HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, July 26, 1960

The house met at 11 a.m.

VACANCIES

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that consequent upon the notification of vacancies in the representation given in this house on Monday, July 25, 1960 by the hon. member for Welland and by the hon. member for Ottawa West, and pursuant to section 10 of the House of Commons Act, I have addressed my warrants to the chief electoral officer for the issue of new writs for the election of members in the electoral districts of Niagara Falls and Peterborough.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister and ask him when the government is going to make arrangements for representation of the constituency of Labelle, which has been without a representative in this house for upwards of six months?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State of External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is very interesting to see the great interest being taken by the opposition in these by-elections. Perhaps they might be wise not to be so enthusiastic about them. Action will be taken in due course.

GRAIN

WHEAT BOARD REGULATIONS RESPECTING DELIVERIES TO FEED MILLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Could the minister inform the house whether the Canadian wheat board will continue to enforce grain delivery quotas beginning in the new crop year as they apply to feed mills? In other words, will the past policy be continued by the wheat board rather than the policy contained in the report of the committee?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I will discuss this matter with the wheat board and give the hon. member an answer with regard to to it later.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

VANCOUVER, B.C.—STATEMENT AS TO WORK PERMITS FOR U.S. PAINTERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, on July 22 the hon. member for Vancouver East asked me a question regarding the importation of painters from the United States to do painting at the Vancouver General hospital for Rust Engineering Company. I have made an investigation and the report is as follows.

A foreman and two men were brought in from the United States to do a repairing and cleaning job on the smoke stack of the Vancouver General hospital. They were given work permits on the assurance of the national employment service in Vancouver that no local workmen were available who were qualified to do high stack repair and maintenance work.

When they had finished the Vancouver job they were sent to Port Alberni to do a similar job for MacMillan and Bloedel. This job, in addition to cleaning a 200-foot smoke stack, involved priming with mastic. The national employment service was able to establish that the latter part of the work, that is the painting, could be performed by local workers. Therefore the two United States workmen on the job have now been replaced by Canadians on a trial basis, and if satisfactory they will be retained. The men were originally brought in by Rust Engineering Company to do repair and maintenance. Painting is part of the job. I am informed that the two painters have been instructed to leave the country.

UNITED NATIONS

CONGO—REPORTED FIRING ON R.C.A.F. PLANE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is the minister in a position to confirm or deny the Canadian Press report to the effect that a Royal Canadian Air Force plane was fired on as it flew over Buta airport in northern Congo?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I heard this rumour last night and I immediately got in touch with the R.C.A.F. at Leopoldville. I am informed this morning that no such incident occurred. No R.C.A.F. plane has been fired upon; no R.C.A.F. personnel have been fired upon; no R.C.A.F. plane was in the Buta district yesterday. The R.C.A.F. are employed now on the ferrying of supplies and equipment to the United Nations force between Pisa and Leopoldville.

DISARMAMENT—REPORTED SOVIET REQUEST FOR BREAK IN DEADLOCK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the minister's attention been drawn to the report in this morning's Gazette under a London dateline to the effect that Soviet Premier Khruschchev has suggested to Britain and Canada that the next session of the United Nations general assembly should try to break the east-west deadlock on disarmament? I should like to ask the minister whether any official letter has been received, and whether he has any comment to make on the suggestion.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, a letter has been received from Premier Khrushchev which is a reply to the reply which had been sent to his first letter by our Prime Minister.

CONGO—REPORTED NEED FOR MEDICAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs based on a news report in yesterday's Globe and Mail which states:

> U.N. officials said the health problem throughout the Congo had become extremely grave. They said there was urgent need for 200 physicians. Nearly all Belgian physicians have left the country.

I should like to ask the minister whether consideration is being given to doing what we can in co-operation with the doctors in order to meet this very urgent problem?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in response to a request from the secretary general of the United Nations through the world health organization and the international committee of the Red Cross, the Red Cross societies of a number of countries have agreed to supply medical teams to provide medical attention for civilians in hospitals where the staff has been depleted by the departure of the Europeans. The Canadian Red Cross is preparing to send two teams, each consisting of one surgeon, one physician skilled in tropical diseases and three nurses. All will be bilingual. It is expected that these teams will remain for three months and that they will be ready to leave for the Congo before the end of this week.

I am sure all members of the house will join me in commending the Canadian Red Cross and its officers for the prompt and efficient manner in which they have responded to this request for assistance.

CONGO—SECONDING OF CANADIAN OFFICERS TO UNEF

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the house that in response to a request from the secretary general of the United Nations and in accordance with the recommendation of the commander of the United Nations emergency force in Palestine, the government has approved that four Canadian army officers, now serving with UNEF, be seconded to the United Nations force in the Congo for service at General Von Horne's headquarters. Two of these officers, Captain E. R. Shred and Captain D. M. Youngston, are specialists in movement control. The other two, Captain J. E. Clark and Captain B. P. J. Glow, are specialists in equipment and transport respectively.

These four officers from UNEF have all volunteered. They are in addition to, and in a different category from, the five Canadian officers requested earlier from UNTSO, whose service in the Congo is part of the technical assistance program which the secretary general is implementing in order to reorganize the security forces there.

The four Canadians from UNEF were required as soon as possible, and I understand that early this morning they left Cairo for Leopoldville. They will serve with General Von Horne until alternative arrangements can be made. Similar requests have been made for Danish, Indian and Norwegian officers in UNEF and the response from the governments concerned has been favourable.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. Is this the extent of the Canadian contribution up to the present? Further, may I ask if the minister has anything to say about the announcement made yesterday at the United Nations by the prime minister of the Congo, that he proposes to visit Canada seeking technical assistance, particularly among people who speak the French language?

Mr. Green: From time to time Mr. Speaker, there have been announcements in the house as to the Canadians who have been sent to the Congo, including these men from UNEF, and also men from the R.C.A.F., as well as to the supplies that have been furnished. Yesterday I made a statement about the possibility of sending additional men from Canada.

In so far as the second part of the question is concerned, which dealt with the prime minister of the Congo, we have had no official word yet that he is coming to Canada or wishes to come. However, in view of the press reports, I have this morning instructed our permanent representative at the United Nations to communicate with the prime minister to ascertain what he has in mind.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask a supplementary question. Has it been decided as a matter of government policy how many men and officers will be sent on this mission to the Congo, and of these how many will be bilingual?

Mr. Green: No, Mr. Speaker. I dealt with that the other day.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister dealt with a question from the Leader of the Opposition, but he did not deal with the decision of the government as to the number of troops that were going to be sent. He dealt with the question of whether or not the statement was true that 800 troops would be sent. The question I put to him now is whether, at this time, there has been a determination of the number that will be sent.

Mr. Green: No, I am not in a position to give any further details this morning.

LIVESTOCK

WELLINGTON COUNTY, ONT.—INQUIRY AS TO COMMENCEMENT OF BRUCELLOSIS TESTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister advise me when the brucellosis test will commence in Wellington county and approximately how long it will take? Will the minister also comment on the general position of the brucellosis control area testing program on a national basis?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, with respect to Wellington county, a request for the gazetting of the county was received from the Ontario department of agriculture on January 15, 1960. The county was accepted for test and gazetted through ministerial order on February 10, 1960.

The department has arranged to commence the brucellosis testing of the cattle in Wellington county in September, this fall, with the expectation that the work will be completed prior to the cattle going to pasture in the spring of 1961.

With respect to the national position of the brucellosis control area program, since the commencement of the program in 1957 some 452 areas across Canada, with approximately 6,401,000 cattle have been accepted for test. One hundred and eighty of these areas, with 2,342,650 cattle have been completed. Of the 180 areas completed, 138 have been declared brucellosis certified. Testing is under way in an additional 144 areas. There are now approximately 3,720,000 cattle in Canada being dealt with under the brucellosis control area program. This represents 28 per cent of the total cattle population.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, and realizing that the Minister of Labour is acquainted with this matter, can the Minister of Labour say whether the government has reached a decision on the request of the united automobile workers for a royal commission to be established to look into the automobile industry in Canada?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): This matter is under active consideration at the moment.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister give some indication when this royal commission may be appointed?

Mr. Starr: As soon as a decision is reached by the government a royal commission will be established, if that is the decision.

[Later:]

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour a question. In view of the reply given by the Prime Minister to my query last Thursday, as to when a royal commission to inquire into the automobile industry will be announced, can the Minister of Labour say whether the government has given consideration to any other form of inquiry into the industry?

Mr. Starr: The government always gives consideration to all forms of inquiry which may better whatever part of our country is concerned.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Chevrier: You have not been doing very much.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will there be an announcement one way or another before the end of the session?

Mr. Starr: As soon as a decision is reached an announcement will be made.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That means there will not be anything done.

URANIUM CITY, SASK.—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has the minister's parliamentary secretary yet reported to him on his trip to Uranium City, Saskatchewan, and his survey of the conditions there which he described as a small-sized Elliot Lake; and has the government decided as a result of this survey and the presentation made by the Saskatchewan government to take any action to relieve this situation?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): There was no necessity for the parliamentary secretary to report to me on this investigation. This matter was not taken up on behalf of the Department of Labour.

Mr. Argue: May I ask whether the government has agreed to take any action to relieve this situation as a result of the submission made to it in recent days by the government of Saskatchewan?

Mr. Starr: The matter is still under active consideration, and as the Minister of Trade and Commerce said on previous occasions in answer to questions similar to one the hon. member is asking now, an announcement of government policy will be made at the appropriate time.

Mr. Chevrier: It has been and will be forever and ever.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Is the minister aware that the inquiry into this matter began last November.

Mr. Starr: I am well aware of it.

SHIPPING

GUYSBOROUGH COUNTY, N.S.—STATEMENT ON RESUMPTION OF SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday last the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough asked me a question with regard to the resumption of service formerly carried out by the C. and E. Burke. It is expected that a contract will be signed for the balance of the season with the Co-operative de Transport Maritime et Aerien of Magdalen islands, using the M.V. Flojald II to carry out the Halifax-Guysborough service for the balance of the season.

It should be possible by using this vessel to initiate service with the new ship in approximately one week.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

MONTREAL, QUE.—REPORT ON FATAL ACCIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Laurier asked me a question regarding the Canadian National Railways line on which an unfortunate accident occurred over the week end. I am advised by Canadian National Ralways that there is no centralized traffic control in operation at present on the line where the accident occurred.

As to the second part of the hon. member's question, the management state that this line has been under study for some time as a candidate for C.T.C. installation, and that the study has progressed to a point that warranted inclusion of a commitment item in the 1960 capital budget of the railway.

AGRICULTURE

DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS—MEETINGS WITH WESTERN FARM ORGANIZATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of Agriculture whether arrangements have yet been made to meet with the liaison committee of western grain producers?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): I have nothing further to add on this subject to what has been said previously in the house.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): May I ask a supplementary question of a different nature. Has the minister or the government replied to the communications from the farmers' union concerning negotiations on acreage payments, the first of which I believe came to the government on May 10? Has any reply whatever been given to those communications?

Mr. Harkness: I do not know to what communications the hon. member is referring, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Argue: Telegrams and letters.

Mr. Harkness: As I say, I do not know to what communications he is referring, so I am in no position to answer the question. So far as I can recall at the moment, I have had no telegrams or letters from the Saskatchewan farmers' union in connection with this matter during the last month or six weeks.

Mr. Argue: May I ask a further supplementary question. In the absence of the Prime Minister, would the Minister of Agriculture make inquiries to ascertain whether or not three communications have been received from the Saskatchewan and interprovincial farmers' union council on this question, and ascertain why the government has not replied to them?

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. Is the Minister of Agriculture aware that the Prime Minister acknowledged on June 9 that he had received a request from the western liaison committee for a meeting with the government, and promised a reply at a very early date?

Mr. Harkness: As I indicated on several occasions, and as the Prime Minister also indicated, we received on May 10, I think it was, a brief from the western liaison committee. The hon. member for Assiniboia asked about communications from the Saskatchewan farm union.

Mr. Argue: And the interprovincial farm union.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REPORTED CIRCULATION OF COUNTERFEIT BILLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether he has any report to make following a question I asked on Saturday, while he was in Washington, with regard to counterfeit $10 bills which are freely circulating in many areas of this country. Is the minister in a position to let us know whether he has a report on this matter from his department, and what steps are being taken to protect the public?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): My parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell), brought the hon. member's question to my attention on my return. I am advised that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were asked about this matter, but it was still under unvestigation, and they were not able to let me have a full report yet.

PUBLIC SERVICE

MONTREAL—COMPLAINT OF MEAT INSPECTORS WITH RESPECT TO OVERTIME PAY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I have not given him notice of this question, and I will have no objections if he takes it as such. I have received representations from meat inspectors in the city of Montreal who complain that while they have received increases in accordance with the recommendations of the civil service commission, none the less they have been required to work overtime for a considerable period of time and notwithstanding this fact—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder whether the hon. member has risen in order to give information or to get it. If he has a question I suggest that he put it.

Mr. Chevrier: The question is urgent, Mr. Speaker, for the reasons I was about to give. The question must be prefaced by some information, otherwise I am afraid Your Honour would rule it out of order. However, I feel that, if Your Honour will allow me to do so, I should put the basis for the question. The basis is this. I think the overtime is paid by the packing houses to the Receiver General, and these men have not received pay for their overtime work for the last three months. Will the minister be good enough to inquire into the situation and let me know why this condition exists?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge as to whether the alleged information provided by the hon. member for Laurier is correct, but I shall be glad to inquire into the situation.

Mr. Chevrier: Thank you.

TRANSPORT

YARMOUTH-BAR HARBOR FERRY—PROPOSED STRIKE OF CREW AND PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister in a position to advise the house what action is being taken by his department to prevent a proposed strike of crew and personnel on the Yarmouth-Bar Harbor ferry?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): This is a matter which comes under the jurisdiction of the Canadian National Railways. I have been in touch with the railways this morning asking them to give me a report on the matter. I have not as yet received one.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

REPORTED FAILURE OF NEGOTIATIONS ON SALE OF PLANES TO U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. Is the minister in a position to answer the question of which he took notice last Saturday in respect to the alleged loss of the prospective sale of CL-44 cargo planes to the United States air force, owing to the unusual and unexplained delay of the Canadian government in reaching a decision with respect to re-equipping its air defence squadrons?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I believe this question was answered by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Hellyer: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the question was not answered by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who just said he was not in a position to answer it. I thought perhaps the associate minister might be in a position to answer it this morning.

Mr. Green: The hon. member for Trinity was not here yesterday.

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, I was here.

Mr. Green: If he will refer to Hansard I think he will find that I answered that question.

[Later:]

Mr. Hellyer: I should like to direct a question to the Minister of External Affairs arising out of the reply he gave yesterday in answer to the hon. member for Assiniboia. Is the hon. gentleman yet in a position to report on the proposed sale to the United States of CL-44 cargo aircraft? Yesterday the minister was not in a position to make a report on this matter.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

IMMIGRATION ACT—REQUEST FOR INTRODUCTION OF BILL THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I could ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, in view of the fact that the session is apt to go on for several weeks longer, whether she would consider introducing the bill to revamp the Immigration Act so that it could be studied between now and the next session.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I am afraid it is not ready to be introduced at the present time.

AIRPORTS

VANCOUVER—INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING FEDERAL OPERATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Drysdale (Burnaby-Richmond): I wonder if the Minister of Transport has a report to make to the house regarding the meeting he had this morning with the mayor and members of the city council of Vancouver regarding negotiations leading to the taking over by the government of the Vancouver airport.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The possibility of the transfer and sale of the city of Vancouver's investment in Vancouver airport to the Department of Transport was discussed today by a delegation representing Vancouver at a meeting with myself and departmental officials. Representing the city of Vancouver were Mayor A. T. Alsbury, Alderman Halford Wilson, chairman of the Vancouver airport board, and Alderman Reg. Atherton.

During the discussion, which Mayor Alsbury termed "most satisfactory", the Department of Transport agreed to undertake an appraisal of the city's interest in the airport, the appraisal to be made by the department's air services branch and an independent appraiser, the latter to be appointed with the approval of the city of Vancouver. The report of the appraisers is to be ready in September.

I have agreed to review the appraisers' report as soon as it is completed, at which time I shall be prepared to make a recommendation to the government as to the amount the department would pay to the city for the acquisition of the airport.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT—CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING MERGERS, MONOPOLIES, ETC.

The house resumed, from Monday, July 25, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-58 to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code—Mr. Fulton—Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 12—Prohibitions.

Mr. McIlraith: I should like to ask a question at this point for guidance. It has to do with the amendments proposed and adopted in the standing committee on banking and commerce to which this bill was referred. It will be noted that there are several amendments, and one has to do with clause 12. I therefore raise the point at this time.

I should like to ask the minister how he proposes to bring forward for adoption by this committee the amendments to certain clauses which were made in the banking and commerce committee, bearing in mind that we are dealing with a report of the standing committee which has not been adopted by the house. These amendments are not reprinted in the amended bill and it is, I think, desirable that they should be put forward at some early point in the consideration of the appropriate clauses so the committee may know exactly what it has to deal with. This is a small point, nevertheless I think it is one worthy of consideration.

Mr. Fulton: I agree it is desirable that the committee should have the fullest knowledge of the amendments reported by the banking and commerce committee. These amendments will be found in Votes and Proceedings for Tuesday, July 19, and that, of course was available yesterday when we started our consideration in this committee. My understanding of the practice being followed is that the chairman, when he comes to a clause on which the banking and commerce committee reported an amendment, says, "Shall the clause as amended by the banking and commerce committee carry?" That was done, I believe, in respect to clause 1. The present clause, I believe, is the next clause to which the banking and commerce committee made an amendment.

May I point out in addition that there is a reprint of Bill No. C-58 available today with the amendments made by the banking and commerce committee printed in the bill. I will make inquiries to see if it can now be distributed. However, as I say, all the amendments will be found in Votes and Proceedings for July 19.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is it not necessary, notwithstanding that they have been reported, to have them formally approved by the committee? This is not a big point, but it does raise an interesting question.

Mr. Fulton: The chairman has been adopting the practice of asking "Shall the clause as amended in the banking and commerce committee carry?" I should think that would be sufficient, but if hon. members wish, in addition, that I should have somebody move the adoption of the recommendations of the banking and commerce committee I shall be be glad to follow that course.

Mr. Caron: I believe it should be brought up in the house, because I have a copy of the new bill and it is marked "As passed by the House of Commons." The committee on banking and commerce is not the House of Commons, and I think it should come back to the house so we may take cognizance of the report of the committee.

Mr. Fulton: It is true that this does say "As passed by the House of Commons", but if the hon. member will look at the next line he will see that the date is left blank; he will see that that is in anticipation and, I hope, a fair one of the fact that the bill will be finally passed by the house.

Mr. McIlraith: Since the matter is not without importance, I thought it should properly be raised at this time. Speaking for myself, it is satisfactorily dealt with, but perhaps it would be helpful if when we come to clauses which have been amended by the committee some indication could be given when the clause is called.

Mr. Fulton: I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that you will help the committee, if I may put it that way, by trying to point out which clauses have been so amended, and I shall also try to inform the committee in case that is overlooked.

Mr. McIlraith: Then I wish to turn very briefly to the amendment proposed in the committee on banking and commerce to clause 12, having to do with appeal. Is the minister satisfied that this gives the right of appeal from all decisions of the courts, including the proceedings indicated in clause 19 of the bill?

Mr. Fulton: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I was just checking to make finally sure that this had been re-examined since the proceedings in the banking and commerce committee. We are satisfied that it covers all the appeals referred to by the hon. member.

Mr. Howard: As the minister indicated, there is a reprint, and perhaps the minor point I am raising with respect to renumbering the subclauses has been covered in the reprint. At the top of page 5 we find that the black figure 31 indicates that it will be section 31 of the act. Then we have subclause 1 immediately following that. In line 20 we start with subclause 2 and then in line 34 we have another subclause 2. This indicates to me that the bill contains two subclauses numbered 2. The last one is headed "Application". Should that not be subclause 3, or has this been straightened out?

Mr. Fulton: We are dealing here actually with clause 12 of the bill, which starts at the bottom of page 4.

Mr. Pickersgill: Line 45.

Mr. Fulton: Clause 12 is divided into two subclauses, subclause 1 and subclause 2. It is subclause 1 which re-enacts section 31 of the act. All those provisions under the black 31 at the top of page 5 are part of subclause 1 of clause 12 of the bill. Having amended and re-enacted section 31 of the act, we then go on to subclause 2 of clause 12 of the bill which is the application subclause.

Mr. Howard: What will be the designation in the act?

Mr. Fulton: My understanding is that it will not occur in the combines act itself. It will stay in the amending bill.

Mr. Howard: Once it passes and is given royal assent it becomes an act. What will it be called?

Mr. Fulton: That act will be this bill as passed by the House of Commons. That will then be called an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code. In that act it will be subclause 2 of clause 12, or subsection 2 of section 12 of the act we are now passing. Subclause 1 of clause 12 amends section 31 of the present act. This subclause will stand on its own. It will be subsection 2 of section 12 of this act.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the minister quite correct about that? If he will look at the bill very carefully—I do not think this is a very important point—he will see that the 1 and the 2 are after the 31 which is being put into the act that is being amended. It would seem to me, therefore, that both parts would appear in the consolidated statute.

Mr. Fulton: The question of consolidation is quite different from the one we were just discussing. The consolidation is merely an office consolidation. As the hon. member knows, it does not have the force of law. What happens here is that this act, when passed, will be an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code. It will be part of this year's statutes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, I follow that perfectly.

Mr. Fulton: Clause 12, which will then be section 12, will have two subsections, subsection 1 amending section 31 of the present act—and subsection 1 will have three subsections, 1, 2, and 2(a)—and then having completed the amendment to section 31 of the bill, section 12 of the present act will go on as it now goes on in subsection 2 thereof at the bottom of page 6 of the reprint.

The Chairman: Shall clause 12 as amended by the banking and commerce committee be adopted?

Mr. Pickersgill: Before we proceed, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word to make clear that as I indicated last night, it is my intention to ask you to call the yeas and nays; not that we would wish to repeal this whole section of the act as it now stands, but of course if this amendment did not go through it would have the effect of merely leaving section 31 of the act as it is now, which we think is much better than the amendments suggested by the government.

We are doing this for one reason and one reason only, and that is to indicate clearly that the Liberal party stands for the view that there should not be two ways of dealing with the same crime in two different cases. We do not think it is proper for this parliament, having regard to natural justice and all our traditions with respect to the treatment of criminal law, to make a provision that in identical cases, even though the administration might never act, it would even be possible in one case to prosecute and in the other case to follow a civil procedure. That seems to us entirely repugnant to the notion of equal treatment for all our citizens for which we stand.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, before this clause passes I should like to make a comment arising from the remarks made yesterday by the hon. member for Hull, who in referring to the various witnesses who appeared before the committee spoke in praise of the evidence given by Professor Cohen of McGill University. I just wanted to point out that with respect to section 31, with which we are now dealing, Professor Cohen was quite in accord with the proposal the government is advancing with respect to this section. At page 547 of the evidence in the banking and commerce committee Professor Cohen is reported as having said:

> In my second point, the problems of the new power under section 31—to restrain or dissolve before conviction, in my opinion, sir, this approach is all to the good. I will strongly support the use of the enjoining power here to restrain parties who are either going to engage in practices which are or are thought to be against the act, or to require them to dissolve situations that already have taken place.

I merely wanted to point out that in a number of situations Professor Cohen was in accord with the provisions of this bill, and this is one of them.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, it is a fact that yesterday I quoted that portion of Professor Cohen's evidence to which the hon. member has referred. If the hon. member had gone on a little further he would have seen this in the next to last paragraph. The last three lines read:

> I think this is all to the good, and I support it. However, I question whether or not the government will soon face problems of the constitutionality of this measure.

Therefore, even if Professor Cohen supported the idea behind it, he had his doubts as to the constitutionality of the measure, and this was what I wanted to bring forward.

Mr. Howard: I have one or two thoughts that I wish to express on this. It think we all recall that the Liberal party is the only party on record which, when it comes to the treatment of combines cases, favours two separate sets of circumstances; and the hiding of the flour report is a prime example of where they wanted to take steps which were contrary to the law in order to protect some favoured sons of theirs in the industrial world. The sort of argument put forward just makes one wonder whether we should believe them at all.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, just one point arising out of the remarks of the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka. I want to point out that the quotation from Professor Cohen's evidence had to do with whether there should be authority for the application of a restraining order in these cases. That is what Professor Cohen approved. The point raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is whether the minister should have the authority to determine what type of proceeding should be taken in these cases, and the point was not dealt with by Professor Cohen whether the minister should have the authority to decide or whether the courts should have the authority. If he will recall what has been said here he will agree that at no point was there any objection taken, or any suggestion that the courts might not properly have the authority merely to issue a restraining order or the other appropriate type of order, instead of applying the usual penalties whether by way of fine or imprisonment.

That was not the point at all. There was no objection to that. The point was that through this amendment, the minister is in effect taking the right, where an offence has been committed, to determine whether proceedings will be by way of criminal prosecution or by way of some civil proceeding, with the appropriate type of order made. That surely is something for the courts and not for the minister.

Mr. Fulton: Well, since the point of principle has been raised, while not wishing to prolong the debate I do, however, wish to point out that there are other authorities with respect to the acceptability and desirability of this flexibility being given in legislation of this type. I refer particularly to the report of the MacQuarrie committee which was set up to study combines legislation. In their report at page 40 they say as follows:

The use of a judicial restraining order has been suggested from time to time as a promising addition to remedies. It would be of marked service in certain types of situation, of which the incipient combine—

Mr. Pickersgill: "Incipient".

Mr. Fulton: Wait; don't be so quick. I continue:

—questioned practices in the twilight zone between competition and monopoly where the law is unsettled and the operations of the single-firm monopoly are illustrations. The analogy of the American injunction suggests itself. In the United States it has been widely used and found of value. Especially when employed in the framing of consent decrees it reaches situations where criminal prosecution may be ineffective or unsuitable, and introduces a useful element of flexibility into the administration of the legislation.

Our framing of the clause now under consideration was with the purpose of carrying into effect the full scope of the view of the MacQuarrie committee.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to reply to the minister by just saying the law as it now stands which, of course, was enacted pursuant to the recommendations of the MacQuarrie committee, is in our opinion very good law and should be left alone.

Mr. Caron: If the minister had continued with the citation he quoted on page 40 he would have seen that the MacQuarrie committee report says:

In this country it is unsettled whether constitutional and other legal obstacles stand in the way of the use of a remedy of this kind.

Therefore, even in the MacQuarrie committee report there is a doubt as to the constitutionality of this provision.

Mr. Fulton: That matter was considered, and we believe we have framed a clause that is not open to constitutional question; that is our view.

Mr. Howard: At the moment, Mr. Chairman, apart from this particular amendment before us, there are provisions in the act which have been there for almost a donkey's age, as it were, which allow the minister to take different approaches to the same set of circumstances in two different cases. This is an act which was enacted by the Liberal administration, or at least it was not changed by them. The zinc oxide case is a case in point. This was a case in which the minister decided not to proceed to court. The minister has discretion now. I think he used it incorrectly in the zinc oxide case, but that is beside the point. At the moment the minister can determine whether he should proceed to prosecution or drop the whole thing, and he decided to drop it in the zinc oxide case.

This is an extension of the ministerial authority to prosecute or not to prosecute, or to ask for a restraining order.

To avoid being inconsistent the Liberal party should ask for the removal of all the discretionary powers that the minister, the director and the commission have to cease to investigate cases whenever they think it is desirable. The discretionary power of the commission to recommend that the report be not made public should be removed. The discretionary power of the minister to decide whether he shall make the report of the commission public should be removed. All this discretion which the minister has should be removed, and it should be mandatory that once they start the investigation, the proceedings should be carried all the way through to prosecution, regardless of the merits.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member can talk all day, but he is not going to get away from the fact that last night he and his colleagues voted to treat one criminal in one way in one set of circumstances and another criminal another way in the same set of circumstances. I think he is embarrassed a bit by what he did last night.

Mr. Fulton: Would my hon. friend say that the provision in the Criminal Code to treat criminals in one of two ways in one set of circumstances and another way in another should be removed? Yet the prosecuting authorities decide now whether to proceed by way of summary conviction or by way of indictment.

An hon. Member: We hope it is a jury.

Mr. Howard: I point out that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has made a slanderous accusation against members of our society. He in effect has designated people who might come under the surveillance of this law as criminals.

Mr. McIlraith: No.

Mr. Howard: He did. He called those people criminals before. I think this is a slanderous accusation.

Mr. Crestohl: As the minister no doubt knows, the provisional execution is at all times a remedy which should be exercised with great caution. Here the matter is already before the courts; action has already been commenced. This is different from when a provisional execution is resorted to, when a report is merely submitted to the minister or to his department to commence an investigation. Here we are already before the courts, and we are anticipating too much when we ask that provisional execution should be made while the case is still sub judice.

[Mr. Howard.]

Mr. Fulton: I do not know that I follow fully the import of the hon. member's question, but as I said in the discussion last night no order could be made under the new procedure unless the facts as contained in the allegation on which the application was based had been proven. So there is no question of issuing an order and leaving the other issues before the court. The issuing of an order would only be done after determination of the question of whether the facts as alleged had been proven.

Clause agreed to: Yeas, 43; nays, 10.

On clause 13—Court may require returns.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, on clause 13 may I make a suggestion, which I hope will meet with the approval of the committee, as to how we should deal with this clause. It will be appreciated that it is a lengthy clause covering a number of sections of the act, and incorporating two new sections into the act. It also carries into effect the new division of the act into parts and contains provision for part V.

If it meets with the wishes of the committee may I suggest, therefore, that we deal with this clause by calling the proposed sections of the act such as 31A, then part V, proposed sections 32, 33, 33A and so on. In that way I think we will have a discussion in the most orderly manner. I should like to give an additional reason for doing so, namely that with respect to proposed section 32 I will be asking one of my colleagues to move an amendment dealing with the question of industry engaged in export trade by way of adding two subclauses to subsection 2, and it will be difficult to do that unless we call the proposed sections one at a time instead of the whole clause.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think that would be perfectly satisfactory. It would really be quite impossible to discuss this clause as a whole clause.

The Chairman: Is the committee agreeable to the suggestion of the minister?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the minister would also consider giving to representatives of the opposition a copy of the amendment he proposes to move so we can be looking at it meanwhile.

Mr. Fulton: It is an important amendment. It is one that was referred to in the committee and an amendment dealing with the subject was moved. I promised to give the matter further consideration to see if we could come up with something. Therefore I am glad to comply with that request.

The Chairman: Shall new section 31A carry? Carried. Shall new section 32 carry?

Mr. Howard: I should like to make a request. We have just received the proposed amendment to new section 32, which adds two new subsections. I wonder whether it might not be more advantageous to allow the proposed section 32 to stand in order to give us an opportunity to assess the effect of the proposed amendment. Perhaps the minister might have one of his colleagues move the amendment and then ask that the proposed section 32 stand. We could then take it after the lunch hour or later today or on another day, if discussion of the bill lasts that long.

Mr. Fulton: I anticipate there will be quite a lot of discussion on new section 32, subsections 1, 2 and 3, which have been in the bill for some time. As my hon. friend has pointed out, the amendment would add new subsections 4 and 5. In effect they stand by themselves, and I had hoped that we could deal with 1, 2 and 3. It may well be that by the time we have dealt with them there will have been time for consideration of the proposed amendment. If there has not been time and the matter is raised again I would be prepared to consider allowing the matter to stand, but I should like to get on with subsections 1, 2 and 3 at the present time.

Mr. Howard: I should like to point out that when we proceed to consider and debate subsections 1, 2 and 3, those who are intensely interested in this legislation will be engaged in that consideration and debate and will not have an opportunity to look at the proposed new subsections 4 and 5. At the end of the debate on subsections 1, 2 and 3 I think we will still find ourselves in the position of not having had an opportunity to consider the minister's proposal. I anticipate that this will occur.

Mr. Fulton: Can we see how we stand when we get there? It may well be that the lunch hour will intervene. If at the time we come to the amendment hon. members feel strongly that they have not had time to consider it, I will be quite prepared to deal with the question then.

Mr. Pickersgill: I see no reason for not going on with the others.

Mr. Howard: If I may proceed to make some remarks with respect to the proposed section 32, subsections 1, 2 and 3, as every member of the house knows and as every witness who appeared before the banking and commerce committee indicated, this is one of the two major amendments in the bill, the other having to do with the amendments to section 34. They are the ones which aroused the greatest amount of controversy involving support on the part of some interested parties and objections from others.

I do not intend to go extensively into such things as whether or not it is proper to put the word "unduly" in paragraph (d) of subsection 1, a matter which I believe was referred to earlier by the hon. member for Hull in dealing with the evidence of Professor Cohen respecting whether or not the verbs "restrain" and "injure" needed any qualification or were absolute in themselves.

I am concerned at this moment with subsections 2 and 3. The argument has been put forward that at the moment those things contained in subsection 2 are permissive as long as they do not have a detrimental effect or do not lead to any of the effects set out in subsection 1. In other words, at the present time corporations can conspire, combine, agree or arrange one with the other to exchange statistics provided the exchange of statistics does not result in limiting unduly facilities for transportation, manufacturing, production or distribution, or enhances prices, and so on. Corporations can and do make arrangements with respect to the defining of product standards as set out in paragraph (b) of subsection 2. As to the exchange of credit information, they undoubtedly engage in such practices. Then there is mention of the definition of trade terms and co-operation in research and development. The pulp and paper industry is a prime example of co-operation in research and development in which even government agencies participate.

Apparently these things can be done at the moment. They are not considered illegal practices in themselves; but if agreements or arrangements of this nature, at the moment, lead to the undue limiting of facilities, transportation and so on, as I related earlier, then the people engaged in these practices run foul of the law.

Cogent arguments against the inclusion of subsections 2 and 3 in the bill were given by practically every one of the university professors who appeared before the committee. Professor Cohen went into the matter extensively, and without reading his testimony word for word may I say that he made the point that this acts as an incentive to engage in these practices. It would be very easy for a group of businessmen who have legal authority and sanction to exchange statistics to feel a psychological incentive to engage in practices which are contrary to the law. The economists, men of stature and ability in the field, were likewise opposed to the changes that are set out herein.

Again without reading the testimony word for word I should like to indicate in a general way that they were so opposed. I think many years ago Adam Smith foresaw that businessmen, when they sat down to discuss things with one another, that is their relationship in the economy and whether or not they are able to increase their profits, whether or not they can increase sales, would discuss whether it would be desirable to do this by co-operation rather than by competition. The inclusion here of subsections 2 and 3 will merely allow for the spilling over into the conspiracy field of price arrangement of the degree of arrangement that is permitted in so far as statistics are concerned.

Another point deals with the argument that has been developed in the courts for a number of years concerning specific detriment, an argument which large corporations that have been charged under the Criminal Code say should be considered. Their argument is that the courts should consider the specific detriment of any conspiracy or agreement, but the courts have rejected this argument generally on the ground that it is not possible for them to do this because the law does not permit it. The courts say that if a conspiracy exists then it is, as such, illegal. We still talk in Canada today—this is the amazing thing to me—as if there were some benefit to be derived by society from price conspiracies, as though there were some beneficial results from corporations getting together to fix prices. The situation in the United States is quite different. Many corporations down there, because of the effect of the law, would no more think of entering a price conspiracy than they would think of picking pockets. It is somewhat in the same category today.

Last year, Mr. Chairman, a bill was introduced to amend this act. I cite it as a specific indication of the attitude of the government on this question of specific detriment. I should like to read a part from Bill No. C-59 of last year, section 32, subsection 2, paragraph (b), where it talks about prosecution for an offence under subsection 1, and so far as the accused is concerned states:

> (b) also establishes that the conspiracy, combination, agreement or arrangement has not operated and is not likely to operate to the specific detriment of the public, whether consumers, producers or others.

We see here in the bill of last year a reflection of the government's attitude toward injecting this specific detriment argument into the law. The words are there precisely, "specific detriment of the public". Those words are not contained in the bill this year. However, I believe the government's attitude slipped out in the explanatory notes on page 6 of the bill, which read in part as follows:

> The purpose of subsection 3 is to make it clear that, notwithstanding that certain practices come within subsection 2, the accused cannot avail himself of that subsection if these practices are accompanied by effects that are detrimental to the public interest.

The word "effects" is in there. There is a reference earlier in the bill to the things which the restrictive trade practices commission may find, and there is a reference to that in the explanatory notes. In the bill presented last year there was a particular reference in one section to what the commission should find, and again there was a reference to a finding of specific, substantial detriment to the public.

I submit that this is what the government desire to do, and they are so weakening the price conspiracy sections of the Combines Investigation Act through the introduction of these legalistic terms that prosecution will be practically impossible. The courts will be spending all their time, if a case comes to the courts, in listening to the arguments of opposing counsel about specific detriment; listening to such arguments as to what the price level might have been if the price conspiracy had not existed; listening to such arguments as to what the productive capacity might have been if there had not been a conspiracy; what the quality of the goods might have been; what the distributive channels might have been, all these theoretical arguments as to what might have occurred if the price conspiracy had not existed.

In my opinion, and in the opinion of every one of the astute and capable economists, in the opinion of Professor Cohen, who as a lawyer has had considerable experience in the combines field, the introduction of the specific detriment provision would emasculate the present Combines Investigation Act in so far as price conspiracies are concerned. We in the C.C.F. party are completely and unalterably opposed to the inclusion of subsection 2 and 3 in this bill because we believe it will do nothing but emasculate the act. Year after year the private interests of this nation have argued that the courts should look at specific detriment. The inclusion of these subsections is an indication of the influence, power and control these interests have over the government. I say that subsections 2 and 3 have no place whatever in this particular bill.

In so far as subsections 4 and 5 are concerned, as I say I have not had a chance to look at them as yet. If this is a reflection of the arguments used for putting this into the Combines Investigation Act in the first place, then at first glance I would be opposed to subsections 4 and 5. As I say, I have not had a chance to look at those subsections which the minister has just introduced but on the surface, in view of the expressions of opinion in the committee on this question, I think we would be rather opposed to them also. But that is another matter.

In summing up, I would say that the proposals do nothing but seriously weaken the effectiveness of the law in dealing with price conspiracies, and they will seriously hamper the courts in the determination they may have to make about price conspiracies because they will be spending their time in arguing theoretical concepts and results from the economic point of view. It will mean that we shall be able to have price conspiracies running rampant through this country without much fear of attention. The only people who are going to benefit are private enterprise, and the only people who are going to suffer are the consumers. To that end I move:

That subsections 2 and 3 of section 32 of clause 13 be deleted.

Mr. Pearson: Our proposition with regard to section 32 was made clear on second reading and it has been made clear in the committee. We are strongly opposed to it. The reasons for our opposition, or some of them, were given by my friend who has just preceded me, and I am not going to traverse the same ground. It must be pointed out that subsection 2 of this section 32 (2), which you might call the exemption subsection gives immunity to a conspiracy or a combination in respect of the matters enumerated, even if competition is lessened in matters such as price, production, marketing, distribution—

Mr. Fulton: Even if—?

Mr. Pearson: Even if competition is lessened.

Mr. Fulton: No.

Mr. Pearson: Competition under this wording has to be lessened unduly.

Mr. Fulton: As is the case with every breach of the combination provisions.

Mr. Pearson: Therefore, as has been pointed out—and it was pointed out in the committee—this provides quite a loophole and will give a field day to the lawyers. Indeed, in reading the committee evidence I recall that the hon. member for Greenwood, I think it was, said that it would make a lawyer's paradise. We think the word "unduly" certainly should be taken out. I do not want to say any more on the subject of this section. We have made our position perfectly clear. This is the heart of the amendments certainly one of the most important parts of the amendments, and will have a very bad effect.

Mr. Caron: We are quite in agreement with the hon. member for Skeena, because we had the same amendment to propose this morning. The reason we felt obliged to propose this amendment is that we believe this section will create a loophole which will permit a greater defence for those who might use this section not for the purpose of just helping to exchange statistics and product standards and other things, but to use these things in order to control or organize mergers outside the law, to organize certain monopolies outside the law and more especially to engage in price fixing.

This is not new. It was raised in 1950 before the MacQuarrie committee. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association at that time, in their brief at page 5, stated as follows:

It is submitted that it should be possible to specify a number of things which are not to the detriment of the public and which businessmen may consequently do without being liable to prosecution under the act.

The only thing they seemed to be afraid of were prosecutions.

To the extent that this could be done, it would reduce the area of uncertainty which at present covers practically the whole field, so far as joint action with competitors is concerned and would be a real forward step.

This matter was brought forward and their brief was most generally dealing with this matter. But at the time there was a book entitled "Monopoly and Free Enterprise" by George W. Stocking and Myron W. Watkins, in which they describe exactly the dangers of the proposed amendment. They say this:

Trade associations frequently engage in a variety of activities some of which are perhaps innocent or even wholesome when considered separately but which together tend to curb competition and restrain trade. Standardization of products and cost accounting methods, for example, may eliminate waste and lower costs, but it also helps insure uniform prices among trade rivals. Exchange of information on the credit of customers may help reduce bad debts, but it may also serve as a basis for boycotting "undesirable" customers. Statistical reporting on prices, output, sales, shipment, stocks and the like may aid producers in independently formulating sound price and production policies, but it may also afford a basis for a tacit understanding to stabilize prices and curtail output. The compiling of freight rates from basing points to shipping destinations may serve the convenience of producers who customarily sell at delivered prices. But it is also an important, if not an essential, element in any plan to stabilize prices among widely scattered producers turning out standardized products with an inelastic demand, heavy transportation charges, large fixed costs of manufacture and relatively constant variable costs when operating below capacity.

It goes on in this vein at considerable length. I will spare the committee the reading of that portion and will go on to another matter, namely the existence of an agreement and the degree of control. With the new bill the task of our courts will become much more complicated. They will have, as in the past, to make findings as to the existence of an agreement and the degree of control involved, but in addition, when the arrangement is related only to such things as the exchange of statistics, the defining of product standards and the other practices mentioned above, the courts will have to appraise the effects of such arrangements on prices, production, markets, distribution and the number of units in an industry, and find whether those practices have the result of lessening competition unduly in those respects.

When I turn to the evidence which was given in the committee, Mr. Chairman, I note that Professor Cohen, speaking on section 32 (2), as reported at page 556 of the minutes of proceedings, stated as follows:

> This proposes the most striking, or one of the most striking features of this bill, I could spend a great deal of time on it.

Further on he said:

> Year after year responsible leaders of industry have come forward, C.M.A., and others, and have put forward what certainly to them, and to many other people, seem responsible points of view. This legislation now, it seems to me, accepts the proposition that it is worth while to cast in terms of law these, what may be called, innocent areas of business co-operation and not merely to leave it to the courts to discover the innocence, but to give the courts specific guidance as to innocence. The best case that can be made for this, therefore—I will come to the other side of the point—but the best point that can be made for this very important policy change, is that it is already sufficiently imbedded in legal ideas about these matters to hold them licit, to hold them legal. Therefore, all we are doing is declaring what in fact is something which the courts would regard as legal.

On page 557 Mr. Cohen is reported as saying:

> So the section already is aware of the possibility that although businessmen may get together for purposes only of advertising, or only for information, or only on research, it may lead to fixing prices; it may lead to restrictions on production. At that point then the defences of subsection 2 will not operate.

Now let us consider some other evidence given on page 434 of report No. 7 by Dr. Skeoch, professor of economics of Queen's University. Speaking on section 32 he said:

> This is the basic section of the proposed legislation is so far as agreements restricting competition are concerned.

Further on he continues:

> This may merely reflect the character of the established jurisprudence, although, if this is the case, it is not clear why it was necessary to alter the legislation.

The professor had this to say, as may be found at page 435:

> If it is desired to maintain the same tests of restrictive agreements as are now in effect, the simplest and most direct means of doing so would be to omit subsections 2 and 3 from the proposed amendments. A somewhat similar result could be achieved by deleting everything after "unduly" in line 43 of page 6.

I think it is sufficiently established that these professors of economics and law seem to be of the same opinion that the opposition holds today. Again, I call the attention of the committee to the letter signed by Professor G. E. Britnell, head of the department of economics and political science of the University of Saskatchewan, which appears on page 15 of the appendix to the proceedings of the banking and commerce committee. Mr. Britnell has this to say in the second paragraph of the letter:

> The amendments to section 32 listing permissible forms of co-operation between companies are still subject to the dangers which we indicated in our submission. Furthermore, the amended bill is still likely to result in a significant weakening of the ban on resale price maintenance. Finally, our concluding suggestion that the application of the legislation to the service industries be examined have been completely ignored.

Then again, we might well consider the testimony given by Mr. Hannam, which can be found at page 594 of report No. 10:

> As far as we can see, the new section 32 in the bill is intended to make it clear that certain practices that are not detrimental to the public interest may be followed provided they are not accompanied by harmful effects. This section seems to us to create real dangers.

He goes on, then, to explain the danger. Thus we are not alone in thinking as we do. We share our opinions with an economist of recognized ability. We share them with a professor of law who knows perfectly well the background of legislation of this kind. He has made a profound study of all the matters which are the concern of this bill, and both he and other distinguished professional men have come to the same conclusion, namely that it would be a lot better to leave the legislation the way it was or to delete subsections 2 and 3 of section 32.

For these reasons we have to go along with the hon. member for Skeena in supporting the amendment. We think the minister should have second thoughts and recognize the weight of the important objections which have been brought up by almost everybody who has considered this question, and especially by those most concerned with the welfare of the consumer in Canada. By persisting in his present course he is granting to the manufacturers association exactly what they were trying to get in 1932 and have been trying to get ever since, namely to turn the law around and do exactly what the law now forbids.

I hope the minister will study this amendment very carefully and accept the fact that his new proposals have been condemned by people who have no political interest in the question, people who are interested in the subject as economists or as lawyers; and I must tell the hon. gentleman that if he does not wish to change this clause we shall have no alternative but to vote in favour of the amendment.

Mr. Fulton: This question has, of course, been very carefully considered. It was considered in every stage of the drafting of the bill, when we had the debate on second reading, and again in the banking and commerce committee.

In my view, the hon. member who has just spoken and all others who have expressed the same opinions are in error when they say this section does not take account of the interest of the consumer. I maintain that it does take account of the interest of the consumer and it does so by preventing the commission of practices in restraint of trade by combination to exactly the same extent as is the case under the present law.

All this section does is to make clear what is now the situation, namely that if without entering into a conspiracy to restrict competition with respect to the prices or quantity or quality of products or channels or methods of distribution, industry engages in certain practices which are set out in subsection 2 which will be beneficial to the economy, these things may be done without fear of prosecution and conviction.

It is surely an incorrect and misconceived position to say that if this section will make it possible for industry, without conspiring with regard to restriction of prices, and so on, to get together to pool resources with regard to research, the defining of product standards and other matters which will benefit the economy and produce benefits which will be passed on to consumers, the section operates against the interest of consumers.

It seems to me that the only criticism which can really be made of it is that it is a section which accomplishes nothing, because it only states what the law is today. That criticism was made by those who referred to the evidence of Professor Cohen. The hon. member for Hull just read a portion from page 556, and I think it is important to repeat it:

> The best case that can be made for this, therefore —I will come to the other side of the point—but the best point that can be made for this very important policy change, is that it is already sufficiently imbedded in legal ideas about these matters to hold them licit, to hold them legal. Therefore, all we are doing is declaring what in fact is something which the courts would regard as legal.

I quite accept that criticism. We have said from the outset that this was our intention. It was made clear to us that without this clarification in the law, practices which would produce positive benefits to the economy in general and to consumers in particular would not be followed by industry because they felt the law was unclear; so if by clarifying the law, not by changing it, you can produce benefits which will be of direct help to consumers and to the state of the Canadian economy generally, I think it would be a weak, unwise and unjustifiable course on the part of a government to refuse to make that change simply for fear of criticism, misunderstanding and misinterpretation.

Our approach is a valid and sound one. It first preserves the existing jurisprudence by retaining the existing definitions, and thus preserving all the force and effect of the law as it now stands. Second, it makes clear what may be done, provided it is done without bringing about a combination. Third, for the purposes of greater clarity we go on to say, "Here are the things which you must not accomplish".

That it is a sound approach is shown by the fact that it makes possible the introduction of the amendment to deal with the position of the export industry, which amendment will be moved a little later in this committee. That amendment is based on the same approach; that there are things that may be done which are not harmful to the domestic economy, which improve the situation of the export trade and which improve therefore the strength of the Canadian economy generally, and which it is agreed are beneficial, and which it is also agreed it is desirable to make clear that the law permits. The approach to be followed in the export amendment is exactly the approach that is being followed in the amendment referring to the effect of certain domestic activities. In both cases it is made as clear as it can be made that whether it be in the export field or in the field of co-operation in Canada, nothing may be done under the guise of that clarification which would in fact have a harmful effect domestically. That this approach has made possible an amendment to deal with the export field, is as I say, additional proof of its validity and of its benefit to the country rather than its detriment.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, if I could just say a word—

The Chairman: I recognize the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, I see; he is making another speech.

Mr. Fulton: Are you suggesting that you would not have made another one?

Mr. Howard: I caught that snide remark—

Mr. Winkler: It was not very snide by your standards.

Mr. Howard: —of the honourable and unemployed privy councillor who I understand has never had a job for very long because he keeps changing—

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would not think of asking the hon. member to withdraw.

Mr. Hellyer: No, that type of remark is typical of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Howard: Since the minister has selected portions of the evidence to read—

Mr. Fulton: My friend the hon. member for Hull appears intent on putting all the evidence on the record eventually, so I did not see why I should have been merely repetitious.

Mr. Howard: That is a point to argue with him, not with me. In fact Mr. Cohen did not fully agree—

Mr. Fulton: I admitted that Professor Cohen was not uniformly favourable. I was not trying to create that impression. I merely emphasized that he had some good things to say about the bill.

Mr. Howard: That is just fine and dandy, but if the minister would be silent perhaps I could be allowed to continue my remarks.

An hon. Member: Take 40 minutes.

Mr. Pickersgill: He can only take 30.

An hon. Member: Thank heaven.

Mr. Howard: I am attempting to proceed but there are many interjections, and if I were to describe them by using the phrase that comes to my mind I would be accused of being unparliamentary.

Mr. Winkler: Most of your remarks are.

Mr. Howard: Most of them are truthful, and that is why they are not acceptable to the hon. gentleman. The truth hurts. I propose to read from the remarks of Mr. Cohen at page 557 with respect to the proposed amendments to section 32, in order to even up the balance sheet to which Professor Cohen referred and to which the minister also referred last evening:

> Now, what we have to ask ourselves is this: what is the extent to which experience teaches us that this kind of encouragement will or will not lead to abuse. The real problem is not the juridical aspect so much, because one can argue with some, I think, clarity and force, Mr. Chairman, that clause 2 (a), (b), (c), (d), (e), (f) and (g) includes matters that most of us already regard as licit and as legal. What is important in subsection 2, however, is this: does it provide psychological encouragement to go further? This is the question.

The next words are not germane so I omit them. I continue:

> So, I say, Mr. Chairman, again, without, by any means being dogmatic, that I think this language is a temptation. I think its importance is not so much legal: it is psychological. I think it is a danger. The point of view of all of us is that we share the same interest, the interest of preserving as much a free and workable competitive economy as we can, in the face of the pressure of a welfare state. That is the main objective we all have in common. Does this, in terms of our common goal,—you and I have here—does this lend itself to it? Will this give the businessman a kind of feeling of legality that in my opinion he already has with these activities, or will it perhaps induce some of them to go a great deal further than they ought to go? My view is that this particular formulation is a flag of temptation, not a rule of legal importance. This temptation may lead to illegalities.
> So much for my views on that section.
> I think this is by far perhaps the most important, with one exception, the most important single policy change in this bill. I would, therefore, sir, certainly oppose this particular change. I see no important contribution it could make at this time without much deeper thinking.

On the one hand Professor Cohen said these activities are permitted at the moment and have been imbedded in the law for some time, and on the other hand he opposed the changes because they might lead to abuse. The minister selected only the good things Mr. Cohen had to say. In fact Mr. Cohen said only that these things exist, and he expressed opposition to the changes pointing out the detrimental effects that could result. I raise this only to correct the balance sheet.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, the minister has said that this is another bill of rights—

Mr. Fulton: Your words, not mine.

Mr. Pickersgill: —in which he is asking this parliament to spell out some things that are not against the law now in order to reassure people that they may do things that it is lawful to do. If I am misinterpreting the hon. gentleman I should like him to correct me at once.

Mr. Fulton: Except that I did not apply the term "bill of rights".

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister did not use the term "bill of rights", no. What this is saying, according to the minister, is that these things have always been lawful, but for greater certainty we are going to put them in because Canadian business is so timorous it is afraid to do what is lawful unless parliament spells out that it is lawful to do it. I do not think so ill of Canadian business as that, sir; I do not myself think that most Canadian businessmen are afraid to do what is lawful even though parliament does not spell out what is lawful.

It does seem to me that if we want this legislation to be as clear and precise as possible, we should content ourselves with saying what is unlawful and have the good old British presumption that anything that is not specifically unlawful is lawful in a free country. But our objection to it is not on the ground that it is declaratory. If it were merely declaratory, if it were merely unnecessary verbiage, as the minister implied, in the statute, our attitude might be different. Our objection is that we do think this is apt to result in litigation and its use as a cloak or a screen for activities which are unlawful.

We are not alone in thinking that, even in the house. The hon. member for Greenwood is not here, but his words have been plainly printed in the proceedings of the committee. They have already been referred to by the Leader of the Opposition. But in view of the eminence of the hon. member for Greenwood, of his long experience in business, of his long experience in parliament, of his unhappily rather short experience in government, it does seem to me that the committee would wish to pay special respect to that hon. member's words, and I therefore think they ought to be put on the record again as they were uttered in the committee. They will be found in the proceedings at page 698, as follows:

> Mr. Macdonnell: I want to ask a question which, I am afraid, would be mainly a rhetorical question.

Well, the hon. member supports the government; I suppose that is why he put it that way. Perhaps I had better go on and read it:

> Mr. Macdonnell: I want to ask a question which, I am afraid, would be mainly a rhetorical question. The more we talk about section 32 the more I am convinced that it is going to be a lawyers' paradise. It is difficult, if things are not gone at directly by retaining the old wording; and I suggest it is difficult to question that the benefit of retaining the old wording is very great. Does there come a time when you pay a penalty for it? Is it possible in this case it might have been approached directly instead of indirectly?

Of course it is a very conservative attitude that we should retain the old wording; that we should stick to something that has on the whole worked pretty satisfactorily; but I come back again to what the hon. member for Greenwood said, namely that he was convinced that this was going to become a lawyers' paradise, sir, if it was used in pleadings, in charges under the main section. I do not think so ill myself of the combines branch, of the director and of the commission, as to think they are going to engage in frivolous prosecutions about any of the matters enumerated in this section, because I understand we were told in evidence that on no occasion had any of those practices which are stated to be perfectly legal ever arisen in connection with any prosecutions. Whether sections 2 and 3 are unnecessary, we think they are apt to prolong proceedings under the act, to make the law less enforceable and possibly to provide a cloak or screen for activities that are not lawful. For that reason I intend to vote for the amendment moved by the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. McIlraith: In his remarks on this clause the minister made reference to something he said on second reading of the bill, which is to be found at page 4340 of Hansard, where he went on to indicate:

> The effect and intention of legislation must be clear, both in order that those who are affected by it may know what their position is, and in order that another very important principle may be maintained, namely that it should not be the government which from day to day determines by private decision what are the rules governing business and society generally, but that the rules governing business and society should be laid down in legislation which speaks clearly and which is capable of fair and immediate application.

I think I am quoting correctly in saying that that is his main defence in bringing forward this clause in the form in which it is found. This is his purpose. Well, I can only say that if this is his purpose it surely is a most indirect and devious route to pursue in achieving this wholly laudable purpose. The form of the new clause 32 is certainly an indirect method of spelling out clearly what is illegal under this particular phase of the legislation.

The minister made some reference to the export provision which he proposes to move later. With deference, I say it has no bearing on the point at issue now being discussed in committee. The export provision could be dealt with under this clause or under two or three other appropriate clauses in the legislation. But the minister also made clear—and indeed it is indicated in the explanatory notes of the bill—that he desired to preserve the existing jurisprudence. Indeed, subclause 1 of the new clause 32 is an attempt to do that, and subject to something I will have to say later as to one small point in clause 32 it does indeed take the former section virtually in toto and attempt to link it up so that we shall have the benefit of existing jurisprudence and many years of experience and administration.

Perhaps hon. members will bear with me for a moment if I seek to go through the section as it now stands to judge the method of approach to this problem. Perhaps you will call it one o'clock, Mr. Chairman, and I shall continue my discussion later.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose for the noon adjournment I was seeking to show the dangers in the method of approach to the drafting of new section 32 as contained in clause 13 of the bill. I had started to indicate my argument by referring to section 32 (1) which contains a statement of the offence. If I may paraphrase the subsection, everyone who conspires, combines, agrees or arranges with another person to prevent, limit or lessen unduly competition in the production, manufacture and so on of articles, or to restrain or injure trade or commerce is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for two years. In other words, 32 (1) is an attempt to preserve the existing jurisprudence and to restate the offence in terms almost identical with the existing law. Then follows subsection 2 which I think I ought to read. It is in these terms:

> Subject to subsection 3, in a prosecution under subsection 1 the court shall not convict the accused if the conspiracy, combination, agreement or arrangement relates only to one or more of the following—

Then there are seven subheadings, the first six of which refer to such things as the exchange of statistics, defining of product standards and so on. As to the first six of the enumerated items, so far as I am aware, and I would ask the minister to correct me if I am not wholly accurate, there has never been any investigation or prosecution under the act. But my concern is with the seventh of the items enumerated in subsection 2, which is in these words:

> (g) some other matter not enumerated in subsection 3.

Therefore there is a good defence if the combination relates to some other matter not enumerated in subsection 3. At that point we have defined the offence in subsection 1, and we have then said that there is a good defence to any prosecution under subsection 1 if the combination relates to some other matter not enumerated in subsection 3. Subsection 3 goes on to say:

> Subsection 2 does not apply if the conspiracy, combination, agreement or arrangement has lessened or is likely to lessen competition unduly in respect of one of the following:
> (b) quantity or quality of production,
> (c) markets or customers, or,
> (d) channels or methods of distribution—

Then these words follow:

> —or if the conspiracy, combination, agreement or arrangement has restricted or is likely to restrict any person from entering into or expanding a business in a trade or industry.

I want to indicate what an indirect route is taken to achieve clarification in this section. The offence is set out clearly in subsection 1, as it was in the earlier legislation, and we have some 50 years of jurisprudence determining what constitutes the offence. Subsection 2, for reasons that were indicated in the banking and commerce committee, enumerates certain types of combinations that have never been considered to be an offence, and therefore at least as to the first six paragraphs in subsection 2 it has no meaning or effect at all. But the seventh paragraph then goes on to say that there is a good defence unless the charge deals with some other matter not enumerated in subsection 3. Subsection 3 then goes on and applies a limitation. It will be seen that the whole scheme of subclause 3 is by way of limitation of the offence, and not even applied directly but applied indirectly by way of enlargement of the defences to subclause 2.

Subclause 3 is not taken in its present form from any of the existing legislation and is not, as such, the subject of any court decision. It is an attempt to repeat, I suppose the minister would say for greater clarity but I would say for dangerous, ultra-cautious reasons, what is already contained in the other subsections. This raises the whole question of how much of the offence set out in the first subclause is discarded by the combined effect of subsections 2 and 3 or the combined effect of subparagraph (g) of subclause 2 in bringing subclause 3 into effect.

I feel that this is a dangerous type of draftsmanship, and the question must remain outstanding as to how much the offence is cut down by this new method, particularly by incorporating subclauses 2 and 3 in the form in which they exist and with particular reference to subparagraph (g) of subclause 2. That is the point I wish to raise. I do not want to belabour the point and I do not want to repeat any of the arguments heretofore advanced. It seems to me, in view of that real danger, that we are unintentionally cutting down on the offence, and for no clear reasons; therefore I would support the amendment.

Amendment (Mr. Howard) negatived: Yeas, 10; nays, 25.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. McIlraith: I have one other matter that I wanted to raise, Mr. Chairman, in connection with subclause 1 of section 32. It is stated in the explanatory notes, as the minister indicated in his earlier remarks on the bill, that subsection 1 of the new section 32 incorporates section 411 of the Criminal Code. He went on to say that it was there merely to preserve the existing jurisprudence. I want to confine my argument to that narrow point. Section 411 of the Criminal Code is set out opposite page 11 of the bill, and I want to draw attention to an addition in subparagraph

(d) of subsection 1 of section 32. There is the addition of the word "unduly". The section in the Criminal Code does not contain that word, but the corresponding reference in subparagraph (d) adds the word "unduly" after the word "commerce".

It seems to me this is adding something new by way of limitation of the offence that is not warranted by any explanation given by the minister. Indeed, there has been no indication of the reason for this other than that the subclause was an attempt to preserve the existing jurisprudence. Without elaborating at length on the argument, I think it has been made clear, or at least it has been argued by the minister, that there has been no attempt to cut down the offence by the new definition. If that is so I respectfully submit the word "unduly" should be deleted.

I therefore move:

That clause 13 be amended as follows:
That the word "unduly" be deleted from paragraph 1 (d) of section 32.

Perhaps the minister would answer the point.

Mr. Fulton: The purpose of inserting the word "unduly" in subparagraph (d) of 32 (1), which I believe is the point my hon. friend is dealing with now—it has been hard to follow him and to know exactly to which subsection he has been referring. Is it subparagraph (d) (1) of 32?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: The purpose of inserting the word "unduly" is threefold. It was felt that the courts would read the subparagraph as though the word "unduly" were there, because the word "unduly" is an inherent part of the definition of every offence in combination except this one. It was not there before, but we certainly felt the subparagraph would be read as though it were there. Second, we thought that for the purpose of uniformity and to make it quite clear that it is the undue interference with competition or trade and commerce that parliament is considering, it should be there. Then, third, we felt it should be there because of the effect of the container materials case, one of the important pronouncements of the Supreme Court of Canada in the field of combinations.

These seemed to us to be good reasons why the word should be inserted. I recognize that, having said that in our view the courts would construe the section as though the word were there anyway, it could be argued that if that were the case then why bother to put it in the statute. I do not believe that is a strong argument. I think our position is the better position, but I am quite frank to say that if my hon. friends opposite attach great importance to this and think it really changes the law, then because I cannot see any great potential harm in doing so I would be prepared to accept the amendment to debate the word. If my hon. friend presses the point I would be prepared to accept the amendment.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to say a word on the point, if I may. It depends a little on which verb you take. It is conceivable that you could restrict trade and commerce duly, which is the opposite of unduly. But it is hard for me to see how you could injure trade and commerce duly or how you could, by putting in the word "unduly" if you read it as "injure", injure trade and commerce unduly. It really suggests that there is a change in the meaning. For that reason I hope that my friend the hon. member for Ottawa West will insist upon his amendment. I might say that I think the minister's attitude is reasonable.

Mr. Howard: In view of the brief reference that was made earlier to the placing in paragraph (d) of the word "unduly", may I say this. The word "unduly" has appeared all the way through in relation to the verb in paragraphs (a), (b), (c) and (d), namely to limit, prevent or lessen. Those are not absolute terms. Lessening something can be done to slight degrees and so on. But when it comes to injury, this verb is more absolute and definite and the word "unduly" in connection with the verb "injure" implies that there is in the act something which should not be there. I think the wisest course is that indicated by the hon. member for Ottawa West. The minister indicated if the matter were pressed he would accept the amendment. Perhaps it would be better all the way round to remove the word "unduly". To me it appears that is the better course to take. I do not think the hon. member for Ottawa West formally moved that the word "unduly" be deleted therefrom, although he indicated that was his intention. I hope he will persist and that the course the minister suggested will be followed, namely that the word will be removed.

Mr. McIlraith: I think the attitude of the minister is quite fair on this point. In order that there will be no doubt in anyone's mind, may I say that the motion I had intended to move refers to the word "unduly" in line 26 on page 6 of the bill; that is to say, it restores the subparagraph exactly to the form in which it was.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, it is page 6, line 21.

Mr. Fulton: That is of the reprinted bill. I think my friend the hon. member for Ottawa West is referring to the original one.

Mr. Pickersgill: Which is the bill before us.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, the original bill.

Mr. McIlraith: Line 26.

Mr. Fulton: Line 26 on page 6.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes. The effect is to leave that subparagraph in the exact language used in section 411 of the Criminal Code. I think this motion achieves that purpose. I move:

That clause 13 be amended as follows, that the word "unduly" be deleted from paragraph 1 (d) of section 32.

Mr. Fulton: Under the circumstances outlined, Mr. Chairman, and in the light of the discussion, that amendment is acceptable to the government.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the committee to accept the motion?

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Howard: I should like to say a word or two about this matter, after listening to the discussion. Now that subsections 2 and 3 are in effect to be retained, while I do not want to cover the same ground again in so far as formal motions are concerned, it appears to me that there is some conflict between subsection 3 and subsection 1. Because there is an insistence on retaining the provisions of subsection 2, it would seem to me that perhaps the better course—

Mr. Crestohl: Would the hon. member mind if I have something to say on section 2 before he goes on to section 3? I think he took it for granted that subsection 2 is also lost.

Mr. Howard: I took it for granted that the motion of my hon. friend had been defeated and it would not be possible to move a similar motion; and that if subsection 2 is to remain, as it apparently is now because of the decision of the committee in the way it has been taken, it does appear that there is a conflict between subsection 3 and subsection 1. It would seem to me that the better course would be not to draft subsection 3 so that it made reference to specific things as it does, as in paragraph (a) to prices, in (b) to quantity or quality of the products, in (c) to markets or customers or in (d) to channels or methods of distribution, or preventing or restricting from entering into or expanding any business. I would think the better course would have been to phrase the subsection somewhat along these lines. "Subsection 2 does not apply if a conspiracy or combination or agreement or arrangement contravenes subsection 1" or has lessened or is likely to lessen competition unduly, and leave it at that. In terms of phraseology this may not be the way the draftsman would do it, but the intent is there. I think this connects subsection 3 with the parts in subsection 1 which are deemed to be improper or illegal. I submit that if we connect the two we would have perhaps less chance of the so-called specific detriment argument being developed in court if any prosecution should be entered upon under this section. I think perhaps I should say this. Following along those lines and to insure that there is some connection between them I move:

That subsection 3 of section 32 of clause 13 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

I will read it, and it will be seen that this proposed amendment I have in mind and am about to read inserts three or four words, and I will make reference to them.

(3) Subsection 2 does not apply if the conspiracy, combination, agreement or arrangement contravenes subsection 1 or has lessened or is likely to lessen competition unduly in respect of one of the following:

(a) prices,
(b) quantity or quality of production,
(c) markets or customers, or
(d) channels or methods of distribution,

or if the conspiracy, combination, agreement or arrangement has restricted or is likely to restrict any person from entering into or expanding a business in a trade or industry.

The added parts I have underlined, I believe, in each of the flimsy copies that are available. The added words are "contravenes subsection 1" which are inserted between the words "arrange" and "as" in line 42. It seems to me that something of this nature is perhaps a better course to follow, to deal with a case where in the first instance under subsection 2 a person is charged, and then under subsection 2 he says, "Oh, we were only exchanging statistics or defining products" and by that argument seeks to avail himself of this sanction or authorization in order that he may not be convicted. I think we then ensure that his defence is connected so that he also must show that the activity of exchanging statistics or whatever it was they were doing does not do and result in any of the things prevented or prohibited by subsection 1.

It was for this purpose that I put in the words "contravenes subsection 1". Perhaps the better course would have been to eliminate all the references in subsection 3 so it just reads that subsection 2 does not apply to conspiracies, combinations or arrangements that contravene subsection 1, and place a period there. I undertake merely to insert them and to leave it for the minister to make some reference in subsection 3 which would, if necessary, bring its provisions into accord with those of subsection 1. The main point is that there should be some relationship between the two subsections.

Mr. Fulton: I must say that the wording of the proposed amendment seems to be following the policy of chasing your tail, because in the light of the amendment suggested subsections 2 and 3 would not only have no purpose but would have no meaning by way of clarification or otherwise. The effect of the amendment is to do indirectly exactly what was suggested directly by the hon. member a little earlier, namely, to delete subsections 2 and 3.

I really cannot say much in amplification of what I said in explanation of the scheme upon which the present section was drawn. This is a clarification proposal based first on the retention of the present jurisprudence under subsection 1. Second, if it is a delineation of those courses of conduct which, if followed exclusively and not amounting to a combination as defined, can be followed without fear of prosecution and conviction. Third, subsection 3, provides further explanation, if you like, in order to make it perfectly clear what it is that parliament intends the combination section to cover so that those who read it may know what it is they may do and what it is they may not do. No one in the committee, in the debate on second reading, or here, has been able to suggest to me any way in which the amplification in subsection 3 of what is meant by a combination in restraint of trade is incomplete or defective in any way. That was the purpose of subsection 3.

To include the words of the hon. member for Skeena would make subsections 2 and 3 of no effect; they might as well not be there at all, because they would accomplish nothing by way of clarification. So I am not able to accept the amendment.

Mr. Howard: I feel that despite the explanation given by the minister that the purpose of these subsections is to add clarification, the provisions are designed to have a somewhat different effect. The minister said that some of the corporations were doubtful as to whether they had the right to engage in any agreement to define standards, exchange information and so on, and they did not want to do so because they felt they might run foul of the law as expressed in the provision set out in subsection 1. This was the purpose as stated by the minister on second reading.

If it is for any other purpose, that purpose is something which the minister did not indicate, and I think, perhaps, that what the minister and the government desire to do is to inject the principle of specific detriment into this section. That is why the minister wants to retain these apparently innocuous phrases such as prices, quantity and quality of the product, and so on. I suggest that the purpose is not simply that of defining the intent so that there should be no contravention of the legislation set out in subsection 1. I submit that in a roundabout way the hon. gentleman is hoping that the argument as to specific detriment can be used in the courts in connection with this legislation. When he used the words "specific detriment" in Bill No. C-59 last year it was developed as an argument which the courts consistently rejected, an argument which counsel for defending corporations has consistently maintained should be allowed. By rejecting this proposal the minister is now dragging in this matter of specific detriment in one way or another.

Amendment (Mr. Howard) negatived: Yeas, 19; nays, 50.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, I wish to address myself to subsection 2 and draw the attention of the committee to the words "shall not convict the accused". I find this language strange and somewhat offensive. We are now giving a judge sitting in a case a command—indeed almost a royal command—that he shall not convict. This does not allow the judge the latitude of discretion that is customarily allowed to a judge in finding whether there are grounds for defence leading to an acquittal or allowing for the benefit of the doubt. The words presently read "shall not convict the accused if" and I feel it would be more considerate language and more in line with the practice before the courts if the language read:

> —the court may consider it a defence if the conspiracy, combination, agreement or arrangement relates—

And so on. The minister has a keen legal mind. I anticipate that he can appreciate the difference in that language. I have rarely seen any section of the Criminal Code or any statute that contains a command to the judge that he shall—and I emphasize the word "shall"—convict. In the present form the wording does not allow the judge the customary discretion as to whether he should convict or consider that there is a defence if certain things are done. The language I suggest would be more consistent with the language in use in the law of our land, in the Criminal Code and in criminal matters. I therefore move:

That the words "shall not convict the accused" in line 6 on page 7 in subsection 2 of section 32 be deleted and be replaced by the words, "may consider it a defence if," etc.

The section would then read:

—the courts may consider it a defence if the conspiracy, combination, agreement or arrangement relates only to one or more of the following—

The Minister of Justice is familiar with the terminology customarily used in statutes and should, I think, support a motion that removes a command of this kind. A command not to convict is an unusual command to give in our jurisprudence.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid I cannot accept or agree with the point of view of the hon. member who moved this amendment when he says that the effect of these words is unusual. The desirable feature of all legislation of this type is to make it clear what is the offence on the one hand and to make it clear what actions do not constitute an offence and will not result in conviction on the other. I therefore do not agree with the hon. member's interpretation when he says that these are unusual words. May I refer the hon. gentleman to one example that I have been able to turn up quickly, subsection 3 of section 246 of the Criminal Code, which reads:

No person shall be convicted of an offence under this section for expressing in good faith—

And so on. I am unable to see any difference in effect and hardly any in detail between those words and the words we use here, "the court shall not convict," so my hon. friend's point is not well taken in the first place.

In the second place the effect of his amendment I think, would be to establish a principle that no one would want to follow and that is the principle of saying in effect that the court can consider only this one defence. In other words, you would be depriving an accused person of all other defences because you would have said in effect that in a charge under the combination section "the court shall consider it a defence if the accused establishes so and so". That, it seems to me, would certainly open the danger that the courts would say, "Well, since parliament has provided for just one defence then by necessary implication there are no other defences", and the effect of this would be to make a change in the law and in the principles with regard to trial that I certainly would not be able to accept.

Mr. Crestohl: If my amendment did nothing else but draw to the minister's attention that only one defence might be open to an accused, and if he thinks he can remedy that, I see no reason why the minister, if he cannot accept the amendment, should not express his appreciation for having had drawn to his attention a loophole which he may be able to plug even though he rejects the amendment.

Mr. Fulton: I do not think that point follows at all because it is not the minister who has established the defence. The courts have entertained defences to charges under the combines legislation on the basis of their interpretation of the statutes. What you would be doing would not be preserving the existing jurisprudence as we have all agreed it would be desirable to do, but with respect to the defence side of it you would be narrowing down all the jurisprudence in one fell swoop to just one possible defence.

Mr. Crestohl: But does the minister not appreciate the fact that if the court hearing the evidence finds there is room for defence its hands are completely tied notwithstanding subsection 3 of the act? The court may find any one of the offences listed in the other sections of the act that are brought before it. As long as any of the items enumerated in subsection 2 are proved then it must acquit even though there may have been proof before it than an offence had been committed.

Mr. Fulton: That, Mr. Chairman, is a complete misconception of the effect of our amendment. I do not know how many times we are going to have to cover the same ground. Our amendment does not say the court must acquit if the accused establishes any one of these points. The amendment taken as a whole says that the court shall not convict if the accused shows that the arrangement related only to one of these points; and it goes on to say that notwithstanding that the accused was able to show that his arrangement embraced one of these points if in fact the arrangement went further than that and amounted to the creation of a combination having these disadvantageous effects then there might still be a conviction despite the fact that one of the incidental features was one of the purposes enumerated in subsection 2.

I am afraid that the trouble with my hon. friends opposite, Mr. Chairman, is that they have persisted in their misconception of the whole scheme upon which these amendments have been founded.

Mr. Crestohl: I point out that it is not a misconception.

Mr. Fulton: It certainly is.

Mr. Crestohl: Here is the classic clash between the producer and the consumer, and we see in this section the widest form of loophole for the offender to be able to escape through when you enjoin the judge and virtually compel him or suggest to him that he must acquit the offender. I feel that saying to the judge, "You shall not convict the accused" is rather tipping the hand of the government in this classic position between the producer and the consumer, in trying to legislate in a way that would produce the greatest good for the greatest number. This has been Liberal policy and that is why we feel these loopholes should be blocked up.

Mr. Fulton: Would my hon. friend not agree that the offence of blasphemous libel is a serious offence? The section of the code says:

No person shall be convicted of an offence under this section for expressing in good faith and in decent language—

And so on. Would my hon. friend suggest that parliament has tipped its hands to the court in a manner which indicates that parliament is really in favour of blasphemous libel? Nor do we do anything of that sort in the amendment which is now before us.

Mr. Howard: I am afraid I have not been able to follow the amendment of the hon. member for Cartier. Perhaps the Chair would like to read it again.

The Deputy Chairman: The amendment reads:

That the words "shall not convict the accused" in line 6 on page 7 in subsection 2 of section 32 be deleted and be replaced by the words, "may consider it a defence if,"

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the amendment of the hon. member for Cartier illustrates very clearly how difficult it is to draft criminal legislation that does not create offences. To try to define what are not criminal offences is a rather new departure which, of course, I cannot enter into now because the committee has made a decision.

Mr. Fulton: It is not a new departure. I was able to turn up a section of the code without any trouble where this was done before.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister was referring to mitigating circumstances set out in the Criminal Code. The whole point is that it does not really seem to me that the wording would make very much real difference in this case because it is only enumerating things which are not against the law, anyway. Everybody agrees that these things are not against the law and the courts could not convict because they are not against the law. Perhaps in the circumstances the hon. member for Cartier, having illustrated very well what a confused kind of situation is being created by the legislation, would feel that he had served his purpose if he did not particularly press the amendment further.

Mr. Crestohl: In the light of the explanation by both the minister and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, and with the permission of the committee, I should like to withdraw the proposed amendment.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give permission to the hon. member for Cartier to withdraw his amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment withdrawn.

The Deputy Chairman: I understand that the minister has an amendment to section 32?

Mr. Fulton: If the discussion on subsections 1, 2 and 3 is finished; if not, we should wait until it is over.

Mr. Howard: I have a few remarks to make on subsection 1 and they relate to the actions of the court or the authority of the court to impose penalties if a person is convicted under this section of conspiring to do certain things. During the discussion on second reading a difficulty arose which I do not think is quite the same problem that we have at the moment. It is contended that if there is a conspiracy to enhance prices the courts would have some authority or discretion to adjust the amount of the fine so that it will bear some relationship to the profit picture of the corporation or corporations involved, and so that the penalty will be imposed for an infraction of the law and so that society will be able to recoup to a degree the additional amount, for argument's sake, that it had to pay during the time that such conspiracy was in existence. Perhaps the best way to get at the point at this stage is to move an amendment which relates to certain words in lines 28 and 29 of subparagraph (d) of the original bill. The amendment reads:

That subsection 1 of section 32 in clause 13 be amended by deleting therefrom the words "is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years" in lines 28 and 29 and substituting therefor the following:

"Is guilty of an indictable offence and liable on conviction to a fine which shall not be less than 5 per cent of the total net profits of his business for the five years immediately preceding the year in which the fine was imposed, or if the conspiracy, combination, agreement or arrangement existed for less than five years the fine shall relate to the lesser period of time, or should such total net profits, if any, not total twenty five thousand dollars, then to a fine in the discretion of the court, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years or to both fine and imprisonment.

That, I should think, sums up pretty well the arguments already put forward in answer to the point raised in objection to the proposal.

Mr. Woolliams: I should like to hear the last speaker define what he means by "net profit", and what he is to do if no net profit is shown, because net profit is a pretty illusive thing when it comes to a balance sheet. I am not surprised that this should come from the C.C.F. because they are probably not aware what a business balance sheet looks like.

Mr. Argue: You are not so bright.

Mr. Woolliams: I will leave that for the decision of the house, not the leader of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: I think I should say a word about this amendment, Mr. Chairman. There is, I admit, an attraction that is more than superficial in an attempt to create a mandatory penalty commensurate with the advantage that may have been achieved as the result of an offence. Unfortunately, however, this is not always possible and certainly not possible within the limitations laid down within the amendment because a combination may well have effects other than an increase in profits. It may well be the intent of those entering into such an arrangement not necessarily to increase their profits but to accomplish other things. Indeed, it is my view and has been uniformly the view of parliament, I think, that combination arrangements are not necessarily more efficient and do not necessarily—indeed, by no means necessarily—result in an increase in profits. They have other effects, all of them undesirable.

In fact, it may well be that as a result of loss of efficiency by the elimination of competition you may have a reduction in profits. There are all sorts of other undesirable effects and results of combinations unrelated entirely to the question of profits. If, therefore, the discretion of the judge with respect to the imposition of the penalty was exclusively limited to the matter of the profits which the company had made over the years, I think you would find that judges' hands would be tied and that activities which should be punished much more severely would have the penalty limited in an undesirable fashion from the point of view of the hon. member for Skeena and, indeed, generally.

Therefore, notwithstanding the criticism which is made of the courts and of the extent of the fines they have been imposing, I think the desirable principle to follow is to leave the punishment in the discretion of the court. Then there is no limitation on the authority of the judge to impose a heavy penalty where he feels there was a deliberate and anti-social—for want of a better expression—anti-social conspiracy on the part of those engaged in industry to do that which the law prohibits. If you start imposing limitations of this sort, what you are actually doing is limiting the capacity of the courts to make the punishment fit the crime.

I know, as I say, that there may be criticisms that in this case or that case judges have not imposed adequate fines. Many of these criticisms arose out of the fact that until recently there was a limitation on the total fine that could be imposed. But even if the criticisms were justified and judges were not yet educated, if you like, to the point where they imposed adequate fines, I do not think the way to cure that evil is by introducing greater restriction. Surely the way to cure that evil, if there be any evil, is by a process of public discussion, education, if you like, and public information as to what it is that parliament and the country desire the courts to do—

Mr. McIlraith: And the hiring of good counsel.

Mr. Fulton: And the hiring of good counsel, yes—in the way of making the punishment fit the crime.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, however desirable the objectives indicated by the hon. member who moved the amendment may be, I think the amendment put forward by him does not achieve those objectives, not only for the reasons indicated by the minister but for another reason. The hon. member would set up a whole new procedure for a trial after conviction to determine the matter of sentence, and there is a great deal of obscurity about the criteria to be used in some of the phrases in his amendment.

It seems to me that we can achieve a much sounder administration of justice if we leave the imposition of penalties to the judges who are charged with the responsibility under our law of imposing such penalties and that the amendment the hon. member for Skeena has put forward might very well defeat the purpose he has in mind. For these reasons, which I admit are purely legal, I feel that for my part at least I will have to oppose the amendment.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I think the attitude of both the Minister of Justice and the member for Ottawa West is commendable from the point of view of the expression of their appreciation of the failure of the courts to take into account the full impact of the anti-social, as the minister put it, actions of some of the corporations that have engaged in these illicit practices and have been found guilty and fined. Rather than to insist that wording of this sort be contained in the legislation, it was my primary purpose to have some base upon which to found a brief discussion of the attitude of the courts on these matters.

I appreciate, Mr. Chairman, that we are skating on pretty thin ice when we undertake to be critical of the judiciary or the courts because this is contrary to the rules of the house. If I had embarked upon critical comment as to the attitude of the courts in levying fines in past cases I would be contravening the rules and would be out of order and so would others. Therefore I preferred to draft an amendment around which a discussion could be centred in order to point up the fact that in my opinion the courts have been overly lenient in past years and have had a tendency to follow the $10,000 limit that used to exist even in respect of cases that have arisen after the change was made with respect to the fine. I think their attitude warrants some criticism.

I do not intend to press this matter to a vote. I thought I might provoke some discussion at this stage. I would be prepared to withdraw the amendment if that is agreeable. It does not matter one way or the other to me. If I cannot withdraw it I naturally intend to vote for it, but my primary purpose was to evoke a discussion of this nature. I think the Minister of Justice and the hon. member for Ottawa West more or less agree that there must be a change in the attitude of the courts with regard to infractions of this kind. Penalties should be more restrictive than they have been in the past thus providing a greater deterrent to illicit practices. It may be that our discussion of this matter will tend to influence the attitude of some of the otherwise reluctant judges.

The Deputy Chairman: Will the committee give unanimous consent to the hon. member to withdraw his amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. McIlraith: I wish to ask one question for clarification having to do with the penal part of section 32 (1). I have particular reference to lines 28 and 29 where it says that every one is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years who conspires, combines, and so on. That subsection is taken from section 411 of the Criminal Code, but as section 411 of the Criminal Code is now repealed by this bill we therefore have to rely on this legislation for the penal provisions. My question is this: Most of these offences are committed by corporations and the Criminal Code deals with the matter of imprisonment and, where imprisonment cannot be imposed, fines in lieu thereof. Is the minister satisfied that the provisions mentioned merely for imprisonment are sufficient in a statute that is not part of the Criminal Code? I must say I am not familiar with the relative sections of the Criminal Code and I have not had an opportunity of looking them up since noticing this point. Perhaps if the minister wishes he could let that stand for later check.

Mr. Fulton: No, I think the relevant provision of the Criminal Code is section 622 which provides that where a person is convicted of an offence punishable with imprisonment for five years or less, he may be fined in addition to or in lieu of any other punishment that is authorized. If this section is taken together with the relevant provision of the Interpretation Act, plus clause 22 of this bill which has the effect—no, I am advised that perhaps I am not on sound ground in citing clause 22—but if section 622 and the subsequent sections of the Criminal Code are taken together with section 28 of the Interpretation Act, they have the effect of taking care of the matter with which the hon. member is concerned.

Mr. Chairman, I had in mind discussing briefly the question of the amendment with regard to export trade. Since I take it that the committee has at this time exhausted the questions it wanted to ask with respect to subsections 1, 2 and 3 of this section, perhaps I could go on now and discuss that matter briefly. Members of this committee will recall that many of the submissions before the banking and commerce committee concerned themselves with the present position of industry in Canada engaged in export trade. I believe that we have all received representations to the effect that, in the light of the current position in international trade, the situation of Canadian industry is declining and that there is the necessity of making some change in this legislation to allow industry to arrest that decline and to restore and improve its position.

It was represented to us that the concern of Canadian industry arises from a number of factors. The fact that we are a high cost economy is probably one of the less important in this context, although it was mentioned and certainly must be borne in mind in any assessment of the position of Canadian exports. More important, and I think more realistic in this context, are two other facts. First, whether we like it or not, in international trade there is a tendency toward association or cartelization, and whether we like it or not this is the situation within which our industry must compete for markets in international trade.

Second, and even more imponderable but I think even more serious, is the fact that in international trade we are now coming into a situation where we are faced with the massive communist organization, represented by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, as a competitor and increasingly this great force is entering into international trade with the whole weight of the state behind it. This state organization is prepared to do anything to obtain markets for its exports and to eliminate markets for exports from other countries, particularly the western world with which, ideologically, the soviets are in conflict.

Our industry has demonstrated, I think to the satisfaction of most members of this committee, that the combination of these various factors has produced for them in the export field a situation in which they are increasingly unable to be successful unless they are also given an opportunity for organization in that field. They have represented to us that if laws are retained in all their rigidity which certainly raise a very real question about, the legality of the right to organize in export trade, then they are going to be at an increasing and permanent disadvantage. I do not believe, that anyone who listened to those representations, and especially any member of the committee who seriously coinsiders the matter, would quarrel very gravely with the general effect of what was said. I doubt if anyone would question that there is a real, serious and difficult problem for our industry in the export markets.

The problem, rather, is one of disagreement on the desirability of doing something to remedy the situation, one of finding some method of amending our legislation so as to make it clear that what may be done in the export field may be legitimate but must not be allowed to spill over and have adverse effects on the domestic economy. However concerned we may be about the welfare of our industry in the export field, it still remains the primary concern of all of us to protect the interests of the Canadian consumer at home. The problem has been, therefore, to find an amendment which would take care of the situation in the export field and yet not open the door under that umbrella, as it were—there is a mixture of metaphors—to abuses in the domestic field.

In the course of the discussion before the committee I indicated this concern. I indicated that we were studying the problem. I made reference also to the fact that there is before the restrictive trade practices commission at the present time an inquiry into a situation in British Columbia in which this very problem was before the commission. I felt it might be wiser to wait until we received the report of the commission because I felt that they must address their minds to the very problem I have outlined of how to reconcile these two possibly conflicting tendencies. However, representations were made with increasing urgency and the committee members were obviously very much concerned about it and impressed by those representations.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, when we were considering the bill clause by clause in the committee, moved an amendment designed to have the effect of directing the attention of the court to a possible defence on a charge under this act that what was done was done with primary concern and effect in the export field. I asked the committee to bear with me in my position, stating that I was unable to accept the amendment because I had not had a chance of assessing its implications. I felt it was too general in its terms and might have the very effect about which I know the hon. member would be concerned, as well as I, and that is opening the door too wide and permitting abuses domestically under a provision which we had intended to have effect in the export field.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate indicated he appreciated my position but was unable to agree that he should withdraw the amendment. He, therefore, pressed it to a vote in committee and it was rejected by the committee. It was rejected, however, on the basis of my undertaking to give this matter further study in the interim between that time and the time when the bill would be reported back to the house, to see if notwithstanding my concern about our action being possibly premature until we had received the report of the commission, I could nevertheless in discussion with my officials and my colleagues find an amendment which we felt would be safe.

The result of this discussion has been that we have been able to devise an amendment which I believe will accomplish the result of making it clear that arrangements entered into by Canadian industry, having effect exclusively with relation to their activities in the export markets, may be exempted from the operation of this act, provided again that they do not have the indirect result, whether intentional or unintentional, of producing a disadvantage to Canadian consumers.

The scheme of the amendment is as I have indicated previously, in line with the scheme of subsections 1, 2 and 3 of the section we are at present discussing and it will become clear, I think, if I read the amendment which I am going to ask my friend, the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond to move, if he will be kind enough to do so. It is:

That clause 13 be amended by adding the following subsections as subsections 4 and 5 of section 32:

(4) Subject to subsection 5, in a prosecution under subsection 1 the court shall not convict the accused if the conspiracy, combination, agreement or arrangement relates only to the export of articles from Canada.

(5) Subsection 4 does not apply if the conspiracy, combination, agreement or arrangement

(a) has resulted or is likely to result in a reduction or limitation of the volume of exports of an article;

(b) has restrained or injured or is likely to restrain or injure the export business of any domestic competitor who is not a party to the conspiracy, combination, agreement or arrangement;

(c) has restricted or is likely to restrict any person from entering into the business of exporting articles from Canada; or

(d) has lessened or is likely to lessen competition unduly in relation to an article in the domestic market.

I think that the amendment which has been previously circulated to several hon. members of the committee will speak for itself without too much amplification from me. However, I should like to refer briefly to the content of subsection 5. Having, as I said, by subsection 4 of the proposed amendment made it clear that in general a charge under this act may be defended if it relates to activity or arrangements concerned with the export of articles from Canada, we have then thought it necessary to ensure that the possible ways in which this might spill over and have an effect domestically be outlined so that it could be made clear that if it did have those effects then the defence that this arrangement related to exports is no longer open or is not successful.

So we have said that the defence does not apply if the arrangement results in any reduction or limitation in the volume of exports of an article.

The reason for this is that since industry says—and we accept this basis of their case—that they are concerned in increasing their success and increasing the volume of Canada's export trade, we think it would be most unsound for us to leave them an umbrella under which they might in fact make merely a comfortable arrangement by which they establish their position based upon present demand for sales in the export market but do not bother to compete for an increased share in it. That is the reason for (a). The arrangement must not be allowed to freeze or decrease the volume of exports from Canada.

Under (b) the defence will not be open if the arrangement injures or is likely to injure or restrain the export business of any competitor of those who are parties to the arrangement. If we do not provide that, it might be the case that unscrupulous persons would be able to make their own arrangements in the export field, under the protection of subclause 4, and then having worked out a comfortable arrangement say this: We are not going to have competition; we do not like you so you must stay outside. Then ultimately they would be able to drive that person out of competition at least in the export field if not indeed in the domestic field.

In the third place, the arrangement must not be allowed to operate if it restricts or is likely to restrict any person from entering into the business of exporting articles from Canada. Again, the object of this protection is to encourage industry in export and to enable them to improve their position. Therefore it must not be allowed to be used by them to prevent somebody else from getting into this field because that would have the opposite effect to the purpose for which the protection was designed.

Finally, it must not be allowed to operate or they must not be able to get protection under it if in fact the result of their arrangement is to lessen or is likely to lessen competition unduly in relation to an article in the domestic market. I think that last paragraph speaks for itself. I do not think there is really much necessity for me to elaborate further on the need for such an amendment or the justification for it.

If I have seemed reluctant so far to commit myself to an amendment in this field, it is for the reason I gave earlier in the committee and elsewhere, namely that it is a complicated field and the reconciliation of the conflicting interests in export and domestic fields is difficult. We have a commission working on the matter now. It could be argued that we might be wiser to wait until we have the assistance of their report. But in view of the urgency with which the problem has been presented to us—and I think I would be right in saying the degree of unanimity of hon. members on all sides in recognizing the problem and urging a solution—for these reasons I felt I could take the risk or was justified in taking the risk of recommending to the committee this amendment under which we believe the position of our industries in the export trade can be greatly improved and their competitive position put on a basis of greater equality with the forces present in the world today with which they must compete.

I should like to express appreciation to all hon. members who have spoken on the subject and have made a contribution in suggesting solutions. I am happy now to have an opportunity of asking the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond to move the amendment formally because he has worked quietly, I know, but most effectively, consistently and conscientiously on this committee. I say again, finally, that he has kept up a fairly steady pressure along the lines that surely it is not beyond the ingenuity of the government and its advisers to find a solution to this important problem.

Mr. Drysdale: Before moving the amendment, I should like the opportunity to supplement perhaps and to underline some of the remarks made by the Minister of Justice. Of all the amendments we have considered in connection with this bill I think this amendment concerning the export trade is the most important one to come before the committee. In order to underline the importance of it and to put the matter in accurate perspective I hope the committee will forgive me for elaborating a little bit on at least some of the argument that was covered in the committee.

I should like to refer to monthly letter No. 5 of May 16, 1960, of the Canadian Bank of Commerce. I feel that this letter puts forward succinctly the problem of industry. On page 3 in an article under the heading "The nature of Canada's Trade", the following is stated:

> The outstanding features of Canadian trade are its immense importance to the economy and its specialized nature. By any accounts Canada is a great trading nation. Notwithstanding a relatively small population, Canada ranks by value as the fourth largest trading nation in the world, following such giants as the United States, the United Kingdom, and West Germany. On a per capita basis, of course, Canada relies more heavily than even these nations on foreign trade. Although the importance of foreign trade has diminished with more broadly based development, commodity exports still account for 15 per cent of the gross national product, equivalent to $292 per head of the population.

In the same article it is further stated as follows:

> Exports still primarily consist of a relatively few staple products from the lands, forests, and mines, while imports cover a whole range of consumer, industrial and capital goods.

The Minister of Justice has emphasized the problem of competition from the U.S.S.R. There is also to be considered the factor of various regional trading blocs throughout the world. There is also to be considered the development by Japan and western Europe or the re-establishment of many of the markets they formerly had in North America and the re-establishment of these markets has resulted in a decline in the North American export trade.

Coming from British Columbia may I say that the matter of exports is of prime importance to me. We had briefs from three organizations, namely fisheries, forests and mines. The fisheries industries export two thirds of its products which is produced in British Columbia. The forest industry exports an average of 70 per cent of its products. In 1959, of total exports of $5,100 million, one third of those exports were from the forest industry. British Columbia contributed one-third of that amount, or some $650 million. As a matter of fact, out of every dollar earned in British Columbia some 50 cents comes from the export industry. The mining industry contributes about 40 per cent of the export trade, a total of about $1.9 billion.

The question may be asked: what was the reason for this amendment. I think it is primarily a matter of clarifying what is the situation regarding the export trade. I think doubt was raised, first of all, by the fish inquiry in British Columbia taken in conjunction with the statements made in the Howard Smith Paper case. Observations were made at that time by Mr. Justice Taschereau and Mr. Justice Cartwright that once it had been established that a conspiracy had been undertaken there was no power to proceed to determine whether or not it was to the economic detriment of the public. I feel that in view of these doubts and in view of the strong briefs put forward by industry it is important that this amendment should be inserted for the purpose of clarification.

I feel that economic competition is more insidious and more dangerous, perhaps, than the threat of nuclear war, because economic competition can destroy a nation without any physical evidence. I feel that at the present time Canada is on the verge of a tremendous economic struggle and I think it is important we should clarify the position of our exporters who are facing the competition of international cartels so as to enable them to fight this economic battle on the same basis as their competitors.

In the United Kingdom, in corresponding legislation, the public interest is taken as the keynote. But it has also been considered to be in the public interest to make sure that export traders do not compete with each other to the detriment of the export situation in which they are involved merely to facilitate the situation with regard to the domestic market. I feel that this amendment permits the export trade to make arrangements to meet the competition of international cartels. The public interest is also the keynote here, and I feel that domestically both the producer and consumer are protected by the amendment. I therefore move the amendment to which the Minister of Justice has referred.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was interested to hear the Minister of Justice say that the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond who has moved this amendment had been persistent and conscientious. I do not remember all the adjectives which the hon. gentleman used, but they were all complimentary. But there was one adjective he used which strained my credulity to the breaking point, and that was when he said that the hon. member had done this quietly. Anyone with experience of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond knows that quietness is not one of his outstanding characteristics, though we do not like him the less for that.

I want to say that, notwithstanding the credit given to the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond by the minister for achieving what has been achieved so far as this matter is concerned, with my accustomed modesty, I take a little credit to myself for it, because I, too, was very persistent at the very last meeting of the committee. I want to thank the members of the committee and the chairman—and I have not thanked the chairman for much—for postponing the final session to enable me to get back to Ottawa from an urgent engagement elsewhere so that I could put forward an amendment which, I think, finally brought this matter into focus in the committee and ultimately in this chamber. I should like to put the terms of this amendment on record so that they may be compared with the terms of the amendment which is now before us. It reads as follows:

That clause 15 be amended by inserting "(1)" after "35", and adding the following subsection: "(2) In determining whether any offence under section 32 or 33 has been or is being committed, the court shall consider the best utilization of Canadian resources to meet the requirements of the export trade and the development of markets outside Canada."

Before I moved that amendment I considered the possibility of moving an amendment to section 32 and the only reason I did not do that was that one of my hon. friends intended here in committee of the whole to move that subsections 2 and 3 be struck out of section 32. It seemed to me that in order to avoid confusion it would be better to amend section 15. However, since the government has persisted over our opposition and over the opposition of the C.C.F. in retaining subsections 2 and 3 it seems to me there is no reason why these other two subsections should not be included.

Here I wish to tell the Minister of Justice that I do not regard the amendment he has brought forward today as being on all fours with subsection 2 at all. Subsection 2 purports to declare that certain things which never have been against the law are still not against the law. But I think there was a genuine doubt in the case of certain combinations to promote exports, and I think we are really legislating, if we adopt this amendment, in a substantive way. It is true, I think, that in the history of prosecutions under the act no combination entered into solely for the purpose of promoting exports has ever been the subject of prosecution. I am not certain, but that is my understanding. The only case that has arisen is the one which is before the commission at the present time where perhaps some other factor is involved. I do not believe I should prejudge that by expressing an opinion; I am merely seeking to identify it.

I must say at once that I think the amendment which has been drafted by the minister and his officials is a much better amendment than the one I offered in the banking and commerce committee. However, to use a phrase which appears in this bill, I am not disparaging myself when I say that, because I did not have the technical assistance that the minister had in this matter. I have looked at this amendment carefully and while it would be easy to pick holes in it, as it would in almost any legislation, I think that generally it does do what we were seeking to do in the committee. I think it does avoid the pitfalls which the minister thought existed in attempting to do what we were seeking to do in the committee.

I am gratified, as I am sure my hon. friends who were in the committee will be, that the government has seen fit to act now instead of waiting to see what might happen in this case before the restrictive trade practices commission because I think, as the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond has said, that we are not only just now but at least as far ahead as we can reasonably foresee in human events facing very great difficulties in our export trade of a kind that have not been faced to any extent since the war. There has been a shift in the world economy from a shortage to what may perhaps be described as a superabundance of supply in many lines. I think, too, that the methods of trading not merely of Soviet Russia and red China but of many other countries in addition to the communist countries are undergoing profound structural changes that are going to make our problems very much more difficult.

I believe we are going to require all the ingenuity and skill that we possibly can exert if we are to keep the place in the export field that we have to keep if we are going to continue to live with a Canadian standard of living. If this amendment is adopted, as I feel sure it will be, I think it will be one thing that we in parliament—not just on one side or the other but we in parliament—have done to recognize and do what we can in the law to meet a very urgent and critical problem for our national future.

We heard the representations of the associations before us representing three of the great exporting industries that export in a so-called private way. I refer to the fishery, the forest industry and the metal mining industry. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond has emphasized their importance to British Columbia. Of course, they are important to British Columbia which next to Newfoundland, I believe, derives a higher proportion of its total income from exports than does any other province. Of course, Newfoundland has to export everything it produces except what is consumed within the province because people on the mainland of Canada have not yet been educated to buy and use our products. For anyone who has a real familiarity with the export business—and what Canadian who keeps his eyes open has not—its importance is clear. Where would Ontario be without its paper mills, it mines and its other export industries?

I am glad to note one deficiency in the minister's amendment about which someone might complain although I am not. I noticed that (d) part of the proposed subsection 5 states:

—has lessened or is likely to lessen competition unduly.

It does not say "has lessened or is likely to lessen supplies unduly". I am very glad the minister left that out and I hope he did so consciously. I think there may be times when it is in the real interest of Canada and even in the long term interests of Canadian consumers to do without something temporarily, perhaps, in order that we can maintain an export market the loss of which would have the effect of reducing the general standard of living and perhaps extinguishing the income of great numbers of Canadians.

While I am sure there will be, as there always is in human affairs, difficulties found in this amendment in some ways, it seems to me that on the whole—and I wish I could say this about the legislation generally, but I am afraid I cannot—in this particular operation, spurred on by the representations of Canadians outside parliament, by members of the opposition and by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond, the government has done a competent job.

Mr. Howard: I am reluctant to throw cold water on this idea in view of the highly charged emotional atmosphere but I renew my request to have the minister consider whether this proposal should stand over.

I do not know whether we will finish our consideration of this bill today. Despite the one-hour luncheon recess there has not been sufficient time for hon. members who are interested in the matter to thoroughly study the proposals of the minister. I had an opportunity to briefly examine the amendment during the lunch hour and while sitting in committee but it is difficult because of my participation in the debate and I am sure the hon. members for Bonavista-Twillingate and Ottawa West are in the same position.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said it is easy to find loopholes in any amendment or piece of legislation but I propose to point some out, not to be critical but to illustrate conflicts between the amendments and other portions of the bill, and this may add weight to my request that the matter stand over.

A small conflict exists in paragraph (a) of section 5 and I raise this for the purpose of uniformity. Instead of referring to "volume of export" why not refer to "quantity and quality" because those words are used elsewhere in the bill and elsewhere in this section in relation to production. Why must we make reference to the business of any domestic competitor in paragraph (b)? We have no jurisdiction over competitors outside Canada but why are the words used? There is a conflict in paragraph (c). Why not follow the same wording used in subsection 3 of section 32 where reference is made to entering into or expanding a business in trade or industry.

The amendment does not make clear the position of a Canadian company that has an arrangement with an international cartel, let us say for argument's sake, that allows the entry into Canada of articles produced by a competitor of the person who is a party to the cartel and through which it could injure others. This outlines my original thought in so far as subclause 3 is concerned.

I point out there is another clause which is going to require a consequential amendment. I refer to clause 9 of the bill, which has been stood over. This clause has to do with the restrictive trade practices commission and provides that it shall find certain things, namely whether a conspiracy, combination, agreement or arrangement has lessened or is likely to lessen competition unduly in respect of one of the matters specified in paragraphs (a) to (d) of subsection 3 of section 32. Would it not be necessary to give the restrictive trade practices commission authority to find whether the activities of such an arrangement had any relationship to, or effect on subsection 5 as proposed?

But this is not a consequential amendment. Therefore, apart from arguing the validity of this amendment at the moment,

I think, Mr. Chairman, in view of the wording which has just been introduced and hon. members not having had the time or the opportunity to study its full implications, the better course to follow would be for the minister to indicate, now that he has moved the amendment and we have had a general expression of opinion on it, that this proposal might be held over until hon. members in all parties have had an opportunity thoroughly to study the possible implications and effects of the proposal.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to second the suggestion made by the hon. member for Skeena. I think it is a reasonable one. I think we shall make better progress if the minister would be willing to stand over the proposed section 32 for the time being and go ahead with section 33.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I certainly do not like to be un-co-operative with the committee which has been very co-operative so far. However, I make the observation that the comments of the hon. member for Skeena, and indeed those of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, do not indicate to me that they have not yet had the opportunity to make a thorough study of this proposed amendment and its implications. I have been asked a number of quite detailed and searching questions to which I think I can give satisfactory answers at the moment. I think both hon. members are being too modest both on their own behalf and on behalf of their colleagues; but still it is an important amendment and the request is not an unusual one. I think I would be glad enough to accede to it. Would hon. members like to carry subsections 1, 2 and 3 of section 32, leaving this to stand?

Mr. Pickersgill: As far as we are concerned I give an undertaking that we will not reopen this section at all. If the minister will allow the matter to stand it will be only for the purpose of discussing the new amendment.

Mr. Howard: It is not our purpose to reopen discussion on sections 1, 2 and 3, if this is allowed to stand. I merely desire to indicate that we may have something to say on section 32 in its entirety or we may have a review of the proposed subsections 4 and 5, but we do not intend to reopen subsections 1, 2 and 3.

Mr. Fulton: On that understanding, I would be quite happy to have the whole clause stand, including the amendment now before the committee.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall section 32 stand?

Clause stands.

The Deputy Chairman: On section 33, mergers and monopolies; shall the section carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: Not for a moment because there is something about it that I think the minister ought to explain. As nearly as I have been able to do, I have examined the parent section, if I may put it that way, from which this comes, and there does appear to be a change. This section reads:

> Every person who is a party or privy to or knowingly assists in, or in the formation of, a merger or monopoly—

In the old legislation it read, "in the formation or operation of". I wondered why the words "or operation" had been taken out?

Mr. Fulton: Because we think they are covered by the words "every person who is a party or privy to or knowingly assists in, or in the formation of, a merger or monopoly". There are alternatives: "assists in a merger or monopoly" or "assists in the formation of a merger or monopoly"; therefore, we think "operation" is covered by the first alternative.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think probably the minister is right about that. This is the only query that bothered me.

The Deputy Chairman: This section is carried. On section 33A, illegal trade practices. Shall this section carry?

Mr. Howard: There were amendments made in the banking and commerce committee that had to do with the grammatical construction of this section. The discussions we had in the committee and the amendments cleared up satisfactorily the point raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and expanded upon by my colleague from Port Arthur. I must admit that once they got involved in a detailed discussion of the grammatical structure of the sentences I gave up; it was a little beyond my capacity to appreciate the fine points of grammar, although now when one reads the amended section and the original, perhaps the amended section makes more sense.

However, there is another matter which I should like to talk about and it is the price discrimination section, which we dealt with quite extensively in the banking and commerce committee and to which I moved an amendment which was defeated. I intend to follow the same course here and to move a similar amendment in order to get a better opportunity perhaps to make my arguments and to get additional opinions.

This section was formerly section 412 of the Criminal Code and so far as we were able to determine no cases whatsoever had been instituted under this particular price discrimination section. Substantially what section 412 of the Criminal Code and this proposed 33A purport to do it to prevent one person from discriminating against a purchaser of his article by selling it at a lower price to one person than to another. Put in an uncomplicated way that is what it means. As I say, the intent of the words and the ideas behind them perhaps have more validity and sound pleasant. In my opinion there are two words in subparagraph (a), namely "and quantity" which permit price discrimination to be practised, and yet do not fall within the prohibition of this particular section. It reads:

> Every one engaged in a business who
> (a) is a party or privy to, or assists in, any sale that discriminates to his knowledge, directly or indirectly, against competitors of a purchaser of articles from him in that any discount, rebate, allowance, price concession or other advantage is granted to the purchaser over and above any discount, rebate, allowance, price concession or other advantage that, at the time the articles are sold to such purchaser, is available to such competitors in respect of a sale of articles of like quality and quantity.

This, of course, indicates that if a person allows a 10 per cent discount to one purchaser, then for the like quality and quantity of articles sold be must allow a 10 per cent discount to any other purchaser. If he gives a rebate to one of the dealers to whom he supplies articles, then for like quality and quantity he must allow the same rebate to another purchaser or to a competitor of the person who made the first purchase. These prohibitions are to ensure that manufacturers, wholesalers or distributors cannot and should not be allowed to pick and choose among retailers who sell their products and give one a price advantage over another in order that the one person will be driven out of business to the advantage of the one who is the favourite of the wholesaler or manufacturer.

