West. I was there at the special request of my constituents, and before going I arranged with the Whip to secure a pair for me, and he did secure a pair with Mr. Edgar, the member for West Ontario. I do not know that I ought to have noticed this attack by the Globe. I know it can do me no injury with my constituents, but it is just possible that in Ireland, among some of my friends there, it may be supposed that the Globe sometimes tells the truth.

NORTHERN AND PACIFIC JUNCTION RAILWAY.

Mr. McCARTHY moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 25) respecting the Northern and Pacific Junction Railway Company.

Mr. MULOCK. Before the motion is adopted I desire to call the attention of the House to this Bill. The company was incorporated by this Parliament in 1881, and by that Act became entitled to borrow to the extent of $20,000 a mile on the first mortgage bonds of that railway. The road is designed to serve a very important public interest, as any one can see by reference to the Statute. It occupies a very peculiar position in connection with the railway system of the whole Dominion. It is practically a public work in which the Dominion has a direct interest, by virtue of the aid granted by the Dominion to the road. On reference to the Statute incorporating the railway company it appears that provision is made whereby the traffic shall be conducted for the benefit of the whole railway system. This railway has not got the ordinary powers of railways, whereby it can conduct its traffic as it may please, subject to Order in Council, but it is governed by some express provisions in the Statute incorporating it. Well, being so hedged round as to its powers, Parliament was called upon to aid in the construction of a line, whereby the railway system of Ontario might be able to connect with the Canadian Pacific Railway, thus giving Ontario direct access to the North-West, vid the Canadian Pacific Railway. This line having been incorporated, it was held out to the people of Canada that it was going to be a neutral link to afford free access for the traffic of Ontario to the North-West and vice versa, and the railway having acquired that status in the minds of the people and in the opinion of Parliament, Parliament in 1884 was asked to grant a subsidy whereby Ontario might be connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and thus by railway with the North-West. Accordingly, in the month of April, 1884, an Act was passed authorising the Governor in Council to grant a subsidy to this road, amounting in all to $12,000 per mile on a total mileage of 110 miles, being the estimated distance from Gravenhurst, the most northerly terminus of the Ontario system, to Callander, the contemplated point of junction between our system and the Canadian Pacific Railway. At that time it was provided by the Act granting that subsidy that it should only be granted and paid over upon the railway in question executing an agreement to the satisfaction of the Governor in Council whereby the railway receiving that subsidy should bring itself under express contract to conduct its operations according to the true intent and spirit of the Act incorporating it. Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, an agreement was entered into between the Dominion of Canada and the railway company, which agreement bears date 12th April, 1884, whereby the company agrees to accept the subsidy which had been granted, subject to certain conditions, and the only condition with which I propose to trouble the House is the condition which I consider is being modified by the Bill to which the assent of the House is now being asked. I may say that when the subsidy was under discussion the question arose in Parliament, what would be the cost of this railway. It was pointed out to the House that $12,000 per mile appeared to be a large subsidy to vote for the construction of a railway through the Province of Ontario, and at that time the House was informed that the surveys had been made and that an estimate of the cost had been arrived at, and to prevent mistakes I will read from Hansard of that date showing what was the opinion furnished to the House as a consideration for the House granting that subsidy to the company to which the Government subsequently did grant it. On referring to the Hansard report of the 18th day of May, page 1291, I find that the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), having referred to the size of this subsidy and otherwise referred to the proposed grant, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), who is now promoting this Bill, used these words in answer to the hon. member for West Durham:

"Mr. McCARTHY. I think the hon. member for West Durham is mistaken in his statement that the cost of the road will be only $12,000 per mile.

"Mr. BLAKE. I did not say that; I do not think it will be much more.

"Mr. McCARTHY. According to estimates made, the cost will be about double that, as some portions of it will pass through a difficult country, although towards Callander the country may perhaps be easier."

Then, after further remarks, I find that hon. gentleman closed his remarks at that time as follows :—

"I think Ontario has thought, at all events western Ontario has thought, it was entitled to have communication with Callander made as easy to its people as it was made to the eastern part of the country, and we are glad to know that the Government have found their way to make the grant which will enable the road to be built, I hope, without great delay. I may state that surveys have been made, that an estimate of the cost has been arrived at, that in certain parts, and especially at difficult points, the right of way has been acquired; and if satisfactory terms to the Government can be made with the company, there is no reason why the road should not be under contract one month after the House rises."

There we have it stated that the surveys had been made, that estimates had been arrived at, and that the cost of the construction of this line would be about $24,000 per mile. It must be within the recollection of every hon. gentleman that Sir Charles Tupper, Minister of Railways in 1883, spoke upon this matter outside of this House. I do not know that I can refer to what occurred in the Railway Committee last year, but if I can, I may state my recollection of what he said, and I am sure hon. gentlemen will confirm me as to what he said when the matter came up in the Railway Committee before it came up in the House. It came up in a discussion upon one of the lines of railway, I think the Hamilton and North-Western, or some other line then seeking legislation before that committee. Sir Charles Tupper announced the policy of the Government on that occasion to be to grant aid for the construction of this neutral link, and he stated to the committee then that the grant made and to be made by the Government would be of such an amount that the country would never have to pay more than $20,000 per mile in order to obtain possession of this road, and that whatever railway got $6,000 per mile, the aid which was granted, and the $6,000 that was proposed to be granted—and which I may say was not granted that year; although he anticipated the action of Parliament in that respect, he informed the committee that the action of Parliament would be to that effect; that the country would at any time be able to resume possession of the line which received this aid at no greater cost to the country than $20,000 per mile. I presume he based that statement on some knowledge he had as to the cost of the construction of that line. Well, we find that in the month of April, 1884, an agreement was entered into between the railway now seeking this Act (the Northern Pacific Railway Company) and the Government, which railway agrees to accept a subsidy of $12,000 per mile, subject, amongst other conditions, to the following, that is, section 6 :—

"For the purpose of ensuring free interchange of traffic, coming to or going from the railways so to be constructed between the lessees' railway, and the railways connecting therewith, so far as such interchange shall be under the control of the lessees, the said lease shall also contain a provision that, in the event of the Parliament of Canada being at any time hereafter of opinion that the traffic of the railway system of the lessees, coming from or going to the projected railway, and interchanging with lines connecting with the lessees' system of railways, is not so interchanged without preference or prejudice as between such connections, then, being of such opinion, the Parliament of Canada may, if it see fit, cancel the said lease and take over the said railway free from encumbrance upon assumption of the bond or debenture debts of the lessor company to the amount of $8,000 per mile of the railway, and upon payment of such further sum of money beyond the said bond debts of $8,000 per mile, and the said subsidy, as the said railway may then be worth, the value thereof to be ascertained, in case the Government and the company cannot agree, by arbitration; the arbitrators to be appointed, one by the Government and the other by the company, and the third by the two appointed, failing agreement as to such third arbitrator, then by one of the Chief Justices of the High Court of Ontario, under the provisions of the Ontario Judicature Act in that behalf, and the award of the majority shall be binding."

This agreement modified the borrowing powers of the company as against the Crown. It is true, by the Act of incorporation the railway company was authorised to mortgage the railway to the extent of $20,000 per mile; but that Act of incorporation preceded this agreement, which expressly stipulates that if the Crown should see fit to take over this railway, it would be bound to assume a bond debt of only $8,000 per mile; and there is the further condition in this agreement that beyond the bond debt of $8,000 per mile, the Crown shall be allowed to purchase the road at its value above the $8,000 per mile, less the subsidy to be granted of $12,000 per mile; and that value was to be ascertained at the time of default, and ascertained in a certain manner. It is perfectly clear, therefore, that if to-day it could be shown that the railway were worth only $8,000 per mile above the subsidy, the Crown would only have to pay $8,000 per mile for it. That being the position this company occupies, and must continue to occupy under this agreement, we are not justified at this stage in passing a measure whereby the Crown may be called on to pay a larger sum, and whereby until that time arrives the railway may be saddled with a larger debt, and the public may be obliged to pay more for the traffic they send over the road. What does the Bill before the House propose? It proposes that this company may, in lieu of the bond issue authorised by its Act of incorporation, issue preferential debenture stock; and section 1 says :

"Such perpetual debenture stock or terminable bonds shall, without registration or formal conveyance, be taken and considered to be the first lien and preferential charge and claim upon the said portion of the railway section, and upon the tolls and property, real and personal, of and belonging to the said portion, after deducting from such tolls and revenues the working expenses of the said portion, and upon the rent payable in respect of such portion, under the lease set forth in schedule A to this Act, to the extent of the interest payable on such perpetual debenture stock or terminable bonds, and each holder of such perpetual debenture stock or terminable bonds, as the case may be, shall be deemed to be a mortgagee and incumbrancer pro rata with all the other holders thereof: Provided, however, that the whole amount of such perpetual debenture stock or terminable bonds to be issued shall not exceed the sum of twenty thousand dollars per mile of such portion," &c.

Section 2 provides that in the process of issuing the $20,000 per mile, the company shall first of all issue the $8,000 per mile, and the residue of the $20,000 per mile on getting the sanction of the shareholders. What is the effect of section 1, as recommended by the Committee on Railways and Canals? It authorises this company to issue preferential debenture stock to the extent of $20,000 per mile, which preferential stock it declares shall be a first charge and encumbrance upon the road. Parliament, by the agreement of 1884, was bound to pay only $8,000 per mile to resume the road in case of default; but if we sanction this proposition, it will be bound beyond all question to pay $20,000 per mile. Suppose the bonds are sold in the market, and the Government subsequently seek to take possession of the road, what will be the position of the bondholders? Suppose the arbitrators value it as worth only $8,000 per mile above the subsidy? Under the agreement we are only to pay $8,000 per mile; but if we are met with a Statute by which we authorise the company to borrow $20,000 per mile, which is to be a first charge on the whole undertaking, is it not clear, both in law and in honor, that we must allow the $20,000 per mile to be a charge on the road prior to the claim of the Crown to redeem? Perhaps the promoters of this Bill may argue that the road is worth $20,000 per mile. I submit that its value to-day is not the question. The question under the contract is, what will that road be worth at the time default is made, which may happen, to-day, to-morrow or years hence? Whatever our agreement is, under that contract we have paid $1,320,000 to this road; and certainly we are entitled to have the contract lived up to, and to refuse to pass this Bill in its present form. I believe it is contended that this road has cost a large amount of money, that the calculations made as to its cost have been disappointing, that the estimates and surveys made at the time were inaccurate. But what difference does it make, what has the road cost? I do not care what it cost, so far as this agreement is concerned; the question is, what is the value of the road? And if the Crown takes the road over, the value must be ascertained, and the value will not depend on the cost, but I submit, on the earning power of the road above working expenses. That opens up another question. Suppose, at the time the Crown proceeds to redeem this road, it should happen that a rival road runs alongside of it. Will it then be worth what it cost? Clearly not; its value must depend on its earning power above working expenses. Under these circumstances, I think this House is assuming to-day the functions of a future Parliament in deciding that the road in the future will be worth $20,000 a mile above the subsidy of $12,000 a mile. Moreover, I call the attention of the Government to this point. The Crown is interested in this property. At present the road cannot be charged to a greater amount than $8,000 a mile as an obligation which must precede the Crown's right to redeem. Now it is proposed to change the Crown's right from an absolute right to redeem on payment of $8,000 a mile, to a contingent right dependent upon the value of the road in excess of $8,000 a mile. It is proposed to establish beyond all question, a further charge of $20,000 a mile which will come prior to the Crown's right. Has the Crown consented to this? Has the Crown investigated this matter? Has the sanction of the Governor General been given to this? The Government, in dealing with this matter, must take the responsibility; they must not leave it to be disposed of as an open question by the House. Considering that the rights of the Crown are being varied, or that there is the probability of their being varied, the Crown is bound to give its sanction to the measure before it can receive the final sanction of Parliament. For these reasons, I submit that the provisions in this Bill should be modified, so that, beyond all question, the rights of the Crown under the agreement of 1884 shall be absolutely guarded. Before I pass from this subject, let me call the attention of the House to the position of this company, in regard to its future operations. This company has entered into a lease with the Hamilton and North-Western Railway Company and the Northern Railway Company, whereby it leases its road bed to those two companies in perpetuity. It does not lease rolling stock, it does not provide railway stock, it does not incur obligations personally to provide rolling stock. There is no need, therefore, for money to meet anything beyond what is necessary to complete the line in order to place it in a condition to be handed over according to the lease to the leasing companies. Therefore, you will see that this claim for increasing the borrowing powers cannot be pressed on the House on the ordinary grounds, that the road is in an unfinished state, that it has to provide for rolling stock and so on. The Bill shows on its face, by the schedule, that the leasing companies took it over in perpetuity and are bound to finish it. I believe it is said that the contract does not quite cover the whole ground, that the company itself is obliged to put up a telegraph line, a few stations, and so on; but these things have been done. Parliament should have evidence of the value of the company and the value of the work, before giving its sanction to place a mortgage which, beyond all question, will come before the claim of the Crown to redeem. I pass from this to another point, the obligation of the Hamilton and North-Western Railway Company and the Northern Railway Company to the country. The Pacific Junction Railway has parted with all interest. The corporations which are seeking this Act are, in reality, the two to which I have referred. They take the whole benefit of the grant. The grant is made nominally to this independent line. According to the return brought down, the subscribed capital stock amounts to $200,000. How much or how little of that has been paid in does not appear in the return. I also observe a highly objectionable clause, under which stock may be handed over to contractors and directors for services rendered without the payment of cash. I object, on principle, to that clause in any charter. I am not aware it has been abused; I have no opinion in the matter, and I have no right to assume it has been. The gross interest of the shareholders in the company, at the very utmost, is the bagatelle of capital to which I have referred, and on which, if I remember rightly, there has been but 10 per cent. paid, according to the return laid before the House a short time ago. On that point I speak subject to correction, for I have not referred to the return to refresh my memory. I may say that of the $20,000 stock which, it is said, is in this road, the bulk, $182,000, was held by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and others in trust for the two leasing companies. Am I correct in that?

