Coronation of George IV.

The ceremony in Westminister IV. on July 19, 1821, lasted from eleven o'clock to four, and was suceeded by a still more splendid display in Westminister Hall, which wore a new aspect. Two tiers of galleries, supported by twenty iron pillars, were crowded by the fortunate persons admitted to witness the spectacle. Six dinner tables, each fifty-six feet long, accompdated the numerous guests who had the honour of being bidden to the banquet. Iwenty-eight magnificent lustres, each containing sixty wax candles, were suspended by chains of gold from the roof. The King's throne was placed immediately under the south window of the Hall, and six gilt gothic elbowchairs were prepared for the other members of the Royal Family. The first course was ushered in with a magnificent procession, in which Lord Howard, of Effingham as Deputy Earl Marshal, the Duke of Wellington as Lord High Constable, and Lord Anglesea, as Lord High Steward, rode on horseback. The course being served, the entrance was again cleared. and young Dymoke, hereditary Champion of England, mounted on a horse corrowed from Astley's Theatre, rode into the Hall, threw down his gauntlet, and delivered his challenge. These and other ceremonies being completed, the company proceeded to the discussion of the princely banquet which had been served up to them. One hundred and sixty tureens of soup, one hundred and sixty dishes of fish, one hundred and sixty hot joints. and more than three thousand other dishes had been prepared for the company, while more than eight hundred dozens of wine and one hundred gallons of punch were provided at the magnificent feast. At night time London was ablaze with brilliant illuminations; fireworks were displayed in all the parks, and fireballoons cast additional brightness on the scene; while a brig of war decked from stem to stern, was moored off the Strand, London, indulged in an unversal revel, in which, it is computed, five hundred thousand people shar ed in some way or another; and amidst this vast aggregation of people there was no riot, no disorder, nd no ill-humouc.

Colonial Ancestors of the Volstead Act.

Although the Colonial Virginians were hard-riding, hard-drinking, hospitable, and gallant gentlemen, little inclined to brook undue restraints of their personal liberty by legislation, it is recorded that they did at one time attempt to enforce a prohibition measure. In "Potomac Landings" Paul Wilstach tells about the fate of this ancestor of the Volstead Act. "Small 'tippling houses,' probably mere drinking bars, for the refreshment of travelers became so numerous that Virginia passed her first prohibition laws limiting each county to one at the courthouse and one a a public landing or ferry. But the law was not popular and was quickly swept aside, says Mr. Wilstach. The inns and coffee houses were so attract tive with their convivial tap rooms that they became an embarrassment to the colonial government, for the clerks in the provincial offices spent far more time tippling at their bars than in recording deeds in the government offices. Jellie's tavern in St. Mary's City, the first capital of Maryland, was so alluring that the council in 1696 requested the mayor and aldermen to suppress it. The legislature also made stringent laws regarding the comfort of the traveler. The St. Mary's bonifaces, according to Mr. Wilstach, were obliged to have at least twenty feather beds, and in their stables they were required to furnish room for at least 'twenty

On Saturday night, June the 24th. Rev. Dr. Chown, Rev. Dr. Gifford., Rev. R. J. Simpson and the writer met in North Sydney with transportation engaged to the conference at Grand Bank. Imagine our shock on arriving at Port-aux-Basgue to learn that our steamer-Glencoe-on account of fog would not be back for a week. The train across country was to leave in an hour and in that time we had to choose between returning home or proceeding by rail across country to reach the steamer at the other end of the island and double back on it to Grand Bank. Argentia was our destination, where we hoped to meet the members of conference and proceed with them by boat to Grand Bank. Alas! no ship and no nembers of conference; but fog thick enough to wash blankets with.

In that hill-crested, shoal-bound ship harbor and R. R. terminal, we spent two quiet but pleasant days. Having this spare time on our hands, and knowing that the big world outside would be too busy to think clearly, we unanimously agreed that it was our bounden duty to syndicate our superior knowledge and settle all the world problems. Ireland is coming out or we decided it should, so also is the coal strike and the R. R. difficulty. If our brethren at the coming General Conference find the great question solved for them and all the pep taken out of the anticipated debates, they may credit it to that quartet, reading the handwriting of God in the sands of the shore and the seams of the hills at Placentia Bay on the S. In ordinary conditions we are all alike. "The berths for the seniors' was the slogan on every lip, while one half of that body of ministers and laymen, stretched out on tables, curled up in chairs and sat on stairway steps in all good cheer, to spend a lone and dreary night. BEAUTY DOCTORING IN CENTRAL AFRICA.

(From Tit Bits.) A missionary who wanders alone month and year—new moons and rain, among primitive peoples seems somehow to have cheated us of a funny story. Why stories about missionaries being eaten by lions or cannibals should be funny it is difficult to imagine, but they have raised laughter in thoughtless moments.

In the case of Rev. John Roscoe, however, any such mishap would have been more than a calamity, for then we should never have read his new book, "The Soul of Central Africa," which is a general account of the

Mackie Ethnological Expedition. Mr. Roscoe appears to have had plenty of chances of being eaten by lions, but to have neglected them. Cannibals were less plentiful, but he lived among the Bagesu on Mount Elgon, Bukedi (which is in the Eastern province of Uganda), and their only stipulation about eating humans that they shall have died. When a man dies his body is taken out to a piece of waste ground at nightfall, and sounds as of jackets are heard. The sounds, however, are produced by men with the aid of trumpets, and are meant to frighten people into keeping to their houses lest they meet the dead man's ghost. Meanwhile old women go out to the body and cut it up, and the relatives must cook and eat the flesh while they mourn and wail for the lost one! On one of Mr. Roscoe's journeys a large wart-hog was encountered, and his guide dare not spear it because he had only one spear.

and not started till the sun was well with the hot sun that had isitors and helpers to carry home with them.-but it was not a good adertisement for their friends, who always want to come later as tourists and visit the Coast. The wires sumnoned the Strathcona to us at Twilingate, and the kindly lighthouse keeper at Long Point soon 'phoned us that our little steamer was threading her way through the ice into the harbor. Gay enough she looked, with her British flag and new paint. She should have been to St. John's for docking, but the heavy ice had prevented it, and so under water she must be rusting badly. Two years ago we had to have some new plates on her, but as the cost for the repairs in St. John's was over twelve thousand dollars and only five plates were put on, besides the boat being held up the entire summer we hope never to have to repeat the experiment. The hospital at Twillingate was being held up by the owners of the piece of land that would alone give the necessary drop to secure fire protection for the top story, and this difficulty had to be smoothed away by the Committee paying at the rate of a thousand dollars an acre for it. Dr. Parsons. of the Johns Hopkins Hospital, who had spent his brief holiday from the Reosevelt Hospital where he is now working, in trying to further the problems of the hospital to which he proposes to devote his splendid talents, had encouraged the Committee to try for a hospital unit that would