I submit, though, that the words "and quantity" in paragraph (a) are the salient words in the case of a person who wants to engage in price discrimination. If the quantity of the product in the sale is different, it is very easy for a person to discriminate with respect to rebates, discounts, allowances or price concessions. The matter hinges on the different quantity of articles sold and thus there can be discrimination and the section can be evaded.

There is a similar provision in the United States law which was enacted about the same time as our statute but there is a difference in the United States law compared with ours. The United States law is commonly referred to as the Robinson-Patman act or amendment and it is found on page 75 of a book entitled, "Anti-Trust Laws and Amendments, 1890-1959", which is published by the United States government printing office. It contains the Sherman act, the Clayton act, the federal trade commission act and amendments, the export trade act and so on which compare with our Combines Investigation Act.

There is one section in their price discrimination law which I think should commend itself for consideration by the committee. I will not read the entire section because it is rather lengthy. Substantially it is the same as that part of our section 412 which I have just read and which will now be 33A. It provides that price discrimination shall not be engaged in and then it goes on to say:

> Provided, that nothing herein contained shall prevent differentials which make only due allowance for differences in the cost of manufacture, sale, or delivery resulting from the different methods or quantities in which such commodities are to such purposes sold or delivered.

The United States law provides that you shall not discriminate between competitors by way of price concessions, rebates, discounts or by giving any other advantage but it also says that if there has been a saving in cost in producing a different quantity of the article there can be discrimination through reflection of that saving in cost in the selling price to the individual.

For argument's sake, and I think this is quite correct, if a manufacturer has an order for the production of 100,000 articles he can produce them at a lower cost per unit than he can produce 5,000 articles of the same type. Normally that is so as far as distribution and packaging are concerned. A larger quantity of goods packaged and distributed results in a lower unit cost for packaging and distribution than for a small quantity.

The Robinson-Patman act of the United States says—I think it is called the cost justification factor—that under such circumstances you can reflect the saving in the cost of manufacture, production or distribution in the price at which you sell this quantity of goods. The saving you make in producing a larger quantity of goods can be reflected in the price at which you sell those goods. The United States law is to that extent different from our law.

We inquired about this matter in the committee when the minister and Mr. MacDonald, the director of investigation and research, were there as witnesses. As found on page 709 of the proceedings of the committee, No. 12, there is some discussion of this matter. Perhaps I should read it in its entirety to show what I am getting at. I hope

I will not misinterpret Mr. MacDonald's remarks. As found on page 709 there is the following passage:

Mr. Howard: May I ask if Mr. MacDonald knows what the activity has been under the Robinson-Patman act of the United States, which covers this same sort of ground in its price discrimination section—I think it is 3; may I ask if he knows what the activity has been in the United States under the anti-discrimination section, the present section?

Mr. MacDonald: There has been quite a lot of activity in the United States under that section of the Clayton act which is familiarly known as the Robinson-Patman act.

Mr. Howard: Do you know why this might be so? Is their legislation different to ours?

Mr. MacDonald: There is a difference between the two pieces of legislation, yes.

Mr. Howard: If our act clearly followed the wording of the Robinson-Patman act do you think we would perhaps be in a better position to pursue this problem here, or might there be more complaints arise?

Mr. MacDonald: What is that?

Mr. Howard: Do you know whether there might be more complaints arise?

Mr. MacDonald: I am inclined to think there would be more complaints.

As I say, I hope I am not misconstruing or misinterpreting what Mr. MacDonald meant, but I took that to mean that we have had no prosecutions under our price discrimination section and that some complaints have been brought to the attention of the director. I do not know how many. Perhaps the minister can ascertain how many there have been and whether there has been a relatively large or small number of complaints about price discrimination activities. It would seem that in Canada there has been relatively little activity under this section whereas under the Robinson-Patman act there has been quite a bit of activity.

I submit that the reason for the greater activity and the more effective manner in which the United States law deals with this question is that the cost justification factor is reflected in the United States law. It is notable that we say that a person shall not discriminate between competitors as to price with regard to like quality and quantity whereas the Robinson-Patman act says substantially the same thing except that it provides that there can be discrimination as to quantity but that discrimination must reflect savings resulting from producing or distributing a larger quantity of goods.

I am of the opinion that this is one of the reasons why there is some complaint on the part of small businessmen with respect to loss leaders. I submit that many retailers, because they see a competitor selling goods at a price lower than they are able to sell them think that the competitor is thereby loss leadering and selling below the invoice price. But in many cases it could well be that the second person has received special discounts or rebates from the supplier, thus permitting him to sell at a lower price and a price which is, in fact, above that individual's own invoice price, but his invoice price is lower because of the price discrimination than the invoice price of his competitor across the street. This is where some confusion arises. The fact that this price discrimination is taking place and does take place has not been taken into account by the words "and quantity".

I am of the opinion we should make an alteration in that regard. I feel we should import from the act in the United States the reference to cost justification, and word it so that it is in compliance with the various parts of our own act. This only requires a very slight change from the wording of the Robinson-Patman Act, which uses the word "provided". We, in drafting our legislation, have used the word "except" in place of that and there are one or two other alterations that would have to be made. Otherwise, the wording of the amendment I am about to move is the same as the wording of the Robinson-Patman Act. I move:

That paragraph (a) of subsection 1 of section 33A of clause 13 be amended by deleting in line 21 thereof—

This reference is to the old bill, Mr. Chairman, and it may not be the same line in the new bill.

—the words "and quantity;" and substituting therefor the following:

"except that nothing herein contained shall prevent differentials which make only due allowance for differences in the cost of manufacture, sale, or delivery resulting from the differing methods or quantities in which such articles are sold or delivered to such purchasers;"

When this amendment was moved in committee there was some discussion as to whether it did, in fact, get to the core of the problem and whether or not some other words might be more acceptable. I looked over the arguments which were advanced in committee in opposition to this particular amendment, but was not able to draft an amendment that was worded more succinctly than the one I originally moved, and which I copied from the United States law. I still believe that this is the way to tackle this question of price discrimination. I know the minister has had far more experience in this field than I, and in addition he is an experienced member of the legal profession. He has within his branch a staff which has spent years and years in drafting amendments to legislation. Perhaps if the amendment in its present wording is not acceptable, although I am sure the principle is acceptable, the minister might indicate whether or not the question might be tackled in somewhat the same way as the export question. If the wording is acceptable, it gets to the core of the problem which I know exists, which I am sure the minister knows exists as does everyone engaged in business. Then we will have a much more effective piece of legislation in the field of price discrimination than we have at the moment.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, this point was discussed quite fully in the other committee. It was considered on two occasions there, and I am not really sure of the extent to which it is appropriate for me to go in this committee in dealing with points which were fully discussed in the other committee. If there are new points or variations of points I feel it is my duty, without question, to assist the committee so far as I can by discussing them fully. There have been several such instances of merely considering what was fully considered and decided in the banking and commerce committee. I really believe we should begin to review the situation. I am reluctant to spend a great deal of time on such points.

However, I am aware of the keenness with which my hon. friend from Skeena entertains this point of view. I am certainly not going to brush this matter aside by saying it was decided in the other committee, and leave it at that. I have to say that I have not been able to bring myself to change my point of view since the problem was discussed in committee, at which time I said this was a far-reaching change, having consquences in a very large area of Canadian industrial and economic life which I would not consider it appropriate to import into our legislation at this stage in the consideration of the bill, without a further detailed study and discussion with all those concerned.

In addition to this question of whether it is prudent and wise to do so at the present time without further consideration, I feel I should remind the hon. member that, although it is true that in the United States they do have this cost justification principle, it is criticized there by some who hold very strongly to the view that its effect is to introduce price rigidity, in the whole system and that as a result of this rigidity, consumers in some areas of activity are deprived of price reductions they might otherwise have. This is by no means a one-sided argument. I know there are arguments such as those that the hon. member has made to the effect that the principle in our legislation is not complete, not adequate, but there are very strong arguments that are made that the principle in the United States legislation goes too far and produces results which are undesirable.

In addition to that, may I remind the hon. member for Skeena and the committee that in the report on discrimination pricing practices by the restrictive trade practices commission they found that the largest area of discrimination was in the field of special allowances, such as promotional allowances, rather than in the field of price discounts.

This is a summary, I realize, but I do not believe I could do anything more than merely amplify what I have said if I took more time. It is for these reasons that I oppose the inclusion of the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Small: I should like to say a few words on this subject, not necessarily in support of the amendment but more in the way of obtaining clarification and interpretation. During the last week or so I have had discussions with an organization in my riding called New Era electrical appliances. They are also in the furniture business and are a retail outlet for the selling and servicing of electrical appliances. This firm is greatly disturbed by the situation which confronts it. This situation has to do with the setting of prices, and the matter about which they complain comes under the heading of promotion. It is not just undue competition from other people in business. Other firms in this retail business have the same complaint.

This organization being a large organization is running into a considerable amount of unfair competition as a result of the practice of contractors being given certain prices which other people are not given. I have been telling these people that there is a provision in the law that will give them relief from this situation, but the firm's legal advisers say that is not the case. The situation about which they complain does not arise from competitors in the same business but from special discounts given to builders and contractors, subdividers and builders of apartments. These people get special prices on refrigerators, electric stoves and other appliances, sometimes as much as $40 below the regular price to the retail merchant. They are not complaining about that if the consumer gets the benefit. But they themselves cannot get a lower price. They buy the same quantities or the same amount, as contractors, yet the price that the manufacturer gives—not necessarily one because they are different manufacturers—was equally in their favour.

But when they find that they cannot buy at the price a builder or a contractor pays, they are rather disturbed about it.

One of the individuals made a good explanation of what he had in mind but because he was quite upset about it, it was an obsession with him. The conduct of the manufacturers, if it is not unethical, it is unfair. It is unjust to the merchants who are selling these appliances and are giving service on them. It is unfortunate for them that they did not bring this before the combines committee when they were discussing these matters. However, I told them I would probably have an opportunity to bring their case before the house.

The situation that they are complaining about is this. The builders and contractors are able to buy at a level at which they are unable to buy; they are able to buy at a much cheaper price. They want to know why they cannot be extended the same advantage so that they can pass it on to the consumer.

It is not a question of raising the price or of loss leaders. It is a question of ethics and unfairness. I do not think the manufacturers would be very proud of the situation. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Skeena, what they have established is another level at which to sell and which is unfair. It is not a matter of giving a competitor a lower price but it is a matter of establishing another level altogether with the builders and the contractors. Even though there is a difference of some $40 they do not complain about that. They say that is perfectly all right as long as they have the same opportunity to get the same price to be able to enter into competition with them. They claim that they cannot go to court over it because they have established these different sales levels that they claim are unfair. I should like the minister, if he can, to give a clarification in interpretation of the matter.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member mentioned this case to me briefly a few days ago. At that time I said to him that without having the full facts I would not care to express an opinion one way or another. I suggested that he might get those who were complaining to him to bring their complaints to the attention of the director of the combines branch and that with all the facts available to them we could see whether there is an offence or whether there is an indication of an offence under the existing legislation or, if there is not an offence covered by the existing legislation, then we could see precisely and in detail the implications of what he has outlined and discuss whether we should take the opportunity of suggesting an amendment.

At the present time all I can say in addition is that our legislation does make it an offence for a person to sell goods to competitive purchasers at different prices or with differing price discounts for sales of the same quantity and quality of goods, as a practice. These are the facts that would have to be established. If they are established there is a prima facie case of an offence under the section. I am not able to say and I would be very unwise to try to say whether on the basis of the necessarily brief outline with which I have been supplied so far there is an indication of such an offence. I can only try to indicate what the section in general provides and then suggest that those complaining that they are victims of an offence should send full information to the branch.

Mr. Small: I might add that they were so greatly concerned about this matter that they went to another city. They had an option on some land such as a subdivision and they called on manufacturers. I will not name them. They are all in the same category. He did not say very much because he did not have time to go into detail. But he did indicate that he was a builder and that he had just recently gone into business, that he had purchased so many of these units, not from the one company but from different ones, 50 here, 20 there and 2 or 3 some place else, established different categories. He purchased them at very low rates because it was going out to the contractor but they had to be delivered to a lot. That was a simple matter. He had them delivered to the lot and he took them to his place.

But he did establish that there was a different level on the sale from what you would call the price to the one that was purchasing electrical appliances. That was the basis of it. I thought he had a good case. The legal advisers claim they thought he would not have a clear case or a prima facie case to go before the courts. I forgot to submit this to the minister but I will submit a statement of the case if that is necessary. I told them that as far as the law was concerned, I would have the matter clarified. Fortunately this just happened in a conversation with them yesterday. I said I would have a chance to bring the matter before the house but I did not think it would be this soon.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure that we are all interested in the clarification of the problem that has been given to us by the hon. member for Danforth. It just shows how valuable it is to have a practical man speaking once in a while in these committees.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Howard) negatived: Yeas, 1; nays, 47.

The Chairman: Shall 33A as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 33B carry?

Mr. McIlraith: This is a new clause. It is not just a reintroduction of a clause from other parts of the existing legislation. According to the explanatory note and to the evidence given in committee, the basis of it is the 1959 report of the royal commission on price spreads of food products. Without elaborating on the matter unduly I may say that the evidence in committee seemed to indicate that the basis for the creation of the new clause is the evidence that had come to the department from the grocery trade or the food trade. The difficulty is that the legislation is of general application to all the trade outlets and is not confined to one branch, namely the grocery trade or the practices in the grocery trade.

The difficulty in which I find myself here is in relating the general provisions of this section to all facets and types of the retail trade. It simply does not relate to some types of trade. In that connection I think I ought to place on record briefly two references made to the committee. I refer to page 27 of the appendix to the committee reports. That page contains a letter dated June 27, 1960 from the Canadian retail federation to the chairman of the committee and the part of the letter I wish to read is this:

> A number of our member-companies have told us that after consulting with their solicitors they have failed to obtain a satisfactory interpretation of the language of section 33B which would direct them as to what course of action they must follow should this section become law. It would appear that it is not possible for a retailer to know what course of action he should follow or under what circumstances he may properly receive an allowance from the manufacturing supplier.

Again at page 39 of the same report there appears a letter from the grocery products manufacturers of Canada dated July 4, 1960. The letter is signed by the chairman of the board and by one of the directors, and the sentence to which I wish to draw the attention of the committee is the last but one of the letter. After referring to the bill generally, the letter goes on to say:

> —the manner in which section 33B in particular is written creates so many difficulties in interpretation, implication and application, that it is most undesirable in its present form.

In the light of the objections expressed there I wonder if the minister has been able to give further consideration to the draughtsmanship of this particular section. I would think that this is perhaps the section to which the remarks of the hon. member for Davenport applied, as well as to other sections of the act. In any event it seems to me that a confusing situation arises with regard to the interpretation of this section, particularly when it is borne in mind that the cost of advertising in newspapers in different parts of the country differs so greatly, along with the methods used in different lines of trade. I think there is no background, no criteria against which the things can be judged. No such information has been gathered as far as I know by the commission with regard to any of these practices except in the food industry. I wonder if the minister could enlighten the committee in view of what I have said and the statements which I have quoted.

Mr. Fulton: I recognize that in the committee various criticisms were made of our proposed section 33(b). These critcisms were twofold, first that the section was uncertain in its application and, second, that since the reasons given in the bill refer to the findings of two commissions which had made studies specifically, it is true, in the grocery field, those findings were not applicable to the field of trade generally and that therefore our legislation should not be made applicable to the field of trade generally.

With respect, I am not able to agree with either of those views, at least not to the extent that I think the legislation is unsound or that it should not be proceeded with. It is a fact that it will be said of any new legislation that it is full of uncertainties. The original combines legislation was full of uncertainties, and so was the British North America Act. As long as lawyers exist there will be disagreement about the effects of statutes. As a lawyer myself I say that if there were no differences of agreement with regard to the interpretation of statutes there would be no need for lawyers—

An hon. Member: A good thing.

Mr. Fulton: But to make that as a criticism, and to say that legislation should not be enacted because its effects are not certain is to apply a particular argument to a general situation. It does not apply at all. Really what these people are saying is this: "We do not like this legislation. We think it is going to affect ourselves, and therefore we are going to criticize it on the ground that it is uncertain." With respect, I think this is the actual effect of the criticism.

With respect to the other branch of the criticism that this was drafted after looking merely at reports in the grocery field and that the legislation should not therefore be made applicable to trade generally, again I do not think this argument is a valid one. Certainly the two reports referred to—the report of the Stewart royal commission on price spreads of food products and the report of the restrictive trade practices commission on discriminatory pricing practices in the grocery trade—were concerned primarily with the food trade, but I suggest that the reading of these reports and an analysis of the situations outlined in the reports leads to the conclusion that none of the findings is applicable only to one particular field of trade or industry alone. On the contrary, I suggest that the findings and conclusions are as valid with respect to the field of hardware distribution, or fountain pen distribution, as in the field of the grocery trade. Let me read some of the conclusions of the Stewart commission, volume 1 at page 36:

> While we think that efforts to assure informative advertising should be intensified we also attach importance to the issue of opportunity for choice and particularly the opportunity for choice offered by a reduction in price. In many instances, promotional expenditures are undertaken as an alternative to a reduction in price. The significant feature of a reduction in price is that the buyer can, if she chooses, reduce her expenditure on the particular commodity and turn the released expenditure to other things. (It is true that in some cases a reduction in price would not reduce and might even increase consumer expenditure on the commodity.) Reduction of price gives the consumer the widest possible extension of choice among the things on which she will spend the income released. In our opinion, forms of non-price promotion which substitute for price reductions are detrimental to the welfare of consumers. The extent of this activity is evidence of an increasing reluctance on the part of business firms to offer reduction in prices.

I submit that there is not a word there which is not of general application to the field of trade generally. Again, I should like to refer to one passage in volume 2 of the Stewart commission report where it is said on page 59:

> The corporate and voluntary chains have been able to draw heavily on suppliers for advertising allowances. In this way the chains have been able to pass back to suppliers part of the costs of advertising and thus to reduce the extent of these costs which must be borne by themselves: the division of costs is shifted even if total advertising costs are not reduced. The competitive position of the unattached independent store is affected in so far as these stores or the wholesaler supplying them are unable to extract the same terms from their suppliers.

I submit to you again, Mr. Chairman, that there is not a word there which is not of general application to the field of trade generally. In that light we came to the conclusion that the findings of the royal commission and the restrictive trade practices commission both supported the proposal that legislation should be introduced to deal with this kind of promotional allowance which had been found to be an unfair form of competitive device. May I also read this passage from the report of the restrictive trade practices commission's study at page 5:

> Finally, the issues which were raised by complainants in wholesale and retail trade in the grocery field were in many respects the same as those raised by complainants, primarily retailers and wholesalers, in other fields; hence the analysis that follows will deal with general problems that are common to a number of fields even though the problems may differ in magnitude and in detail from field to field.

I conclude that there is no real validity in the suggestion that this amendment is not capable of general application and should not be made of general application to industry and distributive trades generally.

I said in the committee, and I think it is proper to repeat here, that I feel that a great many of the complaints of uncertainty can be met, first, by the statement that there is some uncertainty in all legislation; second, but perhaps more importantly, by the suggestion that if people are uncertain how they are going to work out the system of making promotional allowances proportionate—which simply means fair as between those who purchase from them—well, then, it is not a bad thing to end the system of promotional allowances. I think what they are really saying is that they are uncertain how they can make it fair. If they are uncertain in that respect I suggest that the best possible course would be to refrain from granting promotional allowances so as not to be guilty of an infraction of the law.

While this might ordinarily be urged against me by way of argument as interfering with a trade practice, I would answer that at once by saying that here we have two reports, one of our standing commission on restrictive trade practices and one of a special royal commission, both of which found that the practice has in it inherent elements of unfairness and that in addition to that it had the undesirable feature that it tended to prevent genuine price reductions which would be passed on to and thus benefit the consumer.

This legislation, as I see it, will have one of two effects and possibly both. In the first place it will force those who make promotional allowances to give them fairly and thus restore the competitive position—the proportionate competitive equality—of those to whom they are granted. If it does not have that effect, then it may have the effect of discouraging the granting of promotional allowances, thus opening the door at least a little wider to the possibility of price reductions. In either or in both of those ways it will be of benefit to competition, the consumer and the economy generally.

The Deputy Chairman: On clause 33C.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, this clause deals with misrepresentations as to ordinary price. It seems to me there is no apparent reason why misrepresentations as to ordinary price should be made an offence. I am curious to know why that limitation was imposed with respect to misrepresentations as to ordinary price of the article. So that we can bring the matter into focus for discussion I should like to suggest an amendment that would have the effect of striking out certain words in lines 31 and 32. The clause as amended would then read:

> Every one who, for the purpose of promoting the sale or use of an article, makes any materially misleading representation to the public, by any means whatever, concerning such or like articles, is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

In other words, once a person makes a materially misleading representation to the public concerning an article, the offence is committed. It seems to me that this wording would go farthest to protect the small retailers and would more directly meet the difficulty with which we are concerned and at which this clause is aimed. Perhaps I should now formally introduce my amendment. I move:

> That subsection 1 of section 33C of clause 13 be amended as follows: that the words "the price at which" and "have" in line 31, and the words "been, are, or will be, ordinarily sold" in line 32, be deleted.

Mr. Howard: Having prepared an amendment designed to achieve somewhat the same effect I feel it necessary to formally indicate support of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Ottawa West and for the reason he mentioned, that the offence should arise from materially misleading representations as opposed to such representations relating only to the price of an article. Perhaps I have said sufficient to indicate that this is a commendable amendment that will command our support.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, this is a new point. Perhaps I should not comment any further than to say I am sorry it was not raised before when I might have had an opportunity to deal with it so as to dispel some of the misconceptions that there appear to be regarding this section. But it seems to me that if the amendment were accepted we would have something that really goes no further than the present provision in the Criminal Code dealing with the publication of false advertisements.

It was our intention here to go a little further than the Criminal Code goes but in one particular field only, the field of misrepresentation by misleading advertising with respect to pricing. We wanted to cover that as a special and separate field, as one of those provisions which we are now introducing to improve the situation of the independent merchant because this is one of the respects in which he is particularly vulnerable to unscrupulous practices especially by those who use the power of the purse as one of the main devices against their weaker competitors.

Thus it is frequently alleged in advertisements that if you come to my store you can get an article at such and such a price, and that the ordinary retail price is, let us say, a sum two or three times as much. It has been found on investigation—I have not had the opportunity to put this on record before—that in many of these cases the price advertised as the ordinary or average price bears not the slightest relation to reality, or is a grossly inflated statement of what is the ordinary or average retail price at which those articles are sold. Such advertisements, blown up as they are, usually have articles in them for which there would be a tremendous consumer demand if the impression was created that you could get them at one third of the ordinary retail price. So, you see, they have an attractive effect and on that basis the volume of sales of the merchant who makes use of this misleading and dishonest device is increased at the expense of those who do not resort to such misleading and dishonest practices.

It will be appreciated, I think, that this is a special type of misleading advertising; it is misleading advertising related to price alone; and so we have felt it was proper to have a provision in the combines legislation dealing with the matter, because of its relation to other subjects with which this legislation now deals, namely the provision designed to protect and improve the position of the independent merchant.

Another reason for having it in here in this form is that we do not police the Criminal Code; that is the ordinary provisions of the Criminal Code are not normally the responsibility of the combines branch to supervise or to enforce, and I think that it would be the subject of criticism if we took the ordinary provisions of the Criminal Code and put our officers in charge of supervision and enforcement. There would be a change in the normal division of responsibility for enforcement of the ordinary Criminal Code provisions. That is why we put it especially in here. As I say, I think the effect of the hon. member's amendment would simply be to make the section go no farther than the present provision of the Criminal Code, so that it would have really no special place in the combines legislation; it should be left to the operation of the ordinary section of the Criminal Code.

There are one or two additional technical arguments that I could make, but these are the basic arguments why we think it should be in here in its present form, which does give it specific relation to pricing.

Mr. Pearson: Would the minister not agree that those misrepresentations, and what he calls blow-ups and exaggerations in a dishonest sense, are not confined, of course, to prices as pointed out by my hon. friend, and therefore by mentioning prices only is he not in danger of minimizing the offence in relation to other forms of misrepresentation and dishonest advertising?

Mr. Fulton: I should not really think so, Mr. Chairman. The other matters are covered in the Criminal Code sections; there have been some prosecutions under them. I am not at all sure actually, whether if you simply left the section, as this amendment would, to deal with misrepresentation generally, there might be some question whether the courts would hold that a false statement as to the price at which such article is sold in ordinary retail sales is actually a misrepresentation as to the article itself. It is certainly misrepresentation as to the price of the article, but when you are asking the court to hold that this is misrepresentation of the article itself, as you have to do if this amendment carried, there might be some question there. We felt that it was appropriate to include a section that specifically related to misleading price advertising.

Amendment (Mr. McIlraith) negatived: Yeas, 10; nays, 47.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is the decent course to take in so far as the elimination of false and untrue advertising is concerned; but it is qualified somewhat; it implies that a person can be a little bit dishonest or misleading or quite a bit, maybe half way misleading or dishonest before he runs afoul of the provisions of the law. I am making reference to the word "materially". The clause reads:

> Every one who, for the purpose of promoting the sale or use of an article, makes any materially misleading representation to the public—

I wonder whether it is necessary to have the word "materially" in here since it is a qualifying phrase of "misleading" and indicates that "materially" could have a number of connotations. I take it from this it means that a large degree, or more than just a slight amount of misleading must take place. I take it the word is synonymous with the word "substantial", or that it relates to the definition or degrees of misleading rather than to the definition of the word "materially". Before I go any further can the minister indicate just what it means? Perhaps I should stop, since it is five o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock, it is my duty, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15, to leave the chair in order for the house to proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

Mr. McCleave: I think there is agreement among all parties that private bills are to be dispensed with and the house will resume the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

Mr. Pickersgill: I may say it is agreeable to us, sir.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent to waive the hour for private bills?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The house will resume the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT—CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING MERGERS, MONOPOLIES, ETC.

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-58, to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code—Mr. Fulton—Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. Howard: At five o'clock I was asking the minister what was meant by the word "materially".

Mr. Fulton: The word "materially" here is not intended to have the effect, and I do not think has the effect, that the hon. member for Skeena attributed to it. It does not have the effect of saying that it has to be a great big misrepresentation and that a small misrepresentation would go scot-free. What is intended, and I am certain the effect it does have, is to say that it must materially mislead somebody. The effect must be to mislead somebody in a material manner so that they form an erroneous conclusion which is material to them and without which they would not have gone in to buy the article or would not have taken the action they took. It is so that the person who complains that they were misled cannot make a case out of some trifling effect on them that the misrepresentation may have. The misrepresentation has to have the effect of misleading them in a material way.

Mr. Crestohl: Could the minister give a practical example?

Mr. Fulton: I would say if a person felt they were going to get a bargain at about one third of the ordinary retail price and found they were only getting it at five cents less than the ordinary retail price that would be misleading them in a material fashion. But if it was merely said that there was a saving and the saving was five cents I think it would be questionable whether that was a material misrepresentation. To clarify, if somebody merely said there was a saving and if the person forms his own conclusion on that basis that there was a material saving, whereas the saving was only five cents, he would not have been materially misled because there was a saving.

Mr. Howard: If that is the intent of the word, would it not follow that the section is perhaps phrased somewhat incorrectly and would lead someone to form another conclusion? Here is the misleading representation to the public that is qualified as being material and the minister has just said that the effect upon the public from the point of view of being material is the connotation rather than the misleading representation being material. I wonder whether a readjustment of the words would not make it more clear.

Mr. Fulton: I think that this section compared, for instance, with section 303 of the Criminal Code, which deals with false pretences, makes it clear in what sense and with what effect the word is used, and it must be that the misrepresentation has a material effect.

Mr. Howard: Does the section of the Criminal Code to which the minister has referred have the same relationship between words as this one?

Mr. Fulton: No, in a sense this was an attempt to find a word which would be consistent with the general provision of the Criminal Code regarding false pretences. We did not want to go into the long provision of the Criminal Code which outlines what false pretences means. We felt that in this context the use of the word "materially" would convey to the courts the same import as is contained in the section dealing with false pretences in the Criminal Code.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall section 33C carry? Carried.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 14—Defences.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, this, of course, is a very important clause in the amendments. It deals with resale price maintenance and concerns also the practice of loss leaders as well as other business practices. On second reading and in the committee we explained at some length our objection to this clause. We noted that section 34 of the act prohibiting resale price maintenance was maintained. Perhaps that is a little surprising in view of the stand taken by my hon. friends opposite in the 1951 discussion of this subject. However, although it is retained, we feel that this particular clause, which amends section 34 of the act, would result in resale price maintenance coming in again through the back door by a system of private law enforced privately with private sanctions and really establishing a form of private resale price maintenance. When I was discussing this matter on second reading, Mr. Chairman, I had this to say, as found on page 4354 of Hansard:

> If the government feels that some of the practices it is asking the manufacturer to prevent, asking the supplier to prevent, are really undesirable from the point of view of the public interest, then surely the only fair and honourable course of action to take is to make those practices illegal and let the courts decide when an offence has been committed. A system of private law, even if it is to be governed under the supervision of the courts, is not acceptable.

So far as we are concerned, it remains unacceptable. I appreciate, of course, the difficulty of legislating against loss leaders. The report of the MacQuarrie commission had a good deal to say about these difficulties and the report I have in my hand, the 1955 report of the restrictive trade practices commission, containing some 260 pages, is devoted to a large extent to explaining the undesirable results of loss leaders but also to explaining the difficulty in legislating against them. However, it seems to us that if the government is determined to have a section of this type in the act, if it is determined to amend the act in this way, it would be much preferable to have the section deal directly with loss leaders and include in it as effective a provision as can be made to make this practice illegal. I am not going to repeat all the arguments that were advanced in the committee and on second reading with respect to this subject. I will content myself at this stage by moving:

> That all the words after "(5)" in line 39 of clause 14 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> "(a) Every one who makes a practice of selling an article at a price below his cost of acquisition is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.
> (b) It is not an offence under paragraph (a) of this subsection to sell below the price mentioned therein in the case of end of season clearances, sales of broken lines, sales of an overstocked article, sales of a perishable article and in other similar cases where the purpose is also primarily to dispose of the article."

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I think my first comment must be that in a matter of this importance, relating to a portion of the act on which my hon. friends have indicated in the past they are most concerned and with respect to which they have made their most vehement criticisms, it is unfortunate that an amendment of this type comes at this time when there was an opportunity given by the reference of this bill to the standing committee for detailed suggestions of this type to be discussed in an atmosphere and in a place where discussion would have been useful. The committee of the whole would not then have been confronted with the immediate necessity of taking a decision. I must say that I find it remarkable that we have been confronted with amendment after amendment at this stage which was not suggested in committee. I have refrained from commenting before because the circumstances were not as remarkable as these circumstances.

We have an amendment here which deals with a section of the legislation about which my hon. friends have in the past expressed the greatest concern. One would have thought that they would have found it appropriate to make such a specific suggestion as this in the banking and commerce committee. However, that was not done and I am not going to protest about the fact it is actually done here. My hon. friends are quite within their rights, whether or not it had been done in the other place, to move the amendment here and I merely draw attention to the fact that it was not done there.

We are, however, confronted with an amendment which would have a very far-reaching effect, and it is my responsibility to indicate, on short notice it is true, what my position is with regard to the amendment.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister permit a question? Would the minister rather go on to the other sections of the act and come back to this after having had a little time to reflect upon it? This course would be quite agreeable to us.

Mr. Fulton: No, I do not believe it is necessary because I feel this amendment is so far-reaching that it has the effect of destroying the content of the legislation. I do not feel, really, that I have much difficulty in making up my mind with respect to the desirability of defining loss leaders. I am in entire agreement that that might be a desirable thing to do. I would suggest that those who have made a study of it so far have suggested it is a difficult, if not impossible, task to find the kind of definition which you would put into a statute making it a criminal offence to indulge in a practice such as this. It is extraordinarily difficult to define this practice and there is a danger that whatever words you use you may be embracing a practice which, on reflection, you would wish you had not covered at all.

My first comment is that what this amendment seeks to do is to wipe out the legislation which has been before the house on second reading, which has been before the banking and commerce committee for a month, and totally eliminate the proposed amendment to section 34, and substitute for that a provision merely defining "loss leader".

Then, when you come to considering that amendment itself, the definition of loss leader, I find it would be very difficult to accept. It makes the sweeping assertion that a loss leader is confined to the practice of selling an article at a price below the cost of acquisition. It makes this an offence punishable on summary conviction. It is true the amendment goes on to set out what are not offences, and incidentally the form of words used is just as objectionable as the form of words we had in the draft bill of last year which came in for such criticism. However, it is not on that point really that my concern would rest because I was never in agreement with all the strictures that were heaped on us for having used this form of words last year.

What I would be concerned about would be subparagraph (b) of this amendment which provides that it is not an offence if the sales complained of occur in the course of end of the season clearance or sales of broken lines or sales of over-stocked articles or sales of perishable articles or in other similar cases when the purpose is primarily to dispose of the articles. I have very grave doubt as to whether this is valid criminal or quasi-criminal law. Who is to say what is the end of season clearance? That is not defined. Who is to say what is a broken line? How are you to establish that it was definitely a broken line or one that the person selling it merely wished to discontinue? Who is to define what is an over-stocked article? There may be many different impressions of what is an over-stocked article. We must remember that in order to avoid a conviction for a sale which he might not have regarded as a loss leader at all but genuinely the sale of an over-stocked article a merchant would have to establish that it was an over-stocked article. There is no criterion by which that may be established, so he may be convicted although he may have had a genuine apprehension that he was over-stocked. If the court comes to the opposite conclusion, then the court convicts him if he sells the article below the cost of acquisition.

One could make similar points on every one of these purported exceptions which, if established, would render a merchant safe from a conviction of having been guilty of loss leader selling. They are all matters of opinion, and in that sense I question very seriously whether it is fair to attempt to create a new definition of a practice with the certainty that anyone convicted of that practice is going to be found guilty of a criminal offence, an offence punishable on summary conviction. The whole thing is in the area of opinion. There are no criteria which are capable of being reduced to legal language by which you could measure the definition of loss leader.

I have come to the conclusion, as have the experts who have worked in this field before including the MacQuarrie committee, that it is not a subject which is capable of precise definition of a nature which would make it a proper matter for enactment in criminal legislation. It is not capable of that kind of definition which would warrant one in making it a crime. It is because we came to that conclusion, that there was really the greatest difficulty in the way of defining loss leader so as to make it a crime, that we were forced into the position of coming at it by this inverse approach which is contained in our amendment to section 34.

We are not making anyone guilty of a crime under this, nor are we restoring the practice of resale price maintenance. We simply say that if a supplier discontinues the supply, for any of the reasons outlined in the section, then if that is his reason he is not, on that ground alone, to be found guilty of the other crime which was created by the former government, namely that of resale price maintenance. We have not, therefore, created any crime because we are recognizing that in this field it is not possible to create such a precise definition that it would be appropriate to make the conduct complained of a criminal offence.

Now it does seem to me, finally, that what is done by this amendment really falls not so much within the realm of criminal law as it does within the realm of an attempt to regulate trade and business. This is exactly what it is. I have always felt that it is not proper for parliament to make detailed regulations with respect to looking into a merchant's stock to see whether he was overstocked or whether he had broken lines or whether it was a real end of season clearance, and so on, or a perishable article. I have always felt that kind of intrusion into the detailed running of an individual's business is not good criminal law. While I appreciate the intent or motive with which this amendment has been designed, I must conclude with my customary modesty that it does not prevent any better definition of the loss leader practice than do any of those which we have had under consideration from time to time. We felt that none of those were proper matters to present to parliament. I have come to the conclusion that this is not an acceptable amendment. Under the circumstances I have outlined, we believe that our approach is the only feasible one by means of which the interests of the small merchant can effectively be protected.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister complained or, if he does not like the word "complain", may I say that the minister observed that this amendment was brought in at the last moment when there might have been an opportunity for bringing it in in the committee. I have not looked up the matter, but I am sure the minister will recall that there was one occasion in the committee when we felt we had good ground to complain because the elections act was under consideration here in this place, when the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River pointed out in committee that it was going to be simply impossible for us to put forward all the views we wished to put forward in that committee because we were constantly having to appear in the house when we wanted to be in the committee. He served notice on the committee and on the minister at that time that precisely this sort of thing was bound to happen because of the way in which this matter was being proceeded with.

But that is not the reason why this amendment was not brought forward in the committee. The reason this amendment was not brought forward in the committee was that we were concerned to get rid of this, as we think, iniquitous legislation altogether. Until further study is made of this problem and until a thoroughly satisfactory way of dealing with this loss leader problem—and I admitted this problem—can be found, we think the best course would be to leave section 34 alone. But since the government is going to persist in trying to make private law, we felt it was our duty as legislators to accept the facts, as the Leader of the Opposition said, or to accept the realistic situation in which we find ourselves and to do our utmost in order to see that if an attempt is going to be made to deal with this problem of loss leaders it should be dealt with positively and directly by public law enforced in the courts and not enforced by the private ukases of manufacturers.

The minister talks about some of the things in my leader's amendment as being matters of opinion. But what is to let suspected offenders off in the minister's proposals? It is "reasonable cause to believe". If a private individual has reasonable cause to believe, he can take against some businessman punitive action which may put him out of business and that will be perfectly legal under the minister's amendment. If that is the case, we think it preferable, or to put it the other way, it is less objectionable to proceed in this way and make the best attempt we can make—and we do not think it is such a bad attempt after all—to define a loss leader. Of course, the extraordinary thing is that, although the minister says it is impossible to define "loss leader" he nevertheless uses the word "loss leader" in the legislation, in line 47 on page 8 of the bill as it was given second reading, the bill that is before us without the amendments printed in it:

(a) that the other person was making a practice of using articles supplied by the person charged as loss leaders,—

In other words, the courts are to decide without any guidance that someone believed or had cause to believe that loss leaders were in use and as a result some person might be denied supplies by private action.

Mr. Fulton: Might I just interrupt at that point?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: I think my hon. friend has missed the point. I said we did not think it was possible to define "loss leader" with sufficient clarity and precision so as to make it proper to make it a criminal offence.

Mr. Pickersgill: I quite agree.

Mr. Fulton: We have defined "loss leader" here. We have not left the court without guidance. However, it is not made a criminal offence.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister is quite right. The situation is exactly as he says. This parliament in 1951, over violent objection from the minister and his colleagues when they were over here on this side of the chamber, made resale price maintenance a crime. Now by a vague "cause to believe" clause the minister is saying that you can get out of guilt for this crime if you have cause to believe something or other happened that he does not think can be defined as a crime, although it may be defined in some other way. In other words, what this legislation does is this, and it seems to me that the minister's intervention helped my argument because it indicated quite clearly that the minister really is intending to do precisely what we have said all along he was intending to do, namely to provide an escape hatch for resale price maintenance and to make this crime no longer a crime in any practical sense. As I say, if this is really what the minister has in mind, may I suggest that the minister is still thinking along lines that are not much different from those along which he was thinking in 1951. I have been looking through this interesting volume of the debates of the House of Commons for the second session of 1951. On December 28, as reported at page 2450, in the debate on the bill to ban resale price maintenance, the minister said this:

There is, however, ample evidence to the effect that the small retailer will be hurt if the practice of resale price maintenance is eliminated. In the light of that evidence, we are left with the question, why is the government in such a hurry to hurt the small retailer?

I draw attention to these words. The opposition were complaining bitterly because this legislation was being put through by the government at that time.

Why are they in such a hurry to remove the only protection—

And I would ask you to bear those words in mind, Mr. Chairman.

—which the small retailer has against the power of the big interests, the monopolies and the large chain stores, and leave him at the mercy of cut-throat competition? No satisfactory answer to that question has yet been given; yet the Prime Minister, in taking part in this debate yesterday, said that the government was not willing to leave this matter over for any further or fuller investigation; that they were going to remove the protection from the small retailer and leave him to stand on his own feet. It is a callous, ill-considered and ill-advised course to follow, with much harm to be done to independent Canadian business.

If, in fact, what the minister said about resale price maintenance eight and a half years ago was justified—and I do not think for a minute that it was justified—it is hard to see why the minister has been three years in office without doing anything about it; and why now, after three years in office, he is refusing to do what he wanted the government of that day to do, namely to take direct action to deal with this problem of loss leaders but instead is trying to deal with it by a device which we believe will only have the effect of undermining that legislation and of making it virtually inoperative. Why is he seeking to do that?

We say that rather than let that happen it would be better for the government to do what the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice himself said should be done when they were sitting on this side of the house. They said that if resale price maintenance was to be banned there should be legislation to prevent loss leader selling. But obviously all this legislation is going to do is to allow a private law to be established in this particular regard. Rather than do that we think it would be a less objectionable course for parliament to adopt the amendment which my friend the Leader of the Opposition has put forward.

I should like to say one other thing. The minister ended his objections by talking about concern for small business. Everybody who takes his duties in this house seriously is concerned for small business as he is for all other sections of the population. But there is one common characteristic of all Canadians, whether small or big: we are all consumers and, our first concern should be for consumers especially those who belong to the least protected section of this community, especially in the export industries where producers are unable to protect themselves against the movements of the world market. To weep crocodile tears about small business when in fact what is going to be done will very likely have the effect of increasing the prices which fishermen and farmers must pay for the necessities of life is something which does not appeal to us. It is for this reason that the St. Laurent government banned resale price maintenance, and we have enough evidence to know that this action did have some effect in keeping prices down at a time of inflation, and that it is having some effect now in reducing prices to the consumer.

I had a clipping from the Financial Post handed to me by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River—I have lost it now—which referred to the fact that the day after General Motors in the United Kingdom had taken the ban off resale price maintenance in connection with the Vauxhall car the price went down $400 or $500. That was in England. There is no doubt whatsoever that if by the front door or by the back door resale price maintenance is reintroduced the consumer is the one who is going to pay.

Mr. Aiken: I wonder if in view of the amendment he is now supporting the hon. member would agree that the practice of loss leader selling is a serious problem to retailers?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not sure that it is, but I am sure that most small businessmen think it is, and if we can do anything reasonable and proper which is not going to soak the consumer to remove that kind of grievance we ought to do it.

Mr. Fulton: That is exactly what we have done.

Mr. Howard: I think our objections to the proposed section 34, which were made clear during the second reading of this bill and developed further in the committee, apply at this stage also, because only one slight alteration has been made by the government, and regardless of that alteration we consider that our criticisms are still valid. I am speaking now of the bill as put forward by the government with the addition of subsection 5 to section 34. This confirms our impression that the government just has not got enough courage to put forward its own ideas in the proper form; it has to hide behind some loopholes and pretend it wants to do one thing while really doing another. This government wants to reintroduce price maintenance. This is a campaign which they carried on day after day while in opposition eight or nine years ago. I do not recall this personally, but I remember reading reports of the debate in the House of Commons at that time and the hysterical opposition which was voiced by government supporters, then on the other side of the house, to the then Liberal government's ban on price maintenance. All these feelings are in evidence here again, and it would have been much nicer, much cleaner and more decent if the Minister of Justice had introduced an amendment to repeal section 34. This is what he wants to do in one way or another.

We can only look at this new subsection from one point of view and that is that it should be rejected out of hand. It does nothing more than attempt to legalize price discrimination by private manufacturers because they would now have authority of a legal nature to pick and choose and discriminate against and exercise control over their products from the time they are manufactured until the time the consumer gets them. Manufacturer after manufacturer has either appeared before the committee or made submissions to the minister indicating that what was wanted was a return to resale price maintenance; that they wanted the right to have price control not only at manufacturing level but also at wholesale and retail levels. Of course, this would lead not only to price control but, inevitably, to an increase in prices.

It is very easy to see what will occur in Canada under this particular amendment put forward by the minister. This sob stuff about wanting to help small businessmen cope with the problem of loss leaders is simply window dressing to cover up the real intentions of the government. If the government wished to deal with the problems of small businessmen—and there is no statistical evidence of the degree of severity of this particular problem—then measures could have been taken in one of the other sections of the act, such as the section on price discrimination. If we have a free enterprise economy, if that is what people believe in and if that is the type of economy which we desire, then surely the consumer should have the right to pick and choose between, for argument's sake, an article in one store which has a certain price and in connection with which there is a certain degree of service, if we wish to bring service into it, and a similar article in another store at a lower price where such service may not be provided.

I heard references made in the committee to a firm in Ottawa called Absell which was described as a discount house or a store that sells a lot of loss leaders. Of course, I do not know if that is the case. However, some hon. members of the present government are among the clientele of Absell. They have been known to enter and make purchases. Certainly they want to exercise the freedom of selection as does anyone else. I also understand that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has made purchases there.

Mrs. Fairclough: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, that statement is not true.

Mr. Howard: Oh, that is perfectly all right. In any event, that was what was said. The amendments offered by the minister deserve complete and outright rejection. Inasmuch as the amendment introduced by the Leader of the Opposition attempts to meet a bad situation foisted on us by the government it is deserving of support.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, the amendment just moved by the Leader of the Opposition represents the most amazing about face I have witnessed in a long time. Throughout second reading of the bill and throughout the meetings of the committee the attitude of the official opposition was that loss leadering is not causing any difficulty, that it cannot be defined, that small business only thinks it is being mistreated through loss leadering and that in fact this entire piece of legislation being introduced by the government is bad. Every witness who stated that there was nothing particularly wrong with loss leadering was supported by hon. members of the Liberal party and every witness who said that loss leadering was causing trouble was opposed.

The opposition of the Liberals occurred right up until yesterday and this morning, but now there has been a reversal of attitude. The evidence of Mr. Gilbert of the retail merchants association was castigated throughout the hearings of the committee because he said that loss leadering was a problem and deserved to be dealt with. Mr. Gilbert who has been maligned, to say the least, by hon. members of the opposition, in his evidence proposed that he would much prefer to see the outright repeal of section 34 which is almost entirely the same proposition that is being made now. It is most difficult to understand the reversal of the position of the Liberal party.

The Leader of the Opposition in his introductory remarks said he felt that if the government was going to insist on something being done it should be gone into to the full extent. Throughout the whole argument on loss leadering the government has managed to show that some balance is required in this difficult situation. In 1952 the Liberal party brought in legislation which outlawed retail price maintenance. We feel that the absolute outlawing of it was wrong, that it went too far and that it created other difficulties. We believe that the legislation now introduced will have some leavening effect on the whole situation. To absolutely outlaw loss leadering in my opinion would be to swing entirely the opposite way.

It appears as though the Liberals want to swing the whole way, one way or the other, depending on which side they support. They appeared to be on one side in 1952. They appeared to be one one side yesterday and this morning, but this afternoon at 5.15 they appear to have swung right over to the extreme opposite side of the position they formerly took.

I believe the legislation now being introduced is good legislation. As far as loss leadering is concerned it is no offence now under the law for a person to put goods on sale in an effort to sell them. It is no offence to put cheap goods or non-brand name products on sale. It is no offence to use such products for low price sales, even to the point of their being loss leaders. To do so is not an offence under the present law nor should it be. When a product is being used to the detriment of the manufacturer a person can have action taken against him under certain conditions.

Certainly a manufacturer who has spent much money on the research and development of a product and on advertising it, does not want the product put on the market to be sold as a loss leader or as a cheap product nor do the other retailers want this. This is the crux of the whole situation. A retailer selling a brand at a price which is fair and which provides a reasonable profit can surely expect that his competitors will sell the same brand at a reasonable price. If a product costing $1.25 is being sold for $1.59 in one store and for 59 cents in an adjacent store it is certainly of no benefit to small business or the other retailers. It gives the public the impression that the man charging the higher price is making an unduly high profit which is not the case.

I feel that the amendment proposed by the Leader of the Opposition would go too far the other way. I do not know how a loss leader could be defined. I think the effect of this would be to hurt the consumer. I say no more at the moment except that I would oppose the amendment and again I express amazement at the way it was introduced.

Mr. Morton: Mr. Chairman, I cannot refrain from making some comments along the line of those made by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka. It is surprising that the Liberals should have taken the position represented in this amendment after the long arguments in the committee, after what was said there by the economists to the effect that the problem of loss leadering did not exist; after even Professor Cohen expressed doubts about the extent to which the problem did exist and especially after the disparaging remarks made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate not only about Mr. Gilbert but the group he represents because the group was so bold as to bring forward the fact that there was a loss leader problem.

My hon. friends opposite apparently now have seen the light perhaps as a result of the urging of some hon. members in their own party who are involved in small business. We can assume indirectly by implication from this amendment that hon. gentlemen opposite have now realized there is a problem with respect to loss leaders. If you recall the various arguments they were to the effect that perhaps it would be better in the circumstances to let the manufacturer decide whether the loss leader is disparaging his goods.

Mr. Pickersgill: That has been taken out.

Mr. Morton: That part has, yes. As to whether the loss leader is in fact a problem, the manufacturer himself, who knows the situation, in conjunction with retailers who will speak to him about it, would be a good judge of the effect it is having on trade.

The question of whether this is a better method of settling it or having the courts settle it on the basis of the definition of loss leader given in the amendment which perhaps is another definition that is in the clouds. I refer to whether it is a loss leader or not. Perhaps we should leave it as it is and let the matter work itself out, because in all the discussions in the committee very few of the experts could tell us of the effect with respect to the matter of the loss leader in the present situation where the supply is greater than at the time the present act was put into effect, since the manufacturer is not the only manufacturer of the specific goods concerned, and they are not going to destroy their outlets by arbitrarily withholding the right of people to sell their goods. Therefore, for business reasons, they are going to try to get as many outlets as possible. For this reason they would not use this method unless they took a great deal of caution with respect to the effect on themselves.

Of course, we were criticized over the fact that we had not done away with the theory of price maintenance. On the other hand, there are those who feel that we are doing away with price maintenance in the present suggestions. I urge, Mr. Chairman, on this basis that an amendment such as the Leader of the Opposition suggests would not meet the entire problem, and therefore it would be better to go along with the method which is proposed in clause 14.

Mr. Pickersgill: I want to make a couple of observations about the speeches of the two hon. members, the hon. member for Davenport and the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka, since both of them did me the compliment of referring to me. Both of these hon. gentlemen have been great champions, of course, of the cause of the small merchant and are really anxious that something should be done for him with respect to loss leaders. But I notice that they seem to have greeted our so-called conversion to their views not with the enthusiasm one would expect, but with anguish, because they realize the difference between what the Leader of the Opposition is putting forward and what they were seeking to do is the difference between a straightforward, simple way of doing this thing and something that would create a kind of private law.

I rather think that the hon. member for Davenport gave the whole case away when he said, "There are manufacturers who are—" I forget what he said after that; but he was suggesting, perhaps unconsciously, what he was really thinking about when he referred to "manufacturers" and that it reflected his way of thinking. He also suggested we were not concerned until today about loss leaders. That is not, of course, true, as anyone who has taken the trouble, as I have, to look through the debates of 1951, or the speech of the Leader of the Opposition on the second reading, or the remarks that I made yesterday on this subject which I am not going to repeat but which are contained in the second column of Hansard at page 6901.

There is obviously a problem here, a very difficult one. We think the problem has been greatly exaggerated, as I said earlier. We think it would be better to leave the law as it is. But if something is going to be done about this, we think this is the preferable method to the other and I hope the committee is now ready to decide on the amendment.

Mr. Morton: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Morton: In his amendment the hon. member would not carry on the remedies that are set out in paragraph (c) and (d) of clause 14?

Mr. Pickersgill: No.

Mr. Morton: You refer to loss leaders only; you forget the other difficulties.

Mr. Nugent: I have been listening to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and I think I should straighten him out on the Conservative reactions to this apparent Liberal change in position and assure him the change was viewed not with caution but with suspicion.

Mr. Aiken: Not a real convert.

Mr. Nugent: However, a cursory examination of the amendment proposed by the Leader of the Opposition brings to mind immediately a couple of contradictions. They purport to give protection against loss leader selling, and then promptly they say that this loss leader selling is an offence. Then they give some examples which say that it is not an offence to carry out loss leader selling, and one of these examples is the sales of an over-stocked article. I myself am not a storekeeper or merchant but for the life of me I cannot understand how a loss leader campaign or sale can be carried on without involving an over-stocked article. As a matter of fact, the usual practice is for a merchant to get hold of a large quantity of a particular kind of merchandise that is very low priced and sell it at a loss or at cost and absorb the loss as a good advertising scheme. In other words, it is cheap advertising. He gets a better return on his money than he would get in any other way.

So long as they say that the sale of an over-stocked article is not loss leader selling, how can it possibly give protection? I cannot understand this. An article is over-stocked, in my view—and I cannot arrive at any other sensible conclusion on it—if the merchant has more on his shelves than he would normally carry or his business would normally be expected to handle, or circumstances should change and it would be a good reason, he felt, to get rid of the article. If he wants to take a loss, and if he gets some advertising profit, then he is going to feel that he is over-stocked. Therefore, there is no protection at all and no offence possible under this definition.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, I had been dealing with the amendment to this section moved by the Leader of the Opposition, and at the risk of repeating myself I should like to say that I take particular exception to that part of his amendment which deletes from loss leader selling sales of an over-stocked article on the basis that sales of an over-stocked article are usually carried out in circumstances where the merchant finds it unprofitable to try to get rid of the merchandise in the normal course of events. By using the article as a loss leader he hopes to get his value out of it as a result of the advertising benefit he receives. In essence what the amendment does, therefore, is to purport to make an offence of loss leader selling but the definition used by the Leader of the Opposition makes it certain that no one would ever be convicted of such an offence.

My reasoning in this regard is much strengthened by the remarks of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate who has tipped us off as to exactly what the official opposition intends to do. That hon. gentleman referred to these people as those who fear that loss leader selling is going to do them some harm. He made it plain in his remarks that he was not at all convinced there was any harm in it but admitted there were those who felt it would harm them and suggested that if we can do anything in a legislative way to allay their fears we should do so. I suggest that is exactly what his leader is attempting to do by this amendment. He is putting in something which will look like it was intended to give such protection but since they are not really against loss leader selling the amendment will not deter it in the least. He says that these people see a shadow and they fear it. Therefore he has moved an amendment which is window dressing but no more than a shadow to fight the shadow of these people's fears.

I am not perhaps the most astute politician in the house but I do think that when we have an amendment which on its face and with only a cursory examination by members of the house can be seen to be so ineffectual that it really would accomplish not one thing, and when we have had the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate apologize for it in case they should be thought stupid instead of merely politically astute, it really is going a little too far to take up all the time of the committee that discussion of the amendment has.

I am one of those who feel it would be nice if our legislation was not only good but looked good. However, I certainly think it is vastly more important that our legislation should do something rather than merely be window dressing such as they ask us to accept in their amendment. Having said that, I think we have had enough of such amendments, and I trust that the next time an amendment is brought in it will at least attempt to do something, and that if the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate thinks that people are hanging on his every word and reading all his speeches he will not so much further insult the intelligence of members of the house as well as the people of the country by making it obvious that they really do not intend any harm to loss leader selling.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, before the vote is taken, may I say I do not think I can let that savage attack by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona pass without pointing out that our amendment does create a very clearly defined offence, an offence which is precisely of the character that the star witness for the government, Mr. Gilbert, said he wanted, that is to say, that nobody should be allowed to make a practice of selling things below the cost of acquisition. It is a clear and definite offence.

We recognize the practicalities of the situation, that there are certain circumstances in which people should be allowed to sell things below the cost of acquisition, as I am sure the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona and every other hon. member on the other side recognizes, but we take the view that if there is a problem and something is to be done about it then this amendment would be effective. If there is no problem, then of course the amendment could not be effective, but there are those who allege there is a problem. At any rate, we would see this happen directly and clearly. There would be prosecutions in the courts of the persons who were guilty of using loss leaders and they would not be subject to punitive action by manufacturers who could get around the existing law by reason of the loopholes provided in the legislation that the government is putting forward.

I repeat that the best thing of all would be to leave section 34 alone until something really thoroughly satisfactory can be devised, but since the government will not do that, since the government is putting forward something that we think is completely objectionable, we feel it is our duty as legislators to try as far as we can within the rules of the house to put something forward that is at least somewhat better, and that is what we are trying to do.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be repetitious but I am afraid the hon. member has missed the gist of my argument against his leader's amendment. It is true they have purported to create an offence but the only manner in which the offence could be committed has been so covered up by their definitions that it would be impossible to convict anyone of such an offence.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask the hon. member a question. Would he say which of the exceptions he would take out if he were drafting the legislation?

Mr. Nugent: Which of the exceptions in the bill?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, which of the exceptions in my leader's amendment?

Mr. Nugent: I do not have a copy of it in front of me but it seems to me that most of the exceptions are covered by the remarks I have made. The amendment refers to seasonal clearances. Who is to say what is a seasonal clearance except the storekeeper? It is impossible of true definition or to get it down fine enough so that any crown prosecutor I am acquainted with would care to stick his neck out and try to get a conviction. Certaintly one particular clause to which I object most strongly and which I think is most obvious has to do with sales of an over-stocked article. As I have pointed out, the essence of loss leader selling is that the merchant always uses an article on which he was probably going to take a loss anyway, and in order to get his value out of it he uses it as an advertising gimmick or loss leader. I think that is very obvious.

Mr. Fulton: I think before the committee votes on the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition I should endeavour to place it in its proper perspective by comparing it with the proposal put forward by the government, which this amendment would delete. I referred this afternoon to some of the objections to the amendment which I saw upon an immediate examination, and upon reflection have not been removed. Indeed, they have been reinforced by what I have been able to perceive as I studied the amendment. I think a brief survey of what would be done by the amendment, as contrasted with what would be done by the government's proposal, would be helpful.

I indicated that one of the reasons I could not accept the amendment was that I felt it was not possible to place in the criminal law a section defining loss leader selling in a way that should make that practice the subject of a criminal prosecution and conviction. I pointed out just how open to objection the amendment is on that point. Since that time I have been looking at the report of the restrictive trade practices commission on its inquiry into loss leader selling, and refreshing my memory about what they had found with respect to this matter of defining loss leader selling. I find that they made some very interesting observations in the section of their report dealing with this subject. I direct the attention of the committee particularly to the passage beginning on page 230, where it states:

> It has already been indicated that, in the case of practically all those appearing before the commission, whether representatives of manufacturing or trade groups, or of consumer, farmer or co-operative associations, the view was generally held that it would be undesirable to have legislation which would attempt to define loss leader selling. In some cases the objections were directed specifically to legislation which would establish a minimum mark-up over cost in the sale of any article. While this was the position most commonly taken, the Retail Merchants Association of Canada Inc. did make a suggestion for amendment to the Criminal Code to make it an offence to sell merchandise below a stated cost.

Having noted that the retail merchants association had submitted a draft in this respect they went on to deal with it and to point out the objections that they felt concerning it. In this context, and at this moment, I should like to say we have also made it quite clear to the retail merchants association from the inception of our discussions with them as a government that we doubted very much the feasibility of their proposal; then later, in the course of the discussion we indicated that our doubts had been resolved and that we were certain we could not create a definition of loss leader selling which would be appropriate to insert in this bill to make it a criminal offence. We came to that conclusion on much the same reasoning as is given in the report of the restrictive trade practices commission, because they go on to say, as reported at the bottom of page 231, after having dealt with the suggestion of the retail merchants association:

> The necessity, which the Retail Merchants Association of Canada Inc. clearly recognized, of guarding against the use of any formula or definition in a way which would interfere with the normal competitive conduct of business, is pointed up by the fact that those who made the proposal immediately saw that exceptions and qualifications were required. This emphasizes the views of many others appearing before the commission, to which reference has already been made, that any attempt to define sales below some stated level of costs as loss leader selling would have to provide for so many exceptions that practical working of the measure would be impossible. It will be noted that in the definition proposed by the Retail Merchants Association of Canada Inc. an attempt was made to get away from the actual acquisition cost to an individual retailer and use instead "the manufacturer's lowest selling invoice price" to any member of the trade.

Then they go on to point out how impossible it is, how undesirable it is to resort to this method of giving protection to the independent merchant against whom the practice is used. So, Mr. Chairman, it is a fact that the restrictive trade practices commission, while recognizing as they do the undesirability of the loss leader device, and in this field of course they are reinforced by the findings of the MacQuarrie committee itself, have nevertheless concluded that making it a criminal offence is not a practical method of dealing with this problem. I refer to the attempt to define it and to write that definition into the Criminal Code, because of the multiplicity of exceptions which would have to be introduced in such a provision.

On the basis of that conclusion, which this government shares, one is then faced with the necessity of finding some other method of meeting the problem confronting independent merchants, and it is our view that we have resolved that problem satisfactorily and in the only method possible by the amendment suggested in clause 14 of this bill. At this point I have to remind the committee that the amendment suggested by the Leader of the Opposition would completely delete our proposal. When members of the opposition say that their proposal is desirable as against the undesirable government proposal—I will not attempt to review all the opprobrious terms they have applied to it—let us look at what this government's proposal does.

I should like to examine our proposal in the light of what they say, and in the light of what would still be open to be done by way of an inquiry if a charge or complaint is made that resale price maintenance has been introduced by the back door, as my hon. friends say would be the case under our amendment. Starting on the basis that resale price maintenance is made illegal and is an offence under the act, we have not in any sense weakened or amended the operative portions of section 34 which have that result. But we do say that there are certain practices carried on by some large retailers which are damaging to the interests not only of other merchants but of consumers. We say that no one in his right senses would argue that if these practices could be defined and isolated a supplier should not have the right to discontinue supplies because of these practices. Let us look at what our amendment says. It reads:

> Where, in a prosecution under this section, it is proved that the person charged refused or counselled the refusal to sell or supply an article to any other person, no inference unfavourable to the person charged shall be drawn from such evidence if he satisfies the court that he and anyone upon whose report he depended had reasonable cause to believe and did believe—

Let me remind you, Mr. Chairman, that the supplier has to have reasonable cause to believe and has to believe, first:

> —that the other person was making a practice of using articles supplied by the person charged as loss leaders, that is to say, not for the purpose of making a profit thereon but for purposes of advertising;

My hon. friends have recognized by their amendment now before the committee that they also agree that the practice of loss leadering is an undesirable and damaging practice. It is not open to them, therefore, to say that it is unreasonable for a supplier to discontinue supplies if the person supplied is using those articles for loss leadering. We are on common ground there. My hon. friends must agree that it is quite appropriate for the supplier to discontinue supplies under those circumstances.

Mr. McIlraith: Surely the minister would agree that the amendment offered by the Leader of the Opposition provides that the courts should enforce a penalty on a person who practices loss leadering, whereas the amendment with which he is dealing enables the supplier to enforce the penalty against that person.

Mr. Fulton: Not at all. I shall come to that matter when we relate this back to what happens when an inquiry is launched on the basis of a complaint that resale price maintenance has been indulged in. But the point I am making here is that my hon. friends, by their amendment, agree that this loss leadering is an undesirable practice and should be eliminated. If they agree with that suggestion then they cannot say that it is unreasonable for us to provide for the discontinuance of supplies because of this practice of loss leadering.

Mr. Pickersgill: What a non sequitur.

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friend says "What a non sequitur". The only inference to be drawn from that remark is that they were not sincere when they introduced their amendment which says that a company which engages in the practice of loss leadering, as they defined it, is committing a criminal offence.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the minister would permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister really think that every practice that he considers undesirable should be made illegal?

Mr. Fulton: No, indeed. That is precisely my objection to the amendment of the Leader of the Opposition. This happens to be one practice that I consider undesirable, but I recognize that it cannot define with sufficient preciseness in order for one to be warranted in trying to make it a criminal offence.

The next ground upon which we say that a supplier would be entitled to discontinue supplying is when the person supplied was making a practice of using the article supplied not for the purpose of selling such articles at a profit but for the purpose of attracting customers to his store in the hope of selling him other articles. Is there anything unreasonable about that? If a supplier finds that the person supplied is using the goods supplied not to promote the sale of those goods but as a come-on device in order to get people into his store for the purpose of selling them other articles which is damaging the trade of other merchants who are trying to sell his goods, is there anything unreasonable or improper about the supplier discontinuing the supply of those articles to the offending merchant? I hear no voice raised in opposition or contrary assertion. I, of course, am satisfied that no one could hold that it is an unreasonable thing to make it clear that a supplier has the right to discontinue his supplies under those circumstances.

The third circumstance under which it is made clear that supplies may be withheld is that the person supplied was making a practice of engaging in misleading advertising in respect of the articles supplied by the person charged. Will anyone argue that it is unreasonable or improper to make it clear that a supplier can discontinue supplying if the person supplied was using the articles in question as a subject of misleading advertising in an unethical way or engaged in unethical and dishonest practices with respect to the goods supplied. Therefore we say that there should be no question but that the supplier would be right to discontinue supplying there.

The fourth circumstance in which it is made clear that a supplier has a right to discontinue supplying is when the other person made a practice of not providing the level of servicing that purchasers of such articles might reasonably expect from the merchant in question. The circumstance here is not that the person selling articles did not provide a level of servicing required by the manufacturer. That would not be a valid ground for discontinuing supplies. The circumstance justifying withdrawal of supplies is that the merchant made a practice of not providing the level of servicing that purchasers from him might reasonably expect him to supply. This is directed at another dishonest device wherein merchants hold out that they are sellers of goods with respect to which purchasers normally expect a certain level of services and do not make it clear that their low prices are on the basis that they do not service the goods. The purchaser from them comes back and says, "My appliance has broken down will you come and repair it?" And only then finds this merchant saying, "We do not have a policy of servicing these goods". The effect of this section is to say that anyone who holds himself out as giving service with respect to goods that he sells, and who then does not give the service which the purchasers from him are entitled to expect on the basis of that holding out may have his supplies discontinued without the person discontinuing the supplies being interpreted necessarily as having attempted the practice of resale price maintenance.

Hence every one of these circumstances outlined here under which supplies may be discontinued without that necessarily being held to be part of a resale price maintenance policy, are circumstances in which the consumer has a definite interest in seeing that that policy of discontinuing supplies would be followed; because every one of the practices jutifying a discontinuance of supply is a practice that works against the interests of the consumer. I make that statement without hesitation or equivocation.

Having analysed the basis upon which this legislation proceeds, the basis upon which it says that discontinuance of supply under these circumstances shall not be taken ipso facto as evidence of a desire to maintain resale prices, let me turn to the next criticism that my hon. friends make.

"Oh," they say, "but the decision whether or not to discontinue supplying is a sort of private law". Somehow or another they suggest that this matter is placed entirely beyond the reach of the administration of the combines legislation. They say that we are placing the power in the hands of suppliers and thus of manufacturers, of administering private law, and they suggest that the combines branch will not be able to look at it any more and that the courts will not be able to deal with it.

This also is an argument ad absurdum. This can be demonstrated if we go back to review the course of an inquiry that would be made if a complaint was laid by a merchant whose supplies had been discontinued. Let us suppose the case of a retailer whose supplies had been cut off and who got in touch with the director and said, "My supplies have been cut off and I say it is because I refused to maintain a resale price which the manufacturer or supplier asked me to maintain". The director would make an inquiry. The director would examine the suppliers in order to ascertain what was the reason for which the supplies had been discontinued. He would examine into the situation in order to see whether in fact any attempt had been made to practice a resale price maintenance policy.

My hon. friend says, but all that the person then investigated would have to do would be to say, "Oh, somebody told me that the merchant whose supplies are discontinued was carrying on a practice under one of the clauses (a), (b), (c) or (d)". This, of course, would not be by any means an answer to the inquiry into the question of whether there was resale price maintenance, because not only would the supplier who discontinued supplies be obliged to satisfy the director that he did believe that one of these practices was being engaged in, but he would be obliged to show that he had reasonable cause to believe it; and he would not be able to rely upon the suggestion made by my friends in the opposition that somebody had told him and therefore he had reasonable cause to believe. It would then have to be proved that the person who told him also had "reasonable cause to believe".

Are we to assume that just because this legislative amendment is made, the director, the restrictive trade practices commission and in the ultimate analysis the minister and the courts are going to take leave of their common sense and not require the persons who are being investigated to show them positively that they had "reasonable cause to believe" that one of these things were taking place which alone is the justification for the discontinuance of supply?

It is apparent that hon. gentlemen opposite have simply closed their eyes to the real meaning and to the obvious meaning of the provision we have placed before parliament. The director is not going to be hoodwinked, the restrictive trade practices commission is not going to be hoodwinked; they are not going to allow someone to say to them "I have simply formed a belief" without asking why he had formed that belief and whether there were reasonable grounds for it.

Mr. McIlraith: Does the minister not realize that the supplier will have cut off supplies and inflicted a penalty before the director is called upon to intervene, and suppose the director finds there is no defence—

Mr. Fulton: That is a completely irrelevant question.

Mr. Pickersgill: —after he has been put out of business?

Mr. Fulton: There is no change at all. Right now if a manufacturer were to cut off supplies by reason of a policy of resale price maintenance we could not restore that situation until there had been a complaint and an inquiry followed by a report and a conviction. There is no change in that situation whatsoever. Of course, there has to be an inquiry. That would be the case whether this amendment were here or not. So there is no interference with any access on the part of the merchant to the director, and no change in that regard at all.

The director, as I say, is not going to refrain from applying common sense to this situation just because this amendment is here. He will require to be shown that there is reason to believe that one of the practices outlined in the section was involved, and if that is not proved he will say that this section provides no defence. So it will be with the commission, so it will be with the minister to whom the commission will report, and so it will be with the courts. The courts are most certainly going to require that anyone who relies upon the defence of this section must show that he not only did believe but that he had reasonable cause to believe that one of the offensive practices was being carried on by the persons whose supplies are discontinued, and it is only if that can be established that the section is available as a defence.

So I say that when you examine what we have provided here as a reasonable protection for merchants against the unfair competitive practices of some of their competitors, and when you find it does not restore resale price maintenance, that it does not take away the common sense of the combines branch, either of the director or of the commission, and that it does not impose any criminal liability on persons in respect of practices that cannot be defined in legal terms suitable for inclusion in criminal law; when you compare all this with the amendment put forward by the Leader of the Opposition which flies in the face of every report by every agency, including those established by the government of which the hon. gentleman was a member, all of which conclude that it is not practicable to define the practice of loss leader selling and make it a criminal offence, I say to the committee that I am confident that in the light of that comparison they will agree with me that the amendment of the Leader of the Opposition should be rejected and that the proposal of the government should be adopted.

Amendment (Mr. Pearson) negatived: yeas, 20; nays, 59.

Mr. Howard: This clause has been kicked around somewhat and I think there has been a pretty exhaustive examination of it. However, I think there is one group of words which should be removed. We have already debated their effect and intent to some extent. If they were removed I do not say I would support the clause in its entirety, but for the sake of ensuring the greatest possible degree of clarity I think the words that relate to reasonable cause to believe should be removed, and I should like to move, accordingly, as follows:

That subsection 5 of clause 14 be amended by deleting, in lines 43, 44 and 45, the words "that he and any one upon whose report he depended had reasonable cause to believe and did believe".

I think that removing the reasonable cause to believe business will make it more clear, and put more responsibility on the person who is charged to prove why he discontinued his supply to the other person involved.

Mr. Pickersgill: I must say I think this amendment commends itself to me.

Amendment (Mr. Howard) negatived: Yeas, 19; nays, 64.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 14 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: On division.

Clause agreed to on division.

Clauses 15 and 16 agreed to.

On clause 17—Jurisdiction of courts.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I wish to raise a point I raised on second reading. I do not propose to reiterate any of the arguments made previously but I want to point out again to the committee that subclause 4 combined with the new section 32 (1) as adopted earlier today by the committee make it abundantly clear that where an offence or a prohibited act has been committed under this legislation the Attorney General of Canada at his discretion—and likewise the attorneys general of the provinces at their discretion—may proceed by civil proceeding instead of by way of criminal prosecution. That in my view raises a very serious constitutional issue because of the fact that the legislation against combines has been held to be within the competence of parliament because it is criminal legislation.

If we make it clear as I suggest we are doing by the adoption of clause 17 (4) that it is no longer criminal legislation but may be merely a matter that is to be dealt with by way of civil remedy and civil proceedings then we are raising a real constitutional issue that may very well jeopardize—I am sorry I cannot hear the hon. member who is interjecting—the legislation. We are raising a constitutional issue by the adoption of this clause combined with section 32 (1) in the form in which it has been approved by the committee. I merely wanted to point that out to the committee. I do not think I need elaborate on the subject or reiterate the arguments I used earlier.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the brief re-statement by my hon. friend of his position and I will be equally brief in reply because we did cover this before. In my submission my hon. friend is confusing the procedural with the substantive. The hon. member is saying that because we have provided a different procedure to obtain a remedy, we have changed the nature of the jurisdiction under which we seek the remedy. In my submission that is not a sound view. In my submission the procedure by way of information which, is provided in subclause 4 as an alternative is equally a criminal as a civil procedure. We are not relying on any different jurisdiction although it is true that we have provided an alternative remedy.

Mr. McIlraith: The minister's argument would be perfectly valid if he had adopted an earlier argument advanced this afternoon to the effect that the discretion be left in the courts and not in the minister, but since it is a discretion left in the minister it changes the complexion of the matter altogether. That is the nub of the whole argument. If the minister had left the matter with the courts his answer would have been effective but having taken the discretion himself it gives rise to the problem to which I referred.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 18 to 22 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 23—Application of acts to fishing agreements.

Mr. Howard: This provision was inserted in the act last year which, in brief, provided that the act would not be construed to apply to the fishing industry on the west coast up to a certain period of time. This arises out of the fact that there was an inquiry by the director into the fishing industry and consequently a statement of evidence was made to the restrictive trade practices commission. Hinging on this the industry and union were unable to enter negotiations. The fishing association took the position that they would perhaps run afoul of the law again by negotiating with the union on the price of fish. The period involved was from January 1, 1959 to December 31, 1960.

A number of reasons combined to postpone the hearing by the commission. I do not know whether a firm date has yet been set for this hearing. There has been some correspondence between the union and the minister and as is the usual practice I am sure the union sent copies to at least all hon. members from British Columbia. I understand their contention is that there is a possibility of entering into negotiations between now and the end of December, 1961 which could result in agreements which would be in effect beyond the end of 1961. Although they want it to apply for the next 99 years the association suggested that the extension might more properly be to December, 1962 in view of extenuating circumstances and the complications that might arise to ensure that they have the coverage and protection of the law relating to any contract signed in this period.

If the commission meets and hearings are held it will be some time before the matter is concluded and the report released. Following that if there were a decision to prosecute some of the parties the proceedings could well carry on well past 1961. Until the question is finally cleared up the extension should be granted for an additional year beyond 1961 as is presently provided for. Would the minister indicate the decision he has made with respect to an extension to December 31, 1962?

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to support—I do not think there is any need to repeat the argument—very warmly the suggestion of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Fulton: I doubt very much whether I can accept the suggestion, for the reason that it will be quite simple to take care of a situation which might arise if the hearings of the commission are protracted, or if the court has not dealt with the matter by the time limit contained in the proposal before the committee, namely the 31st day of December, 1961. It will become obvious to parliament in the course of the session, and as a matter of precaution the time limit would be extended by a sufficient period to take care of the eventualities, and so on from time to time as appeared to be necessary.

I would hesitate very much indeed to give a statutory exemption to an arrangement which might be held by the courts to be a contravention of the act and find then that by so far advancing the period of exemption the arrangement might continue to operate for an appreciable length of time after it had been found that it was otherwise a contravention of the act. I would think it would be much preferable to keep the period reasonably close; then, if from time to time it is found that it is necessary to postpone the expiry of the exemption period, that can be done.

I might point out to my hon. friend from Skeena by way of, shall I say, compensation for any disappointment he might feel in not having his amendment accepted that any such further postponement would give him the opportunity to discuss the matter again every time. Thus, it is not an unmixed blessing so far as he is concerned.

Mr. Howard: I did not know you would invite me to take part in the discussion again.

Mr. Fulton: The reason I do not like to see it extended for too long a period is that the arrangement might continue to operate for an appreciable length of time after it had been found that it was otherwise a contravention of the act. For these reasons I am not able to accept the extension of the postponement under this section.

Mr. Howard: In so far as the minister's suggestion is concerned, may I say I think that some of his friends on that side of the house would object strenuously to my participating in any debate which might prolong the session.

I do not intend to press the matter to a vote because of what the minister has said, and I think it can be taken as a solemn guarantee to everyone concerned that if circumstances are such at a subsequent session that it is necessary to extend the precaution for an additional period of time, this will be done until the matter is cleared up.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, I will confirm that understanding, Mr. Chairman.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 5—Counsel.

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair has an amendment of the hon. member for Ottawa West.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, it was agreed that we would allow this clause to stand and that I would review the remarks and suggestion of the hon. member for Ottawa West in the light of what I had said and would then attempt to produce an amendment which reconciled the points of view. Accordingly, I have one which I would be glad to ask my colleague the Minister of Labour to move. I think the hon. member for Ottawa West has been provided with a copy. I will send one over now if he has not one.

Mr. McIlraith: Before the amendment is moved perhaps I should withdraw the amendment I had offered.

The Deputy Chairman: Will the committee give unanimous consent to the hon. member for Ottawa West to withdraw his amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. Starr: I move:

That lines 3 to 5 on page 3 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

[Mr. Fulton.]

13. Whenever in the opinion of the commission or the director the public interest so requires, the commission or the director may apply to the minister to appoint and instruct counsel to assist in an inquiry and upon such application the minister may appoint and instruct counsel accordingly.

The Deputy Chairman: The committee has heard the amendment.

Mr. McIlraith: I just wish to indicate that this fully and clearly expresses the views that I was seeking to embody in the amendment I moved.

Mr. Fulton: I do not wish to appear to obstruct my own amendment, but I notice now it seems to have reference to the original bill and I am just wondering, to avoid misunderstanding, whether we are working on the reprinted bill or—

The Deputy Chairman: We are working on the original bill.

Mr. Fulton: Then it is alright.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the committee revert to clause 9.

On clause 9—Findings to be included in report.

Mr. Howard: I understand this clause was held over to make sure that it would not conflict with the possibility of one or more amendments being accepted to section 32 but, in as much as none was accepted, perhaps we might deal with this in a formal way. The minister introduced, or there was introduced on his behalf by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond, an amendment to section 32, notably to subsections 4 and 5, which deal with the export trade question. I am not advancing this favoured point of view because I do not think the clause before us now, namely clause 9, commends itself to our acceptance, in any event. There is a specific reference to findings in the clause and authority is to be given to the commission so that it shall include—and I am reading now from the top of page 4:

—a finding whether or not the conspiracy, combination, agreement or arrangement relates only to one or more of the matters specified in subsection (2) of section 32 and, if so, shall include a finding whether or not the conspiracy, combination, agreement or arrangement, has lessened or is likely to lessen competition unduly in respect of one of the matters specified in paragraphs (a) to (d) of subsection (3) of section 32,—

And so on. If it is desirable to give the commission authority to make findings with respect to subsection 2 and subsection 3 of section 32, would it not also be correct for the minister to give the commission authority to make a finding with respect to subsections 4 and 5 also?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I do not know that a great deal hangs on the suggestion one way or the other, but I have a reluctance to accept it because I would point out that the amendment with respect to export arrangements, it seems to me, is quite distinguishable and proceeds on an entirely different basis from the amendment in the earlier portion of section 32 relating to arrangements in the domestic field. I suggest to my hon. friends that this present clause does not have the implications that they read into it. There was nothing intended by way of creation of the principle or the insertion of the principle of specific detriment. Its intent was to be by way of guidance to the minister as to the proper course to be followed in applying the remedies; that is all. Therefore, I do not want to enter into a great controversy about it, as though a great deal hung on it because not a great deal does hang on it.

We would have to make a fairly lengthy and complicated amendment to meet the suggestion of my hon. friend with regard to the new proposed subsections 4 and 5 of section 32, and since I think the amendment with regard to export trade is clearly distinguishable from the amendment regarding domestic situations I regret that I have to say I do not see any necessity for an amendment and would therefore have to oppose the suggestion.

Mr. Pickersgill: On this particular point I think I must say that on balance I would agree with the minister.

Clause agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: We will now go to clause 13, section 32.

On clause 13, section 32—Conspiracy.

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair has an amendment moved by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, we have had an opportunity at least to spend another half hour looking at the amendment during the supper hour, and on balance I think our position is substantially the same as was expressed in the committee. While we have the greatest concern possible for the economic position of Canada, the need that exists to participate more fully and completely in export markets and the need to be even more and more on the alert to protect ourselves against the economic assault already started by the Soviet union, we feel that our combines legislation is not the place to deal with this sort of thing.

I think I might perhaps disagree with some of the suggestions made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and the Minister of Justice, but as was pointed out with respect to subsections 2 and 3 of section 32 it is very easy for an agreement relating to one sort of thing to spill over into something else. I might say here that the economists who appeared before the committee were divided in their opinion on this matter. Some felt it was desirable to deal with it this way and others felt it was not.

I subscribe to the point of view that it is not desirable to amend the combines law to deal with this problem because of the possibility of a slopping over of a conspiracy to fix uniform prices for the export market into the domestic market. When Mr. Hyland, who represented the fisheries council of Canada, appeared before the committee he gave some evidence in this regard. While it relates to an individual group of people in the fishing industry, nevertheless I think it has some bearing on this situation. His evidence is found on page 273 of the proceedings of the committee and starts about half way down the page. Mr. Hyland is answering a question posed to him by the hon. member for Port Arthur and while it has to do with a regulatory trade commission perhaps I should read the whole thing. The passage reads as follows:

> Mr. Fisher: If you have a regulatory trade commission, with some kind of expert knowledge in the development of a background and a history, they might be in a position to make that judgment, might they not? They are doing it in other parts of the act.
> Mr. Hyland: One thing of which I am always very much aware, as an individual responsible for the sale of a lot of fish, is that we are not selling anything that anybody has to have. It is well known that the per capita consumption of fishery products in Canada is in the realm of 13 or 14 pounds a year, whereas meat and poultry is more like 150 pounds. And of that 13 or 14 pounds canned salmon is about 2½ pounds. There are many people who do not eat it at all.
> Therefore, we recognize that we have to have a price which will sell the product, and where there is the most public benefit involved, if we are to have a healthy industry. We are recognizing the realities of our export marketing, and we are selling the production. We cannot sell it all in Canada. If we encounter a strong market situation in the export field and we get as much as we can for our product—we have people who have no interest whatever in the Canadian market, who do not service the Canadian market, and if they can get $40 a case for sockeye from Great Britain they are not going to sell it to anybody in Canada for $35.
> Mr. Fisher: In other words, there is a very close relationship between the world price and the domestic price?
> Mr. Hyland: There cannot help but be.
> Mr. Fisher: But the world price tends to be set by the export price as long as there is any kind of export market?
> Mr. Hyland: Yes, as long as the export price is strong it will bring it up.

I have read extensively so I would not be accused of selecting only one or two comments out of the passage. There is a very close connection between the export price and the domestic price and this slopping over or osmosis as I believe one of the economists called it, is something that happens almost unconsciously. So far as export markets are concerned, these people are primarily interested in the selling price of the product. They are not concerned about distribution or anything else. We are allowing them to conspire to set a uniform price on the export market so they will be able to compete with other countries' prices or be able to get the highest possible price. In our view this price conspiracy so far as export trade is concerned can very easily spill over into the domestic market.

As I say, we are sure it is necessary to take steps to deal with the export trade question. It is the very lifeblood of British Columbia. Fisheries products were referred to a moment ago. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond went extensively into the question of the lumbering industry and how dependent we are on the export market. We also export minerals, pulp and paper and a number of other things too numerous to mention. It is necessary for us to engage actively in the export field. We merely say that this is not the place to legislate in that regard. We think it should be no part of our combines legislation but rather that other arrangements should be made to promote and enhance our export markets through state organizations or by means of assistance or guidance. For this reason we are opposed to the amendment before us at the moment.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the minister replies I should like to say a word or two. Having supported the hon. member for Skeena in his desire for additional time to look at the amendment, I have looked at it again and the more I look at it the more I am satisfied that paragraph (d) of the proposed subsection 5 does really safeguard the position about which the hon. member is genuinely and properly worried, namely that some kind of combination in the export field, which need not necessarily be a combination for uniform prices, is likely to result in a similar combination in the domestic field. It seems to me it is quite clear that if it does there is no defence under this amendment if it can be properly applied because it says that subsection 4 does not apply if the conspiracy combination, agreement or arrangement has lessened or is likely to lessen competition unduly in relation to an article in the domestic market. For that reason, I warmly support the amendment. Indeed, I thank the government for accepting our suggestion that they should deal with this matter this year instead of waiting for another year.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few remarks in connection with the export market, particularly in relation to the amendment which has been introduced. I think the first thing I should say, in reply to the hon. member for Skeena with reference to the price arrangement made by the fisheries council and the lumber industry, is that in essence the arrangement they tried to make with regard to their export market was to try to set as low a price as it was possible for them to set and still make a reasonable profit. I think there is a great deal of difference between the arrangements that these exporters have outlined in their brief and the arrangements that we normally consider as detrimental under price fixing legislation. As I understand the proposition that is made by the fisheries council, and I want to read some extracts from the brief they submitted, it is made to meet competition in the export market for canned salmon. They found that they were competing against persons who had either state control price-fixing systems or some cartel arrangement within the country which fixed export prices.

As I recall it, each year different groups of the fisheries industry were called upon by importers from other countries who asked what the price of canned salmon would be that year, that is, what the Canadian price would be. They must set the lowest price possible in order to get into the export market. I think to that extent there is a difference between what we are normally concerned with in price-fixing arrangements, and these arrangements, because under normal price-fixing arrangements the price is a little higher than one would normally expect. I feel that in this case it is more a situation in which Canadian exporters as a whole agree on a price they can follow in the export market, and this does not mean basically a combine.

I should like to read a passage from the brief of the fisheries council of Canada which was presented to the committee on June 22 of this year. It reads as follows:

> Both the fisheries council of Canada and the fisheries association of B.C. strongly support the recommendation of other important export industries that the realities of competitive export marketing should be recognized in Bill C-58. If it is necessary or desirable for Canadian export industries to reach group decisions and policies covering export marketing, such activities should be clearly exempted from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act.
> Canada is an important fishing nation and the catching, processing and marketing of our various species of fish contributes importantly to the economic life of many Canadian communities. In many areas it is the predominant source of revenue.

An important feature of this great national industry is that approximately two-thirds of its annual production is exported to markets outside of Canada. The fisheries of British Columbia, with which I am most familiar, provide no exception to this national pattern. Since the inception of the canned salmon industry in British Columbia in 1870 the industry has always depended on export marketing to absorb 50 per cent or more of its annual production. Up until the outbreak of world war II between 60 and 65 per cent of each year's pack was sold in export markets.

Farther along in the brief, it is pointed out, as I have previously mentioned:

For several reasons our industry has found that an industry approach to export marketing rather than an individual canner approach has enabled the canned salmon industry to compete successfully in export markets with the other canned salmon producing nations. I would enumerate these important reasons as follows:

(1) Canned salmon enjoys sufficient demand in the major markets of the world to qualify as a commodity of world trade and to have a world market price based on world supply and demand.

(2) Canada is one of four countries of supply, the other three being Japan, U.S.A. and Russia. The production of these countries in most instances has an equal or greater influence on world price structure than the Canadian production. The Japanese suppliers are organized into an effective export cartel. There is a "one desk" sales organization—

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Aiken: Yes.

Mr. McIlraith: Can he give us the page reference to the committee evidence from which he is reading?

Mr. Aiken: I am reading directly from the brief which was presented to the committee on June 22. What I am reading from the brief has been copied into the committee report at the bottom of page 266.

Mr. McIlraith: I think, in all fairness, I should point out that the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka is following precisely the practice to which the minister objected earlier.

Mr. Fulton: What minister?

Mr. McIlraith: The Minister of Justice objected to the reading from committee evidence at length.

Mr. Fulton: No, I pointed out when I was accused of having selected certain passages, that hon. members opposite had placed so much of the committee evidence on the record I could hardly be accused of being selective.

Mr. Howard: You mean one hon. member.

Mr. Aiken: In order to satisfy the technical point raised by the hon. member for Ottawa West, I would be glad to continue my reading from the committee evidence at page 266. When I was interrupted, I believe I was quoting from paragraph 2.

There is a "one desk" sales organization and prices are set to secure for Japan the share of total world demand which is required to move the annual pack. As there is virtually no domestic market for Japanese salmon it is nearly all destined for export markets. Russian canned salmon prices are named by a state trading agency.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I should like to go on with the reading of the brief. I have these passages marked in the original brief, and I will try to find them in the committee evidence. The next section I should like to read is at the top of page 268 of the committee evidence, and reads:

I believe that the practice of the canned salmon industry in making important decisions on export marketing on a group basis has been fully justified by the results achieved. The record of the British Columbia salmon canners in the competitive field of export marketing has stood the test of experience. Under very difficult circumstances, access to important markets has been retained or expanded. Industry planning has never lost sight of the fact that the availability of export markets is of great importance to the industry. Consequently, today, Canadian canned salmon enjoys as secure a position in world trade as at any time in the history of the industry. It is my sincere conviction that such a position is very much in the national interest.

Then I should like just to quote the evidence from the fisheries council. At the bottom of page 268, in summarizing, they say this:

It is my sincere conviction that it would be a serious error to handicap Canadian exporters by imposing restrictions on their marketing activities, the successful prosecution of which is so important to all Canadians.

I think all of us in the committee were impressed with the evidence by the fisheries council of Canada. Following the presentation of the brief there was a good deal of questioning as to the effect which the export market limitations would have on domestic markets. The fisheries council brief was followed on the same day by the brief of the council of forest industries of British Columbia. Here again, Mr. Chairman, as I have marked the original brief I will just try to find the evidence given in the committee. I cannot find it at the moment but I have the place marked in the original brief presented by the council of forest industries of British Columbia in their comments on the export trade.

During the three years that have elapsed since the present government took office, the Right Hon. the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Transport and other ministers have stressed on numerous occasions the desirability and necessity for action leading to or directed towards the improvement of Canada's export trade and correcting the deficit in such trade. The major export industries in British Columbia, of which the forest industry is the most important, are concerned over the fact that the freedom of action which they consider necessary to enable them to compete successfully in world markets will be threatened unless something is done in the new combines legislation to reassure businesses engaged primarily in the production of goods for export.

These two briefs were discussed in the committee. After the brief had been submitted and when the bill was being discussed section by section, certain comments were made by members of the committee. First, I should say that the amendment which is before us probably does not go as far as the industry would like it to go. However it recognizes the fact that the people in the export industry have a problem and that the government is facing that problem and giving some recognition of the difficulties which they face. They have to meet competition and they have to meet it effectively if Canada is going to stay in the export market. In committee an amendment was moved by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I think it should be pointed out that while there was a considerable amount of discussion among other members present, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate produced first an amendment which was not passed but this is the way in which it read. I should like hon. members to note the rather vague language in which it is phrased. Although the intent was good, the committee did not feel at that time that it carried out what was wanted. The hon. member would have made an amendment something like this:

In determining whether any offence under section 32 or 33 has been or is being committed, the court shall not find the accused guilty if it is of the opinion that the offence charged relates mainly to the export trade and the development of Canada's market outside Canada and that the offence charged does not otherwise contravene the provisions—of the act, as it affects domestic markets within Canada.

I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but I am reading the wrong reference.

An hon. Member: Take it as read.

Mr. Aiken: The amendment made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is found at page 748 and reads:

(2) In determining whether any offence under section 32 or 33 has been or is being committed, the court shall consider the best utilization of Canadian resources to meet the requirements of the export trade and the development of markets outside Canada.

We felt that the phrase "the best utilization of Canadian resources" would be one which would be virtually impossible for any court to interpret. The court itself would be obliged to try to determine exactly what was meant and we felt—or certainly I did so—that it was the place of the legislature to set this out in detail.

Then I made a suggestion as to the amendment of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate which I read in error a few minutes ago and I will not read it again. The minister at that time undertook with the committee that while he could not accept either the amendment moved by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate or the proposal I made in substitution, that he would take them under consideration.

I feel that the amendment which has now been produced is one which will have the effect that the committee wanted and I think that hon. members should be entirely in agreement with the wording which the minister has now proposed.

Mr. Morton: I know that hon. members of the committee are very anxious to complete this bill—

Mr. McIlraith: Except the government.

Mr. Morton: —now that we are so near the end. In view of the fact that the hon. member for Skeena rather dismissed the argument in favour of improving our export trade as somewhat emotional, especially after the plea of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, I thought it would be better to put on the record, as quoted in the committee, the actual methods of competition which are expected from the trade in order to show that far from being an emotional problem, it is a realistic problem. I should like to quote from the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the standing committee on banking and commerce at page 267, at which Mr. J. N. Hyland, during his outline of the brief, quoted a letter which had come into his hands addressed to some of the competitors. It is a letter from a Japanese trading company dated July 2, 1959. The heading is "Cartels unofficial announcement of opening prices for 1959 pack Japanese salmon".

At a meeting held today of canned salmon exporters, Japan Canned Salmon Sales Company (The "Cartel") has made unofficial announcement of the opening prices for 1959 pack Japanese canned salmon as per a list enclosed herewith.

Please understand that the above announcement is not official and the new prices are still subject to slight alteration depending upon the opening prices to be fixed by Canadian and U.S.A. salmon industries. Nevertheless we have every reason to believe that at least the first sale to U.K. as well as to other markets such as Australia, Belgium, Holland, etc. will be made at these prices—probably from mid-July through August.

Please take note also that we are not allowed to make firm offers pending the final official decision of sales scheme by the cartel, expected within a few weeks. As soon as we are in a position to make offers, we will communicate with you

In other words, these gentlemen wait until the Canadian companies determine their prices, and then they sell.

Then, on page 293 of the proceedings of the committee on banking and commerce is set out the methods by which the Russians deal in the lumber industry. Mr. Nicholson giving evidence before the committee had this to say on that subject:

> Prior to the war, and in fact up until 1954, Canada was Britain's leading supplier of soft wood products—lumber, shingles, and material of that kind. That is, as late as 1954 it was the leading supplier. By 1957 Canada's share of the United Kingdom imports had dropped to 14.7 per cent and Canada's position was that of fourth place supplier of products to the building industry in Britain. We had been replaced successfully by Sweden, Finland and Russia. During this period when the Canadian sales were dropping off, the Soviet of Russia had increased her sales from one-tenth to one-fifth of the total of the United Kingdom's soft wood importation. In the case of the Swedish and Finnish importers they were trading at a profit. Their objective was to make a profit, but their operating costs were lower because wages were lower. That was not so in the case of Russia, when they came in and took that market. I am reliably informed by an official of the Department of Trade and Commerce—this can be checked by reference to the minister or other officials of that department—that the Russian technique in invading the British market is that they will come in with a particular type of lumber which is in demand and, even though the lumber may be needed at home in Russia, they will quote to supply the whole demand at a price that is better than the Canadian price for a particular kind of lumber. It is even better than the Swedish and Finnish prices in some cases. Then if you repeat the order they will give you a further reduction. That is not done by any cartel. That is done by a government trade agency.

Now we see the two methods of competition we are up against in our export trade and we are caught between our desire to protect the Canadian consumer from monopolies which may work within Canada and our desire to give our manufacturers full freedom to compete in the export trade which is so essential to the growth of our country. It is becoming increasingly apparent that something must be done to promote the ability of our companies to compete on international markets.

The hon. member for Skeena has said it is not a matter to be dealt with in this bill. Perhaps that is so. It is a matter which could perhaps be dealt with by other methods but this bill should not be used so as to hamper their task of exporting goods to all parts of the world. Therefore I believe that for the good of this country, without lessening the protection we have provided to our consumers, we should give all the help we can to those companies which export goods abroad. Perhaps another bill to this end might help in this direction.

Mr. Pickersgill: Are we to have this parliament turned into a farce at a time when we are being asked to work 56 hours a week?

The Chairman: Does the hon. member rise on a point of order?

Mr. Pearson: I have just one observation to make, and I should like to address my remarks to the minister. In view of the fact that the government has moved this amendment, that it has been accepted by the opposition and that the C.C.F. has made its position known, does the minister not think that we might now pass this bill through committee so that the house might tonight consider a resolution designed to improve the situation of old age pensioners?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pearson: How can the minister explain this filibuster against this bill which is being conducted by his colleagues.

Mr. Fulton: I assume I can answer the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition.

The Chairman: I would think that the only way the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition would be in order would be if the hon. gentleman had risen on a point of order. I must say I cannot find that his remarks are relevant to the amendment before the committee.

Mr. Fulton: I suppose they would have been in order if the Leader of the Opposition had put his question in another form—if he had asked, perhaps, when we expected that the committee stage might be concluded and whether we would ask for third reading of the bill tonight, and that sort of thing. That would have been quite in order, and I take it that is what he had in mind. I should like to answer him by saying that I thought when one or two members had concluded their observations on this amendment and on the question of Canadian export trade I might then make a comment or two in reply and express regret that the C.C.F. party had not been able to accept the amendment.

I do not know why it should be suggested by the Leader of the Opposition that there is no right of speech to be enjoyed by government supporters. It is really a very extraordinary suggestion. I think it is proper for me to observe that government members, by and large, have been very restrained in this committee, both yesterday and today, in the use they have made of their right to speak, especially in the light of the extraordinary and unreasonable strictures that the opposition have expressed with regard to this bill. Our members have shown a remarkable restraint and now, on one of the most important subjects dealt with in this measure, the amendment dealing with the export industry, when our members open their mouths what do we find? The opposition is still trying to apply closure and suggesting that a private member, just because he happens to be sitting on the government side, has no right to speak. That, of course, is not the way that this government believes in operating parliament.

Mr. Pearson: We know what you are doing —sound and fury.

Mr. Fulton: If my friend will restrain his impatience and remember the proper parliamentary practice he will find that our hon. members will be mindful of the desirability of disposing of this matter. But on the other hand they have every right to take the few moments available to them now to express themselves on this important subject. I do not think it is very seeming to suggest that they be choked off.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, it surely is open to any hon. member to question why a particular procedure is being followed at a particular time.

Mr. Pallett: Come off that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is apparent that in the last while we have had speeches designed only for one purpose.

Mr. Kucherepa: The hon. member is imputing motives and he cannot do that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hon. members are eager to ensure that we do not state that purpose.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, may I remind the hon. member of the rule against attributing motives.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am trying to help the minister in his purpose.

Mr. Fulton: I am trying to help you in preserving order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If hon. gentlemen have decided to contribute to the merits of the particular discussion, of course, there can be no quarrel.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Are you?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But every hon. member, including the Minister of Justice, who has spoken in the last three quarters of an hour has associated his remarks with meaningful smiles indicating how proud he is at the success of the obstruction in which they are indulging.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There we are. Mr. Chairman, it is surely open to the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman,—

The Chairman: Order. I am endeavouring to ascertain if the hon. member for Essex East is speaking to the point of order.

Mr. Legere: He is engaging in a diatribe.

The Chairman: If the hon. member for Essex East is speaking to the point of order I must listen to him before listening to the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, as I indicated at the outset I am seeking to deal with the point of order that was raised by the hon. member who has just taken his seat.

Mr. Drysdale: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am speaking to a point of order.

Mr. Speakman: Make your point.

The Chairman: I must ask the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond to resume his seat because I cannot listen to more than one point of order. The hon. member for Essex East has the floor.

Mr. Woolliams: Let us make it a genuine one.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. The point of order is that hon. gentlemen are engaging in a consideration of this matter for only one purpose and that is, as the Leader of the Opposition said, to prevent a discussion—

Mr. Kucherepa: The hon. member should know better.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —of a measure to improve the situation affecting our senior citizens, to prevent a discussion of old age pensions. That is clear. This is the worst filibuster of the session.

The Chairman: Order. I cannot say that the remarks of the hon. member for Essex East or those which preceded them are in order because it is not in order for an hon. gentleman to impute motives to any other hon. gentleman who speaks in this chamber.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Speakman: That is what he did.

The Chairman: If the committee is willing to resume the discussion on the amendment perhaps we could proceed. I recognize the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

Mr. Aiken: I have a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. I am one of the hon. members who spoke in the last 45 minutes. The hon. member for Essex East has said that I made my speech insincerely with a smirk on my face, or used some such words, and that I rose only to waste time.

Mr. Fulton: Not only are we not allowed to speak but we are not allowed to smile now.

Mr. Aiken: I have sat in this chamber for over three years now, and I have never stood on my feet to make any speech that was not sincere since I arrived here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Aiken: I have a very great interest in the export market. This question came up in the committee. I also spoke on it yesterday and felt I should address myself to it again today. Although I was interrupted by the hon. member for Ottawa West on a question of privilege I nevertheless took 25 minutes. If the hon. member for Essex East thinks I was insincere I should simply like to tell him that I was not and if there is any question of insincerity I think the hon. gentleman should consider his own position.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I did not say that the hon. gentleman—

Some hon. Members: Yes, you did.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I did not say that the hon. gentleman was insincere. If he is now telling us that he was I can only tell him that I never doubted it. I have no hesitation in saying, however, that that sincerity accompanied his reading of minutes of the committee that had nothing to do with argument.

Mr. Kucherepa: The hon. member for Hull read for hours the other day. What malarkey. Read Hansard.

Mr. Morton: Mr. Chairman, I wish to associate myself with the remarks made by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka in raising a question of privilege concerning what was said by the hon. member for Essex East. This is not the first time that the hon. member has imputed such motives to members on the government side. Just because hon. members on this side exercise their right to speak the hon. member for Essex East—

The Chairman: Order. I thought the hon. gentleman was rising on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: He is.

The Chairman: I would ask the hon. member to state immediately what are the words to which he objects.

Mr. Morton: Mr. Chairman, I said that I associate myself with the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka in speaking in respect to the reflections cast upon us by the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Drysdale: He is smiling now. Look at him.

Mr. Starr: Look at the hon. member for Essex East laughing.

Mr. Morton: This is not the first time the hon. member has cast such reflections nor is it the first time I have had to rise in this chamber on a question of privilege with respect to the reflections he cast. I feel as does the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka that it is both unfair and unparliamentary for this experienced parliamentarian to take advantage of those of us who have not been in this chamber very long in trying to cast these reflections upon us simply because we exercise our right to speak which is one of the purposes for which we were elected.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, no one on this side desires to reflect in any way on the sincerity of the two hon. gentlemen and the smiles which were mentioned as being displayed on their faces was merely an indication of their intense interest in our export trade.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. Since I was one of those who spoke in the last three quarters of an hour I want to inquire of the hon. member for Essex East if he included me in his reference.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, Mr. Chairman, I was not looking toward the hon. gentleman. My eyes were directed westward.

Mr. Woolliams: Which eye?

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Chairman, I hope my remarks will not be considered irrelevant. I merely wish to speak to the amendment. I should point out to the committee that I rose and then the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate arose and in deference to that hon. gentleman's seniority and experience I resumed my seat. As a result of that I have been unable to make my contribution to the debate until this time.

Allegations were made by members of the opposition, who in my opinion spent a considerable time this year on irrelevant discussions, and they seem to take objection when hon. members on the government side rise to set forth their points of view. I spoke once this afternoon, and I was prompted to rise at this particular time because the hon. member for Skeena alleged in his statements that the Combines Investigation Act was not a suitable place in which to include this particular amendment.

I have done a great deal of study on the particular matter concerning exports. I feel very strongly about it; I feel that this amendment is a tremendous contribution toward the economic policy of Canada and toward keeping Canada one of the world's first export nations. Because of the remarks made by the hon. member for Skeena I feel it is important to set the record straight. Unfortunately my hon. friends in the opposition seem to feel that if there is anything said that is critical of the attitude taken by them then closure should be applied and we are not entitled to set forth our points of view and refute the statements that have been made.

I rose because the hon. member for Skeena made this particular allegation, and when I was contemplating the question of exports I thought it should be clear to the committee that the problem was raised with regard to the inquiry into the fish industry. I think the difficulty with regard to exports and the very reasonable difficulty in the minds of most people in the fisheries, forestry and other industries, who presented their briefs before the committee, was in the reference made by the combines director, and this is found on page 311 of the banking and commerce committee report. I have the summary here, which is referred to, and this is what it says:

> It is my further allegation that during the period from August 1954 to June 1956 the following were parties to agreements or arrangements relating to the export market which had the effect of enhancing prices or otherwise preventing or lessening competition in the production, supply and sale of Canadian salmon for the domestic market to the detriment, or against the interest of the public, and during the same period agreed or arranged to prevent or lessen unduly competition in such products.

This was the particular matter which brought forth the doubts as to the question of the export trade. Up until the time this particular statement had been made it was the opinion of the majority of lawyers, generally speaking, that the Combines Investigation Act did not apply to exports. When this allegation was made in the fish inquiry some doubt was cast on the particular situation, and to indicate clearly what the doubt was I think further reference should be made to the committee reports.

Mr. Hyland, who was the director of the fisheries council of Canada, and who testified before the committee, said, as reported at page 269:

> Our industry has been investigated, and we are in receipt of a statement of evidence and allegations from the director of investigations which alleges that our activities in export marketing have had an influence on domestic prices. Therefore, we are in violation of the act. It is for that reason that we are particularly concerned about the question.

Further on, on the same page, Mr. Hyland states:

> It was clearly stated that our activities in export marketing and the fact that we did arrive at common policies, common prices for our export quantities of canned salmon, had the effect of enhancing domestic prices and therefore we were in violation of the act.

On page 278, Mr. Hyland states:

> We are already suspect now. It has been alleged that what we have done in the export field has had a detrimental effect on the Canadian public, and we feel that this is an effective and a successful way of marketing our product, and we do not want to continue doing it under a cloud. Therefore, that is why we are suggesting that the new act should make it clear that activities of this kind are not in contravention of the act.

Mr. Hyland then went on to state further that this pattern of setting prices for the export industry had gone on for the last 60 years. He stated specifically on page 282, and I think it is of some help to the committee that the questions and answers be put on the record:

> Mr. Horner (Acadia): Is there any competition in setting the export price between the four or five large companies or do they all sell at the same price?
> Mr. Hyland: The whole objective of the export fisheries committee is to arrive at uniform export prices.
> Mr. Horner (Acadia): Have you always been able to do it?
> Mr. Hyland: It has been the pattern in the industry in the last 60 years.
> Mr. Macdonnell: No question has been raised?
> Mr. Hyland: No question has been raised.

Mr. Hyland also pointed out at page 284 that the export price tends to influence the domestic price. Among the reasons for the industry approach to the export market rather than by individual canner approach was the reason that it is necessary to enable the canned salmon industry to compete successfully in the export markets with other canned salmon producing nations. Another reason given by Mr. Hyland at page 287 is as follows:

> My experience in the marketing of canned salmon leads to the conclusion that the domestic price of any commodity which is exported in material quantity cannot be isolated from the world price. This is true whether the commodity is fish, lumber, pulp, copper, aluminum or newsprint.

These statements were made by somebody who was involved in the fish inquiries and in summary it was his opinion that the export trade was completely fair. Some doubt arose at the last session and the minister brought in an amendment at that particular time which amended section 23 of the act to provide for negotiations between the fisheries associations and the fishermen, but there is no provision made in this particular section. Perhaps it might have been an oversight, but no mention is made in this particular section about maintaining the status quo with regard to fishing companies which were engaged in the export trade.

As Mr. Hyland stated, they have carried on this practice for the last 60 years and they carried it on in good faith. This question was raised by Mr. MacDonald, the combines director, and I think quite rightly under the circumstances and under the present legislation. Nevertheless a doubt was raised as to the status of those particular companies with respect to their dealings in the export industry and I feel that the companies and the people who appeared before us wanted to have it perfectly clear that what they were doing was entirely within the realm of the law.