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. Out of the $200,000 nominal capital that this company boasts of, $182,000 is held by these gentlemen in trust for the leasing companies, thus leaving only $18,000 of stock that can be pretended to be held by any interest other than the Hamilton and North-Western Company and the Northern Railway Company; and if there is but 10 per cent. paid on that, it shows the introduct into the company of but $1,800 capital other than the capital invested by the two leasing companies and the subsidy granted by the Crown. That being the case, Parliament is bound to look behind the mere appearance of the thing, and see for whose benefit this Bill is being promoted. It is promoted for the benefit of the two leasing companies. That being the case, the Hamilton and North-Western must be treated as a petitioner to this House for relief, and I submit further that if any corporation or individual petitions this House for relief, it is bound to accede to any reasonable terms, as a condition precedent to its getting such relief. Why I urge that view upon the House, is this: The Hamilton and North-Western Railway Company was at one time an independent railway. Prior to its being built, the country served by it was served by the Northern Railway Company, the first railway which extended its line north-westerly from Toronto in the direction of Georgian Bay. That company is under the management of an English board, and for nearly one-quarter of a century had the monopoly of the carrying trade of the district through which it passes. During that period it conducted its operations, not to the satisfaction of the country, but in an arbitrary and tyrannical manner and thereby prevented the development of the back country and drove many interests away. At last the people rebelled under the thraldom, and thought the possibility of escape presented itself when the Hamilton and North-Western line, a railway incorporated by the Ontario Legislature, sought to build its line through a portion of the section served by the Northern Railway. The people grasped at the opportunity, and the promoters of the Hamilton and North-Western, holding out to them inducements that this new line would be a competing line, succeeded by that argument in obtaining vast bonuses from the section of the country through which the Hamilton and North-Western proposed to pass, which section was one that was practically served, on the east side at least, by the then existing railway. That section of country to the east of the Hamilton and North-Western did not want a new railway merely for the sake of a new railway. It wanted it for the sake of competition and for no other purpose, and it granted a vast sum of money for the purpose of obtaining that competition. One of the termini of the Hamilton and North-Western is on the line of the Northern Railway. The present northern terminus of the Hamilton and North-Western is at the town of Barrie through which the Northern Railway passes. It is true, the Hamilton and North-Western does give an outlet beyond Toronto, because it goes down to Hamilton, but we know that the bulk of the trade of the north seeks its market in the city of Toronto, and therefore what they wanted was competition in respect of the railway rates to Toronto, where they could connect with the other systems, and ship their traffic beyond if they desired. The section of country to which I refer granted $375,000 or thereabouts in aid of this road, and after this Hamilton and North-Western was constructed, after the people had mortgaged their properties and paid over this money to the North-Western Railway, a short time after the Hamilton and North-Western entered into a pooling partnership arrangement with the Northern Railway, and thereupon proceeded to adopt the old objectionable rates, and thus rob the people of nearly the whole value which they had expected to get, which they had purchased, in fact, with their large aid. Of course, it is late in the day to seek redress, and I presume we could not, unless they were petitioners here, bring pressure to bear upon this company to cause it, even so late, to do justice; but the people who granted that money and mortgaged their property for twenty years are still paying. The debt is not yet paid. I suppose there are ten years yet to expire. It is only two years ago that these two railways came here, and in various guises endeavored to get an extension of that pooling arrangement in perpetuity. Fortunately the attempt was discovered in time, and I induced the House to put a clause in the Consolidated Railway Act and in their own charters to prevent its being carried out. Now we have them seeking relief, and seeking and obtaining what will be a practical argument to them whereby at another Session they may come to the House and say: Now you must perpetuate this pooling arrangement because you have given a tenant to us in perpetuity. These two railway companies, as you see by this Bill, have leased this particular railway, the Northern and Pacific Junction Railway in perpetuity. The Hamilton and North-Western, of course, is bound as the lessee to live up to its obligations under this lease, and one of these obligations is that it shall run that road. It cannot run that road except with the assistance of the Northern Railway, because it is not within perhaps fifty or sixty miles of the southern limit of the Pacific Junction Railway, and this lease to the joint roads in perpetuity is referred to in this Bill. We know how little argument is required at times to convince the House that it would be right to grant legislation. Next year, or the year after, or in a short time, therefore, if this Bill is made law without some safeguards in it, we shall find these two leasing companies coming down to Parliament and asking to have that pooling arrangement which I have referred to extended in perpetuity. I may say that that pooling arrangement expires in twenty-one years from the date of its commencement. I do not remember the date, but I think it was some six or seven years ago. It could only be made under the Consolidated Railway Act for the period of twenty-one years at most, and therefore, unless it is extended in the meantime, it must expire at the end of twenty-one years. One-third of the time has run out, and before it expires, before the people have become alive to their interests, we shall find these railway companies from time to time endeavoring in various ways to get legislative sanction for the extension of that pooling arrangement; and then what will Parliament be told? Next year perhaps my hon. friend himself may be promoting such a measure, and he will produce this Bill, if it goes through in its present form, and will show that, although it does not exactly ratify this lease, it refers to it and adopts it. He will say it is incorporated in the measure, it was before Parliament, Parliament was aware of it, and Parliament did not take care to expressly guard its future action in respect of the case referred to. In view of that, in view of the past, in view of the possibility of the future, in view of the fraud committed on the people of that section, it appears to me that we are only justified in granting this relief upon condition that the petitioners do equity themselves, and I submit that there is only one kind of restitution that the petitioning railway can grant to-day, and that is, before they obtain legislative sanction to any measure from this House, they shall make restitution to the section of country from which they obtained the money in respect to the violation of the agreement on the faith of which they received this money. Therefore, when this Bill is in the Committee of the Whole, I intend to call the attention of the committee to that feature of it as well as to the other feature, and to move, as I have given notice that I will, such amendments as will meet the cases in question. I intend to move that the Act shall not take effect until the Hamilton and North-Western makes restitution by returning to the people of Simcoe and the various municipalities that voted money the moneys that they did so vote. I also intend then to move that the borrowing powers shall be so modified as in no way to interfere with the rights of the Crown or the rights of the public who may become customers over that line.

Mr. McCARTHY. This matter can be perhaps more properly dealt with in committee than in the House. I only regret that my hon. friend, who has made so long and labored an argument on the subject, and who is a member of the Railway Committee and was present when this Bill was considered, did not make his objections there, where the manager of the road was present who could have answered many of the matters to which he has made reference.

Mr. MULOCK. The reason why I did not was this: The Bill was called on a few minutes before one o'clock. I arose and proceeded to address the committee. I dealt with only one clause. The Minister of Public Works, who was in the chair, was impatient, intimating that there was a meeting of the Council and he had to leave. The committee did not seem desirous of delaying the Government or the Minister, and accordingly all that I could do was to intimate that, not having the attention of the committee or a reasonable opportunity there under the circumstances to press my case, I would take the opportunity of doing so in the House. I mentioned that to the committee, and my hon. friend heard me.

Mr. McCARTHY. He mentioned one matter to the committee, and but one.

Mr. MULOCK. I had not an opportunity to go further.

Mr. McCARTHY. He had not an opportunity to go further. He mentioned that he would bring before the House this last question that has been raised as to the quasi ratification caused by the adoption of this Act. Now, I think I can explain in a very few words what my hon. friend means, and give the answer to what my hon. friend has stated. The Bill has merely one object in view, and that object is to give the company power to borrow by debenture stock or terminable bonds instead of by the ordinary bonds. That is the sole provision of the Bill, and, added to that, it is intended to make these bonds of the Callander and Gravenhurst section of the road sectional. The hon. gentleman's argument amounts to this, that if this enactment is now passed, the effect of the contract between the Crown and the railway company will be practically done away with, if not in law, at all events in good faith. All I can say in answer to that is, that if that is the effect of it we can add in committee any words my hon. friend may suggest to neutralise that. That is not the intention of the promoters of the Bill. They simply desire, instead of issuing ordinary bonds, to issue debenture stock. I explained that to the Railway Committee, and I repeat it here. That is the whole object of the section, to make these bonds sectional; and if there is any doubt at all that passing this legislation would have the effect of nullifying the contract in any way, then an amendment can be put in, and I have prepared an amendment which I think will meet the view of the hon. member, which amendment is to the effect that nothing in the Bill contained shall interfere with the contract between the Government and the company. Now, a word as to the last statement made by the hon. gentleman. He is very much afraid that the effect of this legislation will be to ratify the pooling arrangement between the Northern Railway Company and the Hamilton and North-Western Railway Company.

Mr. MULOCK. I did not say so.

Mr. McCARTHY. What did the hon. gentleman say as to that?

Mr. MULOCK. I said it would afford an argument to the company to ask Parliament to ratify it at a later time. I made an exception of that legislation that has taken place already.

Mr. McCARTHY. If that is all I do not think the hon. member need be much alarmed, because I find that the 8th section of the Act passed in 1884, says:

"The company may agree with the Northern Railway of Canada to extend the duration of the agreement of the 6th day of June, 1879, between the two companies, to the term of 999 years or from time to time for any shorter term or terms, and may make such changes therein and modifications thereof as may be deemed necessary or advisable in respect of substantially the same matter and subjects as are dealt with by that agreement, referred to and scheduled in the Northern Railway Company's Act, 1881."

Mr. MULOCK. No, I do not know anything about that. I was referring to the agreement, or to the section, which said they should not make the agreement except on getting the sanction of the Crown.

Mr. McCARTHY. The section goes on: "Providing always."

Mr. MULOCK. I only put in the proviso.

Mr. McCARTHY. Now, what the hon. gentleman is complaining of is that by innuendo, or by a side wind, this pooling arrangement between the Hamilton and the North-Western and the Northern will be ratified, or effect given to it in a modified way which will give ground for these companies coming to Parliament at a subsequent date and asking for such an arrangement. But it is plain that has been already done. Now, Sir, I, for one, was as much opposed as any one could be to this arrangement that was made between the Hamilton and North-Western Railway Company and the Northern Railway Company. The validity of that arrangement was tested in the courts. It came before Vice Chancellor Blake, then on the bench, and he decided in favor of the validity of the arrangement. I was solicitor for the county council at the time, and I advised an appeal, but they did not think fit to prosecute it. It has now lasted since 1879, so long that I doubt very much, legal or illegal, if the courts will interfere with it. So we may conclude that the arrangement which is to exist for a period of twenty-one years will continue. The proviso which the hon. member says he put in this Act, certainly gives sufficient protection for the future, because it says:

"Provided always, that no extension of such agreement shall be valid unless and until approved by the Governor in Council, and that before such approval shall be given, notice of the application thereof shall be published in the Canada Gazette, and in some paper published in the county of Simcoe, &c."

If, therefore, the hon. member still thinks there is any doubt there is no objection to putting a clause in this Bill that nothing in it contained shall affect the provision of this section 8 in the Act of the Hamilton and North-Western Company and the corresponding section of the Northern Company's Act. I am not promoting a Bill here, certainly, which is intended to have the effect of making that agreement of 1879 any more valid or effectual than it already is. As to the other part, I will meet the hon. member's views by submitting an amendment to the clause which, I think, he will agree protects the rights of the Crown, and the rights of Parliament, and it is in the words following:—

"Provided that this enactment is without prejudice to the agreement with the Government of Canada and the company, bearing date 12th April, 1884, and respecting the assumption by Parliament of the portion of said line of railway between Gravenhurst and Callander."

Mr. MITCHELL. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would state whether a clause of that kind would relieve the Government, if they should be called upon to take over that railway hereafter, from the liability to pay this $20,000 per mile in addition to the $12,000 bonus already given—in other words, making the whole liability of the Government, if they take over the road, $32,000 per mile. I do not enter at all into the legal questions which have been raised; I do not know much about them; but I do think, in the public interest, it is our duty as legislators to look carefully into an Act involving so much money, where the company was as liberally dealt with as this has been, by the Government, to which $12,000 per mile has been given as a bonus to build it with, on condition that if they failed to carry out the arrangement, or if the Government took possession of the road, they should take it over after paying the difference between the $12,000 and the cost of the road. All I am aiming at now in calling the hon. gentleman's attention to this point, is to have such an explanation as will satisfy this House, and to know whether he can put a clause in the agreement by which the public interested can be protected, where authority is given to issue railway bonds for $20,000 a mile, if the bonds get into the hands of the general public; I want to know how, after we have passed legislation and these bonds have been circulated, and passed into the hands of private parties, perhaps, without their knowledge of the Government lien, how he can put a clause in that Bill that will protect the public against having to pay $12,000 a mile over what they agreed to. It seems to me a monstrous proposition, and I would like to have a clear understanding of it.