To emphasize the position I think reference should be made particularly to the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Howard Smith Paper Mills Limited v. the Queen, 1957 Supreme Court Reports at page 403. I should like to refer particularly to the statement of Mr. Justice Taschereau at page 406. Incidentally, I might mention that this is the latest supreme court case dealing with this matter, or it is the case that comes closest to this particular matter because, as was said earlier in the committee, there never has been any case dealing specifically with the export market. But I feel that the principles enunciated in this particular case would apply to any company involved in the export trade. Mr. Justice Taschereau is reported as having said at page 406:

> It has been argued on behalf of the appellants that the offence is not complete, unless it has been established by the crown beyond a reasonable doubt, that the agreement was detrimental to the public, in the sense that the manufacture or production was effectively lessened, limited or prevented, as a result of the agreements entered into. It has also been suggested that there is no offence, if it is shown that the acts complained of were beneficial to the public. With these submissions I entirely disagree. Conspiracy is a crime by itself, without the necessity of establishing the carrying out of an overt act. Stephen (Digest of the Criminal Law, 9th ed. 1950, p. 24), basing his opinion on Regina v. Whitchurch, et al. (1), goes as far as saying:
> "When two or more persons agree to commit any crime, they are guilty of a misdemeanour called conspiracy whether the crime is committed or not, and though in the circumstances of the case it would be impossible to commit it."
> The public is entitled to the benefit of free competition, and the prohibitions of the act cannot be evaded by good motives. Whether they be innocent and even commendable, they cannot alter the true character of the combine which the law forbids, and the wish to accomplish desirable purposes constitutes no defence and will not condone the undue restraint, which is the elimination of the free domestic markets.

I feel I should also quote the statement of Mr. Justice Cartwright in the same case at page 426.

> In essence the decisions referred to appear to me to hold that an agreement to prevent or lessen competition in commercial activities of the sort described in the section becomes criminal when the prevention or lessening agreed upon reaches the point at which the participants in the agreement become free to carry on those activities virtually unaffected by the influence of competition, which influence parliament is taken to regard as an indispensable protection of the public interest; that it is the arrogation to the members of the combination of the power to carry on their activities without competition which is rendered unlawful; that the question whether the power so obtained is in fact misused is treated as irrelevant; and that the court, except I suppose on the question of sentence, is neither required nor permitted to inquire whether in the particular case the intended and actual results of the agreement have in fact benefited or harmed the public.
> In other words, once it is established that there is an agreement to carry the prevention or lessening of competition to the point mentioned, injury to the public interest is conclusively presumed, and the parties to the agreement are liable to be convicted of the offence described in section 498 (1) (d). The relevant question thus becomes the extent to which the prevention and limitation of competition are agreed to be carried and not the economic effect of the carrying out of the agreement. In each case which arises under the section the question whether the point described has been reached becomes one of fact.

I would suggest that if Mr. Hyland's evidence before the banking and commerce committee is read in conjunction with the statements in the Howard Smith case we will see that Mr. Hyland has raised a reasonable doubt whether the particular companies are in violation of the present Combines Investigation Act. In my opinion the amendment brought forward by myself, based on technical advice from the minister and his assistants, has the effect of clarifying the situation and, as the minister said earlier in introducing the bill, one of the prime objects was to clarify this particular situation.

The evidence given by Mr. Hyland was reinforced by the evidence given by Mr. Nicholson on behalf of the forest people.

I believe that the contention made by the hon. member for Skeena that the Combines Investigation Act is not a suitable place for this amendment is completely erroneous. I have put this information on the record although a great deal of it was tendered before the committee and, although as a government member I have taken up the time of the committee in speaking on the floor of the house, I hope that hon. members do not object too much because if they will consider the relative amount of time taken in this chamber they will find the time I have taken is negligible. I believe that government members also have a contribution to make and, having put the situation clearly on the record, I think there is every justification for the committee to pass this particular amendment.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the last two, or three—

Mr. McIlraith: Three.

Mr. Howard: —readers, or perhaps I should say speakers, have referred to me and what I said, I think perhaps it is only fitting that I should say a word or two in reply. It is still our contention that this is not the place to deal with this particular problem, and I think there is sufficient evidence to support that view which can be found in the evidence of the witnesses who appeared in support of those with a specific interest in the export trade and who advocated some reference in the act to protect them in respect of their activities in conspiring to fix prices in the export market. Perhaps I might be permitted to read a few short references. I will not do so to the same extent as hon. members who have preceded me.

I wish to refer to the evidence of Mr. Hyland as found on pages 282 and 283 of the proceedings of the committee, No. 4. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond made some reference to questions found on this page and I should like to carry on. The witness was being questioned by the hon. member for Acadia. Incidentally, the hon. member for Acadia had been asking Mr. Hyland certain questions about the functions of the fisheries association, how it operated and what relationship there was between its arrangements with respect to export prices and its arrangements, if any, as to domestic prices. The passage reads as follows:

Mr. Horner (Acadia): How do these same companies arrive at a price for the Canadian market?

Mr. Hyland: I do not know whether or not I am in a position to discuss this. Certain allegations have been made against the industry in that regard. Mr. Macdonnell, of course, is very aware of them.

While the use of the name "Macdonnell" would indicate that Mr. Hyland was referring to one of the members of the house, I think he was perhaps referring to Mr. MacDonald, the director of research and investigation.

Mr. Drysdale: No, that is right.

Mr. Howard: The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond says "That is right". What does he mean?

Mr. Drysdale: I believe he was referring to the hon. member for Greenwood.

[Mr. Drysdale.]

Mr. Howard: That may well be. I continue:

The Acting Chairman: Is it under investigation now?

Mr. Hyland: It is not under investigation, but we are still awaiting the outcome of hearings.

The Acting Chairman: Perhaps under those circumstances the witness should not be asked to make any statement.

However, this theme was developed regardless of whether Mr. Hyland wished to make any statement. In any event, at an earlier stage of the proceedings, to which I will make reference, Mr. Hyland did mention the close relationship between the export price and the domestic price: I continue:

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I am not going to try to draw out information which may be detrimental to you in any investigation. I just wondered if it would not have an effect if they knew at what price company "A" was going to sell its product overseas. They would know for what company "A" sold its product on the Canadian market, and that would pretty well narrow it down. They could say that company "A" would sell its product within two or three cents of such and such.

Mr. Hyland: Since 1953 I believe we have successfully divorced those two areas of marketing, domestic and export. What the individual companies do in the domestic field is their own prerogative and there is no exchange of information or opinion in that area.

Perhaps it is quite true there is no exchange of information or opinion in the domestic area. I submit there does not have to be. The exchange of information has already taken place with respect to the export field. That is where the exchange of prices, statistics and so on takes place for the purpose of establishing a uniform price for the sale of any particular pack of salmon. However, as found on page 267, Mr. Hyland was then presenting his formal brief. He had read the letter from the Japan Canned Salmon Sales Company known as the cartel and was dealing with important reasons why there should be an industry approach to export marketing. He went on to say:

My experience in the marketing of canned salmon leads to the conclusion that the domestic price of any commodity which is exported in material quantity cannot be isolated from the world price. This is true whether the commodity is fish, lumber, pulp, copper, aluminum or newsprint. In this connection it should be emphasized that the factors of world supply and demand can work to reduce domestic prices as well as increase them.

Then he goes on to give examples which occurred in the period 1947 to 1953 when the domestic prices of canned salmon increased a certain percentage as compared with the increase in the combined food commodities index. The point here is that on the one hand Mr. Hyland says they have successfully divorced the relationship between the conspiracy in the export market concerning the prices at which they sell and the prices at which they sell on the domestic market; that they do not exchange statistics in so far as the domestic market is concerned. I submit it is not necessary for them to exchange information as to what the price is on the export market because Mr. Hyland himself said, in his initial brief, that the domestic price of any commodity cannot be isolated from the world price.

I would point out that any brief is usually well prepared and well thought out in order to get the exact point of view across. We should, therefore, place a little more importance on what is said in the brief than what is said in answer to a question when the answer is given, so to speak, off the cuff. I think this brief carries more weight and should have a little more attention paid to it than the off the cuff answer. I am not saying Mr. Hyland would have given any different answer to the hon. member if he had sat down and prepared it sometime in advance. However, on the one hand he says, we have divorced the relationship, there is no connection, we do not exchange prices in the domestic field and we have not done so since 1953; we only do this in connection with the export market, which is isolated.

On the other hand, he says that his experience in marketing canned salmon leads him to the conclusion that the domestic prices of any commodity which is exported in material quantity cannot be isolated from world prices. I say that they had engaged in an arrangement to establish the selling price for the export market and this price is influenced by factors outside of Canada, influenced by the volume of the pack in other countries, influenced by the demand that exists or is built up by importing nations, influenced by the desires of the other nations, such as the Soviet union. There are a number of factors that influence export prices.

In any event, the desire of the fisheries association has been for many, many years, and apparently still is, to arrange or agree on export prices. By his own admission Mr. Hyland makes it clear that the domestic prices can be influenced by these prices. There is this question of osmosis, as I think Dr. Skeoch called it, the spilling over of the results of agreements in the export field into the domestic field. Naturally there is no need to exchange statistics in the domestic field because by Mr. Hyland's own admission the domestic price is established by the export price. I submit that if we give legislative sanction, as this amendment proposes to do, to this practice, namely that in a prosecution under subsection 1 the court shall not convict the accused if the conspiracy, combination, agreement or arrangement relates only to the export of articles from Canada we will be, by the admission of Mr. Hyland, allowing them to conspire to set prices in the domestic field. Then we will have a difficult time attempting to discover this sort of thing.

This, incidentally, is one of the reasons why I say this provision should not be part of the arrangements under the Combines Investigation Act, but should have been looked at many months ago by this government, if it had any foresight in these matters, and dealt with in a far better way in different legislation. In any event perhaps the minister could reply to these things, specifically to the reference I made earlier today with regard to whether he feels there is perhaps a conflict between the amendment proposed now and other parts of the bill which have already been passed. Now, the proposed subsection 5 reads:

(5) Subsection 4 does not apply if the conspiracy, combination, agreement or arrangement

(a) has resulted or is likely to result in a reduction or limitation of the volume of exports of an article;

(b) has restrained or injured or is likely to restrain or injure the export business of any domestic competitor who is not a party to the conspiracy, combination, agreement or arrangement;

So far as I can recall I do not believe there is any other reference to volume in the bill. I believe there is a reference to quantity or quality. For instance, there is a reference to quantity or quality in subsection 2 of the very same section that this proposal would amend. I should like to hear from the minister as to whether or not, for the sake of uniformity and clarity, there should not be a deletion of the word "volume" and substitution therefor of the words "quantity or quality". If a case were to go to the courts there would be more certainty in the mind of the court if we were talking about the same thing in each case instead of the words being different.

Then in paragraph (b), to which I have already referred, there is the phrase "domestic competitor". I wonder if the minister does not think that the word "domestic" is redundant. This provision could only have territorial effect.

I should like to have the opinion of the minister also with regard to paragraph (c) which reads:

(c) has restricted or is likely to restrict any person from entering into the business of exporting articles from Canada;

It is the words "from entering into the business" about which I am concerned. I wonder whether there should not be an alteration here, especially in view of the fact that subsection 3, paragraph (d) refers to "entering into or expanding a business in a trade or industry". We are merely providing for the restriction of any person from entering into a business and excluding from consideration the person who is already in business but who is prevented from expanding. I feel that these circumstances should be looked at also.

Then I posed other questions to the minister. I point out that these provisions just affect a combine of companies in Canada and relate to their specific effect on Canadian consumers. Since we are thinking in terms of the export market in which we run up against international cartels, I wonder whether some examination should be made of this aspect of the matter. I understand there was an extensive examination and study made in 1945 under the Department of Labour of the effect of international cartels on Canada, and the relationship of international cartels to the domestic market. This has been the subject also of extensive study under the United Nations and by international conferences, and is an extremely complex subject.

This is something which would require a bit of examination and study because of the variety of effects that can accrue to a nation from the operation of international cartels. These cartels can affect our imports; they can affect our exports, the amount we export and the price at which we export, whether or not the companies are subsidiaries of other companies which are in international cartels.

This is another phase of an extremely broad and complicated problem that I think requires a great deal of examination. However, in this regard I wonder what effect, if any, this proposed amendment would have. Would it allow a relationship between a Canadian company or a conspiracy between a Canadian company and an international cartel owing to the fact that imports into Canada that compete with articles of some of the Canadian companies engaged in this conspiracy are cut off or decreased. What is the fact in that regard? I think this is an important matter.

We are not saying that any one of these companies, if you are talking about the fishing industry, is part of an international cartel. I do not think so. I would think perhaps the aluminum industry is part of an international cartel system on aluminum and allied products. I should like to have these questions answered by the minister before we proceed to consider giving final passage to this bill. Although some of these matters may be considered to be rather minor—that is whether one word should be another word —nevertheless in the long range view, when we are drafting legislation—and this is what we are doing in effect; even though somebody else may have drafted it, still the house must consider it—I think we should give careful consideration in order to ensure that the words contained in that legislation mean as closely as possible, if not precisely, what we want them to mean. While they may be small matters, nevertheless I think they have some importance and should be cleared up.

Mr. Fulton: I think my hon. friend makes the mistake still of attempting to equate a provision dealing with industry in the export trade exactly or precisely with a provision dealing with industry entirely in the domestic market. It is because he makes that mistake, if he does not mind my making the suggestion, that he falls into the error of saying that the words used in this provision should be precisely similar to the words used in the other provision, namely subsections 2 and 3 where they appear earlier in the section.

The problem of export trade is of an entirely different nature from that of companies engaged in domestic business and the same words are therefore not necessarily applicable. To try to use the same words and to make them applicable would be to require us to torture and twist them so that they would fit into situations where they would not fit. For instance, my hon. friend complains because here we use the words "volume of export" instead of "quantity and quality of exports". The reason is obvious. We are concerned here only with the quantity. It would surely be ridiculous to make it an offence for exporters to change the quality of their exports when the requirements of the export market might dictate that they should change the quality of their exports. It is for that precise reason that we have confined it to the word "volume".

With regard to the omission of the word "expanding" in subsection 3 where my hon. friend complains because we have said only "restrict any person from entering into the business" instead of "entering into or expanding the business", may I point out that the problem of expansion has been covered where we think it should be covered, namely in subsection (a) above, where we have provided in general that the benefit of the section is not available if the arrangement has resulted or is likely to result in a reduction or limitation in the volume of exports of an article. It is also covered in part in subsection (b). I think in fact that subsection (b) also clearly covers the complaint that was raised in the circumstances alluded to.

Those are some specific answers to the question asked, but in general the answer is that the situation of the export trade is different from the situation of industry engaged entirely in domestic operations. Therefore the words that are applicable to the one are by no means applicable or suitable in a provision dealing with the other.

Mr. McIlraith: Hon. members on the government side have spoken in rather laudatory terms about the amendment before the committee put forward by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond. I must say that I think the amendment is a sastifactory one. It meets very well the point raised in committee by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. There is every reason to be pleased that this amendment is being included in the bill at this stage.

There are two points to which I wish to address myself particularly tonight. One has to do with the importance of the export trade to this country. In his remarks early this afternoon the minister, in putting forward this amendment or giving notice of it, made a reasoned statement on the subject and rightly emphasized the importance of that subject to Canada. It is particularly timely that we should deal with this subject tonight in view of the Daily Bulletin of the dominion bureau of statistics which has just been delivered and which is dated Monday, July 25, 1960. It is volume 29, No. 142. That Daily Bulletin, under the subheading "Exports in June..." goes on to say as follows:

> Canada's commodity exports to all countries in June were valued at $457,400,000, a decrease of 11.4 per cent from the monthly all-time peak value of $516,300,000 in June last year—

Then a little bit further down it goes on to say this:

> Exports to the United States in June fell to $257,100,000 from $318,800,000 in the corresponding month last year—

That sharp drop in our exports in this past month as compared with those in the corresponding month in the previous year shows the timeliness of any action that can be taken at this time to assist the export industry.

Mr. Pallett: Will the hon. member also read the rest of the report which compares this year's to-date export trade with last year's to-date export trade.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes. I can read the rest of it. It goes on to point out the effect of the cumulative total for the six months and it points out that the figures are up. If the hon. member wishes me to read it, I can do so.

Mr. Pallett: I think it says that there is an 8 per cent increase over last year.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes. I can give the hon. member the precise figure, if he wishes to have it.

Mr. Pallett: It is 8 per cent, is it?

Mr. McIlraith: It is 8.4 per cent.

Mr. Pallett: An 8.4 per cent increase over last year?

Mr. McIlraith: That is right. This decline points up the difficulties there are in this field as well as those difficulties indicated by the minister this afternoon when dealing with the subject, namely the difficulties owing to external forces over which this country has no direct control. I refer, of course, to what appears to be a trade offensive by the U.S.S.R. and the possible trade activity on the part of China. There are other factors in this field which cause grave concern to this country and among them is the whole question of the regrouping of the European countries for trade purposes. The policy of the government with regard to this whole subject of trade has not been one to encourage the confidence of exporters from this country.

There is no doubt that great damage was done to the export industry by the precipitous action of the Prime Minister of Canada in announcing that he was going to divert trade from the United States and then his subsequent denial of this announcement, although it is on record in newspapers right across this country and had been impressed on the minds of television viewers who saw the Prime Minister on television and heard him make that announcement of policy.

Then there was the policy of the government in refusing to find out what the United Kingdom had in mind when they said they were prepared to discuss free trade with Canada at the time plans were being completed for the economic conference. The announcement was made at Mont Tremblay, and the Canadian government has remained strangely silent since with the result that it has not been ascertained just what the British authorities had in mind, whether they meant immediate free trade, free trade in the long term future or whether, in fact, they meant freer trade. In any event, it is to be regretted that the government has refused to find out what the United Kingdom had in mind on the subject and, in consequence, made it impossible for this country to decide whether the effect would be beneficial to us.

Then, of course, we had the unreasoned action of the Minister of Transport in cutting out Canadian shipping to the West Indies at a time when the West Indies were just developing their form of government into a federated body and when there was every indication that trade with that area would increase sharply. It has been obvious from speeches of the Minister of Transport in this chamber that he did not understand the implications of his action on that occasion. It is particularly interesting, for example, that he did not consider what might be the effect on our balance of payments of his action in cutting off shipping in Canadian ships to that area of the world. Clearly, he misunderstood the effect on our export trade to that area.

Mr. MacInnis: Would the hon. member permit a question? Now that the hon. member has had a further word to say on this matter would he indicate whether he disagrees with the remarks of his leader about a filibuster?

Mr. McIlraith: I agree wholly that an extraordinary position was taken by the government tonight. When this amendment was put forward for consideration this afternoon the minister took the position after fully explaining his stand on it, and the import of the amendment, that it should be dealt with then. That was his position at that time. No hon. member opposite rose to speak at that time.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. McIlraith: Then tonight we had the spectacle of hon. members opposite rising in sequence to read excerpts from the committee evidence and later in my remarks I propose to continue that exercise so that hon. members opposite may be thoroughly enlightened as to what that evidence contained.

Since hon. members opposite chose to read excerpts from the evidence without entering into debate on their part, with the possible exception of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond who did include. I think, one sentence, or part of one sentence in his remarks. I may say that the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka in his contribution read from the brief which the witness giving evidence read to the committee; that was the way he did it. I think it is highly desirable that all those hon. members opposite should know just what the evidence is on this subject, and since they are so interested I think it is highly desirable that they should hear more of it. Particularly is it desirable that they should hear that part of the evidence which was given by the Minister of Justice when he explained his reasons for not proceeding with the suggested amendment on export at that time. I therefore propose to read, among other excerpts from the evidence, this passage which will be found at page 694 of the proceedings of the banking and commerce committee near the bottom of the page:

> Mr. Thomas: Mr. Chairman, there were two suggestions made by the British Columbia forest products group. They wanted to have the words "within Canada" placed after the word "unduly" in the bottom line on page 6. That would make it read: or is likely to lessen competition unduly within Canada. This group pointed out that due to the competition in foreign trade, it might be in the national interest for the various corporations producing plywood and other lumber products in Canada to form a combination for the purposes of competing in foreign trade.
> Mr. Fulton: Yes.
> Mr. Thomas: Therefore they thought the words "within Canada" should be placed after the word "unduly".
> Mr. Fulton: Yes, I think their proposal with regard to subclause (3) related also and was ancillary to the proposal for the insertion of another subclause in (2).
> Mr. McIlraith: That is right.
> Mr. Fulton: They submitted that this would have the effect of creating a defence if the agreement related to export trade. That was the effect of it. Their actual submission was that there should be inserted in subclause (2):
> "the allocation of markets and the creation of uniform prices and terms of sale in export trade to better facilitate the competitive position of articles exported from Canada against foreign competition."

The minister went on to say:

> This might be an appropriate place to deal with the questions of the submissions that were made that some amendments should be made to take account of the situation of companies engaged in export trade. We have given careful consideration to that both before and after we received these submissions. In this field of combinations—and I am referring now to section 32—we felt that if there was a real difficulty in holding out any umbrella, the difficulty would be that, in giving them any umbrella at all, you could not isolate the protection that that umbrella gave to the export field alone. I have not yet seen any way in which you can allow them to carry on activities which would otherwise be an illegal combination and say that the effects of that will be isolated in the export field, and that it will not spill over and have an effect on the domestic field. That is the first difficulty which I have seen with respect to putting in such a provision.
> The second reason why we have not felt it appropriate to put in such a provision is that we have a case now before the restrictive trade practices commission, to which reference was made in the submissions, in Vancouver. It is, so far as I know, the first such case in which an inquiry is now under way as a result of allegations having been made with respect to activities which were primarily directed to the export field. I only mention that here because it has already been mentioned and referred to specifically. I refer, of course, to the fisheries case. We do not normally confirm or deny that inquiries are proceeding. We have this case, which is now before the commission, and it would seem to me to be premature for me to be suggesting legislation which is going to have very far reaching effects. As I have said, I was just concerned as to whether I could isolate the export field from the domestic section. I would think it premature to introduce that legislation when such a case is before the commission. And the commission, in its consideration, will, I am sure—and I speak now without consultation with the commission, because I think this is one area where it would be improper for me to consult with them because they are an independent body—I am certain that the commission, in its reviews and reports, will address itself to this very question we are now discussing and that is, whether arrangements having the design of facilitating or improving the position of Canadian companies in export markets can be carried on without having a possibly disadvantageous effect on the consumer in the domestic market. I think the commission will, as I appreciate the terms of the act and responsibilities imposed upon them, have to address its mind also to the public interest and to the question of whether the public interest is better served by allowing such arrangements at all, whether the general interest of Canada is better served by things that facilitate Canadian companies in export fields and, therefore, any detriment there may be in the domestic field may be outweighed by the general advantage of the economy of the country. It seems to me that is one of the things to which the commission must address its attention. In the light of the fact there is now an inquiry before the commission in which these issues are relevant, it would seem to me to be premature for me to be recommending legislation at this time on that subject.

The hon. member for Middlesex West intervened:

Mr. Thomas: There was another suggestion by the metal mining association—

Mr. Fulton: May I just conclude, Mr Thomas?

On that occasion the minister was not as tolerant of the supporters of the government as he is this evening. The minister went on to say:

I think it is premature because I think the situation will be greatly clarified, and the members of the House of Commons as well as the government, in considering what legislation if any, should be introduced and enacted, will be assisted greatly in that task by the report of the commission.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond then interjected:

Mr. Drysdale: In the meantime, would every consideration be given to these people competing in the world export market, provided their competition is such as not to affect the domestic market—because there is no indication, at present, as to when the decision is likely to come down in this case referred to, and it could be a matter of years? I was wondering if consideration could be given, in the meantime, to those who are engaged in this export field.

The hon. member for Greenwood then stated:

Mr. Macdonnell: Consideration has been given to them for sixty years.

The following exchange then took place between the minister, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond:

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, has the minister had time, since the representations were made by the Canadian metal mining association and others, on this point, to give it much consideration or to take it to his colleagues; or will he be able, perhaps, to review it between now and the committee stage of the bill in the house?

Mr. Fulton: I have reviewed it, Mr. Benidickson, and the conclusions I have just outlined, in reply to Mr. Thomas' question, were the conclusions to which we came as a result of that consideration. We were not unaware of the problem when we were initially drafting the bill. In fact, we did have a provision in the bill we presented last year, with regard to the export trade in the field of mergers. But when it was decided it would be more appropriate not to make a substantial change in the merger field, that was dropped. We were considering the position of the export trade with relation to the whole act. I was not able to find any way, in the combination field, that I was satisfied could insulate the effects of arrangements made with respect to export from their effect domestically. We do not have any advice from anybody as to ways of measuring the public advantage of one as against the other.

Mr. Benidickson: I am sorry, but I was reading the act at the time when you made reference to the commission bringing down a report, and that this problem would be one of the points considered. What was the commission?

Mr. Fulton: The restrictive trade practices commission, which is now considering the fisheries case in Vancouver.

Mr. Drysdale: There is unlikely to be any further activity in the export field, provided there is no outward obvious violation of the Combines Act until this particular case is settled. I am not trying to pin the minister down to legal advice, but there is likely to be this period when there is nothing covering the export trade. I wonder if, without putting him on the spot, there is anything he could say to the committee which would indicate the position of exporters with regard to this competition?

Mr. Macdonnell: Do you not think that actions speak louder than words?

Mr. Fulton: I find it hard to answer that without being "put on the spot".

The words "put on the spot" appear in quotation marks.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, by all means.

Mr. Ricard: It suits the hon. member's purpose.

Mr. Valade: For the sake of clarity would the hon. member in reading his citations also read aloud the periods and commas so we would be able to follow his quotations clearly?

Mr. McIlraith: I could not hear the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member wants you to include the punctuation.

Mr. Harkness: That is all the hon. gentleman is leaving out.

Mr. McIlraith: I am prepared to assume that hon. members who are reading the record will recognize the punctuation when they see it. If they are unable to do so I think it would be quite improper for me to indicate it to them verbally. I think to do so would insult the intelligence of hon. gentlemen and I would not wish to do that. I therefore must reject the hon. member's request.

I return to the evidence given by the minister on this point when he took quite a different position from that taken by him today with respect to the amendment. I return to the exchange between hon. gentlemen and the minister at the bottom of page 696:

Mr. Drysdale: I think that is fine, Mr. Minister.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Benidickson, I have misinformed you in an answer I gave. I find we did not have any provision with regard to export trade in our earlier bill, as presented to this house. We had it in several of the drafts we had prepared.

Mr. Benidickson: I was going to ask you why it was not in this bill when it was in last year's.

Mr. McIlraith: If you have finished with that point of export, I want to ask some more questions about subsection (3),—

And so on.

These excerpts indicate that in committee the minister had taken a position which was somewhat different from the one taken by him today—

Mr. Pickersgill: Just like the north pole and the south pole.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes; the two positions taken are as far apart as the north pole and the south pole. But in any event, I want to be very forgiving to the minister and tell him that I appreciate the fact that he has moved to the correct pole this time and has taken the correct position now in committee of the whole in bringing forward, or having one of his supporters bring forward, the amendment which is now before us. But before doing that I would ask him whether he consulted the commission before bringing this amendment forward? He had grave doubts, as indicated by the evidence, as to the propriety of consulting him. Perhaps he should qualify that matter, because I am quite sure he would not have consulted an independent body, but I do not think any possibility of a reflection on his conduct should be left on the record, and I would ask him whether he consulted the commission since giving the evidence in committee more than a week ago and before bringing in the amendment? Perhaps the minister would answer the question.

Mr. Fulton: I was just looking for the reference to the further occasion on which the matter was discussed in the committee, when I again indicated, as I think the hon. member will agree, if he reads carefully, or considers carefully what he has just read that I indicated then, that I did not have a closed mind on this subject. He will remember that when the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate moved his amendment in committee I indicated that, in view of the fact that hon. members generally were uniformly concerned about this matter I felt, under those circumstances, that I should be prepared to give the matter further consideration and I undertook then to give it further consideration between the time the bill might be reported from the banking and commerce committee and the time it might come up here. This passage is found starting at page 750 of the banking and commerce committee minutes of proceedings and evidence. I pointed out at that time, and I am now reading from page 750:

And I am pleased to note that the effect of this amendment is to indicate that Mr. Pickersgill, in moving it, admits there can be something done to improve the position of Canadian industry without weakening the effects of the combines legislation. That is the first and most important thing that appears from this amendment. And I am delighted to have this indication of agreement by the official opposition with the stand of the government, that we can indeed make certain changes which will improve and benefit the position of industry, and thus of the economy generally, without weakening the terms and objectives of the combines legislation. That is one of the main objectives of the present amendments. I am delighted to have this endorsement of those objectives.

At this point, Mr. Chairman, I might perhaps interpolate that I am delighted to have the agreement of the official opposition today, as indicated by their readiness to accept this amendment, that once again they have confirmed that the combines legislation can be improved by making it clear that certain activities can be indulged in by industry without detriment to the economy and indeed to the benefit of the economy of Canada, and without weakening the combines legislation. The fact that our legislative scheme has been sound throughout is substantiated by the fact that hon. members opposite are prepared to accept this amendment to amend section 32, to which earlier they were apparently so much opposed.

Mr. McIlraith: No, not opposed.

Mr. Fulton: Then I went on to discuss the effect of the amendment as proposed at that time by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and to indicate that I was not prepared at that moment to accept the amendment because I felt it opened the door too wide. I am now reading from page 751. I said:

For the reasons I have given, I do not think this amendment, as presently drafted, meets the criteria which this committee, or any government concerned with the welfare of Canadian consumers, could adopt.

My suggestion is that the amendment be rejected, but that the principle be re-examined to see whether a proposal consistent with the interests of Canadian industry in the export field, and the overriding interest of consumers domestically, can be devised. And, if it can, the government would be happy to suggest such an amendment in the house.

Therefore, you will observe, Mr. Chairman, by reference to the latest discussion on this point in the banking and commerce committee, that it is established that the minister's position there was absolutely consistent with the position that he outlined to the committee this afternoon.

With reference to the question of the basis upon which I came to the conclusion that I reported to the committee this afternoon, I can only say that I consulted with the officials upon whom I rely to advise me and the officials with whom it is proper for me to consult and that we did together come to the conclusion that it would be appropriate to introduce this amendment at the present time for the reason I gave to this committee this afternoon.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to take up any more of the time of the committee at all until the minister chose to put on the record here his own interpretation of the attitude I took in the committee. I feel that the record will not be complete unless I now put on the record the position that I took in the committee, and obviously there is not time to do that tonight; but I do think there is one thing that may not always be true, the old principle post hoc ergo propter hoc, but there is no doubt in this case that we would not have had this amendment from the government at all if I had not moved an amendment in the committee and forced the hand of the government.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Don't be so modest.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister knows perfectly well, as my hon. friend from Ottawa West has pointed out at length, that the government had turned down this matter, turned it down completely and finally and I came in and moved an amendment and they began to be worried and thought it was a bandwagon and now they are all trying to get on it. It is eleven o'clock, sir.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Your mentor is in the gallery.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the government leader would tell us what he thinks he can get his followers to do tomorrow.

Mr. Churchill: It would be helpful if I could find out what the opposition intends to do from day to day.

Mr. McIlraith: We tried to help you today.

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow we will continue and complete this particular bill and then estimates will follow. They will follow in this order, only subject to change if some unforeseen accident occurs, for the balance of the session: northern affairs and national resources, secretary of state, defence production, legislation, labour, defence, finance, trade and commerce, privy council.

On Friday of this week the first item that will be called for discussion other than estimates will be the motion appearing in Votes and Proceedings of Monday in the name of the Prime Minister with reference to the amendment as to the tenure of office of judges.

Mr. Pickersgill: The amendment to the British North America Act.

Mr. Churchill: Yes. That will be brought forward on Friday.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the minister would repeat the qualification he made about the order of departments?

Mr. Churchill: I said that would be the order unless some unforeseen circumstance arises such as some minister being unexpectedly called away or somebody on the opposition side requesting a change in the order of procedure.

It being three minutes after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, July 27, 1960

The house met at 11 a.m.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

SUBSTITUTION OF ADDRESS RESPECTING TENURE OF OFFICE OF JUDGES

On the order: Government notices of motions:

July 25—The Prime Minister—The following proposed motion:—That the resolution adopted by this house on the 14th day of June, 1960 and reading as follows:

"Resolved, that a humble address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen in the following words:

To the Queen's most excellent majesty:

Most gracious sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the commons of Canada in parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty, praying that you may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to be expressed as follows:

An act to amend the British North America Act, 1867.

Whereas the Senate and House of Commons of Canada in parliament assembled have submitted addresses to Her Majesty praying that Her Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom for the enactment of the provisions hereinafter set forth:

Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

1. Section ninety-nine of the British North America Act, 1867 is hereby repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"99. (1) Subject to subsection two of this section, the judges of the superior, district and county courts shall hold office during good behaviour, but shall be removable by the Governor General on Address of the Senate and House of Commons.

(2) A judge of a superior, district or county court, whether appointed before or after the coming into force of this section, shall cease to hold office upon attaining the age of seventy-five years, or upon the coming into force of this section if at that time he has already attained that age."

2. This act may be cited as the British North America Act, 1960, and the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1952, and this act may be cited together as the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1960.

3. This act shall come into force on the first day of March, nineteen hundred and sixty-one.

be rescinded, and that the following resolution be substituted therefor:

Resolved, that a humble address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen in the following words:

To the Queen's most excellent majesty:

Most gracious sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the commons of Canada in parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty, praying that you may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to be expressed as follows:

3. This act shall come into force on the first day of March, nineteen hundred and sixty-one.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 2 of standing order 21 this government notice of motion stands transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders at the next sitting of the house.

STARRED QUESTIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE FUND

Question No. 205—Mr. Robichaud:

What was the amount to the credit of the unemployment insurance fund as of June 30, 1957, 1958, 1959 and 1960?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is as follows:

June 30, 1957	$852,729,261.78
June 30, 1958	$644,520,634.54
June 30, 1959	$434,152,690.64
June 30, 1960	$296,187,477.10

C.N.R. CAR ICING, MONCTON AND JOFFRE

Question No. 206—Mr. Fisher:

1. Has the Canadian National Railways considered contracting out the icing of cars at Moncton and Joffre in the past year?

Starred Questions

2. If so, what are the factors in favour of such a move?

3. What effect would such a move have in each of these places in terms of Canadian National Railways employee reduction?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): The answer is as follows:

1. With regard to Moncton this matter is now under study in connection with the operation of the new hump yard. As to Joffre, a contract was entered into with a Mr. J. A. Labrie, effective May, 1960.

2. Moncton—Not applicable.

Joffre—It is more economical to the railway.

3. No employees are hired for the sole purpose of icing refrigerator cars, and at Joffre only one regular employee, a labourer, has been displaced under this arrangement.

TORMENTINE-BORDEN, P.E.I., FERRY

Question No. 207—Mr. Herridge:

1. Is consideration being given to the construction of a new car ferry between Tormentine and Borden, Prince Edward Island?

2. If so, how will it compare to the Abegweit as to the following characteristics: (a) displacement; (b) speed; (c) capacity; (i) passengers; (ii) vehicles; (d) icebreaking capability; (e) suitability for winter passages?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): The answer to part 1 is that tenders were called during 1959, and a contract for construction was entered into on May 24, 1960, with Halifax Shipyards, Halifax, Nova Scotia.

As to part 2, a comparison with the M. V. Abegweit is as follows:

	Abegweit	New Vessel
(a) Displacement	7,600 tons	2,663 tons
(b) Speed	16.5 knots	13 knots
(c) Capacity (i) passengers	950	300
(ii) vehicles	19 railway freight cars and 58 automobiles, or 125 automobiles	68 automobiles

GRAIN

EQUALIZATION OF QUOTAS—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay West, the adjournment of the house under standing order 26 to discuss a question of urgent public importance, namely the large number of marketing points in western Canada still on a 6-bushel quota and the need for urgent action at this time to assure that quotas will be equalized, thus enabling each producer to deliver his fair share of grain.

I believe that this question is of very great urgency, Mr. Speaker, because the end of the crop year is approaching. This is July 27 and the crop year ends on July 31, just four days from now. There have been commitments from the government on previous occasions that every possible step would be taken to make certain that delivery quotas were equalized by the end of this crop year. The importance of this, I should like to point out, is that by equalized quotas the farmers are given the same opportunity to deliver grain and therefore an equal opportunity with their neighbours to the same kind of income return.

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member permit me to ask a question which might help me in determining the urgency of debate? Is this a matter within the administrative jurisdiction of the Canadian wheat board?

Mr. Argue: I would say quickly yes to that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Then the urgency the hon. member suggests is that—the end of the crop year is when?

Mr. Argue: At the end of this month, four days away.

Mr. Speaker: And the importance of it is that—?

Mr. Argue: Once we pass the end of the crop year all the quotas return to zero and the farmer has no opportunity whatever to deliver grain. It is illegal to deliver grain on the present quotas on August 1, which is a very few days away. If equality in the delivery of grain, therefore, is to be brought about, immediate action is necessary so that this can be accomplished within the next few days.

Mr. Speaker: I take it that the jurisdiction to set quotas after the end of the crop year is just as it was before; there is no change?

Mr. Argue: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: I feel I have heard sufficient to enable me to deal with the matter. The question is, of course, one of urgency of debate that we have to consider under rule 26. The hon. member raises a matter which is of undoubted importance, and of particular importance to the producers of grain who are making deliveries. But the problem I have to consider is whether or not there is a lack of opportunity in this house to discuss this matter which is so urgent as to warrant our interrupting a very full program at a time of the session which I think puts a rather severe onus on anyone who attempts to move the adjournment under standing order 26.

In my view there has been opportunity throughout the session to discuss the administration of the deliveries of grain, and if I am not mistaken the Canadian wheat board is under the administrative responsibility of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, whose estimates are to be called within the next day or two, so I would not think it appropriate to give leave to move the adjournment.

Mr. Argue: If I might make a very brief comment on that—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Argue: The quotas will be off; the opportunity will be gone. It will be too late.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate what the hon. member says, but there will be an opportunity to discuss it when the estimates are being considered.

Mr. Argue: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I claim the right to deal with the central question at this time for the benefit of the house, as to whether or not this is sufficiently urgent that it is necessary to initiate a debate at this time. A question has been raised very properly by Your Honour as to whether or not there will be an opportunity, in your own words, within the next couple of days to debate this matter.

Now Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Trade and Commerce would bring on his estimates then that could be done; there would be no urgency if the trade and commerce estimates were brought on immediately. If they were initiated, as the minister announced last night, at the tail end of the session, then these quotas will be down to zero and there will be a great injustice done to the western producers; that is why it is urgent.

Mr. Speaker: I took those matters into consideration in the course of making my ruling.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION ADVISORY COMMITTEE REPORT

Motion No. 132—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

For a copy of the latest report of the unemployment insurance commission advisory committee.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON REVISED SYSTEM OF MEASUREMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that the minister's estimates will be under consideration either later this day or tomorrow, can the minister assure the house that the report of the interdepartmental committee trying to work out new procedures for the measurement of unemployment will be made available to the committee before the estimates are considered?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): In view of the numerous questions asked regarding this report I have made a number of inquiries, and I cannot at the moment give any assurance that that will be done.

UNITED NATIONS

DISARMAMENT—REPORTED U.S. SUGGESTION RESPECTING COMMISSION MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he can advise the house what the situation is with regard to the suggestion of the United States that the United Nations disarmament commission should meet prior to the convocation of the general assembly?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that request, I believe, has been handed to the chairman of the United Nations disarmament commission, but as yet no statement has been made as to if and when that commission will be meeting.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Has Canada joined with the United States in asking the chairman of the commission, Mr. Padillo Nervo, to call the commission together?

Mr. Green: Yes. We also wrote to the chairman urging that the commission be called together.

AIR TRANSPORT

REPORTED JET PLANE LANDING AT WRONG AIRPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees).

Has the minister any comments to make about the jet aircraft with 80 passengers aboard that went to the wrong airport and landed at Cartierville last night, instead of Dorval?

(Text):

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I am afraid I have no further information than that contained in the news report to which the hon. member has referred. This plane landed by mistake at Cartierville airport. Fortunately it landed safely. No damage was done and no one was injured. The passengers were transferred by bus to Dorval airport and the plane later continued its journey to Toronto. I am afraid that is all I have to report.

Mr. Valade: I have a supplementary question.

(Translation):

Could the minister ask his department to take steps to prevent similar mistakes in the future?

(Text):

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, we do everything we can to make it as easy as possible for planes to land at Dorval and not at other airports. I am sure the captain of the air liner was not too happy about having mistaken the landing field. I am sure that people will speak to him about it. I do not think there will be too many recurrences of this error.

AGRICULTURE

RAPESEED—REPRESENTATIONS OF WHEAT POOLS RESPECTING CLASSIFICATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister say what action the government has taken as a result of the representations sent to the government from the three western wheat pools requesting the federal government to set aside the decision of the board of transport commissioners that rapeseed should not be considered a grain under the Crowsnest pass agreement?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): It is my understanding that this matter is at the present time before the Supreme Court of Canada. Therefore, of course, it cannot be discussed at this time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CONGO—INQUIRY AS TO INVITATION TO PRIME MINISTER TO VISIT CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Since the opening of the house yesterday has he or the government received a request from the prime minister of the Congo, Mr. Lumumba, to come to Canada?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, our permanent representative at the United Nations had a long visit with the prime minister of the Congo last evening. Today the prime minister is in Washington and I believe he will be talking with our representative at the Canadian embassy there. I think he will be coming here on Friday and Saturday, but the arrangements have not yet been made definite.

IMMIGRATION

IRENE REBRIN—INQUIRY AS TO POSITION FOLLOWING COURT DECISION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. In view of the decision by the court of appeal of British Columbia yesterday, will the minister give the house an assurance that Miss Rebrin will not be spirited out of this country—

An hon. Member: Cheap.

Mr. Pickersgill: —as long as she is engaged in any actions in the courts?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I cannot stand by and let the hon. member make any such statement. She has not been spirited out of the country. There have been about three different appeals, and I see no reason why she should be so dealt with now.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would like to ask the hon. lady if she does not recall that the words I used were precisely the words used by the Minister of Justice in another case, and that the Prime Minister in that case—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Pickersgill: —did give an assurance—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's question appears to me to be more the supplying of information or an argument than a search for further information.

Mr. Pickersgill: Then I would like to put a supplementary question. Would the hon. lady give an assurance that this lady will not be deported as long as her action against the Toronto Telegram is pending?

Mrs. Fairclough: I thought I made that perfectly clear, Mr. Speaker.

GRAIN

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON DELIVERY AND QUOTA POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. L. Hanbidge (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, since the crop year for the delivery of grain in western Canada expires on July 31, I would like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he is in a position to make a statement with regard to quotas on grain.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the quota situation in the western prairies is better this year, I think, than in any year since the quota arrangement was put into operation. There are 2,007 stations on the quota distribution system. As of July 25, 1,879 or in other words roughly 94 per cent were on the 7-bushel quota, leaving roughly 6 per cent, or 128 stations, on the 6-bushel quota. This is a development which under the supervision of the wheat board has been pursued this year in an endeavour to equalize the quota distribution system as much as possible.

I have not had a communication today but I will be hearing from the wheat board, and I would expect that the number of stations on the 6-bushel quota has again been reduced, so that substantially all stations out west are on an equal basis. This is a major achievement, and every possible effort is being made during the closing days of the crop year to bring all stations up to the 7-bushel quota and to provide box cars in order that the grain may be moved rapidly. I doubt if a better showing has been made in any of the years since the wheat board has been operating.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I think in view of the motion I presented this statement might have been made on that motion—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Argue: —so that those of us—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: It would have been improper for the minister to make such a statement on the motion, but if the hon. member has a supplementary question he may ask it.

Mr. Argue: My question is this. Is the minister prepared to recommend to the Canadian wheat board that the delivery quotas be continued into the new crop year until such time as all marketing points in western Canada are on a 7-bushel quota and, of equal importance, until every delivery point has sufficient box cars to take out the grain? I ask the minister whether it is not a fact that hundreds—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Argue: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member will allow the first one to be answered.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member for Assiniboia is obviously embarrassed when the—

Mr. Argue: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I trust the minister will not pursue that vein.

Mr. Churchill: I would have been out of order, Mr. Speaker, in referring to the futility of the hon. member's original motion, but I will not dwell on that.

Mr. Argue: Just answer my question and you will be more in order.

Mr. Churchill: This question comes up every year. The wheat board with its long experience has reached the conclusion that it is unwise to extend the quota distribution system too far into the new crop year. Every year this question has come up I have examined it with the wheat board and asked them for their experience in years gone by. They have taken the stand that when they can reach the 7-bushel quota as they are doing this year it is adequate for marketing purposes. In certain areas, depending on the arrival of box cars, a few days' grace are permitted, but then the year closes and the new quota goes into effect for subsequent deliveries of grain from the new crop. The wheat board knows this problem, has dealt with it successfully year after year, and will continue to do so.

Mr. Argue: My supplementary question is this—

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was seeking to ask a supplementary question. Perhaps the hon. member would defer his until later.

Mr. C. O. Cooper (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary question may I ask if it would be possible to have the wheat board open all points to 7 bushels before the end of the crop year?

Mr. Churchill: I think that is possible, Mr. Speaker. As of two days ago only 128 points were on 6 bushels. It looks as if all stations will be on the 7-bushel quota by the end of the week.

Mr. Argue: I should like to ask the minister how many hundreds of marketing points there will be where delivery space will not be available on the 7-bushel quota. How many days of grace will the farmers have in the new crop year in order to deliver on the old quota?

Mr. Churchill: Obviously I cannot answer the first question; it calls for statistical information. The question should be put on the order paper in the proper way, as every experienced hon. member knows.

The number of days of grace is left to the discretion of the wheat board and to the common sense of the elevator agents. It depends on the arrival of box cars. If seven box cars arrive at a station, let us say, this coming Sunday night, any Canadian with common sense would see that those box cars are made use of even if it takes until Monday or Tuesday to make delivery.

Mr. Argue: Is there under consideration—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Argue: —a 14-day period of grace as we have had on other occasions?

Mr. Churchill: The wheat board will conduct itself in the same way this year as it has done in other years, to the satisfaction of the farmers of western Canada.

Mr. Argue: That is exactly what we are afraid of.

Mr. Churchill: You do not like the wheat board?

Mr. Argue: We do not like what is being done right now.

Mr. Ricard: Do you like yourself?

Mr. E. W. Brunsden (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary question may I ask the minister whether he has knowledge of any extensive complaints from western Canada with respect to both quotas and box cars? My own experience is that I have none.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Churchill: There have been no extensive complaints. My own experience over the last three years has been that at the conclusion of each crop year messages are received with regard to box cars. I have had only a few of those this year. Immediately the wheat board has been contacted. They in turn get in touch with the railway companies, who have responded very quickly to these requests.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek still some point that is not clear even after this rather extensive inquiry?

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister if the 128 points still on 6-bushel quota are points that in past years have also been on low quota.

Mr. Argue: They are.

Mr. Churchill: I doubt that very much, Mr. Speaker, but I will obtain the information for the hon. gentleman. These questions may be asked tomorrow, Friday, Saturday and Monday before the end of the crop year, and the information will be available.

TRANSPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Gloucester inquired regarding the dispute respecting the unlicensed personnel of the M.V. Bluenose. I might also say that the hard-working and very able hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare has shown great interest in this matter and spoke about it to both the Minister of Labour and myself as long ago as Friday. He has shown a keen interest in this whole matter.

As the house knows, the management and operation of the Bluenose is entrusted to the C.N.R. I have been in touch with the management, and am advised that the union representing unlicensed personnel on the ship has given notice that such employees will withdraw from service on August 5. Although the union has not requested a meeting since issuance of the report of the board of conciliation on June 23, the management state that they stand ready to meet the union at any time.

PUBLIC SERVICE

MONTREAL—COMPLAINT OF MEAT INSPECTORS WITH RESPECT TO OVERTIME PAY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he has had an opportunity of considering the question which I asked him yesterday.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday the hon. member for Laurier stated that meat inspectors in the city of Montreal had not received pay for their overtime work for the last three months. He asked if I would inquire into the situation and advise him why this condition exists. The hon. member also stated that it was his understanding that the overtime was paid by the packing houses in which the meat inspectors worked.

In fact the overtime is not actually paid by the packing plants. If a plant engages in overtime operations a charge is made against the plant to cover the approximate cost of the overtime worked by the meat inspectors, but the payments from the plants are deposited to consolidated revenue. The actual overtime payments to the inspectors are made from the regular departmental vote in accordance with civil service regulations.

Those regulations provide for overtime worked by a civil servant to be liquidated as compensatory leave at any time up to the end of the following month if staffing permits, or failing that, for the payment of overtime. For this reason payment for overtime worked in any one month cannot be made until after the end of the following month.

Cheques covering overtime payments to health of animals staff in the Montreal area for April have been sent out, and it is anticipated that payment for overtime worked during May will be made within a week.

Mr. Chevrier: I thank the minister for his reply.

SHIPPING

MONTREAL HARBOUR—SINKING OF S.S. "COASTAL CASCADES"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. Campeau (St. James): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport and ask whether he has any comment to make as to the cause of the sinking of the S.S. Coastal Cascades of Transit Tankers and Terminals Limited in berth 110 in Montreal harbour, and as to the measures which are to be taken in this connection.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The port manager at Montreal harbour has advised me that in the early morning of July 25, the S.S. Coastal Cascades, owned by Transit Tankers and Terminals Limited, sank in berth 110, Montreal harbour and the vessel is resting on the bottom on its stern. The reason for the sinking is unknown. There is no danger to navigation. The S.S. Coastal Cascades is 230 feet long with a net registered tonnage of 651 and gross tonnage of 1,239. Investigations are being conducted as to the reason for sinking.

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

AUSTRALIA—CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT MEETING ON NAVAL CO-OPERATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether Canada was represented at the three-day commonwealth conference recently held in Australia to discuss naval co-operation and, if not, why not?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): I shall take that question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

REQUEST FOR BREAKDOWN OF FIGURE QUOTED BY MINISTER OF FINANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance whether he could give the house a breakdown of the $2 billion which the Minister of Finance said the provinces were asking out of the federal treasury.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is perhaps a little optimistic in expecting to be able to get an answer to that question on orders of the day.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest it is a very urgent question.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO PROVISION OF FURTHER INTERIM SUPPLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): May I direct a question to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance. Before the Minister of Finance gets negotiated out of all the money he has in the treasury, and in view of the fact that the interim supply bill passed a few months ago will no longer have validity after the end of this month, is it the intention of the government to have another interim supply bill introduced to carry on the public business after the end of July.

Mr. R. A. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): I think the hope of the house is that its business may be concluded in time so that a further interim supply bill will not be necessary.

Mr. Pearson: It won't be.

NATIONAL PARKS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPORTED OFFER OF GARIBALDI PARK FOR OLYMPIC GAMES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Taylor (Vancouver-Burrard): Can the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources say whether the premier of British Columbia has yet made any offer to him of Garibaldi park as a national park?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): No, Mr. Speaker; I have received no offer from British Columbia.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT—CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING MERGERS, MONOPOLIES, ETC.

The house resumed, from Tuesday, July 26, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-58, to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code—Mr. Fulton—Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 13, section 33—Mergers and monopolies.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment to clause 13, section 33, carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I was in the middle, or perhaps not in the middle; I should say I was at the beginning of a statement about this matter which has been occasioned by the observations which were made by the Minister of Justice just before I began.

In order to put what I now have to say in perspective I should like to recall just what it was I did say in my introduction last night. What I said was that, as the hon. member for Ottawa West had shown in his masterly reading of the proceedings of the banking and commerce committee, the government had made a firm and unqualified decision, and announced it to the committee, not to do anything about this problem. The government had decided that because the restrictive trade practices commission was carrying on an investigation into an export problem in British Columbia, no attempt should be made to meet the requests of the fisheries council, of the forest industries and of the metal mining industry which were presented so ably, and I think so convincingly, to the committee, and whose views were put on the record at such length by three hon. members on the other side of the house last evening in speeches the urgency of which was apparent to all who listened to them.

That was the situation right up until the last meeting of the banking and commerce committee. At that point, sir, as I explained earlier yesterday, thanks to the courtesy of the committee and because of my absence on that Monday morning, the committee resumed its sittings in the afternoon and I introduced an amendment to clause 15 of the bill. I should like very briefly to draw to the committee's attention now the reason I gave then for doing so. This will be found at page 747 of the proceedings and evidence of the banking and commerce committee for July 18. Quite a way down the page the chairman is reported as follows:

> Perhaps we could go on with Mr. Pickersgill first—

Then I am reported as having said:

> I have an amendment I would like to move, seconded by Mr. Tardif. But before doing so, I would like to say that some of my friends and I on this committee were very much impressed by the representations that were made to the committee by a number of witnesses, expressing the hope that if the act was to be amended, as was the government's intention, some express provision could be put in the act to make it abundantly clear what everyone, I think, recognizes has always been in fact the situation, namely, that the purpose of the legislation was to prevent combinations within Canada respecting trade within Canada and was not intended, in any way, to cripple our export trade; and that if certain types of combination or arrangements were necessary for the promotion of our export trade they should not be hampered by this legislation.
> Now I recognize—as I am sure every member of the committee does—how frightfully difficult it is to draft provisions which will make that position abundantly plain to the courts, without, in any way, having any ancillary effects or any serious ancillary effects which would enable it—as we thought might be the case with some of these new provisions that it is suggested should be inserted into one of the other sections, section 32—to be used as a cloak for combinations that are clearly intended to be against the law.
> However, we do think that an amendment might be made to clause 15; and I must say that in proposing this, I am not absolutely wedded to this particular wording. It is the best, with such resources that were available to my friends and myself, we were able to come up with at the moment; but we would certainly appreciate any suggestions from any member of the committee that might make it more acceptable to the government.
> In the present circumstances, when it is perfectly evident to everyone that we are not going to have the kind of sellers' market for our exports we have enjoyed most of the time since the second world war, we do think it is of the utmost importance, in the national interest, that we should do everything possible and everything reasonable both to promote our exports and to make sure, by the laws of our country, that we are not providing any obstacles, even if only psychological obstacles, that can easily be removed.

When I made that statement I was authorized to speak, and was speaking, on behalf of my friends here in the house. That was the position, after very careful consideration of this very ticklish and difficult problem, that the Liberal party had decided to take on the matter. We had decided to take the view that even though there might be some slight risk —and we recognize there might be some risk —that such combinations for the purpose of promoting Canadian exports might become a cloak or might have effects in the domestic market which would by themselves be undesirable, for the greater good of the country and indeed the greater good of a majority of consumers, in view of the tremendous extent to which the income of the Canadian people, particularly of the people in certain provinces, is dependent upon our income from exports, that balancing the two, one against the other, it was in the national interest to move such an amendment.

Now, sir, I am glad to say that the arguments we put forward there and, perhaps more than the arguments, the knowledge that the Liberal opposition had taken this up officially as its policy, caused the government to change its mind. Let no one be under any illusion about this matter. The amendment we are now considering, for which we intend to vote and which I admitted quite frankly yesterday is better drafted than mine was, would not have been offered at all if it had not been for the stand I was asked to take in the banking and commerce committee on behalf of the Leader of the Opposition and our party on the last day the committee sat on this bill.

In view of some of the things that were said yesterday, and in view of the obvious efforts of certain members opposite to get on this band wagon and try to make it appear that in some way this was their doing, I think the record ought to be set straight.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member has made what he alleges to be a statement of fact, and I wish to say at once and immediately following what he has said that his statement of fact is not correct. It is not the case that this amendment would not have been offered had it not been for the motion made in the committee by the Liberal opposition. It is true that I had indicated in the banking and commerce committee throughout that I was concerned as to the appropriateness of offering an amendment while a case was still under discussion before the commission and up to the time I had last previously spoken in the banking and commerce committee I had not been able to see my way around the difficulties.

But I had indicated clearly that we were considering the matter. I was considering the matter. I had discussions with a number of our own members, and I told them that the government and the minister were prepared at any time they could come to the conclusion that an amendment could be drafted to submit one to the house. I repeated that on the day the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has referred to, Monday, July 18. It was not by any means simply because he had presented an amendment that we came to the conclusion that an amendment could be drafted and that we were justified in drafting and submitting an amendment at this time.

My hon. friend probably will not accept my assurance on this point. No more do I accept his statement or interpretation of why this amendment is now before the house. But hon. members on this side, with whom I had discussions both before and after he offered his amendment, will know perfectly well the truth of what I say, and they will know that it is a gross exaggeration, and immodest exaggeration for the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate to say it is simply because he moved this amendment that the house now has one before it from the government.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister, who now so passionately claims the parentage of the idea of this amendment, why, having regard to the months, indeed, the year or so when they were drafting their amendments, this idea did not appear in the bill when it was submitted to the house after all the consideration that was given to the matter by them?

Mr. Fulton: This and all sorts of other ideas occurred to us.

Mr. Pearson: You did not put it in the bill.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, from the activities of both the Liberals and the Conservatives I know they are very excellent band wagon climbers, and therefore it is doubtful whether the accusation of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate should be treated too seriously. However, I think he did place some of the facts before the banking and commerce committee in a little different light. Trade is an extremely important matter because we depend so much upon it; but because we have been in so much difficulty since approximately the middle of 1957 in our trading relationships with other countries I hope the Conservative government and its supporters will not think that the change now being made in this legislation is a cure-all for our trade problems. I trust they will not be content to rest upon the false base that this amendment will assist to any measurable extent in increasing our trade with other nations. It only needs a cursory glance at the provision to see that it cannot be considered a cure-all for our trading problems, and that more aggressive measures must be taken by government departments, notably the Department of Trade and Commerce, to increase our exports to other countries.

Our objections to this amendment have been placed on the record clearly and I do not think there is any point in going over them again. I am only making these remarks because the feeling might develop that we have done something which will cure our trading problems or as a result of which they will solve themselves. We need a much more aggressive attitude toward trade. There are other problems and difficulties which have not been thought of or have been glossed over. We are encountering difficulties because of the activities of other nations, and those interested in export trade have used these difficulties as a basis for arguing that they should be exempted from the application of the Combines Investigation Act so far as their export activities are concerned.

A reading of the briefs presented by organizations which appeared before the banking and commerce committee and advocated that their export activities should be exempted from the provisions of the act indicates that they used arguments which were not valid. Perhaps they are most succinctly put by Mr. Nicholson, president of the council of forest industries of British Columbia, who appeared before the committee on June 22 along with representatives from the fisheries council of Canada and the Canadian metal mining association, to which reference has been made.

As found on pages 292 and 293 of the proceedings of the committee Mr. Nicholson put forward what I think were false arguments to promote an exemption under the combines legislation. I should like to refer to them in order to indicate that we need to tackle our trade problems in other ways than by means of the Combines Investigation Act. Mr. Nicholson referred to the letter read by Mr. Hyland of the fisheries council which was written by the Japanese cartel on fish, and near the bottom of page 292 he said:

> I was shocked at the letter as I am sure you were—the letter that Mr. Hyland read here today which was written by the Japanese fishing cartel and written approximately eleven months ago. I am sure the words burn themselves in your mind just as in mine—"We have not yet fixed our final price for the sale of our salmon in the world market; we give you a tentative price and as soon as the Canadians and Americans have fixed their price we will give you ours." How in the world are you going to fight in world markets where 50 per cent of the products of the forests of British Columbia are being exported and one third of the income coming into this country from the sale of our exportable commodities coming in from the sale of Canada's forest products, if we cannot meet the competition coming in from foreign countries?

Then my colleague the hon. member for Port Arthur asked a question:

> Mr. Fisher: Could the witness give us the parallels in the timber industry to the Japanese salmon industry? I do not think that is contained in the brief.
> Mr. Nicholson: I cannot give it to you for Japan, but I can give it to you for Russia. Prior to the war, and in fact up until 1954, Canada was Britain's leading supplier of softwood products—lumber, shingles and material of that kind. That is, as late as 1954 it was the leading supplier. By 1957, Canada's share of the United Kingdom imports had dropped to 14.7 per cent and Canada's position was that of fourth place supplier of products to the building industry in Britain. We had been replaced successfully by Sweden, Finland and Russia. During this period when Canadian sales were dropping off the Soviet of Russia had increased her sales from one tenth to one fifth of the total of United Kingdom's softwood importation. In the case of the Swedish and Finnish importers they were trading at a profit.

Notice the distinction there, and it is developed later on, that the Swedish and Finnish exporters were operating at a profit. The implication is that the Russian exporters were not operating at a profit, and this is developed later on. I continue the quotation:

> Their objective was to make a profit, but their operating costs were lower because wages were lower. That was not so in the case of Russia, when they came in and took that market. I am reliably informed by an official of the Department of Trade and Commerce—this can be checked by reference to the minister or other officials of that department—that the Russian technique in invading the British market is that they will come in with a particular type of lumber which is in demand, and even though the lumber may be needed at home in Russia, they will quote to supply the whole demand at a price that is better than the Canadian price for a particular kind of lumber.

I imagine when he uses the word "better" he means lower.

> It is even better than the Swedish and Finnish prices in some cases. Then if you repeat the order they will give you a further reduction. That is not done by any cartel. That is done by a government trade agency. Does that answer your question?

He went on then to deal with another matter. I should like to point out that our problems and difficulties in the export markets could not be even partially solved by the amendment before us now to exempt export activities from prosecution under the Combines Investigation Act. I refer particularly to our difficulties in so far as the Soviet union is concerned. Mr. Nicholson has pointed out here the manner in which the Soviet undertook to export lumber to Great Britain, thus cutting into the amount of lumber that had been exported from Canada prior to 1954. I have not been in Russian nor have I worked in industry there, so I have no personal knowledge of these facts, but it is generally understood that Russian exports are controlled by a state organization. They have no worry about profits; they have no worry about costs of production; they have no balance sheets which have to be totalled up. The cost of production can be absorbed by society as a whole. The selling price in the world market means, in fact, relatively little.

Canada cannot possibly compete with the Soviet union in world markets because of the system under which the Soviet operates. When it comes to Sweden and Finland undercutting us because of wages, that is another matter. The natural implication of Mr. Nicholson's remarks is that if wages are the only factor, then one solution perhaps would be to reduce wages here to a point where they were comparable with wages in other countries so that we would be able to compete on price. Alternatively we could increase our productivity to the point where we were producing units of wood or whatever it was, say 1,000 board feet of lumber or squares of shingles, at lower per unit costs and then we would be in the position where we could compete. None of these things can be accomplished by an amendment to the Combines Investigation Act.

If it is desired to tackle this question through the Combines Investigation Act, then this amendment fails to meet the problem because it refers only to those exemptions connected with price conspiracy under section 32, which covers agreements between so-called competing corporations. There is no reference whatever in the minister's amendment to the activities of monopolies in the export market. It is true that a monopoly, because there is only one corporation, would have difficulty in conspiring with itself to set prices. It is an automatic action that a monopoly takes to meet these conditions. However, a monopoly does operate in the export markets, and that fact is not dealt with in this amendment.

Then we have to consider the problem of the merger of two companies in the export field. Suppose there were two competing firms, Anglo Canadian Fish Company and B. C. Packers or any other two fish companies or two lumber companies, which entered into a conspiracy in relation to the export of articles, and that conspiracy had no deleterious effects on the domestic market. For the sake of argument let us say that the conspiracy with regard to the export market was protected by the proposed amendment to add subsections 4 and 5. These two companies merge, and they are still engaged in export trade. There is then no conspiracy, because the companies have merged and there is now a monopoly or price leadership situation. What is the position of these companies in so far as the Combines Investigation Act is concerned?

As I understood the amendment originally proposed by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate in the banking and commerce committee, it dealt with mergers and monopolies as well as price conspiracies. It appeared to cover the whole range of illicit corporate activities with which this Combines Investigation Act seeks to deal, apart from the resale price maintenance and price discrimination provisions. These are matters which I think should be dealt with and answered.

There was one other matter which I raised and upon which I was not satisfied with the answer given to me by the minister last evening. I think perhaps the point I made is still valid and I should like to reiterate it. In paragraph (c) of the proposed subsection 5 which is before us it is stated:

(c) has restricted or is likely to restrict any person from entering into the business of exporting articles from Canada;

My contention was that there could be some conflict between that provision and the provision in subsection 3 of section 32, which reads in part as follows:

—has restricted or is likely to restrict any person from entering into or expanding a business in a trade or industry.

It was my thought that the minister should have included these words "or expanding a" also in (c). The minister maintains that these things are dealt with in other paragraphs. He mentioned that paragraph (a) contains protection in this regard when it talks of reduction or limitation of the volume of exports of an article. I believe he also made reference to paragraph (b) in which the language used is:

—has restrained or injured or is likely to restrain or injure the export business—

It could be interpreted to mean that if it prevented the expansion of business, therefore it meant to restrain or injure the export business of any domestic competitor who is not a party to the conspiracy, but I think for soundness and for sense my suggestion should be followed. There is a connection between the activities of corporations which conspire to set prices, to limit production, to limit supply or to do any of the other things prohibited in subsection 1. There is a connection as to whether these activities are in the export field or whether they are solely in the domestic field or whether they are all one or a bit of each. There is a close connection. It is very easy for the activities in the export field to spill over into the domestic field and to injure trade or commerce in Canada internally as a result of their extraterritorial designs and activities.

I think it would be best to place these words "or expanding a" in the subsection so that it reads substantially the same as subsection 3. It is dealing with the same thing. The minister started off in subsection 4 by relating it to a paragraph in subsection 1 and saying that in any prosecution under the subsection a corporation may be convicted if certain things take place. This is the same argument or the same thought that is expressed in subsection 2 where it refers to a prosecution under subsection 1. They are relating to subsection 1 in each case. Subsection 3 indirectly relates to subsection 1 because it talks about entering into or expanding a business. I think these things all have a connection with the basic prohibition against conspiracy to injure trade, fix prices and so on.

Accordingly in this regard, Mr. Chairman, I think I should formally place this matter before the committee by moving:

That the amendment be amended by deleting in line 2 of paragraph (c) the word "the" between the words "into" and "business" and substituting therefor the words "or expanding a".

In my view this amendment would bring the provisions or the words in line with those in subsection 3. I do not think it would have as great a tendency to leave the court in the position of wondering whether we meant something different, as to the activities of a conspiracy and their effect on the export market, from what we meant when we were talking about a conspiracy to exchange statistics internally and its effect upon the domestic market.

If it is the intention of the minister that he means something different, then that is another case entirely, but it appears to me that we are getting at the same thing. It seems to me that the minister wants to ensure that if there is a conspiracy on the export market, this should not have any detrimental effect internally, within the nation. Such being the case I think this suggestion should be adopted, for the sake of consistency and in order to make it easier for the courts, if a case such as this gets into the courts, to determine just what parliament was getting at when it drafted these particular words.

Mr. Fulton: This matter was discussed last night and I explained that we had thought about this problem. It is not as though the amendment was drafted without a good deal of care and consideration. We came to the conclusion that the problem of preventing somebody from expanding in an export industry is covered by a combination of subparagraph (a) and subparagraph (b) of this proposed subsection 5. Surely if the arrangement would prevent the expansion of some business in the export field it is covered by (a), because the arrangement is likely to result in limitation of the volume of exports of an article; and if it was not covered by that provision, the arrangement would certainly have the effect of restraining or injuring or being likely to restrain or injure the export business of a domestic competitor under (b). Hence in either one or both of those subsections the problem has been covered.

As I said last night, what my hon. friend seeks to do, whether or not there is any necessity or any logic for it, is to force words which are applicable to one situation into a section or subsection applicable to another situation. Following that course would result in the complete distortion, twisting and straining of words, or else a framing of amendments beyond their natural and proper meanings or their logical and proper compass.

I therefore oppose the amendment, not because I say the objective sought to be achieved is undesirable, but because the objective is already achieved. It has been carefully considered as a matter of drafting, and I submit that the hon. member for Skeena does not base it upon any sound proposition. He would be sound if he could show that it was not covered, but he cannot do that. He is simply basing it on the proposition that exactly the same words should be used in all parts of the bill. That is a proposition with which I cannot agree.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Howard: I think we can show that it is not covered. As I followed the minister's argument, what he says is that expanding a business, for argument's sake, is dealt with in subsection (a) and that if there is a limitation on the volume of exports as a result of this conspiracy, this means that someone has been prevented from expanding.

Mr. Fulton: No; I put it in exactly the reverse way. If somebody is prevented from expanding, then there is certainly limitation of the volume of exports.

Mr. Howard: If someone is prevented from expanding then there is a limitation of volume, the minister says.

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Howard: That is not necessarily the case. The limitation of the volume or the amount of the volume is controlled by factors outside Canada. If, for argument's sake, in the fishing industry they are not able to sell the whole pack because of other factors over which we have no control, factors in other countries and so on, this is a limitation of volume and it could be agreed that this conspiracy has to a degree resulted in that situation. They could argue the other way very easily, and I think with justification; that it was not their conspiracy which resulted in limitation, that it was factors outside the country which resulted in limitation and that therefore they should not be charged.

That is one of the circumstances with respect to so-called competing companies which engage in a conspiracy in the export market, the business structure of one within Canada increasing and the volume of production expanding, and where the other one's volume of production decreases because of factors not related to the conspiracy. Due to, say, a change in ownership or better business management, company A's business expands, company B's business declines, yet the volume of exports of company A remains the same because of factors outside the company. Now, what if this conspiracy prevented the expansion of one company while at the same time another company's business declined?

Mr. Fulton: Then you come to (b).

Mr. Howard: That is one instance which I think might occur and is an argument for putting "expansion of business" in here.

Mr. Fulton: Under the circumstances the hon. member has mentioned it would be covered by (b).

Mr. Howard: I think not, because (b), as I read it, only makes reference to restraining or injuring the export business of a domestic competitor who is not party to a conspiracy. I am talking about people who are party to a conspiracy if an expansion and decline of business take place within the conspiracy. Subparagraph (b) reads:

> —has restrained or injured or is likely to restrain or injure the export business of any domestic competitor who is not a party to the conspiracy, combination, agreement or arrangement;

So with regard to the case I dealt with which might arise, the minister says it could be dealt with under (a), or if not that it could be dealt with under (b). I submit that is not correct because (b) only deals with people outside the conspiracy.

Mr. Fulton: But if it is not one of them which is hurt, if it is not a member of the conspiracy whose volume is reduced, obviously the conspiracy has resulted or is likely to result in a limitation of the volume of exports. So either way it is demonstrable that the situation is covered.

Mr. Howard: The limitation could result in the volume of exports of an individual company being limited or the total volume of exports from the industry being limited. Subparagraph (a) does not talk about either one or the other; it merely talks about the limitation of the volume of exports of an article, and I submit it is the total exports which we are talking about in (a). If it is to be changed to make it clear whether it is talking of the volume of exports of an individual company or something else, then that is fine. But it talks of the volume of exports of an article, which is the total of the exports and which the minister said earlier is what we are concerned with. I was asking whether or not the word "volume" should be changed to "quantity and quality", but the minister said no, because in this context we are talking of the total volume and not the quantity.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not feel that the hon. member has made any case at all for the amendment, and I do not think I would be able to support it.

Mr. Fulton: I do not think I can add anything, Mr. Chairman. It is obvious that we are just in disagreement.

Amendment to the amendment (Mr. Howard) negatived: yeas, 5; nays, 52.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment to the amendment lost.

Mr. Howard: May I raise a point of order at this stage. I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if you would make a ruling or perhaps acquaint me with rulings which have been made in the past as to the position of a member who comes into the chamber after a vote has been called and is in progress. Does he have the right to vote?

The Chairman: I think the rules are clear that when a vote is being taken, no one can enter the house or walk into the chamber.

Mr. Howard: I do not wish to make an issue of it in this particular case, but I did notice two members on the opposite side of the house who entered the chamber while we in the C.C.F. group were standing and being counted and the vote was in progress. They subsequently stood and voted in the negative on the amendment to the amendment. As I say, I do not wish to make an issue of it at this stage or mention the hon. members by name, but I think we should keep that in mind for future activities.

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order, since the hon. member has raised it, it might be of interest to determine just what is the chamber, and whether an hon. member standing behind the curtain at the time the vote is called and who then steps in from behind the curtain is allowed to vote.

Mr. Argue: It is not where one comes from; it is what one does.

Mr. Pickersgill: On the point which has been raised, I know this matter has been considered before and that when a vote is called hon. members must be sitting in their seats if they are to be allowed to vote. It has never been recognized that a member could come in once the counting started and take his seat and then stand up to vote.

The Chairman: For the benefit of the record perhaps I could quote here paragraph (2) of rule 12:

When Mr. Speaker—

And I understand that it applies to the committee as well.

—is putting a question, no member shall enter, walk out of or across the house, or make any noise or disturbance.

Mr. Fisher: On the point of order, in committee generally quite a number of hon. members do not sit in their own places, and it seems to me that what Mr. Chairman has read applies more to votes in the house when Mr. Speaker is in the chair rather than in committee.

Mr. Fulton: It does not say they must be in their own seats; it simply says they shall not enter, walk out of or across the house.

Mr. Fisher: Then it would interest me to know whether a vote in committee is proper if hon. members are not in their proper seats.

The Chairman: When we are in committee I think hon. members must be sitting in seats. Standing order 59 (1) reads:

The standing orders of the house shall be observed in the committees of the whole house so far as may be applicable, except the standing orders as to the seconding of motions, limiting the number of times of speaking and the length of speeches.

I take it that it has been recognized that no hon. member, when Mr. Speaker is in the chair, can be recognized unless he is sitting in his place; but I think when a vote is taken in committee it is not necessary for an hon. member to be sitting in his own seat.

Mr. Pickersgill: Not in his own seat, but in a seat.

The Chairman: Yes, in a seat.

[Mr. Howard.]

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I thought the hon. member for Peel raised a point of order in which he asked for a ruling on whether the area behind the curtains is in the chamber.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, if I may make a respectful suggestion, the question of whether the area outside the curtains and inside the inner walls is in the chamber is a rather complicated matter not free from uncertainty, and I doubt if it is quite fair to ask the chairman of this committee to make a snap ruling on this question. I think it is one you would want to consider very carefully before making a ruling.

The Chairman: I do not think I have to rule on that but only on the application of standing order 12.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, if this interesting point has been sufficiently canvassed I should like to come back to the amendment before the committee solely for the purpose of replying out of the mouth of the Minister of Justice to the Minister of Justice the last time he spoke. The Minister of Justice said it was not the amendment that I moved in the committee on the last day that was responsible for the amendment now before the committee. I am not going to argue in any other way except in the words of the Minister of Justice, which I am now going to put on Hansard to show that the Minister of Justice said that it was precisely that. Here are the hon. gentleman's words as found at page 751 of the committee proceedings of July 18. The minister said about my amendment:

So, for all these reasons—

That refers to the reasons the minister had given up to that time:

—but mainly because I do not think this amendment, as worded, contains sufficient safeguards in the interest of the domestic market and of consumers in Canada, I suggest the amendment be not accepted.

I ask hon. members to note these words:

However, I am prepared to say that, welcoming as I do the indication from the official opposition that improvements could be made in the situation of Canadian industry, without weakening the effect and intent of the combines legislation—

Perhaps I should repeat those words:

—welcoming as I do the indication from the official opposition that improvements could be made in the situation of Canadian industry, without weakening the effect and intent of the combines legislation, I am prepared to consider this question of export trade further and to see whether between the time when this bill may be reported and the time it may come up for consideration in the house we, ourselves, can come up with an acceptable amendment to deal with the position of the export trade.

For the reasons I have given, I do not think this amendment, as presently drafted, meets the criteria which this committee, or any government concerned with the welfare of Canadian consumers, could adopt.

My suggestion is that the amendment be rejected, but that the principle be re-examined to see whether a proposal consistent with the interests of Canadian industry in the export field, and the overriding interest of consumers domestically, can be devised. And, if it can, the government would be happy to suggest such an amendment in the house.

I think we can just leave those words on the record, because they speak for themselves.

Mr. Fulton: Of course, Mr. Chairman, those words are on the record; but it might interest the hon. member to know that before had moved his amendment I had had meetings, as we believe it proper to do although my hon. friends opposite seem to think it is improper, with hon. members supporting the government who were on the banking and commerce committee. I had already indicated to them that I was prepared to reconsider the matter, so of course I was glad to have that evidence of agreement on the part of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. But I assure him most sincerely that he is in error when he seeks to attribute to himself the sole credit for the amendment now before the committee.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate whether he believes the amendment about which he is so enthusiastic and for which he wants to claim a certain amount of paternity or maternity—I could not ascertain which—will be satisfactory as a part of the law for a long period of time, or does he see it only as a temporary means of assisting certain sectors of the export trade?

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall be glad to try to answer that question briefly. I have other evidences of paternity, so I am not particularly interested in the paternity of legislation. Of course I do not object to the minister talking to his friends. I talk to my friends, and I think it is very proper that the minister should talk to his. However, I will still go on believing, despite what the minister said this afternoon, that what the hon. gentleman said that day in the committee is what he really meant. But that is another matter.

To try to answer the hon. member's question briefly, I think it was always intended that, except in so far as a combination had a detrimental effect on competition in Canada, this legislation should not apply to the export industry. In any case I always understood that was the intention, I always thought it was the intention, and I think it should be the intention. I also think that in a period when we do not enjoy a seller's market in the export trade the balance as between the promotion of exports and making absolutely sure that domestic consumers all the time get their supplies is very often on the side of maintaining our export markets and our income in order to buy goods at all.

Anybody who represents mainly fishermen and loggers, as I do, will appreciate what I mean. I am quite sure I said that yesterday and the minister said that too. I do not think either of us is absolutely sure that this amendment will work out entirely satisfactorily. I think it is a pretty good effort at drafting. It seems to me it represents pretty accurately the kind of thing that most of us in the banking and commerce committee and most of the witnesses who were concerned about this matter really wanted. It may be that some of those in the export business would not be as much concerned about consumers as we are, but I think it is a pretty good effort and a splendid tribute to the skill in draftsmanship of the officials who prepared this amendment.

Mr. Fulton: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: As far as I am concerned I hope it works out not to the disadvantage of consumers and I hope it does something to help our export industry. At the same time I thoroughly agree on one point with the hon. member for Skeena, with whom I do not always agree. If I thought this amendment was going to lull the government into feeling that it has now solved the export problem, I would have grave misgivings about it. I believe this government has a terrible problem which it is not facing up to in maintaining and expanding Canadian exports, but that is no reason for not supporting anything that I think may be of some little help in this regard, and that is what I think this may be.

Mr. Fisher: To return to the general discussion, I was not able to be present yesterday when considerable time was spent on this subject. I wish to reiterate my support of the stand of the hon. member for Skeena. We are not going to support this amendment. I scrutinize the statement made yesterday by the minister when he introduced this. I am curious about some things he said, especially in relation to the question asked by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. At page 6971 the minister is reported to have said:

—in the light of the current position in international trade, the situation of Canadian industry is declining—

At page 6972 the minister is also reported as having said:

However concerned we may be about the welfare of our industry in the export field, it still remains the primary concern of all of us to protect the interests of the Canadian consumer at home.

I do not suggest there is any conflict, but as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate indicated some are not concerned enough about the trade position. We feel the only way we can keep a reliable economy alive is through promoting export trade. I come from an area that is even more dependent upon the export trade than the minister's area. I might add that probably my constituency puts more into the export trade in terms of returns to the country than the whole province of Newfoundland.

Therefore when I take a position with regard to this particular amendment I do so with some care because I know there are five pulp and paper mills, mostly in the export market, in my constituency alone, plus several substantial base metal mines. The reason I do not wholly agree with the amendment is that I think it only partly meets the problem. It seems to me it has relevance particularly to the British Columbia fishing and lumber industries. It seems to me that this amendment will be more useful perhaps just to the mines or to the tender susceptibilities of the British Columbia lumber industry than to the salmon packing industry. I am not sure about the effect it may have in so far as the base metal mining industry is concerned, which seems to me to be the other large group that had a representation to make when they appeared before the committee on this matter.

I am not an expert in the international trade field, but I look at the copper situation. I understand that the world price tends to be determined to quite an extent by what is in effect a cartel, in which Canadian copper producers play some part. I think everyone who has been following the crises in Chile and the labour troubles of the Congo, on account of nationalism, recognizes that this factor has been discussed a number of times: What is going to be the effect of the particular troubles there upon world copper prices? My understanding is that several large companies which have a certain kind of interlocking relationship do play a very important part in so far as the world price is concerned.

There is a parallel to the copper situation which is recognized, and that is the question of oil. I think it is recognized here that price determination is not a matter of national groups putting copper or oil on the international trade market. This is what the minister emphasized in his speech, and this would be one means of enabling Canadian industries to face what is in effect a national type of organization. He mentioned Russia, Japan and other types of cartels.

I should very much like to hear from the minister what effect this may have in giving encouragement to Canada to play a greater part in these international oil and copper agreements which, at least from many points of view, are looked upon as not very bad. In other words, there are two kinds of cartels operating in the international field to where our products may be going. One is the national type, or it may now be the regional type as a result of the European common market, and there is also what you might say is the industrial products kind. It does seem to me that this amendment considered this particular possibility.

I do not think that the mining industry, from what I know of it, has ever been particularly stopped by this legislation. I should like to have more specific examples before I would like their position to be taken into consideration. I understand that up until recent years International Nickel to quite an extent, because of their overwhelming share of the market, did, I will not say set the price because the price has some relationship to demand, but they were in a very powerful position and we have heard arguments in the past that they controlled the market. Therefore it seems to me that this amendment is to a degree a sop, or a go-ahead, to two specific groups, namely the British Columbia lumber industry and the salmon industry.

I do not know much about the salmon industry, but I do know what the British Columbia lumber industry does to the lumber industry in eastern Canada and in northern Ontario in particular. Here again it is always a competitive swirl. What happens when the British Columbia lumber industry has difficulty in marketing its lumber or plywood in Britain? I think the minister is aware of it. Immediately they begin to dump some of their surplus on the eastern Canadian market; and because of its very volume and certain transportation rates they have, they are able to put our spruce producers or our plywood producers almost completely out of the market. Our people who produce lumber or pulpwood in northwestern Ontario are delighted when the British Columbia lumber people have an export market, because it means they are not ruining our people.

I make this point. There is a very close connection between the export market and the domestic market in terms of the way British Columbia dominates all the rest of the lumber industry in Canada once it finds its export market has shrunk. This underlines to me the very close connection between the export and the domestic markets and the correlation of price and volume to demand. Therefore it does not seem to me that this amendment is an adequate way to face up to the general problem.

I think we are going to move to the stage where we shall have to have, despite the fact that the lumber industry particularly is against it, some kind of marketing arrangement, with government sponsorship and government participation, which will enable us to meet the challenge in more fields than just salmon or lumber. We have already a recognition of this in fields such as wheat, where there is no problem of the exporter being ruled as a cartel, a combine or a conspiracy because the sale of wheat is government sponsored.

I would be delighted if the minister would give some indication that in the very severe trade picture facing Canada, the government is giving some consideration to sponsorship or participation in a way which will allow us to gear for great expansion in our exports, and certainly to the effect that there would be no penalty for such a conspiracy. But until we know more of the relationship between the export position and the domestic position, it seems to me that this is an inadequate measure.

I do not think the minister would go ahead with this amendment unless he had looked at all the problematical circumstances with respect to our export trade. As I understand it, the largest single export is pulp and paper, or more specifically newsprint. What effect is this amendment going to have in the newsprint field? As I understand it, at the present time the price of newsprint is not a wide open matter. There is very little price fluctuation, and in so far as the United States market is concerned, while there is a certain amount of negotiation and a certain amount of spill of production at a lower price, in the main the price is one that I would not say is set by a conspiracy or coalition but is set by what might be called the big manufacturers in the field.

I remember there were charges several years ago when the head of Abitibi, I believe, D. W. Ambridge, announced an increase in the price of newsprint. There was a big holler from the Americans. I believe a United States senator said that here was an indication of the kind of conspiracy that went on in Canada to milk or bilk American buyers. There surely is quite a close relationship between the price set by the industry for newsprint that goes to the United States and the price that is paid within the domestic market.

I should like to know, for example, the price the Winnipeg Free Press pays for the paper it may buy from the mill at Pine Falls, and the price the mill at Pine Falls gets for the paper it ships to the midwestern United States. I do not believe anyone has ever made a great issue about it, but I think the export price determines the domestic price completely, and that the only difference is in the packing and transportation cost of moving a roll of newsprint from Pine Falls to Winnipeg compared with moving a roll to St. Louis, Missouri, let us say.

When the largest and most profitable of all our export industries is in a position where the relationship between the domestic price and the export price is almost identical, except for the difference in transportation costs, I wonder whether in effect we have not got in this industry just what this amendment sets out to clear. In that sense I intend to argue that the amendment is not necessary. I think it was partly the view of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that he had always thought this would hardly apply in the case of something that was a great earner for Canada. These points indicate to me that this is a much larger and more complicated problem than this amendment can deal with.

It was interesting to note that to an extent the minister agreed with this view. He talked in his speech about the economic problems involved and how complicated the whole matter was, and said that perhaps they should wait for a report from the restrictive trade practices commission. Before we even think about a report from the restrictive trade practices commission I think we should consider something much broader, the whole role of the Canadian government with respect to export trade.

We are avowedly socialists, I believe, and I would expect our point of view to be markedly different from the Liberal or Conservative position. The minister referred to the crisis in export trade and our declining position. I was pleased to hear him say this, because it seems to be in conflict with the somewhat rosy picture we occasionally get from the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It is my view that the situation is serious enough that as a nation we must have a much grander sweep in the export trade picture, and that this amendment is more or less a temporary provision that does not make enough sense for us to be able to support it.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, there is one point which I think should be made, and I should like to move an amendment with respect to it. I am still of the opinion that there should be a relationship between the activities of conspirators under this section and the results of their conspiracy in so far as the prohibitions in subsection 1 are concerned. I believe this point should be covered; therefore I move:

That the amendment be amended by deleting the word "or" at the end of paragraph (c), by adding the word "or" at the end of paragraph (d) and by adding the following as paragraph (e):

"(e) contravenes subsection 1."

Subsection 5 would then read as follows:

Subsection 4 does not apply if the conspiracy, combination, agreement or arrangement...

That is in addition to paragraphs (a) (b) (c) and (d).

Mr. Fulton: With respect, Mr. Chairman, I think the arguments I advanced yesterday against a similar amendment moved by the hon. member apply here. I am sorry that I cannot accept the amendment.

Amendment to the amendment (Mr. Howard) negatived: Yeas, 3; nays, 51.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment to the amendment lost. Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the new section 32 carry as amended? Carried. Shall the title carry?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, do we not have to carry clause 13 of the bill?

The Chairman: Yes.

Clause 13 as amended agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, may I intervene to suggest that, as legislation has been considered today and by arrangement we do not go past one o'clock on such days, the luncheon recess be observed today.

Mr. Pickersgill: I must say in reply to the house leader I do not intend to exercise my right to refuse unanimous consent, though I must also say I do not see any reason why we should waste the next hour.

Mr. Fulton: We could have third reading by unanimous consent by one o'clock.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Pickersgill: Next sitting of the house. We want to see the amendments.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2 p.m.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

Northern administration branch—

282. Branch administration, $1,089,198.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose at six o'clock on Saturday the Prime Minister was speaking on the subject of Canadian participation in the oil and gas resources of northern Canada as well as the mining properties of the future in northern Canada. I should like to take this opportunity of repeating to the committee one remark made by the Prime Minister, which can be found on page 6874 of Hansard, in the right hand column. The quotation is as follows:

But what the minister has done in connection with oil has been to take one of the major steps ever taken in Canada to provide that this vast but exhaustible resource shall provide not only for economic expansion in our country, and ensure an exploitation of them which we can only consider in imagination, but at the same time maintain for Canadians their sovereignty over their country, because no nation worthy of the name can maintain its political sovereignty unless it has every regard for the maintenance of its economic sovereignty.

I read this statement by the Prime Minister to give me the opportunity of emphasizing again that since this government took office, not only have we moved to allow insurance companies to mutualize themselves when they are threatened by an invasion of foreign investment, but we have also passed the national energy act which ensures that before any monopoly or quasi-monopoly is given to any pipe line company, that company will have to satisfy the national energy board that full opportunity has been given for Canadian participation in the ownership of the shares of that company.

The other day I read to the committee the United States regulations, which indicate how that country tries to ensure that no alien shall have control over the resources on the public lands of their country. Their legislation goes back to 1930. As the Prime Minister pointed out, this great concern of the people of the United States over outside investment coming into their country and taking over their natural resources caused them to put these regulations in their statutes 30 years ago, and we only moved in that direction in Canada in 1959.

These regulations in the United States are identical to the regulations in Canada. The thing to remember is that all they had to worry about at any time in their history was the fact that about 15 per cent of the investment in their resources was foreign investment, while the foreign investment rate in Canada is much higher. This has caused considerable concern and anxiety among Canadians. As a result, we believe that we have moved in a major way to give Canadians the chance to participate in the ownership of the resources of this country. We believe, furthermore, that this step was long overdue in this country.

At this time I should like to point out that the regulations in connection with oil, gas and mining only become effective at the time the company goes to ownership. It does not affect them during the exploration period. We simply make certain that every company taking out an exploration lease knows that before it goes to ownership there will have to be an opportunity for participation by Canadians. I should like now to read another of the mining regulations of our country dealing with the processing of these resources. This is regulation 101, and reads:

> All grants and leases issued under the provisions of these regulations are subject to the provision that all ores or minerals mined from locations described in such grants or leases shall be treated and refined within Canada so as to yield refined metal or other product, suitable for direct use in the arts without further treatment; in default whereof the grant or lease issued for such lands shall be and become null and void; and the said lands shall forthwith revert to and become revested in the crown freed and discharged of any interest or claim of any person or persons whomsoever and shall be open to disposal in such manner as the chief may decide; iron ores produced in excess of smelter requirements from locations situated on any of the islands of Hudson bay in the Northwest Territories may, however, be exported for treatment.

I have read this regulation 101 into the record in order to make it absolutely clear that the thinking does not confine itself just to ownership of the mine taking the resources out of the ground. I think it also indicates the government's thinking that there has to be some control over the use of those ores extracted from Canadian soil. Obviously it is to our advantage wherever possible to have these ores processed or refined to the maximum in Canada.

I point these things out in order to make absolutely clear which way the government is moving in regard to meeting the anxiety of the Canadian people over the fact that so much of their natural resources has gone into the hands of foreign investment. As the Prime Minister said on Saturday, we welcome foreign investment here, but we should like them to set up Canadian subsidiaries in which Canadians can invest and have ownership and control, and also we should like the Canadian subsidiaries to act with the national interests of the Canadian people in mind and not those of their parent corporations in whatever country they are situated.

This is a major step forward. I pointed out on Saturday that this is just a start. I have to say at this time that I think this brings into clear focus some of the differences that exist between the vision of development of Canada for Canadians by Canadians that this government has and the vision which was described on Saturday by one of the opposition members as the Liberal vision. In view of the fact that, in the case of oil and gas, between 80 per cent and 87 per cent of the reserves of Canada are now under foreign control and ownership, the question that we must ask ourselves is this. Where were these people with the vision of the Liberals these last 25 years? We have to ask ourselves, what did they do to reconcile the differences or clashes that occurred, as the Leader of the Opposition said, between this question of Canadian control and obtaining international investment? These are the questions which I think we have the right to ask the opposition. The debate we had here on Saturday in my opinion was a good debate, because it brought out in an objective way, and in a way that has been fair I think on both sides, the clear issues which are before us on this subject.

I think it is right for me to say, at least it is an opinion of mine, that the people of Canada ruled on this matter in 1957 and 1958. They thought that the government which had been here for 22 years sitting idly by while these resources had gone into foreign hands did not deserve the confidence of the people of Canada, and they therefore put in power the government led by the present Prime Minister.

The Liberals say they have a vision. I say they have no vision, because if we allowed this type of thing to continue for which they stood, Canada would soon be in a position in which, no matter what governments did, her resources would be gone unless there was a willingness to go into the policy of repudiation and taking over of contracts just as other countries have done.

The previous government is on record as saying that nothing could be done; that it was not the place of the federal government to do anything; that these resources belonged to the provinces and nothing could be done by the federal government to be helpful. I say that we have done something, and we intend to go on giving a lead. We know that the resources in the provinces belong to the provinces, and there will be no interference on our part; but I also suspect that as the provincial governments read these regulations we have put into effect dealing with our resources in the north, they will be following suit; because if they do not follow suit the people of the provinces will force them to do so by changing governments. We want to give Canadians a real chance to participate in the ownership of their resources. We have taken the lead as a federal government in those areas over which we have jurisdiction, and we expect that the provinces will follow.

A second theme that arose during the debate on Saturday and on which I want to say a few words is this question which the Leader of the Opposition, with his fondness for parallel structure, put forward in this way. He said the Conservative vision was a mirage, that it was a series of declamations and not development. He said it was words, not action. I should like to join issue with the Leader of the Opposition on this point with a series of things that this government has done. But before I do that I should like to remind the committee of something that occurred in 1955 and 1956, namely the submissions of various groups to the Gordon commission which made a series of reports in 1955 and 1956. For example, I should like to start with a document that the Leader of the Opposition used, namely a brief presented to the Gordon commission by the commissioner of the Northwest Territories. The date of his submission was November 22, 1955.

I am going to read into the record the recommendations made by the commissioner of the Northwest Territories; then I shall have something to say about what was done by the previous administration and what was done about these recommendations by the present administration. I am quoting from page 23. The heading of the section is "Ways and Means of Encouraging Economic Development". I will start at paragraph 3 on this page:

> Before discussing how the costs of transportation can be brought down, the first question to be decided is whether it is desirable, at this stage of Canada's economic development, to introduce any special measures to stimulate economic development in the north. It could be argued that the development of the mineral resources of the country should be determined entirely by the current supply and demand position of the resources in question.

I am interrupting myself here in order to say that I have heard this argument presented in this House of Commons on several occasions.

> If a zinc-lead deposit is found in a region which is so remote that it does not pay the mining company or the railroad company to build a railroad to the deposits, the normal contention would be that the deposits should be allowed to stay in the ground until other mines are used up and it becomes profitable to build a railroad. The same line of reasoning could be applied to the economic development of the north generally.
> This line of argument might have considerable validity but for three facts. The first is that it is exploration as well as production which requires the stimulus of adequate transportation facilities. The second is that there is often a gap of between five and ten years between the time when a promising mineral deposit is discovered and when a mine can be brought fully into production—and in the north it is usually closer to ten years than five. This means that it is desirable to stimulate exploration approximately ten years ahead of the time when it is believed that the production from a region will be required. If nothing is done until the demand exceeds the known supplies, then additional supplies in the remote area will not have been discovered and will not be ready to come into production. Consequently, for a period of five or ten years prices of certain vital raw materials will be substantially higher than would have been necessary if a more far-sighted policy had been adopted.

Then it goes on to give the reasons, that is to say the needs of the people who live in the north. Then this brief to the royal commission recommended three things that should be done in opening up the north. The first of these was a railroad to Great Slave lake. The second was development roads, not roads to known developments but roads to open up virgin resources in new areas. The third was air routes to the Arctic.

Mr. Chairman, I mention these three practical suggestions put forward by the commissioner of the Northwest Territories as evidence that there was knowledge in the ranks of officials of the federal government of what had to be done. But what was the attitude of the government in power? This report was never submitted to cabinet. There was no action taken on these recommendations made by this commissioner. It was left to the new government coming to power in 1957 to pick up this report ignored by the previous administration and take the necessary steps.

I would like to make it abundantly clear that when we speak of these development roads and I hear members of the official opposition standing up and saying that this submission was given to the Gordon commission when they were in power and that all these are their ideas, nothing could be further from the truth. Because a year after this submission was being transmitted to the Gordon commission we had a minister of the crown in that government, the former minister of northern affairs and national resources, speaking in Toronto at the meeting of the Empire club, on December 13, 1956.

I will not go through the whole 18 pages of his speech, but I would just read his conclusions. In his speech he described the list of things which the federal government was doing by itself and the list of things the federal government was doing in co-operation with the provinces. Then he pointed out that these resources belong to the provinces and that there is not very much the federal government can do. Then this is what he said about our national development plan, and I quote now from his speech:

> To go beyond that, however, to try to impose an over-all blueprint, a national policy as some understand it, for resource management, to do that is to depart from the facts of our national situation. I have suggested already why such a master plan must fail in its purpose. In a country as vast as Canada with widely different conditions and with different problems in different areas, there cannot be a single and unified policy for the management of resources.

Mr. Chairman, I have put this on the record before. Mr. Lesage's attitude was that you could not call a conservation conference, that the difficulties were so great and the regional problems so intricate that it would be impossible to get anything done. Therefore the government of that day continued a characteristic which had become part and parcel of them in the last ten years of their office. They were passive. They did nothing. They let these problems mount up and mount up and mount up and did nothing.

Mr. Chairman, that is why I used the expression in my opening remarks that this government differed from the previous administration; that we were a dynamic government; that we believed that private enterprise should develop our resources. We believed there were certain things which governments could do which would encourage private enterprise to go into the remote areas of our country and develop these resources for Canadians and by Canadians.

The Leader of the Opposition was somewhat concerned when I mentioned this and saw fit to get up and say that his party were dynamic. He quoted a speech of his in 1953 which listed all those things which should be done. All I point out is that if you want to say that some believe in declamations and not developments, there was that government. They made the declamation in 1953. There were officials of the government who made the representations to the Gordon commission, but the government did not take those recommendations seriously and did nothing about them.

I would like to point out by contrast just what this government did. Communications have been mentioned; I and other hon. members, including the hon. member for Mackenzie River, have said that communications in the north are vital. At the present time there is telephone communication—in fact at this very moment—between Ottawa and Frobisher bay; it went into effect last December. At the present time there are communication lines being built through Alberta, British Columbia, Yukon, right through to Alaska. At the present time there are communication lines being built leading up to Yellowknife; I think the target date for completion of the last two I have mentioned is next year. We have demonstrated, not by speeches made in 1953—

Mr. Chevrier: What about the Pine Pass railway?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I will come to that.

Mr. Chevrier: You had better hurry up.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I have lots of time.

Mr. Pearson: Repetition is reputation.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): In spite of the fine speeches of the Leader of the Opposition in 1953, we have the speech of the responsible minister saying that nothing should be done.

Let me now pass on to the next thing we have done. It was clearly evident that there should be more knowledge of the north, one of the great valuable areas of the world lying unpopulated and uncontrolled. Outside of a few meteorologists, a few mounted policemen, a few Eskimos and a few odds and ends of government personnel from various sources, there was no one in these Arctic islands. We set up a polar continental shelf study under the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, and now leading scientists of the government service are finding out these necessary things about our Arctic islands; they are providing the knowledge about and sovereignty over our country and helping private enterprise industries to go up there and find resources.

As to oceanography, there is an institute of oceanography being set up now in Halifax. Why was this not done years ago? To move into our northern islands in order to fully develop our shores we have to know about ocean currents. The Russians are leading the world in this work at the present time, and we are finally doing the things which should have been done a generation ago.

Then last year we spoke a little bit on the estimates about airfields. I would like to read a list of airfields built by this present government to help mining operations in the north. There is the airfield at Yellowknife mines; the airfield to be built at Rayrock mines in the Northwest Territories. There is the airfield we are still building for Taurcanis Mines Limited; and now there is a proposal before the government to build an airfield for Canada Tungsten Limited at Flat lake, Northwest Territories. I mention these things in communications and Arctic research to show we are moving forward.

With regard to the depths of our waters off our coasts, I asked the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys when we first came into office how long it would take, at the rate we were going, to get information about the depths of our channels and harbours in these northern areas and on our coasts, and the answer was 250 years. I maintain that a government that can move at that pace is not dynamic; it is as passive as a piece of jelly. It just jiggles and does not go any place.

I would like at this time to list the development roads we have built under the recommendation of this submission to the royal commission. There are the Yukon, Pelly and Stewart rivers which now have bridges across them which were not there two years ago. This makes it possible to double and triple the tonnage coming out of the mines in question there. We have rebuilt the Canol road up to the Ross river, and one of the most interesting discoveries in Canada is taking place there, the discovery of molybdenum which is used in hardening steel. Then there is the road from Watson Lake to Carmacks; construction was started this year. There is the road from Eagle plain which I have already described, and that was a road so vital to the oil industry that when we did not get through the pass which we had to overcome in the first 50 miles last year, the oil company was not even willing to wait until this year to do its exploration and built a temporary road 300 miles round the mountains so they could do their exploration last year.

Mr. Chairman, I mention these things in passing. I did not mention the road around Slave lake because it is under survey this year. I mentioned that our interest had been switched to the Fort Simpson-Laird-Fort Nelson road. I just list these things. We did not talk about what the royal commission recommended, nor did we make declamations about it. We took action, and that illustrates the difference between the passivity of the previous administration and the dynamic activity of the present government.

We know there is much to be done. We see these great sources of hydro power on the Yukon river. We see them in the east on the Hamilton river in Labrador. We know that before this country can move forward to the point where cheap processing of our goods is possible, we have to be able to harness and move tremendous reserves of energy from surplus to deficit areas.

The Prime Minister put this on record last September in the town of Kitimat, British Columbia. He indicated that what this country needs is a national power policy. This national power policy has as its heart and centre a grid tying together these great reserves of power in the remote areas in our north into which large quantities of surplus energy in electrical form can be poured at any time and taken off at any point.

This government did not just talk about this matter. It set up a special research group on long range transmission. I call as witness to this action the premier of British Columbia. Mr. Bennett knows about this and approves. He is quite interested in the Peace river and in having the northern part of his province hooked into this national grid. I call as witness the premier of Newfoundland. He has been made aware of our thinking in this regard and has spoken of it highly. In fact I think he got carried away with enthusiasm one night at a service club dinner and divulged what was going on with respect to the possibility of some people from Russia coming in. I call as witness, too, the previous administration of the province of Quebec, as well as a representative of Ontario hydro, Mr. Hearn, the president, Mr. Duncan, and Mr. Cass-Beggs of the Saskatchewan power commission.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent to the minister to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Chevrier: We did on Saturday and we do again now, so carry on.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I thank the committee, Mr. Chairman. I mention this because it is important. The plan we have of national development does not just concern itself with "ad hoc-ery", to use a term taken from Mr. Lesage's speech, "a little bit here and a little bit there". We had to cut out the undergrowth and pick up a series of projects in various parts of the country to enable what had to be done to be carried on.

Mr. Chevrier: Is this "in-mockery"?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I suggest too, Mr. Chairman, that a country with the great resources we have of butane, propane and other L.P.G. fuels which are going to waste in many parts of the country must bring these into deficit areas. If this were done our whole country would be better off.

The hon. member for Laurier asked about the Pine Point railway. I think it is time I put before the committee some of the facts about this matter. The Pine Point railway was recommended in the submission of the commissioner of the Northwest Territories in 1955, and the previous government did nothing about it. In 1958 there was mention of it in the speech from the throne. We were willing as a government to go ahead and build that railway, because we knew first of all from the over-all position of the lead and zinc supplies of the world that there was need to get moving fast in the production of more lead and zinc in Canada. At that time we knew there was a surplus, but we also knew it would take several years to bring this mine into operation.

We put ourselves on record as being willing to build this railway. However, the local people in Alberta, by representations to the government and by statements in the press, indicated that there was a difference of opinion as to where this railway should be built. We had cognizance of the fact that in a democracy where there are differences of opinion, those differences should be brought before a body who could reach some determination. The governments of British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Alberta and the people of those provinces as well as various companies made representations on the subject. The report is now before the government.

I am not going to make any comments on the report itself with but two exceptions. The decision of the members of the commission is clear to all those who have read the report. I think certain facts should be brought forward. In the first place this railway is estimated to cost over $65 million. The government will have to put up not $65 million or $68 million—whatever it comes to, we do not know—but the traditional subsidy to development railways which is $25,000 per mile, or roughly $10 million, and the railway companies will have to put up the balance. That is one fact.

The second thing on which I should like to comment is this. The suggestion was made in the report of the royal commission that it might be possible to take this tonnage out by road from the Pine Point mine. Theoretically that is possible, but I want to warn hon. members of the committee that the report ignores the question of who is going to build and who is going to pay for the road to bring out this 200,000 tons of ore a year. In the opinion of my engineering officials the capital cost of building a gravel road would be in the neighbourhood of $39 million, and the capital cost of a paved road would be $53 million. The cost of the operation and paying capital expenditures indicates that once you reach the figure of approximately 95,000 tons per year it would be cheaper to build the railroad than to construct a road. If the road were paved and the cost were higher it would take a higher tonnage before it was balanced off; or in plain terms, the cost of building and maintaining a road for a tonnage greater than roughly 100,000 tons a year is such that it would be better in the long run to build a railway.

I mention that because with these facts in mind, in view of the government's willingness to go ahead with this railroad, it is clearly evident where the government stands on what it wants to do. I have not had much help from the commission in deciding on the route.

Let me deal with another point under this heading. I was asked by the Leader of the Opposition if we considered markets when we went into these development projects. The implication was that if you did not consider the marketing possibilities there was no use opening up the mine. It is no longer a secret that if this mine is not in production by 1963 or 1964, lead and zinc will have to be imported into Canada to keep the smelters going at Trail. Those things were in the mind of my department when we made the proposition to the government that this railroad should be built. It is true that world lead and zinc prices had gone down at that time. It is true that there was an embargo or quota system against lead and zinc going into the United States. It is also true, however, that we proceeded in spite of these things, because we believed that the United States had no right to look upon us as an extension of their economy.

As minister of Canadian resources it was my responsibility and duty to recommend those things that would keep Canada in a position wherein our great reserves of lead and zinc in this country could be utilized and we would not be forced into the position of having to import. The extent of the importation can be realized by the following figures which I wish to place on the record concerning average foreign purchases.

Mr. Chevrier: Before the minister proceeds perhaps he will permit me to ask a question. If parliament were to approve the building of the Pine Point railway at its 1961 session how long, according to the information available to the minister, would it take to build the railway and have it ready for operation?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): My estimate on the basis of the information given me is about four years.

Mr. Chevrier: In that case it would not estop the importation of lead and zinc from other countries?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): That is quite true, Mr. Chairman. What I am trying to do is build up the evidence that assists people to realize the importance of going ahead with this railway.

Mr. Brunsden: May I ask the minister a question? Is there any disposition, as seen by the minister, on the part of the Alberta government to participate in the capital cost of the railway?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The MacGregor royal commission report on northern Alberta recommended that the government of Alberta participate in the cost of the bridge going across the Peace river, but I have not had any communication from the Alberta government showing its willingness to participate.

May I now give the figures to which I referred. It is estimated that the cost of imports at the Trail plant would be $14 million; it is estimated that in addition we would lose exports valued at $7 million a year, or there would be a total change in our foreign exchange balance of $21 million a year, owing to this railway not being built.

I have put the facts before the committee, Mr. Chairman, with the idea of giving some basis for an objective conclusion on the part of the people of Canada in making up their minds about what should be done with respect to the Pine Point railway.

I have transgressed on the time of the committee, Mr. Chairman, so I am going to conclude with this statement and I shall make it as strong as I can. The purpose of the government in its national development policy is to have more processing in Canada. This processing in Canada cannot come from sitting here idly, passively and letting things work out by themselves. We believe that in today's economics and today's world competition what is required is to get down to the simple basic facts of producing something cheaper than any other nation can produce it. This means that where you have great resources of energy in juxtaposition with great resources of natural products, and where these can be brought together to produce something cheaper by uniting the energy with the resources, we can hold our own in the world competition battle as a processing country.

Second, we believe that with the Canadian ingenuity, so well demonstrated in the past, in the field of metallurgy, our scientists will produce new types of steel, steel mixed with uranium, steel mixed with molybdenum, steel hardened with titanium, steels that can stand cold weather, steels that will meet competition all over the world; and by keeping ahead in the metallurgical field we can move into foreign markets and retain our position in our own markets.

Also we do believe that there has to be a great deal of co-operation between the federal government and the provinces in working with our resources as a whole, and not 11 different government agencies all going their own way and all losing out in this battle that we are in. Whether it affects the Combines Investigation Act, which allows industries to share market information or to combine on research or to come together on export products; whether it is a question of the scientific work of governments or industry, these are things that must all be tied up under the over-all watchfulness of 11 governments which own these resources, and that is one of the main reasons why we have set up this conservation conference to meet next year.

No, Mr. Chairman; the vision that we talk about as a government does have enthusiasm, but it is no mirage. It does have idealism, but we do the things that are practical and realistic. It is a vision which to us is logical and coherent in so far as development is concerned. It does take in all the facts of life there are in Canada in relation to these resources. Let me put it as simply as I can. Canadians all working together can achieve the things that we have in mind.

I think I should point out that the program I have described is a national development program only in the first stages. The second, third and fourth stages are still to come, but much has to be done before we even reach those stages. I am very glad of the opportunity the committee has given me to meet head on the statements of the members of the opposition on this question of the national development policy of the government. It gives me a chance to put forward very clearly the distinctions between us. I think the debate has been carried on on a very high level; I think it has done a great deal of good to clear the minds of many hon. members and I do trust of the people of the country as a whole.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister a question now that he has completed his remarks? Is it fair to say that from what the minister said during the course of his statement this afternoon and on Saturday, the government to which he belongs is a government "des visions" and not a government "de vision"?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I am not trained in the dialectics of certain people, and all I can say in answer to the observation of the hon. member for Laurier is that I think the people will measure us by results and not by the words we use.

Mr. Chevrier: May I say it was not a dialect I was using but the other official language of Canada.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Still dialectic.

Mr. Pearson: I should like to take up at the beginning the last words of the minister, when he said that the people of Canada will measure his government by its results. We agree with him. I think they will not measure this government by the eloquence of the words used by its members in discussions of this kind.

The minister has repeated this afternoon a good deal of the arguments and the words used last Saturday. He may have been helping, or so he may think, to win the next election, but he did not help very much, I am afraid, to get his estimates through this committee.

The trouble with the minister is that so far as the northern parts of Canada are concerned, he seems to believe it was discovered and explored not by Sir John Franklin, not by Frobisher or by the great men of that time, but by Mr. Alvin Hamilton in June, 1957. He seems to be still dazzled by the vision of that discovery. The results of that dazzlement we have seen this afternoon in the glorification of what he considers to be the record of the government in this field of development. But, Mr. Chairman, facts are more important than words; and the fact remains, and the appropriations show it, that in spite of all his talk and his deprecation of the record of those who preceded him, who according to him did nothing—they were passivists—the amount of money they appropriated in two years to the department over which he now presides for development purposes under the previous administration equals the amount of money that his government has appropriated in three years for that purpose.

That fact is far more important in its bearing on development than all the adjectival exuberance of the minister which we had this afternoon and Saturday. Why, his estimates which we are considering now to carry out his vision, are $10 million less than they were last year. The only respect in which they have been increased is in the administration of the minister's department. There has been an increase there, and we are not complaining about that; he made a very good case for that increase. But I say the minister is asking us to appropriate money for the development of this country, about which he talks so much, to the extent of $10 million less than last year. That is a complete and sufficient answer to all the talk about the glorious record of the minister and his government in the last three years.

The minister talked about the importance of communications and transportation this afternoon as if nothing had been done in that field in the north country in the last 10 or 15 years. He even had the effrontery, and I say that in no opprobrious sense, to bring up the Pine Point railway as an example of what they have done in the field of communication and transportation, as railway which the government said in the speech from the throne in 1958 would be constructed at once and money would be appropriated for that purpose, a railway which his leader said in the election campaign of 1957 would be commenced at once, and which the minister now tells us in July of 1960 is being considered on the basis of the report of a royal commission which made no recommendation as to where the railroad should go.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I wonder whether the Leader of the Opposition would permit me to ask a question. In view of the protests of the people of Alberta, would he have built the railway without giving them a chance to put forward their viewpoint?

Mr. Pearson: I should like to ask the minister why they said in the election campaigns of 1957 and 1958 that they would do it at once. Why did he not think about this consideration then? Why did the government put in their very first speech from the throne that they would appropriate money for the building of the railroad in 1958? Why did they not think about this other factor at that time? Now he tells us they had to take a lot of time to get the views of the people, and in order to do so they had to set up a royal commission, all of which takes time. Of course it does. But when we point out to him that it took time when we were in office he says that we were passive and did not do anything. Again there is a contrast between the words of the minister and the facts.

Although not strictly relevant to this item, the minister talked this afternoon about roads to resources, development roads. When I was talking the other day I mentioned one particular road which would be a road to a resource and which would assist in the salvation of the community at Elliot Lake. He had never heard of it. The provincial government of Ontario had heard about it, his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce had heard about it, but the minister had never heard about it.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, what I said was that I knew the road the Leader of the Opposition mentioned had been under discussion by this committee, but I had not been informed—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I do not see any question of privilege. It is just a disagreement.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am very sorry, but I must insist—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Pearson: I accept the minister's remarks even though there is no question of privilege. He says he knew there was such a project but it had not been brought to his attention.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I must rise again. If the Leader of the Opposition will examine the record, and I did not change it, he will find I said I had not been informed officially by the government of Ontario. I knew the committee had been discussing that road, but I had not been approached officially.

Mr. Pearson: All right; the minister has not been informed officially about this particular road to resources which had been announced officially by the province of Ontario as something that was going to be done and about which they had been in conversation and conference with the federal government. The minister had better consult his colleague and his friends in Toronto. He says he had not been told about it officially, but his government apparently has, because they seem to know something about it.

I mention this matter once again to pour the cold water of reality on the minister's exuberant statements. The other day and again this afternoon the minister seemed to take a great deal of pleasure in deprecating the record of his predecessor, Mr. Lesage, a record which will stand on its own and does not need any apology from us on this side. As found on page 6869 of Hansard of last Saturday, the minister was trying to point out that nothing had been done by the previous government. He said that he held the previous administration responsible for not looking after those very valuable resources in the north country. He repeated this afternoon that nothing had been done until 1957 and that we were responsible, especially Mr. Lesage, for the fact that the resources of our north country had not been looked after.

He criticized Mr. Lesage particularly because apparently at one stage he had made a statement in Toronto in which he pointed out and underlined the difficulties of management of our resources in this country except in full co-operation with the provinces, he quite rightly pointed out that the federal government has not control of and cannot plan or manage resources except in co-operation with the provinces, which is a very sound and sensible doctrine, the only doctrine under which we can develop our resources in Canada.

I am going to quote some of the statements the minister made on Saturday, because I cannot be contradicted when I read from Hansard. My memory of what the minister said this afternoon might not be accurate in every respect, because the minister proceeded very quickly and eloquently and it was hard to follow his words; but in talking about the development of the north he did say on Saturday, as found on page 6869 of Hansard:

> The real task was to make certain that the oil, gas and mineral wealth of our northern areas, particularly those in the Arctic islands, would be preserved for Canadians—
> "Would be preserved".
> —now and in the future.

He also had this to say about the oil, gas and mining regulations which have been put into effect in recent months, which show how this wealth is going to be preserved for Canadians now and in the future. He was referring to the regulations, the exploration permits which were given and the methods that were adopted to attract foreign capital, which he thinks can be so damaging to us, and as found on page 6870 he said:

> In other words, we gave a cheap land proposition to the oil industry of the world—

Presumably that is how the minister is going to preserve—that was the word he used—for Canadians the resources of the north by giving a cheap land proposition to the oil industry of the world. He also made this statement, as found on page 6869, as another illustration of the virtuous endeavours of the government in this field of development of resources:

> Naturally when we began to work out these new regulations we began to think in terms of how we can stop, how we can prevent what has happened in Alberta...

In other words—perhaps the minister will explain this—what they were thinking about, among other things, was how they could prevent federally what has happened in Alberta in this industry. On the subject of preserving for Canada control of its resources, there is no difference of opinion between members of the house as to the desirability of ensuring maximum Canadian participation and maximum Canadian control in the development, management and ownership of these resources. We are all agreed on that, but some of us know more than the minister seems to know about the difficulties of reconciling the necessity of foreign investment and the primary necessity of Canadian control of our own resources.

As found on page 6871 of Hansard the minister talked about the yoke—that was the word he used—of foreign capital, the yoke of foreign investment, and the great progress that had been made in Canada under the present government in freeing Canada from that yoke of foreign investment. There has been a great deal of progress, I admit, in talking about that freedom and that yoke, but what do the figures show as to the progress that has been made in freeing

Canada from what the minister called the yoke of foreign investment? Referring to the dominion bureau of statistics "Balance of International Payments 1959", page 14, and the "Canadian Balance of International Payments, 1958", table 8. I am only going to quote one excerpt from these publications. They bear reading in relation to the boast the minister has made about the progress this government has made in freeing us from this yoke. These figures are from official publications; on the balance of international payments, from the part entitled "Non-resident ownership and control of Canadian industry".

The last detailed analysis of foreign ownership was issued in December of last year and covers the year 1957. The balance of payments officials have, however, made estimates of the total non-resident owned long term investment in Canada for the years 1958 and 1959. This series contains an estimate of retained earnings in Canada plus long term investment. It thus is a valid measure of the growth of foreign ownership in Canada.

Here are the figures: 1956, total non-resident investment in Canada amounted to $15.6 billion; 1957, $17.5 billion; 1958, $19.1 billion; 1959, $20.6 billion. The only conclusion that can be drawn from these figures is that total non-resident ownership has increased by one third since 1956. This is how we have been freed from the yoke of foreign investment. While the minister talked about the "yoke" his leader, the Prime Minister, referred to foreign investment in somewhat different terms. I quote from his statement which appears on page 6873 of Hansard for July 23, 1960:

> Foreign investment is beneficial. Foreign investment has done much to improve the economical situation in Canada.

Then he went on to emphasize that external capital had played a very important part in our development. This is just another example, Mr. Chairman, of that schizophrenia that seems to afflict the members of the cabinet. The minister in his statement this afternoon repeated what the Prime Minister said; that the yoke, in so far as foreign investment in the United States was concerned, was never at any time more than 15 per cent of the national income. That was the figure the minister used, while the Prime Minister said that in Canada the corresponding proportion as late as 1957 was almost 75 per cent. Perhaps the minister will try to confirm this figure, that as late as 1957 the corresponding figure for foreign investment in Canada was 75 per cent of our national income. Obviously the Prime Minister was not very careful about his statistics on this matter.

Then the Prime Minister went on to say, and the minister confirmed it this afternoon, that this situation is improving. I have given the figures to show how the situation is improving. The total non-resident ownership has increased by one third since 1956. If the situation has improved however, in the sense that in the last 18 months less foreign capital has come into this country for development purposes, we know the reason for that. Perhaps the minister will get a lot of comfort out of the fact that there has been a decrease in foreign investment capital coming into this country lately. Perhaps he will be very pleased that this may be interpreted as freeing us from the yoke of foreign control. There is another reason to explain that decrease in foreign investment in the last 18 months, and that reason was given by the deputy chairman of the dollar-sterling trade council, writing in the Financial Post of May 21, 1960. I shall quote two paragraphs from this article by A. G. S. Griffin, deputy chairman of the dollar-sterling trade council. He said:

> The past 18 months have seen an important change in the attitude of U.K. and foreign investors toward Canada.
> Visitors to London and other European financial capitals can no longer bask in a glow of satisfaction from plaudit heaped upon plaudit over the way we run our country, treat our foreign capital and develop our resources.
> There is a good deal of grumbling and some positive indignation—as if the overseas investor had been the victim of some vast conspiracy.

Then, Mr. Chairman, on Saturday the Prime Minister had something to say about his vision of the north. Perhaps I had better read what he said:

> Mr. Chairman, a word on these vast potential resources. Somebody spoke of a mirage. Until the vision of the north turns out to be a mirage let me say that the millions and millions of acres which have been taken up in the north, the developments which have taken place there, the opening up of the country and the rendering available to private enterprise of an opportunity and a climate for development has meant much to Canada during the past three years.

I will ask the minister now to give us the figures in regard to this development in terms of oil and gas exploration permits, and also to give us the figures or give us the information regarding the nationality of the companies and corporations that are responsible for taking up these permits, whether they are United States corporations, whether they are Canadian subsidiaries of United States corporations, whether they are other foreign corporations or whether they are bona fide Canadian individuals and Canadian corporations.

The Prime Minister went on to say:

> I remember speaking in 1957 and in 1958 about the highways in the north and the opening of the north igloo to igloo. That was the viewpoint of the opposition.

I will repeat what I said the other day, Mr. Chairman; that the program put forward by the Prime Minister and his colleagues during that election period was not a program of development, it was a program of electoral intoxication. When they talked about this great program of development, this great billion dollar public works program, this great program of communications and transportation which was going to solve the unemployment problem or play a large part in solving the unemployment problem, we on this side said that was a phony program in terms of employment. It has turned out to be just that.

The minister did not reply to me on Saturday when I asked him how much employment had been provided by road development in the north since he gave the last figures, which was something over 2,000 men for the previous year.

Mr. Fisher: May I ask the Leader of the Opposition what he means by "north"? I want him to be specific.

Mr. Pearson: I mean by "north" the areas under federal control, and those areas where the government has initiated a roads to resources program with the provinces; that is the kind of roadbuilding and communications program which was put forward by the government to cope with our unemployment problem.

Then the minister had this to say, as reported on page 6869 of Hansard for July 23, 1960. He talked about this great Canadian proposal which has won for Canada the control of the continental shelf. I will read what he had to say about it.

> We have brought those regulations in, using the Public Lands Grants Act and the Territorial Lands Act, and for the first time in Canada's history we have the legal machinery to give to Canadians or to anybody else the right to explore in our Arctic islands or in those islands off the coast. I hold the previous administration responsible through the error of omission for not looking after those very valuable resources north of our country.

Well, I have dealt with that. Then he went on to say that as the result of a Canadian resolution—no, I had better quote what he said about it:

> It is no accident that the Canadian resolution on the law of the sea conference in Geneva suggested that all the lands that lie beneath the sea, the continental shelf, as far out as you can develop them, should belong to the littoral state for exploration purposes.

Well, I should like to have the minister tell this committee when that specific Canadian proposal was put before the international law conference at Geneva which established the jurisdiction of the littoral state over the continental shelf. If I am not wrong—and the minister can correct me if I am wrong—the proposal appeared in the original report of the United Nations commission which was preparing for this conference. The minister now points out that it was the Canadian proposal that secured for Canada the continental shelf. What happened was that this was discussed at the conference at Geneva. There was general agreement on it, and as a result of that agreement all countries now have accepted and recognized control over the resources of the continental shelf. But when we asked the minister, as reported at page 6873 of Hansard of last Saturday, what was the relationship of this doctrine to provincial control—and this is an important matter, who actually controlled the continental shelf off provincial coasts as contrasted with the continental shelf off federal territories—who actually controlled the resources of that part of the shelf, the provincial government or the federal government, the minister said:

> This is a matter of government policy and will be declared in due course.

My friend the hon. member for Ottawa East asked this question:

> Has the minister had any requests from the provinces for the transfer of rights on the continental shelf?

The minister's reply was no, but the fact is this, as the minister must know. Indeed, in an earlier question—

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I wonder whether the Leader of the Opposition would help me. I just want to understand clearly what he said. He stated that I said that the matter of the continental shelf ownership was a matter of government policy. Can he point out to me where I said that?

Mr. Pearson: I have said two things. The minister now claims that this great development in international law by which the state has control of the continental shelf was the result of a Canadian proposal at Geneva, and I asked for information about that matter. I have also said that the minister said that the question as to whether the crown in the right of the provinces or the crown in the right of the federal government controlled the resources on the continental shelf off provincial coasts is a matter of government policy which will be announced in due course.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): From where does that quotation come? I never made that statement.

Mr. Pearson: If the minister will just read his own words in Hansard of last Saturday as reported at page 6873, and that is not very far back, he will find that in answer to a question asked by my friend the hon. member for Villeneuve, to be found down toward the end of the page, he replied as follows:

This is a matter of government policy and will be declared in due course.

He also said earlier, according to press reports, when he was questioned about the matter of ownership of the continental shelf by the federal or provincial authority, "So far we have not stirred anybody up on this". But this is a matter which has already been stirred up in the provinces. At the Atlantic provinces conference last September, held in Fredericton, the premier of Nova Scotia at that time—that was last September—called for a decision on the ownership of submarine mineral rights. I am now quoting from press accounts of the meeting:

Premier Stanfield also called for a decision on the ownership of submarine mineral rights. He said the constitutional question of whether they belonged to the province or to the government of Canada should be settled.

Indeed it should be settled, because it is one of the most important questions that can face the federation at the present time; that is to say, who owns those rights on the continental shelf. The minister says, however, it is a matter of policy and "we are not stirring anybody up about this".

There are many other things I could say and there are many other questions that we shall be asking because of what the minister has already said. But I think I have put on the record sufficient to indicate the situation. In spite of the eloquence of the minister and in spite of the exuberance of words that came from him this afternoon and on Saturday, the record itself will determine, as the minister says, the result that will be achieved. And when he talks about the passive record of the Liberal government in the past I ask him to look at the record from 1900 to 1910, from 1920 to 1931 and from 1945 to 1957. If he thinks that Canada developed in those great years of development through passive governments he had better read a little bit more of his history than he has been reading lately. In conclusion I remind the minister once again that no matter what he may say, history in this country did not begin in June of 1957.

Mr. Fisher: As the third history teacher speaking in this debate, I should like to get into it and say that I should like to make some historical comments also. I was flabbergasted last Saturday when, in the quiet of this committee, with perhaps 30 or 35 members present, who should rise and take part in the debate but the Prime Minister. Here on the eve of a dominion-provincial conference he found the time to come in and give us his reinterpretation of the vision. This procedure seemed to me to underline the importance that he and the minister must attach to the vision for some purposes which I hope to analyse.

I thought at first that this was a bit of an insult to the minister. It is a rare occasion when a prime minister comes in and defends in essence the general position of a department in the government frame of policy when the minister is before the house. But I do not see the matter in quite that way now. I see it more in terms of an abnormal sensitivity on the part of the Prime Minister and the government with regard to the most blatant or, one could put it, the most flagrant of their political promises and their inability to live up to it.

I should like to ask the minister whether he has ever stopped to wonder why it was that in northern Ontario, from the Manitoba border all the way down to south of Sudbury, the Conservative party in this last election, which he said gave them carte blanche, or words to that effect, or at least a criticism of the Liberal party's position toward the north—did so badly in that part of the country. I should like to tell him one of the reasons is that the people of northern and northwestern Ontario live in an area where we have, to use this phrase that is so overused, vast, boundless natural resources, loads of them. They are much closer to markets and to people in this country than are the resources of the north.

I cannot think of a bigger laugh than that which was caused in our particular region during that election campaign when the minister, I think, or perhaps it was the Prime Minister, came up with the story of how they were going to build a road from somewhere up near Hudson bay down toward lake Superior. It was almost as ridiculous as this suggestion that they are negotiating with the Ontario government to build a road north somewhere between Nakina and the Manitoba boundary, over 400 miles of space.

The people of northwestern and northern Ontario were sceptical of this suggestion on practical grounds. They know that within their region they have copper prospects, zinc prospects, iron ore prospects, gold prospects and all sorts of forest resources that are still not being used. They know they still have certain water power resources. They know they have natural gas moving through there in a pipe line so that it can be used for various developments. They also know that their resources which are being exploited at the present time in the main are being exploited by United States capital and United States corporations.

Hence they are sceptical of the northern vision on two counts. Why not a bit of concentration upon an area that is closer to markets and closer to where there is a labour force that is in trouble? Second, the taint that this particular government in electioneering put upon United States capital does not make much sense to people in an area which for most of its industry depends upon United States capital. This phase of the Prime Minister's electoral activity of trying to batten upon the almost natural instinct of the people to distrust United States efforts it seems to me has gone far enough. It seems to me that the Prime Minister himself has spoiled it by his inability really to do anything about it.

I note that in his speech on Saturday he mentioned going down to the city of Detroit and laying some things on the line. I can remember that Right Hon. C. D. Howe went down to Chicago, to Milwaukee and to Washington, and that he laid some things on the line; but it did not seem to do very much good. It did just about as much good as what the Prime Minister has done. I would suggest to the minister that he throw away this word "vision". Let us have a fairly cool policy of northern development and stop all the extravagant claims about what Canada is going to get out of the north.

In his remarks just after lunch the minister indicated that while this government would never interfere with provincial jurisdiction, these new mining regulations would be a bellwether to the provinces, that the people of the provinces would demand legislation just like it. I know that school teachers—the minister was one and so was I—tend to be naive, but I refuse to believe the minister is that naive and that he really thinks these regulations will be a bellwether to the provinces and will lead the people in the provinces to demand from their governments the kind of redress which one can find, say, in the iron ore contracts in Newfoundland and Labrador.

I do not know why Duplessis and Smallwood sold out to these companies in the way they did for so little by way of fee; but to suggest that we will get any kind of redress through a few regulations is beyond me, and I cannot understand how the suggestion can be made. If the minister is going to say at his conservation conferences that this government would project a policy on the development of Canadian resources in the provinces or in the Canadian north in the highest possible finished state, then I can see that he would be making a contribution; otherwise this is just a continuation of the sham stuff we had in the last election, and which I repeat northwestern Ontario did not buy; and they sure are not going to buy it next time either.

The Prime Minister in his remarks touched on what this country had done to really put Americans in their place; at least I interpreted it in that way. He said something about insurance companies and he said something about oil. Oil certainly is not a minor factor, and I suppose insurance companies are not. But if you are going to do something about United States investment, and this government feels that something should be done, why does it not begin with iron ore? Across the country from contacts I have had with ordinary people I hear time and again, why can we not process iron ore in this country?

The minister has economists who turn out reports. There have been several in the last year right on this very question. What do the reports say? That the economics of the situation are such that we cannot look forward to any great expansion in the treatment of iron ores in Canada other than perhaps in a minor way so far as beneficiation is concerned. The most recent report on the direct reduction process indicated that there might be an economic feasibility of having such a development at Port Arthur and Seven Islands. However, in the main the great bulk of our ore will continue to go down in a raw or semi-raw state to United States smelters.

If this government feels so strongly and wants to give leadership to this blatant anti-American feeling that there is in Canada, how about doing something about the iron ore situation? The sound and fury we have heard in connection with what the government is going to do in the north is to me about the worst kind of nonsense that this government has come up with.

I suggest to the minister that in population terms the north is really not growing, except in civil servants who are being sent up there. I would ask, in investment terms what is being turned out in the north? Is it possible that in the north, in the sense of the northwest, are we really going to get any forestry production which will enter the markets of the world or even the markets of southern Canada? How many tons of iron ore are being shipped from the domains which are under the minister? How many barrels of oil are being shipped? How much is being shipped in the way of base metals? I think that is about the only area where the minister will find he has any production, and it is not very large.

Mr. Chairman, one could spend much more time than I have and the Leader of the Opposition has spent on this question of the vision. I want to make the point that in my remarks I am not supporting the great defence he has made with regard to activity in the past. It seems to me that this government has the intention of doing better than the Liberal government did in pushing the greater use and manufacture of Canadian resources in Canada, but I certainly cannot see that they have attained any success in this field. All they have done is make a great deal of propaganda, and make the very word "vision" in political terms a joke across the country.

Now I would like to turn to something a little more specific, and that is the statement which was apparently made by the hon. member for Yukon either on June 1 or May 31. I cannot find any record of it in the House of Commons debates, but he is on record as having said, according to a Globe and Mail story by reporter Walter Gray:

> A bureaucratic regime is operating in the office of the commissioner of the Yukon territory, the territorial member of parliament charged here today.
> Eric Nielsen (PC, Yukon), added quickly that he was not criticizing the incumbent commissioner, F. H. Collins, but the office itself. He blamed the five-man territorial council for failing to assume more executive responsibility in an effort to correct the situation which has built up over the years.
> The young member noted that of 112 ordinances consolidated by territorial council in 1958, 71 gave extraordinary powers to the commissioner who is able to issue regulations without reference to council.
> "These powers have not been abused so far, but the ease with which they could be abused is frightening", said Mr. Nielsen in an interview.

He went on to give a more detailed criticism, and then said:

> "The council should be encouraged to take on more executive responsibility," he said. "There must be a feeling in the commissioner to relieve himself of administrative powers to assist in the democratic development of the Yukon. I'm afraid there is a reluctance on the part of the administration to divest itself of these powers."

Mr. Chairman, we cannot get into the private circles of the government in power, but we would not have expected that the hon. member for Yukon would have had such difficulty. I understood that he had practically a free run of the bureaux at the department of northern affairs, and that he spent more time there than he did anywhere else; yet after almost three sessions at the job, what could he come up with except criticism of this northern administration?

Mr. Chairman, I think we deserve a satisfactory answer, not from the hon. member for Yukon but from the minister. How can he explain that a member of his own party, to whom he has given a great deal of credit for his interest, can come out into the open with criticism like this and not expect us to want an answer?

It would be foolish for us to assume that we know anything about the northern administration in relation to what the hon. member on the scene must know. I would say the hon. member for Yukon, according to this account in the Globe and Mail, has been exceptionally critical. I wonder why he has not been put into the same category as the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska, because this is real criticism. When you consider that he has had three sessions to go to work on this to get some kind of redress, is this an indication that the minister has no control over his own civil servants?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Would the hon. member permit a question? I think in the interests of saving the time of the committee the hon. member for Port Arthur should realize this.

The hon. member for Port Arthur should realize that the hon. member for the Yukon is also a citizen of that territory. His criticism was of the territorial government. That has nothing to do with my jurisdiction at all. I do not interfere in any way with the territorial government which is an elected government. If the hon. member has any criticisms they should be directed to the people in the territories. Those criticisms of the hon. member for the Yukon were directed against the local government in that area and not against my civil servants at all.

Mr. Fisher: As I understand it, the minister has something to do with the incumbent commissioners.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): My job is to appoint them. I have nothing whatever to do with the decisions of the territorial council either in the Northwest Territories or the Yukon.

Mr. Fisher: What role does the northern administration play in the Yukon territories? Does this not come up under the northern administration branch?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The explanation, Mr. Chairman, is that we look after resources in the territories and also some aspects of Eskimo welfare and education and Indian welfare and education.

Mr. Fisher: In this article I notice that Mr. Gray states that the commissioner, with a salary this year of $10,500, is appointed at the pleasure of the governor in council. When we are talking about other government appointees of the governor in council I always thought this meant that the governor in council had some kind of control over the appointees. Is the minister suggesting that Mr. Collins operates in limbo without any departmental or cabinet control?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): That is precisely what I am saying, Mr. Chairman, that the federal government appoints the commissioner but exercises no control whatever over matters under territorial jurisdiction. The practice has been growing up of permitting an increasing autonomy in the area. I am trying to encourage that in every way. I would not think of interfering in a matter between the territorial government and one of its citizens.

Mr. Fisher: To what audience does the hon. member for the Yukon address himself? Did the minister tell the hon. member that this was something in which he did not take an interest because he feels the federal government should not interfere in any way with the council there?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): This is not under my jurisdiction but I understand the hon. member spoke to the board of trade in Whitehorse on their invitation purely as a citizen of the Yukon. It does not come under my responsibility. In fact, I would fight very hard to protect the rights of the territorial government to look after its own business.

Mr. Fisher: The article, quoting the hon. member for the Yukon, states:

> Mr. Neilsen maintained that, until the Yukon is raised to provincial status, provision should be made under the ordinances for council ratification, instead of allowing the commissioner undisputed power.

Was he talking to the local people or did he have in mind the deputy minister of northern affairs who has something to do with the board that produces these ordinances. The hon. gentleman is quoted as going on to say that the council should take on more executive responsibility. Is he talking to the council or to the government?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think the language is very clear. The hon. member was apparently speaking to the council and not to me. I direct the commissioner in so far as the matters of resources and the education and welfare of Eskimos and Indians are concerned but the territorial council directs the commissioner in relation to territorial matters. Apparently the hon. member disagrees with the way the council is making full use of its powers. That is the understanding I have of the speech the hon. gentleman made.

Mr. Fisher: I will quote another paragraph:

> Mr. Nielsen saw some progress in the correction of the bureaucratic condition in the government's move to establish a three-man advisory committee to consult with the commissioner on the expenditure of territorial revenues.

What could be more explicit? Is this one of the hon. member's recommendations? Did the minister have anything to do with the setting up of this committee?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): If the hon. member had been in the house this session he would have known we passed amendments to the Yukon act setting up this advisory committee.

Mr. Fisher: In other words did the government make this move as a result of representations made by the hon. member for the Yukon?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I have to be fair. All throughout this matter the hon. member for the Yukon has shown a keen interest. There were discussions last year between the hon. gentleman and myself about strengthening the council. Also the council met last year in formal session and passed a resolution—not an ordinance—suggesting that this change be made. I asked the House of Commons to make that change and it did.

Mr. Fisher: I am still bothered by this question of the man appointed being outside the orbit of departmental control.

Mr. Webb: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. Since this discussion commenced the hon. member for Port Arthur has been making reference to the hon. member for the Yukon with whom I have the honour to share an office. The hon. member for Port Arthur suggested that the hon. member for the Yukon spends most of his time over at the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I would say to the hon. gentleman that if he worked half as hard as does the hon. member for the Yukon he would be considerably better informed and would not engage in nonsensical allegations.

The Chairman: Order. The remarks of the hon. member are argumentative. If the hon. gentleman wishes to rise after the hon. member for Port Arthur has concluded he may do so, but he is not allowed to interrupt the hon. member for that purpose.

Mr. Fisher: The hon. member has made a wrong interpretation of my remarks. I did not intend to reflect on the work done by the hon. member for the Yukon. I admire him very much for getting up and saying this kind of thing. What I meant by his being over at the department was this. I served on the committee with him last year. It was obvious that he knew everyone there. The hon. gentleman told me he spent a great deal of time with the department and I have heard others say he does. If there are matters affecting him he should spend as much time as possible pressuring civil servants. I am merely trying to find out if he has been making any headway. My remarks were not intended to be derogatory or insulting to the hon. member for the Yukon.

Perhaps the minister could explain in greater detail how he reconciles the fact that he and the Prime Minister speak of the north as a great area where the federal government is showing leadership and yet the representative from the area makes a criticism which seems to indicate that the great vision is blurred in at least one of the most important fundamental areas involving the democratic control of the affairs of the area by the citizens who live there under this bureaucratic regime.

The minister has often talked about the road to resources program. I raised this matter with him last week in connection with the access to roads where the government makes a contribution. The hon. gentleman gave me the flat assurance which I accepted that wherever the federal government makes a contribution to the roads to resources program and no matter what contribution the company may make the road is open and free of access to everyone.

Perhaps the minister is aware that we have an example in our constituency. The road runs for some 60 miles. The two governments and the company made a contribution. Sixty miles of the road is open but in the middle of the wilderness the road comes to a gate on the edge of the company's property. There is a further stretch of six miles of road that leads to where activities are actually going on. There is public access to the first 60 miles but no one can get through the gates to travel the last six miles unless the company wants them to. I hope the minister will give an assurance that in future agreements that may be made under this section of the act care will be taken to see that this kind of situation is not repeated.

I can underline this by pointing out that this United States corporation has set up what we call a company union and is involved in certification proceedings at this very moment. It uses that gate to keep union organizers out. I do not know whether they are also using it to keep out salesmen or other entrepreneurs who want to get in; but in effect this government has supported, through funds, a 60-mile road that leads to nowhere in so far as the public is concerned. I have to assume that a vacuum cleaner salesman or a union organizer has just as much right to go to the end of a road that the government helps pay for as anyone else, and yet this road ends at a gate in the bush. No one can go past it. I should like an assurance from the minister that in future in connection with roads to resources we shall not have roads which in effect end nowhere. If these roads lead to resources development, then the public should have access to that development. I do not see why the minister cannot make that part of the agreements in the future. Take as an example Anaconda. The minister has a good argument with the provincial government and any firm which may be involved in a matter of this kind. I should very much like to have his comments on this particular story.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): In regard to the road to the Anaconda property, I informed the committee on Saturday that in so far as any road in which we share the costs with a province and a company is concerned, there certainly is public access. It poses a very difficult problem for me. If any company builds up to that access road a private road of its own and pays 100 per cent of the cost of it, do I have to insist that a road connecting on to our road shall have public access? I do not think I can give that assurance, frankly, because first of all it does not lie within the jurisdiction of the federal government to insist on what shall be done in a province. Second, I think it would be an interference with the rights of private ownership. If I am a private owner in that area and I build a road up to a road built by the federal government and the province in co-operation, have I not a right to maintain my private property? I think we would be interfering with the rights of private property. I am putting the argument forward. I realize what the hon. member has in mind, but I do not think I can go beyond saying that the roads that we have already built are free access roads. That is as far as I can go.

Mr. Fisher: The minister may be aware of the mining laws and claims in that area. The Anaconda interest can stretch for some 20 or 30 miles, and other properties go even farther. We can see where we have a virtual private empire of a United States corporation up in northern Ontario. The government of Ontario has committed itself to putting the road in there, and yet the company can determine everything that takes place in that big empire. I will admit that there may be some limits on what this government may be able to argue other than the lever it has through its contribution.

Surely the provincial government which issues the licences for these huge territories that come under the sway of such men should be prepared to listen to suggestions from the minister. I cannot help but feel that the minister and the department are letting themselves into an almost indefensible position from the public point of view. If the minister wants to look at the general unpopularity that the pulp and paper companies have managed to maintain by keeping their roads closed on much greater justification than this, I think he will see what I mean. There is a potential here for one of the sharpest issues that have ever come up in our part of the country.

I just suggest to the minister that in writing any new agreements he does more to see that such a thing does not happen again. If Anaconda actually had an open pit or a shaft, or something like that, going on in there I could certainly see every reason why they should have the right to protect that property from access by outsiders, but when you are going to have what is in effect a town developing in there a townsite, and you are able to put up a gate and keep everybody out of that area because you control the gate at the end of the road toward which the government contributed I think it is going too far. I think a narrower distinction may be made. I suggest to the minister he should try to make it.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I should like to give the hon. member for Port Arthur the assurance that I shall certainly keep that in mind. I should like to say that we impress on any government that makes this arrangement with us that as far as we are concerned these are public access roads and we are not a party to practices such as have been described here. But legally I do not think I have the power to change any agreement already made. I will certainly give the assurance that in the future I shall make it very plain that these are public roads. I have already done so but I will do so again.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I am tempted to rise at this point and take issue with some of the things that were said by the minister on Saturday and again this afternoon as well as with what was said by the Prime Minister on Saturday prior to the opening of the dominion-provincial conference. I am surprised that in his remarks the minister would have been so pronounced in the general statement that when he took office little or nothing had been done by the previous administration and that everything that has been done, has been accomplished since he and those associated with him have been in office.

I should like to remind the minister—I cannot remember the date now but certainly it would be around 1950—that when I occupied a position on the other side of the house similar to his I made a trip over the northwest passage and to airports that had been built by the previous government and not by this government. He had a great deal to say about airstrips that had been built and roads and a future railway. The trip that was made by my officers and myself, was by way of Edmonton to Fort Smith.

Mr. Valade: Get to the point.

Mr. Chevrier: I am getting to the point, and the point I am getting to is that before this government came into office in 1957 a great deal more had been accomplished by the previous administration than the minister would like us to believe. One of the first things that was done was the establishment of the department over which the minister presides now. This department was established by the previous administration. It was taken out of the department of resources and development and made a department by itself, namely the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources at the head of which at one time, if not at the beginning, was the present premier of the province of Quebec. I deprecate the statement which the present minister made on Saturday, on the very eve of a dominion-provincial conference, when an attempt is being made to bring the 11 governments together on fiscal matters affecting the future of our country, and that the minister should attack, 48 hours before that meeting, a former minister of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, the present premier of Quebec. I do not think that attempt will help in any way the progress of dominion-provincial relations.

When I was interrupted I was about to say that airstrips were built by the former government at Dawson, Whitehorse, Hay River, Yellowknife and Fort Smith, all along the northwest route. The Canol project was also built during the time of the previous administration. One would think that in the north country absolutely nothing was done prior to 1957. What about the Kitimat-Terrace railway? What about the extension to the P.G.E. railway, for which the same subsidy to which the minister referred, namely $25,000 per mile, was paid by the previous administration? I could go on and speak of roads running from Edmonton in the direction of Dawson Creek. I have to rely on my memory now as I have no documents before me, but if I had them I am sure I could convince the house that a great deal more had been done in the field to which my hon. friend referred earlier.

There is one other matter for which the present administration seems to be taking credit, the processing of material in this country. The processing of material in this country started long before the minister was in office and long before his government took office. When the Prime Minister was campaigning in 1957 he took from Hansard and out of context a statement I had made concerning the St. Lawrence seaway to the effect that the St. Lawrence seaway was being built to take iron ore to the United States. No mention was made, however, of the fact that the St. Lawrence seaway was going to create secondary industry and was going to bring primary industry along the shores of the St. Lawrence. If that statement had not been taken out of context it would have been clear that those of us who sat on the other side of the house prior to this administration coming into office were as keenly interested as they are and as every true Canadian is in the processing of Canadian materials in this country.

I am sure that is the objective of all of us who sit in the house, and when it is necessary to export to the United States very often it is because there is not a sufficient market in our own country. The proof of the effect of the development of the St. Lawrence seaway on a number of areas lies in the fact that today natural resources are being processed in various parts of our country.

The Leader of the Opposition dealt at some length with statements made on Saturday by the Prime Minister and also by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I shall not add to that other than to refer to the billion dollar program of public works which was put forward in one election campaign and which unquestionably contained the essence of tremendous development by way of employment in the north. As the house knows, little or nothing has been heard about it since.

Finally, I should like to refer to the development in this country both during the war period and the post-war period under the aegis of the Right Hon. C. D. Howe. I do not think history will indicate that at any time has there been a greater development of industry and natural resources than at the time the Right Hon. C. D. Howe was first minister of munitions and supply and later minister of reconstruction and development. There are many people in the country today who would like to see him back in office again and directing the economy of our country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friends laugh—

Mr. Grafftey: The pipe line debate.

Mr. Chevrier: —but they have no one on the other side of the house who compares with him, with his genius, his ability—

Mr. Grafftey: And his respect for parliament.

Mr. Chevrier: —in the development of industry.

An hon. Member: Who wants another C. D. Howe?

Mr. Grafftey: And his respect for parliament.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, the Right Hon. C. D. Howe not only had the respect of members of parliament—

Mr. Grafftey: I said respect for parliament.

Mr. Chevrier: —but had the respect of all Canadians and still has, I believe, the respect of all Canadians today.

Mr. Grafftey: I said respect for parliament.

Mr. Chevrier: Those who interrupt me now are envious because they do not have within their ranks anyone able to direct the industrial economy of our country as Mr. Howe was able to.

Mr. MacInnis: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has just taken it upon himself to say that he can speak for all Canadians. Here is one Canadian whose respect Mr. Howe did not have.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member rose on a question of privilege. First, there was no question of privilege.

Mr. MacInnis: Certainly there was.

Mr. Chevrier: Second, the hon. gentleman rose, as he does on many occasions, to say absolutely nothing, to lose his temper and to try to divert someone who is dealing with the matter that has been under discussion this afternoon but he has not succeeded nor will he succeed in diverting me from the point I was about to make.

Mr. Grafftey: What was it?

Mr. Chevrier: That point had to do with the matter of processing our natural resources in Canada and the minister dealt with this matter as though it were something that had been discovered by those on the other side of the house. Neither was it discovered by the other side of the house nor will the other side of the house be able to claim credit for the development of our natural resources and our industry.

Mr. Grafftey: Or for closure.

Mr. Chevrier: I say to my friend on my left, the young man with the short crop from Brome-Missisquoi, who loves to interrupt, and I do not say that to him in any unfriendly way—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fortin: Let us get back to the point.

Mr. Chevrier: If you would allow me to speak to the point without interruption I would soon finish.

Mr. Fortin: We have been waiting for 20 minutes for you to get back to the point.

Mr. Chevrier: I have been interrupted repeatedly by the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet and his interruptions have not been too enlightening. Like many other hon. members on his side, he usually speaks from his seat rather than from his mind. If he would speak from his mind more often and get up and deal with matters affecting his own province perhaps it would be much better for his constituents than for him to seek to interrupt us in the manner he does from time to time.

I was dealing with the development of our country under Mr. Howe. I should like to conclude my remarks by asking the minister a question, as did the Leader of the Opposition in concluding his remarks, although the minister did not reply. After the speech the minister made this afternoon and also last Saturday, is it logical for us to conclude that the administration over which he and those associated with him preside is in fact a government "des visions" rather than a government "de vision"?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, it is a considerable delight to me to hear the debate on my estimates going forward. I made the remark earlier that so far the debate had been conducted on a very high level. At the present time, I am not so sure about that. As for the use of the word "vision", I am not sure of the words.

Mr. Chevrier: I said "des visions" as opposed to "de vision".

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I have a little difficulty in translating from the French into English. I said to the hon. member at the time that I was not skilled in dialectics. I am not now any more skilled in dialectics. In any event we have heard from the opposition as to what they have done; that Mr. Howe is the greatest man who ever sat in the House of Commons; that they built airfields at Fort Smith and Edmonton. Yes, they did, and I am not going to enter into a debate on that at all. I am trying to make the point objectively that this government did try to meet a situation which was concerning the people of Canada in relation to the ownership of resources. We have taken certain steps and will take other steps to try to push this program forward in order that over the years we can buy back the ownership in our resources, and maintain them especially in our oil and gas resources of the north.

There were many figures quoted to indicate the extent of investment of non-residents in our country in the last two years. This is the same point that I have been trying to make, that this great investment in our resources is alarming Canadians. This government is trying to do something about it. I do hope all Canadians will rally behind us in our efforts. I do not believe there are many who would support the hon. member for Port Arthur when he says that we want more investment from the United States. I do not believe he speaks for his party, either. I think the figures are fairly well known. I did not understand the Leader of the Opposition to ask what the percentages were in the northern areas, but I can repeat those figures. In the Arctic islands, 78 per cent are Canadian held and 22 per cent are non-Canadian. This illustrates the fact that we are reversing the percentage that existed in Alberta.

I have made the statement in the house that I did not blame anyone in particular for what happened in Alberta. I am simply saying we do not want it to continue. We welcome foreign investment. However, we want these investors to set up subsidiary companies in which Canadians have an opportunity to participate, and we know there will always be the opportunity for us, as we grow in wealth and accumulated capital, to own these resources. I believe that point has been well covered.

Another point was raised concerning who made the proposal over in the Geneva conference in 1958. Was it something dredged up by the delegates or was it a Canadian proposal, as I said? The best answer to that is the report of the fourth committee on the continental shelf dated April 16, 1958. This is how the secretary of that particular committee describes the events of that day. The delegate from Colombia had spoken, and then we find this:

> Mr. Carty (Canada) formally proposed that the committee should recommend to the conference that the results of its work be embodied in a separate convention relating only to the continental shelf. The purpose of the proposal was to direct attention to the general committee's recommendations contained in paragraph 5 of its report. The fourth committee had made good progress; it should accept its responsibility and formulate, in the form of a convention, the articles which it had adopted. He agreed that the topics discussed at the conference were interrelated and that it would be desirable to decide on the form of instrument for articles 67-73 in the light of the results achieved by other committees.

Then, going on after discussion by the other delegates from the United Kingdom, Yugoslavia, Switzerland, Mexico, Argentina, Chile,

Venezuela, Ceylon, Brazil, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, India, Israel, the Union of South Africa—just listen to this, Mr. Chairman:

> The chairman put to the vote the Canadian proposal, as amended orally by the U.S.S.R. representative.
> The Canadian proposal, as amended, was adopted by 39 votes to 6, with 7 abstentions.

The Canadian proposal was put forward on April 16, 1958, and it so happens I was over there as minister of the federal government responsible for the team at the law of the sea convention. I do believe I have the right to say that it was no accident that proposal was put forward. We met every morning to discuss the strategy of that conference. I recall speaking very forcibly on the point that the main consideration we had was to get this one part of the work of the conference clearly into an international convention so it would be of some use to us in case there was a breakdown on any other point. I do not believe my claim was made in any sense as boasting.

There were several other points raised which I think will be straightened out in the record. The first one deals with the statement that I said it was government policy to do certain things on the continental shelf. At the time I objected to that statement, but to make the record absolutely clear I would cite page 6873 of Hansard for July 23, 1960, where the hon. member for Villeneuve said:

> So I would suggest the government give serious consideration to granting the provinces the rights to those natural resources on the continental shelf adjoining their own boundaries.

I was not the one who said that, it was the hon. member for Villeneuve. He made the suggestion that we give serious consideration to that matter and naturally, in answer, I said:

> This is a matter of government policy and will be declared in due course.

I did not make the statement that these resources should be given back to the provinces because I have no right to make that statement. What I have said in the past is that we have made it very clear that the legal officers of the crown say the continental shelf belongs under federal jurisdiction. If there are any disclaimers to that, there is a proper course to take and that course is up to the persons who feel offended.

I believe those are the main points I have to answer, Mr. Chairman. I am very grateful to the committee for debating this subject of the Liberal versus the Conservative vision so vigorously because I think it will help many Canadians, not only in this committee but outside, to understand what the differences are between us.

Mr. Chevrier: During the course of the discussion earlier, an hon. member—I believe it was the hon. member for Port Arthur—asked a question about the Yukon. The minister seemed to indicate that he disclaimed jurisdiction. If we have any questions concerning the Yukon, to whom do we direct them?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, I think that is quite correct. The set-up in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon is that we have given jurisdiction to elected councils to look after matters concerning the territories, with the exception of natural resources, education and social welfare for the Indians and Eskimos. The commissioner acts in a dual capacity. When it is a matter that comes under territorial jurisdiction he deals with it without any directions from Ottawa. When it is a matter over which the federal government has jurisdiction he, of course, consults us and is responsible to us for his actions.

This is a very delicate matter in connection with the development of the territory leading finally to the concept of provincial status. In so far as the responsibility of the minister here is concerned, I would suggest it is 100 per cent in connection with matters of federal jurisdiction but in so far as territorial matters are concerned all I can do is relay to the house what is going on there as I see it. I would not want to interfere in their right to decide on such matters as the game laws or the liquor laws which come under their jurisdiction. I can only facilitate any of their actions because everything they do does come under the governor general in council who has to approve all their ordinances. I am not an authority on just what I should be responsible for in the house. I would be glad to discuss any of these matters, as I did with the hon. member for Port Arthur because the case he was discussing was that of an individual criticizing the territorial government. I do not think that I should be required to defend a territorial government or to defend a member. It is a matter between the two and I did not want to get into that discussion.

Mr. Peters: I have been waiting for some time, for this particular item to be reached, Mr. Chairman. Early in March this year we passed a bill which took over for the Canadian government from United States control a pipe line in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. At that time there was a great deal of controversy as to what the government intended to do with this pipe line. It was my hope and desire that the Canadian government would take it over as a crown corporation and would operate the pipe line and would also rebuild those roads and airports that were going to serve in the development and the opening up of the particular area.

At that time we were told that because negotiations were being conducted at the time we could not be told what was going to happen to the Canol project. Since then on several occasions I have asked the other minister of northern affairs, the hon. member for Yukon, what the situation was in relation to this matter and he said that he did not know. Now that we have had an opportunity of buying it and have in fact bought it, I should like to know what we are going to do with it and what the disposition of it is. It is now no longer a buying proposition; it is something that the Canadian people own. I think that now is the time to tell us whether we are going to get it as a crown corporation or whether we are going to sell it or lease it to companies as was suggested at the time of the discussion.

I think this has been an opportunity for development in that area. Connected with the projected has been extensive road development, extensive airfield development as well as the pipe line itself. We were told we were getting a real bargain, that we were getting about a $1,700 million proposition for about $600,000, that this was a bargain. I think this type of bargain could and should be used for the development of that area. I am still of the opinion that the best way in which that can be done is through public ownership and operation as a crown corporation.

I was also interested in the statement the minister made about developing the lead and zinc mines in other areas. While I am not familiar with what the background is or what the situation is, I think the minister should bear in mind something that Larry Sefton, district director of district No. 5 of the united steelworkers said a few months ago when they were discussing the Elliot Lake proposition and the uranium industry in general. He made the statement—and I think it is a correct one—that if we do not plan what we were going to do with our natural resources, it is much better to leave those natural resources alone and not touch them at all. There would have been less of a problem at Elliot Lake to the miners, to the people of the community, to the government of Ontario and to the municipal governments that put money into this project, if we had never operated the uranium industry at all. People are going to lose their life savings in the houses they purchased there when no jobs are possible for many of them in the future.

[Mr. Peters.]

I think we should be giving serious consideration to developing new industries. It is quite true, as the minister said, that if we are going to fit this into our economy, this is the time in which to do it. We must ascertain for ourselves what is the marketing potentiality, what the needs are and then develop a fairly long range program. However, I am not in agreement in any way, shape or form in developing natural resources that are going to be at the expense of the people themselves if we have not a long range program under which we can foresee the sale at reasonable prices of the minerals we are going to produce. Otherwise, it would be much better that we did not operate these mines at all or that we did not do any of the development that is necessary.

I am also interested in another field. I am pleased that the minister has divided his department into two sections. I suggest there should be another section. I come from a part of Ontario that is still in a period of growth, a period in which it is dependent entirely for its existence on its primary natural resources. These resources of minerals such as gold, silver and the other metals and the lumbering industry have been the basis for the development of northern Ontario. This development has all taken place within the last 60 or 70 years.

We have now reached the stage where the development of the natural resources of the nothern area has come to an end. Within the last few weeks in Kirkland Lake we have notice being given of the closing down of two large mines that have been in operation for many years, one of them for 25 years. We have taken the precaution of keeping these properties in production through emergency gold mining assistance and in other ways have assisted them to stay in production. But we have done nothing whatsoever as a government to further the secondary development that is absolutely necessary in order to carry on the second stage. To me it seems rather silly that we should be interested in going into new areas and developing new mines and in going into new areas and developing towns like Frobisher Bay when we have towns much closer that are already there and that are completely dependent on the government for starting the second stage of their development and bringing them into the general economy of the country through the expansion of secondary industry.

This must be the responsibility of the government. If we are going into the production of minerals, into the lumbering industry or any of the other natural resources, I think this must be a planned forage into those industries. I think we must know how far we are going to go, how extensively we are going to support it, what protection we can give for the lifetime of that particular industry but, particularly in those industries that are not renewable, we should be prepared to start a secondary development so that we shall not have ghost towns all throughout northern Ontario, the north of Quebec and, I imagine, all through northern Canada including the Northwest Territories.

It is all very nice to say that this vision keeps moving farther and farther away. We were greatly impressed in Ontario to find that the people in Toronto bought this because all they ever knew about northern development was that if you bought stock on Bay street you could make a fairly good profit on those stocks and that it was a nice thing to get more mines in production because there was a great deal more money to be made on Bay street in the development of those mines. But they never came north to see what was developed and they were not particularly interested in doing so. They were more interested in getting premiums or in clipping coupons of those that were successful and they wanted to forget about those that were not successful.

If we are going to be honest about the vision in northern Canada—and I think we should be, it seems to me that we are going to be going north, we are going to develop the north; there is no question about that—I think we should consolidate some of the northern development that we have already done. In my opinion, there is no better place in which to live than in northern Ontario where the mines are now starting to close down. Sylvanite will be laying off 300 or 400 men in the next few weeks. Kirkland Lake Minerals will be laying off at the end of this month or on the 31st of this month half of their staff. The other half of the staff will be doing a clean-up operation and then the mine will be completely closed in a very short time.

It seems to me that one of the branches of the department of northern affairs should be a branch that will handle secondary industry. I suggest that the minister give serious consideration to this matter. It is not good enough to leave them trailing all over the country, with public works giving a handout here and northern affairs putting their foot in it in another place and the minister of mines making promises in his jurisdiction and none of them actually facing the problem that must be faced, namely that of secondary industry.

In speaking of natural resources and of northern development, may I say that I think the time has come when we must be realistic about putting secondary industries into northern Ontario. This can be done only on a planned basis by a department that is situated so that it can take advantage of the natural development that flows from primary resources and puts some of that money and some of those resources and some of the development that is possible into secondary industries so that when the one dies, the other is being born and communities are able to continue. It will not impress the people of the Kirkland Lake area and the other mining communities at all to hear about the future development of places like Frobisher and other mining communities when they themselves have no jobs or places to go to or no secondary industry in sight.

I think the minister should give serious consideration to this matter of secondary development which is a natural offshoot of primary development of our natural resources. While it may be difficult to convince a Conservative government that this should be done, because it means economical planning and the taking of some money out of the pockets of those who have been scavengers throughout the ages on both the lumber and mining industries, some money must flow back into the development of secondary industries. If we offer the considerations which have been offered in other countries to develop secondary industries we can have secondary industries in our northern areas of Ontario and Quebec.

It is not good enough to say that we will do it five years from now. As far as Kirkland Lake is concerned two of the producing mines are now closing in the next few weeks and I am sure others will follow because some of them have been in production for 25 to 30 years and this is the lifetime, in the main, of these industries. The protection we gave to the forest industry has not made it possible for us to have a continuing industry in that field either, so that secondary industries are the only answer we have to this matter of solving the problem which arises after you complete the first stages of development in the field of natural resources.

There is another problem which affects us, and that is the matter of a seaport on James bay which is not the responsibility of any department of government. We have raised this on almost all the estimates but we are always told it belongs to somebody else. Surely, Mr. Chairman, this belongs at least partly to the department of northern affairs because this is one of the methods, in my opinion, by which we will be able to bring in secondary industries to areas which to a great extent are now devoid of natural resources, and at the same time it will start a flow into that area of natural resources from other areas.

I think the minister is fully aware of the potentialities we have in the Hudson bay and James bay areas which will flow into the heart of industrial Canada and the Toronto area if we are able to develop a port which will make it feasible and economical to produce the iron ore and other minerals in the area to the point where they can be transported to the companies and the areas which will use them. If we do that I think also in the process we will be building secondary industry all along the route which will follow from the fact that we will be supplying finished products, the things which are necessary to develop new areas, mining equipment, all the feeder equipment which will go into production. We will be able to produce that all along the line and this will in turn be a partial solution to the problem which is now faced by those areas which only a few years ago were part of our northern development and which are now nearly devoid of any secondary industry unless it can get it from the reflection of the vision this government has.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 282 carry?

Mr. Peters: No, Mr. Chairman. I would like an explanation particularly about what happened to the pipe line projects.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Negotiations are still continuing, but I can tell the committee that we are now trying to lease to the White Pass railway in the Yukon a four-inch line which goes south of Whitehorse toward the United States boundary leading to Skagway. In the case of the three-inch line leading from Whitehorse to the Alaska border, we are negotiating with the Alaska-Yukon Refineries and Distribution Limited for them to lease that. Therefore, we will retain ownership of these two lines but will lease them to the two companies to keep down prices of fuel in that area. There is a two-inch line which runs from Carcross up to Watson Lake, but so far we have not found any person interested in it and we may have to salvage it and take the pipe out. There is very faint chance we might find a use for it, but I think it is very faint.

Item agreed to.

290. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment including costs arising out of the relocation of the town of Aklavik and payment of such compensation as governor in council prescribes to persons affected by such relocation, $9,805,370.

[Mr. Peters.]

Mr. Pearson: This vote covers, among other things, communications, roads, bridges, and there is a reduction of some $2,800,000 I believe. I wonder if the minister would explain that?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Is the Leader of the Opposition referring to item 290 or 289?

Mr. Pearson: I do not know whether it is under 289 or 290. I am talking about the details which are to be found on page 394 under the Yukon territory, construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, and construction of roads and bridges is one of the details, and the amount being asked this year is $3,367,000, which is a considerable decrease over last year. In view of the minister's statement about the importance of communications and roads and all that kind of thing, I thought perhaps he would explain that decrease.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Are we on vote 290, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Robichaud: I think the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition is on item 288.

The Deputy Chairman: That was passed but perhaps the minister can answer it now.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The Leader of the Opposition mentioned the Yukon, which was item 288, but the figures he quoted are under item 290 and that is why we are confused. But I think the chairman will allow me to answer this question on any one of the votes.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps the minister would answer under 288 and 290 because there are two separate votes for the construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, construction of roads and bridges, one in the Yukon and the other in the Northwest Territories. They both show a decrease and perhaps the minister would explain the reason for it.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The votes referred to by the Leader of the Opposition are construction votes in the Yukon and construction votes in the Northwest Territories. The construction vote in the Yukon is down by approximately $665,000. This is largely due to the fact that this is the completion of the big program of building bridges which was announced in the estimates for 1958 if I remember correctly. The three major rivers that intersect the road leading from Whitehorse to Mayo were a great barrier to the movement of goods north and south in the Yukon. These bridges have been built and will be completed this year. There will be no necessity for the vote continuing on to the next year. The reduced amounts are to cover the finishing off of the bridges which are three in number.

In this vote also is the money required for the Flat Creek-Eagle Plain road which runs north from Dawson City to the new oil find in Eagle Plain. I gave the committee a report on that project on Saturday but will repeat it again. In the first year the progress was slower than we expected due to the fact that there was heavy rain last year in this area for the first time in many years. This year the progress is much faster and we expect by the end of the year to come close to getting back on schedule over the two-year period. I have the details of all the roads in this program. Does the hon. member want that information?

Mr. Pearson: I think not, Mr. Chairman, but could the minister tell the committee whether there is any new road construction involved in votes Nos. 288 and 290?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, the new construction is a continuation of the Flat Creek road up to Eagle Plain. It will take six or seven years to move forward on this schedule. The other runs from the southeast corner of the Yukon to a place called Watson Lake and then will head in a northwesterly direction up to Ross river finally reaching the Whitehorse-Keno road at Carmacks. The road goes through one of the most promising mineral areas of the Yukon. We will start our construction program on that road this year. I believe the program for this year calls for the road going to Frances lake a distance of 28 or 30 miles from Watson Lake. I do not have the figures. The program will be carried out year by year until completed. It may interest hon. members to know that on the road from Frances lake to Watson lake we will be building, when we can see the economics of it, an access road up to the tungsten development on the border of the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

Mr. Pearson: I take it from what the minister said, Mr. Chairman, that this reduction in road and bridge construction in the two votes is due to budgetary considerations largely and not to the fact that there is no longer a necessity for developing communications and roads in the area concerned.

Item agreed to.

Forestry branch—

291. Branch administration, $172,333.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I am not an historian but I want to speak on this item. I always feel at home in tall timber. We discussed this thoroughly on the bill to set up the new Department of Forestry so I will be brief. I think it is safe to say that this is the last time the estimates of this branch will come before us as a branch of this department because next year I presume the item will be a main one in the estimates of the department of forestry.

We hope that as a result of the conference on resources for tomorrow there will be an agreement on certain principles between the government and certain provinces respecting policies concerning the development of forest research and forestry in general. We appreciate the work done by this department and particularly the forest products laboratory which produced many splendid booklets which I have in my hand. When the department is well under way we hope the branch will have ample funds to extend its work in connection with keeping in contact with the lumber industry and especially small operators. Despite the good work done in the past small operators did not know the information was available but knowledge of it is more widespread today.

I shall deal with an immediate problem that can be tackled in the immediate future through efforts on the part of the federal and provincial governments to prevent losses from fires that are occurring even at the present time. The Nelson News of July 21 mentioned that in the Kootenays at the present time approximately 2,000 men are fighting fires and a more recent report indicates that 10,000 acres of timber are on fire. The expenditure on the part of the provincial government is very heavy. There is a worse state of affairs in the region north of Kamloops and to some extent in central British Columbia. I see by the press that there are heavy fire losses in other parts of Canada.

I am keen on this question because I witnessed some bad fires. My first experience was that of being the youngest man on a fire fighting crew in the early days of this century when I was given the job of leading 10 young ladies through the mountains in the dark and depositing them safely at a lakeside some 10 miles away and I have seen many fires since. I stood on a mountain and saw timber in a valley 15 miles long and three miles wide completely destroyed in three hours; 200 million feet of commercial or near commercial timber almost completely destroyed, nothing left but charred stumps and trees killed by the heat. These experiences have led to my keen interest.

Fire prevention is not just a matter of more funds but a question of co-operation between the federal and provincial governments, various government departments and other agencies in the province and even in the municipalities in some cases, and the organization and better mobilization of presently available resources.

I do hope that one of the first things this conference on resources for tomorrow tackles is an immediate problem, something that can be done, as it were, overnight, compared with forestry laboratory research, forestry research or forestry fire protection reseach; that is, some program and planning which, as I said before, will enable us to organize the capacity we have today to fight forest fires in Canada and to mobilize our resources. I suggest that we should have an over-all national policy in this respect that provides for the throwing into a forest fire situation first of all the local resources in manpower, materials and equipment, and when it is obvious that that is not sufficient, then the provincial resources come into play and then finally if necesary we can throw in the national resources.

In the national resources I include the armed forces. I think it is absolutely ridiculous that we should have thousands of men in training at the present time, particularly those men in engineering corps and certain infantry units in the army who could be spared for a month or two, if necessary, to fight fires, and not use them. We have a situation in British Columbia where the armed forces of the federal govvernment could be used. The Department of National Defence should be willing to co-operate with the provincial, regional and local authorities to use the armed forces, whether it is the air force transporting troops, or troops from the infantry or other services, and throw them into a certain area when required to build roads and to assist the local people in fighting the fires which are raging at the present time. The experience would be a good thing for our armed forces. It would be good practice for them in meeting emergency situations and dealing with problems. Very often the problem has to be met under very difficult circumstances of rough terrain with difficulties in respect of transportation of food, men and equipment, and so on.

As I said before, I am going to be quite brief, but I do suggest that one of the first questions that should be considered by the resources for tomorrow conference should be the organization and mobilization of all our resources in Canada as the result of co-operation among the federal and provincial governments and the regional and local authorities in an effort to limit as much as we can the destruction of our forests by fire which is so devastating from year to year and particularly at this time while we are discussing the estimates of the forestry branch of this department.

Mr. Chevrier: I have a question or two for the minister in connection with this division of his department. I take it that this is the division which is going to be transferred to the new department of forestry.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes.

Mr. Chevrier: Since it is a very important division of the minister's department, he should tell us, if he can of course, what will be done with this particular branch. Has the minister any information as to when the new department is likely to be established? Can he tell us what other aspects of forestry over and above those that were mentioned during the discussion of the legislation to establish the new department are to be transferred, and any other information that I am sure he must have at his disposal now in connection with the establishment of the new department?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): First of all, I should like to thank the hon. member for Kootenay West for his kind words to the members of the forestry branch and both research and forest products laboratory, because I do not think there is a group of people more deserving of the thanks of their fellow Canadians. I should like to add my words of appreciation in the committee at this time of the officials of this branch who will soon be moving to the new department.

The hon. member for Kootenay West raised the question of forest fires. When I introduced second reading of the forestry bill I suggested that something could be done in setting up reservoirs of trained personnel and equipment. I should like to inform the hon. member and the committee that just last week end there was a meeting in Oriskany, Quebec, of representatives of the forest industry, the province of Quebec, the province of Ontario, and the province of New Brunswick, represented by ministers; also representatives of the armed services, the army and air force, wondering and working out plans that I hope will be put before the new minister in connection with the proposal that I originally hinted at when I was speaking on second reading of the forestry bill and which has been amplified to a degree by the hon. member for Kootenay West.

I think I can say on my part that until this branch is removed from my jurisdiction I will push as hard as I can to see that everything is done in the form of planning for the new minister; that he will have research work that we have done, at least planning for research work that we have done, and planning better forest fire co-operation with the provinces. All these plans will be turned over to the minister and I will not stop because the branch is leaving me sometime this year.

The hon. member for Laurier asked for details of what is being done with this particular branch. The actual divisions that will go over to the new department from the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources are: forest research division; forest products research division; forest operations division and the administrative division. From agriculture there will go just one division composed of the two sections, forest entomology and forest pathology. In addition to this, there will have to be built up an administrative corps under which these various branches will operate. I do believe there has to be an economics section and a section on marketing to co-operate with the Department of Trade and Commerce, and some administrative officials.

Mr. Chevrier: May I interrupt to ask whether that will include votes 291 to 301? They would go to the new department?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, I think it will include all of those votes, but there would also have to be some additional administrative personnel, the nature of which I just described. At the present time the officials are busy working out the organizational plan for bringing these two branches together. Also, we have the question of housing the new department, and that is now in the hands of public works. I think these are all the details I can give the committee at this time.

Mr. Fisher: I want to support very strongly the point made by the hon. member for Kootenay West about the armed forces. It seems to me it could be very much a part of their training to have them work in fire prevention, especially since it would require their movement at speed to different parts of the country. If the minister runs into any difficulty in getting co-operation in working out such a plan and such a task force, I would suggest to him that he compare, at least in the cabinet and with the Minister of National Defence, the efficacy of the changing of the guard out on parliament hill with the contribution that a force of equal size and of equal training, but in a much more utilitarian field, could play in fire fighting assistance.

The hon. member for Kootenay West has fires in his area similar to those which we have had in northwestern Ontario recently. The problem of the Ontario provincial fire service is not one of bad organization but has to do with the fact that they cannot keep up to strength to master completely all fire problems on any kind of a permanent basis. Last year was a wonderful year in Ontario from a fire point of view in that because of a combination of weather and other factors there was very little in the way of threat. This year the situation is much different, and I have great sympathy with the provincial authorities and the problems they face.

In the Canadian army we have a corps of men whom we can only look upon as being primarily to defend our own country and who could form a kind of task force which could come into the picture when a fire problem arose and because of the experience they would have they would gain very much in a military way. If we contemplate fighting the Russians some day, I imagine most of the fighting will take place in the boreal forest area, and the experience gained in the bush, with all its tribulations, fighting fires is something that I think our army could well afford.

I have noticed in the press the magnificent manoeuvres that are taking place near Petawawa at the present time and the cost to the taxpayers. I am pleased to think our soldiers are being trained but I also think of how comparable in worth the training would be that they would get in moving to danger areas where there are fires. That is why I should like to support very strongly the suggestion that the minister take the lead through this branch in seeing such a force developed.

I should like to ask the minister several questions about the branch. What is going to be done about the library services and facilities for the new forestry department? I am not critical of the forestry branch library. The last time I was there a few years ago it struck me as being a fair though not an excellent library to serve the specific branch, but if we are going to have a forestry department it seems to me it has to be much larger.

The minister is probably aware that from a research point of view the papers and documentation on file now in the Department of Agriculture are much more complex and go much deeper in terms of classification than much of the general forestry literature whether it has to do with economics of forest management or silviculture. Therefore I should like to know what the plans are for the library service in the new department and just what role is now going to be played by the library that now exists in the forestry branch. If, as the minister indicates, the new department is going to be the leading research organization in Canada for forestry in all its aspects I suggest we need more space than we have at present, more librarians and real planning in this field. I should like to know what the minister can tell us about this matter.

There is one other piece of information I should like to have. How much time was given by the foresters of the forestry branch to assistance of the Indian affairs branch in relation to Indian lands in the last year or so? Is there under consideration at the present time any arrangement with the Indian affairs branch that would lead to greater provision of the services of professional foresters to the Indian affairs branch than exists now?

Mr. Brunsden: Will the hon. member permit a question? Those of us on this side of the house find it difficult to follow him in his various ramifications. Is he suggesting that the ceremony outside the parliament buildings each morning should be discontinued?

Mr. Fisher: If it is a good tourist attraction, it is a good tourist attraction, but I would suggest that in terms of actual dollar return to the country, in terms of real military training, a military task force which could handle forest fire crises would be of greater value to the country than the ceremony in front of the building.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): With respect to the question of the library in the new department, I can say we will be taking over the libraries in the head office of the forestry branch, the laboratory offices and the field offices. The library in the agricultural division will be taken over but it is recognized there will have to be considerable effort to build up the forest biology section because to a great extent that library is tied in with the very fine libraries in the Department of Agriculture. The one in the new department will have to be built up. With respect to Indian affairs, there are plans now on foot to assist Indians in two parts of Canada next year but that does not come under this vote. It will come under next year's estimates.

Mr. Fisher: Could the minister give some indication of just what negotiations have taken place? After all, this matter must come under the general forestry branch item and I think it is fair to ask about it. I would emphasize this point by saying I have not been satisfied with the explanations of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration in this regard. I welcome very much the minister's statement that there is going to be more assistance in the future but I think we are entitled to know what is involved.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): It is the policy of the forestry branch to accept requests from any department of the government to do surveys and studies and to help plan forest management with respect to forests under the control of any department. As the hon. member knows, we have done a good deal of this work for the Department of National Defence. The Department of Citizenship and Immigration has asked us to do work in two places in Canada next year. I understand that the planning is going forward but there is nothing in this vote for what is planned for next summer.

Mr. Fisher: Has the minister carried on any negotiations in the past year or had any conversations with the Minister of National Defence on the question of a military task force giving support in the summer time to meet forest fire crises?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The Minister of National Defence and I have been working on this matter for a year and there is perfect harmony and agreement on both sides. What I said to the committee today is the first indication that the matter has moved into the field of ministers meeting with the provinces. These are informal meetings but we are trying to find out what the problems of the various provinces are and to see if we cannot come up with a plan that will be satisfactory to the industry, to the provinces and to ourselves. The military people are very interested in the matter and are co-operating with us in working out plans.

Mr. Fisher: Can the minister tell us whether part of the consideration is the use of some of the facilities of the Royal Canadian Air Force in such a field as water bombing? I raise that point because this appears to be a practical means of bringing medium or small fires under control. Yet very few provincial forestry services can afford the kind of concentration in terms of planes to make this method most effective. Here again, it would seem to me this might fit in with some of the cargo carrying and transportation duties of the R.C.A.F. I should like to know whether that is part of the consideration.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

296. Contributions to the provinces for assistance in forest inventory, reforestation and forest fire protection in accordance wiht agreements entered into by Canada and the provinces, $2,450,000.

Mr. Fisher: Since the election in Quebec has there been any change in the attitude of the Quebec government toward these agreements?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes. Informal approaches were made on these matters by both the previous administration and the present administration in Quebec.

Mr. Fisher: Is the increase enough to take care of any participation in the present fiscal year?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, Mr. Chairman. The vote is set up on the basis of all provinces coming in and if any province does not come in the amount left over is distributed among the other provinces. If Quebec comes in they will get their allotment which is based on a formula.

Item agreed to.

297. Contribution to the province of New Brunswick for assistance in a program designed to combat the spruce budworm infestation, in accordance with an agreement entered into by Canada and the province, $550,000.

Mr. Robichaud: Before I say a word on this item, may I be permitted to welcome the new premier of New Brunswick, whose presence has been noted in the gallery.

This item has to do with the contribution to the province of New Brunswick for assistance in a program designed to combat spruce budworm infestation in accordance with an agreement entered into by Canada and the province. The minister will recall that a few years ago there were some unfortunate instances connected with the spraying operation. Certain streams and certain ponds were infected and the fish were being killed. Could the minister advise this committee if the necessary precautionary measures have been taken to avoid a repetition of such unfortunate incidents?

It seems to me that I recall reading an article in one of the New Brunswick newspapers a few days ago in which it was stated that certain streams had been depleted of sport fish. I believe trout was mentioned in that instance. The main reason for this was the spraying operation. I am not against the spraying of New Brunswick's forests to protect them from budworm infestation, but I do believe certain precautionary measures should be taken. I wonder if the minister could advise the committee if this matter has been looked into?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, this has been a matter of considerable interest to both governments. In the past the spraying has been done on the basis of using 1½ pounds of d.d.t. per acre. We have been in consultation with the Department of Fisheries here, and of course the same department in New Brunswick, and this year in areas close to streams we have decided to use only one-quarter pound of d.d.t. per acre. The fisheries people advise this will not do too much harm to fish, and of course I accept their advice. I think there is a reasonable chance that this compromise will succeed in slowing down the budworms and at the same time not do too much damage to the fish.

Item agreed to.

Forest products laboratories division—

298. Operation and maintenance, $966,063.

Mr. Fisher: Could the minister indicate just how many research people are being added and to what areas are the specialists going? Is it more toward the pulp and paper side or is it more toward the lumber and preservatives side?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The additions to the research staff this year do not do work for the pulp and paper companies directly. The pulp and paper companies do most of their own work in basic research. The 11 new forestry officers put on this year will be doing basic forest research, which will apply to the trees whether they are used for pulp and paper or lumber.

Mr. Fisher: This is not very clear to me. There are a number of people whom I know at the products laboratory who are working in fields that relate to the pulp and paper industry. I am quite aware that the pulp and paper research institute does a lot of work, but I just wanted assurance from the minister that the increase is not in that particular field but is in the field of preservatives and lumber.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think I may have left a wrong impression as a result of my last remark. At division headquarters the number has increased from 4 to 13, that is an increase of 9. At the Ottawa laboratory the number has increased from 108 to 113, that is an increase of 5; at the Vancouver laboratory the number has increased from 53 to 61, an increase of 8. This makes a grand total of 22, of which 11 are scientific personnel. The impression I left at the end of my last answer was that the work of these fellows was connected mostly with the trees themselves. However, these 22 extra people on the research side are working in laboratories which are concerned almost entirely with the uses of wood other than pulp and paper.

Item agreed to.

301. Eastern rockies forest conservation board—Remuneration and expenses of the federal member of the board, $5,575.

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps this question should have been asked on the first item concerning the forestry branch, but in answer to my question earlier the minister gave very little information. Is the minister able to say when the new department is to be established?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): No, Mr. Chairman. Incidentally, since we are on this question of the eastern Rockies, I may say that the agreement that we have will be transferred to the new department. I do not know the time when the new department will be set up. There is still considerable work to do.

Item agreed to.

National museum of Canada—

302. Administration, operation and maintenance, $736,904.

Mr. Fisher: I hope the minister can give us a statement on how the national museum has been adjusting to the problems it had in the last two or three years, the scandal, if I might call it that, within the management. I should like to know, especially, about the performance of some of these central figures in the Rousseau charges, and generally how the museum is coming along now, especially since it now has the building all to itself and is in a position to get moving along in a more constructive pattern. I should like to know whether the government is still searching for a senior appointment amongst the French-Canadians of the population. I should like to know what balance is being sought in connection with that particular matter in order to give French-Canadians some representation at the senior level that they had on such a temporary basis before what was, in effect, the dismissal of Dr. Rousseau.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): First of all, I think the committee will agree with me that there was hardly a scandal down at the museum. It is true that one or two newspapers had headlines which made it look as if there were something very odd going on down there. Fortunately, in the interests of justice and fair play, they stopped that and I am very grateful to them for doing so.

At the present time the director of the museum and the permanent head of the natural history museum is Dr. Russell. He is also the acting head of the human history side of the museum. Recently we have been able to recruit a topnotch person by the name of Mr. Wilson, who will be the assistant director of the human history and natural history side. We are looking forward to gradually straightening out the administrative problems that have arisen in the museum.

I should like at this time to make certain that everyone knows some of our thinking on the museum. The national museum is the place where we keep a record of those things dealing with our natural history and human history. This museum has worked under a very severe handicap because it had to share the building with the geological survey of Canada and the national art gallery.

After many long years the building has now come back to the museum. Certain repair work must be done to modernize the museum for better use. I want to make this point clear. The primary purpose of the museum is to collect our history. However, an important secondary purpose is to make this history accessible and available to all Canadians. It is extremely difficult to move every Canadian to Ottawa. Therefore the museum has done wonderful work in the scientific field in preparing booklets and brochures on various parts of the work we are doing. Indeed, I should like them to push this work further.

Through the medium of television, for example, I should like to be able to take and make alive the exhibits we have there in a dynamic form and send them all across the country through the means of television. In the replanning of the Victoria building I hope that space will be set up for a television studio. I also hope that the various television companies, in trying to achieve their 55 per cent Canadian content, will realize that the best entertainment over a period of years is education and that the great knowledge collected by great scientists in this building will become the real heritage of people all across the country by having it taken to them in the form of television. There are other ways of taking museums to the people. I do not want to bore the committee with details but I will say this. I am quite proud of the way in which the museum is taking hold of this task and with the great ability and the great sense of scientific accuracy possessed by the staff, I am sure the Canadian people, when they have the museum taken to them, will be seeing some of the best examples of the collection of knowledge that we have any place in the world.

Mr. Herridge: In view of the fact that historically Conservative parties have always looked upon nations as national museums and the parties in question as the curators of those museums, the government should meet its greatest success in the administration of this national museum of ours. I think there have been some improvements since the Conservatives came to power. That is one of the branches of the various departments for the improvement of whose administration I give them great credit, although it has been slow. However, I presume it is in line with their historical role in history.

However, I rose particularly to deal with a matter that is of particular concern to people in other museums across Canada and those people who are interested in preserving the archaeological finds and artifacts and other things of the past. In this connection I wish to quote briefly from the report of the committee on mines, forests and waters of the last session in connection with the museum. This report starting at page 671 of Votes and Proceedings of July 6, 1959 reads as follows:

> Your committee recommends that the government examine the adequacy of present legislation and regulations concerning protection of archaeological discoveries and artifacts, and their export from Canada. Such examination should include liaison with the provinces for exchange of information on archaeological discoveries and for uniformity of protective legislation throughout Canada.

I should be interested in knowing what has been done to give effect to that recommendation on the part of the committee because of the interest that is shown in this question by persons across Canada. My attention was drawn quite recently to an article in Maclean's magazine of July 4, 1959. It is written by Fred Bodsworth and it is entitled "The scandal of our lost art treasures". In it he goes to great lengths to indicate how our lost art treasures are going to the United States particularly and in some cases to other nations because apparently we have not in the national museums, the provincial museums or among private persons the initiative to make certain that these treasures are not lost to Canada. I want to quote just a few comments made in this article because they impressed me greatly and in order to emphasize the importance of this question to the committee:

> For 200 years such treasures of Canadian art and history have been pouring unnoticed out of our country into the museums and private collections of the United States and Europe. They have included not only historical treasures of our own pioneer era, but also vast quantities of primitive Indian and Eskimo art—irreplaceable examples of the now forgotten crafts of our first Canadians.

Then he goes on to deal with the places to which these things have gone. He states:

> The Detroit institute of art has a collection of French Canadiana (church sculpture, silver and pioneer furniture) much choicer and comprehensive than anything in Canada, including French Canada.
> New York's museum of the American Indian alone has seventy superb examples of a much-sought type of abstract, wooden, Eskimo mask; in all Canada there are fewer than a dozen comparable specimens.

Then he goes on to say this:

> But the world's biggest Haida argillite collection is a privately owned one in Florida, its 527 specimens probably outranking all Canadian collections combined.
> The art's earliest and most primitive period, prior to the 1830's, is represented in Canada by only one specimen—a pipe in the Hudson's Bay Company museum in Winnipeg. But there are scores of specimens dating back to that period—in the Paris museum of man, the Peabody museum of Massachusetts and the U.S. national museum in Washington.

While we neglect taking care of these treasures, he goes on further to say this:

> Meanwhile collectors from other countries, especially the United States, were overrunning Canada and carting our heritage away by the boxcar load.

I know that the protection of Canadian archaeological discoveries and artifacts is not the sole responsibility or jurisdiction of the national museum. However, I urge that everything possible be done by this government to interest provincial museums and historical associations. I think it is an excellent thing to get the co-operation of local historical associations in connection with the preservation of these interesting relics with respect to our history and former civilization on this continent. I know that our own historical society—I refer to the West Kootenay historical society; and I have never been backward in saying that we are extremely progressive in West Kootenay in many respects—has been greatly interested in making certain of the preservation of Indian relics and things of that sort, of early relics of the pioneer settlements in the fur trading days and the early lumbering days, of the early agricultural settlements, and so on.

I am sorry to know that the only specimen of a Kootenay canoe in existence in Canada was brought from the Kootenays to the national museum, was hung from the ceiling and was allowed to perish from lack of care. One morning when the caretaker went into the museum he found it had fallen to the floor and had broken into many fragments. It is a most unfortunate thing that this canoe, which represents a type of canoe that is found only in two places of the world, namely on the interior lakes in the Kootenays and on a small lake in northern Siberia, was allowed to perish in the national museum because of lack of care.

I mention that matter because this occurrence was greatly regretted by people who were interested in this matter in my district. I am glad to know that I obtained a good photograph of it before it was allowed to collapse and fall to the floor. The situation arose because of lack of a certain moisture content in the air in the building and because of lack of protection of the surface so that the moisture would not evaporate and it would not become so brittle that it would disintegrate.

Before I sit down I also want to bring to the attention of the committee the comments that were made by my leader, namely the hon. member for Assiniboia who I hope will be national leader of the C.C.F. in Canada. On page 1105 of the committee report appears the following:

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, the minister can comment on this if he cares to. Surely there is no suggestion that the Canadian government does not have the constitutional authority to promulgate regulations controlling the export of goods of all kinds—artifacts, specimens, and so on—from this country.—

Then in reply the minister said:

—I know the provinces look after the archaeology of their provinces, and if they had a regulation and would agree that a number of these things could be taken out, at first glimpse, I do not think the federal government would want to set up a national policy to override a provincial policy and look on these as trade goods.

Then the hon. member for Assiniboia goes on to say:

—but I would suggest that general regulations in this field are as necessary and important as are general regulations in the field of taking any other commodities outside of the country.

Then the minister replied:

That has concerned me very much.

And I am sure it has.

I have started a study of provincial legislation and what is operating there.

There is one advantage the federal government has in this field and that is that it can prevent the export of certain things from Canada although it has not jurisdiction over any of these archaeological discoveries or artifacts within the province as within territories. When the minister replies I would like him to say what has been done to remedy this situation and to protect as far as we possibly can these very interesting historical relics which are the heritage of the Canadian people and should be retained in Canada.

(Translation):

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I have only a few words to say. A few years ago, a very cultured gentleman in my province, Mr. Gerard Morrissette, proceeded to make a complete inventory of the riches and invaluable treasures that were going to waste in the province.

In setting up a national museum, we must not overlook its French aspect, that is, we must attach great importance to the souvenirs and treasures still to be found in the province of Quebec, and which are surely valuable.

Therefore, I take the liberty of suggesting to the minister that, in every province of Canada a high official be instructed to make an inventory of those riches and treasures. This task could be entrusted to the curator of each provincial museum, who could at the same time assess their value. Some of those treasures could be given to the Ottawa national museum and would surely enrich it, because in many cases they are on the verge of being forgotten or lost. The situation is the same throughout Canada.

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, in reply to the hon. member for Kootenay West I would like to inform him, because I know he is interested in this, that it is recognized I think all over the world that the finest display of west coast Indian relics is in the national museum here, and at the present time the museum is running in Stratford a big exhibit of the west coast Indians, in connection with the Stratford festival.

The hon. member also spoke of the air conditioning and I can assure him that is being remedied as fast as we can do it in reconstruction of the building. In connection with the Kootenay canoe, the Indians there were kind enough to build one for us so that we have a new Kootenay canoe now.

Mr. Herridge: Which Indians built that canoe?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I will have to wait to get that information.

I should like now to deal with the other subject raised about archaeological site protection. This is a matter which some of us have been interested in for a good many years, and hon. members will remember the strong views which I expressed in the committee in this regard. The hon. member will also remember that one of the recommendations of the standing committee was that some action be taken. I think I have made it clear during the discussion of these estimates that every recommendation of the standing committee has been followed up and action of some sort taken.

I should now like to report to the committee the result of the action we have taken on the recommendation that the hon. member for Kootenay West just quoted. This deals with the promise I made that I would make a study of what was going on in the various provinces. In the national parks we have complete power to prohibit removal of these artifacts. In Indian reserves, under the Indian Act, we also have power to restrict the removal, acquisition of title and trespass. In the Yukon and Northwest Territories, under the amendment we have brought about in the last two years, we are required to obtain permission for control of the minister of northern affairs for their export.

Here is the report for the provinces. Newfoundland, no regulations. Nova Scotia, no regulations. Prince Edward Island, no regulations. New Brunswick, the historic sites protection act 1954, amended 1958. This regulates the designation of sites, issuance of permits and establishment of an advisory board. Quebec, no regulations. Ontario, the archaeological and historic sites protection act 1953. The minister is to issue permits, require reports and specimens and set up a board. In Manitoba, the historic sites protection act 1954. This is modelled after the Ontario act. Saskatchewan, no regulations; but in view of the fact that a letter has gone out with the general suggestion that the provinces should do something to protect these sites, I think Saskatchewan is going to do something. Alberta, the provincial parks act 1955 provides for regulations in the provincial parks only. British Columbia, the archaeological and historic sites protection act 1960 provides for the minister to designate sites to purchase and/or protect sites and to issue permits. It also provides for penalties and the setting up of an advisory board.

I think the report I have just read to the committee illustrates that the value of the work members do in committee does have its effect, and that over the next two or three years more of the provinces will yield to this gentle pressure and set up protection for archaeological artifacts which exist in their province.

I am now informed that the Kootenay canoe which the hon. member was interested in was arranged by the Indian agent at Cranbrook, but I do not know the name of the band.

Mr. Herridge: That is the Kootenay tribe. I was afraid it might have been Eaton's.

Just before the vote passes I want to thank the minister for his explanation and to say that he was quite correct in mentioning the fact that it is the work of this committee and this report which I think spurred interest in the protection of archaeological discoveries.

I also want to make it quite clear that when I referred to the disintegration of the previous Kootenay canoes, I did not mean the staff; I meant on the part of those responsible for providing the air conditioning and the atmospheric conditions required to keep such things in perpetuity.

Mr. Fisher: I was very pleased to hear the accolade of the minister for the committee and I wish he was in a position to tell the committee who it was who wrote that particular recommendation.

I would like to ask the minister how much of this money is going to brighten up the museum and make it somewhat more attractive? I spent quite a few hours last year in the museum with my children, and in doing so I heard quite a number of comments from people going round. The kids are usually impressed with the exhibits but I often hear the comment from adults that the place tends to be gloomy and rather dry.

It does not provide many places where you can sit in comfort nor does it compare with the royal Ontario museum in that regard. If the minister is familiar with the latter he will know there are seats arranged near the best exhibits so that you can sit and enjoy them in comfort. What will be done to brighten up the building? I realize there are limits on what can be done with old buildings. The ground floor display could be improved. If I were from Alberta I would urge the minister to arrange to present the dinosaurs and other relics more impressively than they are presently arranged in that room. Some of the animal and mineral exhibits also should be given better treatment. What are the plans in that regard?

The minister wants to bring the attractions of the museum to the country through television. What contribution does it make in terms of travelling exhibits across the country? Are there plans to increase them? Last year I had the pleasure of seeing a group of students visit the royal Ontario museum in connection with some classes in history. The presence of the attractive exhibits breathed reality into their lessons.

The museum is limited by staff. Much of its material I understand is not on exhibit. What is planned in this respect for next year? This would be interesting news for the people of Ottawa and the country as a whole.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, what the hon. member has just said about making the presentation of natural or human history more dynamic and living is the same point of view I hold. I wish to present to the hon. member a concept of the extent to which the estimates this year attempt to achieve this end. I have in my hand a list of contracts that come under these votes.

A contract has been let covering the taxidermy for two large habitat groups representing the mountain sheep and the mountain lion. One has been let for the construction of four large fibre glass background shells for habitat groups of moose, antelope, mountain sheep and mountain lion. If the hon. member is familiar with the exhibits in the museum of natural history in New York he will know how effective these fibre glass background shells are in presenting exhibits.

Another has been let for the construction of three miniature dioramas of prehistoric life for the new hall of fossils. A contract has also been let for the construction of three miniature dioramas for the hall of geology. A further contract has been let for the painting of the backgrounds of the caribou, grizzly bear and moose dioramas. A contract with another artist has been let for the painting of the backgrounds of the gannet and prairie water fowl dioramas. Another has been let for the preparation of accessories including artificial grass, leaves, flowers, etc., for four large dioramas.

I list these things because they indicate that we are putting into effect the very sort of thing the hon. member is asking for and which I heartily support.

Item agreed to.

Canadian government travel bureau—

303. To assist in promoting the tourist business in Canada including a grant of $5,000 to the Canadian tourist association, $2,687,178.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, this is a very important vote as I need hardly tell the minister and before it is passed perhaps there should be some statement from the hon. gentleman. I do not mean that he should make a long statement—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chevrier: —and I say that with deference to him. Perhaps, however, the hon. gentleman could deal with European travellers, the extent to which the movement of tourists has been affected by exchange restrictions, United States travellers as tourists into Canada and what effect the reduction in the premium on the Canadian dollar has had. If he could make a short statement covering these points it would be of assistance to the committee.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, this is a subject which lends itself to extended statements but I shall confine myself to what I think are salient points. First of all the government recognizes as did the standing committee on mines, forests and waters, that a determined effort has to be made to increase the tourist business in Canada, not only with respect to the question of trade and commerce to reduce the adverse trade balance but also to ensure the recognition of this industry as a basic industry.

The first thing we did was to increase the amount of direct advertising in newspapers and magazines. This increase for the first time raises the amount of advertising slightly beyond what it was before. It is only fair to point out that the inflation in the advertising costs results in not very much over-all space increase.

Second, we have set up the office in Chicago. We had hoped to set one up in San Francisco as well but we had to live within the terms of our budget and make our contribution in that field. Therefore we were not able to get the office in San Francisco going.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle).]

I wish to briefly discuss with the committee something in which I know they will be interested. I refer to the relative merits of advertising over the establishment of offices and other techniques. I know that advertising is very effective in bringing in an increasing number of requests for information. I cannot deny that the effects of the advertising is being carefully evaluated year by year. Every step the advertising agencies can make to prove the effect of our advertising is being taken. However, we have no clear-cut way of evaluating the relative merits of advertising over other forms of inducing tourists to come to this country.

I hold in my hand a page out of a recent Sunday edition of the Chicago Tribune. Hon. members will be able to see that it contains three large beautifully coloured pictures taken along the Alaska highway and a map showing how the people of the United States can get to Alaska. How did this article happen to get into the Chicago Tribune's weekly supplement? The answer is that one of our staff working in the Chicago office became acquainted with members of the staff of the Tribune and I suppose through his enthusiasm and providing them with pictures was able to sell them the idea that their readers would be interested in knowing about the highway that runs into Alaska, the type of scenery that is found along the highway and how to get there. This illustrates one way in which the tourist offices can achieve results.

Third, I wish to mention that for a number of years we have carried out a special program of advertising in an effort to induce people on the eastern seaboard of the United States to go into the four Atlantic provinces. This inducement has been successful to a remarkable degree particularly in the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia which are not separated by water from the road system of the United States. This program has resulted in a sizeable increase each year in the tourist revenue of those provinces.

This brings to mind something I discussed with the standing committee and that is the need for a similar type of program of advertising with respect to the whole of Canada, centering the program around the fact that in every province the trans-Canada highway is completed or soon to be completed. Personally I should like to see a special campaign inaugurated that would point out to all Canadians the completed parts of the trans-Canada highway and the beautiful attractions that are found tributary to the highway.

Each province has a number of attractions that it would like to make known to all Canadians and tourists coming to this country from the United States. I therefore hope there will be some agreement reached between the provinces and the federal government with respect to a special program of advertising emphasizing the trans-Canada highway linking Canada from east to west and associated with this campaign I hope, too, that the attractions in the northern parts of our provinces will be made known to the travellers along that highway.

I wish to put in a special plug, if I may, for the people at the end of the road to Yellowknife which will be opened this fall and on behalf of the people of Whitehorse where so much is being done to build up the tourist industry. It is not without interest that reports which have been made public recently about development of the north show that the report dealing with Alaska puts at the head of the list that the leading industry of Alaska in the near future will be the tourist industry. The Sandford report dealing with Saskatchewan also puts the tourist industry at a very high level.

I would suggest to the committee that the importance of this industry is being very widely accepted, and we have to draft plans that will help push this thing forward with the utmost efficiency. Therefore, I would like to complete that work by saying that I should like to see a program that makes Canadians aware of the trans-Canada facilities that are available nearby and particularly the attractions of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, leading on to Alaska. If we do this I think there is a tremendous number of adventurous Americans who, when they realize there are good roads, good accommodation and tremendous scenic attractions at the end, will want to see their 49th state.

The final thing is this question of European tourist trade. In Europe today there is a relaxation of restrictions, particularly in the United Kingdom, which makes it possible for Canada to move into this market and see whether we cannot induce people to use the cheaper fares that now exist to come to Canada, just as Canadians are using those cheaper air fares to go to those countries of Europe this year. The director of the travel bureau is going to Europe to visit the high commissioner in London and various European countries to talk to their tourist officials to see whether there could not be a program worked out whereby we would in some measure begin to reverse the trend which has become apparent in the last few years of Canadians going to Europe. We do not want to stop that but we do want to try to get more Europeans to come to see Canada, and to make known what is available to them. I do not know whether this summary answers what the hon. member for Laurier has in mind.

Mr. Chevrier: I will not insist.

Mr. Fleming (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Chairman, I feel this is such an important subject that the views of hon. members should be heard. From his opening statement in introducing his estimates and from his statement in the committee of mines, forests and waters last year and from his statements outside the house, it is evident that the minister has a very keen appreciation of the value of the tourist industry and of the development of the industry in Canada. But this, I feel, is a commercial problem and the technique of dealing with it must be borrowed from the field of commerce and the practices of the market place must be common to all our thinking in endeavouring to develop effective means of drawing more business into Canada for the tourist industry.

I appreciate very much the fact that the minister is aware of the value and of the necessity of increasing the number of offices we have in the United States, in addition to an increase in the amount of advertising we do in that area, because advertising of itself is not enough. Even if we were to double our present budget, which I think we ought to do as quickly as possible, anyone in the field of commerce realizes that advertising alone is not enough to sell products; a sales force is essential to follow through on the effects achieved by the advertising program. Advertising softens up, but the sale is undertaken by personal contact. Therefore, a sales force and a travel office can be seen as a branch office of Canadian tourism in the United States, and the staff of those offices should be seen as a sales force for Canadian tourism. Unless the techniques of commercial salesmanship are used those offices are of no value whatever, or at least not the value that they might be.

The minister mentioned the photographs in the Chicago Tribune recently. I would hope that it is common practice of the staff of our travel offices in the United States to constantly endeavour to secure this kind of publicity. If they are not trying to do that they might as well be brought home and be replaced by people who are aware of the necessity of this type of salesmanship and will make it one of the first essentials of their approach to increasing our tourist trade.

I feel that the offices must be considered as sales offices. This is their primary and most important function. The people in those offices must be endeavouring to reach out to our customers, the tourists for Canada, the people of the United States, whether it be service clubs, fraternal organizations, associations of professional people, audiences of Americans that may be reached through any media whatever, in co-operation with Canadian travel organizations, Canadian tourist organizations, Canadian organizations having to do with hotel accommodations, motel associations, Canadian restaurant associations. They must endeavour to sell the ideas of a packaged travel program to groups of people, by making arrangements to make travel in Canada attractive by providing easy and inexpensive opportunities for people to come to Canada, with the co-operation of all those groups in this country that are interested in providing for tourists.

What we want is an imaginative program. We want vigorous people, and they should realize one thing above all, that they are salesmen and they have to get out and reach the customer. They cannot sit in offices and wait for customers to come to them. As long as that concept is realized, then those offices that we have plus those that we add will be worth while. But unless that concept is to be used and put in practice throughout the United States—I hope in far more places than just the three offices, the two now established and the third one contemplated in San Francisco—we shall not be as successful in that effort as we should be. The committee on mines, forests and waters last year recommended Cleveland, Boston and other locations. If these offices are established, then we ought to make sure that the people who go into them have a very clear conception of what their responsibility will be and that they are going to the United States to sell Canadian tourism.

Further than that, the committee recommended last year—and I think the minister is very conscious of this requirement also—that the concept of the responsibility of the tourist bureau be enlarged to include the promotion, in co-operation with the provinces, of increased tourist travel by Canadians in Canada, because while the United States expenditure in Canada increased by $10 million over the previous year, the fact is that Canadians are spending half a billion dollars in foreign countries on travel while foreign visitors are spending $353 million, or thereabouts, in this country. That is not satisfactory.

The minister recognizes that and I believe in his recognition he must be supported by the government and by hon. members to see that the expansion that he has envisioned will come into being and come into being quickly. But particularly, I would suggest that in reviewing how we are going to take advantage of the expanded facilities that are provided we realize that this is a commercial problem; it is a selling problem and the only techniques that are going to be effective in any measure whatever are to see that the people we send into the field are salesmen and when they get there that they sell by every means possible and if they are not capable of doing it they should be brought home and replaced by others in Canada who are.

[Mr. Fleming (Okanagan-Revelstoke).]

Mr. Herridge: Just a few words—

Mr. Chevrier: Hear, hear.

Mr. Herridge: I think I have been very restrained, indeed, this afternoon and not as loquacious as the hon. member for Laurier on occasion.

The tourist industry is a matter of great importance to Canada and is increasing substantially in importance right across the country as people discover the garden of Eden in Canada.

I see, regardless of cuts in other respects, that the vote this year is $2,687,178, which is an increase over last year. I am very pleased to see this increase because I think it is a good investment in the circumstances.

The department is engaged in the function of answering inquiries, which is a very necessary one, in issuing publications and in advertising in various forms. I think these are all worth-while activities which have borne fruit in past years.

I think something more than that is required to achieve success so far as our tourist industry is concerned, namely co-operation with local organizations, with the people of the country, as it were, tourist bureaux, chambers of commerce, tourist camp operators, persons who cater to the tourist industry in various ways, and particularly those engaged on a somewhat smaller scale in the more remote places. You do not have to advertise to get people to go to Banff, Lake Louise and other internationally known resorts. As a result of my experience I find that an increasing number of people want to do two things. First, they want to go to our national parks and their remote and less developed areas. Second, they want to go to the smaller tourist camp operations in the remote areas away from the centres of civilization.

I should like to suggest three things before I sit down. First, it would be a good idea, and I make this suggestion with the best of intentions, for the travel bureau to keep in touch with the operators of smaller tourist camps throughout the country and get suggestions from them as to advertising and publicity and information as to the comments that are heard from tourists from other parts of Canada or from the United States or other countries as to what they enjoy, what they would prefer or what they miss and so on.

Second, I suggest it would be an excellent thing to keep these people, and I know a lot of them, well informed of the work of the bureau and supplied with information to keep them in touch with the industry in their own province and in the rest of Canada as far as possible.

As to my third suggestion, I find that generally speaking tourist camp operators are all in the same circumstances as the hon. member for Kootenay West, always short of funds. I know people with excellent sites and good fishing and that sort of thing and yet they lack the capital to expand their business to meet the opportunities today. I suggest that the minister bring that particularly to the attention of the Minister of Finance because in the last year or two I have had many complaints from persons operating small tourist camps against local banks because of their tight money policy, shall I say, although I do not really like the term. The banks do not seem to have much confidence in the development of our tourist industry. I know of one particular case in my constituency where the value of the operation to date is over $200,000 and the bank looked down its nose at a request for a loan of $5,000 over a period of a year in order to carry out certain developments.

I suggest that the government should include tourist camp operations within the ambit of the Industrial Development Bank Act or similar legislation. I have had this matter brought to my attention by a number of those in my constituency who are interested in the industry and by others in southeastern British Columbia. With these few remarks I will take my seat, I presume much to the satisfaction of the hon. member for Laurier.

Mr. Beech: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister has given consideration to inviting to Canada the American society of travel agents which holds a convention every year. The society is composed of members of the travel industry from all over the world and the convention is in great demand. If the minister could see his way clear to trying to bring the convention to Canada it would be a great help to the travel and tourist industry of Canada and as a result of the convention we would have many good will ambassadors in all corners of the world.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: That completes the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I should like to thank hon. members for the kindness with which they have treated my estimates. I should also like to give the committee a bit of good news. I have had a wire from the Northwest Territories saying that four whooping cranes have been born with the result that the number of whooping cranes has now reached a total of 43 instead of 39 as I reported the other day.

DEPARTMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE

383. Departmental administration, $311,264.

Mr. Balcer: May I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, first of all may I say that my remarks will be very brief. As hon. members know, in addition to the Department of Secretary of State, the minister is responsible for the department of public printing and stationery, which is a service department at the disposal of the departments and agencies of the federal government. He also acts as spokesman for the civil service commission and the chief electoral officer.

The committee will recall that last spring the standing committee on estimates presented a report concerning the Department of Secretary of State. Of the five recommendations that were then advanced, one, four and five, dealt with accounting matters which were brought to the attention of the secretary of the treasury board by my officials. The second recommendation was concerned with lessening the gap between the large expenditures on the printing of patents and the revenue from the sale of printed copies of patents. We have increased the sale price of these printed copies of patents to $1 per copy, and this was made effective on January 1, 1960. I might say that at the same time this change was instituted, there were further amendments made to the scale of fees by increasing certain fees and charges and instituting a new charge for services, all of which should result in some further increase in revenue.

There is also the problem of accommodation for the patent, trade mark and copyright offices. Hon. members will appreciate that the allocation of space is the responsibility of the Department of Public Works and that, consequently, the recommendations of the committee on this subject were brought to the attention of that department. May I remark in passing that when tabling the report of the royal commission on patents, copyright and industrial design, I stated, as reported in Hansard at page 2857:

Since this report contains matters of a highly technical nature, the government does not intend to introduce the necessary legislation to bring a new act into force at the present session. We intend to give to all those who are interested time to study this report and submit their suggestions before introducing appropriate legislation at the next session of this parliament.

For the above mentioned reasons, may I say that the government is quite prepared to postpone, if necessary, the introduction of appropriate legislation.

May I add just a word concerning the civil service commission and remind hon. members that, as mentioned by the Prime Minister, the civil service bill will be left on the order paper. It will be introduced again at the next session of parliament and a committee will be set up for the purpose of going thoroughly into this matter.

I should like to remind the committee also that the house has passed an act respecting the enfranchisement of electors and the election of members of the House of Commons, after long and fruitful work by the standing committee on privileges and elections.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, as you can see, my remarks are rather brief. Since the Secretary of State Department is one of the oldest, most hon. members are quite familiar with all its branches. I am sure, therefore, that all explanations I might give at this time would be superfluous.

I therefore leave it up to hon. members and suggest they concentrate their questions on a particular item and when that item comes up, I shall be very pleased to answer their questions.

(Text):

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, I thank the Acting Secretary of State for his brief statement. I must take this opportunity to state it is unfortunate the government has not seen fit to name a full-time secretary of state for the duration of their term of office instead of keeping the present incumbent in an acting capacity.

Mr. Brunsden: He is acting very well, too.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): You were acting very well, too, up to the present.

As I was saying it is much better for the department itself to have a minister on a full-time basis. I know that the Acting Secretary of State is doing his best, but he also has the responsibility and duties of the Solicitor General. He is subject to a decision from day to day by the Prime Minister who might select another secretary of state. I am not saying this in order to play politics because I am interested particularly in this department which affects so many working branches of the government in which a full-time minister could take an interest and render a great service. I express the hope that at an early date the government will see fit to designate a full-time secretary of state who will occupy that office for as long as this government is in power. What I am saying should not be considered to be any reflection on the present incumbent. So far as I am concerned, it does not matter very much if he occupies the post or someone else does. I am quite pleased with the manner in which he has carried out his functions so far.

I do not intend to say anything about the civil service commission this evening. I feel there is a very good reason why we should not say too much about this. The minister has already indicated that at the next session we will have an opportunity of discussing a new civil service act. It is unfortunate, once again, that although this legislation was forecast in the speech from the throne, we did not get this committee started in the early days of the session. I am sure, however, the government will have no reason for not establishing this committee at the earliest possible date next session.

I am particularly interested, Mr. Chairman, in the report of the royal commission on patents, industrial design and copyright. The minister did make a statement a while ago as to the report on patents which was presented last year. There was also the report on copyright which was presented in 1957 and the report on industrial design which was presented in 1958.

To go backwards, I start with patents. I understand that at this time we cannot hope to change the patent law; nor do I expect that this government or any other government at the next session, in accordance with the report of the royal commission, could produce a Patent Act which would be satisfactory even to any hopeful beginner in patent law. I do not expect action. I am reasonable about this matter. But I expect that the government will listen to representations from various groups and interested parties and will give an opportunity to a committee, perhaps at the next session or a subsequent one, namely a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons.

If my memory serves me rightly, I think it was in 1935 that a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons made a general study of the Patent Act. That procedure worked out well. In studying the project of a new Patent Act or a new patent law, if such a thing is in the mind of the government, after representations have been made I hope that any new legislation will be submitted to a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, which committee I think should formulate a law as to patents which will last for at least some time.

We have had a great many changes in legislation as to patents and trade marks in the past 25 years. In a small country like Canada it is really an extravagance to have what is going on at the present time. I am a practising lawyer and I have never been able to catch up with the changes. It took me some time to learn something about the 1935 Patent Act. We have had many amendments since then and it is now suggested that we should have a new patent law. We had a Trade Marks Act which was revised only a few years ago. Now there are suggestions to be made about designs.

I think that any steps which should be taken in the future should be constructive ones. I hope the government will take its time so that any law which we adopt will be a more or less permanent institution. This country cannot afford to change its law on trade marks, industrial design, and patents every 25 years.

However, I would point out that in the case of the copyright law this report was submitted two years ago. The Copyright Act is one that has not changed over the years and it requires real revision and real amendment. I would suggest to the government that it immediately institute some study with regard to the copyright law. I urge the minister, through his officials and interested parties, to seek to draft a proposed copyright law so that at the earliest opportunity parliament may consider it. As to the copyright law, there are many facets which are undesirable. In connection with any of these laws may I say this, and it will appeal to the government; it appeals to many of us and it appeals to the government, apparently. In connection with these laws it is time for us to look after interests of Canadians. We always speak about looking after the interest of Canadians. In patent matters, industrial design matters and copyright matters, while we should respect as much as possible international agreements, we should first consider Canadian interests.

One does not need to be a student of statistics to understand the present situation. One can look at the grants of patents, for example, and it will be seen that a small proportion of them are granted to Canadians. I think the figure is 1,506 out of a total of about 24,000, which is a small proportion while the United States proportion is 64 per cent as against 6 per cent Canadian and 10 per cent in the United Kingdom. Therefore in drafting laws of that kind in the future, we should be extremely careful to see to it that we protect the interests of Canadians and also that we are not merely passing laws to help people who are foreign to this country, although they are our friends, providing patent protection which may be of some use to them but which is detrimental to us.

By that I am not saying that the Patent Act as it stands now is detrimental to the Canadian people. However, I say that there are some aspects of the law which are not helpful to Canadians. They create a sort of tariff bar against Canadians. Our law does not protect Canadians as it should. When this matter comes up for consideration on another occasion I should be glad to express my views on it. However, I urge the government to go carefully about redrafting the Patent Act and to consult not just one group but all the interested parties who may want to make submissions, even though we have a report from a royal commission. A report from a royal commission may be a fine guide but I still think that the government and the members of this house must take responsibility for passing legislation which will be of the greatest benefit to the people of this country.

In connection with this matter I was going to say that while we have a technical report from the royal commission on patents, copyright and industrial designs, their field did not cover administration. I come back to this matter before this committee because I think it is the government's responsibility to seek some better way in which to administer these three branches of the Department of Secretary of State. At some time I am sure a government will decide that there should be a head over these three departments who will have the rank of deputy minister. At the present time we have branches under the secretary of state such as the Queen's printer who has the rank of deputy minister. We have the chief electoral officer and we have others such as the dominion archivist. But in the case of patents, trade marks and designs, these men do not hold office with the rank of deputy minister. They are under the undersecretary of state. While that situation is all very well, I do not think this important branch should be without its own head reporting directly to the minister.

I urge the government to consider this suggestion because this was not a matter for the royal commission to consider. I think the government will be instituting an important advance in the interest of the department of patents, trade marks and copyright if it would establish such a department under such a head. I think the Prime Minister will agree with me that matters arising under the patent law, the trade mark law and the copyright law require a head who will understand and be responsible for these acts. I know that is the feeling of solicitors and counsel who act before the department. They feel there should be one head over this department, with a director for each branch. This is a suggestion I make to the secretary of state and I hope it will be given further consideration in the near future.

I know that the question of a building for the patent office, the trade mark office and the copyright office is not exactly within the purview of the secretary of state. However, this is an opportunity to tell the Prime Minister and the Minister of Public Works at the same time that it is not satisfactory to go to these departments in No. 8 building, that wooden building out at the farm. It would do some of the members of the government good, in connection with some duties relating to patents or trade marks, to go running around the halls in No. 8 building, in order to find out how difficult the problem is. These are departments to which the public has access all the time and in which business is being carried on for the public in various parts of the country. I feel that a building should be provided as soon as possible in the vicinity of the parliament buildings—for example, on Sussex street near the research council—where all the offices of the patents, trade marks and copyright divisions would be concentrated. I will reserve any further remarks to the separate items.