Mr. COOK. It is a very great pity that we have not a general railway Act which would save us the difficulty that we have experienced in this and previous Sessions. The Sessions would be much shorter, it would do away with the Railway Committee, and the results would be that our Sessions could be shortened at least one month. We would not have all the charter selling, we would not have all the difficulties and scandals in connection with railways, that have been developed this Session and previous Sessions. Any person who wanted to build a railway would only have to furnish means and locate his line and build the road, irrespective of the Government. I think if the Government act wisely they will introduce some plan of this sort. In this case as well as in other cases that have been brought up in this House, there appears to be an underground railway, some members of this House taking a sleeping car; or if they are not in a good comfortable sleeping car, they are in sleeping apartments, or so it is rumored outside. As for the veracity of that statement, I do not know whether it is true or not, but still such rumors are afloat.

Mr. McCARTHY. If the hon. gentleman refers to me I desire him to say so, and I will have his words taken down.

Mr. COOK. I will talk to the hon. gentleman when I am ready, and I will say what I see fit. I will give him to understand that I am a member of this House, and understand my rights and privileges as such. Some reference was made to the Globe. I am not here to defend the Globe, for it can defend itself. Then, as to the question of $3,000 or $5,000 paid to the hon. gentleman as president of this railway, the principle is all the same.——

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope the hon. gentleman will address the Chair and confine himself to this Bill.

Mr. HESSON. He cannot do it.

Mr. COOK. The hon. member for North Perth had better hold his tongue. It is well known that the contractors of this company and the company itself have been at loggerheads for some time back. It is well known that they have only just settled the difficulties between them. They took the advice probably of some older and more experienced men than themselves because they did not wish to have developments made like those respecting another railway company whose charter is held by a gentleman in this House. The Government of the country are interested in this road to the extent of $12,000 a mile. They have a right at any time to take back the road if they pay the amount over and above $12,000 a mile, the actual cost of its construction. The company wants to bond the road for $20,000 a mile which will make a total of $32,000 a mile. In the event of Parliament wishing to take the road back they will have to pay $20,000 of bonds per mile to parties who will, no doubt, purchase the bonds, because I understand they are to be guaranteed by the Northern and North-Western to the extent of 4 per cent. Those bonds will, no doubt, be placed on the English market, and will be sold very readily. Such being the case, if the Government intend to take back the railway they will have to pay this extra $20,000 a mile. It is pretty well known that the road cost only between $20,000 and $25,000—say $25,000. So there will be a balance of $7,000 a mile above the cost. It will not be a matter like that of the member for West Toronto, but an amount of $770,000 which will go into the pocket of someone. Where will the money come from? Into whose pockets will it go? Among whom is it to be divided? The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) says he has not a cent. No, he has not a cent; nor have the rest of them. They have not got the money yet; I do not know how soon they may get it. There was something fishey about letting the contract—there was a great deal of manœuvring. A large number of parties tendered for the work. There were: John Carroll, St. Catharines; B. J. Brown, Ingersoll; James McMann, St. Catharines; D. S. Booth, Brockville; James Cosgrave, Prescott; John Ryan, Brockville; P. Larkin, St. Catharines; Alex. Manning, Toronto; Frank Manning, Toronto; — Peterson, Buffalo or Lockeport; Henry McFarlane, Toronto. Manning & Peterson's tenders were the lowest. The specifications were got out in such a way that a large number of men experienced in railway building did not tender for the work. It is pretty well understood that——

Mr. HAGGART. I rise to a point of order. That has nothing to do with the Bill before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion is on the whole principle of the Bill, which provides for additional bonds to be issued.

Mr. McCARTHY. No.

Mr. HAGGART. This is a statement of the contractors who contracted for the building of the road.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is about the contract for the building of the road.

Mr. COOK. The House is interested to the extent of $12,000 a mile.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is in reference to the contract of building the road. Are additional bonds to be issued?

Mr. McCARTHY. No. The power is to issue one kind of bonds instead of another. There is power to issue bonds to the extent of $20,000 a mile, and it is proposed to issue debenture stock instead of bonds.

Mr. COOK.

Mr. MULOCK. I hardly think the hon. gentleman has put the issue correctly. It is true, as he pointed out, that the Act of incorporation gives power to bond the road to the extent of $20,000 a mile, but subsequently their borrowing power was modified by the contract made with the Crown. It is the position of the Crown we are seeking to protect.

Mr. McCARTHY. I will introduce a clause to cover that.

Mr. MULOCK. This Bill modifies that.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is not the point of order.

Mr. MULOCK. I say that this Bill if passed to-day will make the Crown liable for $20,000 a mile, whereas under the contract previously the company only had power to issue bonds to the extent of $8,000 per mile as against the Crown.

Mr. SPEAKER. For what is this schedule required?

Mr. McCARTHY. It is the lease between the two roads, this road and the Northern and North-Western Railways.

Mr. SPEAKER. This refers to the construction of the road. Is this schedule to be confirmed?

Mr. McCARTHY. No, it is just referred to.

Mr. EDGAR. If I recollect correctly there was a petition presented to this House against the Bill by the contractors, who were spoken of just now by the member for Simcoe (Mr. Cook), and giving the particulars of their claims. That petition is before the House.

Mr. MILLS. Unquestionably the hon. member is in order. He is discussing the whole policy of the Government, he is dealing with that policy, and the manner in which the work has been done. If there was anything improper in letting the contract, if there were larger liabilities being incurred than were necessary, if the securities were being diminished, certainly the member has a right to discuss the whole matter for the purpose of making that clear to the House.

Mr. COOK. I recognise that I have hit gentlemen pretty hard.

Mr. HESSON. Oh, oh.

Mr. COOK. The chirping member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) had better hold his tongue. I was about to say that the rumors current at the time of letting the contract were that the specifications were specially prepared in such a manner that the contract must fall into the hands of a certain party. It is understood that is so. The other gentlemen who tendered, who were the lowest and who were likely to kick up a row, were taken into the contract. The contract was let to Dawson, Hendrie & Co., with several others whose names were not mentioned. The sureties are William Hendrie and Dr. Ferguson, M.P. for Welland, I understand.

An hon. MEMBER. Were those two of the contractors?

Mr. COOK. Those were the sureties; I do not know about the other matter. However, it is said that the spoils are to be pretty equally divided. They are going to bond the road for $20,000 and build it for $25,000 per mile. They are going to divide spoils to the extent of $770,000, which is a greater amount for a small road than any one I know of. The member for West Toronto (Mr. Beaty), I believe, has a road 400 miles long; his plunder is $640,000; but this road is only a little over 100 miles, and they propose to distribute in the way of grab no less a sum than $770,000.

Mr. MILLS. There are more boys in this.

Mr. COOK. Yes; and in consequence of this a large number of gentlemen through the country refused to tender. Bailey & Co., for instance, who did tender, were very much annoyed; Mr. Bailey talked very loud because his tender, being the lowest, was not accepted. But he was provided for, like many other contractors whom it was necessary to take in so that they would not squeal. Mr. Bailey became engineer-in-chief of this railway. He was so capable a man and so able to perform work of this kind that they employed him in that capacity, and by doing this they closed his mouth. Mr. Alexander Manning was one of the lower tenderers. It could not be said that he is not an able and capable man and a man of means—a man who has money at his command at all times to go on with such work. Mr. Peterson and Mr. Frank Manning were also low, but young Mr. Manning was taken in, Mr. Peterson was taken in, and I suppose by young Mr. Manning being taken in the elder Mr. Manning was satisfied, and the company was made up of men of this class. It was stated at the time that the only reason for giving the contract to this syndicate was that there was scarcely any one else capable of furnishing the money necessary to go on with the work. I do not know about that; I think myself there are plenty of men who are capable and I know the part of the country through which the road runs. There is no part of Ontario where a road can be built much cheaper or better. It is a level country; they have at their disposal the necessary wood for ties and fencing; they have good gravel pits all along the line and the road could be built very cheaply. The company also endeavor to work cheaply in the construction of their stations. At one place that I know of, a station was to be placed at a village called Utterson, they discovered that the people there were very anxious for the station, and gave it out that they were going to build it two miles away. In that way they forced the poor settlers there to give them a bonus of $1,000, provided the station would be built at Utterson. I understood they did the same thing at several other places, and this shows the economy of the contractors for the construction of this road. I suppose they proposed to use the same means as are used by other parties. They have received and will receive from the Government in subsidies the amount of $1,320,000, and they propose to bond this road for $2,200,000 at $20,000 per mile. The road should have been in operation long ago; the people are very anxious for it, but the difficulties between the contractors and the company were such that the road could not be opened, and the consequence is that freight, which were contracted for to be carried over the road, is lying there and cannot be removed. Well, I am glad they have come to a settlement.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. COOK. I have no doubt that the gentlemen who chirp so loudly, probably if they have not an interest in works of this kind would like to have. You will always find that men who call thief the loudest are generally the biggest thieves themselves. I wish to say something now about these two companies which are about to lease the neutral line, although that subject has been gone into pretty extensively by my hon. friend for North York. These roads run through the constituencies of the hon. members for South and North Simcoe, and they are largely interested in the matter; they are interested to the extent that the county council passed a unanimous resolution memorialising the Government that the bonuses which were paid by the Simcoes should be refunded to them, as the works had been taken over by the Dominion, as they were supposed to be works for the general advantage of Canada. Therefore, I expect to hear from my hon. friends, whose reeves and deputy reeves were so unanimous in that memorial. The Simcoes were laboring under the monopoly of the Northern Railway for a great many years, and to break that monopoly they entered into an arrangement to build a competing line from Barrie and Collingwood to Hamilton, called the Hamilton and North-Western. Large bonuses were given by municipalities in the county, on the express and distinct understanding that it should be a competing line. The hon. member for North Simcoestated a short time ago, that he was acting for the county council and was solicitor for the county of Simcoe. He drew up those agreements with the various municipalities, and I am sorry to say that they were drawn in so loose a manner that a coach and four was driven through them almost before the ink was dry on the paper. However, the people know the circumstances, and they see the connection the hon. gentleman has now with the men who promoted the Hamilton and North-Western Railway. The result of it all is, that, to-day, instead of competing lines of railroad, they have a greater monopoly than ever they had before. Wheat last year was carried from Collingwood at a cent and a half a bushel, while at 30 miles nearer to Toronto they charged the farmers 8 cents a bushel to Toronto. That is the monopoly that has been created, and I think it is time the Government should interfere to put an end to matters of this kind. The monopoly is greater now because they know they cannot get another railway. They know they have all the lines they possibly can expect in that part of the country, and as long as the amalgamation continues the people are to be swindled by the increased cost of carrying their produce to market. I just wish to make one more statement, that is, in reference to the visit of the committee of the County Council of Simcoe who waited on the Premier. On that occasion the hon. leader of the House stated to the deputation——

"The words of the Act of 1883 declared certain roads for the general advantage of Canada"——

Mr. SPEAKER. I think that has really nothing to do with this Bill. That is an Act relating to certain railways in the Province of Ontario and declaring them to be railways for the general advantage of Canada.

Mr. COOK. Well, I do not wish to bring this up in a hostile way at all. I merely wished to draw the attention of the Premier to the statement he made, and the result of that statement.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member will see that that opens up a vast field for discussion on a public Act, while this is a private Act.

Mr. COOK. I will not attempt to discuss that matter. I hope I will have an opportunity of discussing it again, when I will show that the statement the hon. Premier made on that occasion was entirely fallacious, I think I have about stated my case so far as this railway is concerned. I trust that the Government will see that the road is opened at a very early date. It is of paramount importance to the people along that line. One thing I will mention. I received from the reeve of the township of Monck a letter stating that in crossing from Muskoka to the township of Monck the railway crossed on the side line, blocking the road, so that the people have to travel two and a-half miles to get around. I applied to the Department of Railways, and asked for communications that had passed between the reeve of Monck and the Government, and I propose when I get those letters to lay them before the Minister of Railways. I have no doubt, as soon as his attention is called to it, that he will settle the matter, because it is one of those grievous and vexatious incidents that injure the feelings of people who have to travel long distances, particularly when the roads are bad. I hope in a day or two to get the correspondence, when I will lay it before the Minister of Railways, who I hope, will be recovered from his illness, and will be able to give his attention to it.

Motion agreed to, and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. MULOCK. I beg to amend this clause as follows:—

By striking out of the 32nd and 33rd lines of the first paragraph thereof the words: "The sum of $20,000 per mile of such portion," and by inserting in lieu thereof the following words: The value of said railway over and above the Government subsidy of $12,000 per mile, such value to be ascertained, in case the Government cannot agree, by arbitration, the arbitrators to be appointed, one by the Government and the other by the said company, and the third by the two so appointed; failing agreement as to such third arbitrator, then by one of the chief justices of the High Court of Ontario, under the provisions of the Ontario Judicature Act in that behalf, and the award of the majority shall be binding.

Mr. McCARTHY. The effect of that amendment would be to destroy the Bill. No bonds could be issued if it were adopted. Its meaning is that bonds may be issued to the value of the railway. How are the purchasers of the bonds to ascertain what the value of the railway is? The bonds are offered on the market for sale.

Mr. MULOCK. That is your present proposition?

Mr. McCARTHY. No, it is not. The hon. gentleman will see by the contract that there is no limitation of the bonds.

Mr. MULOCK. As against the Crown there is.

Mr. McCARTHY. The company had the right to issue bonds to the extent of $20,000 a mile. The lease between the two companies provides that up to $12,000 the bonds shall be issued by the consent of the directors, and beyond that amount by the consent of the shareholders; but it was never supposed that $8,000 a mile would build the road. As the hon. gentleman knows, in 1883 it was estimated that it would cost $24,000 a mile. As I have stated, I have no desire at all that the contract between the Government and the company should be in the slightest degree affected, and I propose to add at the end of the clause the words:

Provided that this enactment is without prejudice to the agreement between the Government of Canada and the company, bearing date the 12th day of April, 1884, respecting the assumption by Parliament of the portion of said line of railway between Gravenhurst and Callander.

I move that in amendment to the amendment of the hon. member. Perhaps I may now explain what the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) asked. I think he has misunderstood the contract between the Government and the company. The company was formed for the purpose of building this railway. The Government subsidised it to the extent of $12,000 a mile, and the company had power to borrow to the extent of $20,000 a mile; but the agreement between the Government and the company was that if at any time hereafter, Parliament, not the Government, was satisfied that the company was not acting up to its engagements or discharging its chartered duties fairly, then Parliament might cancel this lease and assume the bonded debt of the company absolutely to the extent of $8,000 a mile and to so much more as the road at that time might be worth. Therefore the power to issue bonds was given in this way. There was power to issue bonds to the extent of $20,000 a mile and the bondholders took their chances as to whether the road at that date would be worth $20,000 a mile or not. If not, then the bonds would not be assumed by Parliament. That is the position the contract was in, and it is not proposed to disturb that positoin in the slightest degree.

Mr. MULOCK. Does not the section disturb that?

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not think so. The company do not, in the slightest degree, desire to affect its contract with the Government by a side wind, but understands that Parliament, should the company not do its duty by the public, may at some future time come in and redeem the bonds, and the bondholders will buy on that chance. It was perfectly understood more bonds would have to be issued, and that perhaps application would have to be made to Parliament for relief in that regard. That is the explanation, and I hope the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) will find it satisfactory.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am glad to get that explanation, but must ask my hon. friend to give a little more explanation before I can be satisfied that we should give the legislation asked for. I am not at all interested locally, as my hon. friend is, who moved the amendment, and do not profess to interest myself in the local question affected by this measure. The one thing that interests me is this: Parliament agreed to give the magnificent subsidy of $12,000 a mile for the construction of what was a very desirable link between our Western Territories and Toronto, the distance being, I believe, about 110 miles. In the contract between the Government and the company, if I understand it rightly, the company agreed, in the case of certain contingencies arising, which it is quite possible might arise—if, for instance, at any time they did not run the road satisfactorily, or if they failed in the payment of the interest on the bonds, or if it became a matter of national interest that the Government should assume the road—that the Government, authorised by Parliament, could take over that road for its cost, less the $12,000 a mile subsidy. This would leave $8,000 a mile to be paid by the Government, assuming the road to cost $20,000 a mile, as estimated at the time. The Bill we are discussing introduces an important alteration as regards the amount of bonds to be issued, by providing that the company may issue bonds to the entent of $20,000 a mile on the road. The company have been paid already $12,000 a mile subsidy, and if they now get authority to issue bonds for $20,000 a mile, that will make $32,000 a mile; so that before the Government could take the road over, they would have, besides the $12,000 they have already paid, to assume the bonds to the extent of $20,000 a mile.

Mr. McCARTHY. No.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have listened with some attention to the explanations of the hon. gentleman, and my conviction is that the construction put upon the clause will be this. My hon. friend says "no;" but I would like to ask him, if these bonds to the extent of $20,000 a mile be in circulation, amounting to millions, on the public markets of Europe and America, and the Government decided to take over the road, in the public interest, either because the interest was not paid on the bonds, or because the company refused to run the road, so that they might force the Government to take it over, would not the Government be in the position I describe? The Government have already paid $12,000 per mile, and they would have to redeem the bonds floated to the extent of $20,000 more per mile. It is all very fine to say that the purchasers of the bonds will have to take them with the responsibility that attaches to the company. Would that be in answer to the private holders or even to public opinion? Would it be an answer to the sensitive feelings of the stock exchange people and the investors both in Europe and at home? No, Sir; the Government would be bound to pay, in addition to the $12,000 a mile, the whole amount of the bonds issued. There is no other construction to be put on that clause. My hon. friend says he is willing to put a provision in the Bill to the effect that nothing in the Bill shall alter or affect the original contract. That would be all very well, if the bonds were in the hands of the company; but when the bonds have gone into the general market and out of the control of the company, how could the Government take that position? The answer would be that the Government had been a party to deceiving the general public by so wording the clause that it would bear the construction that if the Government took over the road with the issue of $20,000 per mile in bonds upon it, they would have to pay the $32,000. This would make a difference to the country of $1,300,000 in all, if the Government took over the road. I do not know any clause the hon. gentleman can put in, on the line he has suggested, which can remedy this defect in the Bill, if the bonds once become public property and circumstances force the Government to take over the road. The popular view of a measure of this kind which would come before Parliament, would be to compel the Government to pay the whole $32,000 a mile. I might illustrate this by a parallel case that occurred here a few weeks ago when the ship canal Bill was up, in which we got involved to the extent of some $3,300,000, that I consider was practically thrown away.

Mr. McCARTHY. Order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am in order; I am illustrating, by an argument that I used then, the effect this Bill will have, if we adopt a similar course now to the one we adopted then. I am endeavoring to show that when the hon. gentleman puts the construction he does on this Bill, the answer is given by saying: "Oh, you are bound already by the issue on our part of $20,000 a mile." I do not know whether we are or not. That is a point I need not deal with as far as this question is concerned; but if we are so bound, I say it is by mistake, or worse still, by collusion; and as to either horn of the dilemma, it is a wrong upon the public, and when these gentlemen ask further facilities to enable them to carry on their scheme, it is in the right of Parliament to say: We will be compelled by the construction of the Act passed to carry out what you have proposed, and let you have the advantage; but we can refuse to give you further facilities, and prevent further legislation to-day by refusing to confirm a mistake or error or collusion, if such exist, and if so which ought never to have existed. Something has been said about the cost of this road. I am told there is no rolling stock on the road, but that simply the road-bed is leased to the Northern and North-Western Railways, and an agreement made to pay interest upon $8,000 a mile and the interest on the bonds. The interest they have to pay is on $8,000 a mile, not on the bonds, I believe I am not wrong in that. That is to be paid as a rental. Where, then, is the necessity for issuing this $20,000 a mile? What is it for?

Mr. McCARTHY. That is not the rental. The rent is the amount of the bond issue, whatever that may be, and 4 per cent. upon the paid-up stock. That is what the rent is. If the hon. gentleman reads the lease, he will find that out.

Mr. MITCHELL. Perhaps I am in error. I accept the hon. gentleman's explanation and suppose I am in error, as he states so, but I read it that they were to pay rental upon $8,000 a mile, and then there was the difference between that and $20,000. I understood the cost of the road was estimated at $20,000 a mile. That is amply sufficient, I should think, to cover the cost of a road with nothing but a road-bed, and with such a character of country. I am told that the greater portion of the country is not very severe to build over. Some of it is pretty severe, I am told, but I am informed that $20,000 a mile is ample to complete it. Whether it is so or not I do not know, but, after looking over the agreements and looking over the Bill now before the House, I think it rests with gentlemen who wish to guard the public interest to prevent them from getting confirmation of any mistakes the Government may have made. If they have a right, legally, under existing legislation, let them keep it, but let us not confirm it and fetter the chains upon us by sanctioning, after it comes to our knowledge, either any mistake which has occurred or an advantage obtained over the Government to the extent of $1,300,000, which I believe there has been.

Mr. McMULLEN. We ought fairly to understand what effort has been made to find out the real cost of this road. It would be exceedingly imprudent for the House to grant the company power to issue bonds beyond the actual cost of the road. If we can find out what the amount of that cost is, it would be within the duty and power of the House to grant that privilege, but, if the road has not cost $32,000 a mile, it is clear the country is running great risk in granting this power to the company. There is one or other of two difficulties that we have to stare in the face. Either, in the first place, the Hamilton and North-Western Railway Company, along with the Northern Railway Company, want to use the security they have got under their hand by becoming the owners or lessees of this road, or else the contractors are in collusion with the Hamilton and North-Western Railway Company, whereby there is going to be a very large amount of money pocketed by some person. Before the company are granted the power to bond this road, the Government should employ some person totally outside and independent of the company and of everyone else interested in it to make an actual careful calculation as to what the real value of the line is, and then it would be fair for the company to ask this House to grant them power to bond the road to a sum sufficient to meet the actual cost over the amount which has been already granted towards its construction, but to ask us to permit them to issue bonds to the amount of $20,000 a mile when we are virtually in the dark as to the actual cost of the road is too much on the part of that company. I do not think we have any right to consent to a course of that kind, because, if we do that, and, through the company not efficiently operating the road afterwards or through any necessity which might happen, if Government take possession of the line, those who hold the bonds and who are outside holders would have a fair ground of claim against the country for a refund of the money which they have invested in these bonds. The Hamilton and North-Western Railway Company do not ask that these bonds should cover the other portion of their line, but that they shall merely cover the 110 miles of new line to which the Government has granted this money. They will clearly be against that and not against any other portion of the Hamilton and North-Western or Northern Railway, so, if the Government should see it necessary to take over this line in the interest of the company they would have to settle with those bondholders, because they will say: You sanctioned those bonds, they were placed on the market under a law of the Parliament of Canada, and you cannot repudiate the bonds now on the ground that the road did not cost the money. Thus we would virtually be in for the whole amount of the bonds we are going to allow them to issue. The whole Dominion is deeply interested in this matter. The Province of Ontario is deeply interested in it. It is important that the road should be run efficiently, and we should take great care before we permit the issue of the bonds. I do not believe that that road ever cost $20,000 a mile or anything like it, notwithstanding the estimate which has been submitted and the certificate which has been given. I know men of extended experience in the construction of railways who have passed over the road from one end to the other who have seen every foot of it, who have walked all over it, and they have declared that it cost nothing like $20,000 a mile, ironed and everything else, and I am satisfied they are correct. I venture to say that, if the Government will appoint three competent, experienced engineers, men who have extended experience in building railways, totally independent of both the Government and the railway company, to value that road, they will not say it cost $20,000 a mile or anything like it. I am satisfied it never cost any such money, because there are portions of it that can be quite easily built, though other portions are perhaps harder to build. From the manner in which the contract was let, from the collusion which existed between the parties tendering for the work, the whole thing from beginning to end bears the evidence of a huge job, inaugurated and carried on as far as the construction is concerned, carried on as far as the railway company is concerned, and it is going to be carried on as far as the bonded debt is concerned. It is quite clear that there is some thing wrong in this matter, and the House is assuming a serious responsibility in lending its countenance to the issue of a bonded debt upon a road which we have a right to take over at its actual value without learning the actual value now, and limiting the issue of bonds to that actual value. In going beyond that we are committing a very grave mistake, because we are committing the country to an extensive bonded debt that there is no necessity for. It is quite clear that the Hamilton and North-Western and Northern Railways are going to use the credit of that road to improve their own condition as corporations, or else they are going to divide the spoil between the contractors and the parties interested.

Mr. EDGAR. In connection with this Bill, there is a matter I would like to draw the attention of the president of the road and of the Government to. In the lease, which is a schedule to this Bill, there is a provision that the Canadian Pacific Railway shall make an arrangement for through rates and fares in connection with this railway within six months after the date of the lease, and there is an elaborate provision for an arbitration in case they do not do it, and the clause goes on to say that this clause shall have no effect, unless the Canadian Pacific Railway shall do so within six months. I understand that the Canadian Pacific Railway have not done so, that they did not do so within six months, and, what is more, that they have not done so yet. It is all very well for us to legislate for a railway and try to make provision to assist this line, or the lessees, but unless provision is made to give the company or the lessees the benefit of through rates and fares, and proper connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway at Callander, we might just as well not legislate at all, and the Government might just as well not have given a cent of the $12,000 a mile. Now, I think it is exceedingly important that the House should have an idea of what has been done recently, because it was not done the other day, for, in reply to my enquiry, the Government said it was not; and if it has not been done, what arrangements are being made that it should be done?

Mr. McCARTHY. I think the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) misunderstood some matters which, perhaps, are of importance. There seems to be an impression on the other side of the House that this company has no rolling stock on the line. I do not know where they got that idea. Rolling stock is to be put on the line, and rolling stock is now being procured at Cobourg and elsewhere.

Mr. DAVIES. How much a mile will that cost?

Mr. McCARTHY. I think in the neighborhood of $300,000, that is, $3,000 a mile, somewhere in that neighborhood. Then I do not know what the hon. member means by saying that there was a conspiracy, in point of fact, that the directors of this road would eat up the whole amount of this bond issue. Now, I submit that it is very unfair for any member on the floor of Parliament to make a statement of that kind unless he is prepared to back it up. If the hon. member will make that charge on his responsibility as a member of the House, and formulate a clear statement, he shall have full opportunity of proving it, that I tell him. I say there is not a word of truth in it, there is not the slightest ground for it. So far as the contract is concerned, I was not in the company at the time it was made, and I do not know the terms upon which the specifications were issued. I do not know who were the tenderers, for I had nothing at all to do with it. But I am quite satisfied in saying that Mr. Charles Moss, who took a great interest in it, was privy to no fraud, that I will venture to say, and I think no gentleman who knows Mr. Charles Moss will venture to contradict my statement. Now, the question really is whether these parties who are interested are to have the means of placing these debentures or bonds upon the market. The bonds are at present held mainly by the Bank of Montreal; $12,000 have been issued and handed over to the contractors, and there is still a considerable sum due to the contractors—I do not know how much—a large sum, I believe. Hon. members will see that no bonds can be issued beyond $12,000 a mile without the consent of the Northern Railway shareholders and stockholders, and the Hamilton and North-Western Railway shareholders. Now, if hon. members will reflect that these bonds became a charge upon both these roads, and these roads are paying concerns, they will understand how impossible it is that the companies should be parties or privy to anything that is charged here by hon. gentlemen opposite. That they should issue bonds beyond the actual construction upon which they would have to pay interest, appears to me so absurd that if hon. members would reflect for a moment they would not assume it to be possible unless they assume that all the gentlemen on this side of the Atlantic from Mr. Barker, the manager and representative of the Northern, and the bondholders who own that road, and everybody else connected with it, should lend themselves to this gigantic fraud. There is not a word of truth in the accusation, and I challenge any hon. member to formulate the charge and he will have full opportunity to prove it.