Mr. Argue: I have a few brief remarks I should like to make at this time. I do not think any of us are ready to complain about the person holding the office of Acting Secretary of State, but I do want to say, particularly since the Prime Minister is in the committee, that it would seem to me it is a mistake to keep a minister in an acting position on almost an indefinite basis. I would suggest to the Prime Minister that it might be very much in order for him either to appoint the present person as a permanent minister as ministers go and remove him from the necessity of acting as the Acting Secretary of State—

Mr. Brunsden: Are you not in that category?

Mr. Argue: Yes, I am, but that does not mean I necessarily agree that it should be on a permanent or semi-permanent basis.

Mr. Chown: It will not be long before you achieve that.

Mr. Argue: I am not going to make any forecasts. Time will decide these things. I notice the Prime Minister smiling, and he was smiling some time ago as soon as I started to say this and I expected he would.

[Mr. Richard (Ottawa East).]

But I do feel that since the Prime Minister is in a position to do something about it it would be a very good thing to have a regular secretary of state instead of a genial and competent Acting Secretary of State on what appears to be a rather permanent basis.

The Ilsley royal commission was asked to inquire into the whole question of patents, copyrights and trade marks and these reports have now been made to the government. I would hope that appropriate action can be taken at an early date. It is a long time since I have said anything in this house on the question of patents, but I do feel that patents in the past have been used as a method of obtaining artificially high prices; that they have been used to maintain a monopoly position in many instances; that they have been used to prevent competition; and that they have been a very heavy burden on the general public.

The purpose of that inquiry, I take it, was to revise the Patent Act and these other acts so as to make competition more effective in the hope that prices of important commodities might be brought down. It has been suggested in the report of the commission that patents on food, drugs, surgical and therapeutic devices have been used in such a way as to maintain unnecessarily high prices in these fields. I realize that many submissions have been made to the government following the publication of these reports. The government wants to consider these submissions but I would hope that at the next session of parliament appropriate action can be taken in these fields.

There is one other item to which I wish to refer and that is with regard to the work of the civil service commission in filling the vacancies in various departments. I have in my hand a very voluminous report which was tabled in this house as the result of questions which I had placed on the order paper. These questions were as follows: How many resignations have been received in each government department or crown corporation in each month in each year since January 1, 1957, from (a) professional personnel (b) administrative officers? Second, I asked: How many vacancies presently exist in each government department or crown corporation for positions to be filled by (a) professional personnel (b) administrative officers?

Now the report has been tabled in the house, and in the Department of Agriculture within this period, in the professional category there were 336 and there are still 194 vacancies. In the Department of Justice, 43 resignations, 21 vacancies still existing. In the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys 92 resignations, 47 vacancies. In the Department of National Defence, 193 resignations, 119 vacancies. Department of National Health and Welfare, 704 resignations, 110 vacancies. Department of National Revenue, 413 resignations, 278 vacancies. Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, 60 resignations, 25 vacancies. Department of Public Works, 71 resignations, 63 vacancies. Department of Transport, 111 resignations, 135 vacancies. Department of Veterans Affairs, 854 resignations, 223 vacancies.

Mr. Chairman, the return is not complete in that every department does not provide information as to the length of time these various vacancies have been in existence; but in looking over the information that has been given it would seem to me that there are hundreds of vacancies in the government service which have been in existence for many months.

I would ask the Acting Secretary of State to comment on why there has been such delay and apparently such difficulty in filling so many of these posts. I would think from looking over the return that perhaps the salaries which are provided in Canada for technical and professional personnel are inadequate and should be increased. It would seem to me that it must detract from the efficiency of the public service to have this very large number of vacancies apparently so difficult to fill. I would hope that speedy attention is being given to this problem. I feel that in a country like ours providing adequate and competent personnel for government departments is very essential and that these vacancies should not exist over a long period of time.

I would ask the Acting Secretary of State to give the committee any information he can as to why there are so many vacancies in existence, why apparently it has taken so long to fill them, and to say what action the government is taking or has under consideration in order to attract into the public service adequate numbers of competent and well-trained men and women.

Mr. Brunsden: Would the hon. member permit a question. Has he noted any diminution in the public service of Canada as a result of these vacancies?

Mr. Argue: I am afraid there is evidence that the efficiency of the public service is suffering because of these many vacancies. Otherwise the government should not be advertising for people. Surely they do not want to waste money. The government must feel that technical officers, nurses in the Department of National Health and Welfare, chemists and botanists and field husbandry and animal husbandry people are important to the Department of Agriculture. These vacancies have existed on a long term basis and I think the public service is suffering.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, would the gentlemen permit a question. The hon. member for Assiniboia said that the granting of patents on medicines has caused an increase in prices. Since I doubt that, could the hon. gentleman illustrate his point by offering a few examples?

Mr. Argue: No, I am not able to at this time. I have referred to some of the statements contained in the report of the royal commission. That, to me, is very weighty evidence that it is a fact.

Mr. Valade: It has not been proved.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to hold up the estimates of the Acting Secretary of State (Mr. Balcer), but I just want to say a few words.

I realize that earnest and sincere efforts have been made in the last three years to make Canada as a whole, and more particularly the Canadian administration, not only bilingual, but also bicultural. A striking proof of this is the simultaneous interpretation system which has been wanted by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) himself.

But as the federal administration cannot be bicultural unless it is perfectly bilingual, it is impossible not to discuss the problem of translation, a field which comes under the secretary of state.

I often complained, both in and outside the house, of the fact that not all documents, even sessional papers, reach hon. members in the French version at the same time as does the English version.

The secretary of state answered an earlier question of mine in this regard by telling me that our translators are remarkably able and quick at their task but that they are overworked. Quite obviously there should be considerably more of them. It is likewise obvious that they ought to be better paid, in the first place because they deserve it by reason of the excellence of their work and also—and this is perhaps rather more serious than it seems—because if our translators are paid more in accordance with their worth, many officials for whom and with whom they work will have much more regard for them. Those officials will look upon translators as fellow workers not merely as a necessary evil. In drafting a report, for instance, consideration could be given to the fact that the report is to be published at the same time in French as in English. There would be no waiting until an hour before a document has to be tabled to realize that it should be tabled simultaneously in both the official languages of the country.

I have heard all kinds of complaints about the way the translation service is organized. No one questions the high intellectual qualifications of the heads of that service, but there are many who question their sense of organization.

I wonder if it might not be advisable to appoint, under the superintendent of translations, a manager, or whatever title might be given to the appointee, who would see that the services of better paid and more numerous translators are put to the best, most effective and most economical use in all respects.

Mr. Bourque: Mr. Chairman, at the outset of my remarks, I wish to commend the Acting Secretary of State on the occasion of the appointment, as printer to Her Majesty the Queen, of Roger Duhamel, a newspaperman with extensive experience and a man who is very highly regarded in leading literary circles of the province of Quebec. It is an excellent appointment, and a wise choice. It gives me pleasure to commend the government for selecting a man of that calibre to fill this important post.

I am confident that the new Queen's printer will enjoy the respect and admiration of his entire staff.

The appointee is an upright, highly regarded man, a distinguished newspaperman who has written for many periodicals, an author with several works to his credit, and I feel sure that his appointment will be welcomed by every political party in this house.

(Text):

I have many questions to ask concerning the administration of the printing bureau. I was inspired to ask these questions after reading an address given to the employing printers' association of Montreal on June 8, 1960 by David MacLellan, general manager of E.P.A. and of the graphic arts industries association, a national body embracing all employing printers' organizations from coast to coast, entitled, "Printing—Canada's Biggest Employer in Manufacturing and How the Industry is Taxed, Trammelled and Trimmed".

As the new Queen's printer has just taken up his new post no doubt he will find it interesting to listen to these questions. My questions will bear mostly on a comparison of the cost system of the government printing bureau with that of other firms in the printing industry. I do not know whether the minister would like to listen to these questions now or if he would prefer to listen to them when the estimates for the printing bureau are before us.

Mr. Balcer: I wonder if the hon. member would mind if I answered his question at the time when the vote with respect to the printing bureau is before us.

Mr. Bourque: Providing I have the minister's assurance that my questions will be taken up when the estimate for the printing bureau is before us I shall be glad to defer them until that time.

I have another matter to bring up bearing on the civil service commission. I refer to the case of Mrs. Catherine Ann Meredith, a lady who has been in the employ of the government for 14½ years and who would have been entitled to a pension within the next six or eight months, but who was informed that her services would end within a month. I think this is a great injustice. I have all the facts before me and would like to take up the case. I will be satisfied to defer this matter until the estimate concerning the civil service commission is before us if the minister will assure me that he will answer my question at that time.

Mr. Balcer: I glady give the hon. member that assurance, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

385. Trade marks division, including a contribution to the international office for the protection of industrial property, $199,906.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, this is one of the paying branches of the department. I should like the minister to tell me what is the salary of the registrar of trade marks and if there has been any increase?

Mr. Balcer: It has been the same salary for the last year and a half, $10,000.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Can the minister give an indication whether it will be increased?

Mr. Balcer: I understand that this position is in a group that will be considered very shortly. We should be in position to correct this situation within a short time. I cannot say exactly how long it will be before there is a correction.

Item agreed to.

386. Bureau for translations, $1,639,678.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I note that this item involves an increase of $40,303, which will allow the bureau for translations to hire five more persons.

I wonder whether the number of translators is adequate to give us the service we are entitled to expect with regard to the translation of some reports.

I have noted, this year, that the French version of the Canada Year Book has been distributed six months after the English publication. The same goes for several other reports. In fact, committee reports often reach us several days, and even several weeks, after the English version has been published.

With regard to the Atlas of Canada, which was published last year, I believe the French edition came out a year after the English edition and, if I am not mistaken, the French version is out of print.

I have no doubt that our translators are efficient workers, nor do I doubt that their output is as high as it can be. That is why I say that last year, especially towards the end of the session, the health of several translators broke down. One of them suffered a stroke, and I understand that this year again some of the translators have been ordered to take a rest cure.

Therefore, could the Acting Secretary of State (Mr. Balcer) give us the assurance that we will have the French translation of the documents I have just referred to, as well as that of many others, fairly soon after the publication of the English version, especially as far as the proceedings of the committees of the House of Commons are concerned?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, I should like to reply to the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger), and to the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon), who both dealt with the bureau for translations.

I take this opportunity to tell the house how fortunate our government and country are in having such devoted civil servants, who perform a task that is often very thankless, the translator's role being extremely important and his work most difficult.

There is no doubt that there have been regrettable delays. However, I do not think these are merely due to an inadequate number of translators on the staff, because the production of some translations is less dependent on the number of people available to do a particular job than on the division which handles it. As we know, during the session a group of excellent translators is responsible for translating all the debates in the house. This work is done under pressure, and the result is that there may be delays in other services.

The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm suggested a moment ago that we appoint a manager of the bureau for translations. It gives me pleasure to report to the house that we have precisely made such an appointment. Mr. Henriot Mayer has been appointed manager of the bureau for translations. His job will be to keep in touch with the various departments, so that the latter may supply the bureau for translations will all manuscripts and documents as soon as they are available. It has happened, in some cases, that a book was completely printed before it was sent to the translation service; I therefore think there is a certain amount of education to be done in some departments, it is to get them into the habit of sending their manuscripts to the translation service as soon as available so that both versions may be published at the same time.

Mr. Pigeon: Hear, hear.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, I want to tell the Acting Secretary of State that I am very happy to hear the good news he just announced; however, I disagree with him when he says that the present number of translators is adequate.

The appointment of a manager for the bureau for translations is a step in the right direction, but I believe that translators now employed by the department are handling more work than they can fairly be expected to handle. The new manager of the bureau for translations will possibly agree, with the least bit of encourgagement from the Acting Secretary of State and those who are familiar with prevailing conditions, that the number of translators might be substantially increased. I believe it is unfair to demand from translators the amount of work that has been demanded from them for a number of years when they have to work outside normal hours. In all positions in the civil service employees are expected to turn out an average amount of work. Now in the case of translators, or at least of a great number of them, the maximum output is demanded, and when it is a matter of translating a technical paper or professional document it is somewhat difficult to demand of those people that they work without respite, particularly under the pressure of circumstance.

Consequently, I ask the secretary of state and his new manager of the bureau for translations to consider the situation and determine whether the present number of translators is really adequate.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, I would not like to give the house a wrong impression. I have no doubt that, if the number of translators can be increased, work will be better distributed and the service will be improved accordingly.

The remarks just made by the hon. member for Ottawa East will be given serious consideration.

Item agreed to.

Office of the chief electoral officer—

45. Salaries and expenses of office, $76,925.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Are the positions of the chief electoral officer and the commissioner of patents being considered for increases?

Mr. Balcer: I am very pleased to say that the new act which was passed just recently increased the salary of the chief electoral officer substantially.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): What about the commissioner of patents? Is he included with the registrar of trade-marks in the group that is being increased?

Mr. Balcer: I will have to check this when the civil service commission item is before us.

Item agreed to.

Civil service commission—

65. Salaries and contingencies of the commission including compensation in accordance with the suggestion award plan of the public service of Canada, $3,853,967.

Mr. Bourque: Mr. Chairman, I should like to bring the case of Catherine Ann Meredith to the attention of the Acting Secretary of State. I read from a letter received from Letourneau, Quinlan, Forest, Emery, Raymond & Bouchard, barristers and solicitors:

Our client, after 15 years in the civil service, is being arbitrarily dismissed despite the fact of an excellent record, as attested by the copy of letter enclosed from D. R. Campbell, Esq., director of civilian personnel (navy) dated as late as December 15, 1959. Mrs. Meredith also has excellent references from the first administrative officer, Lieutenant Commander Thomas, R.C.N., retired, as well as the supervisor at Saint John, N.B., in the Department of National Revenue where our client was employed previous to coming to Montreal, in 1953.

In the circumstances, it would certainly be a shame to deprive our client of the pension which she has earned by good and faithful service over all these years, which retirement pension will become due in November, 1961.

I have a copy of a letter written to Captain J. S. Somers, R.C.N., principal naval overseer, Montreal area, dated June 23, 1960.

[Mr. Richard (Ottawa East).]

It is from the same lawyers. I will not read the whole letter but just some parts of it:

We note that after some 15 years of valuable experience and excellent record in the Department of National Defence, you give her less than one week, to wit: until the 27th of June, to optate for four months retiring leave beginning on August 1 and terminating on November 30, 1960 or three months cash gratuity payable on separation after November 30, 1960. From the information contained in our file, it clearly appears that our client has enjoyed an excellent record up to and including December 15, 1959, as attested by the photostatic copy of letter addressed to our client from D. R. Campbell, Esq., for the director of civilian personnel (navy).

Our client would be entitled in the normal course of events to receive her pension in the month of November, 1961. She was with the Department of National Revenue in Saint John, N.B., from the year 1945 until the year 1953. She has been in her present location with the civil service since the year 1953, adjacent to the Canadian Vickers Limited, but not connected with the latter...

Apparently, from the information contained in our file, you have sent the above letter basing yourself on article 13.02 in the civilian personnel administration and accounting manual, subsection 1 (d), which provides:

"Any employee who has attained the age of 60 years but who has not attained the age of 64 years and 6 months may be retired for reasons of age, in unusual cases where continued employment involves a serious problem."

Then there are certain matters mentioned which are not relevant. I continue:

We cannot see how these incidents could by any stretch of imagination be construed as serious problems, more particularly in view of our client's record with the department over many years.

In view of the foregoing, we do believe that it is only fair, equitable and just that our client be kept on by the department until she has reached her normal retirement age next year and be given when she is retired in November, 1961, the pension she has earned by her excellent record as any civil servant has the right to expect and get.

In view of the very short notice given, we must ask you without delay to explain the option which you set forth in your above mentioned letter, which our client does not understand.

Again, there is another letter written to me by the same firm of lawyers under date of June 30, 1960, which reads in part as follows:

I can only repeat that it does seem a shame that Captain Somers sees fit to dismiss Mrs. Meredith after all these years of good and faithful service to the Department of National Revenue and to the Department of National Defence. Especially, when she will be in the normal course of events coming of age to receive her pension next year.

In the circumstances, it seems to me that the least that they could do would be to transfer her to another department until such time as her time for pension has elapsed.

I will now read a letter from H. Thomas, lieutenant-commander (E), R.C.N., retired, no date.

I have been requested to supply a reference to the above mentioned person dealing with her duties during the period of my appointment as staff officer on the staff of the principal naval overseer, Montreal.

I will pass over some matters that are not relevant.

Mrs. Ann Meredith joined the staff in October, 1953, as a typist. Having regard to her experience and the duties required she was employed as a clerk. She worked well, with initiative and loyalty. At that time, in the circumstances, her work was invaluable. She has one highly valuable quality that fits in a technical activity—she can and does follow instructions from appropriate authority implicitly.

Observing that clerical staff can never fully understand the technical details involved, this attitude is reassuring to the responsible officer. He knows that his instructions will be carried out as required.

I also have a letter dated July 28, 1953, written by R. G. McKenna, reading as follows:

To whom it may concern:

Mrs. Catherine A. Meredith has been employed in the income tax office in Saint John, N.B., for a period of eight years. During this period she has been employed in the accounts-collections section, performing various clerical duties as well as being employed as a stenographer and typist. Her work has always proven to be very satisfactory.

I have been personally acquainted with Mrs. Meredith since July, 1951, at which time I took over the supervision of the section in which she is employed. I have found her to be a very conscientious, capable and dependable employee and believe that she will be very satisfactory. She has demonstrated that she has a considerable amount of initiative and has readily adapted herself to various new duties which she has been called upon to perform.

Then a further letter dated December 15, 1959, from D. R. Campbell for the director of civilian personnel (navy) which reads as follows:

Mr. Sharpe has requested that I forward a personal note to you expressing his regret that the authorities concerned have not found it possible to amend the civilian complement of P.N.O., Montreal, as discussed with you in his office on December 7.

In so far as your own position is concerned, the duties and responsibilities are considered to be consistent with the present classification, clerk 2. The reclassification of the other position to clerk 4 has been found to be unjustified.

It is suggested that you continue to avail yourself of every possible opportunity to enter promotional competitions in the Montreal area. By so doing it seems likely that, in due course, your valuable experience and excellent record in this department will be properly recognized and your advancement to more responsible duties will follow.

Then there is a further letter dated June 21, 1960, from J. S. Somers, captain, R.C.N., which reads as follows:

Dear Madam:

Mrs. Catherine Ann Meredith
N.D.—P.N.O. 72—Clerk 2
P.N.O. Montreal

I am advised by the area civilian personnel officer that records on hand in his office indicate that you have to your credit six and a half days annual leave to which you are entitled upon separating from the service. Consequently, in order to liquidate this annual leave, you will cease active duty in this office at noon hour, 21 July, 1960.

Under existing regulations and in view of your length of service, you have an option to choose either of the following:

(a) 4 months retiring leave beginning on 1 August and terminating on 30 November, 1960, or

Observing that prior approval must be obtained from the naval secretary for either retiring leave or cash gratuity, you are hereby requested to inform me in writing of your decision before 27 June, 1960.

I believe that in the normal course of events a person who has worked 14½ years for the civil service would naturally expect to receive a pension at the age of 60. This lady had worked for some 14½ years and just at the time when she is looking forward to retirement on a satisfactory pension she is thanked for her services and let go. She seems to have a perfect record but after all these years she is fired from her position and asked to take some examination to see if she can qualify for some other position. If she has served the government well for 14½ years I think the government should know whether she is qualified and whether she should get a pension. To say to her after all these years and just about the time she would have been eligible for a pension "We are going to let you go" seems to me to indicate that the government is trying to get away from some responsibility. They put this lady out of a job with no future in front of her on a mere whim just because they do not want to pay a pension. I should like to hear what the minister has to say about the matter.

Mr. Brunsden: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Bourque: Certainly.

Mr. Brunsden: In one of the earlier letters which the hon. member quoted there was reference to some relationship between Mrs. Meredith and Vickers. Would he explain that?

Mr. Bourque: I could not say positively, but I believe the government has employees whom they send—they may send a clerk from here—to a place where they are building a ship. This person may look after their interests at the place where the ship is being built. This lady was evidently sent there for the government, and I assume was working for the government at Vickers.

Mr. Balcer: I was very interested in listening to the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean, and his full explanation of this case. I would say that he appears to be on fairly sound ground in his argument. Unfortunately, in so far as the civil service commission is concerned, this particular case does not come under their jurisdiction because all that the civil service commission is asked to do in a case like this is to concur in the decision taken under the provisions of the superannuation act. Unfortunately, there is no appeal. However, I can assure the hon. member that I will take up this case with the proper authorities, and we will try to find a way out of the problem.

Mr. Bourque: May I ask the minister if we are to understand that a civil servant has no more protection than that? He can work at a job for 15 or 16 years, and then be summarily dismissed for no reason whatever, just about the time he is coming into his pension? Is this the only guarantee we offer the civil servants of Canada?

Mr. Balcer: Unfortunately, we have not got the details with respect to the decision taken by the department. There must be some reason behind their decision because according to the superannuation act there is no doubt that this person is entitled to a pension. There must be some other reason, and I can assure the hon. member that we will make the proper inquiry into the matter.

Mr. Bourque: May I leave it in the minister's hands on the understanding that he will look into the situation, because this lady should have an answer. She should know why she was dismissed.

Mr. Balcer: I will be pleased to do so. If the hon. member had communicated with me directly I would have taken up the matter directly with the civil service commission and the other authorities. This is the first time I have heard about the case.

Mr. Bourque: Possibly the minister's advisers could tell him because no doubt the civil servants of Canada will think their position is not very sound if this can happen to anyone, and they have to have recourse to a member to bring up their cases. They seem to have been fighting this case for the last six or eight months.

(Translation):

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take a few moments of the committee's time to point out to the Acting Secretary of State a disparity between the salaries provided for some classifications and the functions those employees have to perform.

For instance, I refer to the salary scale paid certain professional classes, among others, doctors, economists, stenographers and chemists.

These are approximate figures. For instance, doctors are offered a salary of approximately $10,000 for their services.

[Mr. Balcer.]

With regard to economists, the salary offered them varies between $8,000 and $9,000; stenographers get about $6,000, whereas pharmacists are only offered some $4,500 for their professional services.

May I, Mr. Chairman, in this matter, call the minister's attention to page 38 of the civil service commission report which was published in Ottawa in December 1958, page 38 of the English text. I do not have the French version here; may I therefore quote the English text:

(Text):

4013 (ACT)

The establishment of grade levels in any class shall, within the limits set by the nature of the work to be performed, be such as to provide for a career pattern.

4014 (REG)

The commission may revise the classification or grade of any position to provide for an unusual degree of competence demonstrated by the incumbent.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I hope that the Acting Secretary of State will give my remarks some favourable attention to the effect of considering the professional services of pharmacists, in the civil service; thus, I would ask him to see whether it would not be possible to increase their salaries so as to put them in line with their functions in the federal administration.

Mr. Chairman, with regard to another matter, I wish the minister would take the necessary steps to change the method of interdepartmental promotion through competition.

We know it is customary in the civil service, to have inter-service competitions for the promotion of an employee to another post; that was done in a somewhat unorthodox manner until the Conservative party took over.

May I be allowed to mention, among others, the fact that under Liberal administration, certain practices or certain undue influences were resorted to, in order to have a personal friend promoted within the civil service; thus, a special competition was prepared to give him a particular promotion in the civil service. As a matter of fact, I received some time ago a communication in this respect from an employee who had been appointed to the ordnance depot in Montreal by the former administration. Now, this gentleman, who allowed me to reveal his name here, informed me of the method used by the former administration for the purpose of promoting one of their friends. The case is that of Mr. Henry Sibley, of 7286 Musset street, Ville St. Michel, Montreal.

When a competition was advertised in the department, Mr. Sibley was approached by an official of that administration who is then supposed to have given him all the information and all the answers to the questions which were to be asked at the competition in order to allow him to get the position applied for.

Afterwards, that gentleman, wishing to be promoted, had been assured that he would be rendered the same service. Unfortunately, the necessary information could not be given, because the person who was supposed to provide it had been transferred to another department; and that gentleman could not know in advance the answers to the questions which were to be asked to those interested in taking part in the competition.

There, Mr. Chairman, you have an instance of an abject procedure which was in use and had even become prevalent under the former administration.

I am sure that the acting minister will consider it a duty to correct such an anomaly which involves an injustice towards all those who work in the civil service.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I know that bilingualism in the civil service has made great strides. And I am happy to commend the minister (Mr. Balcer) for his constant efforts to protect and emphasize the necessity of bilingualism in the federal administration.

However, I should like to call the minister's attention to the fact that a short time ago I phoned the civil service commission here in Ottawa to ask information about summer jobs for university students, and I unfortunately noted that there was no bilingual employee there to reply to the questions I wanted to ask.

I have here the name of the person concerned and the date of that occurrence and I am sure that the minister will consider it a duty and a pleasure to meet our requests.

Once again, I take this opportunity, Mr. Chairman, to congratulate the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) and the minister for their constant efforts to establish a perfect bilingual system in the civil service.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I had thought we would pass the estimates of the civil service commission rather quickly, considering that this is the first time the minister has introduced his departmental estimates and that a commitee is to be set up next year to consider the new civil service act.

However, having heard the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Valade) lay a serious charge and mention a name, that of Mr. Henry Sibley, I think the minister now has a duty to make a thorough investigation of the case. He can no longer ignore it. The hon. member for St. Mary has laid a charge which may be based just on hearsay. As we know, he always likes to rise and throw charges around. Now that it is done—

Mr. Valade: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Caron: —we demand that—

Mr. Valade: I rise on a question of privilege. The member for Hull has just stated that I have laid charges. I laid no charges, but I laid down definite facts on the complaint referred to me.

Mr. Caron: The hon. member is trying to start a debate; it is not a point of privilege.

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Some hon. Members: Are you the authority on questions of privilege?

Mr. Caron: Questions of privilege are clearly set out in the standing orders.

Mr. Valade: He is afraid of mosquitoes.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I was saying that, in view of the serious charge laid by the hon. member for St. Mary, the minister has a duty to direct the civil service commission to investigate. Names have been mentioned, and it is claimed that examination questions and answers were supplied in advance to one of the examinees.

That is one of the most serious charges ever laid against the civil service commission. I think the members of the civil service commission have always been honourable people. If any one of them had committed such an action, he would have been guilty of a crime, and would no longer be honourable. The charge just laid by the member for St. Mary implies that within the civil service commission, whether it be the commissioners or other people, there were persons of questionable integrity. The minister therefore cannot ignore this charge; he must investigate the matter fully and report to the house as soon as possible. I would even go so far as to demand that the minister let the estimates of the civil service commission stand until the last minute of the session, to give him time to conduct an investigation and report back to the house.

I realize that the civil service commission, as any human organization, cannnot be perfect. It will make mistakes. However, in the many years I have been observing its behaviour, the commission has done a first rate job for the government and has striven to eliminate patronage to the greatest possible extent. And when I hear people—

Mr. Pigeon: Tell us about your nephew Lupien, who is a manager for the central mortgage and housing corporation.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) has just mentioned the name of one of my nephews who has been appointed manager of the Montreal office of the central mortgage and housing corporation.

Mr. Valade: On your recommendation.

Mr. Caron: I give my word to the hon. member that I have not intervened in any way, directly or indirectly, nor to the civil service commission or the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in favour of or against my nephew. I never had the opportunity to talk about him with anybody, either on the telephone, nor verbally, nor by letter or otherwise. And when the hon. member claims such a thing, it is another charge he is making just like all the unfounded charges he makes, without ever being able to substantiate them.

Mr. Pigeon: Is he your nephew, yes or no?

Mr. Caron: He is my nephew. And the fact that he is my nephew does not prevent him from trying to earn the right to advancement in the civil service commission or elsewhere.

Mr. Fortin: It did not do him any harm.

Mr. Caron: I feel that a man who claims to be serious and intelligent and who raises such a question as this, reveals his habitual state of mind. It reminds me of his state of mind when under the former administration of the province of Quebec, he was the secretary of a minister of that government.

I hope that when the hon. member makes charges, he will at least have the courage to rise on his feet and make them directly rather than in the underhand way he is making them now.

I say that anyone who suggests that a man who has earned advancement by his work does not deserve it, and has no right to promotion, either in the civil service commission or elsewhere—I say that anyone who claims such a thing is devoid of any sense of honour.

[Mr. Caron.]

The Chairman: Order. I hope the hon. member for Hull, on thinking over the words he just used—

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: —will realize they are obviously out of order.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, is it—

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

The Chairman: Order.

(Text):

Mr. Chevrier: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. My understanding of the rules of this house is that if a member of parliament on his responsibility makes a statement such as that which the hon. member for Hull has just made, then the hon. member who makes the accusation must accept that statement. That is the rule.

The Chairman: I agree with the hon. member for Laurier, but I was not objecting to this statement. I was simply objecting to a statement made by the hon. member for Hull concerning the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm. That is quite a different matter.

Mr. Chevrier: I still rise on a point of order. Before the other point is disposed of I ask you to demand of the hon. member that he rise and accept the statement which has just been made by the hon. member for Hull.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member has attacked me. He told me that I am devoid of honour. I ask you to order him to withdraw his words, which are not parliamentary.

Mr. Caron: I never said, Mr. Chairman—

(Text):

Mr. Chevrier: I still rise on a point of order and the point of order I raise was the first one, namely that it is the rule of this House of Commons that if an hon. member states on his responsibility that such and such is not the case, the hon. member making the accusation must accept that statement.

The Chairman: Order. I have told the hon. member for Laurier that he is right in principle. However, in the present case the hon. member for Hull has not challenged the statement made by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm. There was no contradiction.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes; there was.

The Chairman: No; there was no contradiction. The hon. member for Hull made a statement which was not a denial of any statement made by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm; it was an explanation. There is therefore no reason for the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm to accept the statement made by the hon. member for Hull, as he did not deny it. If he had denied it, I would have asked him to accept the statement made by the hon. member for Hull. But the point I raise—and this is the first point that must be settled—is that the hon. member for Hull, I am sure without reflection, mentioned that the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm had shown that he had no honour. Of course that is against the rules as clearly indicated in citation 155, paragraph 3 of Beauchesne. That is where I intervened and asked the hon. member for Hull to correct that statement.

Mr. Chevrier: Will Your Honour hear me?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

The Chairman: I will hear the hon. member for Laurier further if he wishes to speak on the point he has raised, but first I must dispose of the point raised by the Chair.

Mr. Chevrier: Will Your Honour hear me on this point later?

The Chairman: On the point I have just discussed?

Mr. Chevrier: On the point I raised earlier.

The Chairman: I have already indicated to the hon. member for Laurier that if he wishes to deal with his point of order I will listen to him after I have disposed of the point of order raised by the Chair prior to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Laurier.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I am reported by the hon. member as having said that he was devoid of honour, and you repeated the same thing. That is not what I said. I said that he was devoid of a sense of honour. What is it to have a sense of honour. It is to understand something. To have the sense of something, is to understand what it is. By saying that, I did not say that he, himself, was devoid of honour, but that he did not understand its value. In my opinion, this is not against the house rules.

The Chairman: I am prepared to believe that the hon. member for Hull can explain what he said. The hon. member is well aware that it is no more in order to say that an hon. member does not quite know what honour is, than it is to say that he is devoid of honour. I am sure that, on second thought, the hon. member for Hull will agree to withdraw his words.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I did not say that he was devoid of honour. If I say, for instance, that a man lacks a sense of justice, does that mean that he is unjust? No, it means that he does not have a complete understanding of the word justice, that he cannot understand the sense of the word justice.

The Chairman: I ask the hon. member for Hull to please accept the interpretation of the Chair and to withdraw the words he used when he said that the hon. member was devoid of honour or lacked a sense of honour.

Mr. Caron: I did not say that the hon. member had no honour. I merely meant that he did not understand the principles of honour. That is what I meant. I did not mean to say that he had no honour. And I wonder if it is against the rules to say that an hon. member knows nothing about the principle of honour.

The Chairman: I am simply expressing my opinion to the hon. member in this matter. I am telling him that he cannot say directly or indirectly, or question directly or indirectly, anyone's attitude in this house and I am simply asking him to withdraw the words he used when he said that the hon. member was devoid of honour.

Mr. Caron: I withdraw the word "honour" but not the words "has no sense".

(Text):

Mr. Chevrier: If Your Honour will hear me on the point of order which I raised earlier I say that the interruption made by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm was by inference equally an attack upon the honour of the hon. member for Hull. The fact that he was asked these questions left the inference immediately that influence had been used by the hon. member for Hull in connection with the appointment of a relative of his, and it seems to me that the ruling the Chair has made, if it applies to the hon. member for Hull, applies equally to the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm who, by inference committed the same infraction of the rules, if I understand them aright.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order. In order to establish precisely what the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) has just said, I denied a moment ago having intervened directly or indirectly. And to show that there was a direct implication, the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) made the gesture of someone picking up a telephone receiver and listening in, to indicate that I had intervened by telephone. He was implying in another way that I had intervened, and in so doing he was still trying to insinuate that I had intervened. The hon. member implied that I had unduly and unjustly intervened on behalf of a relative of mine.

Mr. Pigeon: May I explain myself, Mr. Chairman? The hon. member for Hull quite reluctantly withdrew what he had said. I simply said in the course of this debate that Mr. Lupien, a nephew of the hon. member for Hull was working for the C.M.H.C. in Montreal, and that a son of the Leader of the Opposition is an employee of the Department of External Affairs. I do not know if it hurt the hon. member for Hull and his friends, but that is all I said without any comment.

An hon. Member: With innuendos—

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the Chair that it would be better to go on with the estimates of the secretary of state, instead of listening to those interventions from the hon. members who are saying things that they should not be saying or that are altogether meaningless.

The Chairman: No doubt the debate would be more orderly if the rules of this house were respected. In any case, and only to clarify the situation, because I feel that the point of order is not quite well taken, I would simply ask the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm to say that he accepts the statement of the hon. member for Hull to the effect that he did not intervene directly or indirectly on behalf of his nephew concerning the appointment mentioned.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Does the hon. member for St. Mary wish to speak on the point of order?

Mr. Valade: On the same point of order, Mr. Chairman—

(Text):

Mr. Chairman, will you hear me on the point of order. I noted the chairman asked the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm to accept the apology of the hon. member for Hull, but before doing so I did not hear the hon. member for Hull say that he was taking back his words. If I may be permitted I would refer you to Beauchesne's fourth edition, page 123, article 141, which states:

> It is impossible to lay down any specific rules, in regard to injurious reflections uttered in debate against particular members, or to declare beforehand, what expressions are or are not contrary to order;—

Et cetera. I would ask that the members of the opposition kindly allow me to make my point clear; I can see they do not want to hear.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Valade: I ask you call them to order. May I now refer to page 123 again, citation 141, which continues:

> When the Speaker observes upon any expression as personal and disorderly, and tending to introduce heat and confusion, and this appears to be the general sense of the house, the member offending ought immediately to make an apology,—

May I refer you back to page 117, citation 134, which says:

> In case a member persists in using unparliamentary language, the Speaker will be compelled to name him—

Mr. Chairman, you can read the rest of the article from Beauchesne, but I do not think the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm has been satisfied in this respect.

The Chairman: I must inform the hon. member for St. Mary that the point of order has been settled, the hon. member for Hull having withdrawn and the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm having accepted the withdrawal.

I said that in my view it was not absolutely necessary for the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm to state that he does not pretend to deny the declaration by the hon. member for Hull that he did not intervene directly or indirectly in favour of the appointment of the person he mentioned.

Mr. Taylor: Let us get down to business.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the various questions that have been asked about the civil service commission—

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, since the point of order has not been dealt with, I think that the Acting Secretary of State should resume his seat. Anyway, I have not completed my remarks.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, I was rising precisely to answer the questions that were put to me.

Mr. Caron: I have not completed my remarks.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I never said in this house that the hon. member for Hull had intervened directly or indirectly; I simply stated that his nephew, Mr. Lupien, had a first class job with the C.M.H.C. Therefore I have nothing to withdraw; I never said that.

Mr. Habel: Base innuendos.

(Text):

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I still rise on the point which I brought to your attention earlier—

(Translation):

An hon. Member: In French.

(Text):

Mr. Chevrier: —and I do not think the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm has met the requirements of the rules.

The Chairman: I indicated that the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm had not denied the declaration of the hon. member for Hull. He affirmed that he did not intimate that the hon. member for Hull had intervened directly or indirectly. I think under the circumstances the statement made by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm should be accepted. I recognize the hon. member for Hull.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, may I go on with my remarks in connection with the civil service commission?

Though I complained of the way in which the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Valade) reported some situations which arose under the former Liberal administration—as if errors were not committed under any administration—I just wanted to point out that while there had been no sign of party politics since the discussion started, I found his attitude in very bad taste; and I hope this expression is in order.

On the other hand, the hon. member made some remarks which were devoid of party politics, and which I approve. I believe he is right. He was justified in complaining of the fact that some professional civil servants are not adequately paid and that it is the reason why the civil service commission which has such great need of professional experts to carry out certain tasks, is unable to find them.

Every week, we read notices asking for accountants, and the salary offered by the civil service commission is of $3,000, $3,500 or $4,000 a year, whereas those working in an accountant's office get $6,000, $7,000 and even $8,000 a year, even when they are only employees. How can the civil service commission possibly obtain the services of competent people if it fails to pay them salaries comparable to those paid in private business?

It is the same for nurses. Lately, there was a demand for a nurse to manage a hospital. She was to be sent to northern Canada, and the salary offered was the fabulous sum of $3,600 a year, to leave everything and go north. It is absurd; it is simply ridiculous.

If you want good employees, you have to pay them properly, give them salaries that are paid in private industry. I know that salaries in private industry have substantially gone up in recent years; I know also that it may be somewhat difficult to keep pace with salary trends everywhere, and I would not like to criticize the commission too harshly.

I remember having dealt, on another occasion, with the various job opportunities advertised by the civil service, when I showed that it had been difficult to find the required personnel for hundreds of positions, precisely because the salary offered was not reasonable.

As I said a moment ago, the same goes for accountants and nurses and, as the hon. member for St. Mary pointed out, the same goes for druggists and chemists. It is true that chemists are classified in various categories. At the very beginning, a chemist only gets about $3,000 a year, and it is only after constant labour and years of work that he can get a reasonable salary. Besides, if he is competent, he goes to work for a company like the C.I.L. and right away he is offered a high salary.

Canada is now losing several of its doctors precisely because they do not get adequate salaries. In fact, American professionals have called at our universities, and even before our medical students had received their degree, they were offered a remuneration so much higher than that which they could have got in Canada, that those young people went to the United States to complete their studies and, afterwards, they settled there.

We have also seen a California lecturer come to Toronto and Montreal to give lectures to our doctors. This lecturer was a Canadian who had emigrated to the United States because he could not get the necessary facilities to work, and the salary which would have allowed him to complete his education. He is now a United States citizen, and he comes back to Canada to lecture our Canadians.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that in this field the civil service commission would do well to make a serious and thorough study of the situation in order to meet the needs of the civil service and to give satisfaction also to those who, because of their education, deserve to get a salary at least equal to that they would receive in industry.

Mr. Chairman, I would also like to deal with the matter of appeals to the civil service commission. It is a situation which should be seriously examined, because many of the appeals are rejected. Why? It is because the civil service commission is not giving serious enough consideration to those who make an appeal? I do not know, but in the few cases I have studied, I have noticed that the civil servant, who was a very good employee, fully qualified for the work he had to do, did not get the appointment to the higher position he had applied for. The promotion has been refused to him in favour of another civil servant. He filed an appeal. He appeared before the commission and his appeal was fruitless. Why? Because he was naturally shy and did not have the necessary knowledge to plead his case. This is why I believe that in cases of appeal—I am now talking for the benefit of lawyers—the applicant should have the right to be represented by a lawyer, who would know how to make the necessary representations to the commission and would know how to examine the witnesses.

Otherwise, the man who is not used to speaking up, who did not make special studies in that field is stuck; he is embarrassed because he is not used to expressing his views publicly. He is terrorized by the presence of the members of the civil service commission, and, for those reasons, he often loses his appeal simply because he does not know how to go about it.

Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the civil service commission take steps so that those who make an appeal have the right, if they so choose, not to be represented by another employee of the public service, nor by a member of his association, but by a lawyer of his choice.

Another field where there is some injustice, perhaps unintentional, is in what we call the rating system. The rating is a survey made by the department concerned, on the value of the employee. They say, for instance, that the employee is worth so much per cent in this and so much per cent in that and at the end, it should give a total of so much.

But in the army, they instituted the rating system. The rating was shown to the person concerned who considered the matter, and if dissatisfied, asked to be paraded in order to discuss the situation.

Things are different in the civil service commission. The head of a department—

Mr. Drysdale: More slowly, please.

Mr. Caron: I am sorry I was going too fast. In the civil service, the person concerned is treated the same as in the army. I do know, however, that an employee's rating is arrived at on the basis of a numerical system and that outside the Department of National Defence, which has been following a system similar to the army system, an employee is not given an opportunity to see his rating. Now, in the event of a promotion, the rating has more weight than the person's real value. In my view, the employee should be told about his rating, so as to be able to study it and appeal to the civil service commission if he disagrees; if satisfied, on the other hand, he could just initial the rating. In that way, no unfairness could arise.

I have referred to that system in the past. I discussed it when the Liberals were in power, and I raise it again today because in my view, it is a means of avoiding cases of gross unfairness. Indeed, it may happen that a head of a division, who for some reason dislikes a particular employee, will rate him accordingly. As the employee never sees that rating, and comes under the civil service commission only when a promotion arises, his chances are jeopardized in advance because of the fact that in a fit of temper against an employee, the section head does not grant him the rating he is entitled to.

Those are matters that deserve consideration as well as the question raised earlier by the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean (Mr. Bourque).

Mistakes might happen, the civil service commission may do someone an injustice; but the greatest danger of injustice is not in the civil service commission itself, but mostly in the departments where people work side by side all day long and where there are clashes of temperaments. Those people do not always get along together and this is what gives rise to injustice, because very often reports submitted to the civil service commission on applicants have more weight than the true merit of the applicants and are more important than the results of the exams they passed. I suggest that this situation should be corrected in the interests of the civil service.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, various questions were brought up by the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Valade), for Hull (Mr. Caron) and for Outremont-St. Jean (Mr. Bourque) concerning the civil service commission.

(Text):

First of all, I should like to answer briefly the remarks made by the hon. member for Assiniboia about resignations from the civil service. The hon. member for Assiniboia included in the figures he gave to the committee all types of resignations. They were not confined to only one category; they included all those who retired because of age, illness or in the case of women because they got married. It included also those who were returning to schools and universities and all those who retired for personal reasons and also who accepted employment elsewhere. When all these factors are taken into consideration the percentage of vacancies and resignations is not so large for such a huge number of employees.

It is true that in certain fields vacancies are a little more numerous on a percentage basis than in other fields, but I should like to tell the committee that if the civil service commission, for instance, is experiencing certain difficulties with such classes as veterinarians, nurses, meteorologists and accountants, I think it is a good thing for the committee to know that in all these classes industry is facing the same difficulty and is experiencing the same shortages; but I can assure the committee that the civil service commission is doing its very best to remedy this situation and is paying special attention to these fields.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Valade) has dealt with the case of pharmacists and some other professionals. The hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) referred to it, too.

According to them, the salaries of those professionals as compared to those paid in private industry were not attractive.

I want to remind the house that on June 1, various professional groups received salary increases from the civil service commission and among those were the groups of engineers, chemists, scientific officers, statisticians, teachers in our miltary colleges, medical officers, legal officers, and some other groups of public relation officers as well as other groups of university graduates.

Unfortunately, the salaries of both classes of pharmacists and accountants have not been increased yet, but the officials of my department tell me their cases are to be revised soon.

As for the case about which the hon. member for St. Mary complained, and about which the hon. member for Hull insisted I make a thorough investigation in order to know all the facts, I want to assure the house that I will study this matter which has been raised by the hon. member for St. Mary, and if I come to the conclusion there are grounds for an investigation, I will not hesitate to order that it be made.

The hon. member for Hull raised the question of rating. May I say to him that there is at present an interdepartmental committee which is studying the possibility of establishing a system which would apply to all departments. This interdepartmental committee is expected to report to the commission in the very near future.

As for the matter of appeals, which was raised by the hon. member for Hull, I must remind him that the new civil service bill includes several amendments on the matter, and that new bill provides a well defined procedure about that.

I am told, at this time, that a civil servant who lodges an appeal, may be represented by a lawyer.

Mr. Caron: I regret, Mr. Minister—

Mr. Balcer: That is the information I got from some officials of my department.

Mr. Caron: Some will try to be represented by lawyers who know very little about such defence. They were told they were entitled to be represented by a member of the association only. I think that the act now provides for that. They are entitled to be represented by a member of the association, but not by a lawyer.

Mr. Balcer: I am very happy to announce to the hon. member for Hull that, very recently, it has been decided that a civil servant who lodges an appeal is entitled to be represented by a lawyer.

Mr. Caron: Then I must congratulate the minister on behalf of the employees and of the lawyers.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, some objection was raised a moment ago to the fact that I raised the point of order which I did in the English language, and if I did so it was for an obvious reason. I want to continue not on the point of order but with respect to the matter raised by the hon. member for St. Mary, equally in the English language for equally obvious reasons. The charge which was made by the hon. member is a serious one and I do not think it can be allowed to remain in the manner in which the minister has left it. It is a charge against the civil service of Canada as a whole and more particularly against the chairmen of the civil service commission who have occupied that post over the years. The charge made was that an applicant for a position in the civil service of Canada was given the questions and answers with respect to an examination which took place. The point is so serious that I think the minister should take the first opportunity not only to make an investigation but to state here and now that he does not believe that those persons who form the civil service commission of Canada are responsible for such an act.

I refer first of all to the present chairman, who was not accused, and to the preceding chairman, the Hon. Mr. Heeney, now ambassador at Washington, who was appointed by the former Liberal administration and whose term of office was extended by the present government. If the charge is a valid one then it reflects indirectly upon his tenure of office. Again, his predecessor in office was Mr. C. H. Bland, who for many years was chairman of the civil service commission. He was appointed by a Conservative administration and his term of office was extended by a Liberal administration. Before his retirement he was asked to make a report on the whole purview of the civil service commission.

What I deprecate in this attack is not so much the fact that it is directed at a previous administration but rather the fact that it is an attack upon the civil service commission of Canada. I have been a member of the house for many years. I came here in 1935 and I have heard silly rumours such as that to which the hon. member for St. Mary gave vent this evening, but I have never yet seen the proof established of any such thing as was stated this evening. I say to you, sir, with respect, and equally with respect to the Acting Secretary of State, that it is not enough for him to say what he did say. In all fairness to the men and women who are under him he must say that they are not in any way responsible so far as this kind of ignoble attack is concerned. I hope the minister will conduct an investigation at the first opportunity and let the house know what the facts of the case are.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Laurier has said that in his 25 years in the house he has heard all kinds of rumours of this type and that when they were looked at closely most of the time they did not stand up or make sense. That is precisely the reason why the commissioners cannot order a full inquiry with respect to every little rumour that comes along. I think it is the duty of the minister to study and investigate every charge that is made and, if the charge is serious, to go very deeply into the matter and make sure that every accusation is answered. In my view I think I am just following a very proper course.

As far as the present and past chairmen of the commission and the other commissioners are concerned, I quite agree with the hon. member for Laurier that they have given excellent service to the state and have always done their duty as far as the people of Canada and the government are concerned.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, I would like to answer the few remarks which were made in a less than accurate manner by the hon. members for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) and for Hull (Mr. Caron).

I never charged the civil service commission or its officials with playing such a game. I pointed out that the promotion system, or the rating test, to which candidates were submitted is defective, and that consequently some people were awarded undeserved promotions. That is what I wished to clear up. I also want to reply to what the hon. member for Hull said to the effect that he thought the civil service was not quite honourable.

I think the civil service is very honourable. I know, a great number of federal civil servants in my riding who are honestly doing their work. I have never had any quarrel with them in respect of what I know. And I am today giving credit to the civil service and to its employees for the magnificent co-operation they give to public servants, to the government and to anybody by whom they are approached.

I just wanted to say again that there was a defective system which had to be corrected, and under which some employees had been given certain promotions.

I want to recall the name of the person who authorized me to name him, and to give his address and his telephone number, telling me that he would be available if needed.

I did not start a ridiculous rumour, as the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) said. I just established a certain fact, and I fail to understand the turmoil which took place in the ranks of the Liberal party following my stating the facts in this house.

I just wanted to take this opportunity to say how the Conservative party has given consideration to civil servants, who had been neglected and forgotten by the Liberal party. Under the Conservative party, Mr. Chairman, civil servants received a generous salary adjustment which had been refused by the former administration. And I took that opportunity to point out that I felt the rating system is faulty and should be corrected in the interest of the government.

Mr. Caron: I much prefer the last statement made by the hon. member for St. Mary to the first one, because the last statement may be a matter of taste, to use the words of the member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin), while in the first statement, he mentioned a name, that of Mr. Sibley Henry and—

Mr. Valade: Read the Hansard and you'll see what I said.

Mr. Caron: He said that this person had been supplied in advance with the answers to the questions that were to be asked.

Mr. Valade: That was under the former administration.

Mr. Caron: That is not exactly what he said. However, if it is true, that one Sibley Henry was supplied with competition questions, that is a very serious matter which deserves to be enquired into, because a direct charge has been laid. But, if he merely said that the rating form can involve injustices, I fully agree with him, and there is no use discussing the matter any further.

(Text):

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, in view of the charges made recently that so far as foreign service officers are concerned people of French Canadian origin are not getting a fair share of the posts, could the minister explain how much control the civil service commission has over examinations for the post of foreign service officer? Does the civil service commission set the complete examination or is there a special examination set by the Department of External Affairs?

Mr. Balcer: The examination is set by the civil service commission.

Mr. Fisher: In other words, the civil service commission is completely in charge of the examination set-up for foreign service officers in the Department of External Affairs?

Mr. Balcer: That is right.

Mr. Fisher: So if there were any criticism of the selection, as it works out, then some responsibility must rest with the civil service commission rather than upon the Department of External Affairs? Would that be a fair assumption? Would the minister not care to answer that?

Mr. Balcer: This is precisely what I said earlier. It is the civil service commission that makes the appointments.

Mr. Argue: I believe I was out of the chamber when the minister made his general statement in reply. I wonder if the minister would care to comment on the large number of resignations, the large number of vacancies in the various departments to which I referred? What is being done to fill them?

Mr. Balcer: I explained briefly that the figures that were given by the hon. member were not the actual figures for vacancies. They include all the people who have resigned from the civil service because of retirement, because of age, because of illness, because of marriage in the case of women, to fill alternative positions such as returning to universities and schools, as well as for personal reasons of some other nature. When you take into consideration these various groups you will see that the actual resignations are not so numerous for such a huge service.

In so far as these vacancies are concerned, the commission has experienced shortages in certain fields, such as veterinarians, nurses, meteorologists and accountants. Industry is also experiencing shortages in these classes. I can assure the hon. member that our civil service commission is doing its best to recruit these people.

Mr. Argue: My main point was not the number of resignations. The point was that in relation to resignations there were so many vacancies. I have in my hand a particular return for the Department of Agriculture. For example in two instances the position of engineer has been vacant one year and one month; two veterinarians have been required for this length of time; two librarians, an inspector of poultry products, a poultry fieldman. The position of economist has been vacant one year and five months, and so on. It would seem to me that there has been something of a collapse in the civil service of this country in these important positions. The fact is that the government is not offering enough money, in my opinion. Some of these positions have been vacant for years.

I am not criticizing the civil service commission for failing to have them filled. I think the personnel are not available at the salaries that are being offered. My complaint, as I said initially, was not the number of resignations. I expect there will be a large turnover, inevitably, in any service because of promotions, transfers, new recruits and so on. As I said earlier, I do not have the full information because it was not supplied for every department. I would ask the minister to look into this question. I feel that it is a very great problem for the civil service of this country, and it is a shame that these positions should be vacant for years. I would suggest that one of the reasons the government is unable to fill them is that the salary which is offered for people with these kinds of qualifications is too low.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, I am told by the officials that there is an actual shortage of veterinarians, for instance, and they are just not available. In so far as many of the other positions are concerned that the hon. member has listed, very often the department concerned does not request the civil service commission to fill these vacancies. The department just wants to keep these positions open.

Mr. Argue: Why would the department want to keep them open?

Mr. Balcer: That is the problem of the various departments; so far as the civil service commission is concerned, they only recruit people to fill vacancies when the department requests that these vacancies be filled.

Mr. Argue: I did not expect to hear from the minister that these were fictitious vacancies. I think it is a rather disgraceful position if the Department of Agriculture is going about the country saying we have many vacancies; we need a number of qualified people for many posts, but we do not want these posts filled. It looks ridiculous.

Mr. Balcer: Many of these vacancies remain unfilled because applicants do not come.

Mr. Argue: Very well; in other words, in relation to the salary there is a severe shortage of these people and the government is unsuccessful in having these positions filled.

Mr. Balcer: At the present time the government is granting all kinds of salary increases. A few minutes ago I listed a group of professional men who received increases on June 1, quite substantial increases. I feel these increases compare quite favourably with the salaries paid in industry for similar work.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Brunsden: There are some vacancies in the Department of Agriculture, and the hon. member for Assiniboia is a trained agriculturist. I sincerely recommend to the minister that he consider an application from the hon. member for Assiniboia in order that he may use his great talents in a field outside this house.

Mr. Argue: I suggest to the hon. member that my application is in for much higher stakes than that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: I suggest that the record of inefficiency and ineptitude of this government will result in innumerable vacancies on the other side. My hon. friend's advice, I would suggest, would be more appropriate to the droves of his colleagues around him who, in a very short time, will likely all be looking for work.

Mr. Fisher: I was going to ask the minister a question related to one of his own divisions. Has the civil service commission any request from the companies division of his department for additional staff, especially in relation to the carrying out of what will be great changes in the functions of that division if the present dealings with the provinces in an effort to smooth out the whole Companies Act operation in Canada should be successful.

Mr. Balcer: I cannot answer that question offhand; I shall be obliged to inquire. Perhaps I could let the hon. member know personally outside the house with regard to this matter because I do not think I can get an answer tonight.

Mr. Fisher: That will be satisfactory. Will the minister also let me know at what time it is expected that some kind of crystallization will take place on this program to consolidate the various provincial and federal companies acts across the country and when he expects that this program will have some kind of policy application?

Mr. Balcer: I could not tell exactly how many months it may take. This process is a long one, as the hon. member knows. At the present time this committee, which consists of representatives of the federal companies section and a representative of each of the companies law section of the various provinces, is preparing a joint draft to be submitted to the government of each province and of Canada. If I remember rightly, this draft at the present time has not been given to the government and the government has not considered such a draft at the present time. I do not know about the various provinces but I do not think the matter has reached the government level. I believe it is still on the official level, or on the level of this committee of which I was speaking. However, I can assure the hon. member that when we have uniformity of companies law across the country, if there is a need to increase the number of officers in the companies law section of the department, we shall do so.

Mr. Crestohl: Can the minister inform the committee whether there is at the present time an active chief or an acting chief of the companies branch?

Mr. Balcer: We have only an acting chief at the present time.

Mr. Crestohl: How long has the position of chief of the department been vacant?

Mr. Balcer: I am not too sure but I think it is over five months; between five months and six months.

Mr. Crestohl: Has the minister taken under active consideration the appointment of a chief for that department? I know the department is in need of a chief.

Mr. Balcer: Yes. We want to fill this vacancy. At the present time we are discussing the matter with the civil service commission.

Item agreed to.

Public printing and stationery—

320. Departmental administration, $675,523.

Mr. Fisher: On a previous occasion when these estimates have been before a committee I made a request of the minister to use his influence to see that contracts were spread out more across the country or in other words that there be less concentration in the Montreal-Toronto-Ottawa triangle and on at least two occasions, once by the present Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and once by the minister who was in charge of this section last year, I received the assurance that this was the policy of the government and that they were going to see to it that more contracts and subcontracts went to the western provinces and to some of the eastern provinces. I should like to ask the minister whether he can give some indication as to whether this policy has been effective.

In previous years I put on the order paper a request for information that it took many pages to give. However, from it I can determine this information. Last year in this particular return I could not see that more contracts were going to provinces other than Ontario and Quebec. I wonder whether the minister could give us an indication now as to what increase there has been, perhaps in percentage terms, of contracts going to printers in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia and the maritime provinces?

Mr. Balcer: I am glad the hon. member has asked me this question because the figures that I can give at the present time show quite a definite increase. For instance, in Alberta in 1957-58 the total value of departmental purchases from the Queen's printer was $55,014; in 1958-59 the amount increased to $75,451; and in 1959-60 it has reached $83,018. In British Columbia, for instance, it was $110,000 in 1957-58; in 1958-59 it stayed at about the same level of $108,000; but in 1959-60 it increased from $108,000 to $164,000, which is quite substantial for British Columbia. With regard to Manitoba the amount increased from $80,000 in 1957 to $137,000 in 1959-60.

Mr. Fisher: I should just like the minister to give the pattern. I appreciate knowing the figures. Has there been any percentage increase over-all in these particular years that would indicate that we are just following a general trend? I should like to determine whether this is following a general trend or whether it is a real fruition of a change in government policy.

Mr. Balcer: If one looks at the total record, it will be seen that in 1957 the total sales were $17,400,000. The figure increased in 1958, one year later, to $18,330,000 and in 1959-60 to $18,400,000 which is an increase of only $100,000. I therefore think there is a definite movement of decentralization.

Mr. Fisher: I am pleased to have this indication of a change in policy. Will the minister indicate how much of this $18 million is put up for bid, where you have an open bid or an open tender? I should like the figure, roughly, as to how much is on the basis of a selective invitation to a few people who happen to be on the list of the department?

Mr. Balcer: It is practically all open bids. The only cases in which there are no open bids are in respect of these punch cards or specialized equipment like that which are produced by only one producer and where there is only one firm from which they can be purchased.

Mr. Fisher: How does a job printing firm in a small town in northern Ontario like Geraldton or a town like Brandon or Selkirk in Manitoba know, find out or hear about these tender possibilities in order that they might submit a bid?

Mr. Balcer: They are invited by area. Every time there is a printing contract to be let we always invite a certain number of printing shops to tender. As I understand it, the Queen's printer has a list of practically all printing shops in Canada. Any printing shop can write to the Queen's printer giving its name, qualifications and details of its production possibilities, and the Queen's printer tries to encourage all printing shops in Canada to submit tenders, and the Queen's printer tries to give a chance to the printing shops in one particular area. It would be practically impossible for a printer in Brandon, for instance, to compete with a printer in Ottawa or Montreal or Toronto on account of shipping charges, and things like that. So we arrange to have these bids submitted by area, and that is the reason why in the last three years there has been an increase in contracts granted outside of the central provinces.

Mr. Fisher: Could the minister tell me if there have been any contracts let in the past year in the area I call northwestern Ontario, which is between the Manitoba boundary down to North Bay or Sudbury? Have there been any contracts let in that area; or if that question cannot be answered, have firms in that region been invited to make bids?

Mr. Balcer: In view of the importance of cities like Port Arthur and Fort William I am sure that there are some printing firms there which have been asked to tender on contracts, but unfortunately I have not the breakdown for the region specified by the hon. member.

Mr. Fisher: One last question, and this is more specific. How much does it cost, and who is the printer who does the job on the Canadian army journal?

Mr. Balcer: The successful tenderer was Charters of Brantford, Ontario. Unfortunately I have not the amount.

Mr. Fisher: Can the minister tell me how many firms bid or were invited to bid on this particular job, and did the lowest bidder get the job?

Mr. Balcer: At least a dozen printing shops were asked to tender, and the hon. member can be sure the contract was given to the lowest tenderer.

Mr. Fisher: I thank the minister for the information. It does not match with what I have but I will have to check my information.

Mr. Caron: In those cases do they call for public tenders or do they just call certain firms?

Mr. Balcer: What is being done in practice is that we call for a specified job according to the equipment of the various tenderers. I mean by that that for a definite printing job which requires a certain type of printing press we call for tenders from various printing shops where they have the required press.

Mr. Caron: That is what we call invited tenders. By which means do they establish that they are better equipped than other firms to do the job? Who makes the inquiry about that?

Mr. Balcer: Nobody decides which is better equipped. The various printing shops send to the Queen's printer details of all their equipment, and it is very easy for the Queen's printer to be able to judge from the equipment on the card if a particular printing shop can do a certain type of work or not.

Mr. Caron: Anybody who has good equipment can send a demand for work at the printing bureau and they would be put on the list and asked to tender?

Mr. Balcer: Yes; and I can assure the hon. member that we receive requests like that every day and all of them are considered for tenders.

Mr. Bourque: As I said previously, Mr. Chairman, I have a lot of questions to ask. I am a printer by trade, and therefore when you talk to me about printing, after having spent some 50 years in the trade, I have learned a lot of things in that time.

The evolution which has taken place in the printing industry during the last few years is so tremendous that it would be difficult for anyone to call it an evolution. When tenders are asked for by the printing bureau, if you want to have cheap tenders you could ask ten people and know before you start which one will be the lowest. Because the machinery is such today that certain printers can turn out a job at say, $1.94 a thousand, yet you can ask another big printer equipped with the most modern equipment possible and he can turn out the same job for about 46 cents a thousand, a difference of 75 per cent. So therefore I am sure the printing bureau has a list of all firms in Canada with the equipment they possess, and I am sure they would ask ten printers having similar up-to-date equipment to tender so that they will get the best price. I would like to ask the minister if this is so?

Mr. Balcer: Would the hon. member repeat his question, because I was disturbed and missed part of it?

Mr. Bourque: I will give an illustration of my question. Say the government wanted 500,000 dodgers 9 x 12 printed in two colours and two sides. If they asked a small printer with automatic machines, say Kelly presses, he will give you a price of, say, $2.25 a thousand and that will be a fair price for him. But if you asked a big lithographic printer which had all the modern and latest type presses, his price would be perhaps only 75 per cent of the other price. So I think the printing bureau should have a list of all firms in Canada with the equipment each firm has, and they should ask similar firms with similar equipment to tender, because the difference in cost can be tremendous.

Mr. Balcer: Yes, I understand the question. We divide the various orders up into three categories; small, medium and large. With the small printing shops we ask them to tender on the smaller contracts. The huge, big concerns are invited to tender on the really big contracts. We understand the situation pictured by the hon. member and he can be sure that the Queen's printer is very much in the know as regards this situation. That is why they always divide these contracts into three classes, and when we ask for bids on a small contract we always ask the small printing shops.

Mr. Bourque: As I said earlier I was led to ask these questions after reading an address given to the employing printers' association of Montreal on June 8, 1960 by David MacLellan, general manager of E.P.A. and of the graphic arts industries association, a national body embracing all employing printers' organizations from coast to coast entitled, "Printing—Canada's Biggest Employer in Manufacturing and How the Industry is Taxed, Trammelled and Trimmed".

My first question is this. Are the salaries of the officials—the Queen's printer, his assistant and other officials—paid by the government printing bureau or are they included in the civil service and paid by the government?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, the Queen's printer and his assistant are paid out of the vote in the estimates but all the production people are paid out of revenues from our sales and charged to expenses.

Mr. Bourque: I am sorry, but I did not hear the answer.

Mr. Balcer: As far as the Queen's printer and his assistant are concerned they are paid out of the vote in the present estimates. As far as the production people are concerned they are paid out of general expenses and charged to the cost of jobs.

Mr. Bourque: Are these the only two officials paid from the estimates or are the salaries of other officials added on to the hourly cost, because the hourly cost has a great bearing on printing costs and estimates. If only the two are paid from the estimate it does not amount to much but there may be other officials who are not on the payroll of the printing bureau.

Mr. Balcer: I do not quite appreciate what the hon. member is after. Does he want to know, for instance, if there are people other than the officials whose salaries are charged to the ordinary expenses of this department?

Mr. Bourque: Right. I want to know what officials, employees and staff are paid out of the estimates. Is it only the Queen's printer and his assistant or are the proofreaders, the chief accountant, the accountants and other officials included? What other officials are there that should be on the payroll included in the estimates or paid directly through the printing bureau and do they count on the hourly cost?

Mr. Drysdale: Consult page 426 of the estimates.

Mr. Bourque: It is all on the first item.

Mr. Balcer: It would be difficult for me to tell exactly because some do and some do not. It depends on the work being done.

Mr. Bourque: You have your officials there, Mr. Minister. Why can they not tell you? They should be able to tell you. It has a great bearing on what I have to say.

Mr. Balcer: If the hon. member will refer to page 426 of the estimates he will see that the Queen's printer and his assistant—

Mr. Bourque: Do all of these officials come under the vote?

Mr. Balcer: I apologize for giving the hon. gentleman incorrect information. At page 426 are listed all the people who are paid out of the vote. All the other employees of the Queen's printer, and there are over 1,500 of them, are paid out of the ordinary expenses.

Mr. Bourque: That is the operating staff, the typesetters, the pressmen, all the people working in the offices of the department? Their salary is charged against the hourly cost of the printing bureau?

Mr. Balcer: Yes, and also the production men, the planning manager, the planning clerk, the storekeepers, the shipping employees and various others.

Mr. Bourque: Did the minister say creative men? Did he say he has a creative staff in the printing bureau and that they create all kinds of ideas?

Mr. Balcer: I did not mention that. I referred to the shipping employees. Perhaps the hon. member misunderstood me.

Mr. Bourque: Who purchases the necessary equipment such as presses, flat-bed and offset presses, linotype and monotype machines, gathering machines, varitypers, Xerox, I.B.M. equipment, collating and cutting machines, bookbinding equipment, etc.? Who pays for this equipment? Is it paid for and charged directly as an overhead expense in the printing bureau or is the cost of these machines calculated as overhead and included in the hourly cost of operations?

Mr. Creaghan: See page 437.

Mr. Balcer: All these expenses are included in vote No. 326 covering plant equipment and replacements.

Mr. Bourque: Do you charge depreciation on this equipment?

Mr. Balcer: No.

Mr. Bourque: An ordinary printer could not very well operate unless he charged depreciation.

Mr. Balcer: This is not an ordinary printing shop.

Mr. Creaghan: This is the Queen's printer.

Mr. Bourque: Years ago we used to buy a press and try to make it last for 20 years but now competition is so keen that a press should be operated 24 hours a day and worked until it is absolutely through. That is the only way you can operate a printing plant today.

Who pays for the lighting, heating, maintenance, etc.? Is it charged to the printing bureau and has it got any bearing on the cost of operations? In other words, does it form part of the actual hourly cost?

Mr. MacInnis: If you know, why ask all these questions?

Mr. Bourque: I have to ask them. The hon. member obviously knows nothing about business.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): If you know so much why not help them at the printing bureau?

Mr. Bourque: I am not interested in working there.

Mr. Balcer: Anyone who is a little familiar with government operations in the cities of Ottawa and Hull is aware of the fact that this building was constructed by the Department of Public Works and is heated by that department.

Mr. Bourque: No rental is charged that goes on the hourly cost?

Mr. Balcer: None. The Department of Public Works looks after this building as it looks after the House of Commons. The House of Commons is not charged rental.

Mr. Bourque: That is what I wanted to know and that is what the printers of Canada wanted to know. What department is the rental value of the printing bureau charged to? Is it charged to a specific department or is it just an overhead charge that adds nothing to the hourly cost of operation? Does the cost of the building enter into the hourly cost of operation? Is any rental included in that cost?

Mr. Balcer: The printing bureau, like other similar establishments of the government of Canada, operates under the same rules applying to them.

Mr. Hellyer: It is unique. There is nothing like it.

Mr. Bourque: There is a difference. I should like the minister to tell me if the delivery of printing to the various government departments, the cost of automobiles and trucks and other equipment, is included as overhead? Who pays for that?

Mr. Balcer: The charges for operating expenses of the trucks are charged to the operating expenses of the Queen's printer.

Mr. Bourque: Does this go on the estimate or does it go on the hourly cost?

Mr. Balcer: On the hourly cost.

Mr. Bourque: Does the printing bureau pay a municipal tax for its building or is the tax included with the stipulated amount the government pays to municipalities? If so, is there any charge made for this item to the printing bureau?

Mr. Balcer: No. The hon. member is seeking to make out a case to illustrate that the Queen's printer has not the same charges as an ordinary printing shop. We all agree with him; we have not the same charges. It is a completely different establishment. It is a government establishment created to print government publications and it is doing a very good job at the present time.

Mr. Bourque: I did not ask that; I did not say it was not doing a good job. I just want information. After all, the printing bureau does not pay for lighting; it does not pay for heating; it does not pay for the building. It has no overhead costs, or anything. Is it charged any income tax?

Mr. Balcer: No, it does not pay any income tax.

Mr. Bourque: If it succeeds in making a profit in competition with private industry, why should it not pay income tax, the same as any private printer who has to pay for all the services that the printing bureau is granted by the different departments such as public works, national revenue division, and so forth?

Mr. Balcer: The hon. member has been asking so many questions of me about this matter that I wonder whether he would answer one for me?

Mr. Bourque: Yes.

Mr. Balcer: Does he think the printing bureau should pay income tax?

Mr. Bourque: I think it should if it is going to be in competition with private industry and the printers who are competing with it right along. They have to pay rent, light, heat, and so on. That is exactly the question I wanted the minister to ask me. The private printers who are in competition with the printing bureau have to pay for rent, light, heat, maintenance, delivery, promotion, advertising, taxes of all sorts, wages, salaries, legal expenses and so forth. I can assure the minister that the printers are very much worried at the present time because of the work that the printing bureau is doing in Canada today. The printing bureau has no sales staff going to the different departments to find out what work needs to be done, or is the work brought to the printing bureau? The printing bureau has no public relations officials, no creative division of artists and top executives who create all kinds of mailing pieces, packagings, labels, promotional work, and so forth, for the different departments? Therefore, the overhead is reduced practically to wages only.

Mr. Balcer: And materials.

Mr. Bourque: And materials, of course; you have to buy the materials. How is the hourly cost arrived at in the printing bureau? If you wish to estimate a job and you want to get out 500,000 booklets for tourists and the job is worth say $25,000 or $35,000 and you ask for bids outside, what do you do? I believe you have an estimating department in the printing bureau which says that the job should be worth so much. If you do not pay any overhead, and you do not pay any income tax, and you do not pay lawyers' fees and you get a free building, free light, a president, a vice president, a superintendent, a foreman and everybody, and nothing is charged on the job, how can you come to a price that is competitive with that of a printer who has to pay all those charges?

Mr. Balcer: The Queen's printer does not have to pay income tax; he does not have to pay selling expenses; he does not have any depreciation and he does not make a profit. The formula that they use in assessing the price of a certain job is that they subtract 36 per cent for the cost of the printing job.

Mr. Bourque: I did not get that.

Mr. Balcer: They subtract 36 per cent from the cost of the printing job. Their regulation is that this 36 per cent is to represent the fact that there is no charge for profit, for income tax, for selling expenses or for depreciation.

Mr. Bourque: They do not know whether it is right or wrong.

Mr. Balcer: They do.

Mr. Bourque: They start and finish—

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, I cannot let that go. They have made accounting studies and they have come up with a figure of 36 per cent. It did not come out of thin air. They take the usual expenses of an ordinary printing shop and with those figures they have come up with the exact percentage of 36 per cent, and that is how they come to their costs.

Mr. Bourque: Mr. Chairman, take the case of the working man an ordinary compositor in a plant who may be paid $1.98 an hour. He has two weeks' holidays, some have three. There are so many legal holidays a year and there is so much sick leave and everything. By the time you figure all the costs of that man—I am not saying the unproductive time but the productive time—that rate of $1.98 an hour may rise to $2.48 before you even begin to add profit or anything. How can you come up with a figure of 36 per cent if you do not know just where you are starting from? In bookkeeping you must start with a figure; you do not guess and say we take 36 per cent off.

Mr. Balcer: I know the hon. member is trying to make a point and I am ready to agree with him that it is less expensive for the Queen's printer to operate than it is for an ordinary printer, but as far as the costs that we charge are concerned, they are the same as those of any other printer. I referred to the cost system.

Mr. Bourque: I can tell the minister that if he were in private enterprise and running a private firm he could take a job today for approximately $10,000 and it might cost him $18,000 to turn it out. The next day he might take a job for $15,000 and it may cost him only $12,000 to turn it out. At the end of the year he might arrive at a figure something like the 36 per cent that the minister has mentioned, but I do not understand how the printing bureau can arrive at a figure of 36 per cent unless they start with something. You must have a firm figure. You cannot afford to guess at something; you have to know where you are going to land.

Mr. More: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Bourque: Wait a minute, I am not finished. Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. More: No, I have a question.

Mr. Bourque: I am not finished. I should like to ask a question about apprentices. Does the printing bureau train apprentices, or does it absorb apprentices trained by free enterprise as fast as they become journeymen? It costs a printing firm thousands of dollars to train apprentices. According to the rules, a printing firm can have only three apprentices. Out of every three apprentices who start in the printing business only one finishes. Does the printing bureau train its own apprentices, or does it take apprentices that private printers have trained? Does it recruit apprentices from those people who have trained them, and bring them into the printing bureau?

Mr. Balcer: We recruit from technical schools.

Mr. More: Did the government of Canada operate the printing bureau during the years 1935 to 1957? I should also like to ask the minister if there has been any change in the method of valuation since 1957.

Mr. Balcer: No, it is exactly the same as when the government of the party to which the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean belongs was in power.

Mr. Hellyer: You mean you have not been able to find any method of improving it since?

Mr. Balcer: We have changed the minister.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): We did not lose as much money.

(Translation):

Mr. English: Mr. Chairman, I realize that the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean (Mr. Bourque) is very interested in the matter, and I simply wanted to ask him, as a recently elected member, who has only been here since 1957, and who needs to gain some experience, whether he would explain the difference between the former Liberal policy in this field and that of the party now in power.

Mr. Bourque: I can tell the hon. member that I have been here longer than he has. I have been sitting through four different parliaments, so that I have a little more experience than he has.

(Text):

I should like to ask another question. I have not received a reply so far as printers are concerned. No doubt the minister knows, as I said, that master printers spend thousands of dollars and the government should not take advantage of the printing industry by taking from them the apprentices that they train. Does the minister not think it is a grave injustice to the printing industry to take these apprentices from them?

Mr. Balcer: I certainly do not think so; I do not think it is an injustice at all. I think the Queen's printer is an establishment that is rendering a tremendous service to the people of Canada. It is producing for the government of Canada and its agencies and if it can operate at a low cost I think that is a splendid thing. If we can save money for the taxpayers of Canada that is a very good thing.

Mr. Bourque: The government should not take advantage of the printers by raiding their establishments to get staff. It should form its own staff.

Mr. Balcer: I do not agree.

Mr. Bourque: Does the minister know that the graphic arts are first among Canadian manufacturing industries in employment and fourth in dollar value of production? From the standpoint of income taxes, the graphic arts industry pays the highest wages of any non-seasonal manufacturing industry and the amount of income tax paid by the employees is considerable. Does the minister not think that the government should not cripple the goose that lays the golden egg by competing with private industry unless it be on the same level? Does the minister not think that the minister should take into consideration all the items that enter into the cost of a finished job in the printing industry before presenting competitive cost figures from the government printing bureau that show only one half of the real cost?

Mr. Balcer: The hon. member has been asking me the same questions over and over and over again.

Mr. Bourque: No, I have asked different questions.

Mr. Balcer: He has repeated himself about five times and his last question is the same.

Mr. Bourque: I have not.

Mr. Balcer: I do not agree with him and I still maintain that this establishment is not creating trouble for the printing industry in Canada but rather is rendering a great service to and doing a very good job for the Canadian people and is saving money.

Mr. Bourque: I would say to the minister—

The Chairman: The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond.

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Chairman, I think the minister might like a little variety in the questioning. Under this item I should like to make a plea primarily for the benefit of the judges and lawyers of Canada and it has to do with the printing of the annual statutes of Canada. Last year, for example, the session ended on July 18 and yet I was not able to obtain the statutes of Canada until the beginning of January. Out of curiosity I went to the library of the Supreme Court of Canada. When they receive the statutes they stamp them and I found that an interval of six to eight months was the average over several years.

I believe that one of the most important things parliament does is to enact legislation and in my view it is important that we place the statutes, comprising new legislation and amendments to existing acts, in the hands of the judges and lawyers of Canada as soon as possible. I believe it is extremely important that they receive them with the greatest expedition. I am not being critical of the minister or the Queen's printer because I realize they have a variety of matters to attend to but I do not think it is right that the judges and lawyers of Canada should be in the position of not knowing what the up-to-date law is. I urge the minister to expedite, if possible, the printing of this very important publication and I suggest that perhaps it could be done in a period of two months.

Mr. Balcer: The hon. member has asked a very refreshing question and has made a very sound suggestion. I think it is most important that the statutes of Canada should be printed as quickly as possible because they play an important part in Canadian life. I can assure the hon. member that we will take his remarks and suggestion under very serious consideration and will do our utmost to complete the printing of these statutes earlier this year.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, I must confess I have been quite amazed and rather confused by the running battle we have seen tonight between the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean and the minister. My confusion arises from the fact that I cannot make out whether this is the new liberalism of the Conservative party or the new conservatism of the Liberal party. However, one thing strikes me as very strange. It has been repeated many times by the hon. member that the Queen's printer competes with private printing companies. I do not know of one instance where the Queen's printer has gone out and competed with any printing company in Canada. I think his whole argument is based on a myth.

Mr. Bourque: May I ask the minister another question? Does he know that our small population supports the greatest volume of imported printing of any country in the world? Sixty per cent of United States printing exports are absorbed by Canada and only 5 per cent of our printing exports are absorbed by the United States. We absorb 60 per cent of printing exports manufactured by 170 million people and they only absorb 5 per cent of printed material manufactured by 17 million people. If it were 5 per cent to 60 per cent the situation would not be so bad, but it is like an elephant and a rabbit or comparing 60,000 elephants we take from them with 5,000 rabbits they take from us. In addition, I understand that the Japanese are now coming into the market.

I am sorry if I have annoyed the minister but these are all things that the printing fraternity are very anxious to know. As we have a new Queen's printer I thought it would be well to make him aware of the things he will have to put up with and that is why I have asked so many questions tonight. I can assure him I wish him well and I hope he will make a success of his new job. I hope he will also take the things I have said tonight into consideration and try to bring about a fair distribution of the work that he gives out.

Mr. Herridge: I have one question which I have been waiting quite a while to ask. Would the minister inform the house who prints the Parliamentary Guide and, if it is printed privately, what is the name of the company and what do they charge for it?

Mr. Balcer: It is strictly private. The copies that we have are bought by the House of Commons, and it is the commissioners of internal economy that do that.

Mr. Herridge: The right to print is given by the commissioners?

Mr. Balcer: It is purely private. It has been done by the same family for quite a number of years. The copies are bought by the commissioners of internal economy of the house.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: This completes the estimates of the Department of Secretary of State.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

Fourth report of standing committee on agriculture and colonization—Mr. Stanton.

First report of special committee on broadcasting—Mr. Fortin.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

STATEMENT ON CONCLUSION OF MEETINGS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a short report to the house on the dominion-provincial conference. The premiers of all the provinces, together with a number of their ministers and advisers, met at the invitation of the government, as hon. members know, to commence discussions which are requisite in preparation for the revision of the financial arrangements with the provinces, which expire in March of 1962.

This meeting was a most active one at which many proposals were put forward by the various provinces, and an opportunity was afforded for the discussion of these proposals in camera. Now they will be studied by my colleagues and myself during the next several months in preparation for subsequent discussions. Most of the meetings took place in public, and the press has given a most full and comprehensive report as to what transpired in these meetings. I shall not, therefore, endeavour to summarize the many suggestions and points of view that were put forward by the ten premiers. I do, however, wish to table copies, in English and in French, of the preliminary verbatim report of the public proceedings of the conference. I would point out, too, that these reports still have to be corrected before they are issued in final printed form. When the copies have been revised the documents will be made available to all hon. members.

The financial proposals that were advanced covered a wide range of subjects and involved very large sums. Indeed, if parliament were to act upon even the more modest of them, it would involve far-reaching changes in the budget and tax system. There were two central problems; one, the nature and extent of the net payments to be made to provinces based upon some measure of their fiscal need, which payments include the equalization payments, which this government insists shall be continued, and such other payments as the Atlantic adjustment grants, the special grants to Newfoundland and other comparable payments. The second central problem considered was the sharing of the direct tax fields. Not unnaturally, some of the provincial governments would prefer to have the federal government reduce the federal corporation and personal income taxes and estate taxes. It would be necessary to give careful study to the various provincial suggestions and thereafter, as was the case in 1955, make preparations for the agreements such as were ultimately entered into in 1957; that is, a further conference or conferences will have to take place. It has been agreed that the present conference will resume on October 26, at which time a period of three days will be devoted to it.

The conference, though called to discuss fiscal matters, provided an opportunity for discovering that there was now a wider measure of agreement on the desirability and possibility of having two fundamental improvements made in the constitution. It was concluded that we should proceed at once to seek agreement on a means of amending Canada's constitution in Canada rather than by petition to Her Majesty the Queen to request the parliament at Westminster to make amendments which have to do with the distribution of powers as between the federal parliament and the provincial legislatures.

There was discussion also respecting a bill of rights. I hope that in consequence of the meeting which has been arranged for the latter part of September or the early part of October, to be convened by the Minister of Justice and attended by him and the various attorneys general, we may possibly look forward to the day when the constitution will be brought home, so to speak, and that consideration will then be given to making arrangements by agreement to incorporate, following the return of the constitutional powers to Canada, all the guarantees of those fundamental rights for Canadian citizens.

I think I need say no more at this time than to give this general report; for, as hon. members know, the discussions that took place in Canada are not revealed at this time in accordance with the tradition that has been built up through the years.

Questions have been asked with regard to the agenda. I might summarize the questions that were on the agenda following the determination by the conference on Tuesday. The first had to do with tax arrangements, a discussion of the possible arrangements after March 31, 1962, under the following headings: (a) arrangements with respect to personal income tax, corporation income tax and succession duties; (b) equalization and fiscal need payments, the principles underlying equalization and fiscal need payments and an examination of possible formulas; and (c) stabilization payments; indirect provincial retail sales tax; a matter such as uniform rules for allocation of corporate profits and the income of individuals to provinces; taxation of natural resource industries; sharing of the federal income tax collected from corporations whose main business is the distribution or generation for distribution to the public of electrical energy, gas or steam. Then some time was taken on the question of action respecting the application of the sales tax to crown agencies. In addition to those I have mentioned were such matters as economic development and employment and capital financing. Constitutional questions also received attention, as did the important field of conditional grants and shared-cost programs.

That is a résumé of those things that received consideration, and I feel it is only fair to say that it was most careful consideration having regard to the time available. All the deliberations took place in a spirit of frankness and with every regard being had by all to assure that the federal and provincial governments are not separate one from another when questions such as the welfare of Canada as a whole are being considered.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has just told us that the conference which has just concluded was an active one. The record of the proceedings and the Prime Minister's own statement show that it was indeed an active conference. Part of that activity, so far as one can judge from the record, seems to have been the reaction of the provincial premiers to the statement of the Minister of Finance interpreting in statistical terms the requests made of the federal government by those provincial premiers who spoke on this matter, an interpretation which was challenged, as indeed the procedure adopted in the minister's speech was also challenged, by the premier of Ontario as repeating a controversial procedure in the conference of 1957.

On the side of more constructive activity one must mention the proposal taken on the initiative of the premier of Quebec that a conference should be called in the autumn to consider ways and means by which Canadians can amend their own constitution. That was a proposal made by the premier of Quebec which was supported by other premiers, including the new premier of New Brunswick. The proposal also dealt with the possibility of a national bill of rights at a time when we have before us only a limited bill of rights. This activity at the conference, Mr. Speaker, was indeed constructive.

Perhaps less productive of a reaction was the request made by certain provinces that there should also be a discussion at this time of the unemployment problem. So far as the financial proposals are concerned, it would appear that after a long series of conferences, study groups, seminars and examinations by the federal government and federal officials, after nearly three years' consideration of this matter the federal government at this conference had no proposals to make to the provincial premiers. It appears that their attitude on this matter was negative and passive. This, Mr. Speaker, is a far cry from the new deal that was promised to the provinces in the electoral period of 1957 and 1958.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Before the Leader of the Opposition proceeds I want to remind him that in these statements which are made on routine proceedings there is an opportunity for comment which I think the good sense of every hon. member will dictate should be of a constructive, non-provocative and non-controversial character. Otherwise we are doing that which is not permissible, namely entering upon a debate without opportunity for reply, and that was demonstrated the other day.

So in giving this word of caution my suggestion to all hon. members who take part in such discussions is that they must bear in mind that it is not really a discussion but merely an opportunity for brief comment. I particularly felt that the Leader of the Opposition, in entering into political controversy of this kind which he was approaching, was perhaps getting beyond the proper scope of this kind of discussion.

Hon. members will realize that there are no fixed rules. There is no subject before the house. Comment by a spokesman for each party has been customary; it has usually been brief, and it has usually been constructive. I am sure the house does not want to limit any hon. member to concurrence or approval only, but I think some restraint is in order at this time.

Mr. Pearson: The Prime Minister has given the house a report on this conference. The Prime Minister has taken the initiative in making that report, and that report gives an interpretation to the results of the conference which we on this side do not accept. I am trying to point out, Mr. Speaker, that the result of this conference in our view, in so far as the federal government is concerned with the negative and passive attitude it adopted, is a far cry from the promises and assurances given by the Prime Minister to the provinces earlier.

Some hon. Members: Cheap politics.

An hon. Member: Flouting the rules.

Mr. Speaker: It was at that point I intervened, and I think hon. members will appreciate why I did so. I did so because that is a controversial matter of political and party debate. If the Leader of the Opposition does not wish to attempt to follow our practice I must ask him not to make use of such expressions; otherwise I shall have to consider the whole question of permitting statements at this point on routine proceedings, and of permitting comments to be made on them. The simple fact is that there is nothing in the rules to permit debate, and if hon. members in following this practice which has grown up will not avoid debate I shall have to limit it or have rules which will govern it.

Mr. Pearson: On that point, Mr. Speaker, when spokesmen for the government make statements which are merely factual, any comment by our representative on this side of the house should be factual also. But surely when the Prime Minister or members of the government make statements which are political, and which are interpretative, we have the right to comment accordingly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I say that I do not wish to interfere with the right to speak of the hon. member for Assiniboia.

This is not the first time this has happened. It is not the first time the Leader of the Opposition has made a partisan attack—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —on an occasion when he realizes that you, Mr. Speaker, always direct me not to reply. I would point out this fact, that the Leader of the Opposition chooses this subterranean method of making his insinuations, and on every occasion from now on I am going to ask for the right of reply. I simply say this. I am not going to answer the hon. gentleman today, because that would be contravening something which he himself disregarded, namely a direct order from yourself.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I find myself in a somewhat difficult position. I want to obey your admonition, Mr. Speaker, and I intend to. At the same time I hate to sit out any partisan political controversy that may be going on in this house. There is an overall rule which says we are equal here, although some of us think there are some who are more equal than others.

I want to thank the Prime Minister for having taken this opportunity to report to the house on the federal-provincial conference, because that does give opposition spokesmen a chance to make some brief comment. As has been the custom in the recent past, the federal government approached this conference, I will not say in a negative and passive manner but with a blank sheet of paper. The government was not showing its hand at this conference, except that the Minister of Finance did add up all the proposals which the provincial premiers had made and then got into a controversy as to whether the total was $2 billion or some other figure.

A very definite theme was enunciated by the premiers as they rose one after another, and that was that the revenues of the provinces, as well as of the federal government, depend to a very large extent on the state of our economy. There was great concern at this conference about the weak and unhealthy state of the economy, and it was emphasized that everything should be done to make our economy more buoyant and therefore by that means to increase the revenues of all the provinces.

I was glad that the Prime Minister underlined today this belief in the principle of equalization grants. I think equalization grants are a part of our economic structure in this country today which must be maintained. I feel that in the future greater emphasis needs to be laid on the fiscal needs of the provinces. I would think that before the coming conference this fall there are two general economic areas that should be considered. First of all, there is need to embark upon programs on a co-operative basis which will strengthen our economy. Second, I submit there is need to make a broad attack in the field of welfare measures, and now is the time to go forth.

The Prime Minister has said, and very properly so, that if the many proposals that were made were acceded to by the federal government it would mean far-reaching tax changes. Undoubtedly that is true. I feel that as a parliament, or as a nation, we should not shy away from increased taxes where they appear to be necessary to provide improvements in essential services or to contribute to an expanding economy. Between now and the conference this fall I hope the federal government will consider economic proposals and will bring in something in the nature of those contained in the green book proposals of 1945, because I think once again our country is at the economic crossroads.

The Prime Minister has said there was greater acceptance among the provinces of the idea of bringing our constitution to this country, having it domiciled here, and there was greater support for embedding in our constitution a bill of rights. I hope the Prime Minister will proceed with all energy to endeavour to get agreement from the provinces so we can bring our constitution to this country and so we can have a bill of rights embedded in it which will provide for a strengthening of human rights and fundamental freedoms in this country.

I have expressed in another place the position of our group; that pending this conference there should be a postponement of further procedure on the bill of rights. I do not intend, Mr. Speaker, to make any further comment on that matter. I merely say the Prime Minister should consider now every practical means of speeding the day when we may have a bill of rights embedded in our constitution.

UNEMPLOYMENT—FEDERAL REACTION TO PROVINCIAL PROPOSALS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister tell us what was the reaction of the government to the proposals made by the provinces concerning unemployment, and particularly to the brief presented by the province of Quebec?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is a very interesting question because, if the hon. gentleman will recall 1955, when a similar conference was convened, the federal government at the initial conference made no proposals nor did it indicate its attitude regarding the agreements that might be entered into. The first meeting, as I remember, was held in the month of April; then there was a later meeting in October. We have arranged, as I mentioned, for a meeting to be convened in October, at which time the federal government, in keeping with the experience of 1955, will submit its views, having secured from the provinces the benefit of their suggestions.

In so far as the particular question of the hon. gentleman is concerned, our discussions in respect of those matters took place in camera, and it was understood that nothing would be said regarding them.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question. The Prime Minister has just made a statement concerning an earlier dominion-provincial conference. Does he not remember that at that time a suggestion was made by the former government for a proposal of unemployment assistance?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the particular conference to which I referred was the one at which, among other things, unemployment assistance was discussed as a subject. The present conference was to be entirely a fiscal conference. During the course of representations, naturally, matters dealing with the economy as a whole were brought forward. My answer still stands; that any replies or views expressed were, it was clearly understood by all present, not to be made public. Indeed, the only statement that came out of the conference was the one that I had cleared with the members of the conference, indicating that there would be a further conference after the preliminary one, in October, and that a meeting of the provincial attorneys general would be held with the Minister of Justice.

INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL PROPOSALS AT AUTUMN MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister of Finance, and in asking it, I am sure I should say that the house extends a warm welcome to him on his return from Europe and the federal-provincial conference.

In the light of the statements, requests and demands made by Premier Frost, will it now be the intention of the federal government to revise its program and put forward proposals when the federal government meets with the provinces next autumn, or does the government propose to insist on the position it has been taking that this will not be done until 1962?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, first may I express my unqualified gratitude to the hon. member for his words of welcome. I really had a suspicion that on my return to the house today any welcome I might be accorded by some hon. members opposite might be characterized by warmth.

The hon. member is asking about the period to which the proposals at the autumn conference may relate. The conference which concluded yesterday was called for the purpose of discussing fiscal relations in the period following March 31, 1962. That was the scope of reference of the conference, and the discussions were within that scope. There are one or two matters on the agenda to which the Prime Minister referred today which are not necessarily confined to that period, but the broad questions all relate to the period following March 31, 1962.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Finance a related question. The minister was reported in the press as having said that the additional demands of the provincial governments add up to $2 billion. Would the minister give the house a break-down of these demands so it will be available for us in considering his estimates?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, with pleasure, Mr. Speaker. The unrevised record of the conference reports that in the early part of the remarks I was called upon to make following the conclusion of the opening statements by all ten provincial premiers I said:

> ...to give effect to proposals that have been made here today would involve the raising on the part of the federal government and paying over to the provinces or for their benefit approximately $2 billion per annum.

The house will appreciate that I was called upon to speak immediately after the conclusion of the opening statements by the premiers. I had no advance copies of those statements. The calculation was one that had to be made by the Department of Finance under some pressure at the time. Therefore I indicated that the figure I was giving was an approximate one.

There has been an opportunity since to make a further calculation in the department, and the conclusion we have reached is that the approximate cumulative figure to cover the demands of all the provinces which I put forward at that time is somewhat on the low side. I can give the house full—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the minister proceeds with details, may I remind him that in his absence yesterday I stopped a question of that kind which an hon. member asked—

Mr. Pickersgill: It was the same hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: —which the same hon. member wished to ask because I felt it was not one which could be answered succinctly enough to qualify for this period of the day. I am not asking the minister to desist, but only cautioning him that if the answer is extended it would be more appropriate to reserve it for his estimates.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure the house would like the minister to proceed, because it would be of great help to members of the house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It would involve a quite extensive reply with a number of figures. I have them here.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the minister could not be permitted to put them on Hansard without reading them, because it would be a great convenience to the house in considering his estimates to have a chance to study these figures.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I hear some objection to that course, and it could only be done by unanimous consent.

BILL OF RIGHTS—APPLICATION OF STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I have a question for the Prime Minister which perhaps can be directed to the Minister of Finance, who was present at the conference. It has to do with the public statement made by the Prime Minister in connection with the bill of rights, in which it was stated that the next step will be to preserve and maintain and ensure our freedom by means of a constitutional amendment passed in Canada rather than having a declaration of freedom passed by the parliament of the United Kingdom. The question I had was this. May I ask the minister, who was present, what application this statement has to the bill of rights now before the house?

Mr. Speaker: I think on reflection the hon. member for Laurier will agree with me, or I hope he will, that the question relates to a matter which is within the possession of the house now, and will come back to the house in due course. It is not customary on orders of the day to ask questions which are anticipatory in that sense, that they relate to a matter which is coming up for debate, particularly when it is not strictly a matter of information but of opinion that the hon. member for Laurier is asking. I hope he agrees with me.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not disagree with Your Honour's general interpretation, but the point was that the statement made concerned a matter that was before the house and is still before a committee of the house. I think it is a fair question to ask either the Prime Minister or one of the ministers who were there, what application it has to what is now before us.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the proposal which has been approved to hold a conference in late September or early October with the Minister of Justice and the attorneys general will provide an opportunity of discussing in relation to the amending of the constitution any subject that arises out of the proposed amending procedures. So far as the bill of rights is concerned, it has been made quite clear by the Prime Minister that it is the government's intention to ask that the present bill be enacted at this session of parliament and that will be a substantial contribution—indeed in the view of the government an essential contribution—to the kind of proposal that has been made in relation to constitutional amendments.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

QUEBEC—DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN PROVINCIAL ATTORNEY GENERAL AND MINISTER OF JUSTICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Theogene Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister had any discussion with the attorney general of Quebec, as reported recently in the press, concerning the Quebec provincial police and a possible commission to conduct a political investigation?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I noticed the report in the press with respect to a discussion on the Quebec provincial police. I had understood that our talks were private and confidential, at this stage at any rate; but since I observe the press reports that the Quebec officials have said that these talks took place, I see no reason why I should not confirm it. In fact there have been preliminary discussions between the attorney general of Quebec and myself with regard to the Quebec provincial police.

With regard to discussion of a possible commission to make a political investigation, which was also reported in the press this morning, I should say that there was no mention whatsoever of this subject during the talks I had with Mr. Lapalme. I would think, of course, that this is the natural situation, because I would think it would be necessary for me to reject any suggestion that the government of Canada be drawn in any way into a purely provincial political controversy.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POLAND—REPORTED CANADIAN STUDY OF GERMAN TERRITORIAL CLAIM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. My question is based on a Canadian Press dispatch, reported in this morning's Globe and Mail, headed "Canada Studies Polish Theory on Bonn Claim", and which reads in part:

> The Canadian government is studying a Polish note asking how far Canada goes in support of a West German claim to territories east of the Oder-Neisse frontier.
> No reply to the note has been given yet, but informed sources said today the Canadian government is not likely to give any support to the West German claim.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has, I think, laid sufficient foundation for his question.

Mr. Herridge: In view of the great importance of this question, can the minister give the house any information at this time with respect to the government's attitude toward this request?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, a note was delivered by the Polish chargé d'affaires some days ago giving the views of the Polish government on a recent statement by Chancellor Adenauer. This note is being studied in the department and a reply is being prepared. At the moment I cannot give the house any further information.

HUMAN RIGHTS

OTTAWA—REPORTED DISCRIMINATION AGAINST WEST INDIES FAMILY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works based on a Canadian Press report in yesterday's papers that a West Indies born federal civil servant has said that he and his wife are being kept out of a housing project in Ottawa because they are negroes. Will the minister tell the house whether this Ottawa housing project which has barred a negro civil servant is being subsidized in any way by the government or any government agency?

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. minister proceeds to answer that question, it strikes me that the operation of housing in Ottawa is probably a matter of municipal responsibility, and the question may be beyond the scope of the minister.

Mr. Argue: May I say a word—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the simplest thing would be to hear the minister.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Nipissing, the incident to which he refers did not happen in a federal-provincial project, did not happen in a limited dividend project, and did not happen in any project which has a mortgage from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Consequently, much as I should like to assist the hon. member, it is beyond my jurisdiction to do so.

I can say, however, that with respect to any projects which are under our aegis or over which we have any control we have already taken steps, of which I have given the house details, and we are also hoping to include a clause in Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation mortgages, to protect people such as my hon. friend has referred to from being discriminated against. Ever since this government came into power in 1957 we have been attempting to do what the Prime Minister has always sought to do, avoid discrimination against anyone on the grounds of race, language, colour or religion.

Mr. Garland: I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Is there any provision in the Canadian bill of rights which would make this kind of discrimination illegal?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the minister will permit me, the bill of rights has not yet received final approval of the house, and even if it had I think the question is not the kind that can be asked on the orders of the day. It is really asking for a legal opinion and interpretation of the bill of rights.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Public Works a supplementary question. In view of the formula which he mentioned today and, also, several weeks ago, the purpose of which is to safeguard, so far as federal competence permits, against any discrimination such as that here alleged, is the minister now in a position to say that the formula could be discussed in the committee on the bill of rights? The minister was asked some time ago about this matter and he said he would give consideration to it.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I told the hon. member for Essex East that I would be very happy to notify the house as and when the formula had been finally drafted and was ready to be put in these mortgages, but that date has not arrived yet.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is a very important matter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

79951-0—449

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member asking a further supplementary?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A further supplementary. Does the minister not recall having said that he would give consideration—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We are discussing a bill of rights at this time.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have two problems of order. First, I was unable to hear the hon. member who was interrupted by others and, second, what I could hear rather indicated that he was asking an argumentative question rather than one seeking information.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): With great respect, Mr. Speaker, I was not; I was asking the minister if he did not recall having said to the house that he would give consideration to whether or not he could make available the formula that he had in mind to the committee on the bill of rights rather than await the passage of that bill in this house, in order to make sure that the formula was consistent with the bill of rights.

Mr. Walker: No, Mr. Speaker, I made no such statement.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hansard will show that.

NATIONAL REVENUE

TORONTO—ESTABLISHMENT OF SECOND HIGHWAY SUFFERANCE WAREHOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank McGee (York-Scarborough): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. In view of my many representations, can the minister now say whether or not he has decided to permit the establishment of a second highway sufferance warehouse in the metropolitan Toronto area?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question, which I received before coming into the house. As he knows, we have had many conversations on this matter. My departmental officials have given it careful consideration and have recently discussed their findings with me. Due to the heavy increase in truck movements from the international border to the Toronto area, as well as traffic movements generally, I have authorized the establishment of a second highway sufferance warehouse in Toronto for the convenience of importers in the eastern section of that city.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. McGee: I wonder if the minister could indicate what site is being considered for this warehouse.

Mr. Nowlan: No decision has yet been made as to the site. This will be a matter for discussion between our collector in Toronto and the people concerned. I am sure, however, the hon. member will be a little hopeful when I tell him that the sites so far being considered are in Scarborough township.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—ANNOUNCEMENT RESPECTING APPOINTMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. N. L. Spencer (Essex West): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister any information to give to the house relative to the representations recently made that consideration be given by the government to the appointment of a royal commission to inquire into the problems of the automobile and automotive parts industries or, alternatively, a reference of the matter to the tariff board?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member generally I may say that earlier this month representations were made by representatives of the united automobile workers, and also by the parts manufacturers, in which the suggestion was made that a royal commission should be set up and a full study made of the various aspects of the Canadian automobile and parts industries, or that the matter might be taken under careful study by the tariff board.

We found on looking into the matter that the tariff board has a tremendous backlog of work and, however diligent that board is, it is very considerably behind in its schedule, having regard to the number of matters that have been brought to its attention.

The government has decided that the importance of the automobile industry to the Canadian economy is such that there should be a comprehensive investigation of the various aspects of that industry. During the last few weeks and months several departments of government, the Department of Finance, the Department of National Revenue and the Department of Labour, have been making investigations and gathering preparatory material, generally securing the fullest information in connection with this very important problem. With this background of information available we feel now that a royal commission should be appointed, and the government has so decided. I hope the particulars of the powers and ambit of authority of the commission, as well as the personnel, can be announced next week.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, in asking the Prime Minister to give consideration to the representation on that commission of management and labour, I hope the Prime Minister will also take into consideration the great desirability of giving effect to the recommendations made by the united automobile workers in this context.

SMALL CARS—INQUIRY AS TO TREASURY BOARD DIRECTIVE RESPECTING GOVERNMENT PURCHASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Can the minister advise the house whether instructions to federal government departments to purchase small foreign made cars are still in effect?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): There is an interdepartmental committee that is charged with responsibility in these matters. I am not aware of any changes in its instructions in recent times.

UNITED NATIONS

AVAILABILITY OF TECHNICAL OFFICERS FOR UNEF DUTIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): In view of the fact that on two separate occasions Canada's 900-man stand-by infantry battalion for use by the United Nations has not been required but rather that administrative forces have been required, is the department doing anything to make arrangements so that this kind of administrative personnel will be available at all times if required by the United Nations, thus avoiding the long delay in bringing them together?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): The matter is under consideration.

HARBOURS

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD—REPORTED LACK OF PROMOTION OF CANADIAN PORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. E. Barrington (Chateauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport arising from an article in this morning's Gazette which states in part:

> Federal promotion of Canadian ports by the national harbours board was attacked here yesterday as "weak, ineffective and without any continuity."

Has the minister any comment to make on this statement?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The national harbours board has never conducted promotional activity on behalf of any single port, but has related its advertising and publicity to all ports under its jurisdiction. The board maintains a continuous advertising campaign throughout each year in the trade papers and magazines which are of direct interest to shippers and manufacturers. Further, it is in constant contact with export, import, traffic and manufacturing groups, urging the greater use of Canadian ports generally.

In the foreign field, the board has recently strengthened its association with the Canadian trade commissioners and has established a good working relationship under which they have agreed to promote traffic and interest in Canadian ports within their respective areas. Recently the board sent to the United Kingdom an exhibit for display, both there and in Europe, featuring enlarged photographs of the various ports and essential information as to their facilities and services.

The promotional program of the board is at present under review to determine the most effective means of further bringing Canadian port services to the attention of world shippers and manufacturers.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

SOUTHERN RHODESIA—INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN DISCUSSIONS WITH U.K.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, arising out of the well known attitude of the government that countries within the commonwealth should come as quickly as possible to full nationhood where their citizens have equal rights. In view of recent press reports of mounting unrest in Southern Rhodesia in respect of the denial of rights to eight million negroes, has the Canadian government entered into any discussions with other commonwealth countries—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is enlarging the responsibility of the government too much. It seems to me that the relations of Rhodesia are with the crown in the right of the United Kingdom and not of Canada, and that the matter would be quite beyond the administrative responsibility of the minister. If the hon. member who wished to ask the question can persuade me to the contrary I will permit it, but at the moment I do not see it.

Mr. Argue: May I put the question in this way, Mr. Speaker. Has our government had any consultation with the government of the United Kingdom as to the situation in Southern Rhodesia and the desirability of bringing this country to full nationhood wherein its citizens have equal rights?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in reply to this question may I point out to the hon. member that the government of the United Kingdom does no need any prompting by Canada or any other nation on the question of promoting democracy in the various parts of the commonwealth. I am greatly surprised that he would suggest that we should try to prevail upon the United Kingdom to do something about speeding up the giving independence to members of the commonwealth.

Mr. Argue: And removing racial discrimination.

Mr. Green: When the United Kingdom has actually launched five different nations, namely India, Pakistan, Malaya, Ceylon and Ghana and is launching Nigeria on the road to independence within the next few weeks, I suggest that she does not need any suggestions from Canada or from the hon. member for Assiniboia with regard to the need for this action.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think I could permit a supplementary question on that subject.

Mr. Argue: If I might be permitted—

Mr. Speaker: I recognize the Minister of National Defence.

[Later:]

Mr. Argue: I wonder whether I might ask another question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the government had any recent reports on the racial situation in South Africa, and does the government's attitude in opposing racial discrimination in South Africa also extend to Southern Rhodesia?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I suggest to you that again is an argumentative question and not of the type which can be asked on the orders of the day.

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

AUSTRALIA—CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT MEETING ON NAVAL CO-OPERATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Yesterday the Leader of the Opposition asked a question which I took as notice, as to whether Canada was represented at the three-day commonwealth conference recently held in Australia to discuss naval co-operation and, if not, why not?

The conference in question was in no sense a general commonwealth conference but was restricted to certain officers of the Royal Navy, the Royal Australian Navy and the Royal New Zealand Navy. The object of the conference was to discuss certain technical matters in connection with a naval exercise and manoeuvre which is to take place in southeast Asia. The reason no Canadian officers were present is that no Canadian ships are taking part in those exercises.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

CORRECTION OF REMARKS IN RESOURCES DEBATE ON JULY 27

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Yesterday on my estimates, Mr. Speaker, I was reading a report of the survey that was made of the provinces as to their various statutes and legislation on archaeological site protection. During the discussion of my estimates I stated that in Saskatchewan there were no such regulations. I received a phone call this morning from the director of the museum saying there is an act respecting provincial parks and protected areas, chapter 50 of 1953, which was amended by chapter 14 of 1958. I should like to make this correction.

Mr. Chevrier: Is this an attempt to open up your estimates?

AGRICULTURE

DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS—MEETING WITH WESTERN FARM ORGANIZATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of Agriculture whether any reply has now been sent to the message from the representative of the western liaison committee of grain growers dated May 10, 1960, requesting an opportunity of meeting the Prime Minister and his cabinet colleagues in order to discuss at their earliest convenience the question of acreage payments?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): I believe that all communications from these gentlemen have been replied to.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should like to ask a supplementary question based on a statement attributed to the minister which appeared in the Regina Leader-Post of July 7:

> No federal aid for Saskatchewan farmers other than the acreage payments announced by the federal government several months ago are in store for the near future Agriculture Minister Douglas Harkness told the Leader-Post Wednesday night.

My question is this. In view of that statement, when is the minister going to announce this acreage payment program?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I did not tell the Leader-Post any such thing.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Misquoted again.

An hon. Member: A government of misquotations.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): An opposition of misfits.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask a question supplementary to the one I just asked the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister give us the nature of the reply made to this telegram of May 10?

Mr. Harkness: These telegrams were not addressed to me. They were addressed to the Prime Minister. The nature of the reply, and so forth, I think should come from the Prime Minister, not from myself.

Mr. Argue: A supplementary question. Would the minister make inquiries as to whether or not any reply was made, since the farmers' union say that such a reply was not received?

Mr. Harkness: I had my files searched and there were no communications which had come in with regard to this matter from the Saskatchewan farmers' union or from the interprovincial farm union.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HERRIDGE—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN OTTAWA "CITIZEN"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise with great reluctance on a question of privilege. My question of privilege arises out of a press report in the Ottawa Citizen of yesterday evening with respect to a certain statement made by the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Tardif) at a board of control meeting recently. In order to get the point correctly I just wish to read briefly, as follows:

> At one point in the meeting the discussion produced reference to the facilities sought by "M.P.'s" when they are sick. "I understand they do not always stay in the best of places, observed Mayor Nelms." Countered Con. Paul Tardif, who is M.P.

for Russell: "There are M.P.'s who are not accustomed to anything... There are five rows of them in front of me in the house."

My question of privilege is this, Mr. Speaker, and I rise more from a feeling of hurt than from a sense of anger. While members of this group are members of the working class and consequently are able to make only modest expenditures on food, dress and habitation, I consider it most unfair and ungentlemanly of a colleague in this house or any colleague who enjoys better financial circumstances to ridicule our humble circumstances.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENCE PRODUCTION

66. Departmental administration, $8,323,356.

The Chairman: Order. House in committee of supply, Department of Defence Production, item No. 66. This item is to be found on page 16 of the blue book, the details on page 153.

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Chairman, the estimates of the Department of Defence Production have been the subject of consideration by the special committee on defence expenditures; accordingly I do not propose to make a lengthy statement at this time. First of all, however, I would like to express my appreciation and thanks to the members of the special committee for the work they have performed and also for the action that has been taken in approving my departmental estimates and commending them to this committee. I would like in particular to express my appreciation to the hon. member for London, who carried out his duties as chairman of the special committee in such a splendid manner.

I would now like to refer to the content of the departmental estimates, and in this connection I propose to follow the order of the votes, Nos. 66 to 74 and votes 508 and 509 in the supplementary estimates.

Vote 66 shows an increase of $774,000 over last year's estimate. The largest individual item which contributes to this increase is salaries. In this regard I would like to point out that for the first time in eight years we have found it necessary to ask for an increase in staff. This increase amounts to an addition of 74 new positions, of which 42 are required for the intensified activities in connection with the Canada-United States joint production sharing program.

Vote 67 and supplementary vote 508, for the care, maintenance and custody of standby defence plants, buildings, machine tools and production tooling, provides some $90,000 less than the total provision made last year, but about $450,000 more than was actually spent in 1959-1960. The provision under this vote is contingent to a great degree upon decisions which must be taken during the course of the fiscal year, and requirements therefore cannot be forecast with any close accuracy.

Vote 68 provides for capital assistance to industry and for the underwriting of certain tooling preproduction costs involved in bids submitted by Canadian industry for United States orders under the production sharing program. There is also a substantial contingent element in this vote, as it is not possible to anticipate the opportunities for bidding which are going to be open to Canadian industry nor the degree of success which they will enjoy. The total provision made this year is slightly less than that of 1959-1960, owing to a reduction in the forecast requirements for capital assistance.

The plants covered by vote 69 have been acquired by the crown under the capital assistance programs of previous years and are operated by private contractors on the same basis as industrial plants. The grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes are computed on the normal assessment evaluation by the municipality, taking account of the services rendered, and are estimated to equal the taxes which would otherwise be payable.

The provision made in vote 70 to establish qualified sources of supply of component parts and materials is identical with that made in 1959-1960. This is a selective program in which we must weigh each case in the light of the quantities of components likely to be required and existing manufacturing capabilities on which we can build. While it is intended primarily to establish sources of components which will be needed for future Canadian military requirements, the likelihood of United States defence requirements is also taken into account.

Vote 71 continues the provision which was made for the first time last year to support select defence development programs as part of our Canada-United States production sharing program. It is becoming increasingly clear that as a result of the rapid pace of change in military equipment, the future success of Canadian industry under the production sharing program requires that Canadian engineering capacity be maintained and advanced to the greatest extent practical.

Votes 72, 73, 74 and supplementary vote 509 relate to crown companies. Vote 72 provides for the expenses incurred by Defence Construction (1951) Limited in procuring the construction and defence projects on behalf of the Department of National Defence. During the past few days it has been possible to obtain a firmer estimate of the construction work required during the current fiscal year and it will be possible to reduce the vote requirement for the current fiscal year by $250,000 to a revised figure of $3,626,117. I propose to ask one of my colleagues to move an amendment in this connection when we reach the vote in question.

Vote 73 and supplementary vote 509 provide for an increase in the provision made for administrative expenses of Canadian Arsenals Limited. As I explained in my statement on the estimates for 1959-60 the decline in the sales of this company has made it necessary to revert to the practice of appropriating funds to cover a part of its administrative costs. At the time the main estimates for the current year were prepared it was thought that this financial requirement could be reduced by accelerating the production of ammunition needed by the navy in future years. Subsequently it has been found impractical to do this and the additional funds must therefore be sought under the supplementary estimates.

As regards vote 74 I would point out that the provision for the cost of construction improvements and new equipment for Canadian Arsenals Limited has been substantially reduced. This vote covers capital costs of a general nature and excludes any sums attributable to specific programs which would be covered by vote 68. The reduction is, of course, a reflection of the reduced volume of operations at Canadian Arsenals.

As I have already pointed out to the special committee on defence expenditures, there is an important new function reflected in these estimates. An emergency supply planning branch has been established within the Department of Defence Production to undertake the planning and organization necessary to permit a war supplies agency to come into existence immediately should a nuclear attack be made on this country. As the Prime Minister explained when advising this house of the government's decision to assign this planning task to the Department of Defence Production, the war suplies agency would be charged with responsibility and authority for all aspects of control over the production, distribution and pricing of supplies, both civil and military, during at least the early period of a nuclear war, other than production on the farm and the catching and landing of fish. Such a war supplies agency would combine the responsibilities carried out in the last war by the department of munitions and supply and the wartime prices and trade board.

[Mr. O'Hurley.]

I wish to emphasize that this new branch is a planning agency and should not be confused with the war supplies agency itself. Broadly speaking, the functions of the emergency supply planning branch with respect to supply planning are analogous to those of the emergency measures organization in the field of civil emergency planning generally. In addition to being responsible for the preparation of a basic plan for the creation of a war supplies agency, it will thus also have responsibility for co-ordinating those aspects of emergency supply planning that are properly the responsibility of other branches of the Department of Defence Production or of other departments and agencies of the federal government, particularly planning in the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Fisheries.

The initial staff of the emergency supply planning branch is small. In the future it is intended to establish a number of regional offices of the emergency supply planning branch across the country, similar to those already established by the emergency measures organization of the privy council office.

At this time I would like to deal with certain matters which arose in the course of the consideration of these estimates by the special committee. The hon. member for Trinity inquired as to the status of Iroquois engine tooling. In this connection I can report that from the early development stages of the Iroquois engine, many groups engaged in aircraft production have expressed interest in using this power plant in various types of aircraft. My department and Orenda Engines Limited have received inquiries from governmental agencies and private interests in North America and Europe.

Officers of Orenda and of my department are co-operating in discussions with all groups who may be in a position to complete the development and put the Iroquois into production. The future use of the engine is now under serious consideration by one aircraft manufacturer in the United States. Proposals have been submitted to the manufacturer, and these are presently undergoing technical and economic evaluation. I regret that I cannot reveal the name of the manufacturer or any of the details at this time, because a premature announcement would not be conducive to the successful completion of negotiations.

Interest in the Iroquois for the purpose of furthering the "state of art" has been shown by a company in the United Kingdom. This company has requested the use of one engine and we have agreed, in principle, to make one or more engines available in the event that the engines are not required for the production program which is now under consideration.

In the meantime 13 completed prototypes, components sufficient to complete an additional seven engines, and all essential tooling are stored in the crown-owned high altitude test facility at Malton. This facility is not in current operation but is being retained for future use. The storage costs are therefore negligible.

The hon. member for Renfrew North stated that invitations to tender are submitted to both wholesale and retail stores in Pembroke. My departmental officials have investigated this matter and I have been advised that the invitations to tender by my department, which relate to food requirements in the Pembroke area, are not directed in the manner suggested by the hon. member. The cases he has in mind may concern small local purchases which are made direct from the trade by service officers in connection with the requirements of various messes and canteens.

The hon. member for Renfrew North also suggested the inclusion of a clause dealing with the employment of local labour in contracts covering the construction of housing units at Camp Petawawa. As the chief engineer of Defence Construction (1951) Limited pointed out to the special committee, the construction of these units is a responsibility of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The comments of the hon. member have been brought to the attention of that corporation. As regards the firm price construction contracts which are placed by Defence Construction (1951) Limited, I would like to point out that the general conditions covering such contracts provide as follows:

> To the full extent to which they are procurable, consistent with proper economy and the expeditious carrying out of the work, the contractor shall use Canadian labour and material in the work and shall employ labour from the locality of the work and reasonable proportions of men who have served on active service with the armed forces of Canada and been honourably discharged therefrom.

I am not going to make any further comments at this time. However, I shall be most pleased to deal with any questions that may arise as we proceed with the consideration of the estimates.

Mr. Hellyer: As the minister has stated, his estimates were considered by the special committee which examined governmental expenditure, and since we went into this subject at length it is not our purpose to ask a lot of questions in committee of supply today.

However, there are a few questions we should like to put to the minister, and the first is this. Some time ago there was newspaper speculation about the possibility of obtaining for Canada a very large order for picket planes, long range radar aircraft. I wonder if the minister could tell us what happened in that case; whether the order has been let by the United States government and, if not, whether there is still a possibility of obtaining it for Canadian manufacturers.

Mr. O'Hurley: I am advised that the United States did not continue with the purchase of these planes. As far as we know they have not purchased the planes in question.

Mr. Hellyer: Can I take it from that reply that as far as the minister knows there are no current negotiations which may lead to a Canadian order in this respect.

Mr. O'Hurley: Not at this time.

Mr. McIlraith: I should like to ask the minister a question. I realize there is difficulty in obtaining an accurate statistical analysis because of the very nature of the operation, but is it fair to say that the volume of procurement for the armed services is down? The estimates of the department would tend to indicate that, and I wonder if the minister would go as far as is practicable in giving us information as to the volume of procurement this year as related to the last few years.

Mr. O'Hurley: In my report to the committee I dealt with this subject. I should just like to repeat that part of the brief I read.

Mr. McIlraith: Would you give me the page reference?

Mr. O'Hurley: Page 5 of my report. I might sum up by giving a few figures which are particularly relevant. We spent for supplies and services, on behalf of the Department of National Defence, $654 million. This was about 12 per cent lower than the level of expenditure in 1958-59 and continued a decline in defence production expenditures which has been going on for some years. Out of the total spending last year, $593 million went directly to contractors in Canada. To put it in another way, expenditures by our department going to foreign contractors represented 9.3 per cent of the total payments during 1959-60.

Does that answer the question asked by the hon. member?

Mr. McIlraith: It does in part. As I say, I recognize the difficulty of giving precise information. Perhaps we could approach the subject from another direction. Can the minister tell the house in general terms the total number of staff in his department this year as compared with the last three years, or over a shorter period if the figures for the last three years are not available at the moment.

Mr. O'Hurley: There was no increase in the staff of the department for eight years; there were even considerable reductions. In 1959-60 the total number of staff was 1,510. We went into the production sharing program, and there has been an increase this year for the first time in eight years. For 1960-61 we plan on having a staff of 1,584, which is an increase of 74. These are positions available; the actual number of staff is somewhat less.

Mr. McIlraith: That is the establishment?

Mr. O'Hurley: Yes the establishment. The actual staff on March 31, 1959 amounted to 1,441. On March 31, 1960, it was 1,476 and on June 30, 1960, 1,483.

Mr. McIlraith: I think the point I wanted to make can be made from the figures given by the minister. The staff of this department has been decreasing for some seven or eight years. This year, for the first time, the establishment is increased. This raises a point which should be watched, namely that there is an increase of staff and administrative costs in a department which is facing less procurement responsibilities at a time when there is less material to procure.

Perhaps the point can be dealt with better when the estimates of the Department of National Defence are before us and we shall be dealing with the actual procurement for defence purposes in this country, but I wanted to put that general warning on record; that there is a problem here which will require to be watched, and watched carefully, because at the very time we are reducing our procurement program for the defence department, as we have been doing for the last couple of years, we are increasing the administrative organization of the department which is charged with the responsibility of procuring those supplies, materials, equipment and so on. This is something that I think should be drawn to the attention of the committee for checking and watching in the future.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, it looks as though government departments have to be on guard at all times with respect to Parkinson's law, that staff increases to fill the time available. The minister will keep this in mind as he considers his establishment from year to year.

Can the minister tell us the present state of negotiations with respect to the proposed United States purchase of CL-44 aircraft from Canadair Limited? As the minister knows, there were reports in the newspapers which indicated first of all that there was a possible order of some $900 million for those aircraft. Later reports indicated that the figure was reduced to something of the order of $150 million or $160 million. Can the minister bring us up to date on the matter?

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Chairman, in reply to the request of the hon. member for Trinity, I should like very much to be able to give full information to the hon. member at this time. If Canada is to have an interceptor, it will have to be a military requirement; it will also have to be the policy of the government. With respect to the question of the exchange of the CL-44, on the one hand and the F-101 from the United States on the other, this matter is under active discussion at the present time with the government. I should like to be able to make a declaration, but no decision has been made up to this date.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister is stating, then, that the purchase by the United States air force of the CL-44 cargo carrier is dependent on the purchase by the Canadian government of a certain number of interceptors to be supplied to our air defence squadrons? Is that correct?

Mr. O'Hurley: The position of the government and of the Department of Defence Production has been and is still today that we would wish the United States to purchase from us the CL-44, and the other question can be discussed at another time. It is fair to say that one of the conditions that is being discussed is the exchange of the two planes.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the figures that have been given on the increase in staff are interesting. The minister has indicated that it is due to increased work, and I do not quarrel with that statement at all. I know how hard working the members of this department are, but it is nevertheless interesting to relate this increase to the reduced work of the department in so far as production is concerned for the armed forces.

But that is not really what I rose to speak about, Mr. Chairman. The minister has told us that this question of the possible exchange of the CL-44 air freighter for United States interceptors for our continental defence squadrons is now under consideration; indeed it has been under consideration for some time. It would be a very unfortunate thing indeed if this principle of defence sharing were applied, not only in this connection but in any other connection, in a way which brought about the result that "if you wish the U.S.A. to purchase certain material from Canada, which it may need and which it can get in Canada, we must in return purchase certain defence material in the United States to offset against that".

I am not suggesting that any such principle is being applied in that hard and fast way, but there have been indications that this is the situation in regard to this particular proposal. It would be most unfair for the United States to take that stand. For one thing, it would be pressure brought to bear on a Canadian government to do something which it might not otherwise feel necessary or desirable to do.

If this principle of defence sharing means anything at all, and it certainly should mean something, it means sharing—and not in the way I have suggested—in defence production generally, and it means sharing in the production of defence materials. The United States has certainly shown no awareness of the application of that principle in connection with such an essential defence material, for instance, as uranium. That has nothing to do with the minister's department, and I am only bringing it up as an illustration of the general argument I am making.

In connection with the CL-44 proposal—and I know how important this would be for the aircraft industry in Canada if it could be followed through, and I know the minister's department is doing its very best in this regard—I should like to ask the minister this question. Perhaps I should know this, and if I am ignorant on the matter I hope he will accept my apology. Has the bill which was submitted to the United States congress some months ago by Senator Monroney, which would have had the effect of compelling the United States federal government to underwrite 75 per cent of the cost of constructing air freighters built in the United States, made any progress? Has it been passed or not? If it has been passed, of course, it would have an effect on this whole problem. It is interesting to note that this bill was submitted to congress, I think last February, by Senator Monroney, who is a very great friend of Canada and who has been quoted in this house by the Secretary of State for External Affairs as having given some resounding utterance about continental co-operation in continental defence. This is the kind of bill which, if it were to prevent Canadian competition in the defence field, would hardly be a reflection of that kind of defence co-operation and defence sharing that I would like to see brought about.

Also, it is difficult, at least difficult for me, to get the facts and statistics regarding the defence sharing program. I know how difficult it is to make exact comparisons on this matter or to get statistics on military buying by the United States in Canada and comparable military buying by Canada in the United States, which it was hoped would be facilitated, and of course we hoped to our advantage, in the defence sharing agreements about which we have heard so much. I remember reading in the January 23 issue of the Financial Post an article on this matter by its Washington correspondent. In that article there was a table which gave figures of direct military buying by the United States in Canada which would indicate that that buying has gone down very considerably since the years 1952 and 1953.

But those figures, which I remember reading at the time, which I have before me and which perhaps are familiar to the minister or his officials, do not harmonize with the figures that are quoted in appendix F to the report of the minister's department, table 6-a and table 6-b, and to which reference is made in the body of the report. Table 6-a shows United States contracts and expenditures in Canada just for the last three years. They do not go further back than 1957. Table 6-b is the value of expenditures by the United States government on defence contracts placed in Canada through the Canadian Commercial Corporation and Defence Construction Limited. These figures are not comparable, even in respect of the years which they cover, with the figures that were produced in the article I have mentioned. But if that earlier compilation is correct it does indeed show that we have not made very much of an advance in recent years so far as United States defence purchasing in Canada is concerned. Perhaps the minister might have something to say on this point.

Mr. O'Hurley: First of all may I say to the Leader of the Opposition that the Monroney bill, which was discussed at length and whose introduction came as a surprise to Canada, was finally quashed and was never passed. It was shelved. With respect to purchase of the CL-44 by the United States air force, my information is that there is no impediment whatsoever and that the United States could purchase these planes from Canada.

The Leader of the Opposition spoke about our intensified efforts to get into the field of production sharing with the United States. I want to be quite frank with the Leader of the Opposition. I am not enthusiastic about the results to date myself. I think it is a long range program. In my view we have to start now to get into this field, which involves engineering because there is a complete change-over in armaments. If Canada wants to produce in this field we have to start now and probably the first results will not be very satisfactory.

Last year was the first year that we really kept records, and we did not have the staff to do the work. We did it with our ordinary office staff which we had to spread out fairly thin. One reason we have had to increase our staff is that we were sending too many of the boys to the hospital. Production sharing is a very difficult matter. A lot of credit has to be given for keeping the program alive. Many Canadian companies have shown their interest by writing us or visiting the department and they are quite pleased with the results, but of course not all companies are happy about it. There are companies that are not pleased and where the results have not been good.

So far as the long range program is concerned involving production sharing by Canada and the United States, I give my frank view to the Leader of the Opposition that we have to keep harping on the subject, working on the matter and putting forth all our efforts to reach an understanding. I wish to say that I think the United States officials on the secretarial level and the heads of departments in the Pentagon realize the usefulness of the program and have really made quite an effort to help. But in the United States so much of their defence program is concerned with the missile field, and there are many contracts that are allocated. My goal was that the United States should spend at least an equal amount on defence production in Canada as we spend in the United States. At least it would have been something if we could have equalized our purchases in the United States. This year we will not do so on account of the expensive purchasing for the CF-104 program, involving licensing and so on.

We will certainly not achieve that result unless we are fortunate enough to have something unexpected happen before the end of the year. Several projects are being studied. I want to give credit to the secretaries in Washington and the heads of their departments for their real interest in doing something about production sharing. However, I still make the statement that the situation could be much better and that the present state of affairs is no fault of the department. We are doing everything we can with respect to production sharing under these different programs in the years to come.

Mr. Pearson: I do not wish to minimize the importance of the program, its difficulties or the efforts that are being made by the officials of the minister's department to realize it. I think one aspect of this difficulty may well be that a defence production sharing program of this kind inevitably becomes linked with co-operation in defence strategy and defence generally. There is an interrelationship between defence production and defence generally which can operate to our advantage, but when we are dealing with such a powerful nation can also operate to our disadvantage. I am sure the minister is much more aware of this than I am. For instance, on page 25 of the report of the minister's department there is the following:

> At the beginning of 1959, production sharing arrangements were based mainly upon four projects of mutual Canadian-United States interest: the Bomarc anti-aircraft missile, the semi-automatic ground environment (SAGE) control system, heavy radars and gap fillers for the radar lines.

These are four projects which, though it is an arguable matter, in our view may well be of much greater interest to the United States than to us. Indeed our position is that we should not be participating in at least one of these projects at all. I mention that just to illustrate the interrelationship I have talked about and which undoubtedly will have a bearing on the minister's laudable desire to increase United States purchasing in Canada and bring it to a basis at least of equality with our own purchases from the United States. These as he has mentioned, have increased during the years because of the CF-104 contract and presumably the necessity of remodelling the earlier version to make it suitable for the purpose which the government has in mind of equipping our squadrons in Europe with it. I have just been reminded that no doubt this is another major worry in the minds of the minister and his officials as to how this can be done and at what cost.

I should like to ask the minister one other question, and again I refer to page 25 of the 1959 departmental report, where there is reference to the arrangements which were made for exemption from the buy American act through a revision of the buy American regulations in order, presumably, to make it a little easier for our manufacturers to get contracts in the United States. Is the minister satisfied that these amendments to the regulations are working satisfactorily from our point of view and that our people are indeed given a fair opportunity to compete with United States manufacturers for these defence contracts?

Mr. O'Hurley: In reply to the last remarks of the Leader of the Opposition, I honestly think that the changes in the buy American act regulations are really fair to Canadian manufacturers.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, at the time the Avro Arrow was cancelled the Prime Minister informed the house that Canada was no longer able to participate in major development in this country, and he announced this new and visionary production sharing arrangement which he thought would be of benefit to both countries and which we have been told is coming along slowly but is still pretty much in the early growth stage.

Subsequent to that, of course, our government arranged to purchase the F-104, which is to be built by Canadair in Montreal. The developmental work, however, is being done by the Lockheed Aircraft Corporation in Burbank, California. The other day I saw a list of some of the major modifications necessary to this plane before it would be suitable for the role the government has in mind for it. This list covered two whole pages, which seems to be a fantastic amount of developmental work that is presently being done for Canada by the United States.

At the same time that the Prime Minister made this announcement, he said that in our production sharing arrangements we were going to obtain from the United States some developmental work. We were not going to be satisfied with just production, but we were going to insist that we have a share in the developmental work. Now, Mr. Chairman, my question is this. What developmental contracts have we succeded in getting from the United States armed forces, and to what do they amount in terms of dollars and cents?

Mr. O'Hurley: In answer to the first question asked by the hon. member for Trinity, I wish to inform the committee that the changes made in the F-104 for its Canadian role are being paid for jointly by Canada, Germany, Belgium, Holland and Italy. We are partners in so far as payment for these engineering changes is concerned. In so far as developmental contracts that we get from the United States are concerned, I have not that information at hand but I will give it to the hon. member as soon as I obtain it.

Mr. Hellyer: In the meantime I should like to ask the minister another question. He made reference today to the amount in these estimates for the storage of the Iroquois engine since production and development were discontinued. My question is really this. If we have not been participating to any great extent in the developmental projects of the United States, if the government had any faith whatever in this engine and its potential—as it must have had or it would not have kept the prototype in storage at public expense—and if the government anticipated that there would be opportunities for the sale of this engine; if production sharing were really working, if the system were sound, why would the Canadian government not have gone ahead with the development of this engine and put it into production? Then they could try to exchange it with the French or United States governments, as well as others who might need it, and get in return the military equipment which they have available and which we could have used for our armed forces.

Mr. O'Hurley: Well, Mr. Chairman, we certainly had hopes that the Iroquois engine would have a future. We have been working for some months with the United Kingdom in relation to the future development of this engine, and we are working with the United States in connection with the future development and use of the Iroquois engine. We are certainly following this situation very closely. We have some hopes that this Iroquois might be developed in the future in collaboration with some other countries, and that the engine might be brought to the point where it is supposed to be as a new power plant.

However, at the moment I cannot give any assurance to the committee that this project is going to really be a success. We are hoping it will be. We are hoping that the Canadian engineers who have worked on the Iroquois engine will have made a contribution to the future. The Canadian government has great faith in Canadian manufacturers, Canadian engineers and Canadian developers, and given the opportunity Canadians will be out in front with new developments and will make their mark in the world.

Mr. Hellyer: The government had the opportunity to assist in the completion of the development work on this engine. The government showed a complete lack of faith in the potential of the engine when it laid it aside in moth balls for this period of two years, thus allowing it to drop further behind in this very competitive field. Surely the government is demonstrating a lack of faith in its own salesmanship, because if it had any confidence in its own ability to make production sharing arrangements really work it would have gone ahead with this project, developed the engine to the place where it was pre-eminent in its field, and then proceeded to make a swap with other countries for the military equipment that Canada needed. Obviously the government has no faith in Canadian industry, and no faith in itself. We feel that the whole policy of the government in the last two years has been timorous and lacking in imagination, and this has been evidenced by the contracts we have received and the lack of results achieved.

Mr. O'Hurley: Surely the hon. member has forgotten some of the history of Canada. He is forgetting the latest developments in which Canada has participated. We have contributed to the development of the Caribou by De Havilland, which has proven to be very popular. What about the help we have given to Marconi in connection with the development of the doppler system? What about the help we have provided for the sonobuoy that the United States has bought? Within the last week or so Air France has shown an interest in the development of this doppler system. We certainly have faith in Canadian industry and Canadian engineers who developed the Iroquois engine. We have kept the Iroquois, and we have faith that at some time in the future we might find a country interested in it and that we might jointly develop this engine. I feel that Canadian engineers are tops, and they enjoy a lot of respect all over the world.

I wish my department had hundreds of millions of dollars available to spend on Canadian development to help Canadian engineers and Canadian industry, because everywhere in the world Canadian engineers and Canadian industry are highly respected. Here is a list of Canadian developments. There is the doppler navigation aid by Canadian Marconi; the radome development, Long Sault Woodcraft; the 500 HP turbine engine by Canadian Pratt & Whitney; the V/STOL aircraft, Canadair Limited; the Caribou improvement, De Havilland Aircraft; electro servo valve, Jarry Hydraulics; hydraulic pump, Lucas Rotax; oximetry, Aviation Electric; extended life sonobuoy, EMI-Cossor; Avrocar, Avro Aircraft; fuel system J.69, Lucas Rotax. These are some of the developments on which we are spending money and encouraging Canadian industry and Canadian engineers. I think this demonstrates our interest and our faith in Canadian engineers and industry.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if the minister would tell us in how many of the cases he has just cited the Canadian government participated in the development through all stages to completion, and can he give us the dollar total of the government's assistance?

Mr. O'Hurley: In answer to the hon. member for Trinity, I may say that none of these developments has been completed as yet. It is very difficult to give a figure up to completion, because they are still in the developmental stage.

This is Canadian money put in on development, and we are continuing that. But they are still under development at the present time as the hon. member for Trinity knows. I spoke about doppler aid for the Canadian Marconi Company. That is what I was telling you. Air France are interested in that doppler system. Then there is the extended life sonobuoy at EMI-Cossor. But there is still development going on in each one.

[Mr. O'Hurley.]

Mr. Hellyer: I thank the minister for the information. We give the minister and his department full credit for everything that is being done. The point, however, is that this is a small contribution when considered in proportion to the total industrial capacity of our nation at the present time. It is expansion on a considerable scale that we feel the government should have undertaken or should still undertake. I wonder whether the minister has now a list of the development projects which he has obtained from the United States government and about which I asked him earlier.

Mr. O'Hurley: I cannot give a complete report of it here with the papers I have before me. I should be pleased to give it in the house or the hon. member if he so desires. We have not the list with us today of this development and production. Some we obtained as an exchange of civil suppliers on the CF-104 program. Different companies are given part contracts. We have got into production sharing since about January 1, 1959. For example, we have concluded about $35 million of contracts from the United States government in production sharing since January 1. Many of them are projects that come in on this estimate. If the hon. member desires it I shall be pleased to give him the information.

Mr. Hellyer: I would appreciate receiving it some time at the minister's convenience. Will the minister agree that this portion of the program involving Canadian development of new projects is a small proportion of the amount of Canadian funds being expended in the United States for the development of military equipment?

Mr. O'Hurley: For the development of military equipment, the hon. member says. The main development of military equipment that is being done at this time is the reconfiguration of this CF-104 for the Canadian needs in Europe. As I said before, this cost is being shared with Germany, Holland, Belgium and Italy. I think it was a satisfactory arrangement for the Canadian government when we went into this arrangement. I think it was encouraging that we succeeded in getting this arrangement made. My officers tell me that the hon. member for Trinity raised this matter last year, namely that we should get co-operation from those countries in Europe in order to help in the development. We listened to that advice, and we obtained that help.

Mr. Hellyer: I am glad the minister listened to my advice but certainly not in respect of this aircraft, because I do not think it is a good aircraft for the job. I think he is having some difficulty in trying to go into production of an aircraft which is not even designed yet. I should like him to tell us about those problems.

Mr. O'Hurley: We have no problems on this design. The program is on time and we are going ahead on schedule with the production of this plane.

Mr. Hellyer: I have one final question on this item. Can the minister give us an estimate—and he probably may be reluctant to do so—as to what he expects the total dollar volume of United States purchases in Canada for defence equipment to be in the coming year to increase or decrease as compared with the year just past?

Mr. O'Hurley: It is rather difficult for defence production to give this figure. After all, we purchase when we get a demand from the Department of National Defence. We have not this facility of reading the mind of the Department of National Defence. It is therefore useless on my part to try to give a figure, as to whether it is going to be comparable to last year, until we determine what national defence will require from defence production.

Mr. McIlraith: I think the minister has correctly pointed out the difficulty that arises from time to time in dealing with the estimates of his department, namely that he does not have control over the items to be purchased. It means that a good many of these questions really have to be asked of the Department of National Defence, and there is always the difficulty of knowing, when we are considering the estimates of national defence, whether questions should be asked about the Department of Defence Production. However, there is one matter that I wish the minister would clear up. I want to quote a reference in Hansard of 1959 in order to lay the basis for my question. It will be found at page 1302, in a debate having to do with the cancellation of the Arrow contract. The sentence is this:

> The cost of the Bomarc missile to Canada, as compared to the $781 million of the CF-105, is approximately $110.8 million.

That was the statement of the Prime Minister. There has been a great deal of confusion since that statement was made. Only at this session has it been made clear that the cost of the Bomarc missile would not be anything like that amount. Another figure, I think of the order of $15 million, was subsequently given, but I think that figure of $110 million was believed to be the cost of procurement of the Bomarc missile for Canada. The point I should like the minister to clear up is this. Can he tell me how much procurement he has provided in his 1960-61 estimates for the Bomarc missile?

Mr. O'Hurley: I hope the hon. member for Ottawa West realizes that this statement by the Prime Minister just mentioned the Bomarc but of course this figure does not mean just that; it covered the SAGE system, heavy radar and the gap fillers. The figure for the Bomarc itself is something in the neighbourhood of between $12 million and $15 million. In my estimates this year there is no procurement for Bomarc at all; there is just construction this year.

Mr. McIlraith: I thank the minister for that explanation. I find as I think other hon. members have found over the last month, that there has been a great deal of misunderstanding about this item. Of course the matter being debated at the time that sentence was used was the cancellation of the Arrow contract. It was the Arrow figure that was being discussed. There was no elaboration of this sentence. I quoted it precisely and accurately. It is easy to see how, when the sentence is taken by itself, a misunderstanding arose in the public mind. It is regrettable, but I fear that it was not cleared up until this session of parliament when there was an opportunity to draw sufficient attention to it and to give the explanation that is now given to the committee.

As to the matter of production sharing, does it not come to this situation, namely that there is a long term continuing problem of great magnitude facing this country because of the rapid development of new and extremely complicated and expensive equipment as a defence requirement, and that by the very nature of things, notwithstanding the competence of our engineers and our industry—about which I agree wholeheartedly with the minister—there is the problem of development as opposed to production? Our problem in this country is in securing the participation of Canadians in development at a sufficiently early stage so that when it comes to the point of production they will be in a position to share in it.

I think that is the nub of the problem, and I think the term "production sharing", while I am not quarrelling with its practice, is sometimes an unhappy phrase to use. It seems to me too simple an expression to describe the problem. What I for my part would like to encourage the department to do is to seek to get Canadian participation at the earliest possible stage in the development of new weapons. Then we can follow up with getting all the production sharing we can at the production stage. It is really the participation at the development stage which creates the problem, because in many instances there is such abnormally high cost in relation to the ability of the taxpayers of this country to bear it, and that cost seems to be increasing as the nature of the weapons becomes more complicated.

Mr. O'Hurley: In reply to the hon. member for Ottawa West, we have in fact changed the name of our defence production sharing program and now we call it defence production and development sharing. I realized at the outset that we wanted to get in on the ground floor of the development of these projects, and I think our engineers and our companies are wide enough awake. We have been much encouraged and are now really working on the development of any new missiles or weapons which come up, especially in the electronics field. It is very complicated, but we are really getting in on the ground floor on any new project coming up.

Mr. McIlraith: I agree with the minister's remarks about the engineers in Canadian industry, and so on, but the point I wish to make is that the term "sharing" and the use of that word rather indicates that there is participation by both Canada and the United States, and that we are trying to increase our participation in something already there.

What I am trying to focus attention on is this. By the very nature of things at the developmental stage the development may start outside of this country, and I wanted the minister, in addition to pressing to the maximum the sharing in the production stage, to be ever alert to see that we have the opportunity of participating in the development stage. It is a very real problem, and I am not trying in any way to minimize the difficulties before the minister; I am trying to encourage him to be very assiduous in the job of trying to protect our interests in this regard.

Mr. Speakman: I want to ask the minister a few questions relative to Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, and I am wondering if this would be the appropriate item.

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Chairman, that is a separate item, and when we come to the item for crown companies I would be pleased to answer it. There is no vote for crown assets because there is no sum voted, but when we come to crown companies I will answer the question.

Mr. MacEwan: Mr. Chairman, I have a few words to say on the estimates of this department. I would like first of all to thank the minister and his officials for the co-operation they showed when I and some members and leaders of the industrial world in my area came to Ottawa to look into various methods and ways by which they could share in defence production in this country. They were given a fine reception by the minister and all the officials, and I want that to be put on the record.

I have heard talk here by the hon. member for Trinity about the department having no faith in Canadian industry. As far as I am concerned they have shown full faith in it. There are various firms in my constituency, including Maritime Steel and Foundries Ltd. and the Trenton plants of the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation which are well equipped to carry out various types of work for this department.

Mr. Hellyer: They are trying for orders.

Mr. MacEwan: The hon. member can make much better comments sitting down than standing up, because when he stands up he never says anything anyway. In any event, there are various plants there with machines of the latest type, including Trenton Industries Limited.

I would like to point out, further to the statement by the hon. member for Trinity that Canada is not leading in any field, that right in my own area we are co-operating with EMI-Cossor Limited in making the "fish" for the variable depth sonar for our navy on a subcontract. This is a step forward as far as naval defence is concerned and anti-submarine work. I also believe that the United Kingdom is interested in this type of equipment, and I also understand that the department is going to look into the possibility of the United Kingdom purchasing some of it. In the marine shop of the Trenton Steel Works they have been doing work on propeller shafts for destroyer escorts, and other work has also been carried out.

I believe the minister has taken the lead in promoting the idea of industry in the various parts of this country taking part in the defence production program. He has encouraged it and I know, speaking from my own experience in the maritimes and especially in my own constituency, that this policy will continue in this way, thus giving industry throughout the whole country the opportunity of taking part in various orders for his department.

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): Mr. Chairman, in connection with the department's cost sharing development program I would like to ask the minister whether this program can be applied to the production in Canada of commodities which are not strictly used in defence production. I can think of commodities which are used in shipbuilding, in post office equipment and a great many other things. Is it possible that the program can be used for that purpose?

Mr. O'Hurley: In reply to the hon. member for Lincoln, as far as we are concerned these arrangements we have made with the United States government concerning the buy American act, and so on, apply only to military equipment. I cannot give any further information than that.

Mr. Weichel: Mr. Chairman, I was very interested in the remarks of the Minister of Defence Production concerning his estimates, and I believe his efforts are very commendable. I hope continued effort will be made concerning tenders from Canadian industry in order that our workmen are continually employed. May I also say that the commendable efforts made in the past concerning foreign trade should always be given close study.

Mr. Hellyer: Just before the item carries, Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister could tell us whether he has had any more offers for Polymer, and whether his sentiments have changed any since the last time he answered a similar question in the house.

Mr. O'Hurley: That is a crown company and I will deal with it when we come to crown companies, if the hon. member does not mind.

Item agreed to.

67. Care, maintenance and custody of stand-by defence plants, buildings, machine tools and production tooling, $400,000.

Mr. McIlraith: I note that the estimate this year is $400,000 and last year it was $882,011. That is apparently a decrease of $482,000. I note also that in the supplementary estimates there is an item, No. 508, amounting to $390,000 which seems to me to be precisely the same item, so there is no real reduction in the estimate this year as compared with last year.

Would the minister explain why this method was used this year of only putting half the real estimate into the main estimates and the other half in the supplementary estimates? The minister will recall that the question was asked in the committee on defence expenditures, but the chairman declined to allow it to be answered because he said we were not free to discuss supplementary estimates.

Mr. O'Hurley: I remember the incident. After we had put in our estimates we found that our real requirement concerning one company—I do not want to give the name of the company—was established. We had engaged to give financial aid to that company if they had not sufficient work to meet certain commitments. That is, in the main, the reason for the supplementary estimate. We did not know what our full requirement would be when the estimates were first prepared.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not want the minister to tell us the name of the company, but was this a company which was getting benefits under this item last year? What made the department think the item would be less than it was last year?

Mr. O'Hurley: In 1959-60 the estimate under this vote amounted to $882,000. The expenditure amounted to $343,000. This year the estimate, together with the supplementary estimate, vote 508, will come to about $790,000. We had it in mind that last year, when there was a vote of $882,000, we did not spend the whole of that sum on account of the work done in this plant. They had work and we did not have to pay a certain amount.

Mr. McIlraith: The expenditure for last year, then, was $343,000 instead of the estimated expenditure for last year, given at page 156 of this year's estimates as $474,000. In fact we are expecting to double expenditures on this item this year.

Item agreed to.

71. To sustain technological capability in Canadian industry by supporting selected defence development programs, on terms and conditions approved by treasury board, and to authorize commitments against future years in the amount of $7,000,000, $5,000,000.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if the minister can give us any indication of the main commitments he has in mind with respect to the authorization of $7,000,000 in future commitments.

Mr. O'Hurley: The hon. member wants the commitments for future years in connection with this program?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes.

Mr. O'Hurley: The following information applies both to this year and future years.

	1960-61	Future years
ELECTRONICS
Radar (detection, identification of ECM techniques) RPS—6 radar radomes	$1,500,000	$1,000,000
Data processing, computing, display techniques	250,000	500,000
Communication (advanced techniques) 150 watt amplifier	250,000	1,000,000
	$2,000,000	$2,500,000
Communications	300,000	600,000
Navigation: doppler navigation kits	500,000	1,400,000
Fuzing	100,000	200,000
Instrumentation	300,000	300,000
	$1,200,000	$2,500,000
Long-life sonobuoy (anti-submarine warfare)	300,000	1,000,000

Our tentative proposals in the field of aeronautics have not yet received approval by treasury board. We have requests in this field for $6 million, and for future years, $8 million. However, only part of it will be spent and many of the procurements we have been talking about are not yet approved and work is still being done with regard to them in the department.

Item agreed to.

Crown companies—

72. Expenses incurred by Defence Construction (1951) Limited in procuring the construction of defence projects on behalf of the Department of National Defence and procuring the construction of such other projects as are approved by treasury board, $3,876,117.

Mr. Speakman: I was interested when the minister told us that his staff had increased, and I should like to put forward a suggestion which, incidentally, is not mine, which I think will enable the minister to effect a considerable saving and probably a reduction of staff.

This suggestion concerns the disposal of surplus equipment up to the value of $1,000. We know that government departments have responsible officials in charge, and these officials could, I think, be classed as sufficiently responsible to handle such matters as the disposal of assets in this category without the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation being involved. I should like to give an example of one instance which I think will clearly indicate the circumstances I refer to. It concerns a building which was leased by the crown over a period of years. Then a building owned by the crown was constructed. The usual procedure will be to remove the heating unit and equipment to storage where it will take up valuable storage space, or to dispose of it through the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation. There is one other method; to declare it obsolete and beyond economic repair and of no economic value, and write it off.

Returning the equipment to store would cost a minimum for crating of $15. Cartage would amount to $6. Storage at $1.80 per square foot for five years would amount to $45 and time and effort would amount to $50 or a total expenditure of $116 to preserve an article which would be declared surplus after five years and disposed of. The value of this particular item at the time of putting it into storage would perhaps be $20. I suggest that the disposal could be handled by a responsible official of the department concerned, and the money remitted to the crown by the department. This would mean a very considerable saving to the department and would perhaps eliminate some of the large staff in crown assets.

I should like to make a little further reference to crown assets, based on my own experience. I spent four years in the army in Whitehorse, and annually there was a collection of equipment that was no longer usable and no longer required. A tremendous expense was involved in having an annual sale, because at a point like Whitehorse very expensive travel is involved to bring people there for the disposal sale. It also involved very considerable expense to the prospective buyers of this equipment who, therefore, bid very low.

I suggest to the minister that this could be a method of saving time, money and people. He should cut down on these sales and allow the disposal to be done through the responsible officials of the department who are on site, who know the material and who could dispose of it perhaps at a slight profit to the government instead of, as in most cases, a very substantial loss.

Mr. More: Mr. Chairman, on this item I should like the minister to tell the committee what is the present attitude of the government with regard to the disposal of surplus United States equipment from their bases. I have had many representations on this matter. It is of great concern to my own industry. These machines, which the United States government will not allow to come back into their own business channels, are appearing on our scene in ever increasing numbers and in ever expanding areas. Can the minister make a statement on this problem? Can he tell us whether there are any taxes on these machines, and how the valuation is arrived at? In other words, what is the government's policy at the present time in regard to this matter?

Mr. O'Hurley: I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin, and they will certainly be brought to the attention of the officials. I think we have two sales, one on the Alaska highway and one at Whitehorse, each year. I will take up the matter with crown assets, and I shall speak to the hon. member about it.

With respect to the question of the hon. member for Regina City respecting the sale of United States equipment by crown assets, we have had a lot of correspondence on the matter; pressure has been put on the government, and memoranda have been submitted to me and to other ministers of the government concerning the sale of this surplus equipment, especially in Newfoundland. This question has been looked into by crown assets and myself, and we have taken note of it.

This information we think has been put out by equipment suppliers, by some Canadian manufacturers and by the Canadian contractors association. On the other hand we have small municipalities and small dealers in local communities who wish the sale of this equipment to be continued. They repair it and sell it on guarantee. Two briefs have been prepared and will be submitted to the government right after the session closes. The government will study this situation and its decision will be made known shortly.

I wish to tell the hon. member for Regina City and any other hon. members who have written to me about the disposal of United States equipment that the matter is receiving the attention of the government, and a decision will be arrived at shortly.

The hon. member for Trinity spoke to me about Polymer. Polymer is a very successful crown company which is going to have a very good year in the sale of its synthetic rubber and even in its specialty rubber, which is something new. As hon. members know, Polymer is in a competitive field. It is the duty of the minister to have, as former ministers did, a review once in a while to see what is the situation of a crown company. This review is going on at the present time and the results will be submitted to the government shortly.

I have no views as far as the future of Polymer is concerned. The company has been very successful; it is under very good management; the sales of rubber this year have been very good. Even during the difficult time of the strike last year the customers in Europe remained with Polymer after having been deprived of their rubber for some time. But the government will look into the future development and the capital expenditures and any other questions that might pertain to Polymer.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I take it from the minister's answer that the government has not yet decided whether Polymer is to be sold?

Mr. O'Hurley: No.

Mr. McIlraith: I will not, therefore, elaborate on that phase of the matter other than to say I am somewhat surprised to hear the minister say he has no views on the matter. I would hope that as the responsible minister he would have a great many views on the matter. I might think they were wrong, or I might not agree with him, but I still hope he will not persist in having no views on the matter but that he will acquire some and assert them to his colleagues successfully.

In any event, the point I want to make is that if Polymer is to be sold I hope the government will bear in mind the fact that this country is facing a problem of balance of payments that is quite severe. The adverse balance of payments last year, as the minister will well know, was of the order of some $1,400 million. Polymer Corporation has been a good earner of money; it has a very good record as a crown company, and I would hope that in any sale the minister and the government would make sure that it is not sold in such a way that the earnings of the company are drained off to another country and our balance of payments situation is further worsened by the sale of this company.

There is perhaps no purpose in elaborating a view on it unduly at this stage. I did want to draw that to the attention of the government because I think it is a matter of major importance, and because I hope that in any decision they take, if they decide to sell it, the company will be sold only to interests whereby the earnings of the company will be retained in Canada for the development of Canada. The history of the company so far has been outstanding; it is a very good story. I hope that in the years that lie ahead it will continue to be a very good Canadian story.

Mr. O'Hurley: I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member for Ottawa West. Mr. Chairman, my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce will move an amendment to item 72.

Mr. Churchill: I move, seconded by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys:

That item No. 72 be reduced in the amount of $250,000.

Mr. Hellyer: Before this item carries, could the minister tell the committee whether, with respect to the construction of the two Bomarc sites, there is any arrangement with the United States government whereby, in the event that congress should be successful in cancelling the whole program again next year, there would be any recovery on the part of the Canadian taxpayers from the United States government?

Mr. O'Hurley: I think we can depend on the arrangement which has been made that any expenses will be reimbursed pro rata.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Canadian Arsenals Limited—

73. Administration and operation, $1,349,120.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the minister say a word with respect to his view of the future of Canadian Arsenals? He noted earlier that the government now has to come to its rescue with regard to maintenance and carrying charges. I know that some of the people who work there are a little embarrassed at the seeming inactivity. Would the minister give us his views as to what the future holds in store for Canadian Arsenals?

Mr. O'Hurley: As far as the minister's position is concerned respecting Canadian Arsenals, the government will certainly maintain Canadian Arsenals and will strive to give work to the different plants. Of course, in certain plants of Canadian Arsenals we have had to reduce the number of men because we have not the same use for the material they manufacture. On the other hand, we are trying to get extra work for the plant in the production sharing field for example, Long Branch. I think Canadian Arsenals is a very capable organization. I do not see the closing of any of the plants in the near future, but some of the plants will be operating on a reduced scale. I wish to state that we are interested in keeping all the plants of Canadian Arsenals in operation for the future needs of the country.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister mentioned production sharing. Can he say whether Canadian Arsenals have obtained any production sharing contracts to date?

Mr. O'Hurley: I cannot state offhand whether they have any contracts. I know they are negotiating and working on a couple of projects at this time, but I cannot say whether they have a contract in hand. I know they are negotiating on at least two contracts. I also wish to state that it is the intention of the government to have a study made of Canadian Arsenals by management consultants, having in mind the arrangements in the different plants of Canadian Arsenals.

Mr. Hellyer: Has a group of management consultants been retained for this purpose?

Mr. O'Hurley: Not yet, because the matter has to go to the Auditor General for approval.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: That completes the estimates of the Department of Defence Production.

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the committee for their co-operation in passing my estimates. In terminating may I express my thanks to my officials, to the directors of the crown companies under my jurisdiction and to the whole staff of the department for the work they have done in the last year and since I have been the minister to whom they have to report. Now some of them can take a vacation.

Mr. McIlraith: I am sure the minister will agree that he inherited a very good department and a good set of officials when he took over the department.

LEGISLATION

The Speaker of the Senate—

175. Allowance in lieu of residence, $3,000.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member for Laurier would allow me to make a statement.

Mr. Chevrier: I was going to ask His Honour if he intended to make a statement at this stage. Perhaps the chairman would recognize me afterwards.

Mr. Speaker: Thank you. I feel very strange in this position, and I hope that the chairman will not declare me out of order immediately.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We find it strange to see you there.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say only one thing as we commence consideration of the legislation estimates, and that is to express the appreciation which I feel, and which I am sure all hon. members feel, for the staff of the House of Commons which suffers with us through these rather arduous days when we are trying to complete the work of the session. It puts no small strain upon all the officers of the house and particularly upon those who must be with us throughout the entire hours of our sittings. I do not want to mention names, but I include in my remarks the Clerk, who is responsible generally for the administration of the House of Commons staff, his assistants, the reporting staff and all the other employees of the House of Commons who serve us so well. They look forward, of course, to the compensating benefits that come from service with the House of Commons, which are real and, if they are not too long deferred, do help to compensate for the extra hours which service of this chamber calls for.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I think all of us will realize that it has been the custom and tradition over a long period of time not to consider the estimates of Mr. Speaker as contentious in any way, and certainly it is not my desire to so consider them at this time. There are, however, a few brief remarks I should like to make on behalf of those who sit on this side of the house.

First of all I wish to extend to His Honour the Speaker our thanks and our gratitude for the consideration he has given to the many representations we on this side of the house have made with respect to secretarial assistance. I should also like to let him know that even if His Honour has not always been able to meet all our requests and demands they were always received with such courtesy and such sympathetic consideration that we could not in any way feel otherwise than grateful to him for the manner in which these representations were received.

Before I go farther I should like to join with Mr. Speaker in the tribute he has paid to his officers, the officers of the House of Commons, the staff and all who are associated with our work in parliament not only during the whole of the session but more particularly toward the end. I join with him in the laudatory words he has expressed with respect to them. We know that their task is a difficult one, particularly at this stage of the session, and I personally should like to add to the list of those mentioned the bureau of translation. The translators, as Mr. Speaker knows, comprise a new group which has become a part of the staff arising out of the simultaneous translation system. Frankly, it is amazing to many of us how well and efficiently they perform their tasks.

Your Honour will remember that last year when there was a discussion of the matters that I should now like to take up, namely assistance, secretarial and otherwise, which members of parliament as a whole have, Your Honour replied that he had asked the civil service commission to prepare a report, and that they had reported at the time. Your Honour at that time put on record a paragraph from that report which I should like to quote because it is by way of preface, I assure you, to the brief remarks I intend to make. This paragraph will be found on page 6336 of Hansard for July 18, 1959:

> It is dated June, 1959, and I am reading from the summary of conclusions on page 37, as follows:
> "That the plan to provide supervised, small groups of stenographers in offices located close to the members served, and restricted to individual political parties, would be the most effective secretarial system for the House of Commons, and that such a service should include provision for telephone answering, dictation equipment and allied services."

This, of course, is an extremely important conclusion which was arrived at as a result of the survey. I was wondering whether it was not possible for Your Honour, before we dispose of the item, to give a further report on that matter. I am sure it is the wish, not only of Mr. Speaker but of all of us, that some day there will be a secretary assigned to each member of parliament, together with the additional assistance which is referred to in the report.

There is also the question of the secretaries who are without work during the period when the house is not in session. I did bring this matter to Your Honour's attention toward the close of the session last year. While it was not possible for Your Honour to meet all our requests, I again say that they were met with fairness and, I am happy to state, on the whole there was not too much hardship, although there was some during the intersessional period.

I said earlier we were happy about the arrangements which were made for the secretarial assistance during the period after the session had prorogued. However, there are still a number of young ladies and others, whose names of course I cannot assign to the record, who have had in one case 10 years service, in another case 10 years service, in a third case nine years service, in the fourth case eight years service, and in the last case three years service, and I am sure Your Honour agrees with me that those secretaries who have had years of experience and who have attained an age—I say this with deference—where it is not always easy during the intersessional period to find employment, should be given special consideration. I wonder whether Your Honour would not take the request which I make now in the spirit in which it is made.

Then there is the very important question, which I know is in Your Honour's mind, not only of secretarial assistance but of technical and research assistance as well. I need hardly remind the committee that when the house met in 1957, under the present administration, the Prime Minister had it in mind then to give some additional assistance to those of us who sit on this side of the house. He had that in mind in the light of the difficulties, the plight, and the extra work which the Prime Minister and his associates had when they sat on this side of the house.

Well, as you know, Mr. Speaker, it has not been found possible to grant this additional technical assistance. I wonder whether it is not a matter to be considered by either Mr. Speaker himself or by the commissioners of internal economy. My friend the hon. member for Ottawa West says, while it is known as the committee for internal economy, it is eternal economy which they practise. I am not going to comment on that interjection, other than to say that I know that particular committee of the house have given to this subject, and to many others, very careful consideration.

I know, too, what the views of Mr. Speaker are with reference to additional rooms for members, and I at once commend him and those who are responsible with him for the establishment of these additional rooms. I do hope the day is not far away when it will be possible to assign to each member a room, with his own secretarial assistance. I know that must be in the mind of His Honour the Speaker and those who sit on the committee that is responsible for the decisions taken with reference to the proceedings of the house.

I have no more to say, sir, other than to ask you once again to give consideration to those several cases that have already been brought to your attention, and with which I am sure you will once again deal fairly.

Mr. Winch: I should like to join with the previous speaker in utilizing this opportunity to thank the Speaker for the co-operation he has always extended to us in connection with any problems we have taken up with him. We fully realize that he has not been able to accomplish all he himself desires, but we do hope he may be able to give us this afternoon some intimation as to still greater progress that he has in mind. I am not going to repeat what has already been said by the previous speaker, but will just add my words to his hope that in the not too distant future provision is going to be made for greater secretarial and research help.

I should like to add just a new thought on the subject of secretarial help. I should like to inquire why it is not possible for the secretaries, who sometimes have to work overtime because of the responsibilities of their members, either to get paid for the overtime or allowed time off for it. I think it is rather unfair that secretaries have to be placed in the position where they either do the overtime work on a voluntary basis or the member must pay out of his own pocket. I do hope something can be arranged in that connection.

While we are mentioning the staff, Mr. Chairman, may I say that I hope Your Honour can give us some information as to whether action is going to be taken on a matter that has been raised every year for a number of years. I refer to the supplying of new and adequate accommodation for the security staff. I know Your Honour has gone into the matter several times, but the accommodation provided is a disgrace to this house as employers of the security staff. This one room has to accommodate, I think it is, 52 men. They have to change their clothes there, spend their time off there and keep their clothes there. It is where they eat. The time is long past due for them to have received adequate accommodation. I hope that with the changes the Speaker is making now, he can inform us that there will be something better for those men in the near future. I am not going to say anything more at the present time, Mr. Chairman, because I can say the other things I have in mind under the various items.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I should say what I can briefly on the subject which has been raised so considerately by the hon. member for Laurier and the hon. member for Vancouver East.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

The report to which the hon. member referred and which we discussed at this time last year was circulated in due course and was put in the hands of all hon. members, as was agreed at that time. Its relevance or the possibility of its implementation I think improves considerably now with the prospect we have for more accommodation for hon. members. Some have already been accommodated in the west block. I think it is no secret that plans are going forward which will, I hope, within the term of this parliament or in any event before long give us the objective which certainly has been mine and which I know has been that of many hon. members, namely one office for each member and the facilities which will permit each member to have one stenographer. To my mind that is a minimum service for members of this house and it has been my objective since I have put it forward and which I intend to continue to put forward in the expectation that we are nearing the point now where we can achieve that objective.

As to the stenographic staff of the house —I refer to the temporary staff or the sessional staff—it is true, as the hon. member says, it perhaps does not get compensation for the extra hours which many of them put in voluntarily and quite agreeably. I know there is no compensation for that. Those who are continuous, of course—and this consideration applies to all staffs of the house—receive holidays with pay beyond those which are the rule in the civil service and they have the advantage of shorter hours in the recess period.

But the point which was made by the hon. member for Laurier about those who have over the years given good service to this house as stenographers is one which gives me a great deal of concern and has done so as the problem arises each session. There are two considerations that must be taken into account. First, there is the service of the members during the recess and that is a basic consideration. The personnel who are selected by the whips of the parties to fill the recess quotas are selected on the basis of their usefulness to the members whom they will be serving and, as all hon. members will agree, that is a prior consideration. The other factor is the circumstances of the stenographers themselves—and seniority is one of those important circumstances as well as the personal considerations which apply in certain cases—which make it important that continuous work should be available.

As I have done in the past, I shall do everything I can to meet to the fullest degree the problem of those who have claims on the basis of seniority but are not required on the other basis which I have mentioned. A problem is created not only for the whips but for the Speaker and the Clerk in making the choice which has to be made to keep within the limit of the vote. Hon. members will note that the vote provided for only 38 stenographers, 33 actually in the category of continuous temporaries and five who are in the permanent category and therefore have status which is not subject to termination. That is a total of 38 and the division of those among the parties is one which is made by arrangement and the choice is necessarily limited by the amount of the vote. Each session we have gone beyond the authorized amount with the concurrence of the commissioners of internal economy in order to meet the kind of problem mentioned by the hon. member for Laurier. I only regret that we cannot meet all the problems and that is due to the fact that the introduction of new staff is from time to time made on all sides of the house in order to meet the problem of the special service that is required during the recess.

The other matter mentioned by the hon. member for Laurier is a larger one and I think I shall not attempt to discuss it, namely that of technical assistance for the opposition parties. The staff which is available for the Leader of the Opposition I believe compares favourably with that available in any period in the past and it is perhaps larger now than it was previously. I have not made an exact comparison but I realize that a problem exists. However, I feel it is a matter which is really beyond my jurisdiction or scope.

I have mentioned the expectation of better accommodation for the members and that consideration also applies to all of the staff. The renovation and reconstruction of the accommodation in the west block will give us an opportunity to deal with such problems as the accommodation of security staff mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver East. I am sure that with those changes we shall meet some of the things that we have been unable to do in this building because of the severe limitations that exist here on our space. I think I have dealt with all of the matters that have been raised.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask this question of His Honour, Mr. Chairman? His Honour said that the vote provides for 38 stenographers only, 35 of a permanent nature and three of a non-permanent nature, I believe. I think he said that was an improvement on last year.

Mr. Speaker: No. We went beyond the vote last year and the year before. Actually we began the recess with 44 or 45 last year in order to meet some of the problems to which the hon. member referred. But the vote has been for 38 in total for some years. This is larger actually than it was in the time of my predecessor although prior to that time there was a period when the sessional staff was larger. I think it was because of the fact that it included secretaries who served the parliamentary assistants of that time. But the estimates which are now coming before parliament for stenographers is not what had been asked for. The number is not as large as I had put forward. I asked for more. As a matter of fact, I asked for one stenographer for each member but in the circumstances it was not felt possible to accede to that vote. I also attempted to rearrange the recess staff so that the more or less permanent secretaries would be separate from the recess staff proper for service of private members which could be looked at as one unit and considered as such.

Mr. Chevrier: I thank the Speaker for his explanation but I had not completed saying what I had in mind. What I had in mind was this. While I was under the impression that there had been more, apparently it was an erroneous impression. As His Honour knows there are in the list of persons who are going to be without employment quite a number who will be in difficult circumstances through the non-sessional period notwithstanding their priority and their years of service.

What I am coming to is this. I was going to ask His Honour whether it was not possible to increase this vote. I realize that that is what happened last year and perhaps this year the expenditure will go beyond the vote, which is all to the good. Of course, I am not inviting by the statement I make a reply to the effect that perhaps we did less when we were over there; but the point now is that there is a realization that we should be doing perhaps a bit more. I wonder if before the vote which will be coming forward next session it would not be possible to find sufficient funds to look after those secretaries who, because of their years of service, eight, nine or ten years of service, will find themselves in some hardship.

I remember one case which I brought to Your Honour's attention last year where there was real hardship and Your Honour fortunately was able to do something in that case. Again the matter repeats itself this year. It is impossible to put names on the record but Your Honour knows who they are, and I again simply bring them to his attention in the hope that it will be possible to go beyond the vote sufficiently to look after the requirements of those who will find themselves in these difficult circumstances.

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to draw to the attention of Mr. Speaker a couple of items of interest to me on the administrative aspect.

My first point is that I am wondering if Mr. Speaker could give consideration—and I am not too sure whether this comes under his jurisdiction—to having a loose leaf edition of Beauchesne where it would be possible to add at the appropriate place the frequent rulings which are made? From my own brief experience in the house I notice that one of the basic difficulties is that the majority of members do not seem to know what the rules are or what the previous rulings have been, and I thought it might be of some assistance to the house if we had an up to date loose leaf edition. Because even with a book such as Beauchesne it is extremely difficult to find the correct citation very quickly. Since it was published in 1958 there have been quite a number of decisions which Mr. Speaker has made which I think would be of considerable value to the house if they were available by this loose leaf method.

The other suggestion which I have made previously is that I would be interested in seeing an electronic roll call machine installed at the earliest opportunity to speed up the processes of the house. I realize that perhaps this discussion would have been more appropriate before the special committee on rules, but since their hearings are in camera I thought perhaps I would be permitted to put my suggestion forward at this time.

Mr. Robichaud: I have a grievance I would like to raise at this time. I am not too sure if I am on the right item of the estimates, but it has to do with the condition of the typewriters supplied to members. I share an office with my colleague from Northumberland-Miramichi and we have been complaining at least ten or twelve times since the opening of the session that our machine is only good to be thrown on the scrap pile. We have not been able to get any results and I hope that before next session we will be supplied with a decent typewriter which we can use if we need it.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I might reply to those comments now.

The idea of a loose leaf edition is interesting. With changes in the rules revision would be necessary. I can say this much, with all respect to the late and learned author of Beauchesne, that I myself have found difficulty with the index and have in course of preparation an index which could be supplied to all members and which I think would be helpful in finding much good material which is there.

The typewriter question has been solved and all hon. members will have new typewriters at the beginning of next session. And I may say, at every session thereafter.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I wanted to bring something to the attention of Mr. Speaker and the committee that we have had general comment on at various times and some views expressed. It concerns the problem of the development of more research help for members of parliament, and particularly for members of the opposition. I should raise this point just in connection with the office of the Leader of the Opposition, because I know the Leader of the Opposition is hardly in a position to raise it himself and perhaps members of his party feel the same way. But I do know that the more assistance one has, whether in a formal or informal way by people with certain expert knowledge, the better is the performance possible, not only in a party sense but in an individual sense.

Mr. Chairman, I have sat in some amusement, as I am sure other members have, and have watched the little corps of assistants in the Leader of the Opposition's gallery grow in the past two years and I know they now have a small corps of people. I do not know whether some of them are covered under this particular vote, but I do know that others are being paid through other arrangements.

I would like to suggest at this time that we make greater provision for assistance of officers such as the Leader of the Opposition. It seems to me that the opposition is undermanned in relation to the expertise which is available to cabinet ministers, and the essence of our parliamentary system is that of the opposition against the minister rather than the opposition being against the ordinary members on the government side.

So far as ordinary members on the government side are concerned, I think they are to a degree in the same position as members in the opposition. I know, whether the general public knows or not, that they have no greater access to governmental expertise than we have. Or if they have it is in a limited way. I feel that both the official opposition and also the average member of parliament are short of the kind of research assistance which we need.

I would not like to try to mark off any suggestions as to how this could be done. Two years ago I said that I felt the library of parliament as a reference service was completely inadequate, especially compared with what is available in other countries. The British handle this somewhat differently than the United States. The British library is no more effective than ours in terms of resources, but the party organizations in Great Britain are much more so. Our parties have not got that tradition. But from what I can see they show very few indications that they will ever get to it. In the United States system each congressman as a congressman and each senator as a senator is given much greater provision in order to do the job as an individual representing his constituency, his region and his nation.

It seems to me that they are the two areas in which this committee should consider providing more extra knowledge and assistance in order that members can do a good job. First of all, help should be given to the offices or position of the official opposition, if you want to put it that way; second, there should be some means of helping the general membership, the ordinary membership of the House of Commons whatever the party.

It may be a poor thing to say, but what I have seen of the general framework of the library, or the committee of the house dealing with the library, has not given me much hope of our getting help from that direction, and if I may make the point bluntly as to why, it is because there is an influence on that committee by the other place, which is so traditional and, I may say, out of date, that we are not going to get from any such group a modern and up-to-date way of looking at this problem.

I think the research facilities and the assistance available to members of this house in the light of what the cabinet ministers have is very slight and I have a great deal of sympathy for every member of this house in his task of looking after his constituency responsibilities and the larger and more national one in the light of the resources he has. It is just pitiful when you think of us as having one full-time secretary with so very limited time available during which the ordinary member tries to do the best job he can. There comes a stage when diminishing returns reach such a point that he can scarcely do his task. This is much more pronounced with what is happening in this parliament with more committees meeting, and the onus of attendance in this house. If you do your duty in attending even, say, half the committees and attend the proceedings in the house for half the time, at least, you have no time to keep up with correspondence or to see that letters are framed to go after research that needs to be done not only in connection with the responsibilities of this house but also with regard to questions raised by constituents.

I think we are a living example of a cultural lag. We are in the mid-twentieth century and we are still acting in the House of Commons with regard to ourselves as if we were living in the mid-nineteenth century. One of the reasons we have this cultural lag is because the House of Commons tends to be dominated—this has nothing to do with party —by a relatively small number of people and I should like the small number of people who do dominate the house, whether they are cabinet ministers or stars of the opposition, to stop and look at the situation. Members of the Canadian parliament come from a tremendously disparate background. In the main you do not have the kind of person focussing into it as in some other parliaments. Congressmen and senators in the United States are much more educated to a full time political career. It is much more a matter of choice than it is in Canada. Similarly, in Britain there is a common educational background, and aspiration that we do not have in this country. This, to me, not only explains our cultural lag and our unwillingness to live in the mid-twentieth century in legislative terms but it underlines the extra difficulties that we have.

I have said before I have no wisdom in making great suggestions but I do feel that if the parliament of Canada is really going to adjust and be the forum which I and most other members think it should be, we are going to have to do something in this particular area and it is more than a question of just better typing facilities or better copying facilities or getting a few extra books from the Library or putting a few extra librarians on. It seems to me we need a new approach, and I think that approach should be made by a committee of this house with no association with the other place to study this whole question. I should like to see senior people and some junior people from all the parties get into some kind of group and go and see how other parts of the world are doing things.

I know it is not popular to go around complaining that an institution is senile, though I hold this view strongly. This is not a commentary on the government, but I think it is senile. I would judge from talking to a number of other hon. members that this is not a strange or odd view. I remember one businessman told me not long ago that we are not worth a heck of a lot as politicians as far as he was concerned if business was run the way parliament is run, business would go broke in a hurry. I do not buy that criticism completely but I certainly know that in the way we individually as members are geared to face the problems of the nation we should be going broke, as I believe we are.

I welcome this opportunity to express this point of view and I hope that the Speaker, who is primarily concerned with the situation, will at least give it some attention and consideration. Any small improvements that he can make—and I can definitely say he has made them and this is very much appreciated by every member—are all to the good, but I do think there is a latent crisis here which needs to be met by much greater action than this, and one of the things that must be the goal or end in sight is raising and elevating the position and prestige of the individual member of parliament whatever his party and giving him some status, some real authority in the role he could play, a role I do not think he can play at the present time.

Mr. Chevrier: There is much which has been said by the hon. member for Port Arthur with which I agree, as I indicated earlier in my reference to additional technical assistance and research help. His Honour did, however, reply that this was a matter outside his jurisdiction.

The hon. member for Port Arthur now presents this matter in another light and it may be it can be considered in that context. However, I rise to say to the hon. member that he is wrong in his assumption with reference to the Leader of the Opposition. While it is true that in the gallery which is used by those who assist the Leader of the Opposition there are more people who have joined it of late—within the last year —I should like to reassure him and tell him, so that he will know what the position is, that these are people who are assigned to those of us other than the Leader of the Opposition who sit on this side of the house, and that they are paid exclusively by members of the official opposition themselves and their salaries do not form a part of this vote or of any other vote that has to do with the Leader of the Opposition. I am sure the hon. member was not aware of that.

Mr. Fisher: I was aware of that, but I did not feel I was the one who should be bringing it out. But I did not want to leave the inference that these people were all paid under this vote. I believe I know the people who are paid under the vote and those who are not. It is all to the good. I would like to see a larger corps up there because the greater the number the better the government, in a sense.

Mr. Chevrier: Anyway there is no difference of opinion on this matter between what I have said and what the hon. member has added. It certainly was not clear from what the hon. member said. Although he may have been advised what the position was, the hon. member may have left an impression that the Leader of the Opposition was adding and adding to his staff. Such is not the case. There are three additional members who have been added during the last 12 months or, perhaps, two sessions, whose services are being paid for exclusively by those of us who sit on this side of the house.

Mr. Herridge: I wish to make a few brief remarks on this interesting item, an item which could be the cause of considerable debate, if we had plenty of time and opportunity. I fully appreciate the feelings of the hon. member for Port Arthur with regard to the situation in which members of parliament find themselves, although I do not take quite such a dim view with regard to the senility of this institution. I take an interest in this subject and I have been reading the proceedings of the committees which have been set up by the United Kingdom parliament to study procedure.

I find that this institution was becoming senile in Great Britain in 1860; frequent references were made to the disabilities that the institution suffers from and predictions were made as to how long it would function, and so on. But we must remember that parliament is an evolving institution which has to change its practices and its procedures to meet the changing circumstances in the country which are reflected in the work of the house. I remember reading some minutes of committees on procedure in which Mr. Campbell Bannerman expressed his views, and Mr. Asquith, later Lord Oxford, gave his views; Mr. Baldwin gave his views, and prominent members of the labour party gave their views. Mr. Chamberlain gave his views; Mr. Churchill gave his views, and Mr. Attlee and Mr. Bevin gave their views. All through the years of British history we find this recurrent concern over the efficient functioning of parliament, and rightly so, because from time to time changes have to be made to meet the circumstances under which parliament is functioning.

The criticism that we in this group have primarily is of those who refuse to make the changes which are required for parliament to operate efficiently under circumstances that change almost from day to day. As a matter of fact, in reading the history of the debates and of the committees in the British house particularly, one for which I have a particular affection—I think one rather finds inspiration than disappointment. One realizes that 50 years, 60 years, 75 years or 100 years ago parliament suffered the same concern and the same type of problem that we suffer from today, facing rapidly changing conditions. But the main point is this: with all the impact upon parliament because of the entirely changed society today from that which existed when parliamentary institutions were first established as far as British countries are concerned, parliament is stronger than ever, and that is the test. That is all I wish to say with respect to general remarks on the parliamentary situation.

I do wish to say a word or two, while I have the opportunity, about the staff, because the staff functions here day after day, week after week and month after month, with possibly a good many people failing to realize that this whole process would come to a halt without the co-operation of a considerable number of persons who perform their duties responsibly from day to day. I think of the protective staff and the work they undertake day by day in assisting in the efficient operation of our parliament; the elevator staff, the public works staff around the building generally; the messengers, some of them quite on in years, whose duties on occasion take them many blocks around the city of Ottawa, meeting the requirements of members and so on; the page boys and the staff in general.

I also wish to make a reference to the Hansard staff who work under a particular strain during these lengthened hours. Speaking of the Hansard reporters and of the ladies —I always refer to them as the Hansard angels—who are required to work long hours and stay a considerable time after the house adjourns in the evening, sometimes until after midnight and later, in order to make certain that they have all the quotations and things of that sort that certain members have used in making speeches, I do trust, Mr. Chairman, that the members of the staff I have referred to, including the secretaries and all who are connected with this house, receive the increases in salaries that they are entitled to in relation to the increases received by other sections of the government service.

Now, again with respect to the Hansard staff, the reporters and the ladies in question, I feel that when one works the hours they work and at the salaries they receive at the present time one must realize they are underpaid, greatly underpaid, and I do suggest there should be some arrangement made to compensate those faithful people in a financial way for the unduly long hours they have had to endure in recent weeks and for the valuable service they have rendered by making it possible for parliament to continue to function for such long hours. Just imagine if they all fell ill what a state of affairs we would be in in so far as the operation of this house is concerned.

In conclusion I come back to the theme that has been repeated over and over again by members of this group, and simply say that this state of affairs will not be remedied until we are willing to make changes to meet the changing circumstances of our lives and society today and so organize our sessions that we come here in January and continue until possibly the 15th of June, or the end of June, and then recess until the 1st of October and accept some planning. I see the hon. member for Greenwood shakes his head as though he were in disagreement with me; if so, I should like him to rise and give his reasons. I have given my views; I wish he would give his reasons and other hon. members would do the same who are opposed to a recess in the summer. We in this group believe it would make it possible for the staff and members of parliament to carry on more efficiently, and also it would represent some fair consideration for the members of the staff whose holidays with their children in many instances are completely upset at the present time by our unorganized and unplanned parliamentary habits.

Mr. Legere: Mr. Chairman the reason for my rising today is one of gratitude which I should like to express for the service I have received. In doing so, I refer to the page boys. Their service has been given with a smile. They are to be commended for their forbearance in being sent here, there and everywhere, for a drink of water when you want it, for your mail when you want it, and so on. This sense of gratitude has caused me some concern also for their education. I have been told that these children or young boys have in the main about three half days education during the week when we sit at eleven o'clock in the morning. I should like to ask the Speaker to consider whether it would not be possible in the future to see that these children are given the same advantages through a tutor or a professor as those who are fortunate enough to be able to attend public school. I think we would be rendering a service to these children that would be most beneficial. Since I am the father of children myself I realize fully the importance of education. Therefore, I do not hesitate at this time to make this appeal on behalf of those who have rendered, and always render, this service with a smile.

Mr. Macdonnell: Very often in rising one says he had not intended to speak, and I do not suppose that in 1 per cent of the cases it is believed, but possibly I shall be believed at this time, and particularly by the hon. member who interpreted the movement of my head in a way to suit him. It is quite true that I have been strongly against the proposal for two sessions a year, and for one very simple reason. To me it is clear—indeed, I believe this is admitted by those who advocate it—that it really means that to all intents and purposes we become professionals. At any rate, I was discussing this proposal the other day with some people who advocate it and they agreed. I think that can be taken as true and I take it as true.

I simply wish to say that would cut at the very root of the idea of parliamentary government. My idea of parliament is that it should be composed of people who have achieved some position in the community—I do not necessarily mean in a money way—people who have done some service of some kind in business or otherwise and who therefore have something to contribute when they come to this house. If members of parliament become sheer professionals I believe we will lose a lot and parliament will be composed more and more of people who come here to make a living.

Mr. Pickersgill: As another enthusiastic amateur like the hon. member for Greenwood, I should like to echo and endorse what he has just said.

Mr. Macdonnell: May I say it is worth while to have spoken when my words are greeted with such an endorsement.

Mr. Herridge: To reply briefly to the hon. gentleman, with whom I am often in such complete agreement on matters of principles related to parliament, I cannot understand why a person becomes a professional if eight months or seven months are divided in two and part of the session is held before a holiday and part after. I cannot quite see the logic of his argument.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, one of our respected members, the hon. member for Mackenzie River, has suffered serious damage to his health. I am very sorry that this is so. He is a personal friend of mine but he is also a valuable member of the house and I think part of his trouble is related to the inadequate expense allowance for those in outlying constituencies. He is not a member of our party, as hon. members know, but I know him personally. He has given of his time and of his health to the north country in no uncertain fashion. He knows his constituency because at great expense to himself and danger to his health he travels widely throughout the constituency. He could not possibly pay his way on $2,000 a year.

I think it is high time we reviewed the whole subject, particularly so far as our undeveloped areas are concerned. His railroad pass is absolutely useless to him. There are no railways in his district. We are going to improve that situation somewhat in the near future, but I know personally that at the present time he is unable to meet the expenses involved.

The hon. member's remarks about the mounted police were very timely. I have a letter in my pocket from an ex-commissioner of the mounted police commending the hon. member for Mackenzie River for his very comprehensive remarks in this regard. The long sessions we are having exaggerate the situation. The result is that he only has a very short period, September and October, when he can travel throughout his constituency. He has to fly wherever he goes, and anyone who hires an aircraft for personal reasons in the north country knows that the hon. member could not make more than one short trip down the Mackenzie for $2,000.

I cannot ignore this opportunity to bring before those responsible the urgent necessity of looking into this matter. It affects others besides the hon. member for Mackenzie River, of course, but I have used him as an example because in my opinion he has suffered physical damage in the service of his country. I should like to see serious consideration given to reviewing expenses in general and the expenses of the hon. member for Mackenzie River in particular.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make some detailed references covering a number of votes and perhaps I should do so at this time. I have never been able to understand why the highest officer of parliament, Mr. Speaker, should receive an allowance less than that of even the smallest cabinet minister. When I say "smallest" cabinet minister I mean one who is in charge of a not very onerous department of government. If we had greater respect for parliament I believe we would ensure that the highest officer of parliament received remuneration or compensation, call it what you like, more in line with the dignity of his office.

I should also like to refer to the plea I made a number of years ago on behalf of the deputy chairman of committees. I believe we are doing a wrong to him because in effect the Speaker, the Deputy Speaker and the deputy chairman of committees have year round employment. When the House of Commons is not sitting they are actively engaged in preparation for the next session of parliament involving research work and many other responsibilities of their offices. To pay the deputy chairman of committees only an additional $2,000 a year is in my opinion most inadequate. I would not be adverse to increasing the remuneration of the Deputy Speaker, but I feel very keenly that the dignity of the office of Mr. Speaker demands that he receive at least as much as a cabinet minister and I believe we are doing a continuing injustice to the deputy chairman of committees.

In addition, I endorse most happily the views expressed by my colleague, the hon. member for Kootenay West. Over the years, both in the former parliament and in this one, I have been one of the harshest critics of government policy. However, I believe that I take second place to no one in my love for the institution of parliament. I believe it will be a sad day for us when we permit our institution of government to be governed by the experts. In one large area of the world there is a government where in effect the experts or scientists rule the nation. In Hitler's time we had another nation ruled by so-called scientists and experts.

The House of Commons is the place of the people. This is the place where the people speak. After having known many members of parliament it is my belief that they are as good or as bad as most Canadians, and on the whole it is my conviction they are on a higher level than the average Canadian elector. If there is something radically wrong with the institution of parliament or the members who compose parliament, it is my opinion there is something radically wrong with the Canadian electorate because I am convinced that we in this chamber are no more and no less than the people of Canada as a whole.

I do not like politicians and newspapermen making reputations for themselves by attacking fundamentally and basically one of the most sacred human institutions we have. I readily admit that changes and reforms are necessary. We do have a committee to consider our procedure and I am sure that such a committee should continue to work continuously in order to ensure that parliament adequately represents the people, not the government. Parliament was never intended to represent the government, it was intended to allow the people's voice to be heard in the presence of the government. We, I believe, must be continuously on the alert for ways and means for making it a more effective institution of the people. I do not like the inference that those who may be elected to this house do not deserve to be here. I have a tremendous respect for the right of the people to send here whoever they please.

Mr. McGee: I should like to interject briefly in this debate to comment on the action taken by Mr. Speaker during the past session as a result of recommendations made at this time last year, and I am sure in years before, particularly with regard to the appointment of extra guides to conduct people around the building and in extending the visiting hours. I have a few suggestions to make, one of which will save some money and the other of which might cost a little money, but I believe both would accomplish something.

First, I should like to refer to the documents that are placed at the seats of members of parliament. I notice behind me I have two French speaking members, and there is hardly room for them to get into their seats because of the pile of documents. Most other desks, at this stage of the session, are fairly full of bulky documents. My seatmate and I decided this year to experiment by eliminating one set of documents. I do not know if we have any other advantages over other members in the house, but at least we have a great deal more leg room and I suspect a more tidy desk. As I say, if all other sets of double desks were furnished with one set of commons bills, Hansard, Senate reports, and so on, I think that would be one way of saving a bit of money.

The other suggestion concerns what goes on in this chamber and in the building after the house prorogues. I have voiced this suggestion to Mr. Speaker earlier this year, but I should like to repeat it publicly now. It concerns something in addition to the information provided by the guides on the workings of the House of Commons. I believe the Speaker of the House of Commons has a copy of the film entitled "The Sceptre and the Mace", which deals with the opening of parliament and contains educational information on how we go about accomplishing things in the House of Commons and the Senate. It is my suggestion that when the house is in recess this film "The Sceptre and the Mace" might be shown at frequent intervals during the day, possibly in the railway committee room or some other appropriate place in the building, so that visitors and tourists, particularly Canadians who are visiting Ottawa in increasing numbers every summer, can get a vivid and clear picture of the working of parliament, even though parliament may not be in session.

Another suggestion which I should like to make at this point is related to a practice followed in Great Britain. I think there might be some fairly obvious point in the main lobby of the building at which some visual indication could be given of what is going on in the house, just what part of the proceedings we are dealing with, and so on. I do not know whether we would go as far as I am told they do in the United Kingdom, that is to indicate who is speaking at any particular time. However, this would provide some visual indication to the casual or serious visitor to this building concerning what is happening in the house.

I should like to agree with the suggestions that have been made here today, and at other times, concerning the desirability of providing an adequate allowance so that the first commoner could adequately represent us without going broke in the process. It seems to me there has been hardly a week go by when I have been on my way into the chamber that I have not observed our first commoner entertaining visitors on our behalf. I think it is important that he should be given an adequate allowance to cover these fundamental and necessary expenses.

I should like to offer another suggestion which concerns the position in order of precedence which our Speaker occupies. I am given to understand that we are almost unique in that we place our Speaker somewhat farther down the ladder than is the practice in many other legislatures within and without the commonwealth. I feel this is something that might be re-examined, and I would be very much in favour of placing our first commoner as high in the social spectrum as it is possible for him to be.

Mr. Carter: I had intended to defer my remarks until we reached item 183. However, in view of the fact that I am going to ask for some information perhaps it would be more convenient if I put the question now, thus affording His Honour a little more time to answer it when we reach that particular item. Before I go further, I should like to associate myself with those who have paid tribute to the fine work and the devoted efforts of our staff in this House of Commons. I am sure we all appreciate very much the services that they are giving to us. I quite agree with the hon. member for Kootenay West that, in view of the long hours they are putting in, they are very much underpaid. I agree also with the remarks of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam that the salary of Mr. Speaker himself is quite inadequate. I have been searching through the estimates to find under what item His Honour gets an allowance for entertainment. I have an impression that in view of present-day costs, that item, too, must be quite insufficient.

The hon. member for Athabasca referred to certain members whose expense allowance did not meet their costs incurred in travelling around their ridings and, therefore, they had to pay those costs out of their indemnity. I am sure that we would not want Mr. Speaker to be placed in that same position where he would have to finance the expenses incurred by entertaining so many important delegations who are calling here, and who should be entertained on behalf of us all.

The question I wanted to put to His Honour has to do with the salaries of the staffs. The question was touched upon by the hon. member for Kootenay West when he referred to the recent increases in civil service salaries. I should like to know how many of the staff have already received the benefit of that recent increase, and whether the total estimate under item 183 has made provision for the increase.

(Translation):

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, for two sessions now we have had in this house the experience of simultaneous interpretation, and I think everyone has found it satisfactory. The system has been of great value and has enabled many members to understand speeches made in the other official language.

However, Mr. Chairman, the sessional work is not done exclusively in the House of Commons. I would therefore suggest that the simultaneous interpretation system be extended to the committees, that is to say in two or three rooms where the main committees of the house hold their meetings.

It was said at one point that French speaking members from the province of Quebec did not take an active part in the work of the committees. I do not agree with that statement, but I would say that, even if it were true, there might be a reason for it. When a member who is called upon to put his views before a committee and does as responsible a job as he can only to realize that his audience does not understand him, and that quite often even the chairman of the committee does not understand, it is an unpleasant experience; indeed, it is a bit discouraging for one who has taken the trouble to study a particular subject.

I think if that system were established in a few committee rooms, or perhaps on a trial basis in one of the committee rooms every hon. member would be in a position to make a more efficient contribution to the work which is being done in the committees.

Mr. Regnier: Mr. Chairman, I want to support the suggestion made by the hon. member who just resumed his seat, that the simultaneous interpretation system be extended to the discussions of some of the committees of the house. I have often noticed that French speaking members did not take part in committee debates just because of the absence of a simultaneous interpretation system. Moreover, as a rule, the chairman of the committee is English speaking and does not understand French. It therefore becomes almost impossible for hon. members from the province of Quebec to take part in committee discussions. That is probably one of the reasons for the absence of French speaking members on some committees because, if they use French, they are not understood. If, on the other hand, they attempt to use English, they often risk expressing their ideas in a form which does not exactly represent what they have in mind.

I also wanted to associate myself with those who complained about the altogether too low salary being paid the Speaker of the house. The Speaker's task is a very difficult one; he has to be present in the house and I would say that it is, in fact, he who directs parliament. In my view, his salary should at least be equal to a minister's.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have found too that there is a certain inequality in the salaries paid to some of the staff.

For instance, I note that in the parliamentary library, the French assistant librarian is paid only $7,500 a year, whereas the salary of the English speaking assistant librarian is $8,580.

On the other hand, I notice that the salary of the editor of the English section of the Debates is $9,060, whereas the editor of the French section gets $8,580.

In the Journals division, I see that the head of the English section gets $9,060 a year, whereas the chief of the French section receives $8,220 only. Moreover, in the same division, the salary of the assistant chief of the English section is $7,500, and that of the assistant chief of the French section is paid only $6,660.

I cannot admit such a difference between the salaries of English speaking and French speaking members of the House of Commons staff.

Mr. Chairman, during three and a half days we dealt with human rights and the elimination of all discrimination with regard to language, religion or race. Yet, there seems to be some discrimination in the House of Commons, as the salaries are not the same for identical work, because, after all, it is probably more difficult for French speaking employees to accomplish the work required of them.

I am therefore of the opinion that it is time that such a situation be corrected.

(Text):

Mr. McCleave: I shall be brief, Mr. Chairman. I want to make two points only. The first is with reference to the speech made by the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet. I would suggest to Mr. Speaker for his consideration that the simultaneous translation system, if it is extended, should first be extended to the seats in this particular chamber for the audience. I give this fact to the house merely by way of illustration. Any time when debate is in English, they might look around the chamber and note how many of the French speaking deputies now need to use the simultaneous translation here in order to understand the words in English. The plain fact is that all our confreres from Quebec are adept, as they always have been, to quickly pick up the use of the English language. I suggest that priority should be first for the spectators in the galleries before extension of the translation system to other parts of the house and then to one or two committee rooms, perhaps as a start.

The other reference I should like to make comes from a remark made by the hon. member for Port Arthur, in dealing with what he called the cultural lag in the institution of parliament. I think that his argument and particularly an article he wrote for a national magazine have been rather effectively met by his confrere, namely the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. But if that be not the case, I certainly want to challenge the remarks of the hon. member for Port Arthur with regard to parliament being in a cultural lag. This, of course, is a term or phrase that has popular usage among the social scientists. It indicates a feeling on the part of those who use this argument that parliament should be as bright and shiny as next year's model car with souped up horsepower, covered with chrome and completely geared for all the vicissitudes of life in the twentieth century.

My own attitude toward parliament is this. May I say that I have been here no longer than has the hon. member for Port Arthur and I certainly would not want to press my young and presumptuous views on the House of Commons. I think any good hard look at our system comes best from members like the hon. member for Greenwood, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate or others who have been here a great deal longer than we have. We are still junior leaguers.

However, my idea is that the people are quite content to have an institution that has about it a faint odour of moth balls, one that does not show signs of becoming a factory with modern and swift assembly lines and the use of automation. I think they prefer parliament to be perhaps a little bit slower than the fast pace of the twentieth century.

After all, the House of Commons is a place for meditation and reflection. I certainly decry the suggestion that our institution is behind the times from a cultural or any other point of view.

Mr. Peters: I should like to say something on this matter also. It seems to me that we have had probably two extremes and I am not in favour of either one. I think this parliament of ours does not function as well as it might function. I do not think it functions as well as most of the members think it can function. I think we are being silly to stand on tradition and say, "Let us not make a change because it is a change". I think we should consider those changes that are necessary and that all hon. members agree are necessary. This is one place in which there should be no government and no opposition. The members themselves should be free to agree on what changes will make this parliament much more efficient.

I have been satisfied with the operation of this particular department in the past year. We have received courteous consideration. But I should like to make a plea which I am sure Mr. Speaker would also like to make, namely a plea for more money to do the things that should be done particularly in relation to the staff. I am sure the public does not know that the staffs, having regard to their overtime, in the main are not getting paid at all for the work they have to do. That statement applies to the Hansard reporters, the Hansard staff and all the people concerned, not only those in front of the committee but those in the back rooms who never come to the attention of the public. These people are working till one and two o'clock in the morning in order to get the work done so that parliament will function. Their job does not call for them to work until one or two in the morning; they should be finished by 11 or 12. This is a hardship being imposed on them which we have not been able to do anything about because money has not been made available to take into consideration these things.

I should like to ask another question. In the Senate they have an internal economy committee. I did not know who composed it or what its function was because I was not involved and therefore can plead ignorance because it did not affect me personally. But in the Senate they have already made their fourteenth public report and it is reported in Hansard. They have gone into the changes which have been made with regard to the salaries of the people involved and with regard to some of the people who have been promoted. It would seem to me that they should follow us, because after all we make the arrangements for the money which they spend and they have spent the money before we have spent it on our own people. I would like to see this internal economy committee report to the House of Commons in the same way as it reports to the other place.

In their report they state the class of employees concerned. They do not name the people by name but they state how much they get and this keeps them in a pretty open and well understood position so that members of the Senate if they wish, and they did wish in this case, can discuss specific classifications and receive information which is very difficult to receive in the House of Commons.

I think there should be closer liaison between the two internal economy committees so that members of one house do not receive increases before they do in the other and so that increases are kept on a fairly equal basis so that friction does not develop between the two groups of employees.

It would seem to me that some of the changes we could make would bring up to date the advances which are necessary for modern way of living. Many of the members themselves have bought photostat equipment, copying equipment, and some of us have reproduction machines of our own. It seems to me we should give some consideration to the recommendations made a year ago by the consultant from the civil service who recommended quite a number of changes, some of them not acceptable to the House of Commons but some of them very acceptable.

I am pleased to note that Mr. Speaker has given consideration to some of them and that new typewriters are forthcoming next session, because some of the typewriters which we have are museum pieces and I am sure the national museum would be happy to have them. Some of them could never be used economically in a business office because they just are not in good enough shape. The money spent on repairs must be greater than the money the machines originally cost. I would also think that we could put in a number of dictating machines. These are quite costly but they could be attached to a pool where they could be loaned out on a limited basis. They could be kept for only a limited time and one dictating machine would probably do quite a number of members and would be of valuable use, particularly at the end of the session.

I might say I do not need a secretary at this time of year because it is impossible to be in my office and attend committee meetings and the house. I cannot attend all the committee meetings I am supposed to and I cannot be in the house the length of time I am supposed to, and certainly the place you neglect is your office and your correspondence.

It seems to me that this brings up the major problem with which we are faced. In the first part of the session you have lots of time to decide the things we are going to do during the session, the committees to which you would like to give consideration, time for research, and so on. Then when the session is part way through and the committees are set up you are no longer in a position to do that work because the committees are meeting at an accelerated pace and the house is meeting at the same time. Surely we are adult enough in this country for members to sit down and decide to make better use of our time and facilities.

I met a lawyer the other day and he said to me, "Why is it you people are so stupid? We in the legal profession do not work in the afternoons anymore, it is too hot and you cannot get any work done".

An hon. Member: He must have been a C.C.F. lawyer.

Mr. Peters: No, he was not; he was one of the rankest capitalists I ever talked to. He is not a personal friend of mine but an acquaintance, but even he was of the opinion that this was certainly not an economical way to do business, that we should go home for the summer, come back in the fall and carry on with whatever business is required.

Mr. Chairman, I violently disagree with the argument being used that you have to be old and rich to be a member of parliament. If we have to depend on decaying members of society to run our country just because they have the means whereby they can afford to support themselves, then this will be a fine state of affairs. You will not find businesses which are going ahead and expanding and in competition with other businesses hiring old men who can afford to work for nothing. They hire young men and are willing to pay them, as they sure work them when they get them, and when they get to 40 or 50 years of age they shove them out, and perhaps they run for parliament. This does not seem to me to be a good way of doing things.

Mr. Chairman, I ask you to look around this House of Commons. You will find many young people here who have to buy homes in their own areas, because after all this is a temporary occupation. Nobody can say that he will be here tomorrow or a year from now. This is not the Senate. We have to go back to the people, and all sorts of factors have to be taken into consideration. It seems to me that there is a tendency for young people to take part in politics these days, which is a good thing; but we have to change our way of doing things. I think you will be surprised to find how many members have children who are even going to public school. If you compare this situation with 25 or even ten years ago, you will find that the number of young people has increased very greatly.

This means that we should as members of parliament sit down and decide what we are going to do about this matter of hours. There is no better place to do that than in a committee under the guidance of Mr. Speaker, who is impartial. I think we should all reach the conclusion that we would come back here and do the work before us as rapidly as possible and then, if it was not possible to complete it at the end of June, agree to come back in the fall to complete that work. Surely it would not be necessary to repeat everything we had said in the spring—

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Peters: We could go on with the business in an orderly fashion. If there was an exchange of ideas between members of all parties I am sure we would find that an arrangement of this kind could be arrived at.

Another problem we face is the problem of offices. I am sure this is receiving consideration. A number of members have been asked to move into other accommodation and I would humbly submit that this is not a good idea. Those hon. members should be in the House of Commons close to the seat of business, which is this chamber, and the committee rooms. If anybody has to move—and I think somebody does—I suggest it should be some of the senators who have time and who have no pressure of business. If they have to move to the west block or to the east block or even further down town I shall be happy to make a contribution towards their expenses in travelling up here or going through the underground tunnel which, apparently, is to be constructed.

Another subject I should like to raise concerns radio facilities in the House of Commons. I had the privilege last year of attending the United Nations and I was very surprised and pleased with the facilities which have been installed there. There are four or five studios there and every morning these studios are being used by representatives of the various delegations. There are facilities for making live radio broadcasts or recorded radio broadcasts. These facilities are free and available to all delegates. I think this is something which we should consider. I am one of those members who use the Report from Parliament Hill which is a facility of the press. We are pleased with that. We think it is an asset. But in the last two or three weeks every time a radio broadcast has to be made I have had some important committee to attend or an obligation to be present in the house. It would appear to me we have now reached the stage when radio and television facilities should be supplied in the House of Commons and it should be done on a formal basis. We all know that there is at the present time a small radio station in the House of Commons, but this is a private set-up. I think it is a good thing, and it speaks well for the enterprise of some of the press and some of the radio stations, but it is not under the jurisdiction of the House of Commons.

Another problem I should like to raise—and this seems the time to raise it—is the matter of the committee rooms themselves. I have always been very disturbed by the meetings which are held in the railway committee room. I do not know if members of parliament 30 years ago had better lungs than members who sit here now, but at every meeting I have attended in the railway committee room there is always a continual request by members of that committee for the members who are speaking to speak up because nobody can hear them. I suggest that some consideration be given to improving the acoustics of that room whether by putting drapes over the windows or installing an address system. Some attention should be given to this room because the acoustics are worse there than they are in any other room or section of this building.

In closing I should like to raise one other problem. I think the hon. member for Mackenzie River has been mentioned, and the fact that he has suffered a serious illness. This reminds me that we have a higher mortality rate in the House of Commons than exists even in the Senate where the average age would be 20 or 30 years greater. In the last three years a great number of our colleagues have passed on. It has been suggested that those members who have been here for a long time should be in a position to make provision for their dependents but that is not true with regard to all members of parliament. I believe that when the pension plan for members was put into effect more consideration should have been given to the position of survivors and to placing the widow of a deceased member in a much better position. I highly recommend the method which was adopted—I am not suggesting it was for financial reasons—by the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas who ran for office and came here herself. That certainly is one solution, but I think it would be of more general benefit if we were to put better protection into the plan which members of the house now have and I would ask that consideration be given to this as soon as possible.

I should like to make one reference to the press gallery. I have always been surprised when I walk into the press gallery to see the number of people who crowd into that small space. I have had the opportunity a number of times of reading the sections of the Ontario factory act which prevent people from being crowded into too small a space. I think we are treating these people in a way which we would not allow people in a factory or some similar place to be treated; we are cramming 50 or 60 people into a space which would supply offices only for three or four members, and when we move the senators into another building, which should be in the near future, the opportunity should be taken of expanding the space available for these members of the fourth estate.

(Translation):

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to delay the estimates of the hon. Speaker of the house (Mr. Michener); however, I should like to take a few minutes of his time to make some brief remarks.

In the first place, even though others have already expressed appreciation to the staff of the house, I should like to do the same, and to voice my own appreciation to staff members.

I also wish to endorse the views of the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee) in asking the hon. Speaker of the house that the simultaneous interpretation system be extended to the galleries, so that both French speaking and English speaking visitors to the galleries may find it more convenient to follow the proceedings.

I also wish to make a suggestion which I think would improve the Parliamentary Guide.

If, for instance, the biographical sketches of every present member of the Senate and of the House of Commons, carried a small inset photograph, I think it would improve that publication and, at the same time, it would be helpful to us in identifying those with whom we work.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I just want to take this opportunity to support the hon. members who have suggested that the simultaneous interpretation system be extended to every committee of the house. If the system is not installed at the next session, I would now ask the hon. Speaker of the house to do what has been done this year, namely have interpreters in all committees, so that members may take a more active part in the proceedings.

Item agreed to.

181. Subscriptions to publications of the commonwealth parliamentary association to be distributed to members of the House of Commons, and to provide for the Canadian share of expenses of the commonwealth parliamentary association, $11,000.

Mr. Winch: I should like to say a few words on this vote. During the past several months there have been a number of distinguished visitors to our capital city. Perhaps the two most prominent were the prime minister of Australia and the premier of Northern Nigeria. I was most interested in the remarks of those two world statesmen when they addressed the members at the Speaker's luncheon in their honour. Both of them emphasized the importance of the work of the commonwealth parliamentary association, and they both expressed the view that that organization of parliamentarians of the British commonwealth had perhaps a greater potentiality in the furtherance of freedom and democracy and in solving the urgent problem of these days than any other organization. I agree with all the vehemence, energy and understanding that I have with these sentiments. It is because of the work that I have seen the association undertaking in the past few years, but in particular in the past few months, that I am vastly disappointed to find in the estimates this year the sum of only $11,000 for the furtherance of the work of the commonwealth parliamentary association. It may be said that $11,000 is quite a bit of money for the Canada branch; but I am concerned with the fact that $8,000 of that is to go to the headquarters in London for the purchase of publications; only $3,000 is available for the work of the Canadian branch.

There has been a great increase—and I think a great deal of the thanks for the increase in the interest in the work in Canada must go to Mr. Speaker who has been applying himself so thoroughly and intensely to the work of the organization—in the interest in the work of the parliamentary association; but its potentialities are increasing, and Canada is not able to take advantage of the invitations that are issued and is not able itself to issue the invitations in the numbers that I feel the Canada branch should be doing.

There is a regional conference in Malaya this year and Canada has been invited to send an observer. Canada will not have an observer there because we have not any money. Invitations come from other parts of the world, and especially from the United Kingdom, to parliamentarians from Canada to go over for certain special studies. We have not got the money. Recently, a regional conference was held in the West Indies at which we were represented. I have heard from all sections of this house and from the West Indies how much they would appreciate the opportunity of attending a conference in Canada, but this Canada branch association has not got the money.

In these days of conflict and misunderstanding I feel certain, as a result of the honour that was given me last year of being able to make a trip to Australia and, of course, to visit Indonesia, Singapore, Pakistan and Israel, that the greatest need of today is for the peoples of the world to know each other better and to know each other's country better. If we only did that we would go a long way toward resolving the difficulties, the problems and the misunderstandings of the present day.

I join with the prime minister of Australia and the premier of Northern Nigeria—and I think I am safe in saying I express the point of view of the Speaker—in saying that great as has been the contribution of the parliamentary association in the past it can be of even greater use and serve a greater purpose in the future, but that means that more money has to be available for the work of the commonwealth parliamentary association.

Instead of having only $3,000 available to the Canadian branch in the next 12 months and only $8,000 as our contribution to the United Kingdom headquarters, we should have $100,000 in this estimate. As an absolute minimum I say there should be not less than $50,000 in this estimate. I sincerely hope that the Speaker can say a few words on the work of the association and on his admiration for it. I hope he can give us some indication of his being able to approach the treasury benches for some more money.

May I also point out it was the unanimous feeling and decision at the biennial conference in Australia last year that the conference should be held every year and not every two years. There is a need for that. Unfortunately under the old system is has to be a host country that can afford all the expenses of putting on the conference. Therefore, the suggestion was made that all the governments be approached with the idea of holding the conference annually but instead of the host country having to put up all the expenses there should be annual grants by the governments to the association so that the association could pay the expenses of the conference. If my memory serves me correctly, the estimate for Canada will be approximately $24,000 annually. On that basis, sir, I think it would be one of the finest investments that this parliament could possibly make.

I did want to make these few remarks not only in support but in appreciation of the work of the commonwealth parliamentary association, in its regional meetings or in its world meetings to express the hope that we can get more money for this most worthy cause and advance the commonwealth parliamentary association as a still greater instrument for freedom and for peace.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to take the time of the committee by repeating what has already been said, but I do want to indicate my support of the remarks just made by the hon. member for Vancouver East. He has made a good case and described in detail why this item should be increased. I might say that his arguments apply equally well to the following item which has to do with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Without going into further detail, I want to indicate my support for an increase in both of these items.

Mr. Southam: Mr. Chairman, it is not often that I find myself in accord with the principles expounded by my good friend and colleague from Vancouver East, but I should like to take a few moments to reiterate and agree with the remarks he has made, and also my colleague from Burin-Burgeo. I am one of the newer members of the house and it has been an honour and a privilege for me to be an active member of the commonwealth parliamentary association during my tenure here. May I also say it has been a special honour for me to be the executive member of that body for my great province of Saskatchewan. By virtue of this experience, I have worked in close association with the commonwealth parliamentary association and also with the NATO parliamentary association in the house here. I feel they are doing very important work. Because of the fact that Canada has taken such an active part in world affairs, especially since the last world war, we are beginning to realize more than ever that we are not independent but are becoming interdependent and our friendly relationships with other countries are gaining a wide importance in world affairs.

I think our commonwealth parliamentary association is taking an active part in the cementing of good international public relations. It was brought to our attention during the recent annual meeting of the association that our limited resources were cramping the work of the association. I should like to support the suggestion made this afternoon to increase the appropriation for this very worthwhile work. Instead of having to try to get along with an inadequate amount of $11,000, I think the amount should be increased to $50,000 or $75,000. In my view the money would be well spent and would be one of the best investments that we as Canadians could make.

His Honour the Speaker pointed out the other morning that we had as visitors in the gallery two members of the commonwealth parliamentary association from Australia. As a member of the committee, and in association with the hon. member for Vancouver East and other members, I have had the pleasure of helping to entertain these gentlemen during the last couple of days. In the course of our association they paid particular tribute to the visit made by Canadians to that great country last year. They associated themselves with the idea that we should come back again and said that they would like to see these visits by members of the association increased. As I say, I fully realize the very important work that is going on.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few brief remarks in relation to something in which the Speaker had an interest last year. In checking through the various committee reports last year I noticed that in the one committee where we had a translator, the special committee on broadcasting, there was much better participation by French Canadian members than in other committees. This year we have had translators in several committees of which I have been a member, especially the one that investigated the Jacques Cartier bridge—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think the hon. member was not here when we passed that item. We are on the commonwealth parliamentary association.

Item agreed to.

182. Grant to the Canadian North Atlantic Treaty Organization parliamentary association, $14,000.

Mr. Speaker: As several hon. members have been good enough to comment on the work of the various parliamentary associations, I want to acknowledge their references very briefly. It is a pity there is not more opportunity in the House of Commons for members of the house who are members of delegations that go abroad to report to the house and to share the benefit of the experiences they have. As hon. members will see from these three items, our principal parliamentary exchanges fall into three groups, the commonwealth parliamentary association, to which several hon. members have referred and which now has a very large and active branch here of 280 members in the two houses, more than ever before; the NATO parliamentary association; and the Canada-United States joint parliamentary group.

These bring many of our members into close touch with countries with whom we are most directly connected and associated in the commonwealth, in the NATO alliance and with our neighbour across the border.

I mention these associations because I am thoroughly convinced that their value cannot be estimated in dollars in a world which has been so drawn together by communication and transportation but is so far apart in many of its thoughts. If more of this kind of exchange between members of parliaments is made possible I feel that it has had a very salutary effect and I have observed that it has had very useful consequences with relation to these three groups.

As hon. members will see when we come to supplementary item 529, we are asking for additional funds in order to join the inter-parliamentary union, an association dating back 75 years or more and with a membership among countries with whom we now have no parliamentary exchange, Latin American countries, Central American, Asian, African countries which are not in the commonwealth and European countries which are not in NATO. I strongly commend this proposed new application as well as the additional purpose of this supplementary vote. I apologize for anticipating it but I deemed it appropriate to deal with these items together.

The additional purpose of the supplementary vote is to permit the house to reciprocate the hospitality of those who have received Canadian delegations. That becomes rather necessary in the circumstances which have arisen in the last two or three years. I see a number of members here who were on the Canadian delegation to the commonwealth parliamentary association meeting in Australia. Their expenses were paid, of course, by the Australian government as it was their turn to have the conference. But in the course of that journey members of the Canadian delegation were official guests of the state of Israel for one week and of the Indonesian Speaker and parliament for four days. That is only by way of illustration. Last year the Federal Republic of Germany invited a delegation from the House of Commons and five of us went. This year they have invited a delegation from the Canadian Senate. We saw the new German federal state and its democratic processes at the centre as well as in three of the states as a result of their hospitality.

The Speaker there told us that the Bundestag at Bonn had voted one million marks annually, which is over $200,000, for the express purpose of sending delegations from the Bundestag to other parliaments and inviting others to come to Germany. We were the beneficiaries of such an invitation. I think it is important that the Canadian parliament should be in a position to accept these bilateral exchanges, which means that we must be in a position to repay them in kind.

183. General administration—estimates of the clerk, $2,085,293.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, in a few fleeting minutes today we have a delightful opportunity to ask questions of Mr. Speaker, and I have two I wish to address to him. In Votes and Proceedings No. 124 for July 14 of this year there is a report of the civil service commission dated March 22, 1960, which reads in part as follows:

> Pursuant to sections 10 and 62 of the Civil Service Act, the commission has approved the following, effective from April 1, 1960:
> 1. Abolition of the classes, second clerk asistant and chief of English journals, chief of orders of the day and parliamentary papers, assistant chief clerk.
> 2. Creation of the classes, second clerk assistant, chief of English journals, clerk of parliamentary papers.

Does that mean that the office now held by Mr. Crossley Sherwood is being abolished? Would the Speaker mind explaining what this change means? Second, pursuant to a question I asked the Acting Secretary of State last night which was out of order, would Mr. Speaker mind explaining to the house what arrangements are made for the purchase of the Parliamentary Guide and its cost to parliament each year?

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure I would be in order in discussing the first question which is raised by reason of a report of the civil service commission tabled the other day, concurrence in which will be moved in the house in due course, but the answer is yes. It does mean a reorganization and the abolition of that particular office but it does not abolish the duties of that office. It is a consolidation under the administration of the English journals branch of the orders of the day and parliamentary papers. It was thought, and so found by the commission, to be a more efficient administrative arrangement and the change itself does not affect the tenure of office or the position of any individual.

The answer to the other question is that the Parliamentary Guide is purchased from a gentleman who publishes it as a private enterprise, and we purchase it through the vote under the heading "Sundries", I believe. The quantity purchased is 420 copies annually, 265 for the members, 96 for the press gallery, 45 for officials and the table, making a total of 406, with a surplus of 14 for contingencies. The price is $6 and the editor is Mr. Normandin, who has published the book for years and, of course, has other outlets than the House of Commons.

Mr. McIlraith: I should like to ask one or two questions of His Honour, the Speaker, concerning pay increases granted to the staff of the House of Commons, both the staff under this item and under item 184. As I understand the matter, pay increases have been granted to a large number of the staff, but some members of the staff have not yet received any increases. I want to find out and make sure that is merely because the classifications or groups not yet receiving pay increases have not been dealt with, and also to make sure that pay increases, when granted to them, will have the same effective date as those already granted.