Mr. McMULLEN. I stated in my remarks that I had met, a few days ago, a gentleman who walked over the entire line of road and he stated to me that it was his candid opinion that the entire road did not cost $20,000 a mile. I say that I believe if the Government instituted an investigation to ferret out the exact value, they will find that it is not worth more than $20,000 complete, with the steel on it.

Mr. BOWELL. That is not what you said.

Mr. MILLS. I think the House is entitled to more information than those who are interested in this charter have given us. We are entitled to know what this road cost.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is not completed yet.

Mr. MILLS. I understood that the work is nearly done.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman will understand that it is not a lump contract, it is so much according to measurement, a schedule contract, and this contract is made in such a way that in case of disagreement between the company and the contractors, Mr. Hobson—and every body will say he is a responsible engineer—is to settled disputes as to the quantity.

Mr. MILLS. Certainly the company have had the quantities estimated and have sent an engineer over the road, they know what the amount of traffic is, they know the amount of building, and they know the terms upon which their contract has been made. Why should they not give to the House that estimate? Why is that information not given to the House upon this subject?

Mr. McCARTHY. When Mr. Barker, the manager of the road, was here before the Railway Committee, why did not hon. gentlemen ask for information on any of these points? They could have got it all in detail. These matters ought to have been brought up in the Railway Committee.

Mr. MILLS. It is quite clear that these matters ought to be brought before the House, and if they were not brought before the committee this House would be altogether wanting in its duty if, in the case of a road which has been subsidised to the extent of $12,000 a mile, it permitted amendments to be made in its charter, and additional powers given it which might seriously affect the public interest, without insisting upon the fullest information. I do not say that the amendment asked is unreasonable. So far as my information goes, the company are asking permission to issue bonds to the extent of $8,000 to $10,000 per mile, beyond what is necessary. Now, what is the effect of that upon the arrangement between the Government and the company? Certainly after those bonds are issued, the Government could not invoke any contract making them liable for a less sum in case they took over the road. I think the Government would be liable, if called upon to pay, not for the amounts specified in the original contract, but for that amount as modified by the additional powers that the company have acquired by the legislation now being sought. Why should we give the company power to issue bonds to the amount of several thousand dollars per mile beyond the actual requirements of the company? The hon. gentleman says that the company can have no interest in the arrangement of this sort; but I say that if the Government is to buy out the company, if it is to make a public appropriation to it, if the company's interests and rights are to be extinguished, the company have a great interest in the legislation that is being sought. It has an interest of from $7,000 to $10,000 a mile, according to representations that have been made to me. I think we ought not to sanction legislation of that sort, and the hon. gentleman, before he asks for it, should give that information which ought to have been given in committee, but which it is not too late to give now, and which this House ought to insist upon before it permits a further step to be taken.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I think this House has had already some information in the matter. In the first place the contract was let by Mr. Moss, who was president of the road, for so much per yard, so much per pound of iron. It has cost $27,000 a mile, and yet the road is not complete. Now, how can the company tell that it will not take $3,000 a mile, or in all, $32,000 to complete the road? The hon. gentleman from Wellington says that a gentleman walked over the entire road and said it could have been built for $20,000 a mile. That is a very strong statement for any hon. member to make to this committee. The work is being done by the yard and the iron is contracted for by the pound, and it will be very difficult to state the extent of the work, but it has been announced that up to the present time the expenditure has reached about $27,000 a mile. Under these circumstances how can an hon. member, who professes to be a practical man, declare that the road will be built for $20,000 a mile? It is unreasonable for any hon. member to make a statement of that kind, and thus try and convince the committee not to grant this Bill. If I understand the matter rightly, the Government have to pay what the road is worth if they take it over. Suppose bonds are issued to the extent of $20,000 a mile; the Government give $12,000 a mile, making $32,000 a mile in all. Suppose further, that the Government three or four years hence decide to take over this branch. Suppose the value of the road is $25,000 a mile, the parties holding the bonds will have to lose the other $7,000 a mile. The Government is not bound, if the road has been built for $26,000 or $28,000 a mile to pay $32,000 if they desire to take it over. That matter was before the Railway Committee and was fully discussed.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Yes, and it was before a subcommittee.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. McCARTHY. No, it was the other Bill.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). This Bill was before the Railway Committee at all events and the committee were satisfied to grant what is asked in this Bill, $20,000 a mile. The contractors have received already $26 000 or $27,000 a mile and the road is not yet completed. The have got the Government's $12,000 a mile, they have bonds for $12,000 a mile and the company owes them $3,000 or $4,000 a mile, and the road is not yet completed. The contract was let by Mr. Moss of Toronto, a gentleman who would not lend himself to anything either dishonest or imprudent. We should grant this company what they seek because they are asking only what is reasonable and right.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman's argument may be very good, but it does not meet the point suggested by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. I would be sorry to give a vote that would prejudice the undertaking, but the point raised by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) seems worthy of consideration. Let us get down to the actual dispute between that hon. gentleman and the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). The Bill proposes to allow the company to bond the road for $20,000 a mile. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) says: I move that that arbitrary sum be struck out of the Bill and that there be inserted $8,000 a mile and such other sum as it may cost. He practically allows the road to be bonded to the full extent of its cost. If any dispute should arise the value would be decided by arbitrators. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) states: What difference is it to the Government if the company wants to bond the road for $20,000 a mile, why do you want to limit it? The reply is that the agreement entered into between the Government and the company before the Act was passed provided that if the Government choose to acquire the road they should pay to the company some $8,000 a mile ——

Mr. McCARTHY. Not to the company. They will assume the bonds.

Mr. DAVIES. $8,000 a mile and such further sum beyond that amount as the said railway may then be worth. Now here comes in the force of the position stated by the member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). That agreement allows the company to bond the road for $8,000 a mile, and if this Bill is granted and Parliament allows the company to bond the road for $20,000 a mile and those bonds pass into the hands of private persons and they are made preferential bonds, if the Government attempt to take advantage of the expropriation clause, they would be bound in honor and in equity not to pay what the road would then be worth but the amount of bonds they had authorised to be issued. That would be the effect of the Bill if it were passed, and the committee should hesitate before passing it. What I desire to know is this: It is said by two or three gentlemen who are acquainted with railway building that the road will not cost more than $20,000 a mile. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) said it would cost $3,000 a mile to provide it will rolling stock, which would raise the sum to $23,000 a mile. The company have the Government subsidy of $12,000 a mile and they propose to issue bonds bringing the amount up to $32,000 a mile, leaving $9,000 a mile surplus.

Mr. McCARTHY. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to explain. I think I have said already that there has been placed in the contractors' hands $12,000 a mile. There is due to the contractors a very large amount, the exact sum of which I am not able to give; they have also received $12,000 a mile in bonds, making in all $24,000 which they have received; and in addition $3,000 a mile will be required for equipment. The hon. gentleman will see that there will not be very much left to go upon. When it is considered that the Ontario and Quebec, which runs through a much better country, cost about $30,000 a mile, it will be obvious that this road is not going to cost an exorbitant sum.

Mr. DAVIES. Accepting the hon. gentleman's statement as correct there is still a large margin.

Mr. MULOCK. Will the hon. gentleman explain in what part of the agreement he finds a provision in regard to providing equipment?

Mr. McCARTHY. I will do so.

Mr. MITCHELL. The promoter of the Bill has stated that these objections ought to have been taken in the Railway Committee. He is quite right in that the objection should have been taken before the Railway Committee. But the hon. gentleman knows, and the House knows that unless a person is specially interested in a Bill before the committee, the chances are that little attention will be paid to it, and I frankly own that I neglected my duty in the matter, because I believe it to be the duty of every man who is a member of that committee to attend to every Bill that comes before it. But in the multiplicity of other business that is sometimes impossible, and I confess that I did not look into this Bill very closely. It was only called to my attention when the hon. member for North York got up in the committee about one o'clock to move an amendment to the Bill, or to seek information, or to make some explanation, and then the chairman of the committee, the hon. minister of Public Works stated that he had to attend a meeting of Council and the time was up. Then the hon. member for North York stated that he would bring the matter up before the House. Now, while I say that this ought to have been done in committee, the responsibility still rests on us, and if we neglect anything in committee it is our duty to bring it up in the House, especially when so important a question is involved. Another point taken by the hon. gentleman is that Mr. Barker was before the committee, and that he could give the information which my hon. friend cannot give, not being a practical railway man. Well, it is easy to get Mr. Barker to come; he should have stopped here to give the information, and the House should not be asked to pass legislation so important in ignorance of the actual facts. There is another point to which I shall refer. I must express my surprise that the Government of the day sit in their places hearing this discussion, knowing that if the statements made are true, if the facts and the construction put upon them in connection with this Bill are logically stated—knowing that the country is liable to be called on to pay $1,300,000 more than the agreement with the company who are promoting this road. Now, if that is true, it behooves the Government to get up and explain what that agreement was, what they understood by it, whether or not they understood they were to pay for the road the full amount of the bonds which were issued, in addition to the $12,000 already paid. That is the crucial point in this matter from the standpoint from which I speak—in the public interest. It is the duty of the Government to explain their construction of it, and if they do not, if it can be proved that in case of there being a desire to take over the road for any reason, they will be held responsible for that amount over and above the agreement, and the country will hold the Government—whose duty it is to watch these private Bills and guard the public interests—responsible for neglect if neglect there is in this matter.

Mr. DAVIES. According to the statement of the hon. member for Simcoe there will be $27,000 required, and then he says there is a sum still due to the contractors. The $20,000 bonds and the $12,000 subsidy make $32,000 which he proposes to raise, leaving a difference of $5,000 per mile or nearly $600,000 in all. Now is there any such amount due to the contractors? That is a very important point upon which we should be correctly informed, because if that sum is not due we should not authorise the company to bond the road for the amount they now ask, viz., $600,000 beyond its actual requirements. By adopting the proposition of my hon. friend for North York the company bond the road to any amonnt over and above the Government subsidy of $12,000 per mile. He allows them to bond the road to the full extent of its value, and he says, if the Government and the company cannot agree as to that value let them appoint arbitrators. Now do they want power to bond the road for a larger amount than its value? If the Government were not interested they might say: This is a matter which you can arrange among yourselves; it does not affect the public interest. But if we are to be in the position of expropriating this road and to pay this amount, it will materially affect public interests. The question is, may not this new legislation compel us to pay in the full amount, and, if not, what is the objection to expressly limiting our liability in case we do expropriate the road to its actual value? I do not think the amendment of the member from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is very explicit, because no bondholder reading that proviso would imagine it had anything to do with the private arrangement.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is referred to, and the date is given

Mr. DAVIES. In such general terms that nobody can understand it.

Mr. McCARTHY. I have no objection, if you like, to put it in the schedule.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not see that the company is bound under the lease to provide any rolling stock at all.

Mr. McCARTHY. They are doing so, and under the 3rd clause of the agreement there is a reference to it.

Mr. MULOCK. That is the agreement of 1884.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is the lease.

Mr. MULOCK. As it is six o'clock I have drawn up an amendment and have tried to meet the views of the hon. member for Simcoe.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think the hon. gentleman will be satisfied to put it in as a schedule.

Mr. MULOCK. Let me read my amendment, and I will explain wherein I think it is better than the other arrangement.

It being Six o'clock, the Committee rose, and the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MULOCK. I understood when the Speaker left the Chair that the hon. member for North Simcoe was about to propose some other amendment in lieu of the one he had offered.

Mr. McCARTHY. What I told the hon. member was that I would schedule the contract, and instead of referring to it by the date, would refer to it by the schedule, by adding the words; "And which said contract is set forth in schedule B to this Act."

Mr. MITCHELL. This amendment is not entirely what I would like, but on the whole I think it is the best thing we could do in the public interest. I for one am prepared to accept it.

Mr. MULOCK. If the Minister of Justice is of opinion that that contract leaves the rights of the Crown just as they are under the contract of April, 1884, I have nothing further to say on this question.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have no doubt at all that the clause which the hon. member in charge of the Bill has introduced would save all the rights of the Government.

Mr. MULOCK. That being the case, I am prepared to accept the amendment of the hon. member for North Simcoe.

Amendment (Mr. Mulock) negatived, and amendment (Mr. McCarthy) agreed to.