Mr. Speaker: In general, the answer is along the lines suggested by the hon. member. There have been 415 members of our staff who have already received the increase, as part of the series of civil service increases which the house has discussed from time to time, leaving 291 who have not yet had the increase, but who will when their categories are reached in the rest of the civil service. They are in categories which have not yet received the increase in the civil service generally, and we have timed our action with that of the civil service generally, so that the corresponding categories will be increased at the same time. Perhaps that answers the question.

Mr. McIlraith: There is one part of the question which perhaps I should develop a bit further. The pay increases in the civil service outside of the house have not been made effective at the same time; that is they have come into effect on different dates, depending on the particular group involved. I would express the hope that the internal economy commission dealing with this matter in so far as the House of Commons is concerned would adopt the principle of having all pay increases effective at the same time.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the hon. member's concern that that should be done. Actually there are two different dates for those who have already had increases, April 1 and May 1. In so far as those who have not had the increase are concerned, most of them are not temporary employees of the House of Commons but are on the regular establishment of the civil service, and they will receive their increases as a matter of course when those categories are dealt with by the civil service commission and presumably the same commencement dates would be applied to them as to their corresponding employees in other departments.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. McIlraith: May I ask one further question? Is the matter of their increase a matter for the civil service commission and the government or is it a matter for the internal economy commission of the House of Commons?

Mr. Speaker: If they are, as most of these people are, permanent civil servants, then it is automatic. The action of the internal economy commission is taken with respect to those who are not under the Civil Service Act, and they were dealt with on a class analogy to the action of the civil service commission.

Mr. Fisher: I should like to raise a question in connection with translations in parliamentary committees. I believe most members of the house have enjoyed the change that has come over the house itself since the translation system was installed. I should like to ask the Speaker whether it would not be possible to make a more consistent arrangement for translation services in the house committees. I should like to know how the service we have had so far has been arrived at. In the broadcasting committee of last year, and in the Jacques Cartier bridge committee this year, there has been someone in attendance to translate, I understand at the request of the French speaking members.

It seems to me that in fairness to both the French speaking members and the English speaking members on the committees, a more thorough and complete job of translations might be available than exists at the present time. I shudder to think of the position I would be in, as well as many of the English speaking members, if we had to express our thoughts or our questions in French. I am sure that cuts both ways. If bilingualism is recognized in the house by the translation system, with the proliferation of committees and the increase in their work, it seems to me we might think more seriously of taking better care of this problem in the house committees. I would be interested in Mr. Speaker's comments on that, and any background information he may be able to give as to how what we had was set up, as well as to any possibility in the future of extension of such facilities.

Mr. Speaker: Yes, this is a question which has also been raised earlier by the hon. member for St. Boniface, the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, and the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot, and which has been receiving consideration. I, myself, have spent considerable time this session in discussion with the engineers of the organization which services our sound system in the chamber. They are in the course of preparing quotations for installations which will deal with this problem of simultaneous translation in committees. We are working experimentally. It was my thought that if we had one room properly equipped, where committees which particularly needed the translation could experiment with it, that might be the first step. The cost of equipping all of our committee rooms with facilities, and more particularly with personnel for translation, is quite a sizeable undertaking. We are definitely working on the problem and I hope next session we shall be able to supply translation for at least one committee at a time.

Mr. Carter: I should like to ask a supplementary question to the one I asked earlier. Of the 415 members of the staff who have received increases, are the sessional stenographers included?

Mr. Speaker: Yes, all of those who are sessional stenographers received the increase which was effective as of April 1, I believe.

Mr. Carter: My second question is this. Does this figure given here of $2 million plus take into consideration the further increases that have not yet been granted?

Mr. Speaker: No, it is not in that vote. However, there was a vote of the house to cover the increases as they were brought about and that includes the House of Commons staff as well as other civil servants.

Mr. Valade: I know that Mr. Speaker will be glad to know that I am not rising on a point of order or a question of privilege at this time. My purpose at the moment is to congratulate him on the wonderful way in which he has presided over the debates of the House of Commons in French and in English. I am sure all members of the committee share my point of view in this respect.

I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would consider my proposal to place on the shoulder band of the protective staff the bilingual designation of their functions, as the House of Commons and Chambre des Communes. I think this would be a fine gesture toward the tourists that come here and would also signify the bilingual characteristics of our country.

Mr. Pearson: I know that anything I might say on the subject which has just been raised is prejudiced because of my long and, for me, highly rewarding friendship with the Speaker. However, notwithstanding that fact, as one whom he keeps in order when the occasion seems to require it may I say that I am sure it has been a long time since this House of Commons has had such a good Speaker.

Library of Parliament—

186. General administration, $352,828.

Mr. Speaker: May I answer one question which I should not like to leave unanswered? It relates to the library. The hon. member for St. Boniface raised the question of salaries or rather the difference in salaries as between the assistant librarian in English and the assistant librarian in French, which salaries in the column are shown to be different. May I say this to him.

(Translation):

The salaries are exactly the same, but the two staff members referred to do not have the same seniority within the service.

(Text):

It is an explanation which is not apparent but the range of salaries is exactly the same. One happened to have started his services earlier than the other and is further advanced.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: That concludes the legislation estimates.

Mr. Speaker: May I thank all hon. members who have been so cordial and assure them that their remarks will encourage me in the performance of my duties in the future.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

General administration—

164. Departmental administration including a grant of $10,000 to Frontier college and the expenses of the international labour conferences, $1,118,255.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): In bringing before the house the estimates of the Department of Labour and the unemployment insurance commission, I do so in the knowledge that the efficient functioning of these two departments is of concern to many thousands of Canadians and, of course, to the members of the House of Commons.

As all members are aware, the number of men and women in the working force in Canada has increased considerably in the short period of ten years and the functions and the services of these two departments have been extended to meet the new demands which have been created.

In 1950 the labour force numbered slightly over five million. Today there are some 6,454,000 Canadians in the labour force which shows an increase from 1950 to the present time of some 20 per cent. Hon. members are also aware of the rapidly changing pattern in Canadian industry in a period which has seen a change-over from primary occupation and an increase in the employment in secondary manufacturing industries and in the trade and service industries. The transitions in the economy have been reflected in the changing complexion of the labour force, in the nature of the occupations which are being followed and, of course, in new production methods owing to the rise of technology in industry. In the field of labour in Canada and in the social-economic aspect related thereto, change has been the order of the day and in the past few years change at a rate unprecedented in our history. The transitions that are taking place have posed complex problems for both the Department of Labour and the unemployment insurance commission.

When one deals with the unemployment insurance commission, the operations of that department relate directly or indirectly to almost every Canadian who is holding a job or looking for a job. I would add that both these departments—that is to say, the Department of Labour and the unemployment insurance commission—are aware of the extent of their responsibilities in these matters and that the aim of all our operations is to keep abreast of the changing conditions which are evident in our industrial and economic structure.

The Department of Labour is asking for a sum of $14,985,700 in the current estimates. In the 1959-60 estimates the department required $15,991,942. That figure shows a decrease in this fiscal year. The unemployment insurance commission request $88,411,000. This figure represents an increase of something over $13,500,000 and is accounted for largely by an increase in the government's contribution to the fund arising from the recent amendments to the act. I should point out, Mr. Chairman, that the estimates of the labour department do not take into account the supplementary estimate which was passed by parliament dealing with the special municipal winter works program in the amount of $15 million. At this point I want to reiterate what has been said by the Prime Minister. Last Saturday in the house the Prime Minister announced that the municipal winter works incentive program will be continued and enlarged in scope in the coming winter and an item to cover the cost of this program will be included in a later supplementary departmental estimate.

The house will be aware of the fact that the main estimate of these two departments total $103,129,198 and supplementary estimates will raise the total to $103,366,700. The total for last year was $90,845,942 or $12,520,758 less than this year, as I have already explained. With your permission, Mr. Chairman, at this point I will enlarge briefly on the functions of the Department of Labour.

[Mr. Starr.]

The department has an establishment of 626 employees and is responsible for the administration of Canadian labour legislation in the federal field. Such legislation includes the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act, the Fair Employment Practices Act, the more recent Vacations with Pay Act, the Female Employees Equal Pay Act, the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act, and various agreements entered into thereunder, farm labour agreements with the provinces, civilian rehabilitation agreements, the Government Employees Compensation Act and the Government Annuities Act.

Apart from the actual administration of this legislation the department provides services for the continuing development, promotion and co-ordination of a number of programs in the national interest in which these pieces of legislation have a place as well as in other programs in the manpower utilization area. These include our educational activities in the general field of discrimination in employment in Canada on account of race, colour, religion or national origin; the promotion of joint labour management co-operation committees; the work of our women's bureau in the interests of training, employment and the welfare of women in industry; the promotion and co-ordination of activities for the rehabilitation and employment of disabled persons; the activities of our training branch in co-operation with the provinces, industry and labour in the improvement of apprentice, trades and technical training programs, and the establishment of uniform trades training standards; the older worker employment program; our winter seasonal employment program; and the work done in connection with farm labour.

It will be evident that these measures and activities embrace a wide area of social and economic activities in the field of human welfare. The various functions of the department thus are related to services which have come to be essential in a closely integrated industrial economy. They operate so as to assist the smooth functioning of the economy and they are also designed to provide the government and the members of this house with day to day information on the rapid and fundamental transitions which are taking place in our economy.

Let me say that my department is keeping abreast of these transitions and that such matters as automation, the utilization of manpower, the progress of working conditions in industry and other matters of urgent concern are the special province of the research branch of my department which is thus enabled to provide useful and up to date information on a continuing basis. This information on changing conditions in industry and in the labour field is immensely valuable not only to myself as minister and to the government, and I think also to members of the House of Commons in the determination of questions which arise before us, but also are widely used and appreciated by industry and labour and the provincial authorities.

Over a ten-year period the cost of all these services has risen in line with the extension of the facilities which are being provided. Taking into consideration the rise in the labour force, the increasing complexity of industrial and economic patterns, the need for keeping abreast of changing conditions, it would be surprising indeed if services had not increased correspondingly. In the industrial relations branch, for example, 106 disputes were dealt with in the past year by conciliation officers. Of these about 76 per cent were settled without the necessity of further proceedings. In only one dispute was a settlement not reached and a strike resulted.

Under this branch, I may add, come administrative responsibilities relating to such social concepts as discrimination on account of race, colour or creed. Discrimination is of course a continuing problem. It may not be perhaps as widespread in Canada as in some other countries, but we are certainly not as yet in any position to throw stones. I may say, Mr. Chairman, that in the preservation of good relations in industry the principle that is observed in the department is that labour and management should be encouraged to develop maximum initiative and that they should be relied upon to keep their house in order in their own best interests.

I mentioned the economics and research branch, and may I say that the work of this branch has become more and more important with the increasing complexity of industrial organization. This branch surveys the whole field of manpower in Canada dealing with trends in the labour force as well as the compilation and analyses of wage and working conditions and other data in the labour management field. This is achieved in co-operation with the national employment service.

As I said, these trends, developing as they are with maximum rapidity, must be lucidly analysed in order that full information may be available as speedily as possible and as accurately as possible. A number of studies have recently been completed on automation and its effects on manpower and studies have been prepared in the past on various phases and aspects of seasonal unemployment. Others are now in progress. This work of checking, compiling, analysing and reporting goes on continually.

I might mention at this point that before I resume my seat I wish to make a statement on what we find from the work we are doing in the field of automation, and I do this specifically at the request of the hon. member for Vancouver East who has shown a great deal of interest in this aspect of our industrial development.

Before leaving this aspect I might add that the joint research programs of seasonal employment are presently being carried on with the governments of the provinces of British Columbia, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. There is an advisory committee on professional manpower with representations from the various professions which greatly assists the department in questions relating to this subject. A national registry of engineers and scientific personnel is also maintained.

In all the discussions on dislocation in industry due to changes in technology, the fact has emerged that there is increasing importance in providing the type of training required to bring Canada's labour skills to a level in line with modern requirements. Let me say at once that this is a task of major importance. The provision of this type of industry training on a scale necessary to meet future requirements will require a degree of foresightedness and co-operation on the part of federal and provincial authorities and industry.

At the present time there are a number of agreements in existence with the provinces entered into under the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act. The vocational and technical training agreement No. 2 provides $40 million over a period of five years, ending in 1962. Of this $15 million is for operational costs and the remaining $25 million for capital costs for expansion of training facilities. There is also the special vocational training projects agreement which provides for refunding 50 per cent of provincial government expenses in training of unemployed workers and disabled persons, as well as supervisors in industry; and training in fishing and agriculture.

A few days ago I advised the house of the government decision to increase the federal contribution to costs of training of unemployed workers from 50 per cent to 75 per cent of such costs. This is a cost sharing agreement with the provinces and the incentive in respect to this training lies with the provinces. We hope that this increase on the part of the federal government will be an incentive to the provinces to increase this program.

Our women's bureau works closely with other branches of the department, the national employment service, and other departments and with the national women's organizations, for the promotion of good standards in the fields of women's work and a better understanding of the problems of women in the labour force. I might say at this point that two public spirited bodies—the vocational training advisory council and the apprenticeship training committee—are most helpful to my department in the administration of these agreements.

Having mentioned these bodies, I trust the committee will grant me the indulgence of pausing for a moment to express my appreciation of the valuable work of the loyal and devoted staffs of both the Department of Labour and the unemployment insurance commission. In a period of change they have magnificently met the challenge and have performed a service that is greatly appreciated by myself as minister.

While I am dealing with training I might mention that enrolments in all training programs have continued to increase and that this presents a problem to practically all provinces in finding adequate staffs and accommodation. This is particularly acute in respect of technicians and trades training programs. Registered apprentices in training, for example, have increased to some 20,000 persons. Last year training was extended to unemployed persons on a much wider basis than previously. This, as was recently announced, will continue on an expanded basis. Training for disabled persons has increased by about 15 per cent. Apart from apprenticeship training there are some 15,000 persons receiving training under these co-operative federal-provincial agreements. In additions, enrolments in vocational schools across Canada number more than 130,000.

I may say that at the present time vocational training facilities are filled to capacity and there is a need for additional facilities. To meet this need the provinces are being encouraged to establish additional facilities and to take advantage of capital funds which are available under these agreements. More facilities are particularly required to train persons who have left the regular school system either before or after completing it.

In a program of the magnitude we have in Canada caution must be exercised to maintain a proper balance between the long term educational and training needs and the shorter range programs to retrain or refresh those who need such training to adjust to rapidly changing conditions. We also have agreements with the provinces sharing costs of movement of farm labour, and I shall be pleased to discuss these in greater detail on the individual estimates.

As hon. members know, my department has been active in promoting a program encouraging people to have certain types of construction and repair work done in winter. Following the slogan of "Do it now" this program has had a degree of success over the years. The slogan has become popular and well known and the program was intensified last winter and also in the present fiscal year. My officials inform me that the modest amount spent in advertising by the department has stimulated some $3 million worth of advertising in this field by private industry and has been instrumental in providing a good many jobs during wintertime for persons who otherwise would have been inactive.

The special services branch was responsible for administration of the municipal incentive program which contributed to some $75 million worth of municipal construction during the winter months and provided direct on-site employment for some 50,000 persons. Since this program is dealt with generally by supplementary estimate, and has already been discussed in the house, it does not appear in these estimates.

In the field of civilian rehabilitation, in which my department, together with the Department of National Health and Welfare, also co-operates with the provinces, a simple illustration will serve to show the effect of this program. Of the first 4,689 cases reported as successfully rehabilitated, 3,600 when referred had no earnings whatsoever and with their 3,410 dependents, were being maintained at an annual cost of $3,500,000. After rehabilitation their estimated earnings in the first year will total $8,500,000. I think that this indication in itself justified the program. We have the benefit of the advice of a widely representative national advisory committee in the promotion and operation of this program.

In this respect a great deal of attention has been devoted by my department and the unemployment insurance commission to the problem of the older worker, and we are continuing to pursue this policy among employers.

The information branch of the department also disseminates factual information through press, radio and television, dealing with the various functions and activities of the department.

The annuities branch is of course, concerned with the administration of government annuities, and I will be pleased to answer any questions in this regard at the proper place in the estimates.

In dealing with the unemployment insurance commission one is confronted with a department numbering some 8,500 employees, staffing some 200 offices across Canada. This department deals in a direct and often personal way with many thousands of Canadians across this country and as such its administration is of considerable interest. Costs of administration, including the government's contribution to the fund, in the present estimates come to something over $88 million which as I have said is an increase of some $13,500,000 in the federal government contribution. The commission is charged with administering many millions of dollars annually within the terms of the act and, of course, is concerned to see that proper controls are maintained at all times.

The administration of this department caused me some concern when I first took over my present responsibilities. Over the past two and a half to three years I have endeavoured to help in any way I could to obtain the maximum possible service from this department and to see that the maximum possible service was rendered to all Canadians. To this end I have continuously emphasized the need of courtesy on the part of the commission staffs. I have also made it a point to emphasize the placement side of the operation so that officers whose function it is to find jobs for Canadians were given every facility to do so.

Let me say that it was quite evident from the first that salaries in this organization, particularly on the placement side, were not such as to attract the type of qualified person necessary to perform an efficient job in this regard. At the same time, and perhaps as a result of this, there were acute shortages of staff. Steps have been taken to adjust both of these situations.

The increase in the commission's administration costs this year totals $857,000, which may largely be attributed to salaries. Further salary provisions totalling some $2,794,000 will be provided through the general civil service salaries vote. There is an increase of some $200,000 in the vote relating to transfer of labour, and this covers anticipated removal expenses of workers owing to the decline of the uranium industry in Elliot Lake and Uranium City.

During the fiscal year employers listed some 150,000 more jobs with the placement service than in the previous year, indicating a growing acceptance of this service. The number of placements effected was 987,481, an increase of 120,000.

At the present time, an estimated 70 per cent of urban employers avail themselves of the services of the national employment service, and the national employment service endeavours to bring to the attention of Canadians this service that we have available to them. The commission during the recent months published a booklet entitled, "N.E.S.—Geared to Canada's Employment Needs" which tells the story of how the national employment service can help employers in recruiting their employees. I know that hon. members would like a copy of this booklet and they may procure it if they ask my office for a copy.

It will, of course, be realized that a national employment service cannot properly operate unless both employers and employees make use of such a service. During the coming months an effort will be made on the part of the commission to contact an increased number of employers in order to obtain a larger number of orders for employment.

The total amount of benefits paid out during the year was $415 million, down somewhat from the $479 million in the previous year. Owing to higher contributions, revenue was up by $40 million to $275 million. Some 190,000 audits were completed and 37,340 investigations were undertaken by the unemployment insurance commission. The enforcement branch carried out 73,547 investigations compared with 67,702 in the previous year.

May I say that the chairman and members of the commission are co-operating fully in the endeavour to constantly improve the administration of this important service. During the coming year the placement service will continue to be strengthened in order that it may fulfil its function of finding jobs for Canadian workers. It is my aim, Mr. Chairman, and I know it is shared by all members of the staff, to provide the best possible service for Canadians. We are making every effort to provide better accommodation, to secure more qualified people for the service and to enlist the co-operation of labour and industry in the general administration.

This government has already announced a number of measures which will help to stimulate employment in the coming months. One of these was announced by my colleague the Minister of Public Works in respect of housing that, commencing on September 1, the ceiling for those who can qualify will be raised to $7,000 and to $7,600 for those with families. These loans will be available to builders of pre-sold homes, with as much money as will be necessary and required to fulfil this need. This most certainly should stimulate a great deal of employment.

Our winter works program, which has been announced by the Prime Minister, has been expanded on the basis of the recommendations of the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities. An earlier announcement had been made in this respect and we hope that here, too, there will be a substantial increase in the number of people employed during the coming months.

The training of unemployed workers is a very important thing because at the moment, in my opinion, there should be very few unfilled vacancies, but we have quite a number of unfilled vacancies, and it is probably due to the fact that we have not the properly trained persons to fill those jobs. We hope that because of our incentive to the provinces, the provinces will undertake to train at an increased pace more and more workers in this country and this, too, will help a great deal to stimulate unemployment.

We have been interested in our winter works program in the home improvement field and it has been our thought that the chartered banks of this country would be interested enough to put forward their facilities and make them available to those who want to avail themselves of home improvements in order to help the situation during the coming months. We have taken this further step in this direction to increase domestic construction in the wintertime.

The government has been in communication with the chartered banks through my colleague the Minister of Finance and all the banks have undertaken to co-operate fully in a program of expanded home improvement and home extension construction during the coming winter. As hon. members know, under the National Housing Act the government guarantees bank loans for purposes of home improvement and home extension. It is hoped, Mr. Chairman, that with this announcement house builders across Canada will take advantage of this program this winter, providing an expanded volume of home construction and improvement in order to provide employment in the building trades during the winter months.

I mentioned earlier that at the request of the hon. member for Vancouver East for a full statement on automation I would be prepared to give it, but before doing so I wish to refer to Hansard of July 23 when the Prime Minister, in announcing the municipal winter works program, said in the last paragraph at page 6817:

> I should point out that in addition to this announcement the Minister of Labour has another announcement to make at this time,—

Which I did make.

> —and that further projects and plans to meet the unemployment situation will be announced in due course.

Now, as to automation: the Department of Labour, with the assistance and co-operation of management, labour and provincial training authorities, has been examining the employment effects of automation and other kinds of technological changes for several years. Research work began in 1956, and has continued since that time. In 1957 an advisory committee on technological change, with representatives from labour, management, government and the universities, was established to consider and discuss the work undertaken and planned. The findings of the studies conducted so far have been published as the work was completed. Reports have been issued for the electrical and electronics industry, the heavy machinery industry and the household appliance industry. A full report on the automobile and parts industry has been completed and is now being considered by members of the advisory committee on technological change before release.

Studies have been conducted of office automation as well as of technological changes in industry. A case study is being made of a large electronic data processing system recently installed in an insurance company office. A more general survey of all companies with medium and large size computers is now under way and will provide information on the extent, growth and manpower effects of electronic data processing equipment in Canadian offices.

There are a number of significant findings emerging from these studies. One of the most important concerns the effects of technological changes on skills. In the industries studied technological changes have been accompanied by a rise in the employment of engineers, technicians and skilled tradesmen, a decline in the employment of semi-skilled workers and a still more marked decline in the employment of unskilled workers.

Another effect has been a relative decrease in the number of direct production workers and an increase in non-production employment. One reason for this is that most of the semi-skilled and unskilled occupations so far affected by technological changes have been those involved in direct production tasks, while the resulting increasing need for skilled manpower has been in such areas as maintenance and tool room work which are non-production functions. Another reason is that new products, improved production methods, greater quality control and increasing research and development have all resulted in more technical specialists who are not directly involved in production.

Technological changes are not affecting all kinds of semi-skilled and unskilled workers to the same extent. They are resulting in a decreased need for semi-skilled machine operators. Automated transfer equipment and conveyor systems have replaced much unskilled labour formerly employed in material handling jobs. On the other hand, assembly occupations which are usually semi-skilled have been affected to a much lesser extent.

Mechanization is having important effects on office employment, although not to the same extent on the various office occupations. It appears, for example, that middle level supervisory and senior clerical jobs are going to decline. In addition, much routine clerical work will be carried out by machines. On the other hand, evidence suggests that needs for secretaries, stenographers, typists and a growing variety of office machine operators will continue to expand.

Another important result of office automation is an increasing demand for employees to fill the new occupations that are coming into existence—systems analysts, programmers, computer operators and maintenance technicians. On the whole, these new occupations are more complex than the old clerical ones they are replacing and tend to require much more formal education than routine clerical work.

The studies carried out so far suggest that while little difficulty is usually encountered in retraining production workers for the jobs created by technological changes, problems have been encountered in retraining workers for the more skilled and technician jobs which are growing more rapidly. The main difficulty appears to be the insufficient formal education held by many semi-skilled workers today.

The extent to which automation and technological change result in employees being laid off varies a great deal from one industry to another. In growing industries such lay-offs rarely occur because the workers affected can usually be transferred to other jobs. In industries where employment is stable or declining, however, lay-offs do take place. In these cases the national employment service tries to find new jobs for those concerned and we are endeavouring to make available more facilities for the retraining of such unemployed. The extension of federal government assistance to the provincial authorities for training programs for the unemployed, announced just a few days ago, had this problem in mind. Our stay in school campaign is also important here because the more education one has the less are the chances of losing one's job or being unemployed for long because of technological change.

We are continuing this research work and will be publishing detailed reports on findings as studies are completed. Our work is discussed regularly with the advisory committee on technological change and general reviews of our findings and plans are made to the Canadian vocational training council and the national advisory committee on apprenticeship.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, the minister has given us a general account of the work of his department. When we reach the details of his estimates there will be an opportunity to comment on the several items which he covered. I regret that in the statement he has just made he has not highlighted, as I propose to do, the most important single domestic problem in Canada, which is the continuing high level of unemployment in our country. I would have expected the minister to deal forthrightly with this problem, which he knows concerns all of us in this house as well as the people of Canada generally. He referred only at the end prior to his statement on automation, which did not really traverse new ground, to the four prongs of attack devised by the government to mitigate the severity of unemployment.

As I have said on other occasions, notably last Saturday, the government's announced program does not represent the vigorous approach to the solution of this problem which we have a right to expect. It certainly is not a program consistent with the assurances given by hon. gentlemen, when they confronted the Canadian people and indicated that plans which they would devise would remove the spectre of unemployment and the consequential suffering from that economic disease. We have therefore not had, in these the closing days of the session, any demonstration by the government that it has a program capable of resolving or mitigating this serious situation.

All through this session, we in the Liberal opposition have sought to bring home to the government, not with any success, our concern for this problem, and the fact that it requires vigorous action on the part of the government. The government's laissez-faire policy, and its relaxed attitude toward the problem are reflected in the kind of answers we have had to questions. We have had no less than seven questions put to the minister asking him when we might expect, for instance, a report from the interdepartmental committee set up for the purpose of establishing a new measurement for unemployment in our country. We have not yet, in spite of this interval of four and a half months, been given anything that would indicate what progress this interdepartmental committee is making. It may be that the committee has made a decision. It may be that the decision arrived at by the committee simply confirms the pattern pursued in the past, namely a pattern of sampling a number of unemployed, only in the new formula increasing the number of people to be covered by the sampling process.

Then we have had the persistent refusal of the government to treat this House of Commons, composed of the elected representatives of the people, in a manner at least equal to that accorded by the spokeman for the government in the other place. We have asked for the right in this house to examine the problem of unemployment in all its aspects, to examine these proposals that might be embarked upon to relieve this situation, but no recognition of the right of this chamber has been accorded. This has occurred in the face of the fact that the industrial relations committee, set up for the purpose of organization, met only on that one occasion, and still has a motion before it on unemployment, put forward by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River designed to provide corrective action in unemployment.

There is still the refusal of the government to call a conference of labour, management and government to try and resolve this problem in accordance with the recommendations made by the Canadian Labour Congress, and indeed publicly supported in a speech made at Easter by the Minister of Labour when he spoke in the town of Gananoque. Today, following the conference between the federal and provincial governments, where unemployment undoubtedly was discussed—we certainly know from the statements of Mr. Lesage and other provincial premiers that they initiated such a discussion—we have not had from either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Labour any report whatsoever as to the conclusions reached at that conference or as to the nature of the discussions. Yet the Prime Minister, disagreeing with the Minister of Labour the other day, said that the provinces had a responsibility in connection with this matter. Notwithstanding this we reminded the Prime Minister, at that time, that he was repudiating the declared position of the Minister of Labour, who said that this was a federal responsibility.

Mr. Starr: I am afraid I have to rise on a question of privilege if the hon. member is again trying to distort statements in this house. I made my position abundantly clear, as it has been in the past, on shared responsibility. In the first instance, I have stressed the fact that the federal government does not wish to shirk its part of the responsibility, but there is a responsibility lying with other bodies. I have said that time and time again, and what the hon. member wishes to convey now is not so.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have no objection to the Minister of Labour rising and seeking to correct me. I think in debate it is desirable, that he should do so. I can only point out to you, sir, that the time at my disposal is limited. I have no objection to it but I hope he will remember—

Mr. Chevrier: He has no right to do it, either.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have no objection to the minister doing it, because I want now to deal with the correction he has made. I say that the statement the minister has made now, consistent with the statement of the Prime Minister, is not consistent with the position he took as a private member and later as a member of the government. I now propose to establish that fact. On June 29, 1960, the Prime Minister said as reported at page 5535 of Hansard, inter alia:

> The Minister of Labour can speak for himself in that regard, but I am glad to have support for the stand taken by the Minister of Labour in the position taken by the new premier-designate of Quebec, who throughout the campaign, made it absolutely clear that the responsibility for unemployment rested on the provincial administration.
> Mr. Pearson: Would the Prime Minister not give some members of the house who did not hear him the opportunity of hearing him confirm the statement he has just made, that the federal government has no responsibility for unemployment?
> Mr. Diefenbaker: I said no such thing.
> Mr. Starr: Since my name has been brought into this discussion may I say that, on several occasions, I have said on behalf of the government that we have a responsibility in the matter of unemployment. We do not shirk it. But at the same time I have said, time and time again, that in order to carry out the responsibility and in order to solve the problem of unemployment co-operation is needed from provincial, municipal and, yes, even labour bodies and other interested organizations in this country.

Mr. Brunsden: Do you agree with that?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Wait until you have heard the whole story. This was a statement made by the Prime Minister on June 29, 1960. Now, the Minister of Labour spoke in this house on March 3, 1960, and here is what he said as reported on page 1699 of Hansard:

> The government as a whole—I have said this on previous occasions and I repeat it—has assumed the responsibility for unemployment. We have said that right from the start, and this is possibly the only time that a federal government in this country within recent years has accepted that responsibility.

Mr. Starr: On a shared basis.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend did not say on a shared basis. I have other statements that the minister made, and I suggest my hon. friend should not destroy the credibility of his own witness. The fact is my hon. friend, in a statement on March 3, did make a statement that was consistent with the earlier statement that this government, attempting to solve unemployment, was not going to look to another level of government to assist; it was going to solve the problem of unemployment itself. That was the statement made by the Minister of Labour. It was in direct contradiction to the statement made by the head of the government.

I do not deny that Mr. Lesage, recognizing the failure of this government to do anything about unemployment in a fundamental way, has not hesitated as the premier of a province to recognize that he must in the face of this situation seek to do something. I commend him for that kind of initiative. However, I am dealing now with the policy of this government. Here is what the Minister of Labour said as a private member of this house, and it is consistent with his second last reported statement. He said on March 3, 1955, at pages 1693, 1694 and 1695 that unemployment had reached a dangerous and alarming figure. Then he said:

> It is not a situation which can be brushed aside nor can the problem be shifted to another level of government. It is a problem which only the senior government of this country can tackle effectively providing they feel, as they should, that the responsibility is theirs.

Then further on he said:

> The important thing at the present time is to place the blame and the responsibility for unemployment on the proper government. Delegation after delegation is becoming fed up with the shirking of responsibility on the part of this government. We must place the responsibility with the federal government where it belongs.

Is that statement of March 3 the policy of the government or is it the revised statement the minister has given today, supported on June 29 by the Prime Minister? Is that the way in which this government is now seeking to escape its responsibilities, now that Liberal governments have come into office in two of our provinces, and there will be more?

An hon. Member: Where?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is that the situation? I ask the Minister of Labour not to hesitate to maintain the position he has taken that this was a responsibility of the federal government and one which he did not propose to shirk.

The problem facing us in Canada is a serious one. Unemployment now persists on an increasing scale since hon. gentlemen came into office. The situation month by month reflects the justification for the statement I have made. Here we are on the 28th of July, when on the basis of past experience there should be such an improvement as to indicate that the problem at best is temporary. From the last available figures given to us by the minister and by the Minister of Trade and Commerce—that is the figures on the basis of the bureau of statistics, the lowest figures—on June 18 there were 300,000 people out of jobs and seeking work. That was in June of this year. That means that 4.6 per cent of the labour force in Canada was unemployed.

How does that compare with countries with a like economy? From the minister's own publications we know that in May of this year in the federal German republic out of a population of over 50 million people, with a working force of 30 million, there were only 135,000 unemployed or 0.8 per cent of the German labour force; that in Sweden 2 per cent of the labour force was unemployed; that in Britain, with a labour force of 23 million, 2 per cent of that country's labour force was unemployed. That is a situation that should agitate the minister as nothing else should agitate him. We know that for the first time in May of this year unemployment was higher than it was in the same period in 1958, and that was a post-war record. To attack the unemployment problem, as the government is doing as if it were merely a question of having more of the year's work done in the wintertime is to indicate a profound lack of knowledge of this problem on the part of the government. We still have distressed or depressed areas such as Sydney, St. John's, Quebec, Levis, Windsor, Winnipeg and Vancouver.

Mr. MacInnis: Did the hon. member say Sydney?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes; Sydney.

Mr. MacInnis: Sydney where?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Sydney, Nova Scotia.

Mr. MacInnis: The hon. member had better take another look.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member for Cape Breton South had better look at the publications put out by the Department of Labour and he will see that is a distressed area.

Not only have we that situation, but we have regional pockets of structural unemployment showing that the problem is more than only seasonal in its character. I have given you minimum figures, Mr. Chairman, but these do not tell the whole story. One form of unemployment which we have in this country and which the government overlooks is underemployment. The figures that my hon. friend quotes do not touch that matter. They refer only to people who are working for more than 33 hours a week. What are the facts taken from my hon. friend's own publications? We know that in June, 1958, 669,000 people were employed for less than 33 hours a week and in the month of June, 1960, 730,000 people worked less than 33 hours a week. In other words, 10 per cent more people worked short time. That is part of this problem of unemployment.

From the claims for unemployment insurance benefits we know how serious the problem is. We know that on June 30 last claims for unemployment insurance benefits were made in the number of 296,400. This is a rise of 35 per cent over last year's figure. More than 75 per cent of this increase was accounted for by males, normally regarded as a primary earning unit of the family. These claims rose by 25 per cent in Quebec to 91,800. In Ontario as of June 30, 1959 there were 77,600 claims; as of the same day in the same month of this year in that province there were 111,100 claims, or an increase in the province of Ontario of 43 per cent. There was nearly a 50 per cent rise in the number of claimants in British Columbia, from 23,000 to 33,000. Need one spend any more time in indicating how serious this problem is?

The minister mentioned the problem of older workers. That is a problem, it is true, but there is also the problem of the young, the problem of the youth of this nation. Of the expected 780,000 increase in the Canadian labour force during the next five years it is estimated that 300,000 will be in the age category under 25. During the first six months of this year there were on an average 580,000 who were from 14 years to 19 years of age. Of this number approximately 496,000 held jobs. This means that 89,000 were without jobs during the first half of 1960; that is nearly 14.5 per cent of this age group in the labour force or double the rate of unemployment in the total labour force, as 7.5 per cent of the total labour force was without jobs for the first six months of 1960.

How does the government propose to resolve this problem? The minister told us or made an announcement the other day about an acceleration in vocational training. He did not refer to the speeches made two years ago by the hon. member for Trinity, the Leader of the Opposition and others who two years ago urged that this very thing be done. He has made no mention of the complaints of the advisory council last fall. He made no mention whatsoever of the statements made by the chairman of the unemployment insurance commission last year, namely that only one in ten was trained and that something must be done about the problem. Nevertheless the minister seeks to resolve this problem by the winter works program, a program which, when we had close to 700,000 people out of work, was able to provide jobs in the amount of some 55,000, assuming, of course, that that program was responsible for providing those jobs. Surely the minister does not think that that program represents an effort that would satisfy the Canadian people that this government is seriously tackling this problem?

The Prime Minister announced some modification of that program. He said the federal government would pay 50 per cent of the wages on municipal buildings. But that modification does not represent the demands and the requests of the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities. All one needs to do is to look at their brief in order to see their recommendations and to decide whether they are consistent with the minister's statement today that these demands have been met.

If the Prime Minister wanted to give some substance to that program he might have included underground parking garages. He might have mentioned a policy that would guarantee municipal debentures issued in order to raise the municipalities' share of costs for after all the municipalities, many of them in the very areas in which unemployment is greatest, are not able to meet their share of the cost of this program.

Then the government, through the Minister of Public Works two weeks ago, after the prodding of the hon. member for Nipissing, announced that it was going to increase its housing loans in order to meet the problem of unemployment. All I want now to say about that matter is this. No one denies that construction is an important constituent in unemployment. The Minister of Public Works, in the announcement of that program, said that one of the expressed purposes of that program was to create jobs in the wintertime. Since this government is responsible for the low level of starts so far this summer, what they are in effect doing is replacing unemployment in the winter with unemployment in summer. That is the consequence of this program. Instead of embarking upon a real program and instead of taking those steps which were recommended by the Leader of the Opposition and by practically every member in this house who spoke, and which were finally summarized by the hon. member for Laurier in 25 different suggestions, what did the Minister of Labour do? In the face of this serious problem, more serious in Canada than in any other country in the western world, the Minister of Labour said the problem would be solved by the winter works program, by training more unemployed workers along the lines mentioned by the minister in his announcement, and by the housing program.

What is that going to do for the people in these depressed areas? What is that going to do to provide employment in places like the city of Windsor? Why did the government not recognize at the beginning of this session, let alone the two earlier sessions, the desirability of treating this problem as a government responsibility, not as the responsibility of the Minister of Labour and of that department? Why did they not establish an organism within the government of Canada along the lines now proposed in the province of Quebec, along the lines which have been proposed in the United States, along the lines now proposed by the two candidates for the presidency of that country, and along the lines proposed by the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities, when on May 11 they called upon the federal government to appoint an impartial board of inquiry or royal commission to investigate unemployment in Canada?

Here we are in the dying days of this session, and no further ahead so far as eliciting from this government a policy in keeping with the character of the problem, and certainly a program in keeping with the assurances which were given by the hon. gentlemen when they went before the Canadian people.

This problem this fall and this winter on every available index gives indication of being as severe, if not severer, than in the months which we have just traversed. What is the government doing to meet and to anticipate this situation? Parliament is going to conclude this session very shortly. Will the government call this parliament back into session in the fall to deal with this problem if it becomes serious? Can the government escape the responsibility of calling parliament together to meet the emergency if it should appear, as every indication now establishes? Or are we to prorogue, come back here next year, have a report from the government in the speech from the throne in two or three sentences, meanwhile allowing all these months to intervene, during which the problem of unemployment will stare us in the face as it has now for three years?

That is not what the people of Canada expect this government to do with regard to this matter. I am sure hon. gentlemen are aware that their prestige and their support in the country has very seriously dwindled. The Gallup polls indicate that, and the last Gallup poll was taken, by the way, before the elections in New Brunswick and in the province of Quebec.

An hon. Member: But after Nova Scotia.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): After Nova Scotia but before Quebec and New Brunswick, which is significant. I venture to suggest that because of the way the government has handled the problem of unemployment in particular the next Gallup poll, later to be published, will show that hon. gentlemen have lost still more support from the Canadian people.

I say that, because there is a growing dissatisfaction with the way in which this government is confronting this problem. We have had no estimate by the government of its plans, not only for next winter but we have had no projection at all for the foreseeable future. This government will have to try to provide in the sixties if it is still in office, and that I believe is a doubtful possibility, for another two million jobs if its promises and assurances are going to be kept. That will be a great task and if two million jobs are provided there will still be 200,000 people out of work.

Are we just to receive from the minister dodging answers, answers which do not in any way convey information? Are we to be again confronted with a refusal to allow this house to examine this problem on the ground that members are going to play politics with this problem? Is that a justification for the contemptuous way in which hon. gentlemen have treated the House of Commons with regard to this matter? We have not had anything from the minister today about the seriousness which will develop as the result of the state of the unemployment insurance fund.

The other day we were given by the minister the figures for four different years showing the extent to which that fund has been reduced, in itself a reflection of the level of unemployment in Canada. What is going to happen next year? Will there be enough money to take care of the unemployed of our country, who have contracted with their employers and with the state for sustenance and maintenance in the event of unemployment? That fund has reached a level way beyond $300 million, in spite of the fact that last year the hon. minister introduced amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, which provided for an increase in the contributions from 25 per cent to 55 per cent, higher without basically changing the pattern of benefits. In spite of that $78 million by way of additional revenue we are to be confronted with a situation which should cause anyone concerned about that fund, based as it is upon contributions from the employers and the employees, to be greatly alarmed.

We have had nothing from the minister today about the actual losses in that fund, actual losses which were reported by the Minister of Finance when he advised us on May 31 that during the fiscal year 1959-60 the fund realized losses totalling $8.4 million, a further $1.5 million in losses realized in April and May of this year. The Minister of Labour did not tell us anything about the loss in the market value of the fund's securities on March 31 of this year, which was approximately $55 million less than their book value, only $5 million less than the book value loss of the fund during the fiscal year 1958-59. The government told us it made advances to the fund, but the Minister of Finance, when this question was put to him first denied it and then corrected himself the next day and said there were advances to the fund from April 1, 1960, to May 6, 1960 totalling $20 million.

I say to the minister, are we not entitled to have from him, and should we not have had it from him at the outset today, not a recital of the valuable and important work of the department, all of which could be given to us when we discuss the estimates in detail, but instead a statistical statement about the problem now? He has figures in his possession, which are later than those in the last release by the Department of Labour and the Department of Trade and Commerce. He should have talked about the problem not only of the old but of the young workers as well. He should have told us what are his prognostications for the next fiscal year. He could or should have told us what the government proposes to do about that problem.

I say to the minister, then, because the minister has not done these things, because he reflects in his statement a complete bankruptcy of policy on the part of this government, I believe he must recognize and be made to see in a friendly but nevertheless in a responsible and vigorous manner, what is the temper of this committee and what is the judgment of the Canadian people. If the minister says this problem is beyond the ability of any government to resolve, if he now takes the position that it is no longer an exclusive federal responsibility, if he takes the position that the assurances given to the Canadian people will no longer be satisfactory, he will win the support and the confidence of this committee to an immeasurable degree. But to sit there day after day and refuse to give satisfactory answers either on his own part or on the part of other members of the government, notably the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister, is not discharging the functions of government in a manner such as the hon. gentleman stated in 1957 and 1958 this government would undertake to do. Every member sitting behind the ministers on the treasury benches who made similar claims in the elections shares the responsibility, along with the government, for not joining with the rest of us in bringing this problem home right where it belongs—right to the treasury benches.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Once again I find I must follow my namesake and once again it seems to me that about the only thing the two of us have in common is our last names. The hon. member for Essex East has once more clearly stated to the committee that apparently, as far as the Liberals are concerned, their sole responsibility is to place the blame for unemployment on the shoulders of the government. I wonder what the hon. gentleman and his supporters would say if the Minister of Labour stood up and said: Yes, we are to blame, and we are to blame because we have done exactly what you people did in the same situation. What would the answer be then from the Liberal benches? This is exactly the same problem as that which the Liberals were unable to meet, and they were unable to meet it because they were incapable or unwilling of facing up to the nature of the problem and the steps necessary to deal with it. This is exactly the present government's failure. It is trying to use the same methods which were used by the Liberal governments of the past, and they have failed dismally. In fact, I would go one step further and say that this government has failed even to follow its own advice. For the last couple of years they have been asking Canadians, in an expensive advertising campaign, to "Do it now". But they have failed even to follow their own advice.

I should like to deal now with an aspect of this problem a little different from those which have been discussed so far, namely to consider some of the effects of the unemployment situation upon our economy. It seems that in this country we have become conditioned to the idea that we must have massive unemployment. It has come to be regarded as a normal state of affairs. In the main, unemployment has ceased to be news, and that seems so strange to me, because let there be a strike in any part of the country and it will fill the newspapers. Articles appear about the loss of man-hours, the loss of purchasing power and the way in which the economy of the country is being upset. We completely ignore the fact that hundreds of thousands more man-hours are lost every day through unemployment than are lost through strikes during the course of the whole year. But that does not make news.

Another thing we forget when we talk about the cost of strikes and their effect on the economy is that the harm done to local trades people and others is offset by the funds which the strikers very often receive from their local or international union. I know whereof I speak, because in 1953 eight out of the 11 producing mines in the Timmins riding were idle through strikes, some of them lasting eight months or more. Not one business in that town failed during that period or in the year following, because the united steel workers of America spent over $2,500,000 during that strike. I have just been checking the home town news and I find that two businesses have gone under in the last month, just as a result of the slow down in our economy and the resulting unemployment. The people laid off in Elliot Lake coming into Timmins seeking work have been enough to tip the scale with regard to at least two businesses which have been operating for some time. As I say, we make big news headlines out of a comparatively small problem and tend to ignore much greater problems. When are we going to realize that unemployment has effects more serious on the public, on the workers, on the stores and on the whole community than any strike which ever took place in this country?

Little can be said in defence of strikes as such. I forget who said that democracy is the worst form of government in the world except any other, but I would say the same about strikes; they are about the worst possible way of settling a dispute. I wish strikes were unnecessary, and I feel that if both sides played the game they would be unnecessary. In this country we seem to have failed to realize that strikes have to be settled some time and the longer they go on the more disruption they cause. I often wonder why the parties concerned cannot sit down before a strike starts and possibly arrive at the same solution as they reach after perhaps months of idleness and frustration.

Why have we failed to face up to this problem of unemployment in Canada? I say it is because no serious attempt has ever been made to do so. We have always approached it with dribs and drabs and considered it in little pieces. We have never faced up to the fact that we have a serious problem on our hands, and I think the reason is very simple.

All we have ever had in this country are Liberal and Conservative governments and their basic philosophy is that as far as employment is concerned, it is the responsibility of production and industry, and government's should keep their noses out of it. That is the very basis of the principles that the two parties have preferred to believe in. I do not say that the members of the Conservative party or of the Liberal party want unemployment or like it. I think they are just as much opposed to it as I am, and I think many of them have tried very sincerely, within the limits of their philosophy, to find some solution. They take this worn out old tire and put patches on it here and there and finally they get to the stage where they are putting patches on patches, and still they have not found a cure; they still cannot get away from a flat tire. I think it is about time they realized that the best cure is to buy a new tire.

I should like hon. members to think back over the past 50 years and see whether they can find any time in our history, when for any reasonable length of time, where we have solved the problem of unemployment unless the government took a hand in it. The only time we have ever had full employment was when the federal government accepted the responsibility of having all-out production. During wartime we had full employment, full production and jobs for everyone. As soon as the war was over the government stepped out of the picture and free enterprise took over again. What did we have? We had the same thing as we had before the war started. How many times do we have to be taught this lesson before we realize it?

Unemployment is caused by three main problems. One we have always had with us. It is quite true that technical advances have been made in this field, but conditions are such in this country that Canada will always have some degree of seasonal unemployment. Because of climatic conditions in this country certain jobs cannot be done in certain months of the year. As I said, technical advances have been made. We have these new plastic covers which are used to cover buildings and keep the employees working in the winter where formerly they could not work at all. There have been various other technical advances which have assisted us to cut down on this problem to a certain extent, but certainly at least in the foreseeable future it is a problem that is always going to be with us.

A few attacks have been made on this particular problem with some considerable success. The first was the implementation of unemployment insurance. The basic principles of unemployment insurance were carried out at least when the system was started, but I am sorry I cannot say the same for it at the present time. The idea was that over a period of months when you worked you paid a premium, the same as you paid for the insurance on your home, and then during those months when, because of climatic or change-over conditions, or something of that sort, you were unavoidably out of work, from this insurance policy that you had built up you received enough to keep yourself and your dependants going over that short period of time until you went back to work again. That was the basic principle of unemployment insurance.

Another way in which seasonal unemployment has been attacked successfully, although in a very limited way, is by the institution of the guaranteed annual wage. At one time it was very profitable for certain industries to work only six or eight months of the year. They closed down for the other six months or four months to re-tool, to do some repair work or something of that kind, and they did not care about the men who were laid off for those months; it was no responsibility of the company. Since it was more profitable to operate that way, that is the way it should be done. That is the way our free enterprise economy works.

Some trade unions have been strong enough to acquire across the bargaining table what is known as the guaranteed annual wage by which a company, in addition to the individual, accepts some responsibility for year around employment and year around pay cheque. I think it is a very good principle, Mr. Chairman, because surely with all the facilities, all the brains, ingenuity and ability at the disposal of the company, together with the individual, they can arrive at a much better solution than the individual can when he is left to his own devices. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that these two attacks made on this one cause of unemployment can go a long way toward solving that particular problem. Between the guaranteed annual wage and the unemployment insurance fund the problem of seasonal unemployment can, I think, be licked.

If that was the only problem we had it would not be too bad, but unfortunately it is only one of the three major problems we have. As time goes on we find that we have two other major ones as well. The second one is that of automation. Machines are taking over jobs formerly done by 20, 50 or 100 men. There are only two possible solutions to this particular problem. There is a bad solution and a good solution. The bad solution is not to use the machines. We all remember the make work programs we used to have, where a man would pick up a stone here and take it over there and then another man would bring it back again. We had work but we did not accomplish very much. That is the way it would be if we attempted to hold back the scientific progress that automation is bringing about in our society. But we have to realize that if automation is to bring progress, if it is to benefit mankind, then we have also to take into consideration the problems that automation creates.

That is something that we have not been doing. We have made little dabs here and there. I was very pleased to hear the minister tell us the other day in his announcement to the house that they were increasing the federal contribution to 50 per cent to the provinces which went ahead with some kind of technical training scheme which would retrain workers so that they could fit back into society again. I think that is a very good step and in the right direction, but we have to take a great many steps before we reach our goal sometimes. That is the situation in which we find ourselves today, or else we would not have 300,000, 400,000, 500,000, 600,000, 700,000, 800,000 unemployed every year.

The third major problem of unemployment involves two different fields. I do not know of any better example than the position of the coal mining industry and the uranium mining industry in this country. The end result of both is the same: the eventual shutdown of the industry and a complete shutdown of the employment provided by the industry to many men who have spent their lives in the industry. The uranium industry was much more dramatic because it was much quicker. What took 50 years to happen in the coal mining industry happened in five years in the uranium industry. It was drawn to our attention much more quickly, much more dramatically; it was much more newsworthy, but the end result is the same. Whether it is a uranium miner in Elliot Lake or a coal miner in Alberta, both of them find themselves in exactly the same position. Here again the only solution certainly that we can offer is similar to the one suggested to meet the problems caused by automation.

I say that this problem must be tackled and tackled vigorously because it is not being cured but rather is increasing very rapidly all the time. It is true that bad as things were last winter they were still not quite as bad as they were in 1938 when a Liberal government had been in office for some three years. At that time unemployment reached the highest peak in the history of this country. But if we are to believe the economists, who are almost unanimous in their predictions, unfortunately next winter is going to set a new record in this field.

I was also pleased that after considerable prodding from opposition members, and

I assume and hope from government members as well, the Minister of Public Works announced the other day that as of the beginning of September they are taking the lid off the housing fund. I am glad to see that he is finally following the example of the previous minister who in my opinion almost single-handedly, so far as government action was concerned, was able to turn the tide of recession in 1957. I think that the building program embarked upon by the minister at that time did more than anything else done by this government to prevent what could have been a very much worse recession.

These problems and other related problems are certainly the responsibility of the federal government because they are the only group in the country with the resources at their disposal to meet such problems. Over the past number of years we have had examples of how formerly the Liberal government and now the Conservative government have tried to meet the problems of unemployment. The difficulty has been that they have applied the only remedy they have, unemployment insurance, in an effort to try to cover the waterfront and the result has been disastrous. Unemployment insurance was never designed to cope with the problem raised by automation. It was never designed to meet the problem of closed industries. The result has been twofold. In the first place, in the last three years the fund has been reduced from something over $900 million to approximately $200 million, as I believe I heard the other day, in spite of a substantial increase in premiums.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is $290 million.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): But there is something far more serious which is going to be much harder to cure. While the government has been doing this, while they have been adding weeks to the period of payment of unemployment insurance benefits, they have been building up in the country the old political gimmick involving the idea of something for nothing so that today we are receiving letters from people who say that they have paid into the unemployment insurance fund for ten years and they should get a dividend from it. I have such letters in my office that I can show hon. members, as I am sure many other hon. members have. The people have no idea what the principle of unemployment insurance is at all. They look upon it as something they get from the government not realizing that they are the ones who have paid for it in the first place and the purpose for which they made their payments. I cannot blame people for doing this because certainly there is no insurance principle today in the unemployment insurance fund. All it is today is a sort of glorified welfare fund and everybody in the country from coast to coast is trying to climb on the bandwagon.

There is another very dangerous trend developing in the country, a trend that takes us back to the last time a Conservative government was in power. I refer to the tendency of government members more and more to try to create the impression that the only people who are not working today are those who do not want to work. Many of us can remember all the so-called bums who were wandering across the country from coast to coast in the thirties. I was one of them.

Mr. Thrasher: Not bums.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I know a number of other hon. members who were in the same boat. They were not able to get work in the places where they were born and because they sought employment elsewhere throughout the country they were chased from town to town by municipal police officers for the sole purpose of getting them out of there before they became a charge on the community and had to be fed, clothed and housed by the community. What happened to all these bums during the forties and fifties? Where did they go?

Mr. MacInnis: Apparently the hon. member thinks there are a few of us here.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Very true. Many of them joined the armed forces. Many of them shed their blood for the country, came out of the armed forces, went to work and worked for 15 years, but now things have run their full cycle. I have talked to men who rode the rods during the thirties seeking work from coast to coast and who now find themselves in the same position.

An hon. Member: They do not ride the rods today.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): No, they do not ride the rods today. We have progressed a little since that time. We have passed social measures so that people do not have to starve today. They can always get enough to keep body and soul together provided they stay in their own community. Possibly that is one of the reasons we have not realized that the situation is almost as bad, if not just as bad, as it was during the thirties. In those days you could starve to death in your home town but today you can always go to the municipal welfare office provided you can establish residence and that you have lived in the community for a year. It may be that in some cases the fact that a man has to remain in the community prevents him from going elsewhere to seek work. Because of this restriction, the social measures we have passed possibly are adding in a small way to the problems today.

We see the same situation raising its ugly head again. Although I hope this is not so, I am afraid that the spreading of the idea that the only people who are out of work are those who do not want to work will increase as time goes on. I have heard hon. members refer to various jobs being available and have seen them produce advertisements to prove it, but what we do not realize is that many of the men who have been thrown out of work are not qualified for the jobs that are available. Furthermore, many of them have the responsibility of a family so that they cannot afford the length of time it would require to take the necessary training in a technical school in order to qualify for these jobs.

That is why I was pleased to see the government take one more little step in the right direction but I think they should take a much bigger step because in view of the facilities the government has at its disposal, whereby it is able to ascertain in the first place what jobs are available and where the surplus of manpower is, the government, if it has the will and desire, should be able to do much more about the problem.

I should like to refer to what happened just after the last war. We had over a million men in uniform, many of whom had never worked a day in their lives as civilians. They had either been out of work from the time they left school until they joined the forces or they joined the forces directly on leaving school. What did we do? We made training available to these men so they would be better qualified to fit into society again. If they were married and had families we made sure that they had enough to keep their families going while they accepted this training, whether it was university, technical or whatever training they took. I would say, Mr. Chairman, that was one of the best things we ever did because we not only helped those individuals but, as a result of this training, they were better qualified when they went back into society and they were more of an asset to this country.

I would say this was the method by which we should approach the unemployment problem today. All we have had in the past from governments in relation to this problem has been a little dab here, a little dab there and a little dab some place else. It has been something like feeding a headache pill to someone suffering from a brain tumour. Sure, the headache is stopped for a while, but we do not cure the condition; we just postpone the inevitable. That is exactly what we have been doing in regard to unemployment over the years.

I believe it is a fair thing to say, Mr. Chairman, that during the past two years we have never had less than one quarter of a million unemployed. We have had as high as three quarters of a million. As I mentioned before, economists have been predicting that the unemployed could amount to over a million this year. I cannot see any sense in a society which since the war has spent $20 billion on obsolete defence to defeat communism, yet still permits a million unemployed in this country which breeds communism. If the communists ever get a start in this country it will be because of unemployment, and not because they came in from the outside. I should like to back up that statement by asking when communism was at its strongest point in this country? It was back during the thirties and early forties.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I have very little more to add, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Starr: We would be agreeable to allowing the hon. member to complete his remarks.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent to permitting the hon. member to complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I mentioned the other day, Mr. Chairman, that the millionnaires have proven they are not socially responsible but rather that they are socially rapacious. I say that this government has a responsibility to all the citizens of this country to ensure that the actions they take are going to be in the interests of all the people of this country and not just in the interests of a few selfish individuals.

(Translation):

Mr. Allard: Mr. Chairman, I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) to a couple of facts, one of local character and another national in scope.

On the local level, I vigorously protest the new delay on the part of the unemployment insurance commission in dealing with the dispute between 369 workers of the Dominion Textile of Sherbrooke and the commission. I shall read a statement published on July 8 last by the workers union of the Dominion Textile of Sherbrooke:

The employees of the Dominion Textile in Sherbrooke heard to their great surprise and dismay that consideration in respect of the right to unemployment insurance benefits of the 369 employees who were dismissed on November 6, 1959, will only be taken up three weeks from now by the arbitration board in Sherbrooke.

Considering that annual leave for workers in that company is to be taken in the last two weeks of July, it is rather difficult to expect the hearing before that board to take place before early in August.

Considering that the case of those 369 employees has been up for hearing since early November 1959, it is high time that public opinion be aroused and informed of the policy and attitude of some officials in the unemployment insurance commission with regard to the claimants who have been unemployed for the greater part of last winter without receiving any benefits (from November 6, 1959 to February 27, 1960), and who are still waiting for a final decision to be rendered by which they would be declared eligible for unemployment insurance benefits.

Having been laid off on November 6, 1959 by the Dominion Textile plant in Sherbrooke, those 369 employees went to the unemployment insurance office, during the following week, to fill out their claim forms. On November 19, they were disqualified by the local unemployment insurance official.

The union representing those employees lodged an appeal with the arbitration board in Sherbrooke (of which Mr. Antonio Pinard is chairman). The arbitration board having considered the whole case with much attention and having rendered on December 21, 1959, a unanimous decision which was, in every respect, favourable to the employees concerned, the said local official appealed that unanimous decision before the single arbitrator in Ottawa on January 6, 1960. The arbitrator's hearing was held in Montreal on March 16, and his decision rendered on May 27, 1960.

During the hearing, the attorney of the commission submitted copies of newspapers, claiming this constituted new evidence. All actions or representations by the representative of commission employees only had the effect of beclouding the issue and confusing the arbitrator.

As a result the said arbitrator referred the new evidence to the local board of arbitration for consideration, so that a new hearing might be held on the matter in dispute and a decision rendered on the point at issue before the single arbitrator made a final ruling on the whole matter.

The Sherbrooke board of arbitration has been ready to hear this case since early June, but has been unable to sit because it is still waiting for the file on the investigation conducted by the regional officer, which is not yet ready after over two months' delay.

In view of such useless delays and abusive procedures on the part of certain representatives of the unemployment insurance commission, the executive of the Association des Employes du Textile de Sherbrooke Inc., on behalf of its members, strongly and publicly protests the inconceivable attitude of some officials who seem to be resorting to a method that can only be used by a public authority or by a party without financial responsibility for the costs of a case, and with little regard for the hardship sustained by employees who have been laid off and have been waiting to receive their benefits for over eight (8) long months. The employees are not asking for charity, they are merely demanding their rights, which should be enjoyed by anyone insured under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it six o'clock?

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit a question? I wonder if the hon. gentleman would be kind enough to speak a little more slowly?

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

(Translation):

Mr. Allard: Mr. Chairman, before the six o'clock recess, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) asked me to speak more slowly. It gives me pleasure to meet his request, but I must say I am surprised at his interest in the textile workers in view of the fact that as a member of the last Liberal federal cabinet he was among those largely responsible for sabotaging that Canadian industry.

Having read the statement of the workers union of Dominion Textile in Sherbrooke, I wish to say to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) that I fully support the statement.

I urge him to intervene immediately, in order that an early solution be found to this difficult problem for the benefit of the workers concerned.

The second aspect of my remarks concerns the unemployment in the textile industry and the numerous difficulties this Canadian industry has to face on the domestic market.

Some 20 years ago, Canadian textile products were supplying about 75 per cent of the Canadian market. Today, they barely supply 44 per cent of the national market.

The major cause of this situation is the quantity of foreign textiles flooding the Canadian market.

In 1959, United States mills sold in Canada 6 million more yards of cotton than did Canadian mills.

Besides, in that same year, 1959, Japanese textile exports increased by 56 per cent.

The situation last year was becoming so alarming that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) made protests to the Japanese who agreed to voluntarily reduce their quotas in 1960. They were supposed to make their views known to us in December 1959, but they postponed their decision until early May, 1960.

However, in spite of our warnings, Japan continues to flood the Canadian market and its quotas, according to Mr. Laz Peters, chairman of the Canadian textile manufacturers association, are still excessive.

On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, a few months ago, when he visited Washington, the Minister of Finance asked the U.S. government to suspend subsidies on U.S. exports of textiles into Canada. The answer he got was a flat no.

Therefore, in the face of the U.S. government's categorical refusal, and of the Japanese government's tacit refusal, followed by a continued flooding of the Canadian market, it has become necessary for the Canadian government, after observing amenities at the international level, such as representations which I mentioned a moment ago, to fix its own quotas with regard to the most vulnerable sections of the textile industry.

It goes without saying that the present government, since it came into office has done a great deal in its attempt to settle this difficult problem of textile products that we have inherited from the previous Liberal administration.

Allow me to summarize under 12 headings the efforts made by this government in this field.

1. In 1957, a request for inquiry and recommendations to the tariff board concerning tariff duties on textile products;

2. In 1958, the present government raised the British preferential tariff on woollens and carded wool under tariff item 554b;

3. In 1959, the government raised the most favoured nation tariff with regard to section 554b, in order to restore the British preferential margin;

4. In 1958, the government considerably amended the definition of the word "dumping" in the act;

5. Additional assessors were appointed and instructions were given to request more detailed invoices, accompanied by samples;

6. Certain measures are taken with regard to particular groups of commodities on receipt of recommendations from the tariff board, while due consideration is given to the overall pattern of our international agreements;

7. Negotiations were started in Geneva during the 1959 GATT session, with regard to a number of textile products;

Mr. Pickersgill: You are speaking too fast.

[Mr. Allard.]

Mr. Allard:

8. Official authorization was obtained to pursue negotiations with regard to consolidated textile items under instructions No. 125 to the tariff board;
Japanese textiles.

10. Following the budget speech of the Minister of Finance, on March 31, 1960, and following the four budgetary resolutions, a tariff increase of about 15 per cent was imposed on many foreign textile products.

11. On May 5, we received information about Japanese quotas for the year 1960.

12. In 1960, the Minister of Finance asked the American government to cut down subsidies on textile products exports to Canada.

Those are, Mr. Chairman, serious steps which make one understand the efforts and the spirit shown by this government to settle the unemployment problem in the field of textile products. And as I said at the beginning of my remarks in the face of events which happened recently, namely the refusals of the American and Japanese governments, I humbly think that it now becomes necessary, in order to relieve unemployment in the textile industry, for the Canadian government to establish quotas in the most vulnerable sectors of that important field of our secondary industries.

This is the recourse which is left to us in order to reduce unemployment in this area and allow our Canadian industries to recover a larger share of our domestic market.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, every time the estimates of the Minister of Labour come up, we are reminded of this famous statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) in an election campaign:

(Text):

As long as I am Prime Minister no man or woman is going to suffer from employment, as long as public works will provide them with the assistance they require.

(Translation):

That was a long time ago, yet unemployment is still a very important factor in Canada's economy.

During the first year and for a good part of the second year, the people of Canada were perhaps inclined to side with the Prime Minister, who stated that the Liberal party had not laid the ground work in anticipation of a depression.

I thank my hon. friends for this applause.

However, the Conservative party has now been in office for three years, and the excuse used in former years is no longer valid. Our friends have now had time to review the situation and to apply corrective measures. That, however, would have required appropriate steps, which they failed to take.

I feel sorry for the minister because he is a nice chap, who has acquired much experience.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caron: Again, I thank you—who, as I say, has acquired much experience in the field of labour and I know he means well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caron: Thank you.

But, his position is unstable, and I am convinced that he does not enjoy the co-operation that he is entitled to expect from his colleagues.

And to support this, I will refer only to what appears on pages 1406 and 1407 of the English Hansard of February 24, when, following a certain discussion with the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), he said:

(Text):

I must say at once that, in my opinion, no unemployment has ever been solved in this country through conferences.

(Translation):

The hon. member for Quebec East—I am sorry, the hon. member for Essex East—

An hon. Member: He is mixed up.

Mr. Caron: —urged the ministers to call a conference of trade unions and labour of the provinces in order to try to find a solution to the situation. This is, in fact, what he said:

(Text):

That is what the hon. minister recommended himself; a dominion-provincial conference and a parliamentary committee.

(Translation):

And the minister replied: "I did."

I am surprised by the statement of the hon. member for Essex East who replied: "Your party, and you supported it". And the minister replied:

(Text):

—I speak for myself in this regard. What has been said by others in the past is their own responsibility.

(Translation):

Therefore, he could not take the responsibility for the statements of others, and this proves beyond any doubt that he did not have within the cabinet the full co-operation he might have expected. I know that he would like to accomplish great things, but he is misunderstood.

All the same, as Minister of Labour he has to take responsibility for government action in the field of labour.

At present, unemployment stands at a dangerous level for this time of year. We can expect an extremely serious situation when the cold season comes around.

To prove my case, I shall refer to a D.B.S. bulletin released on July 26, 1960, this very week. That bulletin reads in part as follows:

Unemployment insurance applicants reached 296,400 on June 30. This is 35 per cent more than the 220,500 registered applicants on June 30, 1959.

A 35 per cent increase. And farther on, the bulletin reads:

More than 75 per cent of the increase over last year applies to male workers, and 70 per cent of them were in Ontario and Quebec.

The two leading provinces are the ones most affected, and are turning to the other provinces for assistance in finding an answer to that problem. And yet nothing comes from Ottawa.

And further down, in the same D.B.S. daily bulletin, we read the following:

Unemployment payments reached $26,800,000 in June—and $18,200,000 in June 1959.

A substantial difference.

The increase in payments over last year (48 per cent) is much higher than the increase in claims at the end of the month (35 per cent) and the extension of benefits over a few additional weeks (39 per cent).

The figures are as follows: In Canada 296,400; and last year, during the same month, that is on June 30: 220,500. And what about the original and renewed claims in Canada: 128,500; and, last year, in 1959, 107,100?

That is to say, Mr. Chairman, that the situation we have to face at this time is extremely serious. However, the government does not seem to be overly worried about it.

The minister spoke about some changes, some improvements which had been brought about. But he did not seem alarmed, and appears to take things with a disconcerting ease. As in the song: "Everything is just fine, madame l'électrice". Our chief cause of concern—

Mr. Asselin: That is Mr. Lesage's way of doing things.

An hon. Member: He has been elected, has he not?

Mr. Ricard: By default.

Mr. Asselin: We are anxious to see what he will do.

Mr. Caron: Very well, sir, I shall have the opportunity of referring to that, of dealing with those matters a little later, if you will be just a little patient.

Mr. Brassard (Chicoutimi): We are very patient.

Mr. Caron: Our chief cause of concern is the optimism of the minister who does not seem to realize the seriousness of the situation.

Yet, in business circles, even the most optimistic have to admit that, unfortunately, the way things are going at present, we will probably have over 800,000 unemployed next winter. Others maintain that there will be over a million.

Is Canada able to afford the luxury of such unemployment next winter?

Those conditions exist and are getting worse from year to year, since this government took over in Ottawa. Everybody is worried, except the government. How can responsible people consider the situation with such complacency and without appearing in the least alarmed? Unless they be consummate actors, I am unable to understand that their faces should not reflect any worry at this time.

(Text):

Mr. Speakman: Would the hon. member permit a question? Does he seriously believe what he has just said, that the government is not concerned about this situation?

Mr. Caron: I said they should be concerned, but what surprised me was this—they must be good actors because it does not show on their faces.

(Translation):

In any case, at present, hundreds of thousands of our fellow citizens are not earning enough to pay their unemployment insurance contributions, which would entitle them to benefits next winter. The situation is thus rendered alarming because, once again, the burden will fall on the municipalities and provincial governments. At the present time, as the public welfare officer told me last week in Hull, the number of welfare applications is increasing substantially in this period of the year when, normally, it tends to decline. This is not calculated to hearten those who dare think ahead for next winter; and our provincial governments will have to bear a responsibility that the present Prime Minister of Canada did not attribute to them in 1955, because I remember that the present Prime Minister then said, as recorded on page 2036 of Hansard for March 15, 1955:

"Over the past seven or eight years there have been recommendations by the national employment commission, the Sirois commission and others, that the dominion should assume responsibility for necessary relief to the employable unemployed. It has been generally suggested that the dominion should accept this obligation as part of any general settlement with the provinces."

That, at the time, was the attitude of the present Prime Minister; he asserted that the main responsibility with respect to the employable unemployed rested squarely on the shoulders of the federal government, which could, of course, call for the co-operation of the provinces in that field. However, he emphasized the fact that the main burden rested on the federal government. The tune seems rather different today.

Mr. Pigeon: What does Mr. Lesage have to say on the subject?

Mr. Rouleau: Mr. Lesage has no need for the advice of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

Mr. Ricard: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Caron: Certainly, I am in a good mood at the moment.

Mr. Ricard: Does the hon. member know that in the years 1951 to 1957, 23 textile mills were forced to close down in the province of Quebec, according to the Primary Textiles Institute?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That was not a federal government responsibility.

An hon. Member: Was it the responsibility of Mr. Lesage?

Mr. Caron: I recognize that that may be true, I am no expert in the field of textiles; there is no textile industry in this area, and I have not studied the subject. Moreover, in view of the fact that the hon. member has been reading from a report which seems to be genuine, I accept it as I accept his word. I would add, however, that if previous governments did certain things that should have been corrected, that does not absolve the present government from taking its full responsibilities. That, as I say, is my present position, and I can assure the hon. member—

Mr. Ricard: And that of the previous government.

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: I will say to the hon. member that I try to live in the present, not in the past. I try to look to the future, because, being of a Liberal frame of mind, I cannot live in the past as do the Conservatives.

So far, what action has been taken in that field, Mr. Chairman? Oh, the government has made a few changes, on the recommendation of the opposition with regard to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. As announced the other day by the Prime Minister, there have been a few changes to the winter works program, but that is all.

Are those formulas a remedy to the present illness? They might be of some help, I admit. All we can do might help, and we are glad they are trying to do something, but the problem is too much—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caron: Once again, thank you for the applause. But the problem requires very much more than those small remedies. We must look much farther; besides, this is not what our hon. friends opposite were saying or thinking at the time they sat in the opposition. In fact, I would like to indicate with the help of Hansard, what the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) said in 1955 as found at page 2261 of Hansard:

> In the midst of abundance, in the midst of surpluses, in the midst of evidences of prosperity this ugly fact of unemployment continues.

Well, Mr. Chairman, this ugly fact of unemployment continues. While government members talk about prosperity, that ugly fact of unemployment not only continues but grows worse. And there are those who claim that the government which had promised to right all wrongs, to improve everything, to change everything, is doing what it should do under the circumstances.

Mr. Pigeon: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Caron: I accept questions from certain members, but I know the others, and I do not accept anything from them.

An hon. Member: Write to Mr. Antonio Barrette.

Mr. Pigeon: You cannot answer.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I feel I am entitled to be a bit contemptuous.

An hon. Member: Of you?

Mr. Caron: Then I find at page 3396 of Hansard of May 3, 1955 what the present Minister of Finance said when he sat on this side of the house:

> The second problem which has been ignored by the government is the problem of unemployment. This problem has been discussed at length in this session—

He said:

> —or I would seek to go into it at greater length today. But let me content myself, in this limited time, with making this limited observation on the subject, that the government throughout this session has observed a conspiracy of silence in regard to unemployment—

Were we not faced with the very same situation? We have put questions time and again, and the hon. member for Essex East did not let a week go by without asking the minister for information not only on the unemployment situation but also on what the government had in mind to meet the situation. All we got were evasive answers. We were not supplied with the documents which would have enabled us to study the situation. Why? It is precisely because on the other side of this house they realized that nothing substantial had been done to relieve unemployment.

I have another quotation, this one from the Prime Minister. When he was on this side of the house, in 1955, the Prime Minister said, as reported on page 3612 of Hansard:

> At the beginning I am just going to say a word in regard to employment. Strangely enough, there has been no serious answer from the government regarding the unemployment problem that still fills the hearts of many Canadians, no answer whatever as to what is to be done now by the government, except a speech by the Prime Minister at the dominion-provincial conference—

How like today.

> —as to what is to be expected at a further meeting to take place this coming fall between the federal and provincial authorities.

Again a striking similarity.

> Indeed, the great and abiding principles that were to bring about a new millennium in dominion and provincial relations now have been embalmed in the records of history.

Isn't that just like the meeting which took place this year. Provincial premiers wanted to discuss that unemployment matter which is of concern to everybody; but instead of dealing with unemployment, they talked about bringing back the constitution to Canada. Nobody dared tackle that matter. They tried to embalm the whole matter so people would forget about it. Believe me, Mr. Chairman, people are suffering at present and cannot forget this vital matter.

Mr. Chairman, I still have another quotation, but it is the last one. This is a statement made by the Minister of Finance at the time when he was concerned with unemployment. He seems to have forgotten about it since then. He is so busy trying to avoid deficits. As reported on page 2261 of Hansard of 1955, he stated this:

> There are people in Canada today who are going hungry as a result of unemployment. There are ruptures in family life that are occurring day by day as a result of unemployment. In the great urban centres where unemployment is acute it is the experience of all those connected with welfare, church or philanthropic work in any capacity, that men are deserting their families deliberately because that is the only way in which their families can qualify for relief assistance.

The same situation exists today, the same which was described by the Minister of Finance when he was on this side of the house. This is exactly what we have today.

I maintain that the government has failed to do its duty, in a fair way, in a way consistent with the seriousness of the situation. It may be still time for the government to take action. Therefore, I ask the minister to urge other cabinet members to look around and realize the seriousness of the situation. The minister if not in this house, at least in his own office, certainly heard, some members of his party complaining of the seriousness of the situation. I do not blame them for not mentioning it in the house because they are "party men", but they are always complaining because they have to admit that the government is making no effort to improve conditions.

Earlier today, a certain member asked me what the government of the province of Quebec did with regard to unemployment. I was just about to mention it.

There are two kinds of unemployment: seasonal unemployment, and almost permanent unemployment, which is caused by automation, by machines replacing man. Well, I am among those who believe that each of the two governments has its part of responsibility. The provincial government has a certain responsibility, and so has the federal government. But the larger part of responsibility is that of the central body. It is up to this government to bring relief to the jobless and to give him work at a time when he is unemployed. The utmost will have to be done in order to prevent those people from suffering hardship; and yet, nothing seems to be done at this time.

On the other hand, I maintain that it is the responsibility of the provincial government to try and increase the setting up within its boundaries of a variety of industries, so as to be able to supply the people with jobs. May I be allowed to suggest that the government consider the proposal made to the Americans in 1920 by the Hon. Mr. Gouin when he told them: "You want to use our forests, etc.; in that case, come and set up your industries in our country." It was at that time that the International Paper emerged which established itself here, as well as the Anglo pulp and paper company. Besides, those industries gave rise to the magnificent town of Gatineau, in my constituency.

That suggestion came to us from the Gouin government in 1920. We hope the provincial government will find the means of solving the unemployment problem. But while the provincial government is considering the situation, it is the responsibility of the federal government to see to it that people do not suffer from the hardships brought about by unemployment. It must see to it that families have something to feed, house, clothe and warm themselves in winter. That is the immediate responsibility of the federal government, because it is the one that has the greater source of income; its responsibility is the most complete, total and immediate.

Mr. Chairman, I regret that time is flying so fast, because I would have liked to deal perhaps a little longer with the dilapidation of the unemployment insurance fund.

When the Conservative party came into power in 1957, the unemployment insurance fund had accumulated about $900 million to provide for difficult years.

Today, we hear from the minister, according to the latest figures he gave us, that the fund has now gone down to $296 million. If that situation is allowed to continue, the fund will go down substantially, because each month, according to statistics, there is a decrease of $26,800,000. So, if we take off, at one stroke, $26 million from those $296 million, only $270 million are left.

And if this situation should continue, it will become worse next fall and winter and it will mean that the unemployment insurance fund will be totally depleted next winter.

What did the minister provide? What did the government provide to replenish this unemployment insurance fund which is essential to continue to help the unemployed?

This very year, despite the fact that last year, the house raised the payments into the unemployment insurance fund by $78 million through increases in the contributions of workers and employers, the government should have asked the house to vote $300 or $400 million to replenish the fund. But nothing was done. Why? Is it because they fear a deficit?

We have said this in the past, and I repeat it: we think it is quite proper for the government to run up a deficit to alleviate the people's hardship, to bring about social improvement or to prevent human suffering. But when the government does nothing and in spite of that, runs into expenses which might be avoided, I think it is wrong.

Mr. Chairman, this morning I had the visit of a number of my constituents. Never have I had so many calls from heads of families who are in need.

I even had a man crying in my office this morning over the problems he is faced with. That man told me he has been looking for a job for six months, without success. He is reduced to begging. He has no money. As he is reluctant to beg, I had to get in touch with the welfare service in the city of Hull to find out whether they could look after him. That man cried in my office, and you know, Mr. Chairman, how sad it is to see a man cry. Now that is not a unique situation; there are many similar cases, so I should like to close my remarks with this simple quotation—

Mr. Chairman, has my speaking time expired?

(Text):

Mr. Starr: Will the hon. member permit an interruption? I would appreciate it very much if the hon. member would give me the name and the address of this person. I think I can do something for him.

Mr. Caron: I certainly will do so and I thank the minister for making that offer.

Mr. Ricard: What is his name?

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I am in a good mood and I will not allow those individuals to make me lose my temper.

So, Mr. Chairman, may I conclude my remarks by quoting these words from Franklin D. Roosevelt:

(Text):

The test of our progress is not whether we add more to the abundance of those who have much; it is whether we provide enough for those who have too little.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I hope that the government will draw its inspiration from those wise words of Franklin D. Roosevelt and that it will try to give much to those who have nothing in order to alleviate their troubles.

(Text):

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Chairman, it is with much pride that I rise in my place at this time to support a government which is led by a Prime Minister who said that as long as he is Prime Minister directing the government and as long as any one man is unemployed this government will consider the problem most seriously and enact most vigorous measures.

Mr. Pickersgill: Give the quotation correctly.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Denis: No one will suffer.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask my generous and amiable friend if he will give us the exact text and where and when these words were used by the Prime Minister who, if I am correct, said no one will suffer—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Chairman, I feel that was not a question; it was a statement. Before getting into the substance of my remarks this evening—

Mr. Pickersgill: Give us the time and place.

Mr. Grafftey: —I should like to say that this is the tactic that hon. members to my right often employ. Every time we bring in a measure to help the employment situation they say it is nothing and they try to indicate to the people of Canada that this is the only measure with which we are facing the employment situation. Such is never the case. To summarize very briefly, may I say that we have heard speech after speech in the House of Commons by the Minister of Labour indicating that the government has enacted sound measures based on basic Progressive Conservative doctrine; measures which recognize the dignity of the individual, measures which are designed to encourage activity on the local level, measures, I repeat, which in short are in complete accord with the basic doctrines of the party I support. These are the measures, housing—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Grafftey: I ask hon. members to my right, will the recent announcement in relation to housing not stimulate employment and the economy? Of course it will. But hon. members laugh. The leader of the C.C.F. party or new party has just laughed, Mr. Chairman. I suggest that he laugh in front of the people who will be employed because of these measures. The Minister of Labour and the Prime Minister announced recently, and earlier this year, an expanded winter works program, a program which, according to the principles of our party, will be enacted on the local level. I remember what the hon.

member for Port Arthur said when I spoke last year on a similar occasion and reported the fact that I hoped that in some way I had helped to put this program over in my own area. We all know that the hon. member for Port Arthur has some very funny theories in relation to the functions of a member of parliament. At any rate he accused me of usurping the functions of civil servants. Such was not the case.

I suggest, that the winter works program is a program toward which every member of parliament can take a bipartisan attitude. It is a program designed to stimulate winter employment on the local level and I feel that every member of parliament on both sides of the house has a responsibility to help to put the program over in his or her respective area.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Grafftey: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would he explain where the C.C.F. comes in in a bipartisan program?

An hon. Member: You cannot tell the difference between the Liberals and the C.C.F.

Mr. Grafftey: I should like to say to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that any problem regarding employment demands bipartisanship, even from the C.C.F. Then we have the measure announced by the Minister of Labour providing increased funds for the education of unemployed people. We also have the increased emphasis that is being put on the national placement service by the Minister of Labour. Every hon. member of the house must recognize the fact that since the government has come to power—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We have had disaster.

Mr. Grafftey: —workers from one end of the country to the other realize the efforts that are being made through the national placement service offices to place men in jobs.

Mr. Pickersgill: Unfortunately that is true.

Mr. Howard: Apple polisher.

Mr. Grafftey: I could go on to say that these measures are not a cure-all, but in the face of that record, which is not a cure-all, I think opposition members are being most irresponsible, as was the hon. member for Hull, when they say that the present government is not vitally concerned and is not acting in a real way in the face of the present situation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: Negative and passive.

[Mr. Grafftey.]

Mr. Grafftey: I should like to say that the hon. member for Essex East in his usual fashion, with plenty of thunder and fury—in fact I think it was William Shakespeare who said, "Much sound and fury signifying nothing"—made one good suggestion and I will refer to it later. But what in fact did the hon. member for Essex East propose in his speech? In essence the hon. member has demanded a conference to study unemployment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I demanded action.

Mr. Grafftey: In his usual way he tried in his speech to convince the house that the government has attempted in some unknown fashion to stifle debate on the employment situation. Time and time again he said that the house was denied an opportunity to discuss the unemployment situation. I ask you, Mr. Chairman, what are we having now if it is not an opportunity to discuss the unemployment situation?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In the last days of the session.

Mr. Grafftey: Just five minutes ago we heard the hon. member for Hull say that the unemployment or employment situation had been discussed often in the House of Commons. Who is right? I suggest that there has been a lot of debate in the house as to who is responsible for unemployment. Frankly, I am not interested in these detailed niceties. I can say one thing—

Mr. Pickersgill: What about the Prime Minister on January 20, 1958?

Mr. Grafftey: —that a man who is out of work is not interested in who is responsible, the municipal, provincial or federal authorities. He is interested in finding a job. I am not going to get into these detailed arguments. I should like to inform the hon. member for Hull that during the last Quebec provincial election campaign the new premier of the province said that unemployment was entirely a provincial responsibility.

Mr. Pickersgill: Where is the quotation?

Mr. Grafftey: I frankly do not agree with this but he said it nevertheless in a burst of political enthusiasm.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman tell us where and when he said it? That statement is untrue and the hon. member knows it.

Mr. Grafftey: I often wonder, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Ricard: We know it is untrue because it was made by the premier of the province of Quebec.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The Chair cannot permit more than one member to speak at a time. The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, when an hon. member, even the amiable hon. member who is speaking, makes a statement which is challenged and he is asked for the authority for the statement I believe it is our practice for the hon. member to give us his authority. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate asked for the authority.

Mr. McGee: He was out of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He modestly asked for the authority, and I think we have a right to ask the hon. and vigorous member for Brome-Missisquoi to give us the authority for his statement.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate—

The Deputy Chairman: Order; the hon. member for Essex East asked a question, and repeated his question. If the hon. member has another point, or is he rising on a point of order?

Mr. MacInnis: Yes, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has just made a remark from his seat that the member speaking has made an untrue statement.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is right.

The Deputy Chairman: I understood he asked him the source of his statement.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Cape Breton South is correct. I stated, and I repeat, that the statement made by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi that the premier of Quebec stated unemployment was exclusively a provincial responsibility is a statement which is completely untrue and the hon. gentleman knows it is untrue.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

The Deputy Chairman: Order; we are just having contradictions here, and they can be taken up after the hon. member has completed his speech.

Mr. Grafftey: I have been asked so many questions that I am only going to answer them very briefly. Before I answer them I should like to say this, and it is a very interesting point. During the many election campaigns in my province I find that in the campaign literature published by the Liberal party they always say, "We were not responsible for that."

The Deputy Chairman: Order; I shall have to ask the hon. member to come back to the subject under discussion.

Mr. Grafftey: In answer to the question posed to me by the hon. member for Essex East, may I say that I have in my hand a copy of a full page advertisement in Le Devoir, Montreal, dated Tuesday, May 10, 1960, concerning the problem of unemployment. It reads:

(Translation):

The Liberal solution:

1. To consider unemployment as a family problem and a provincial responsibility.

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: Was that statement made by the premier of Quebec?

Mr. Grafftey: On May 17, 1960 Le Devoir reports, and I am translating the article:

St. Joseph d'Alma: The leader of the provincial Liberal party, Mr. Jean Lesage, promised Sunday that his government will tackle the problem of unemployment not by "reverting to the system of direct relief"—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: You are reading the wrong quotation.

Mr. Bourget: Read it all.

Mr. Pickersgill: Go ahead.

Mr. Grafftey: I continue reading:

—not by "reverting to the system of direct relief", founded by the Conservatives in 1931 under Mr. Bennett, as it has just been promised by the leader of the Union Nationale—Mr. Barrette —at Granby, but by a planned economic development of the province and by tactical training of workers at home . . .

It is further reported that Mr. Lesage observed that Mr. Barrette had, nevertheless, recognized that the provincial authorities have their responsibility in the solution of the unemployment problem.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Grafftey: I want to revert to the original point I tried to make, and that is that the man out of work is not really interested in the niceties of who is responsible for finding him employment. It is for this reason I reiterate time and time again in this house, that I feel the problem of employment or unemployment is a problem that often demands a bipartisan approach from hon. members. It is for this reason, that so many of the utterances of the hon. member for Essex East in this chamber ring hollowly in my ears.

I can say this, as well, that we must recognize the government is taking active measures in the face of the present situation.

Mr. Pickersgill: Name them.

Mr. Grafftey: As I have already mentioned, the hon. member for Essex East had many suggestions to make.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Grafftey: However, I ask him this one question. Over and above the fact that he demanded that we initiate a grandiose conference to discuss the problem, what concrete measure was proposed—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member has asked me a question.

Mr. Grafftey: I am not interested in what—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Deputy Chairman: Order; the hon. member for Essex East has the floor.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. The hon. gentleman has asked me a question.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He has asked me a question.

Mr. Hees: He knows he would not get an answer.

Mr. Bourget: Are you afraid of the answer?

The Deputy Chairman: Order; once again I must remind hon. members that we cannot have more than one speaker at a time. The hon. member for Essex East was asked a question. I must remind hon. members that they cannot interrupt the hon. member who has the floor unless he permits a question to be asked.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman for whom I have a deep affection, asked me a question—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Unless it was a rhetorical question and not meant to be answered I shall be glad to deal with it if the hon. gentleman wishes me to do so.

The Deputy Chairman: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Grafftey: In point of fact, I was asking myself a rhetorical question. I have put on the record this evening some of the active measures, undeniably active measures that have been taken by this government.

Mr. Pickersgill: What are they?

Mr. Grafftey: I am not going to say these are a cure-all; I am not for a minute going to suggest that employment or unemployment, as such, is not a problem, but I am going to suggest that active measures have been taken and more active measures will be taken. I am going to suggest that the people of Canada are not interested in the constitutional niceties relating to the role of the opposition.

An hon. Member: Oh, no?

[Mr. Grafftey.]

Mr. Grafftey: I am going to say that at times it would be nice to hear a constructive suggestion from the opposition in a field as important as this. I believe it is irresponsible partisanship to suggest for one minute that the problem of employment has not been given full discussion in this house since we convened here in January.

Another point with which I feel we must deal is the sort of straw man that deserves to be burned as quickly as possible. Hon. members opposite have suggested that the premier of the province of Quebec made a statement in relation to the unemployment problem, and that it may have been discussed in camera during the recent dominion-provincial meetings. The Prime Minister was attacked for not making a statement with regard to what was discussed in this conference recently. Hon. members opposite well know that no statement, either from provincial premiers or the Prime Minister, could be made in relation to those meetings that were held in camera, so I feel this is just another instance of partisan bickering and hollow hankering over an important issue that merits better attention. Everyone here knows that the Prime Minister or the provincial premiers cannot make statements regarding meetings that supposedly have been held in camera.

This is the type of responsible debate for which I make a plea this evening in relation to the problem of employment. I refer to the type of responsible debate that merits the bipartisan consideration of every hon. member. I may say frankly that I do not think the average working man in Canada, when he finds a job, is interested in knowing whether it is supplied to him by a Liberal administration or a Conservative administration or whether it is supplied by a municipal, provincial or federal government. He wants to find a job. I think that is the attitude that we should all take.

Without carrying on much longer there are just a few more things I have in my mind before terminating my present remarks. Like every other hon. member in this house, I have naturally devoted some serious attention to this problem. I cannot help but think of some possible long term national objectives that we might have in relation to the problem of employment. I am not going to suggest any cure-all; they are not perhaps even suggestions. They are merely thoughts, Mr. Chairman. I often wonder how much immigration, for instance, over the next ten years we should have, and what kind of immigration we should have over the next ten years, taking into consideration the expected natural birth increase, in order best to develop the Canadian economy at an optimum level. These questions are the sort that I think we should ask ourselves about long term national objectives.

Mr. Pickersgill: What is the hon. gentleman doing about it?

Mr. Grafftey: I heard another facetious remark by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, Mr. Chairman. I suggest that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate place before us in all sincerity what he believes is the best idea. After all, what is this forum except a place for offering what we hope are constructive ideas. If, when I offer suggestions in a true spirit of trying to be helpful, I wonder why my remarks evoke facetious interjections from some hon. members opposite.

I should like to say that I am a supporter of the government and that it allows its backbenchers to speak frankly. We are not under the dictates of any C. D. Howe. I realize that while I am speaking of long term national objectives, I am expanding this debate in a broad fashion. While the Minister of Labour is often seemingly responsible in the narrow sense for statistics that hon. members opposite throw at him, unemployment statistics depend, as we all know, on the economy at large. I therefore go on with other thoughts. I have heard it suggested that expanded trade will help our economic and thus our employment situation.

I should like to suggest to all the businessmen in Canada that under the aegis of the Department of Trade and Commerce we have trade commissioners who are second to none in the world. I feel we should make even further use of them than we are. While the government can take the lead, I feel that private enterprise can help by availing itself of the real facilities of, I repeat again, one of the finest trade commissions in the world.

Then it has been suggested that under the Department of Trade and Commerce some time in the future we might have a revolving export credit fund which in the initial stages might involve $50 million. These are things that all hon. members must look upon at some time in the future with the hope that they will help our economy and thus in turn our employment situation.

Another thing is this. Many of my confreres realize that I whip this matter a good deal but I feel that both government and private enterprise should strees the simple general notion of what I call "Buy Canadian". I do not think you can hope or feel that the housewife on the retail level in the stores can differentiate or would want to differentiate between Canadian made goods and foreign made goods. Once they have reached the retail level, I think it is too late. But I think both the government and private enterprise should initiate and support what I call a "Buy Canadian" policy.

I know that there seems to be a feeling abroad in Canada that because something is imported it has an aura of perhaps snobbery about it. I think a great many good things are made here in Canada by Canadians for Canadians. I look forward to the day when we can increasingly encourage the situation. The government has already taken a great lead in this matter. I feel that more is going to be done and that more will be done by private enterprise, enterprise that is always stimulated and helped by Progressive Conservative doctrines and principles.

I know that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, as he has done in the past, will perhaps accuse me now of entering into the classical field of high or low tariffs. I am not doing that. I have been one who has always said that we should take a close look at our dumping regulations. I am pleased that the Minister of National Revenue has appointed officers to police more closely the dumping regulations vis-à-vis Canada and outside powers. These are regulations that must be strictly enforced, not only in relation to the textile industry so ably touched upon by the hon. member for Sherbrooke but in relation to many other Canadian goods. Perhaps we shall be obliged to take a more serious look at our position in GATT.

Mr. Chairman, I have been broad in my remarks tonight but these are all things that affect our economy and in turn affect our employment position. They are just a few superficial highlights that I felt might merit attention at this time. I would suggest to some hon. members alongside me that rather than trying day in and day out to make a political football of the employment or the unemployment situation it is time to stop this sort of thing. I know we all like a little bit of infighting now and again but I am sure the people must say at times, "Enough is enough".

The Minister of Labour in these past months during this session and between sessions has posed many problems in relation to the employment situation. He has said time and time again that this government is seriously concerned about it and is taking serious action. I repeat myself. But let us realize one thing and in saying this I hope I am not going to be misunderstood for making these remarks. In my opinion there is such a thing as statistical unemployment. Whether we are taking the unemployment insurance statistics, the national placement service or dominion bureau of statistics statistics or the Martin bureau of statistics; no matter what statistics we are taking, we must take a good look at them.

An hon. Member: Especially at the last ones.

Mr. Grafftey: I think every Canadian should realize that we have many social welfare measures today, especially since this government has come to power, in that we have extended unemployment insurance benefits. We have social welfare benefits, as well we might, that will never allow anything to happen such as that which happened in the depression days of the thirties. However, Mr. Chairman, I think we must be careful when we are dealing with what I call the problem of statistical unemployment for when statistics are irresponsibly used there is created, not only a lack of confidence on questions of domestic concern but also a lack of confidence among our neighbours to the south and among far away powers. No member of parliament is doing any service to his country or even to his party in the long run when he irresponsibly quotes or reiterates in this house or outside this house statistics that he knows are basically not correct.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Grafftey: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does he think that was equally true between 1953 and 1957?

An hon. Member: Who is living in the past?

Mr. Grafftey: I know that hon. members in my party whether in power or out of power, have always been most responsible in their use of statistics.

Mr. Pickersgill: Page the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Grafftey: I think perhaps the minister might refer to this matter in his remarks but as I understand it the dominion bureau of statistics samplings are taken from one end of this country to the other. No matter how accurate the samplings are as such in their initial stages I also understand that on these matters the only possible information that can be put down is whether or not the man was in or out of work during the preceding week when he was interviewed.

I might be wrong here, but I think with just those facts alone we realize we are dealing with a very serious problem. In other words, everybody is aware of the fact that we should not for political reasons try and build up what I refer to as statistical unemployment. Certainly there is unemployment and it must be dealt with seriously, but I feel these are statistics which must be dealt with seriously too. I repeat time and time again that it is not serving our country well when they are irresponsibly used either on the home front or abroad.

In summary, I have felt obliged to refute some of the straw men put up before this House of Commons by members opposite. Second, I have tried my best to outline some of the vigorous measures introduced by the government. They are not cure-alls, not the complete answer; and do not let hon. members alongside ever go to the people of Canada and try and tell them we said any one of them is. The hon. member for Essex East has called our winter works program a mere bagatelle, and this from a member of a government which in 1954 and 1955 told the municipalities that nothing could be done for them. Nevertheless, these measures by themselves are not cure-alls. Taken in toto maybe they are not cure-alls either, but they are certainly a step forward in relation to a problem which must be met and is being met.

I have outlined these measures and made what I hope are at best some helpful suggestions.

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the fact that the hon. gentleman's time has expired, I wonder if I might be permitted to ask him one question. Can I ask the hon. gentleman if he recalls that in the year 1955 the Liberal government assumed half the cost of unemployment assistance to help the municipalities, notwithstanding the fact that he said we did nothing for them?

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, members of the committee seem to be in a rather peculiar mood tonight, and one hardly knows what kind of reception one will get. But I do know that we all enjoyed the tour de force of the previous speaker and that his remarks will be a great deal relished when they appear in the press and in Hansard tomorrow.

As a matter of fact, I think there is only one thing wrong with what the hon. member had to say, and that is that it is not going to pay the rent or buy the food or the clothing of the unemployed in Canada today.

The hon. member in his closing remarks said quite a bit about statistics. Good, bad or indifferent, I do not know, but I am afraid that what is happening today as far as the government is concerned is that they are trying to reduce unemployment to a statistic. We hear more talk and more arguments about statistics and whether they are right or wrong than I think we do about the actual question of unemployment itself. That is the problem, the real fundamental problem, which we have the responsibility of dealing with, not one set of statistics compared to another or whether it is 300,000 or 325,000. It is the problem of unemployment and there is a great deal of it in Canada today.

I feel all of us are concerned with the fact that unemployment in Canada seems to be a perennial and an increasing problem. It is quite all right for hon. members to get up and say that you should not say this, you should not say that, and do not bring that up because it is dangerous to Canada and to countries outside. The real danger is in refusing to face realism, refusing to face facts and refusing to try and work out some plan to handle the problem.

We would be betraying our country if because it may be a little bit unpopular or obnoxious to certain people we were to say the problem does not exist; if we were to close our eyes and say the problem is not there. That may be the attitude of some hon. members but I do not think it is the attitude of the majority. We must be concerned when we pick up our newspapers and read such statements as this, which is taken from the Toronto Star of April 30:

> With unemployment figures steadily mounting, many economists and business leaders feel the time has come for a long range look at the problem . . .
> A cross section of economists and business experts, applying their statistical stethoscopes to Canada's body economic, come up with this general report:
> This summer: A substantial boom.
>
> Next fall: A down-turn in the economy.
> Next winter: Unemployment worse than this year.
> The winter after: A post-war peak of unemployment.

When some of the chief economists and business men of Canada give that general analysis, when we hear from the provinces and our constituencies, and when we get the statistics from the Minister of Labour about this problem, I say we have got to try to face up to the situation and see what can be done now in order to offset any possibility of an increasing tempo of unemployment.

I am not going to go into any long harangue on the details and the broad general picture; that can be done by others. I want to concentrate for a few minutes on the question of the problem of unemployment as it is now being brought to bear through the medium of automation.

I was very grateful to the Minister of Labour this afternoon when he reported on the research studies undertaken in his department on the question of automation. That is something which is inevitable but it is a problem we have got to face up to now if we are going to be able to offset the conditions which new technologies and efficiencies will bring about in this field. If we do not face up to it, then I say we are being irresponsible as elected members of the people of the country.

I would just like to give a couple of examples as to how automation is operating. Only this week I received a communication from the oil, chemical and atomic workers international union in Vancouver which pointed out that in the 18 months ending May 31 of this year 150 hourly paid jobs had been eliminated through automation in refineries in the Vancouver area. In addition to 150 hourly paid jobs being eliminated through automation, approximately as many staff jobs were also eliminated. So here is a process in the refining industry of my own city of Vancouver which, according to the union affected, has created unemployment for 300 men owing to automation in the industry. I am also informed that the workers who are still employed have been notified that there are going to be more lay-offs yet as they increase efficiency by putting in new automation machines.

That is just one example and I would like to give just one more, because I think it is well known to the Minister of Labour and to the majority of the members of this committee because of the fact that there was a delegation here not so long ago from the united steel workers of America who were representing the employees of English Electric Company at St. Catharines where because of the need for greater efficiency from the company's point of view and because of automation we have the closing of the English Electric plant in St. Catharines.

There have been employed there until recently according to my information approximately 500 employees. As a result of the closing of this plant and the consolidation of the operations in Toronto only 160 of the 500 employees are being invited to sell out at St. Catharines and take employment in Toronto. I understand that the average age of these 500 employees is 53. Nearly one quarter of them are 50 years of age or over and the average length of service of the employees is 16 years. I understand that 80 per cent of the employees are home owners in the St. Catharines area and one third of the homeowners own homes which they value at more than $10,000. In addition, the average number of dependents is 2.26. This means that about 1,000 people are being affected by automation, the need for greater efficiency, the closing down of a plant and its moving to Toronto.

This is not a rare instance. This is happening more and more often and in the new technology it is going to happen more and more often in the future and we have to face up to it. It is inevitable. You cannot hold back styles and new methods. But the people must be taken care of. We cannot take care of the people affected in this way by just expressing pious hopes and saying we are giving continuous study to the matter. Excellent as may be the research work being done in the minister's department and marvellous as undoubtedly are the reports the hon. gentleman receives, we have reached the stage where we should get down to planning; we must get down to something definite with regard to meeting the situation, and I feel that this is where the government has fallen down up to the present time.

The government has failed to demonstrate to me that they are taking a sufficiently serious attitude toward this phase of the unemployment problem or that they recognize that this difficult situation must be met by distinct policies. I feel that if action is not taken we may get into a worse situation still. Though I appreciate what the minister had to say on the studies on automation which are being carried out I should like him to go further and tell us what practical steps the government has in mind.

We are faced with the need to evolve practical plans to handle the situation. If labour and industry do not get together and reach agreement about the way in which this problem is to be met, then it becomes the duty of the government to take a definite stand and bring in definite policies and even special legislation if required. I have heard it said that when this matter was brought to the attention of the government some time ago—the concentration of industry, the closing down of plants in the smaller towns and so on—the government expressed an understanding of the situation but said it had no power to deal with it.

I feel it is necessary for us to get away from this increasing concentration of industry in a few centres. Decentralization of industry is necessary. Plants must be encouraged to continue their operations in centres which depend upon them, and if necessary assistance should be given to these undertakings to stay where they are, to stay where the homes of their employees have been built and where they have earned their livelihood for years and years. I think we need a more satisfactory and a more militant declaration of government policy in this regard. Canada will not reach its real maturity and potential until, by legislation if necessary, we have decentralization of industry, not only within provinces but throughout Canada.

I believe that when there is notice of approaching automation, whether it affects 400 employees, as in the case of the electric company which I have mentioned in some detail or in the case of the refineries in British Columbia where 300 people have been affected in the last three months, the government should take the initiative, if the industry declines to do so, and say: You have got to start planning; if this move is required, then fine, but you have got to plan now, either to bring a new industry in or to take care of these people; if you cannot take these people with you you have got to have a system of portable pensions. This is the sort of thing which has to be planned before the effect of automation comes into being.

I have only one plea, and that is that we do not ask ourselves rhetorical questions as the previous speaker said he was doing but that we face the realities of the situation, that we face up to the inevitability of evolution and recognize that nothing is here forever. The only thing that is constant is change. I say that we have passed the planning stage. We have reached the policy making stage and in the very near future we shall reach the point at which action must be taken with regard to this particular phase of the unemployment problem to which I have confined my remarks this evening. Let us all, irrespective of party, instead of continually looking at the past, start looking at the future.

(Translation):

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, I should not want to delay the passage of the estimates of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr), but I feel it is my duty to speak in order to correct certain misstatements or to disprove some irresponsible statements made in this house.

I listened to the remarks made earlier by the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) and I was greatly surprised to realize that members did not break out in tears on hearing the heart-rending description he gave of the situation. He exerted himself to make us believe that the present situation, and especially in the field of textiles, was an exclusive responsibility of the Conservative party. Mr. Chairman, allow me to refer to the official report and to acquaint the house with the true situation. I have here a report of the Primary Textiles Institute, dated July 5, 1960, in which I read the following:

> But during the last decade, serious changes in the situation and in the trend of the industry were noticed.

Needless to say that that industry is the textile industry.

> A difficult period set in in 1951 and it is continuing. During that time, 23 spinning mills had to close down, which deprived some 2,000 people of employment opportunities.

On the last page of the same report, we find some statistics according to which, from 1935 to 1939, 120 million linear yards of fabric were imported, while in 1956, under the administration of our friends the Liberals, those imports reached 316 million yards.

During that same period, that is from 1935 to 1939, Canadian industry provided for about 71 per cent of domestic consumption, while it provided for only 55 per cent in 1956.

Mr. Chairman, I should like now to call the attention of the house to a statement made by Mr. Laz Peters, chairman of the Canadian Association of Clothing and Textile Manufacturers. As recorded in the minutes of a meeting of the said association, held in April:

> Mr. Peters lauded the efforts made by the Canadian government to put a stop to "the immoderate influx of Japanese clothing and textile" which wrought havoc in the Canadian market and inflicted hardships upon thousands of workers.
> He said that imports of clothing and textile from Japan had increased from $5 million in 1954 to $26.5 million in 1958. "If it had not been for the determination of the Canadian government authorities in their negotiations with Japan in the last five months, that torrent would have been still more devastating."

And Mr. Peters concluded:

> Only voluntary limitation on the part of Japan can stop Canada from inserting restricting clauses in its trade agreements.

We know, Mr. Chairman, that we are ruled by the general agreement on tariffs and trade, which was negotiated by our predecessors and we necessarily have to face a situation which is of their making.

Mr. Chairman, the unemployment problem is not the sole responsibility of the federal government. That was proved a few months ago. And, as further evidence, if I remember rightly, in 1958 the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) stated that unemployment could not be exclusively attributed to the Conservative party.

The settlement of the unemployment issue demands joint action, which concerns all classes of society. Governments, public bodies, and even individuals, have to do their part and try to create as much employment as possible, for without close co-operation from all classes of society, our efforts will be useless.

During the last few months, and I might even say during the past two years, our Liberal friends have bent over backwards trying to proclaim that there was unemployment, to the point of making every worker believe that he was jobless. As a matter of fact, following such baleful propaganda by our Liberal friends who resorted to all available media—radio, television, papers and speeches—several of our workers going to work in the morning had a feeling of being also among the unemployed.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that people now are beginning to realize the situation and are taking Liberal claims with a grain of salt.

The hon. member for Hull paid an unusual tribute to the Conservative members of this house. He paid us a tribute we were not expecting from him. He said that all of us or almost all of us had made representations to our ministers in order that steps be taken to put a stop to unemployment. I can assure the hon. member that it is so, because in the Conservative party it is not only the front line people, the ministers, who express their opinions, but also the backbenchers; and our ministers listen to us, contrary to what used to be the rule in the past.

Everyone recognizes that there are weak points in the Canadian economy. The present Minister of Labour and the other ministers recognize the fact, and all of us are endeavouring to take steps so that there may only be a minimum number of unemployed in Canada. Unfortunately, there are problems that we cannot solve and it has not been possible to this government, in a period of three years, to make up for all the inaction and the lack of foresight that our predecessors have shown during the years they have been in power.

They take pleasure in saying that, in the last war, Canada has experienced an unprecedented period of prosperity, but they hide the fact that in 1936, 1937 and 1938, and even in 1939, the number of unemployed in relation to the population, was much higher than it is now. They hide this information because they believe they can continue to mislead the population and that the people will continue to believe them.

Mr. Chairman, before I resume my seat, I would like to emphasize two points from those facts. First, there are more jobs now in Canada than ever before.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And more unemployment.

Mr. Ricard: Second, this Conservative government has taken the necessary steps, has made huge sums available to the unemployment insurance fund in order to alleviate the difficulties of the workers who, unfortunately, though nobody wants it to be so, are necessarily unemployed for some time.

So, I ask my hon. friends on my right when they make their great statements on the situation, to take those facts into consideration and act accordingly by giving people the information they are entitled to get.

(Text):

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I listened with interest this afternoon to the minister giving a review of certain studies by his department but I was greatly disappointed that he did not deal with the problem of unemployment as such. I think that all of us should be greatly interested in unemployment and should be giving the utmost consideration to putting men back to work. We spent four days on the bill of rights. That bill is very important, but the people in my area are more interested in getting work. The bill of rights has no apparent effect unless they get a job. I think we are getting things a little bit out of focus because, as I said, we spent four days on the bill of rights and we have not spent five minutes in the house on any new government legislation to put one man back to work.

In the Department of Public Works the estimates have been cut by approximately $25 million which is a far cry from the $1¾ billion which the Prime Minister promised for public works just before the June election in 1958. One man who spoke for the Conservative party in my area thought this was a wonderful thing. He was so entranced by the northern vision that he said he doubted there were enough people in Canada to do the job.

The minister announced that the government would carry on a winter works program on a cost sharing basis with the municipalities. The municipalities are heavily in debt and it is very difficult for many of them to assume more debt at the present high interest rates in order to carry out such projects. The municipalities have had no share in the fiscal policy of the government and I do not think it is fair for the government to call on them to assume more debt at high interest rates in order to help to bail the government out of its mistakes with respect to fiscal policy.