On section 5,

Mr. EDGAR. As I see the First Minister in the House, I would like to ask him as to a point I raised this afternoon when he was absent. This section confirms the lease which is made a schedule of the Act, and in the lease there is a provision that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company shall, within six months from the date of that lease, make an agreement with this company to fix their rates and fares in favor of that line, so that the Ontario system of railways, which is to tap the Canadian Pacific Railway at Callander, may have something like a fair chance of getting its share of the trade of the North-West, over the Canadian Pacific Railway, without its having to come around by Carleton Place. It is of vital importance that this should be attended to. The grant of $12,000 a mile to this railway is entirely without justification if it is to be considered a purely local road. The only possible reason for giving that subsidy was to make an independent connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway for Ontario, and the provision made in this lease was in order to secure a fair chance for that connection. Without that, of course, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have the matter absolutely in their own hands. They need not send a pound of freight over the Ontario line unless they chose, because they can establish such rates as will throw all the freight to the east. I asked the Government whether the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had made the agreement within the six months provided in this clause, and I was told that they had not. Before this Bill goes through the committee, I am sure the House would like to know what prospect there is of the Government securing that arrangement from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. If they have not done it there is nothing in the lease that I can see to enable the Northern Railway Company to compel them to do it. The matter must be dealt with by the Government. I have no doubt they will be able to secure that from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company if they say so, and I would like very much to hear from the Government what prospect there is of getting that agreement made, because without it all our legislation is useless, and this railway will only be a fair road for opening up the Muskoka district.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman has made some remarks about the agreement in relation to traffic over these lines. I am not here to speak for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and I do not speak for them now; but as the Government remain silent, and do not give the hon. gentleman any answer, I will state what I believe to be the facts, from information I have casually gained; and if I mis-state any of those facts, I shall be only too glad to correct them. The remarks of the hon. gentleman on my left have left the impression that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have refused to do something that they agreed to do. I have heard within the last ten days a good deal of conversation on that point. I believe, so far from the Canadian Pacific Railway having refused to carry out any engagement they have made, either with the Government or the Northern Pacific Junction, or any other inheriting or possessing their rights, have always been prepared to carry out whatever they agreed to. In other words, they claim, that under the agreement which was put in their Bill a few years ago in the interest of Toronto, the Canadian Pacific Railway should carry traffic over their road to the west at the same pro rata rate as on their own line, say from Carleton Place, Ottawa or Montreal. That agreement the Canadian Pacific Railway entered into and are prepared to carry out, but, as I understand it, the gentlemen who represent the Hamilton and North-Western and Northern Companies, and who own this Pacific Junction Railway now practically, claim that the Canadian Pacific Railway, under that clause of the agreement in their Bill, should carry freight, not at the same pro rata rate, but at a great deal lower rate. I am interested, as a representative of an eastern county, at seeing that no unfair privileges are given to the Northern Pacific Junction, which will interfere with the traffic through my section of the country. The distance from Thornhill, which is substituted for Callander, to Toronto is about the same as that to Carleton Place, 225. There are a few miles difference, the distance being shorter to Toronto than it is from Thornhill or Callander to Carleton Place. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company, in fact, say this: Our rates are fixed from Carleton Place, which is about the same distance as from Toronto to Thornhill, at say $10 a car, and we are willing to carry freight from Toronto at the same rate; that is our agreement and that is the law. But the gentlemen who control the Hamilton and North-Western or Northern Railway say: that is not the agreement; the agreement is: If you carry goods from Montreal or Quebec or St. John or Halifax, no matter how low a rate as through freight you may take, you have got to carry goods on our 220 miles at the same pro rata rate as you do on the long haul of 1,000 miles. To illustrate this more clearly I will take Toronto as the starting point. The Canadian Pacific Railway say we will carry from Toronto to Thornhill or Winnipeg at the same rate as from Carleton Place; but as we joined a portion of the system of the Canadian Pacific Railway in the Ontario and Quebec road at Carleton Place, in order that we might get a share of the Toronto business, both east and west of Toronto, and that the people of Ontario, more particularly of Toronto, should have competition in that trade, we will carry, if it is necessary, freight over the Ontario and Quebec road, giving you the same rate exactly from Toronto that we charge from Carleton, which is comparatively the same distance. In other words, if the contention of Mr. Barker, who represents the Hamilton and North-Western and the Northern Railway, is maintained, the effect will be that it will drive the Canadian Pacific Railway out of the Toronto and Ontario business, by competitors for business to Winnipeg and further west, for the simple reason that they cannot carry 400 miles as cheap as they can 200; and it will prevent their giving special rates from the Eastern Provinces for their manufactures and products, because Mr. Barker will contend, whatever you give as through rates for a 1,000 miles east, I demand you should give on my 220 miles. That never was the intention of the clause which the Government put in the Bill, and I would like to have an explanation from the Government, because this question interests my constituents. When this clause was inserted, no one dreamed of such a construction being put upon it as that put upon it by Mr. Barker. If his contention be maintained, he will have a monopoly of the whole trade; and at whose expense? At the expense of Ontario, at the expense of Toronto, and most decidedly at the expense of the eastern people, because if they get through rates on 1,500 miles to Winnipeg, Mr. Barker will get a pro rata reduction over his road. My constituents are interested in this matter. They do a very large trade of fish with Boston and New York, and they hope to open up a trade with Toronto and Winnipeg; but if the contention of Mr. Barker be maintained, that will be impossible, for they will not be able to get through rates such as will enable them to send their fish in that way. I may be misinformed, but from what I can gather that is the true state of the case, and I am told to-day that there is a discussion going on before the Board of Trade in Toronto at which this question is being considered. I would like to hear from the Government what construction they put on the clause which was inserted in the interest of Toronto, but which will work to its detriment if Mr. Barker's contention is maintained.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That question does not at all arise on this Bill, it may possibly arise on a discussion on the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. MITCHELL. It may not arise on this Bill, but when it has been raised by an hon. gentleman and the impression left by him contrary to what I believe to be the facts, and contrary to the interests of my constituents, I felt it my duty to explain what my understanding is upon this matter.

Mr. EDGAR. The reason I raised this point is because it appears upon the face of the lease, which is in the schedule of the Bill, as originally introduced at any rate, and is referred to in the clauses of the Bill which are before the House now. This is an exceedingly important measure, relating to the running and working of this railway, and I am very glad, indeed, that there was an hon. member in the House who took some interest in this, if the Government did not, and endeavored to have it made clear. I have not been complaining about the Canadian Pacific Railway not carrying out their agreement, because there is no agreement.

Mr. MITCHELL. My explanation was to correct an improper understanding of the clause on your part.

Mr. EDGAR. What I complain of is not that the Canadian Pacific Railway did not carry out their agreement, because there was no agreement, they did not sign any agreement that amounted to anything. The Government gave this subsidy of $12,000 a mile to this road to make this connection. They did not see that the Canadian Pacific Railway were bound by anything that amounted to a row of pins. There was an optional clause left in for them to carry out or not as they chose, and now, after the Government money is all spent, they are negotiating and saying what they would like to do. I thought the Government, when they gave $12,000 a mile for this road, would be able to say what they got for it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This clause is between two railways. The Government are no parties to it and can be no parties to it. They have not come to an agreement. Whether that is the fault of the one railway or the other we do not know. At all events, that rests between themselves. The Government have full power under the General Railway Act, and under the Canadian Pacific Railway Act for that matter, to settle the rates satisfactorily to the country and satisfactorily to trade and the interests of commerce.

Mr. MULOCK. I quite agree with those who say this discussion is not in order on this Bill. A propos of what has taken place, however, it appears to me that the Government might and ought to have made all provision in respect of the matter now in controversy between these two railways before they handed over the subsidy.

On the schedule,

Mr. MULOCK moved that the following be added as the seventh section :—

This Act shall not come into force unless and until the Hamilton and North-Western Railway Company shall repay to the county of Simcoe and the various municipalities therein all moneys paid by way of bonus by said county and municipalities respectively in aid of the construction of the railway by the Hamilton and North-Western Railway Company.

Mr. McCARTHY. I suppose the hon. gentleman is not serious in this proposition. How this company should be deprived of its right to issue debenture bonds until some other company is to pay a debt which the hon. gentleman says it owes, is a curious proposition. I suppose the hon. gentleman does not intend to press it.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman has no right to assume that I am not serious. I was never more serious in my life. I firmly believe that it is necessary that such provision should be made. I have proved that this is really the application of the Hamilton and North-Western for relief. I proved to the satisfaction of the House that there is only $1,800 in this company except money put in by the Government and by the Northern ad North-Western.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman is all wrong. I know myself that there was $25,000 paid up at all events.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not think that is possible.

Mr. McCARTHY. I know it as a fact.

Mr. MULOCK. The returns do not show it. The returns to the House show that the gross amount of capital stock owned is $200,000.

Mr. McCARTHY. And 10 per cent. on that?

Mr. MULOCK. Before we say 10 per cent. on that, we must remember that the hon. member himself stated, in answer to my question, that $182,000 of that was held by himself and his co-trustees.

Mr. McCARTHY. Precisely, but 10 per cent. had been paid on it before.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman stated that of the $200,000 subscribed stock $182,000 was really stock of the Hamilton and North-Western and Northern Railways, so that there is only $18,000 subscribed capital which has been subscribed by persons or corporations not being the Northern and the Hamilton and North-Western; and of that only 10 per cent. has been paid up, so there is only $1,800 in this enterprise except money which has come out of the Hamilton and North-Western and Northern. Is that correct?

Mr. McCARTHY. That is correct, there is not as much as that. I misunderstood the hon. gentleman. I thought he meant there was only $1,800 paid up altogether.

Mr. MULOCK. Very well. This is called a Bill of the Northern Pacific Junction Railway, but really it is a Bill promoted by and for the benefit of the Hamilton and North-Western Railway Company and the Northern Railway Company; and I proved to the satisfaction of the House, to the satisfaction of every independent minded person that a gross fraud was perpetrated on the people of the county of Simcoe by those two roads combined. Now that they come and ask for relief, I say they must do what every suitor is bound to do who appears to a court for relief, he must make restitution before he is entitled to consideration, and so this railway is bound to make restitution. I never presented a matter to this House with greater seriousness or one that I felt required the judgment of the House in favor of the amendment more than this. I therefore hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. COOK. The town of Collingwood, the town of Barrie and the township of Nottawasaga contributed very largely towards the building of this North-Western Railway in bonuses for the express object of having a competing line, they have been deceived, woefully deceived. The agreements that were drawn by the solicitor of the county were no better than waste paper. There was no doubt at all in the minds of the parties who controlled or promoted that railway, at the time when the contracts were signed with the municipalities, that those contracts were worthless. I believe I will have the opportunity now which was denied me a short time ago by the Speaker, in reference to the matter of the deputation that waited upon the hon. Premier in connection with this same affair. The hon. gentleman's reply was in these words:

"The words of the Act of 1883, which declared certain roads for the general advantage of Canada, were of no consequence. They were put in every Railway Bill granted by the Dominion Parliament in cases where the railway or railways affected were all within one Province in order to show that the Federal Parliament had a right to deal with the subject. The words 'for the general advantage of Canada,' were merely a phrase."

At the time that question was being discussed in the House it was stated by the supporters of the present Administration that it would make no material difference, the roads would not be removed and the very fact of the Government of the Dominion taking charge of those roads made no difference whatever in the condition of the railways. A short time ago, there was a man injured on the Midland Railway, he brought an action for damages in the courts, and the courts decided that, in consequence of the road being transferred from Provincial authority to Federal authority, his case could not lie. It was in reference to the filling up of frogs. Some years ago, I introduced a Bill into this House for the purpose of filling up frogs on railways, so that parties in the yards, brakesmen and yardmen, would not be caught and injury would not be sustained in that direction. This man was injured in that way. When I had the honor of a seat in the Local Legislature in 1879, I introduced the same Bill there and it became law. The man who was injured by being caught in the track and run over by the car appealed to the courts, and the courts decided that he had no case, that the Local Government had no jurisdiction, and, as the Dominion Government has no law by which the frogs of railways should be filled, he could get no damages. There is a direct point in issue, contrary to the express words of the hon. the Premier that it was merely a phrase. Now, Sir, if there ever was an unrighteous act of a railway company towards a municipality, it was the conduct of the North-Western Railway in connection with the bonuses received from the municipalities. It was upon the distinct understanding that that line should be a distinct, a separate and competing line to the Northern Railway Company, that the bonuses were granted. I called upon the hon. member for South Simcoe on a former occasion to vindicate the rights of his friends in his riding, and I hope he will now take an opportunity of expressing his views in connection with this matter.

Bill reported.

Mr. McCARTHY moved the third reading of said Bill.

Mr. MULOCK. I beg to move that the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole with instructions to amend the same by adding the section of which I have just given notice. I have before me now a letter showing something of the practices of the Hamilton and North Western and the Northern. This letter gives a sample of the treatment received by the community served by these railways. It is to be borne in mind that these two railways are worked now by a joint company. This particular letter refers to rates upon the Northern Railway. The rating is fixed by the joint company—and fairly illustrates the policy of both these roads towards the people. Last Session I gave to the House some statistics upon this matter, and by way of illustration I may tell you that the Hamilton and North-Western Railway charges for hauling grain from the village of Cookstown around by Barrie to Toronto, and charges for the haul by its own line and down upon the Northern again, being an unnecessary haulage, and unnecessary mileage, of perhaps forty or fifty miles. I do not speak accurately as to the distance, for I have not the figures before me. I think the House ought to have some consideration for the people in question. Upon this point I shall read a letter dated March, 1886, from R. & G. Strickland. I may say they are at present owners of a large lumber mill in the vicinity of the village of Bradford, succeeding Thompson, Smith & Co. I may say, too, à propos of this question, that I was informed by Mr. Sage, who formerly lumbered on the line of the Northern, that he abandoned his whole Canadian trade on account of the tyranny of this road in exacting rates. Now, the Messrs. Strickland, who are at present doing the only lumbering that I can think of at the moment, in the vicinity of Bradford, in this county, have written me on the subject. I met Mr. Strickland upon the train one evening going to Toronto, and had a conversation with him upon the subject, and he wrote me afterwards as follows:—

"DEAR SIR,—In connection with our conversation in regard to the Northern Railway, I beg to say we have determined to stop operations at Bradford owing to the excessive rate charged for carrying lumber from that point. The rate charged on lumber from Bradford are $1.60 per M. feet, board measure, to Toronto. The Grand Trunk rates from Lake Field to Port Hope, the same distance are $1.15 per M feet, and this excessive over-charge applies to all kinds of freight The following is an extract from a letter written by our agent at Bradford last January."

He then goes on with some further complaint. That shows the way our section of the country is discriminated against by this joint system of railways, and unless the Legislature will intervene and come to our relief, it will be very difficult for us to build up enterprises upon that line of railway. There is only one way by which railways can be taught to live up to the spirit of their contracts, and that is to cause them to make restitution unless they do carry out in good faith the understanding on which they obtain the money which practically brings them into existence.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. member's zeal is rather late. There was a Bill here presented by the Hamilton and North-Western Railway Company, presented in its own name, and for its own purposes; the hon. member was then in the House, and he told us this afternoon that he aided in promoting one of the clauses of that Bill. That was the time for the hon. member to have moved, that was the time for him to have insisted, when the relief granted by that Bill was accorded to the Hamilton and North-Western Railway——

Mr. MULOCK. It is never too late to do right.

Mr. McCARTHY,—upon the justice which he speaks of towards the municipalities in the county of Simcoe. The present motion is one which, if it were characterised in the terms in which I would like to do so, I should probably incur your censure, Mr. Speaker, which I refrain from doing, though I dare say we all understand what is meant by it. Now, the effect of it is this: This railway company, which is to connect the Ontario Railway system of Ontario with the Canadian Pacific Railway, is to be obstructed, is not to go on. Rolling stock is not to be acquired, the road is not to be carried on unless—what? Unless a railway which runs from the town of Collingwood to the city of Hamilton, does what the hon. member says it ought to do, pay back its bonuses obtained under the circumstances which he referred to. Now, that would hardly be robbing Peter to pay Paul, because it would be a much more nefarious transaction than that. The effect of this amendment is that so far as the Bill is concerned, it would be waste paper, no advantage could be taken under it; and if it is necessary to have this piece of legislation, in order to carry on the work of connecting the railway system of Ontario with the Canadian Pacific Railway system, then this amendment of the hon. member obstructs it.

House divided on amendment of Mr. Mulock.

Bill read the third time and passed.

RELIEF OF FLORA BIRRELL.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton), moved that the House resolve itself into committee on Bill (No. 129) for the relief of Flora Birrell (from the Senate).

Motion agreed to, on a division, and Bill considered in committee, reported and read the third time and passed, on a division.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 97) respecting the London and Ontario Investment Company, Limited.—(Mr. Beaty.)

PUNISHMENT OF SEDUCTION.

Mr. SPEAKER reported that the Senate had passed Bill (No. 20) for the punishment of seduction with amendments, to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. MCCARTHY.

Mr. CHARLTON. At this stage of the Session it is evident that if this Bill is placed upon the Order paper it is entombed. All days of the week are now taken by the Government for their own business, except Monday. Next Monday is Queen's Birthday and there will be no sitting on that day, and if the House is to act upon the Bill it will have to act in some other mode than by the regular mode of placing it on the Order paper and reaching it in its regular course. The Bill passed this House by a large majority, by a majority of more than two to one. The amendments made by the Senate are not of importance, except in the case of one section, that relating to the punishment of seduction under promise of marriage. The Senate has provided that a male shall not be liable until after he is twenty-one years of age and a female shall have no recourse after she is eighteen years of age. This amendment is of course not satisfactory to the friends of the measure; still the balance of the Bill is a copy of the Imperial Statute of last August and is a great improvement on the present law, and in order to save what is left in the measure I am quite prepared to accept the amendments of the Senate. I hope the Government, in view of the fact that the Bill received such an overwhelming support in this House and is evidently favored by a large majority of the people, will accept the amendments. I move that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think this Bill that has just come down from the Senate should remain before the House so that we can consider what the amendments are. It is a Bill that was not passed in this House without opposition; I was opposed to the principle of the Bill, and it should remain before us before we proceed to consider it. The hon. gentleman says at this stage of the Session there will be very little chance of passing the Bill as amended. I do not know how far we have gone in the Session; it is evident we are not near the end yet by what we saw on Friday, and therefore I think we had better give time for the consideration of this Bill.

Mr. CHARLTON. With regard to the hon. gentleman's estimate as to the length of the Session, it is the general impression that the Session will end soon. If we had another private members' day I would not feel very apprehensive as to the fate of the measure, but as we have not, and as the general impression on this side of the House at least—and I suppose we are in as good a position to know as gentlemen on the other side—is that the business will be completed next week, the course of the Minister of Public Works simply amounts to killing the Bill. Now, I am quite aware that he is opposed to this Bill, but because he is opposed to it I do not think he should interpose his individual opinion against an overwhelming majority of the House, and the evident wish of the country in favor of the Bill. Certainly if I were in his position I would waive my own individual opinion in the face of the opinion of the House and the evident opinion of the country. It is not for me to say, but if he wishes to assume the responsibility of killing a measure which is demanded by the public sentiment of the country, which was passed by an overwhelming majority of this House, which has passed the Senate with amendments which can be understood by any man of ordinary intelligence in five minutes—if he takes that position, and requires that this Bill should be put on the order paper, with the clear result that the Bill should be killed, then I throw on him that responsibility.

Mr. SPEAKER. The first motion is whether the amendments shall be considered now. That is equivalent to a first reading, and I understand that the House are willing to consider it now.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. SPEAKER. Then the question is whether the amendment shall be considered now.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. CHARLTON moved that said amendments be now read a second time.

Mr. SPEAKER. That is for the House to say. Rule 23 of the Commons provides:

"Amendments made by the Senate to Bills originating in the House, shall be placed on the Orders of the Day, next after Bills reported on by select committees."

Upon that rule Mr. Bourinot, in his work on "Parliamentary Procedure and Practice," remarks:

"The practice in both Houses with respect to amendments is the same. When the amendments are of an unimportant character, or there is no objection to their passage, they are generally read twice and agreed to forthwith; but if they are important, their consideration is deferred until a future day. The Speaker of the English Commons lays down the English practice as follows: 'In cases where expedition is necessary it has been the practice of the House occasionally—especially late in the Session—to order that these amendments shall be considered forthwith. But on such occasions the member in charge of the Bill is bound to satisfy the House that expedition is necessary.'"

So that I think it is for the House to decide whether they shall be gone on with.

Mr. CHARLTON. I assert that expedition is necessary, and that unless it is taken up now the Bill will be lost.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman who has made the motion can tell us what the amendments are, but for my part I do not know; they have not been read.

Mr. CHARLTON. I stated what they were before, but I shall be happy to repeat them. The first amendment is in the second clause of the Bill. As it stood before it provided that any person who, under promise of marriage, seduces an unmarried female of previously chaste character, and under 21 years of age, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. The amendment made by the Senate adds, after the word person, the words "over 21 years of age," and further provides that any such person seducing an unmarried female of previously chaste character, and under 18 years of age, instead of 21, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. It also makes a change in sub-section 1 of section 4, by making the maximum term of imprisonment for inveigling a child under the age of 10 years, ten years instead of five, at the discretion of the court. These are the amendments.

Mr. McCARTHY. There is a proviso in the second clause struck out.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, the proviso that in the case of an unmarried man the subsequent marriage of the parties may be pleaded in bar of a conviction, for seduction under promise of marriage, is struck out.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think that is rather important.

Mr. CHARLTON. I think it is an important provision to lose, but still we can understand it.

Amendments concurred in.

MATHEW ROCHE, OF LINGAN, N.S.

House resumed further consideration of proposod motion of Mr. Blake for a select committee to enquire into certain allegations respecting the case of Mr. Mathew Roche, of Lingan, N.S., and the action of Mr. Dodd, M.P., and Mr. McDougall, M.P., for Cape Breton, in connection therewith.

Mr. DAVIES. When the hon. member for West Durham moved this resolution, he did not consider it necessary—and in that I think the House approved of his course—to make any lengthened remarks upon it. He was content with making the charge, which he did deliberately from his place and on his responsibility as a member of the House, and then leaving the House to refer the charges to a select committee to enquire into their truth or falsity. I, myself, would have imagined, looking at the gravity of the charges made against the hon. members, that the committee would be granted without any hesitation; and I must say frankly that it was with no small surprise that I found the hon. Premier, the hon. Finance Minister and other members of the Government taking a line in the debate which indicated that they did not feel disposed to grant the committee. I may be wrong, Sir, but we shall learn directly whether my belief was correct or not. Of course, it was perfectly proper and right that the hon. member for Sydney (Mr. Dodd) should have made the personal explanation he did after the resolution was moved. After he had made that explanation, I thought for one that the House, recognising the truth of the remark made by the hon. Finance Minister that the resolution contained charges of a very grave and serious character against hon. members of the House and against the Government, would have at once acceded to the proposition to let the case go to a committee. But, Sir, it appears that such is not to be the case; and I only rise on the present occasion to make a few remarks because an attempt was made, whether unwittingly or otherwise, to present the charges made by my hon. friend in an aspect altogether incorrect and improper. Sir, the hon. gentleman's charge was a very plain and simple one. I am not going to read over verbatim the charges made in the resolution, but they amounted to this, that a public officer had been threatened by a member of this House that if he voted according to his convictions, if he voted against the candidate put forward by the Government in their own interests, it would be at the peril of his office. Mark you, there was no charge against the officer of using any undue influence; there was no charge that he had attempted to act in an offensively partisan way; there was no charge that he attempted to take an active or improper part in the election. The charge simply was that by acting within his perfect right as a citizen of this Dominion, the right accorded to him in our Franchise Act, of voting in favor of the candidate of his choice, he incurred the peril of dismissal from office. Well, Sir, what will be the effect on the country—what is the only consequence that can flow from the refusal of the House to grant this committee? This consequence, that members of the civil service, be they few or many, be they numbered by hundreds or by thousands, are to be simply the slaves of the Administration of the day—that they are bound to vote in favor of the Government candidate, whether that candidate represents opinions in which they share, or represents opinions from which they dissent—I say that position involves very grave consequences; it affects the independence and the efficiency of the entire service. If that position is deliberately adopted by this House after reflection, it will have the effect of driving both political parties into a policy destructive of the best interests of the civil service. It is not to be expected for a moment that one of the great parties in the State can lie by and see a doctrine promulgated by the party for the time being in power, to the effect that every civil servant is bound to vote for them at the peril of his place, without, from pure self-defence, being driven to the resolution, whatever their private views may be as to the consequences upon the efficiency of the civil service, to announce to the members of the service: If you vote for the Government, you must do it at your peril in case we come in. It amounts to this, that the old doctrine of "to the victors belong the spoils," is to be again introduced into our political life. It amounts to this, that if the Opposition came into power after that doctrine had been accepted, they would be bound to dismiss every man who, exercising his franchise in an honest way, voted against their candidate at an election. I hope the House will not accede to that proposition. I hope the hon. First Minister, after reflection, will see the gravity and the seriousness of it in its effects on the efficiency, the independence and the loyalty of the civil service at large. I do not wish to express any opinion as to the truth or falsity of the charges themselves, that will, of course be enquired into by the committee; but I wish to refer to some remarks that fell from the hon. gentleman who made the personal explanation, which he had a perfect right to make. That hon. gentleman took three positions antagonistic to each other. He started with the assertion that the charges were utterly unfounded. They may or they may not be; that is a matter entirely for the committee; but the charges have been made on the responsibility of an hon. member of this House. Precedents and practice alike point to the course we should adopt, and that is we should treat those charges with the respect due to the member who makes them, by referring them to a committee of enquiry. This House must have been surprised, after hearing the statements made by the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. Dodd) to hear the letter which the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Blake) read in reply, a letter which, if it turns out to be authenticated, will, to a very large extent, prove the charges the hon. gentleman made. The hon. member for Cape Breton first said the charges were unfounded, then that the official had not been removed, and he wound up by the statement that he had been removed, and that in removing him he (Mr. Dodd) had simply discharged his duty. In the latter part of his speech, the hon. gentleman advocated the rule, which, afterwards, I was sorry to see was endorsed by the Premier and the Minister of Finance, that to the victors belong the spoils. The Minister of Finance attempted to interpolate into the letter words that were not there and were never intended to be there, by insisting that Mr. Roche had taken an active part in politics, and that it was because he had done so the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. Dodd) had insisted on his dismissal. The Minister of Finance insisted that words to this effect were in the letter, but they are not to be found there. The reason given by the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. Dodd) was, not that Mr. Roche had taken an active part in politics, not that he had made himself personally offensive, not that he had displayed partisanship in the discharge of his duties, and brought undue influence to bear on those under him, but simply that he had voted at the election. Let me refer to this once more because I think it is right the House should understand what the charge is. The charge against Mr. Roche had nothing to do with undue partisanship, but simply with his right as a citizen to record his vote. The following is the hon. gentleman's letter:—

"HOUSE OF COMMONS, OTTAWA, 21st April, 1885.
"TO MR. MATHEW ROCHE,
"Lingan, Cape Breton.

"DEAR SIR,—It is quite true that it is in view to remodel the pilotage commission. You must remember that it is the invariable rule, where a Government officer votes against the Government candidate, as you did in the case of the election of McDougall and Mr. McKay, that he runs the risk of being turned out. Mr. McDougall thinks that a friend of his should have the position which you hold, and I cannot object to him placing him there, for the reason that I personally told you what the consequence would be if you voted against him, and further asked you to vote for him because he was the Government candidate brought out and selected by them to carry the county if possible in their interests. Knowing all this, you assumed the responsibility of the course you pursued, and having done so I fear you must submit to the consequence.

"Yours very truly,
"MURRAY DODD."

That is to say, Mr. Roche had the honesty and the manliness to record his vote for the man of his choice, and because he did so the hon. member told him he must assume the responsibility of taking that honest course, the consequence of which, according to the opinion held by hon. gentlemen opposite, was dismissal from office. That is the notice to be sent to the civil service, should this House endorse the action of the hon. member, as it is asked to do. The civil service will be told: If you dare to exercise your franchise and vote for the gentleman of your choice, no matter if you abstain from partisanship and undue influence, you are to be dismissed from the service. The thing comes back to the position formulated in the old phrase: "To the victors belong the spoils." If we are to introduce that principle into our politics, well and good. I, for one, much as I believe it would be to the detriment of the service, am prepared to accept it. If the position is to be taken by the Government side that the civil servants hold their offices at the beck and whim of Government supporters for the time being, the contra position must be assumed by us that every man who ventures to vote against us will have to go out. I would be sorry to see the House repeal the Civil Service Act, and introduce that system which has many vicious principles in it and perhaps some merits, but if it has to come let us know it. Some of the Government side are quite willing to accept it. The Minister of Finance had perspicacity enough at first to see that the charge was a very grave one, but the hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) did not see that there was anything serious in it at all. He is willing to dismiss every man in the service who votes against him, and so are many others behind him. If that be the case let us know it, and if the issue is forced on the Opposition they will be driven to accept the alternative position. I do not wish to enter into a long discussion as to whether the hon. member for Cape Breton's statements are consistent with the facts or not; that will be for the committee to determine. I am merely dealing with the refusal of the House to enquire into the truth of the charge made by the hon. member for West Durham.

Mr. JENKINS. I am much surprised and gratified at the zeal displayed by my hon. colleague and his leader in favor of the independence of civil servants. It is not a very long time ago, it was in 1874, when the late Government, by what I think I may say was one of the greatest political flukes on record, gained power. At that time there were some fifteen or twenty members of the civil service dismissed, not with any friendly warning, not for any reason, either official or political, but simply because it was necessary to fill the hungry maws of the supporters of the Government with the positions held by Conservatives.

Mr. MILLS. Appointed the night before they went out of office.

Mr. JENKINS. No; but even supposing that was true, it is well known that the Government has the power of making appointments until they give up the reins of office. Under the British Government it is done whenever a Government goes out of office. That is no excuse, however, in my case, for I held office for eleven years previous to the time I was dismissed, and I was dismissed for no official reason and for no political reason, because I had strongly urged the advisability of having no opposition to the then candidates of the Government, and there was no opposition, they were elected by acclamation, there was, therefore, no reason, either official or political, for my dismissal. When the Government came into power my friends urged that I should be reinstated. The leader of the Government said no; it is a hard case and I am sorry, but I will not infringe on this system we have adopted, of the independence of the civil service, and I and a number of others who had been dismissed were not reinstated, and those who usurped our positions were allowed to retain them. That fact alone is quite sufficient to save this Government from the charge made by the leader of the Opposition and my hon. colleague.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I had not the advantage of hearing the preliminary discussion, but I may say, in regard to the dismissals complained of by the hon. gentleman who sat down, that I do not think that the First Minister himself would say that he held that a Government were always bound to sustain the nominations made by its predecessors under all circumstances, and I think that his own course afforded some very striking illustrations to the contrary; but I do not think it is at all desirable, in the discussion of this particular question, to complicate the matter by a reference to what happened either in 1874 or 1878. I have no doubt that, if I were disposed to do so, I could bring forward a very great number of illustrations of the application of the doctrine of which the hon. gentleman complains, but, as I understand, the case is simply this: My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition made a certain statement which I believed was traversed, in part if not in whole, by the two hon. members against whom it is directed. Now, the course of the House always has been heretofore on such occasions to give the accuser and the accused the opportunity of bringing forward what evidence they could respectively submit to a committee of this House, either to a select committee or in some cases to the Committee of Privileges and Elections. My hon. friend's statement was briefly, as I understood the matter, that a certain officer of the Canadian Government had been dismissed, not for interfering actively in elections, but simply for casting his vote. That statement, he declares, he is prepared to prove; and most assuredly, if he is prepared to prove it, I think that the House must see that it is utterly impossible for us to admit that act by itself to be a valid excuse for depriving a man of his position, unless we are prepared to adopt the doctrine alluded to by my hon. friend that, if you make the civil servants the absolute political serfs of the Government of the day, you put the whole civil service in jeopardy of being displaced whenever a change of Government occurs. Now, I have always myself contended and I am quite willing to give the gentlemen opposite the benefit of that contention, that, if a civil servant, a man in the employment of the Government, chooses to step out of the line and chooses to canvass or to make himself conspicuous in opposition to the candidate of the Government, he must take the consequences. I have always believed that it is impossible to maintain the discipline of the service if that occurs, but there is a most extreme distinction between the case of a man who does that and the case of a man who simply exercises his franchise; and, if it has come to this, that the mere exercise of the franchise is to expose civil servants to the risk of being deprived of their places, then it would be infinitely better to take away their vote from them altogether. There are reasons, and reasons which deserve serious consideration, why civil servants should be treated as we treat judges, those of them, at any rate, who occupy offices which may fairly be called offices of emolument and permanent offices. I do not hesitate to say that my own individual opinion is that the great majority of the civil servants would be better without votes, but, while we allow them to retain votes, it is very unfair and unjust to threaten them, as is stated to have been done in this case, with deprivation of their office if they choose to exercise it. If the hon. gentlemen who are the subjects of this motion are prepared to show that this gentleman actively interfered, I say that I for one would sustain the action of the Government in dismissing the civil servant, but, unless that is done, I think it is an extremely harsh act to take away the position he held.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. The hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) in commencing the brief remarks he made, said he did not desire and did not think it proper that we shoud complicate the discussion by references to matters of 1874 and 1878. My hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) further said during the debate some days ago that there was too much text and no commentary.

Mr. MILLS. I said there was too little text and too much commentary.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. Well, I propose to give the hon. gentleman a little text and a great deal of commentary this evening. I think the question itself is one of vital importance, and when reflection is made on hon. members of this House, we are bound to look at the record of hon. gentlemen opposite and consider how they acted under similar circumstances. It must be apparent to every man in this country, to every man who thinks and who desires to think, or who observes human nature and political affairs, that a wonderful transformation passes over the so-called Liberals whenever they are in Opposition. We remember, going back not very far, that there were several planks laid down by hon. gentlemen opposite, each one of which was ruthlessly smashed the moment they got into power. I remember well, some years ago, there was to be no provincial alliance, no alliance between the Ontario Premier and the Dominion Premier. We all know, as politicians and as public men, how hon. gentlemen opposite fulfilled that pledge. Then, again, there were to be no extra portfolios in the Government. The House was to be kept clear from the influence of the Administration of the day.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I will give the hon. gentleman all he wants before I get through, both of text and commentary.

Mr. DAVIES. Is this the question?

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I am simply showing that, while these gentlemen in opposition are such carpers and advocates regarding the purity of elections and the purity of Parliament itself, they have, every time they got the opportunity, strangled their pledges and broken their promises. I was simply laying the foundation of my argument, not for this House alone but for the country, calling attention to the fact that on no occasion did those gentlemen keep a promise or, when they uttered a profession, maintain it by their actions.

Mr. DAVIES. Is this in order?

Mr. SPEAKER. It is leading up to the whole question about the dismissal from office. It is a political question.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. As my hon. friends opposite do not desire me to refer to the past beyond this particular question, I shall come to the question at issue itself. We remember that there was to be no Government interference in elections. That was a solid plank in the Liberal platform. I hold in my hand a statement made in the House in 1873, in connection with an election in the County of Welland. In 1872, Mr. Griffin, Post Office Inspector, wrote to a postmaster in Welland:

"If you cannot support Dr. King, who is the ministerial candidate, take no active part against him, and give no ground of complaint against yourself."

We remember what a thrill of horror passed through the Reform party then, as a thrill of horror has passed through hon. gentlemen to-night at the unseemly act, as they insinuate, of two hon. gentlemen who are respected in their constituencies and in the country where they are known, because one of them wrote to a friend of his to take no active part in the election——

Mr. DAVIES. No.——

Mr. MACKINTOSH,—and not to place himself in the position of being dismissed. My hon. friend says "no." I shall quote from the letter, as hon. gentlemen have quoted from it. The hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. Dodd) wrote:

"You must remember that it is the invariable rule where a Government officer votes against the Government candidate, as you did in the case of the election of Mr. McDougall and Mr. Mackay, that he runs the risk of being turned out."

Hon. gentlemen opposite have talked of the ballot. What is this a proof of? It is simply a proof that Mr. Roche had publicly made himself known, being one of those who issued pilotage certificates, as one of the opponents of Mr. McDougall, and his personal friend Mr. Dodd spoke to him to do nothing to jeopardise his position, and for giving him that advice and approaching him in such a way as Parliament itself might countenance, certainly not censure, he is to be censured by the leader of the Opposition:

"Mr. McDougall thinks that a friend of his should have the position which you hold and I cannot object to him placing him there, for the reason that I personally told you what the consequence would be if you voted against him."

Now, I ask hon. gentlemen to look at it plainly and honestly, without any captious political feeling, and what will they find? That Mr. Dodd, a friend of Mr. Roche's, told him not to make himself known, not to demonstrate the fact outwardly that he was opposed to Mr. McDougall, not to place himself in such a position so that, should Mr. McDougall be asked to make an appointment he would have to refuse him such appointment; and because of this the hon. member for Queen's, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), says that the great Reform party must now adopt the alternative of either bowing submissively to the decrees of the Conservative party, or to declare: "To the victors belong the spoils." Sir, it is like the general platform and policy of the party itself. It never rises higher, and never will rise higher, I fear, than appeals to race, religion or section, and certainly not higher than this case regarding Mr. Roche, who, when receiving $30 a year, is transferred from one point to another at the same salary, and yet this is a scandal for which two hon. members are indicted with as much gravity as though the fundamental principles of the Constitution had been ruthlessly violated. In 1872 Mr. Griffin, Post Office Inspector, wrote to a postmaster in Welland:

"If you cannot support Dr. King, who is the ministerial candidate, take no active part against him, and give no ground of complaint against yourself."

When this case of Mr. Griffin's came before the House the hon. member for East York, then leader of the Opposition, moved:

"That it is highly criminal in any Minister or Ministers or other servants under the Crown directly or indirectly to use the power of office in the election of representatives to serve in Parliament, and an attempt at such influence will be at all times resisted by the House as aimed at its own dignity, honor and independence."

"Servants under the Crown!" Why, I remember, in 1874, in this very city, when the Hon. R. W. Scott, then a Minister of the Crown, openly canvassed the civil servants in favor of his candidate, Dr. St. Jean, against Mr. Lewis, a lamented friend of mine. I remember when a test question came up in 1874 in this House with regard to the mayoralty, and there are members of the civil service living now who will bear me out in saying that some deputy heads went to the Departments and spoke to their clerks, and said: "Either vote for Mr. Featherstone for mayor, or do not vote at all." That is the way hon. gentlemen carry out their pledges and professions when in power. Then, again, in the Kingston election, the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) will, no doubt, have a lively recollection of certain orders given to the post office and customs officials to "vote for Mr. Carruthers or not at all." Then in West Toronto when the late Chief Justice Moss was a candidate. Why, at that time Mr. McKellar, then Minister of Public Works, was shown to have written to the Superintendent of the Central Prison telling him to give the men a half holiday and pay them out of the public funds, in order that they might vote for the Reform candidate. These men were driven as serfs to the polls, at a time when the hon. member for South Huron, the then Minister of Finance, was picturing gloom and misery, creating depression through the influence of his speeches; these men, I say, were driven to the polls like serfs in Russia, to vote for reform and the elevation of the standard of public morality. Then, Sir, we come nearer home. I hold in my hand a report of the trial in South Renfrew, in 1874, in which Mr. McDougall, the present Auditor General, was respondent. Mr. McDougall was asked:

"Q. Had you any other friends to help you in the county, friends who wrote letters?
"A. I think the Hon. R. W. Scott was the only person.
"Q. Did you request Mr. Scott to write letters?
"A. I don't think I did, but I think he did write."

Here we find a Reform Minister, if one can call the Hon. Mr. Scott a Reform Minister, going out of his way to strangle the pledges of the Reform party, not that any one urged him to interfere in the election for South Renfrew, for the candidate himself says:

"I found after the election, and during the election, that the Hon. R. W. Scott wrote a large number of letters, using his official position to secure votes for the Government candidate." Again: "I did not ask him to write."

Was not that coercion of the electors? I will prove, by the evidence of the court, that there was something beneath that, that beneath these letters there was a promise from a Minister of the Crown of a large amount of money to assist in colonisation roads in that district, in the township of Brudenell. Mr. McDougall's evidence proceeds:

"Q. The Hon. R. W. Scott was then in the Dominion Government?
"A. Yes.
"Q. What position did he hold?
"A. He was then without portfolio. He spoke to me about having grants for this part of the country, but the exact sum he did not mention, but that night in Shamrock village, Hudson told me Scott had fixed the sum at $8,000."