It is true that unemployment was discussed in the house on a motion to go into supply and my leader made some suggestions, as did the hon. member for Essex East and the hon. member for Laurier. I have some 29 suggestions here but I do not think the government has paid much attention to them. At that time they made fun of most of our suggestions and spent their time debating which figures regarding unemployment were right. I have heard much tonight about statistics but in my area we certainly have unemployed people who are entitled to more consideration than statistics.

I think the time is long overdue for the government to bring measures before members of the house to relieve unemployment. Unemployment is our No. 1 social and economic problem and I think members of parliament should be able to debate some of the proposals which the government must have. I know when the Minister of Labour is asked about anything having to do with unemployment or any measure that might be taken he generally says that this is a matter of government policy and that an announcement will be made in due course. I have heard nothing new. It is true that the government announced a cost sharing winter works program with the municipalities but this is nothing new. They had the same thing last year and it took care of comparatively few of the unemployed.

The hon. member for Essex East referred to a national advisory board and suggested we should have such a board to look into the matter, a board which would keep employment and unemployment under review. I think this is a very good suggestion. For instance, I think it would be very helpful for the government to know how many are out of work because of automation so that they could be able to make proper plans for vocational training. I think it is also necessary to know the number who are registered because of seasonal unemployment and also those who may be unemployed because of shifts of trade and shifts in government policy. We get shifts in government policy because sometimes they are building houses and sometimes they are not. When they are not certainly many men are out of work in my area.

One of the first measures that should be undertaken is a study of our manpower resources. The minister reported in the house some time ago that there was a shortage of certain skilled workers at Elliot Lake. If we had some idea about our manpower resources we would have no difficulty in filling these jobs. I think it is very important that the government should encourage students to stay in school longer than some now do. In my view it is better for our young people to finish their education and to learn different skills before leaving school rather than leaving and adding to the numbers in the unskilled labour market. I think the unemployed could be put to work at this particular time because they are at leisure and not doing anything. I was glad to hear the minister say today that he intended to carry out that program.

I heard the hon. member for Essex East say that there was very little unemployment in Australia, western Europe and England. From press reports I have read I know there is a boom in England. I read an article a day or two ago which stated that in western Europe production was up 15 per cent and foreign trade was up 40 per cent. We know that western Germany is importing skilled workers from Italy, Greece, Spain and even from Canada. I understand that in some of the foreign newspapers in Canada there are advertisements for certain skilled workers and I happen to know that two or three German families in my area are returning to Germany. The heads of the households have jobs awaiting them in Germany, and in his particular skill there are more jobs in Germany than there are people to fill them. I do not believe it is a very good thing for us in Canada to be losing skilled workers, people who have come to this country and who want to make Canada their home. We are losing them because they cannot get work in this country.

I note that the other place has a committee set up to inquire into unemployment. I heard over the radio this morning that they were sending out a questionnaire. I do not know how much secretarial help the committee of the other place will have, but it seems to me that this is something that should have been pursued by the government itself and not by the other place. It seems to me that also the committee of the other place will not have an adequate staff to deal with all these questionnaires. They might amount to half a million if everyone answers them, but I doubt that everyone will answer them.

I do not believe that a country like Canada can continue year after year with 6 per cent to 8 per cent of its people unemployed in the spring. I am not going to give any figures in connection with the number of unemployed, but I have read that it was as high as 8 per cent, and the year before last it was 6 per cent. I feel that the policy of the government has been one of drift so far as this problem of unemployment is concerned. They have been waiting for something to turn up, and nothing has. The trouble with this government is that they have depended on the unemployment insurance fund. If they did not have that unemployment insurance fund they would be in trouble. If we did not have an unemployment insurance scheme we would have people waiting in breadlines, just as we did in the days of Bennett. Even today, we see people in long lines at the unemployment insurance offices waiting to get their unemployment insurance cheques.

In so far as the unemployment insurance fund is concerned, I was interested in looking at the statement the minister gave which indicated that in the last three years the fund has gone down from $852 million to $296 million. This means it has gone down by $556.5 million, without taking into consideration the depreciation on the bonds in its portfolio. Some people may think this does not amount to very much money, but it amounts to at least $32 for every man, woman and child in Canada and it amounts to $125 for the head of every household in Canada. This represents a cost of running the government. If, as one hon. member suggested earlier, our unemployment is just statistical, why spend so much money out of the unemployment insurance fund? During the years of Liberal administration this fund increased and now it has gone down precipitously, in spite of the increase of nearly 30 per cent in the contributions from employers and employees.

As I have said, this represents a cost of government. When we talk about the operations of the Department of Finance we find that has a lot to do with this particular fund. For instance, in three years the aggregate extra interest we will be obliged to pay will be half a billion dollars, so you can see that the charges on the unemployment insurance fund and the extra interest of the Department of Finance will amount to about $250 for every family in Canada. I believe this is an indictment of a government which said it would not raise taxes and yet, ever since coming into office, it has steadily gone into debt, as well as taking more money from all Canadians in taxes.

One of the difficulties in which the unemployment insurance commission finds itself is that it has taken on long term bonds. We know that in Canada during the last two years it has been better to hold short term bonds. The result of the way our fiscal policy has been handled has been that we have had two markets for bonds, a short term market and a long term market. At the time of the bond conversion the unemployment insurance commission converted its short term victory bonds into long term bonds which went down precipitously. They sold some of these bonds well under the present market price. I believe the price of these bonds went down to 82, and I do know that the unemployment insurance commission sold some at the time the market was around 85. The unfortunate part about the unemployment insurance commission having these bonds is that when they came to sell them in order to get cash to pay these unemployment benefits the market was very thin. The people in the market know the Bank of Canada is offering these bonds, and they immediately withdraw their offers. It is extremely difficult for the Bank of Canada to get a firm price for these particular bonds.

I feel that the basic thing back of much of our unemployment is our own fiscal policy. I believe that the high interest rates we are experiencing tend to stagnate our economy. Certainly in this country it costs more to build houses, and it costs more to go ahead with a project that has to be financed. It costs more for the small businessman or for any industry to expand because of the high cost of money. Certainly this government has found it costs more to operate. The municipalities have to pay more in order to float their debentures; they pay more interest. I know of two or three projects in municipalities right now, one of which is a much needed school, that will not proceed because of the high cost of money. This is certainly contributing to unemployment.

I see unemployed people every week end. I feel heartily sorry for them. I believe when a man is unemployed for a long time he loses his morale. Many of these people have made commitments; they have purchased homes, and their savings are gone. They are just living from day to day. I feel this government should take some action to alleviate the situation. If this government had followed a proper fiscal policy we would not have the number of unemployed we have in Canada today. You cannot blame the Minister of Labour for all of this, but he is a member of the government and since he is a member of the government he will have to share in the responsibility. The people of Canada will be paying out more for unemployment insurance because there are more unemployed. As one hon. member suggested, whether they are statistics or not, the unemployed have needs just as we all have, and the people of Canada will have to go on paying for the mistakes of this government, not only because of its fiscal policy but for unemployment as well and the Canadian people will have to absorb the cost of the depletion of this unemployment insurance fund.

(Translation):

Mr. Parizeau: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few remarks on the subject under consideration. In the last three sessions, we have been listening to criticism levelled by the opposition at the present employment situation in Canada, but we have heard few constructive suggestions. They have just been passing the buck and saying that when the Conservatives were in office, there was unemployment, and when the Liberals were in office, there was prosperity. There was that phony prosperity in wartime and in the post-war period, and then in 1957, the Liberals did not see fit to consider the recommendations in the confidential report on the economy, no doubt in the hope that the people would go on believing everything was fine. They hoped something would happen to check unemployment, such as the Korean war. The Liberal party kept hoping for a war, which would have checked unemployment. What did the Conservative government do to correct that deplorable situation? It spent over a billion dollars on housing. It initiated a winter works program. Was that enough? While I am not prepared to say yes, I am not prepared to say it was worthless. The winter works program provided employment for over 50,000 people last winter.

In areas such as mine, where the winter starts around late November, and snow banks reach heights of six or seven feet, and the thermometer drops to 30 degrees below zero, it is hard to build water mains, sewers, etc.

Thanks to the representations made to the Minister of Labour by Conservative members, the provisions will be broadened and thus municipalities will be able to share in the winter works program to a greater extent.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few suggestions to the Minister of Labour and also to the government. I hope that our good friends of the opposition will take them into consideration, since they never made any themselves.

In my opinion, the government should assign $1 billion or more to carrying out important works that are needed throughout the country. I am thinking in particular of the famous maritime causeway, the pipe line from Calgary to Montreal, the building of bridges in Montreal and of a tunnel between Levis and Quebec, and many other necessary works that could be done. Where will this billion be found? In wartime, bonds were being issued. Why, then, could the government not issue Canadian bonds that the Canadian public could buy in order to help reduce unemployment and provide jobs for our people.

I feel that the Canadian people would make a point of buying those bonds in order to help the government to solve the unemployment problem.

Could the federal government not also establish a federal-municipal bank in order to help our municipalities? I agree that we do not always have the right to help our municipalities directly, but through such a bank we could help them carry out certain projects. If we loaned money to them at a reasonable rate, say 3 or 3½ per cent, our municipalities could carry out public works programs all year round. And whatever Mr. Lesage may say, we all know that unemployment is a provincial responsibility, we all know that unemployment is the responsibility of all three levels of government, federal, provincial and municipal. However, I think that the federal government could establish a federal-municipal fund in order to help municipalities to carry out public works programs.

I also suggest abolishing unemployment insurance and setting up work insurance instead.

If the government were to follow up my suggestions, our municipalities might employ people who are temporarily out of work. We would not see those jobless filing up at the unemployment offices in the fall, where a qualified worker with experience is told that there is no demand for his specialized services, but that he could obtain some other work. And so he refuses and says: "I have enough insurance stamps, I am a qualified workman, have you anything to offer in my own line?" And he gets as an answer: "No sir, but we have something else for you". And the man replies: "If it is outside my line, I would rather receive my $24, $30 or $34, and stay at home, with my feet near the oven, and be warm." And the worker goes on receiving unemployment insurance benefits.

In replacing unemployment insurance by work insurance, the unemployed would have to accept employment on works done by the federal, provincial or municipal governments.

That work insurance would be contributory, just as unemployment insurance, but the contribution would perhaps be higher. I think my colleague from Chicoutimi (Mr. Brassard) had made that suggestion early last winter.

I believe our trade unions would be in favour of such a project. If we had work to be done the year round, all across Canada, I am sure everyone would be at work and would be adequately paid, and no one would have to depend on unemployment insurance. As I said a moment ago, a great number of people prefer to be idle rather than to be employed at jobs which are not in their line, and it is thus that statistics are hurled at us with the cry: "Murder! It's unemployment!"

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the minister will take note of my suggestions. I admit, they are not very elaborate, but, I believe, they reflect the general ideas stated by my colleagues. They might be considered by economists, who may draw from them, some practical solutions, not in two or three years, from now, but immediately. Let us establish a public works program. I say, once again, let us subscribe $1 billion in government bonds. I am convinced that Canadians will do it gladly in order that major public works be carried out to alleviate unemployment.

(Text):

Mr. Bourque: Mr. Chairman, when I state we are all worried over the prospective unemployment next winter I believe I am expressing the sentiments of every member of this committee. When I crossed swords in a mild way the other day with the Minister of Labour over the winter works programs plan he mentioned that the cost of labour averaged 34 per cent of the total cost. It had been my idea that the labour on an average did not average more than 22 per cent. However, I take his word.

I have worked out here a table showing how little the municipality gets in the end and how little incentive there is for a municipality to undertake a winter works program. Most of the municipalities in Canada can ill afford to undertake any works programs, whether winter or summer. The financial standing of most municipalities precludes them from making any issue of debentures and borrowing money, especially at 5¾ per cent. Works programs cost approximately 10 per cent more when executed in the winter plus the interest on the money borrowed. A $100,000 program would cost in winter $110,000. The Minister of Labour said that about 34 per cent of the cost would be represented by labour. That would mean that approximately 66 per cent of the cost, in round figures, would be for materials or $72,600. Labour then would cost $37,400. The government would pay $18,700. The municipality also would pay $18,700. The government's share would then be 17 per cent leaving the municipality to pay 83 per cent or $91,300 as its share of $110,000.

If the municipality had not carried on the works program in the wintertime the cost to the municipality would be $100,000. That would be the real cost of the job if executed at the municipality's pleasure. As it would have cost the municapility $91,300 under the government plan, the municipality, to carry on the work whenever it wanted to do it, would expend only $8,700, so all it would really get from the government would be 8.7 per cent of the total cost of the job. There is not much incentive when only 50 per cent of the cost of labour is to be granted for any municipality to undertake any winter works program because if you deduct from the

However, I should like to make a suggestion to the minister and if he carries out this plan I think it will help very much with regard to unemployment next winter. It would be a great incentive to the municipalities which are ready to undertake winter works programs.

To my mind the cause of a lot of unemployment amongst intellectuals and men in the best paid trades is due in large measure to United States magazines. In the case of the United States magazines printed in Canada, all the preparatory work is executed in the United States and plates ready for printing are sent to Canada. Editors, writers, artists, make-up men, lay-out men, compositors, monotype and linotype operators, stereotypers, electrotypers, all United States labour, depriving our citizens from enjoying these situations and causing a serious slump in the graphic arts industry and adding greatly to the ranks of the unemployed in these highly remunerative situations.

United States magazines that claim to put out Canadian editions are not doing anything of the sort. They are for the most part merely dumping United States magazines into Canada. True there might be a slight change made in the contents by inserting a few pages touching on Canadian matters, but the majority of the text is still American. These United States magazines sell a lot of advertising space to Canadian advertisers and funnel back the profits to the United States. Canadian publications are facing an abnormal and unfair competition from these United States magazines and many of our large Canadian magazines are being forced out of business, adding greatly to the ranks of our unemployed.

In 1951 the total combined circulation of Canadian national periodicals per year was 42 million copies, against a circulation of United States magazines coming to Canada of 86 million copies. In 1957 Canadian magazines combined had reached a circulation per year of 45,600,000 copies against a circulation of United States magazines coming to Canada of 154 million copies.

Now, Mr. Chairman, intellectuals as well as editors, writers and newspapermen contribute greatly to the progress of any country. They stimulate and inculcate in the minds of the citizens that pride of citizenship which stirs them to greater deeds and to the creation of activities which eventually leads to more employment. By depriving our Canadian citizens of the leadership of these intellectual minds we are rendering them a disservice by forcing them to read United States magazines. These magazines in many cases are a serious threat to our Canadian culture, for they inculcate in the minds of our citizens an American ideology that we do not appreciate. We have a great admiration for our United States friends and we value their friendship. We want to remain on friendly terms with them—

Mr. Brunsden: On a point of order, is the hon. member in order in discussing periodicals from the United States under the Minister of Labour's estimates?

Mr. Bourque: They all bear on unemployment.

Mr. Brunsden: Well, let the Chairman rule on it.

The Chairman: Frankly, I would say that unemployment touches a lot of subjects and I think up until now the hon. member has related his remarks to unemployment to a great extent. He may have been straying a little recently.

Mr. Bourque: Above all, we want to remain Canadians and we want to preserve our Canadian way of life and expression and thought. We prize our Canadian heritage. We are proud to be Canadians. We have two main cultures in Canada and we respect the rights and ideals of one another. We want to preserve these cultures. We meet in harmony and not in conflict and we want to continue to do so; hence our need for magazines with a Canadian mentality so that we may continue to enjoy and cherish the inheritance left to us by our forefathers who were willing to endure the greatest of hardships and even die for the maintenance of the high Canadian principles in which they believed.

In the Gazette of Monday, July 25, 1960 there was an editorial and I would like to comment on it. The editor expresses surprise that in a country like Canada with so many advantages over other countries we should find ourselves with hundreds of thousands of unemployed at a cost to the unemployment insurance commission of approximately $500 million a year. And he asks this question:

—what form of economic activity creates the most jobs for Canadians?

And he answers:

Manufacturing creates more jobs than anything else. And in the last decade manufacturing has tended to decline in relative importance.

He further says:

—about 100,000 more young people every year reach the age when they are seeking jobs... Construction and "service" industries like transportation, communications, trade, finance and so forth offer the most jobs but they can scarcely hope to continue their expansion, unless manufacturing, which is by far the greatest employer of labour, itself maintains its rate of growth.

It is a fact that the most ambitious and highly trained of our citizens are leaving Canada because we do not seem to be able to provide them with the wider opportunities they seek.

Our prospects for an increase in population and in job opportunities depends largely upon the extent to which manufacturing is encouraged. Manufacturing is falling behind at the present time. We import more manufactured goods per capita than any other country in the world.

I am particularly interested in the fate of our unemployed. I believe we should gauge our economy to provide a job for everyone who is able and willing to work. I believe it is an inherent right for a citizen to be able to procure for himself a job of his liking, and I believe it is the duty of the government in power to seek ways and means to provide these jobs, to seek the cause of unemployment, and to do everything in its power to create work for all.

I should like for one moment, to give the committee a little information contained in the Canadian apparel and textile manufacturers association's bulletin of March 25, 1960, which bears on the unemployment situation. This bulletin says:

> Value of Japanese exports to Canada of clothing, textile products and fabrics during 1959 showed an increase of 56 per cent from 1958 totals, and in many cases volume outstripped domestic production, reports the Canadian apparel and textile manufacturers association. During 1959 shipments to Canada of clothing and textiles from Japan were valued at $41.5 million, an increase of 56 per cent over the 1958 figure of $26.6 million.

The United States, at least 15 times the size of our market, took only six times as much Japanese textiles in 1959. Imports from Japan of man-made fibre fabrics amounted to 1.4 million square yards in 1958 and 3.4 millions in 1959; imports of cotton fabrics rose from 18 million square yards in 1958 to 25.3 million in 1959. As the committee will realize that is a great cause of unemployment in Canada.

Imports of man-made fibre sports shirts amounted to more than double the Canadian production. I point that fact out to members of the committee and ask them to draw their own conclusions about it. Exports to this country amounted to 370,000 dozen compared with Canadian production in 1958 of 163,000 dozen. Japanese exports to Canada in 1959 generally showed a considerable increase and, if I may, I will mention a few of the items we imported and the quantities in which we imported them.

Towels	6,300,000 units
Gowns, pyjamas and underwear	1,332,000 units
Woven outerwear (coats, dresses, etc.)	3,708,000 units
Bed sheets and pillow cases	3,100,000 units
Blouses	4,092,000 units
Sport shirts	7,536,000 units
Dress and work shirts	2,148,000 units
Trousers and shorts	5,364,000 units
Knitted garments (outerwear and underwear)	6,372,000 units
Gloves and mittens	6,216,000 pairs

Is it any wonder that we have an undue number of unemployed in Canada? Is it any wonder that the textile industry is experiencing such serious financial difficulties at the present time? The same applies to the rubber industry, to the shoe industry, to the automobile industry and to a dozen of our most important manufacturing industries.

May I be allowed, Mr. Chairman, to read in French a few lines from a letter issued

(Translation):

May 5, 1960, by the garment and textile manufacturers association of Canada:

> Canada cannot go on indefinitely importing from Japan to the tune of 50 per cent of its needs for certain textiles without destroying a large part of its industry.
> Canada cannot buy Japanese textiles in larger volumes than other industrial countries such as the United States and Great Britain without taking protective measures such as have been taken by 14 other countries which have had to defend their markets against Japan.
> Total shipments of Japanese garments and textiles to Canada represent approximately 113,000,000 square yards of cloth; or 6½ yards of cloth for every man, woman, child and infant in this country.
>
> The Japanese have set themselves a quota on shipments of jumpers and shirts to Canada for 1960, which is about equal to what the Canadian manufacturers could hope to produce in 1960.

(Text):

The following is from a bulletin of the cotton institute of Canada, dated May 3, 1960:

> Canadians in 1959 used 540 million yards of cotton fabrics, an increase of 8 million from the previous year, according to figures released today by the Cotton Institute of Canada.
> Despite this, Canadian mills were able to sell only 228 million yards on the home market, a decrease of 12 million yards from 1958. Meanwhile, volume of imports sold here increased to 312 million yards from 292 million.

We have all worried over the unemployment situation. The prospects for employment next winter are far from bright. Our citizens are most anxious that some plan be formulated to relieve the unemployment situation and I hope that the Minister of Labour will take my remarks in good part and set the necessary machinery in motion to create jobs so that the Canadian people will not suffer next winter and so that their families and particularly their children may be properly fed and clothed.

(Translation):

Mr. Rouleau: Mr. Chairman, I listened very carefully to the remarks made by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) when he threw the responsibility of unemployment upon the new Quebec premier.

The present Quebec premier is ready to assume his responsibilities and, as he rightly said, unemployment comes under the federal government, the provincial governments and municipalities.

I found it very improper that politicians, men who call themselves politicians, take advantage of those who are now having trouble finding a job and who can hardly manage to make both ends meet.

Mr. Chairman, we each have our responsibilities. The present Quebec premier, the Hon. Jean Lesage, is ready to assume his responsibilities with regard to unemployment in the province of Quebec and to co-operate fully with the federal Minister of Labour in order to enable our fellow citizens to earn a decent living.

Attempts were made to distort statements made in the province of Quebec during the last election campaign. Some of our Conservative friends from the province of Quebec in this house tried to distort statements or announcements published in the Quebec press during the last election campaign saying that the present premier wanted to take upon himself the entire responsibility for employment in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Chairman, I repeat the present Quebec premier is ready to assume his responsibilities and to work in close co-operation with the federal Minister of Labour and with the present government in order to find an answer to unemployment.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to speak any longer about unemployment, because other members who rose before me treated that question competently.

During his last election campaign, the present Prime Minister of our country (Mr. Diefenbaker) solemnly stated that as long as he would be Prime Minister of our country no one would suffer in Canada.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I think that the Canadian people and especially the people of the province of Quebec will agree that never in all the history of this country, have so many of our fellow Canadians suffered as much from unemployment, as since the Conservative party took over.

Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who would like an answer to be found to the unemployment problem. Certain members on this side of the house offered concrete proposals to the present government in order to solve the unemployment problem, but those suggestions fell on deaf ears.

Mr. Chairman, I should like now to deal with another problem which I have already mentioned since being elected to this house, and I am sure that the Minister of Labour will listen with kindness to the remarks I have to make on that matter.

There exists in this country a social problem which all of us parliamentarians have a duty to solve. I am thinking of those who are 45 or over and who, on account of their age, cannot find work. I have been speaking of this for the last four or five years and tonight I want to mention it again and insist further so that legislation is introduced in our statutes in order to put an end to the kind of discrimination which is practised against our fellow citizens who are 45 or over and who are looking for a job.

I admit that some efforts have been made in that direction during the last few months. The Department of Labour has published a pamphlet to facilitate the hiring of workers 45 years of age and over. I am glad it did, but on the other hand, I believe that this publication of the Department of Labour is not enough. So, I again urge the Minister of Labour to place in our statute books an act which would eliminate this discrimination.

In the last few days, we had, in Ottawa, a federal-provincial conference attended by the representatives of the federal government and of the various provincial governments in this country. At some later conference there should be a proposal to study some way of enforcing legislation which would prevent the discrimination I just mentioned.

The representatives of the federal government should, together with those of the various provincial governments, insert in the statutes of parliament and in the statutes of the various legislatures, some legislation tending to prevent such discrimination. The problem is acute and it is up to us to solve it. Something should be done at all levels to settle the matter.

I trust, Mr. Chairman, that at 40, at 45 or even at 50, a man has acquired enough experience in life to be of use to his country and to his province and to be able to earn his living decently. We who are the legislators have no right to tolerate such discrimination. We have only to read advertisements in the papers, or published by the federal government to realize that such discrimination exists and that it is useless to ask for employment when one is over 40. It is evident, therefore, as I say, that there is discrimination with regard to those people.

The various American states have passed legislation in this respect in order to help their fellow citizens who are 45 years old and over. Now I shall make a special appeal to the Minister of Labour, asking him to put aside party politics and to accept the request I have been making for a number of years to help our fellow citizens.

Ever since I have taken an interest in the matter I have received correspondence from several parts of Canada, and I should like to quote only a few extracts of letters I have received, in order to show the house that the problem does really exist.

Among others, I received a letter from a fellow citizen of Longueuil saying:

I had a job at the Canadian Pratt & Whitney Engine in Longueuil. I was told that past 45 years of age we were dismissed and I tried to get another job; but I was refused all the time on the grounds I was too old at 40. Mr. Rouleau, we will have to wait until we get our old age pension, or else open a blind pig in order to live.

I received another letter from one Mr. Laforce, in the constituency of Chateauguay, who told me, among other things:

I am 54 years old and I am still able to work very well, I am looking for work, but each time I am told that I am too old.

I received another letter from one Mr. Laurent Blais, of St. Roch, who tells me:

When we go and look for a job, we have to state our age and, each time we say we are more than 40 years old, we are turned down.

I received another letter from one Mr. Ernest Pausner, of Montreal, who told me:

(Text):

Dear Sir:

On May 8 I read with pleasure an article in La Presse, in which your intention of projecting a new law concerning employment of workers over 45 was reported. Such a law would indeed be the only means to terminate this eternal discrimination of age. This discrimination has sometimes even the effect, that people in that age bracket have to work in strange, unskilled, and badly paid occupations, despite the fact, that these people had a special vocational education.

(Translation):

Here is another letter, which was addressed to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson); it comes from Toronto, and is signed by one Miss Grace M. Parker. It reads in part as follows:

(Text):

I believe the government will first have to pass a new law regarding company benefits. It appears that firms will not hire females over the age of 45 years and males—the age limit is 35 years. I have been told by businessmen that benefits are not transferable in case anyone wishes to make a change and that the insurance companies have set the age limit for hiring. The new law should change this to permit a firm to hire older people and either grant benefits on a lower rate or else without benefits. Also that benefits should be transferable. There are many thousands of people out of work through no fault of their own.

(Translation):

Here is another letter I have received from Vancouver. It is from a Mrs. Bonsmiller. I quote:

(Text):

My husband passed away in November, 1958. Since that time I have found that it is impossible to find work because I am 49.

(Translation):

I could go on quoting dozens of such letters. I therefore make a very special appeal to the Minister of Labour in the hope that no later than at the next session, he will introduce a bill to eliminate this plague.

There is another point I should like to raise tonight. As a student at Montreal university and McGill University, I found that a large number of my young fellow citizens lacked the money to pursue their education. I realize that in my province, the new government will soon be instituting free education. However, we in the federal government, without encroaching on the rights of the provinces in the educational field, could help our young fellow citizens to get an education and provide for their needs during their school years.

The federal government could initiate a program to enable our young fellow citizens to work in the summer months and earn enough money to pursue their studies. Here again, I urge the Minister of Labour to do his utmost to sell my suggestion to his colleagues in the cabinet so that we may offer to students across the country jobs that will enable them to earn the few hundreds dollars they need to complete their education.

I know the Minister of Labour, and I know he has great sympathy for our young people. Therefore I feel sure he will give sympathetic consideration to my remarks.

The Minister of Labour has run into many difficulties since the Conservative government has been in power. On several occasions since the Conservative government took office we have dealt with the confusion which exists in Canada because of this government. There is confusion in parliament because of this government. But I am convinced that the Minister of Labour, despite this confusion, will do his best to solve the two problems I have pointed out.

(Text):

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, again we have the opportunity of speaking on the problem of unemployment and some of the things that go with it. We have heard many suggestions that in my opinion can be implemented to some satisfactory degree but there seems to be a terrific over-all problem that we have not yet been able to face. I notice that in today's Ottawa Citizen there is an article entitled, "Senate to Send Questionnaire to Unemployed", which reads as follows:

> Canada's unemployed are to be asked to fill out a special Senate-sponsored questionnaire about themselves—who they are, why they can't find jobs, their training, background and vital statistics. This was indicated Wednesday in the Senate by Senator Leon Methot, chairman of the special Senate committee on manpower.
> "I understand these questionnaires are going to be printed in many languages and sent to every unemployment insurance commission office in Canada", he said in reporting that the manpower committee was launching a research study "in depth" into the unemployment problem.
> The questionnaires would be drawn up in such a way as to preserve the anonymity of the applicant. The committee has retained Professor John Deutsch of Queen's University, Professor William Hood of University of Toronto and Warren James, a statistical expert with the defence production department, as the nucleus of its research team.

Very seldom is the Senate ever on the right track, Mr. Chairman, but I hope this is one of the times they are. It seems surprising to me that the House of Commons industrial relations committee has not seen fit to employ people of this calibre to do research work into what is unemployment and what is not unemployment.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was not allowed to by the government.

Mr. Peters: I realize the government is responsible for whether or not they do it but it seems funny that the Senate should be the ones to do this in-depth study that they appear to be going to do. There is a considerable difference of opinion as to who is unemployed and who is not. I have heard a number of government members say, and I think sincerely, that those people who are registered with the unemployment insurance commission just do not want to work. I do not think that accusation should be made about anybody in Canada until these people are offered the opportunity to work. If they are offered jobs and turn them down then I think it is quite safe to say they do not want that particular employment at least. If we have no jobs to offer, which is the case in most instances, then we cannot very well say that a person is just lazy and does not want to work. I think that members who use this argument are being unfair to many Canadians who have travelled from one part of the country to another looking for work and have not got it.

Mr. Grafftey: Would the hon. member permit a question? Is the hon. member suggesting that any hon. member actually used this argument in the house? I do not think such is the case. There may be a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Peters: I do not know whether the hon. member wishes to make it a question of privilege. However, I did not say that anybody had said it in the house. Some members of the government have said this to me and one of them said it today. I do not think it was said facetiously but rather quite sincerely. I do not think he is in a position to offer employment himself but he mentioned that many of these people do not want to work. It is true that we are having trouble in connection with unemployment insurance. There are people receiving unemployment insurance benefits who do not deserve them in my opinion but I would be much happier to find people receiving unemployment insurance payments who do not deserve them than I would be to find any person being turned down who deserves unemployment insurance benefits.

It is quite true that certain married women are drawing unemployment insurance benefits because of conditions we did not realize when the act was first drafted. It is quite true there are people seasonally employed who are making very close to a yearly income out of such employment and yet are able to draw unemployment insurance which is being paid for by people who are getting less than some of these construction workers earn on a seasonal basis. While this is true, I think we have to be very careful in limiting the provisions so that we will not take away the benefits from those who need them just to stop the very few who are abusing the system, and I think there are some now who do abuse it.

The whole matter of unemployment should be given very serious consideration because it seems to me we are reaching the stage now where we are reaping the effects of automation and yet we have done absolutely nothing to overcome the difficulties. This afternoon the minister mentioned that we are extending training for unemployed people who wish to take technical trade training. I hope this will mean that we will turn out more bricklayers, painters, plumbers and mechanics rather than more clerks, storekeepers and inventory keepers in government offices and that sort of thing. It seems to me that the problem facing the government is a manifestation of the fact that governments have not yet been able to meet the demand for change in industry.

One problem affecting many Canadian workers has to do with automobiles. In tonight's newspaper there is a letter from an economist who points out that there was an increase of 38,800, or 157 per cent, in the number of new cars imported into Canada from the United Kingdom between 1957-58 and 1959-60, and this was accompanied by a fall-off of $5 million in the value of our wheat exports to the United Kingdom. New car imports from the United Kingdom in the first quarter of 1960 were 26,800, a greater total than our imports for five of the past 10 years. In 1959 Canada imported 73,000 British cars.

I think this illustrates that it is time we took a look at the automobile industry. It is quite true that there is all this ballyhoo about bigger cars, faster cars and so on. However, the Canadian people have decided that they do not agree with the automobile industry. They do not want big cars with powerful motors that use more gasoline. They want the small economy cars. They are not interested in the terrific expanse of tailfin, with the consequent increase in price. They are interested in a small car. I think this is the time for the government to give leadership and say to the industry, you will give the people a number of small cars, and you are going to balance the number of cars against what we need to establish an export-import balance.

You may ask me, Mr. Chairman, why we should tell the automobile industry these things. It is very simple. These automobile companies would rather shut down and lay off their workers than change their system of production. They would rather do this because they do not care a hoot about their workers; they do not care a hoot about the country; they do not even care much about the buyer. What they do care about is making a profit. They can make just the same profit from the cars they manufacture in plants they own in Europe as they can from the cars manufactured in the plants they own in the United States. If it gives them more dollars to import cars they produce in other countries, then they are willing to bring those cars into the country and put them through their own dealerships and make their profit in this way.

It seems to me that the government itself is going to have to take some position in connection with directing industry, especially when an industry continues to produce something that is not going to sell. The only people who are going to be hurt in this situation are the workers. Industry will not be hurt because it will at least break even. However, the workers, the municipalities, the storekeepers and the people who are dependent on the auto workers for a living, these are the people who are going to be very hard hit. In the final analysis, the government which is being asked to support these welfare ventures that are necessary is going to be hard hit because there will be no taxes paid.

In the last few weeks notices have appeared in the local newspapers in my area that there will be two of the major mines in Kirkland Lake closed down. One of these is Sylvanite which has operated for nearly 25 years, and the other one is Kirkland Lake Minerals, which has operated for a long time. At the end of this month Kirkland Lake Minerals will lay off half its working force, and will continue operations with less than 100 employees. Sylvanite, which I think has employed about 100 persons for a number of years, sometimes a great deal more, is going to lay off all its employees.

I think it is interesting to note what they are going to do. This company, like a lot of other companies which close out, is not considering the federal government which has financed the company for a number of years. This company is not concerned with the community or their workmen. The company has done no more than it should have for the community or the workers. It has not even given the worker a decent standard of living or a pension plan. It has paid as little income tax and other taxes as possible to the government, while at the same time obtaining as much from emergency gold mining assistance as it could get. However, when it comes to closing out the company is going to dissolve, according to newspaper reports. It is not going to establish an exploration company to look for another mine in order to employ these workers. The company will close down and hopes to be able to liquidate its assets and repay every stockholder all the money put into that particular operation. They are going to do very well by the people who financed them, but they have not done very well by the people who have worked in this industry. They have not done very well by the government which paid a great deal of money to the company in order to help the community exist during the last 15 years.

I think this highlights what I am saying. If the government does not start directing industry into places like Elliot Lake, then there will be more unemployment. There is no great need for a park at Elliot Lake. What do the miners want with a park? If they want to go fishing, they can fish in the surrounding lakes. The miner does not need a park with a campsite. He has a $15,000 or $20,000 house in that area, and he does not want it in the middle of a park. He needs a job and industry should be directed there to provide him with a job. I suggest this government should take industry out of Toronto and other municipalities that do not really need it. They have more industry than they have room for now, and some industries should be moved from there to places like Elliot Lake.

Today, with all the technological changes, a worker can produce five or 10 times as much as he could 20 years ago. However, he is going to wear the same amount of clothes, buy the same amount of food and need the same amount of entertainment. I think it must be obvious to everyone that we are not going to solve unemployment problems until we start supplying new jobs to replace those jobs that are no longer there. If our standard of living continues to increase, it will mean more jobs and more purchasing power. People who are unemployed cannot buy anything. They cannot continue to increase their standard of living and they become a burden on those who remain in the productive field.

At the same time this government is not going to solve unemployment, nor is any other government, until it goes into "depth", as the Senate says. However, I do not believe the government will want to wait as long as the Senate has to find the answer because governments do not last as long as senators.

May I call it eleven o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the house leader what the business is for tomorrow and Saturday, and what he intends to do next week?

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, we will commence with order No. 5 on today's order paper, the motion pertaining to amending the British North America Act, followed by the estimates of the Department of Labour and the other estimates as already outlined which still retain their position, defence, finance, trade and commerce, and privy council. The business for Monday and Tuesday, I will announce tomorrow night.

There is just one other matter. My understanding is that all parties opposite agree that tomorrow at five o'clock we carry on with estimates rather than the private members' hour. Is that procedure agreeable to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the chamber?

Mr. Chevrier: In so far as we are concerned, it is agreeable. May I ask this further question? Will the Prime Minister be here to deal with the item announced by the house leader?

Mr. Churchill: The Minister of Justice will take that matter in charge. I wonder whether the representative of the C.C.F. is agreeable to that arrangement tomorrow at five o'clock?

Mr. Peters: Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent to an order that the house will continue to sit tomorrow without interruption from eleven o'clock a.m. to eleven o'clock p.m.?

Mr. Pickersgill: With an interruption for dinner.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes; an interruption from six o'clock until eight o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Oh, I understand; we suspend the hour for private bills. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

It being three minutes after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

PRIVILEGE

MRS. FAIRCLOUGH—REFERENCE TO ADVERTISEMENT IN OTTAWA "JOURNAL"

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I rise on a matter of personal privilege, arising out of an advertisement in last night's Ottawa Journal by Absell Wholesale which quotes an exchange which took place in this house a few days ago. At that time I rose and took issue with a statement made by the hon. member for Skeena that I was a client of this outfit.

Mr. Speaker, such is not true. I do not know this organization; I have never set foot in their establishment. On inquiry I discovered that a member of my staff had made a purchase there some time ago, without my knowledge, using a blank cheque with my signature which she endorsed. She has told me she shopped for the article desired in a number of other stores but was unable to purchase it anywhere else.

Under the circumstances it will be apparent that this was not a purchase made by me, and I repeat that I do not know this organization.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REFERENCE OF BILL NO. SD-124 BACK to STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax) moved:

That the order for house again in committee of the whole on Bill SD-124, an act for the relief of Louise Dupuis Papineau, be discharged; and that the said bill be referred back to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills together with the evidence taken and the papers produced in respect of the said bill before the Senate standing committee on divorce, and the letter of the petitioner's solicitor and the petitioner's own sworn petition and affidavit requesting that her original petition for divorce be withdrawn.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF STATEMENT BY ACTING SECRETARY OF STATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Secretary of State. Is it true that he made this statement, as reported in La Presse for July 28, 1960, and I quote:

The Acting Secretary of State also pointed out that a reduction of the defence budget has enabled the federal government to better "meet its responsibilities towards the provinces".

Hon. Leon Balcer (Acting Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, having neither seen nor read the article in question, I shall reserve my judgment on the matter. I do not recall using those very words.

Mr. Chevrier: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In fact, this is a reference to a statement allegedly made by the minister over the radio. It seems to me, therefore, that he should remember it.

My second question is this: Is it the policy of the government to cut down on war expenditures in order to give more to the provinces?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, in the statement I made over the radio, I explained that this year the government had reduced defence expenditures; on the same occasion, I listed certain federal government expenditures that were helping out the provinces.

Mr. Chevrier: May I have a reply to my question: Is it the policy of the government to reduce war expenditures, so as to give more money to the provinces?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Balcer: The policy of the government is to reduce any unnecessary expenses and develop all useful services.

UNITED NATIONS

CONGO—SUGGESTED OFFER OF CANADIAN FRENCH SPEAKING INFANTRY BATTALION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I sent this question earlier this morning to the Prime Minister's office. In his absence I wonder whether I might address it to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the C.B.C. report this morning to the effect that Premier Lumumba told United States authorities in Washington yesterday that he is willing to accept more foreign troops so that Belgian troops in the Congo may be repatriated to their own country as soon as possible, and in view of the fact that French is a common language in the Congo, can the Acting Prime Minister say whether the Canadian government will offer to the premier during his visit a French speaking infantry battalion for service in the Congo?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, any troops which are sent to the Congo are going under the authority of the United Nations and not on the request of the prime minister of the Congo. Any action which Canada took would be through the United Nations, and we have received no request from the United Nations for a battalion from Canada.

Mr. Argue: A supplementary question. Can the Acting Prime Minister say whether this question will be discussed with the premier? I realize that troops will be available, of course, through the United Nations.

Mr. Green: I cannot say what items will be discussed with the prime minister of the Congo, but certainly any troops which Canada might send to that country would go under the authority of the United Nations.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the minister whether the government has indicated to the United Nations the kind of forces we will be in a position to send if requested to do so?

Mr. Green: I indicated to the house some days ago that the suggestion had been made to Canada that we should send administrative troops, and that is still the situation.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ESQUIMALT, B.C.—PAYROLL DEDUCTION OF HEALTH INSURANCE PREMIUMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. If the minister does not have the information he may take the question as notice. Has the minister received representation from the international brotherhood of electrical workers requesting that the 150 employees at Her Majesty's Canadian dockyard at Esquimalt, British Columbia, be permitted to retain their credit union and co-operative health plan and be given the privilege of premium payments by payroll deductions similar to the privilege granted to other groups of employees dealing with other insurance companies? If so, what action has the minister taken in this matter?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have not received any such representation. I shall make an inquiry to ascertain if any message has come to the Department of Finance, but I have not received any representation personally.

PUBLIC SERVICE

AVAILABILITY OF INTERPRETER FOR CONGO PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The question I raise was brought to my attention by a distinguished member of a well-known Canadian family whose exploits in Canadian history are well recorded in our records.

Mr. Grafftey: Ask your question.

Mr. Herridge: Don't be in too much of a hurry. In view of the report in this morning's Globe and Mail to the effect that external affairs officials are trying to round up an interpreter for Prime Minister Lumumba, who speaks French but not English, and in view of the fact that the present government has repeatedly stated its respect for the bicultural and bilingual character of the country, would the minister assure the house that there are senior French speaking officials in his department fully competent to receive the prime minister of the Congo without an official interpreter being engaged?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Kootenay West usually asks some witty question, but today he has asked a very foolish one. He should not be so gullible as to believe all the things he reads, even in the Globe and Mail. The Department of External Affairs has, I believe, far more bilingual officials than any other department of government. The deputy under secretary happens to be a very distinguished French speaking civil servant, and even the minister is becoming at least partially bilingual.

Mr. Herridge: I am glad my question at least brought that information to the attention of the house.

ATOMIC ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO DISPOSAL OF U.S. ATOMIC WASTES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister assure the house that atomic waste from the United States will not be dumped off British Columbia or other Canadian coastal waters? Can the minister also inform the house why, as reported, Crossroads Marine Disposal Corporation of Boston, a firm which is licensed by the United States Atomic Energy Corporation to dispose of United States atomic wastes off the United States eastern seaboard, is now operating a plant in Nanaimo, British Columbia for the manufacture of containers for the disposal of atomic waste, and can the minister say where these containers will be used?

Mr. Speaker: Did the hon. member give notice of this question? Unless the minister wishes to answer, it appears to be an appropriate question to be put on the order paper.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The notice was very short, about an hour. The source of this report is not identified. The first question is applicable to the Department of External Affairs, not to the Department of Trade and Commerce, and the second question cannot be answered because we have no information which could be obtained within an hour as to whether the firm mentioned has a plant which is operating in Nanaimo, British Columbia, so obviously the question should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Argue: In view of the lateness of the session I wonder whether the minister would make further inquiries and give an answer some time before the session ends?

Mr. Churchill: The matter will be pursued. I would appreciate the source from which the hon. member has obtained his information.

Mr. Argue: I shall be glad to supply that information to the minister.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FISHERIES

BRITISH COLUMBIA—CONSIDERATION OF SINCLAIR REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I may address a question to the Minister of Fisheries and ask him whether it is his intention to make public the report of Dr. Sinclair on the British Columbia fishing industry, and whether the government intends to carry out its recommendations.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): No decision has been arrived at in connection with that matter as yet.

Mr. Pickersgill: Even about publication?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): That is so.

AIRPORTS

DORVAL—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CONSTRUCTION OF TERMINAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Pratt (Jacques Cartier-Lasalle): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I wonder if the minister could give us an up to the minute report on the progress which has been achieved in the construction of the new air terminal at Dorval.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday afternoon I made an inspection of the progress in the construction of the new air terminal at Dorval. I was very much impressed by what I saw. There were at least a thousand men working on the job, and progress is very satisfactory. I would say from what I saw yesterday that there is no doubt this will be one of the finest air terminal buildings anywhere in the world, which of course is in keeping with the needs of the great city of Montreal. We fully expect to open the terminal this year as advertised.

An hon. Member: Was the minister given notice of that question?

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

STATEMENT ON FUTURE USE OF CONTINUING COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Finance a question. In view of the criticism directed at the minister's instrument known as a seminar or study group on federal-provincial fiscal relations, is it the intention of the government to continue that particular form of discussion with the provinces or has the hon. gentleman now decided to abandon that procedure entirely?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): There has been no criticism from any responsible source—

An hon. Member: Touché.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —either of the continuing committee or of the use which has been made of it. As a matter of fact, not very long ago I heard a commendation of the work of this committee—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): By whom?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —from responsible sources—

Mr. Pickersgill: Responsible but secret.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —on some aspects of the work it had done in preparation for the plenary conference which was held in Ottawa the first three days of this week. Indeed, so highly is the work of the continuing committee regarded by the eleven governments concerned that it has been asked to meet in the interval before the resumption of the plenary conference, and arrangements have already been launched to hold a meeting of that committee in mid-September. I have no doubt that the meeting of the continuing committee at that time will be fruitful, as have its previous meetings. I have heard some suggestion of an effort being made on the part of persons who are not altogether unallied with the hon. gentleman politically in seeking to claim some credit for the original appointment of the continuing committee.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Is it proper in this house to refer to the premier of Ontario as an irresponsible source?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, obviously the question put by the Leader of the Opposition has no relationship whatever to anything I said.

REQUEST FOR BREAKDOWN OF FIGURES QUOTED BY MINISTER OF FINANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the Minister of Finance if he could clear up an ambiguity about his estimate of $2 billion. Could he say whether that includes payments already being made or whether that is additional to what is now being made?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no ambiguity and there never has been in this respect in anything I said, Mr. Speaker. The figure I used, as I made quite clear, indicated additional payments.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister in some fashion provide hon. members with a breakdown?

Mr. Speaker: Order. We dealt with this matter yesterday. The hon. member is repeating his request. I daresay it will be taken into account.

GRAIN

STATEMENT ON DELIVERY AND QUOTA POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. On Wednesday last, July 27, the minister was asked several questions with regard to the quota system as it pertains to grain producers in the prairie provinces. In reply to my question as to whether the 128 points still on the 6-bushel quota were the same points that were on low quotas in previous years, the minister stated he would have the answer later this week. I wonder if the minister is now in a position to advise the house about this situation.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker. On Monday I reported that there were 128 points still on the 6-bushel quota. That number has now been reduced to 52, so that most of the stations are now on the 7-bushel quota.

With regard to the specific question, a year ago, on July 31, 1959 there were 183 stations on the 6-bushel delivery quota. I took this up with the Canadian wheat board in August and asked them to give special consideration to those stations during the course of the present crop year. That has been done. I checked with the wheat board on several occasions during the course of the year to make sure that those stations which had complained about being on a low quota for several years would be given special attention. They were on a low quota because of conditions during the course of this crop year and the previous crop year, when a certain amount of grain in the northern part of the three prairie provinces was damp and had to be moved rather quickly to the terminal elevators.

During the early part of this year I mentioned that fact on several occasions. I think the farmers generally in western Canada appreciated the fact that in order that the damp grain might be moved rapidly some would have to wait their turn on the quota. Nevertheless the 183 stations that were checked last year are all on the 7-bushel quota and were on the 7-bushel quota on July 27 when the question was asked. The wheat board has met the necessary requirement there.

The board informs me that the space situation at these points is such that the delivery of the full 7-bushel quota should be possible by July 31. If at the end of the crop year there are some stations still on the 6-bushel quota, or some on the 7-bushel quota where deliveries have been inadequate due to full storage space, I will do the same thing again with the wheat board and check to make sure that during the course of the next crop year those stations receive special attention.

Mr. McIntosh: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Can the minister tell us the area in which the 52 stations still on the 6-bushel quota are located? Is it in the southern part of the province or the northern part?

Mr. Churchill: I do not have the actual area and cannot say whether it is in the north or south, but perhaps I could give a rundown of the quota distribution. Of the 2,007 stations, in Ontario there are 2 on the 7-bushel quota; in Manitoba 369, or the entire group; in Saskatchewan 11 on the 6-bushel quota and 1,071 on 7; in Alberta 41 on the 6-bushel quota and 508 on 7, and in British Columbia 5 stations all told on the 7-bushel quota. The grand total is 52 still on 6-bushels and 1,955 on 7. I will find out for the hon. member what areas are affected by the 11 in Saskatchewan and 41 in Alberta.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to ask a supplementary question. In addition to the welcome announcement about special attention next year, I wonder whether the minister has given any consideration to whether deliveries could take place for a short time within the new crop year, perhaps for two weeks, so the 7-bushel quota could in fact be available to producers at all points.

Mr. Churchill: I dealt with that question the other day, but it might be worth while to expand it a bit. I discussed with the wheat board the general subject of extension of quotas beyond July 31. As hon. members know, the initial quotas for the 1960-61 crop year become effective on August 1. This is in accordance with the practice of the wheat board, and the same policy has been followed over the last few years. In the opinion of the wheat board it is better to end each year's delivery quota on July 31 and open up with initial delivery quotas for the ensuing crop year on August 1. If delivery quotas were extended for a period after July 31, all deliveries would have to be for the account of the 1960-1961 pool, because under the terms of the Canadian Wheat Board Act July 31 is the terminal date for all pools. The extension of old quotas into a new crop year would result in delaying deliveries under new quotas which become effective on August 1.

Nevertheless, as I mentioned the other day, in one or two instances where box cars arrive on the last day of the crop year I think the practice has been to see that those box cars are filled up, even if it is August 1, and sent on their way. Generally speaking, however, the quotas and the deliveries end on July 31 for the 1959-60 crop year, and the new crop year opens on August 1.

WHEAT BOARD REGULATIONS RESPECTING DELIVERIES TO FEED MILLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, on July 26 the minister promised me an answer within a few days, and perhaps he has it now, with respect to whether or not it is the policy of the Canadian wheat board to insist that feed mills in the purchase of grain shall purchase it through ordinary delivery quotas, or is the policy being changed in line with the report of the agriculture committee?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I referred the matter to the Canadian wheat board and asked them to consult with the advisory committee of the wheat board. I propose having a conference with the wheat board as soon as possible after the session is over to discuss this matter and see what should be done with regard to the proposal put forward by the agriculture committee.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REPORTED ACTIVITIES OF CHINESE SECRET SOCIETY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice based upon a report by Gerald Waring on C.B.C.'s "Preview Commentary" today, which indicated that the Chinese immigration difficulties now being studied by the R.C.M.P. are related to a mysterious chinese secret society known as the Triad. Can the minister give us any indication whether such a sinister society is or has been operating in Canada?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the details of the operation and of the evidence collected by the police in the course of that operation and investigation will be made known as charges are laid and the cases brought before the courts. At that time the courts will have to determine whether the evidence justifies or supports the charges as laid, including charges that may or may not be laid against any member of any organization or the organization itself. Therefore I think it would be improper for me at this time to name or deny the name of any person or organization with respect to whom speculation may suggest that they are the subject of investigation.

MONTREAL—STATEMENT RESPECTING ARREST OF CERTAIN CHINESE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the house that I am advised that reports which have appeared in the press regarding the arrest of two Chinese in Montreal yesterday are inaccurate, especially in so far as mention was made that these Chinese were arraigned as much as three hours after their arrest. In fact I am advised that they were arrested at 1 p.m. and were before the court at 2.30 p.m.

In view of the adverse reaction and in some respects unjustifiable criticism with respect to the questioning that has been carried on in the past, may I say there has been no questioning at all of these two persons, on this occasion at least. Upon arrest they were taken directly to the R.C.M.P. headquarters for fingerprinting only and then taken directly before a judge. They have been released on bail. Further arrests are expected within a few days.

OTTAWA—ALLEGED PERJURY IN DIVORCE CASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Is the minister in a position to report on the investigation being conducted by the R.C.M.P. into the alleged perjury in the Eccles divorce case heard before the miscellaneous private bills committee this year? If not, is he in a position to make a progress report?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): The hon. member's question anticipates something which has not yet commenced, that is, an investigation by the R.C.M.P. A day or two ago I received a letter from the chief of the committees branch transmitting to me the report of the committee, and I also received a day or two ago the transcript of the evidence. In considering this matter I have felt that inasmuch as the matters concern themselves with two possible species of misconduct, first collusion and second perjury, and inasmuch as either or both of these, if they occurred, occurred also and primarily with respect to the proceedings before the Senate committee, it would be only appropriate that I should communicate with the chairman of the Senate committee to see whether that hon. senator or his committee felt that there was further action their committee desired to take in the matter. I have indicated to him and I am ready to refer the question to the attorney general of Ontario, especially with regard to perjury, but I believe also the attorney general of Quebec should be informed in that regard. I felt it would not be proper for me to do so without obtaining the comments of the Senate committee first.

Of course, with respect to the matter of collusion, if there be collusion, that would have been committed or would have resulted in an abuse of the procedures of parliament but primarily in the Senate committee itself, and it is of course within the power of that body to deal with such an offence, if such an offence were committed in connection with the hearings there.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

OTTAWA—NOTICE PROHIBITING SALE OF ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES TO INDIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration whether she is aware that Bright's wine store at 186 Sparks street, Ottawa, is displaying an antiquated notice issued under the authority of the former director of Indian affairs which prohibits the sale of alcoholic beverages to Indians. In view of the fact that in Ontario Indians are now supposed to be on an equal basis with white men so far as liquor is concerned, would the minister make inquiries to see whether there is any justification for this notice being there?

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member will agree with me that this matter is not of such urgency and importance as to occupy the time of the house when we are approaching the end of the session. I suggest that he take it up privately with the minister.

Mr. Howard: It is very important to some individuals.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO RESUMPTION OF DEBATE ON CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the house leader what arrangements have been made for the resumption of the debate on capital punishment?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The understanding was that as we reached the close of the session, the house would determine what it wished to do; and in that regard, if the Leader of the Opposition will inform me as to the day on which we will close perhaps we can make some arrangements.

Mr. Pearson: Is the minister not aware that the Prime Minister gave the house an assurance that arrangements would be made for the resumption of this debate?

Mr. Churchill: My understanding is that he said it would be open to the house to determine what would be done.

Mr. Pearson: Read Hansard.

JUDGES

AMENDMENT TO BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT—SUBSTITUTION OF ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

Hon. E. D. Fulton (for the Prime Minister) moved:

That a humble address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen in the following words:

To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty:

Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the commons of Canada in parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty, praying that you may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to be expressed as follows:

An act to amend the British North America Act, 1867.

Whereas the Senate and commons of Canada in parliament assembled have submitted addresses to Her Majesty praying that Her Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom for the enactment of the provisions hereinafter set forth:

Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

1. Section ninety nine of the British North America Act, 1867 is hereby repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"99. (1) Subject to subsection two of this section, the judges of the superior, district and county courts shall hold office during good behaviour, but shall be removable by the Governor General on address of the Senate and House of Commons.

(2) A judge of a superior, district or county court, whether appointed before or after the coming into force of this section, shall cease to hold office upon attaining the age of seventy five years, or upon the coming into force of this section if at that time he has already attained that age."

2. This act may be cited as the British North America Act, 1960, and the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1952, and this act may be cited together as the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1960.

3. This act shall come into force on the first day of March, nineteen hundred and sixty one.

be rescinded, and that the following resolution be substituted therefor:

B.N.A. Act

That a humble address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen in the following words:

To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty:

Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the commons of Canada in parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty, praying that you may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to be expressed as follows:

3. This act shall come into force on the first day of March, nineteen hundred and sixty one.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am very appreciative of the privilege of moving, on behalf of the right hon. the Prime Minister, the motion which stands in his name on the order paper. The motion, as hon. members will appreciate, asks that the house rescind the resolution adopted by this house on June 14 and substitute therefor a new resolution. The new resolution is in exactly the same form as the original resolution, with the exception that it omits reference to county and district court judges.

The effect of the new resolution therefore, Mr. Speaker, will be to ask Her Majesty to place before the United Kingdom parliament a proposal to amend the British North America Act to provide a retirement age of 75 for the judges of the superior courts of the provinces of Canada. This change is made necessary—I cannot go so far as to say desirable—by the fact that the other place, in dealing with a motion they had before them which had been in identical terms to the resolution which we adopted on June 14, came to the conclusion that they should delete the reference to district and county court judges.

The situation then was that we were faced with the necessity of taking action to deal with our own resolution in order to avoid the possibility of Her Majesty being confronted with humble addresses from the two different houses of the parliament of Canada in two different forms. This, it seemed to us, was a most undesirable if not an improper position for us to contemplate the crown being placed in. While therefore, Mr. Speaker, the government felt that its own view as to the form of the resolution was correct, nevertheless we came to the conclusion also that the exigencies of the situation, in all their implications, indicated that the preferable course was for us to invite this house to rescind its own resolution and adopt a new one which would be in exact conformity with the resolution of the Senate.

This having been done—and I trust this house will agree that this is the preferable course—then the two addresses founded on the resolution may be forwarded, and will be in identical terms. This is, of course, I am satisfied, what parliament would wish to see when we present addresses of this far-reaching importance and consequence to Her Majesty.

I have said that we felt this was the preferable course, and I should perhaps add we felt it was a course that could be adopted with propriety under the circumstances, notwithstanding our previous expression of opinion that it was desirable to include the reference to district and county court judges. In arriving at our conclusion that this was the preferable course, we were reinforced by the realization that in asking the House of Commons to adopt this course we would be achieving the major purpose which we presented to the house, that is of insuring that there will be a retiring age limit of 75 for superior court judges. We realized also that the determination of the retiring age of county court judges might then still be made in accordance with the present provisions of the Judges Act. In adopting this course we are achieving the major purpose, and we are not producing the result that the district and county court judges will have no retiring age limit set because their retiring age may continue to be determined, as at present, by the Judges Act.

On the basis of these considerations, but for the primary reason that we felt it would be undesirable that this parliament should present to Her Majesty addresses in two different forms, one from each house, we came to the conclusion that we should ask the House of Commons to rescind its resolution and substitute another.

Now, with respect to the procedure being followed, the authorities have been consulted, and I think there is no question but that this is the proper course, although it looks cumbersome on the order paper. Our position is that there is authority to the effect that the resolution can be rescinded and a new one substituted therefor, and that this is preferable to a motion to amend a resolution already adopted.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I submit to the house this new resolution calling for the rescinding of the earlier one and the adoption of the new one.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the views of the official opposition in regard to the purpose of the resolution which is now before the house were made known when we discussed the previous resolution, and I do not need to repeat those views on this occasion. At that time we expressed our support for an amendment to the British North America Act, which was undoubtedly required to provide for a retiring age for superior court judges. There was no difference of opinion between the government and ourselves on that score, although there was a difference of opinion as to whether this provision should be made applicable, as we thought, only to judges that were to be appointed henceforth.

However, Mr. Speaker, the decision of the house on that matter was reached, and I have no desire to reopen that question. The decision has been taken. However, this resolution before us today differs from the earlier resolution, as the Minister of Justice has pointed out, in the omission of the previous provision for an amendment to the British North America Act covering the retirement age of district and county court judges.

That provision is omitted. That was a provision that we did our best to have taken out, for reasons which we indicated at some length at the time the earlier resolution was before the house. We were not successful. The other house, however, decided that this provision should be omitted and it saves parliament, as the minister has put it—and indeed the British parliament—from the embarrassment of attempting to deal with two resolutions, not identical, in connection with an amendment to the constitution, the government has decided to accept this omission as recommended by the other house and has submitted this new resolution which implements that decision.

I think the government has been extremely wise in taking this course, which in our view saves this parliament from the consequences of a reversion to colonialism—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: It will be a simple matter to show that. At a time when the Prime Minister has called for a conference or rather has accepted an invitation to a conference which would repatriate, so we hope, the rest of our constitution; while that initiative was being taken, a step had been taken in this house which, if it had been carried out, would have resulted in the expatriation of a part of the constitution which is now under our control.

There has been a good deal of public misunderstanding of the meaning of this provision as it appeared in the first resolution, and some misinterpretation of the effect of its removal. As the minister himself has pointed out, this provision has nothing whatever to do with the retiring age of county court or district court judges. It has nothing whatever to do with that matter. The federal government has legislated for that purpose now without challenge, so far as I know, for 73 years. Under that legislation of this parliament the present age limit of 75 years for district and county court judges was established, I believe, as far back as 1913.

There is therefore no question of re-establishing a retirement age which was established so many years ago. All that this provision would have done—I refer to the one which is now omitted—was to have removed, according to the minister, doubts about the constitutionality of those actions which have been taken by this parliament over a period of 73 years without challenge. When we discussed this matter previously, I referred on June 14 to a question on this specific point. It was a question asked in the session of 1927, and it will be found at page 1080 of Hansard of that year. It was a question asked by the then hon. member for Simcoe, Mr. Boys, of the minister of justice of that day. The question was this:

> Is there any special provision in the British North America Act with respect to the retirement of county court judges?

The then minister of justice said no. Another question was asked:

> Is it suggested that such legislation was ultra vires?

The reply given was:

> No, not at all... There is nothing in the British North America Act preventing us from dealing with the tenure of office of county court judges.

However, when we discussed this matter previously the Minister of Justice said that while the provision has not been challenged in the courts there is involved, as he put it at page 4907 of Hansard, a residual doubt. Indeed, in his communications with the provinces on this matter he said there was a serious doubt.

As a result, we were asked in this house to resolve this doubt which, so far as I know, had not been in anybody's mind previously; at least there had been no public expression of that doubt, so far as I am aware. We were asked to resolve this doubt not by carrying on until our constitution was entirely repatriated, at which time we could resolve it in our own way if there was any doubt; we were asked to resolve it not by submitting the question to our own supreme court for a decision. No; after the expiration of 73 years we were asked to resolve this so-called residual doubt or serious doubt by asking the parliament of the United Kingdom to declare that we were wrong, that we in this parliament did not in fact have this power which we had been exercising for 73 years, and therefore to ask the parliament of the United Kingdom if it would please amend our constitution and make us honest Canadians again.

That request, Mr. Speaker, was made by a government which talks a good deal about Canadian nationalism and Canadian national development. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what would have been the reaction in the British House of Commons or in the British parliament upon receiving from this great independent state of Canada a request of this kind, to change our constitution in respect of something over which we have had control for 73 years.

That was the only issue involved in this particular provision which appeared in the earlier resolution, Mr. Speaker, and even at this stage I am glad the government has decided not to take the course which it advocated should be taken a few weeks ago, and which at that time we tried to persuade it not to take.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should think the government would find itself at this time in a rather embarrassing position. As the Leader of the Opposition has said, it was argued in this house by members of his party that the provision to retire district and county court judges at 75 should not have been in the original motion. However, the government insisted that it remain in the motion and the address went to the Senate, where this matter was also considered. Now we have action being insisted upon by the government to bring the address of the House of Commons into line with that of the Senate. I would think that the government, by this action, is admitting bad draftsmanship on its part and, it would appear, is bowing to the accusation that it has received bad advice and admitting in public that this additional provision which was in the first motion was not needed.

Mr. Speaker, I think another course should have been followed. Instead of an abject surrender to the members of the other place, this government should have arranged for a meeting between the House of Commons and the members of the other place and had a joint conference, as provided for in rule 22, as set forth in Beauchesne's fourth edition. This method which would have demonstrated that the House of Commons was not ready to surrender the terms of its motion to those members of the other place who are insisting upon changes. I believe that is the place where this whole matter should have been discussed, and perhaps at this conference the House of Commons could have persuaded the members of the other place to go forward with the motion we had passed in this chamber.

I think the position the House of Commons is in today demonstrates very clearly the need for reform of the other place, as has been advocated in general terms by this government on many occasions. This is a demonstration which the members of the other place can bring to the House of Commons of—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would ask the hon. member to consider whether he is in order in pursuing that line. I would think not. It is not relevant to the motion, and I think it is against our rules to make disrespectful references to the other place. The hon. member has not made disrespectful references, but he has questioned their actions. The principal reason I intervene is because this resolution really does not involve the question of the reform of the other place.

Mr. Argue: No, Mr. Speaker; I was just saying it is an indication that in my view there is a need for certain reforms in the other place. I was not speaking in any disrespectful manner of those in the other place. As a matter of fact, this is an occasion when one must give to them the greatest amount of respect, since their motion is the overriding one and we are asked by the Minister of Justice in this motion to amend our position in order to go along with the members of the other place.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question. Does he not really think that what this indicates is a need of a reform in this place?

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I think it demonstrates both. It definitely demonstrates that this government was either wrong initially in the terms of its motion, or is wrong in its action today. For a man with the knowledge of the Minister of Justice, and for a government led by a distinguished lawyer, it would seem to me that they have been in great error in presenting a motion with such an obvious loophole in it in the first place; or, if they were right in their motion in the first place, then they are now agreeing to a change in a rather subservient way which I think is degrading to the House of Commons itself.

I think hon. members of this house should oppose the motion as it is now set forth as protest against the members of the other place who, with the connivance of the government, are prepared to place the House of Commons in what is obviously an inferior position. In our Canadian democracy it is the belief of the members of this group that the people's will is better served by the House of Commons without so much power being vested in members of the other place. Certainly we say that the government should have had the type of conference set forth in the rules, instead of an abject and total surrender as demonstrated by the terms of the present motion.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a brief word on this subject. The Minister of Justice will remember that when the matter was before the house, I did state my views with regard to this situation. The minister and I had several exchanges as he will recall. The Leader of the Opposition in his succinct statement has made a comprehensive coverage of the problem in so far as this party is concerned, but I believe there is a situation arising out of the position of the government at the present time that must not be overlooked.

The minister has been preoccupied during the past ten days with consultations with the government of the United States in Washington, with his responsibilities as spokeman for the government on the combines act, and with heavy obligations as spokesman for the government in the bill of rights committee. I can only in all charity attribute this heavy preoccupation as the reason for the position in which the minister now finds himself. Other members of the government may not have as valid an excuse, but in the light of what I am going to say I recognize that that is the case so far as the Minister of Justice is concerned. But the Minister of Justice is the spokesman for the government of Canada in this House of Commons. He is not as other private members are. He has a responsibility not only as a member of this house but also as a member of the government.

Mr. Speaker, what was the position of the government regarding this matter when it was first discussed in this house? The position, as the Leader of the Opposition has stated, was that in the matter of the tenure of office of the county and district court judges, the minister felt there was a doubt as to the authority of this parliament to deal with this question in any way notwithstanding the fact, as was pointed out, that from 1867 and more particularly from 1873 on this parliament had take measures directly in relation to the tenure of office of district and county court judges.

We argued that to ask the United Kingdom parliament for leave to amend our constitution so as to give parliament the power to deal with the tenure of office of district and county court judges was to ask the United Kingdom parliament to do something which we now have the power ourselves to discharge. As the Leader of the Opposition said, to take that course now would be a retrogressive step and that would be going back to the colonial period so far as Canada was concerned. We argued that was objectionable particularly at a time when through one of our provinces, the province of Quebec, initiative was being taken in the matter of acquiring for Canada the right to amend our constitution without resort to any legislative body outside Canada.

Surely the Minister of Justice owes the house a fuller explanation than he has given. We recognize that as a result of the action taken in the other place, the situation now is that Her Majesty's government in the United Kingdom would be confronted with two resolutions from the houses of this parliament which, in part, are in conflict with one another. To allow that situation would be a reflection, as the Leader of the Opposition has said, on the responsible independent position that must be taken by a parliament such as the parliament of Canada.

What the Minister of Justice has not explained is this. Does he now say that the action we took in this house prior to the passage of the resolution with regard to county and district court judges was a valid position to take? Is he now satisfied beyond doubt that this parliament has the right to deal with the tenure of county and district court judges without resort to an amendment of the constitution by the parliament of the United Kingdom? The minister must be in that position before he can accede to the suggested way out of the dilemma in which he has been placed.

The minister cannot accept this solution merely on the grounds of expediency or merely to relieve the government of an embarrassment; he cannot accept it because he is faced with the dying days of this session and that accordingly this is the best way out of the muddle caused by the government's failure to appreciate the constitutional position regarding the tenure of county and district court judges. That, surely, is the situation. The government cannot agree to a course such as this on the mere ground of expediency. It must be backed up by conviction and by an appreciation of what the true constitutional position is. If the minister will now tell the house that it is the considered opinion of himself, of the law officers of the crown and of the government, that the position he took in this house prior to the vote on the resolution has now been changed as a result of further consideration, then of course he will extricate himself from the difficulty in which he now finds himself.

What were the grounds for saying that we must go to the parliament of the United Kingdom to obtain the necessary power to deal with the tenure of office of district and county court judges? What were the grounds presented by the minister? We pointed out the precedents. We pointed out what was done in 1873 and we pointed out what happened in 1926 when the then minister of justice, Mr. Lapointe, in answer to a question asked by Mr. Boys in the presence of such outstanding legal luminaries as the late Lord Bennett and Mr. Cahan, said there was no doubt about the constitutional right of this parliament to deal with matters having to do with the tenure of office of district and county court judges. The Minister of Justice heard that argument prior to the vote in this house on the resolution. He did not agree with that position. He said there was some doubt about the situation, although I think the only evidence of doubt was an observation made by the attorney general of, I believe, the province of Saskatchewan. The minister apparently agreed with that doubt. Does he still agree with it?

The important thing is whether the minister now believes that it is not necessary to go to the parliament of the United Kingdom to get the necessary authority to deal with the tenure of office of county and district court judges. Unless the minister can answer that question in the affirmative, he is now taking, in my judgment, pursuant to the high responsibilities of a minister of justice, an irresponsible course. The minister cannot act merely on the ground of expediency. He cannot act merely because he wishes to extricate himself from the difficulty which the circumstances present.

We in this party believe that it is desirable to retire judges at the age of 75. We have taken the position that in order to provide for the compulsory retirement of superior court judges, authority must now come from the United Kingdom parliament. We have always taken the position that authority of this kind was not required in connection with the tenure of district and county court judges. But having taken that position, we are now faced with a situation which confirms our fears and our concern. The position taken by the minister prior to the passage of the resolution has been repudiated, not only by a decision in the other place but by the very act which the government now accepts.

Surely the government owes the house a much more careful explanation than the minister has so far given us. The minister must now tell us, "I was wrong". The position, he must now agree, is clearly that this parliament has the right to deal with the tenure of county and district court judges. If the minister takes that position we shall respect him for it. But if not, I say that the course taken by the hon. gentleman is not a responsible one.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wish to rise briefly to reinforce what has been said by my hon. friend from Essex East, and to reinforce it out of the mouth, in part, of the Minister of Justice himself, because it does seem to me that the point raised by the hon. member for Essex East deserves a serious answer.

I say this with all the more conviction because when I made the same argument in the debate on June 14, as had previously been made by the Leader of the Opposition on this point, the argument that this was a reversion to colonialism and that it was totally unnecessary because the jurisdiction of this parliament had never been questioned, my contentions were ridiculed. I pointed out that no question had been raised regarding this jurisdiction by anyone of eminence in this country since county court judges were retired at the age of 75 in 1913; indeed since Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, who later became chief justice of Canada, had asked parliament to provide for the retirement of judges at 80 years of age in 1903; since Mr. Doherty had done the same thing in 1913, changing the age to 75; since Mr. Lapointe in 1926 took the position to which my hon. friend from Essex East referred, in reply to a Conservative member of that day. I said it was an extraordinary thing that the present Minister of Justice or the Prime Minister should suddenly have had a revelation that every government and every parliament up to this day had been wrong and they were right.

When I made that argument following the Leader of the Opposition, who had already made it one June 14, it was ridiculed. I should therefore like to repeat a few of the words I used on that occasion. I will not go over most of what I said, but I did use these words:

> However, if they feel there is a doubt—

That is the government. I continue:

> —I hope they will refer the matter to the courts. Surely it is the height of colonialism—and no other word can be applied to it—to seek to vest in Westminster a jurisdiction which they have never had—which they did not assume in 1867 and of which certainly, once the Statute of Westminster was passed, they divested themselves—and to seek to put into a British statute something no one has ever questioned since 1867 until the minister had this bright idea quite recently, namely the right of this parliament to do something which this parliament has done over and over again and which has been the basis of the tenure of county and district court judges since the year 1913 without any kind of question. It almost passes comprehension why a government should seek to be so abject.

The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) interjected at this point, "Nonsense". I went on to say:

> What purpose they think this is going to serve it is very hard to perceive.

The hon. member for Carleton again interjected:

> Argue it on a sensible basis.

The Minister of Justice then interjected:

> The hon. member does not know what that means.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. Martineau: Can the hon. member not find a better authority than himself to back up his previous affirmations?

Mr. Pearson: Yes; the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think the minister is a better authority, but I will go on to quote another authority, the Minister of Justice, if the hon. gentleman will just possess his soul in patience for a moment.

Mr. Martineau: This is a sign of progress.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Carleton suggested that I should argue the matter on a sensible basis.

Mr. Fulton: What page?

Mr. Pickersgill: Page 4923 of Hansard of June 14. I went on to say:

> The hon. member for Carleton says "argue this on a sensible basis". If the hon. member for Carleton belongs to the school of thought that wants to vest in Westminster again the control of parts of the constitution of this country that have always since 1867 been vested in this parliament, I do not know what other convenient words could be found for such an attitude than a colonial attitude.

I repeat that. I am glad to say that in another place, where the majority is different from what it is here, that colonial attitude was not taken. In that respect I must say it rather astonishes me to find that the hon. gentlemen in the far corner of the house supported the government on that occasion and appear still to be supporting the old position of the government that this colonial gesture should be made; for the hon. member for Kootenay West warmly supported what the government was doing and opposed the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition to take this colonialism out of the resolution before us at that time.

I should like now to turn to what the Minister of Justice had to say about my argument, as reported at page 4925 of Hansard in the second column. Referring to my remarks the minister said:

> I have seldom heard so distorted an argument as that made by the hon. gentleman to the effect that to seek to place the position of judges of district and county courts of Canada under the constitution is a retrograde step. Yet that was the argument made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

I interjected "Not at all," and the minister went on to say:

> In an attempt to bolster his political position the hon. gentleman used charges of colonialism and similar inept words.

I certainly did use charges of colonialism. I think it was colonialism and nothing else. It served no practical purpose. The judges were being retired. No one can believe that those judges, some of whom did not like being retired, would not have taken action in the courts if they had thought there was any doubt about the validity of the legislation under which they were being retired. The minister went on to say:

> Of course, as I recall some of the things that were done by the former government I can well understand their resentment of the attempt now being made to place the position of the judiciary with respect to the county and district courts on the sure basis of the constitution—

At this point a number of interjections were made resulting in the following exchange:

> Mr. Pearson: Of the British parliament.
>
> Mr. Fulton: My friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and the Leader of the Opposition by his endorsement of that argument would prefer to have the judiciary—the county court judges particularly—left to have their tenure of office—
>
> Mr. Pearson: In Canadian hands.
>
> Mr. Fulton: —determined—
>
> Mr. Pickersgill: By the parliament of Canada.
> Mr. Fulton: —by the government with no reference to the constitution whatever.

In fairness to the minister I think I should read that sentence without the interjections made by my leader and myself so we can thoroughly appreciate what the minister said on June 14. These were his words:

> My friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and the Leader of the Opposition by his endorsement of that argument would prefer to have the judiciary—the county court judges particularly—left to have their tenure of office... determined... by the government with no reference to the constitution whatever.

That is what the minister said. He said that the retirement of county and district court judges was being done with no reference to the constitution whatever. He was unequivocal about it. In other words the hon. gentleman said that the law under which we are now operating is unconstitutional, yet he comes here today and asks us to reverse the decision of this house, to do what? To go on with this unconstitutional situation which he found so intolerable only six weeks ago.

I wish to draw attention to the words the minister used, referring again to county and district court judges, as found in the second column of page 4930:

> What would happen if they were not included in this address? One would have an extraordinary situation if he considers what would happen if they were left out. Section 1 would say that judges of superior courts shall hold office during good behaviour and shall be removable by the Governor General on address of the Senate and House of Commons. Section 2 would say that judges of the superior, district and county courts shall cease to hold office on attaining the age of 75 years. This would be a most intolerable distinction and differentiation between the position of judges of district and county courts on the one hand and judges of superior courts on the other.

The minister described the situation as most intolerable; yet we are now asked to go back to that situation. In view of the fact that the minister told us on June 14 that what was being done at present was unconstitutional and intolerable—and that was the basis, with which we did not agree, on which he asked the majority in this house to adopt the original address—we are within our rights in marvelling that he should now come back to restore this unconstitutional and intolerable position without giving a word of explanation except that hon. gentlemen elsewhere, refusing to act in a colonial fashion, refused to pass the address that the minister was able to persuade the majority here to pass. That is the situation, as my friend the hon. member for Essex East pointed out a few moments ago.

I wish to draw the attention of the house briefly to another argument used by the minister, that with respect to consultation with the provinces. The minister said that one reason he could not accept the amendment that was offered on June 14 by my leader—and here are his words as found at page 4910; I am going to read no more than is absolutely essential to be fair to the minister and make the argument—was that:

> In my view, therefore, it would not be open to me to suggest at this stage that I could consent to an amendment to give effect to the point made by the Leader of the Opposition. Before I could do so I believe I would have to go back to the provinces and ask further consent to what to my mind would be a new proposal rather than the proposal which we have placed before the House of Commons and the Senate.

I think we are entitled to be told whether the minister has gone back and asked the provinces, or whether he has recanted about this view too. It is true, I believe, that in the case of every province but one the decision was made by the executive, but in one province the terms of this resolution, literatim and verbatim, were placed before both houses of the legislature and accepted by the legislature, and that is the legislature of a province which historically is perhaps as sensitive about its rights under the constitution as any province.

Is the minister asking us in this house now to change what the legislature of Quebec agreed to without even consulting the premier and the attorney general of that province? If he has consulted them, will he tell us what the premier or the attorney general said about this change? I think perhaps I should also put it on the record that it is true, as I pointed out in defence of our amendment, that district and county courts do not exist in the province of Quebec, and the reference to them was quite irrelevant so far as that province was concerned. That was one reason, of course, why my leader did not hesitate to move and we did not hesitate to support his amendment, because we realized that to take this out would not in fact have any practical effect whatsoever so far as that province was concerned.

But that was not the position taken by the Minister of Justice. The position taken by the Minister of Justice was:

Before I could do so I believe I would have to go back to the provinces and ask further consent to what to my mind would be a new proposal rather than the proposal which we have placed before the House of Commons and the Senate.

What we were asked to do on the 14th of June and what we are being asked to do again is a very solemn thing. We are being asked to go to the parliament of another country to change the constitution of our own country, and we should not be doing this in any spirit of levity. We should be most careful in doing this to follow all the proper forms and procedures, because we know very well how easily precedents are made even when we say we are not making precedents.

It does seem to me, sir, that in view of the confused state in which the government has got itself over this matter we certainly require more explanation of the position of the government than we have had. That, of course, does not alter the fact at all that we take the same view now that we took on June 14 and for which we voted, namely that we should never have contemplated this proposal to ask the parliament at Westminster to start changing parts of the constitution that belong to Canada and always have belonged to Canada. We think that was a grave mistake, a grave error. It was perhaps a lapse into the traditional colonialism of the Tory party.

If the minister wants to get up now and say they are repenting of that colonialism, repenting of that reversion to type; if he wants to say they have got better legal advice than they had when the Prime Minister first introduced the measure, let him do so. We should not forget that this is the Prime Minister's motion, not the minister's motion. If he wants to say that they were ill advised and had the wrong advice and have received better advice now, I think we should be told what that advice is, and whether or not they are satisfied that the retirement of district and county court judges is constitutional, before we are asked to adopt this amended motion.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the Minister of Justice speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, just before the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate sat down he made reference to some confusion that existed in somebody's mind. I turn these words upon him and say that the only confusion that exists is in the minds of the opposition, a confusion created in large by their deliberate refusal to understand the whole of the proposal in its context but rather to give vent to their desire to choose only those selected parts which suited their convenience. I give proof of what I have said immediately by referring to the extraordinary tactic just followed by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. He is an expert at this kind of tactic. He says, "I am not going to be selective, I am not quoting the whole of the minister's remarks, but I assure the house that in selecting passages I have selected those which will nevertheless indicate his whole position."

Mr. Pickersgill: I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Fulton: There is no question of privilege.

Mr. Pickersgill: I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. gentleman has made a suggestion which I think touches my honour as a member of the house. I quoted and gave the minister the reference, and the minister knows perfectly well that when I have given quotations in the house and have been asked to quote the context I have always been ready to do so, unlike some other hon. members.

Mr. Fulton: I do not know who the hon. member has in mind, and that does not matter. I have him in mind, and I am going to say that in his argument with respect to my position on the amendment of the Leader of the Opposition he has deliberately omitted a portion of my statement occurring immediately before the portion he read which, if he had read it—

Mr. Pickersgill: Which one?

Mr. Fulton: I will come to that in a moment—would have put my position in an entirely different context from that in which he sought to place it by his selective reading. The hon. member said that I owe the house an explanation as to why I rejected the amendment of the Leader of the Opposition. He said I had said that before accepting it I would have to go back to the provinces. He said, "Why then are you now able to accept this position, and have you gone back to the provinces? You owe the house an explanation."

I made it clear, on the earlier occasion, Mr. Speaker, that I rejected the amendment of the Leader of the Opposition in respect of its whole effect on the proposal of the government, because it would seek to remove the word "whether", which would have had the effect of giving the resolution then before the house application only to superior court judges appointed after the resolution came into effect.

Mr. Pickersgill: Who is doing the selecting now?

Mr. Fulton: I pointed out to the house that before presenting the resolution I had discussed it with the provinces and had made no reference to its confinement only to judges appointed after it came into effect but rather to its application to all superior court judges. I said I would therefore not be able to accept an amendment which would have the effect that the provision would cover only judges appointed here after, without going back to the provinces. I made it clear that it was on that ground I was opposed to the amendment. Now the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has sought to suggest that I opposed it because the elimination of district and county court judges was what was in my mind.

That was not what was in my mind when I made the statement. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said that I opposed the amendment on the ground that it eliminated district and county court judges and that I said I could not do that without going back to the provinces. In proof of what I say let me read this passage which he quoted—

Mr. Pickersgill: In the first place, I did not say that.

Mr. Fulton: —from the bottom of page 4910. It is true that this is what I said there:

> In my view, therefore, it would not be open to me to suggest at this stage that I could consent to an amendment to give effect to the point made by the Leader of the Opposition. Before I could do so I believe I would have to go back to the provinces and ask further consent to what to my mind would be a new proposal—

But the immediately preceding paragraph omitted by the hon. member made clear what I had in mind when I said "new proposal", and that what I had in mind was the proposal to delete the word "whether" so as to give the resolution application only to judges appointed hereafter. Here is what I said toward the bottom of page 4910:

> One way or the other, and it was not intended that the letters should create that impression. The letters and the discussion I had proceeded on the basis that the legislation would become effective immediately and with respect to all judges whether previously or subsequently appointed. It was on the basis of these letters and that discussion, that the provincial consent was received.
> In my view, therefore, it would not be open to me to suggest—

The house will appreciate from what I have just finished reading that the paragraph making my position clear is the one immediately preceding the one which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate read and which states:

> In my view, therefore, it would not be open to me to suggest at this stage that I could consent to an amendment to give effect to the point made by the Leader of the Opposition.

That is, without going back to the provinces. My whole argument on that point was that I could not consent to his amendment without going back to the provinces, because his amendment would have had the effect of preventing the resolution being applicable to judges hitherto appointed. I had in mind, as my words prove, that I would have had to go back to the provinces on this question. At that time the county court judges were already covered in the Judges Act and therefore, in that respect, we were making no substantive change; we were making a change merely in the legislative provision.

For the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate to suggest that I now have to explain why I have not gone back to the provinces before introducing this new resolution, and then to make that allegation on the basis of such carefully selected passages from my remarks when the passage immediately preceding it, which he could hardly have avoided seeing, made it clear that his argument was clearly inapplicable, results now in his being in the false position in which he sought to put me.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the hon. gentleman feel, then, that he could ask for an amendment to the constitution in certain particulars without consulting the provinces, though he must consult them in respect of others?

Mr. Fulton: That, of course, is a question—

Mr. Pickersgill: That is what you have just said.

Mr. Fulton: —which shows how incapable the mind of the hon. gentleman is of following a simple proposition. The question of whether I believe there could be a change in the constitution without consulting the provinces is not relevant. We did consult them with regard to county court judges. We said we wanted this amendment with respect to superior court judges, and wanted to know also whether they would be willing to have an age limit on district and county court judges included in this amendment. They said yes. No point arises, therefore, because we are not amending the constitution in the new form of the resolution in any way to which the provinces have not consented.

Now, I hope my hon. friends will be able to appreciate at least that simple statement.

Mr. Pearson: Will the minister permit a question? Did he not include in his communication to the provinces—I have before me the one to the attorney general of Newfoundland, dated October 5—a sentence to the effect that there does appear to be serious doubt as to the constitutionality of that provision? The minister was referring to the provision dealing with district and county court judges.

Mr. Fulton: Certainly I did. But surely my hon. friend can appreciate the distinction between amending the constitution without consulting the provinces on the one hand, and on the other the mere failure, for good and sufficient reasons, to go forward with an amendment to which the consent of the provinces has been received. The two are entirely different propositions. It would be most inappropriate to amend the constitution in a feature requiring provincial consent without having obtained the consent of the provinces, but there is nothing improper about a situation that arises where, having obtained the consent of the provinces to the amendment of the constitution in two respects, we proceed to submit an address to amend it in only one respect, particularly when the elimination of the second respect does not change any single aspect of the change in the first respect.

Mr. Pearson: You said there was serious doubt.

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friends are so anxious that they seek now to deprive me of the opportunity of dealing with these picayune points they have raised. I am going to deal with all these points, but first of all I wanted to demonstrate the falsity of the position assumed by hon. members opposite in making the so-called arguments they have sought to advance.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the minister leaves that point, would he permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: Yes; anything that might elucidate the position for the hon. gentlemen opposite, I would be glad to do.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister said he did not feel there was any impropriety in not going ahead with an amendment to which the provinces had agreed. I could not disagree with that point of view. However, I would ask the minister whether if my hon. friend's amendment had carried the other day he would not still have been going forward with the residual portion of the address, and the residual portion of the address would still have been something to which the provinces had consented. If that were the case, what was the point of what the hon. gentleman said in the remarks I quoted earlier?

Mr. Fulton: No. In my view the words immediately preceding the passage which the hon. member quoted make clear that taking out the word "whether" would have made a substantial difference. It would have altered the effect of the proposition which I put before the provinces.

Mr. Pickersgill: Not at all.

Mr. Fulton: If my hon. friend cannot even appreciate the difference between something that is substantial and something that is insubstantial, I may not be able to help. However, other hon. members will be able to follow the argument, so I will complete it.

My view was that to take out the word "whether" would have made a substantial alteration in that aspect of the constitutional change to which we had received provincial consent, namely the imposition of a retirement age of 75 on judges of superior courts.

My hon. friend is surely not going to try to pretend that the provinces, in giving that consent, were not aware of the fact there were quite a number of judges well over 75 at that time, and that there were many more judges under 75 who had been appointed before this resolution was to come into effect and therefore a great number of judges, in fact all the judges presently serving on the superior courts, would have been affected. My hon. friend is trying to suggest by his argument something which is really in the nature of an insult to the provincial ministers who considered this matter, that they would not have been aware that it affected all the judges, and that it was on the basis of that awareness that their consent was given.

So that the change in the address as suggested by the Leader of the Opposition, to make it apply only to those judges appointed subsequent to its passage, would have been a substantial change in the basis upon which provincial consent had been given. I said I did not believe, as a responsible minister of justice, I could consent to that without going back to the provinces. Perhaps my hon. friend from Bonavista-Twilingate would have followed such a course when he was minister. I do not know. All I know is that I am thankful he did not have the opportunity to do it. I am glad he does not have the opportunity to do it now because I would have regarded it as irresponsible, and I suggest that as long as he persists in that attitude that you can play ducks and drakes with the consent received from the provinces, then just so long will he remain where he is, at least until such time as the electors conveniently remove him from the house.

Mr. Pearson: Will the minister permit a question on this point? Is he now stating that if our amendment had been restricted to district and county court judges, then he would have accepted it?

Mr. Fulton: I am not able to give an answer to that question at the present time. All I can say in answer is that, in general, if my hon. friends opposite would introduce sensible amendments, then we would be able to deal with them at the time. What I would have done if he had brought in a sensible amendment, I do not know. I might have fainted with surprise.

Mr. Pearson: You are accepting our amendment now.

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friend says we are accepting his amendment now. We are not accepting his amendment now. His amendment was rejected because, in part, it contained this change which would have substantially changed the basis upon which provincial consent had been received, and that is still rejected.

Now let me come to some of the other things that were said this morning. It was suggested that our original proposal by including district and county court judges was a reversion to colonialism. May I suggest to those who consider this problem seriously that not only was it not a reversion to colonialism, but I think I shall be able to establish that the course that has been suggested by some, if followed, would have been a real and substantial reversion to colonialism. There has been a suggestion that what we should have done was simply to let the two resolutions go forward, and that somehow or other—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Who suggested that?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, who suggested that?

Mr. Fulton: —we are guilty of yielding or knuckling under in making this resolution and bringing it into conformity with that of the Senate.

Mr. Pickersgill: Eating crow.

Mr. Fulton: May I point out that as a result of the procedure followed in submitting the original resolution to the respective house, there was no possibility of a conference after the other house had changed its motion. That is my view on reading rule 22, cited by the hon. member for Assiniboia, because that rule applies only to a case in which one chamber has amended something submitted by the other chamber. In this case the procedure followed was that identical resolutions were submitted in each chamber. It was not the case of an address being adopted here and forwarded to the Senate for their concurrence. Identical addresses were submitted in each chamber. We adopted our address without change. They adopted theirs with an amendment. There is no provision for a conference under those circumstances. It may well be that our rules should be changed in order to take care of this situation. However, in my view and in the view of those who advise me there is no provision for a conference with the Senate in this situation. There is provision for a conference only if one house amends something sent to it by the other.

I have been asked why we followed this course of submitting simultaneous resolutions instead of a resolution of one house to be transmitted to the other. I find that the procedure we followed is the procedure that has been followed with respect to addresses regarding amendments to the constitution since 1940. I have not been able to find authority as to why this course began to be followed and has been consistently followed since 1940 whereas previously it was not the course followed. But with respect to the manner in which these things are placed on the papers of the houses, we have accepted those procedures worked out by the officials of the houses. It was for that reason that it was done in that way in this case.

I must say that I think we should now give consideration to the question of whether or not we should in future follow the previous system of having an address submitted to one house and then forwarded to the other. Either we must do that or most certainly we must look at our rules with a view to seeing whether they do not need revision in order to make it possible to have a conference with the other place in a situation such as this.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the minister just tell us where in rule 22 there is anything that would prevent a conference between the two houses in this matter.

Mr. Fulton: If my hon. friend reads the rule he will find—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would suggest that the minister read it.

Mr. Fulton: I have read it and I have had it analysed, and the advice I have is that it applies only to amendments made by one house to proposals received from another. Hence what we were confronted with was a situation in which we must either do what we are now inviting the house to do, or be in the position where two conflicting or different addresses would go to the United Kingdom. I ask hon. members of the house to ask themselves this question. Which would have been the greater colonialism, if there be any question of colonialism; the original proposal which we put forward, or a situation in which two conflicting addresses arrive in the United Kingdom and it is then for the United Kingdom authorities to decide what it is that the Canadian parliament wants done, instead of having the Canadian parliament indicate clearly by unanimous resolution what it is that it wants done. We came to the conclusion that the latter situation would be an intolerable one, and we therefore decided to recommend to this House of Commons what we believe to be the proper course for the reasons I outlined when I spoke in moving this motion, namely that the only proper course was to bring the two addresses into conformity.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: No; I am confined to 40 minutes.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, the minister is not confined.

Mr. Fulton: I will permit a question.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister say whether he does not now think that the colonialism consisted in putting in the district and county court judges in the first place? That is what we said.

Mr. Fulton: I wish my hon. friend, when he asks questions, would ask proper ones. He has already said that. All he is seeking to do is to repeat his own nonsense.

Mr. Pickersgill: Because the minister did not deal with the argument.

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friend is so fascinated with his own nonsense that he cannot avoid yielding to the temptation of repeating it by making interruptions in all the manners he knows he should not pursue.

Mr. Pickersgill: Because the minister was not dealing with our argument at all.

Mr. Fulton: If my hon. friend will just have the courtesy of abiding by the rules of the house, I should like to deal with this so-called argument that they put forward, but I should like to be permitted to do it in a fashion which, at least to those accustomed to orderly argument, will bear some resemblance to an orderly argument. However, I find it extremely difficult in the light of these petty interruptions that are constantly made.

Mr. Pickersgill: The precedents of 1956.

Mr. Fulton: Will my hon. friend not contain himself? Can he possibly stop his tongue from wagging?

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister has asked me a question, Mr. Speaker, and the answer is that I will not contain myself.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Peters: May we call it one o'clock and give the minister an opportunity to think the matter over?

Mr. Speaker: The minister seems to be having difficulty in making his remarks without interruption. May I ask for the co-operation of hon. members so that he may continue. While I am on my feet may I say that in my view the house will adjourn at one o'clock today unless by unanimous consent it wishes to change its order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think the Minister of Justice ought to be allowed an opportunity to carefully consider his remarks.

Mr. Fulton: I was just coming to the point of dealing with the question of why we put district and county court judges into the resolution in the first place. Here I should like to correct several inaccurate statements made by all three hon. members of the Liberal party who have spoken this morning. Each one of them has said that the exclusive right of the parliament of Canada to legislate with respect to the tenure of office of district and county court judges has ben accepted without challenge for 73 years. That is not the case, Mr. Speaker, and that statement reveals the lack of preparation and consideration given to this matter by hon. members who used those words.

The fact is that there have been circumstances giving rise to doubt as to where the authority to legislate with respect to the tenure of office of district and county court judges resides ever since 1869, when the legislature of Ontario enacted a statute dealing with the tenure of office of district and county court judges. That statute continued in existence on the statute books of the province of Ontario until the year 1953, I think it was, when it was finally removed in the course of one of their annual revisions. Hence to say that there has been no doubt about this matter for 73 years is as complete a misstatement as are most of the other statements that have been made about the matter by the members of the opposition in the course of this debate.

Some hon. Members: One o'clock.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, when the lunch hour intervened I had just directed the attention of the house to the fact that the question of whether the parliament of Canada has exclusive legislative authority to deal with the question of the tenure of office of district and county court judges is far from having been without challenge for 73 years, as has been erroneously asserted by the Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Essex East and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Pickersgill: I in fact made no such assertion.

Mr. Fulton: Then I am glad to have that correction made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Pickersgill: I said it had not been challenged since 1903.

Mr. Fulton: Then the hon. member says it has not been challenged for 57 years. Apparently he differs from the other two members of his party, because they said it has been without challenge for 73 years. Apparently hon. members opposite cannot agree among themselves as to the length of time for which it has been without challenge.

However, my main point is that it has not been without challenge, and that that challenge has continued ever since 1869, when the legislature of Ontario passed a statute dealing with the tenure of office of district and county court judges, which came immediately under question by the minister of justice of Canada, who at that time was Sir John A. Macdonald. Sir John A. Macdonald took the position that the statute as originally passed in the legislature of Ontario was open to great question.

There is a long history of discussion of that matter which is reflected in the Journals, I think it is, of this house. These record the correspondence which took place between the government here and representatives or officials of the government of Ontario. From reading the original correspondence it appears that the time for disallowance had gone by on the first occasion when it could have been exercised. So there was correspondence between officials of the two governments, and the Ontario government agreed to submit to its legislature another bill amending its original bill.

However, the subsequent statute also dealt, although in an amended form, with the matter of the tenure of office of district and county court judges in Ontario, and it is quite obvious from the correspondence and the discussion which took place with respect to the legislation that there was a very fundamental difference of opinion as to whether the parliament of Canada had the exclusive right to legislate with respect to the tenure of office of county or district court judges.

I might refer hon. members, if they want to follow up the interest which I am sure they have in this matter, to an article appearing in the Canadian Law Journal of 1881, volume 17, starting at page 445, in which the author of the article took the position that although the matter had been brought under question, that the authority lay with the parliament of Canada. The editor of the law journal appended an editorial note at the end of the article in which he reviewed some of the authorities and some of the considerations relative to this question.

The position of the government, therefore, with respect to this matter has been that it could not be asserted that there is no question as to where the legislative authority resides and that our constitution is not absolutely clear on the point. There is one other view which I think deserves mention; that because of the silence of the British North America Act on the point, the authority to determine the question of the tenure of office of district and county court judges lies perhaps not so much with the parliament of Canada as with the Governor General.

I think probably the best view is that the complete authority over this question does reside somewhere in the federal field, but that whether it be with the Governor General or with the parliament of Canada itself is a question; and there has been a very considerable and authoritative body of opinion which holds that it is open to question as to whether it lies between the federal and provincial authorities.

So, Mr. Speaker, in the light of that brief résumé of the differences of opinion which have been expressed, differences of opinion which, as I say, resulted in a legislative enactment by the legislature of Ontario which continued on their statute books until 1953, I think it is desirable to resolve the doubts and to resolve them in a manner which would place the matter beyond any question.

In asking the house to consider the reasonableness of that point of view, I think I should remind the house that this suggestion of a constitutional amendment which is now before the house is the first time since confederation that we have asked that the British North America Act be amended with respect to the tenure of office of judges. This is the first time since 1867 that the parliament of Canada has asked the United Kingdom parliament to amend the British North America Act in that respect.

There is no doubt that with respect to the tenure of office of superior court judges the only way in which it is proper to ask for an amendment is first to obtain provincial consent and then to ask the United Kingdom parliament to make that amendment in the British North America Act. That is agreed to by every hon. member of the house who has spoken in this debate.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would the hon. minister permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: May I just conclude this portion of my remarks. There is no question as to the propriety of our having asked for provincial consent. There is no question as to the necessity at the present time and under the present circumstances, of submitting an address to the United Kingdom parliament to amend the British North America Act in this respect.

That being accepted by all members of this house, and having been accepted by the members of the other place without question, it is surely reasonable to suggest that while we are asking for this kind of amendment, and this being the first occasion on which this kind of amendment has been asked for with respect to the tenure of office of judges, it would only be the course of prudence to include at the same time in our request for an amendment, a provision that would place the position of district and county court judges beyond question, and which would also have the effect of making it clear that the authority to legislate with respect to the retirement of district and county court judges resides in the parliament of Canada.

Hon. gentlemen say that that is a return to colonialism. Their argument is absurd.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister says that our allegation that this is a return to colonialism is absurd. Does he not agree that his statement, that the power likely resides with the Governor General is perhaps the most blatant declaration of the colonial tendencies of this government that could be found?

Mr. Fulton: First, the hon. member for Essex East has done what he so often does. He has taken a statement which I made beyond what I said, and then tried to say that that was my statement, which it was not. Second, he has misinterpreted what he himself said I said. I said there was some opinion which held that although it may be agreed that authority in this matter lies in the federal field, yet, because of the silence of the British North America Act on the question of the tenure and removal from office of county court judges authority in this matter rests with the Governor General. I did not say it rests with the Governor General. I said there was argument that that might be the case, and I refer the hon. gentleman to the remarks of Lord Watson in the case of the Attorney General for Canada v. the attorney general for Ontario (1898) Appeal Cases, 247.

That was not my decision. A Conservative government was not in office at that time; a Liberal government was in office.

What I say is that there is doubt about the matter for the reasons I have given; reasons which, I submit, would lead the average reasonable person to a conclusion that there is indeed some doubt about it. So I said, this being the situation, it seemed to us proper that when we for the first time submit an address to ask that the British North America Act be amended to deal with the tenure of office of judges, we should take the opportunity at the same time to ask that the authority to deal with the tenure of district and county court judges should also be placed beyond doubt, and that it should be placed beyond doubt within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada.

There is nothing whatever of colonialism in that position. It is a reasonable, logical and proper position to take. It is a position which asserts the pre-eminence of Canada in this field, and which attempts to have the situation resolved in the only way in which I submit it can be resolved at this time, that is by a constitutional enactment.

If there is any responsibility for the fact that at the present time we still have to go to the United Kingdom parliament in order to get this sort of constitutional amendment, the responsibility certainly does not rest with the present government of Canada. Indeed, the present government of Canada has given notice in unmistakable terms of its intention to attempt to resolve this problem and produce a method by which authority to amend the constitution of Canada may be brought home to Canada. That was announced by the Prime Minister in the course of his remarks this session, when he was speaking in the debate on the address. Therefore for hon. members opposite to seek to take advantage of this situation by blaming this administration for the fact that authority rests elsewhere is again a misrepresentation and a distortion.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit a question? I understood him to say—and if this is not correct I hope the hon. gentleman will correct me—that the effect of this amendment was to give the jurisdiction to the parliament of Canada.

Mr. Fulton: That is correct.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister explain how this amendment gives jurisdiction to the parliament of Canada; because this will be an act of the United Kingdom parliament. Is that not the case? It would be an act which could only be changed by the British parliament.

Mr. Fulton: At the present time, yes; but it makes it clear—perhaps I have not appreciated the meaning of the hon. member's question—

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the minister would permit me to make a slight intervention so I may put it in declaratory form. It seems to me that what the address now before us is seeking to do is to change the provision that judges should hold office for life. It provides that they should hold office until the age of 75. That would be an enactment of the British parliament and, having been enacted, the British parliament alone will be able to change it unless we repatriate our constitution.

Mr. Fulton: That is correct.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the minister had persisted in putting county and district court judges within the terms of the British North America Act, that would have taken jurisdiction away from this parliament, and if any subsequent change was needed that would be up to Westminster and only Westminster could change the situation. That is what we call colonialism.

Mr. Fulton: Then the responsibility for that kind of colonialism rests equally with hon. gentlemen opposite. Indeed, the major responsibility rests with them, because they have rested content with that kind of colonialism for the last 22 years.

Let me complete what I have to say before hon. gentlemen opposite lean back and laugh all over their desks. This government has said it intends to consult with the provinces on a method of bringing the constitution back to Canada so it may be clear that wherever the power to make specific amendments resides, the general power shall reside here in Canada. I am quite prepared to admit that in haste and under interruption I may have overstated the case in one particular and, if so, I should like my previous remarks to be read in the light of what I say now. The point I was making earlier is that there is doubt as to where the authority to legislate with respect to the tenure of office of county and district court judges resides, whether it resides here or whether it resides in the provinces. Our suggested amendments would have made clear that the provinces do not have authority to legislate with respect to the tenure of office of county and district court judges.

Mr. Pickersgill: Nor do we.

Mr. Fulton: If I said our amendment would have put the authority in the parliament of Canada, I should have said in the constitution of Canada. It is our intention to suggest to the provinces the formulation of a means by which the authority to amend the constitution may be brought to Canada, that authority for all amendments to the constitution may be brought to Canada. At that time, this being accomplished, authority with respect to the tenure of office of all judges will be determined in accordance with the constitution of Canada, a constitution which can be amended in Canada.

Division

If there is no objection, as there has been no objection, to our using the present facilities for amending the constitution, namely asking the United Kingdom parliament by way of an address to Her Majesty to amend the constitution, then I fail to see why there should suddenly be objection to a procedure which places district and county court judges in the same position as superior court judges when at the present time no one can say with absolute certainty where the authority to legislate with respect to the tenure of county court judges resides.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit a question? Would he say whether he knows of any case since the amendment of 1903—

Mr. Fulton: I am coming to that. The hon. member should not be so eager.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I complete my question? Can the minister give any instance since 1903—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt, but if my interpretation of the rule is correct the hon. minister is limited to 40 minutes and his time has expired.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, I think everyone in this house will consent to allowing the minister to go on.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Argue: Let us take the question.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

General administration—

164. Departmental administration including a grant of $10,000 to Frontier college and the expenses of the international labour conferences, $1,118,255.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I, together with those who sit on this side of the house, have listened with interest to the remarks made by the Minister of Labour concerning his department during the course of his opening statement. While his statement was an interesting one, I think all of us will agree it was a statement which had to do with the activities of his department. Important as those activities are, in my opinion very little was said during the course of his remarks concerning the very important problem with which this country is faced at the present time. Of course, I refer to the serious economic problem of unemployment. The minister, while he spoke for some 30 minutes or more, did not give to the committee a detailed statement other than what had been said by the Prime Minister and his other colleague concerning a frontal attack upon the problem which faces us today.

What is the problem? Earlier during this year, when the matter was under discussion in the house, and I refer now to February, 1960, there were 800,000 Canadians out of work and seeking employment. This represented 8.1 per cent of the labour force of this country. The Toronto Star, dealing with that question in its weekly editorial on February 27, 1960, had this to say:

> As parliament and various provincial legislatures opened this year, speeches from the throne glowed with confidence about the return of good times and of surging economic activity in 1960. At the very same time 723,000 Canadians were looking for jobs through national employment service. Not all, but the great majority of these were out of work.
> The two views do not jibe. There may be good times, but not for the hundreds of thousands of people—and their families—having to depend on unemployment insurance instead of pay envelopes. The insurance, though a help, is no substitute for a job.

Then there is this remarkable paragraph which I should like to put on the record.

> Apart from extending unemployment insurance benefits, the government's main attempts at treatment are to solicit the public to hire people for odd jobs ("Do it now" campaigns) and the winter works program. This program provides relatively few jobs and is certainly no answer to the problem.

At that time there was a great deal of advertising about what was known as the "Do it now" campaign. To what extent this has assisted in providing jobs for people, little or nothing has been said.

What is the position now? The hon. member for Essex East the other day put on the record the situation, and I shall not repeat it except to make one general statement. In June of this year, having regard to the latest figures from the minister's office and the dominion bureau of statistics, there were 300,000 people out of jobs and seeking work. According to the labour force survey of the dominion bureau of statistics for the month of June of this year, this represented 4.6 per cent of the labour force, unemployed and out of work. Three hundred thousand people out of work in the month of June, at a time when normally there is no seasonal unemployment and at a time when the business cycle should be at its peak, is symptomatic of a problem which, it seems to me, demands the immediate attention of the minister and all those who sit with him on the treasury benches. Three hundred thousand people out of work at this time of the year is a serious matter.

What will the position be as time goes on? If the committee will bear with me, I shall attempt to deal with that. I hear from my left the statement, "doom and gloom". Yes, we were accused of being the prophets of doom and gloom, not only during the course of this debate but during an earlier debate, at which time the minister lost his temper and said to those of us who sit on this side of the house, what have you got to offer? Have you anything to offer? I have been sitting here now for I do not know how many days, he said at the time, waiting for suggestions from those of you who sit on the other side of the house, and I have not heard a thing. However, we replied at the time that the responsibility was not on this side of the house, but on the other side of the house to find a solution and to do something about the problem with which this country was faced.

The government faced up to it with the winter works program which provided about 40,000 to 50,000 jobs, a winter works program which was announced too late in 1959 to be of any use in the province of Quebec and which was, because of the credit restrictions in 1960, of very little value. What is the solution?

Mr. Grafftey: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Grafftey: The hon. member said it was of no use in the province of Quebec. I was wondering if the hon. member was aware of the fact that in my own particular constituency many men were put to work as a result of this program last year?

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member is perhaps correct. Perhaps when I used the expression it was of no use, I should have said it was of little use because I now say, without fear of contradiction, that in the province of Quebec it provided jobs for less than 8,000 people when there were over 200,000 people out of work in that province. Of that there can be no doubt. The complete lack of planning for dealing with the problem at the time is what has brought about the hard core of unemployment with which this country is faced.

The other day the Prime Minister, the Minister of Public Works, and then later the Minister of Labour himself announced a new solution. What was this solution? It can be dealt with under four headings. First, there was housing. The restrictions are to be relaxed to provide greater employment. I shall not go into the details of this program because it would take too long. I believe the weakness of that program has been stated by the hon. member for Essex East when he said that all this was doing was replacing unemployment in the winter with unemployment in the summer.

Then there was the winter works program which was extended. I am not complaining about that; that was all to the good. But if the winter works program, as we had it in effect last year and the year before, provided from 40,000 to 50,000 jobs at a time when there was a substantial number of people out of work, what is this extension going to do with regard to the problem?

Then there is the training of unemployed workers. The federal government is to increase its contribution in that field from 50 per cent to 75 per cent of the total cost. Finally, there was the statement by the Minister of Labour himself, made during the course of consideration of his estimates, that the Prime Minister promised that he would add, as and when circumstances warranted, new and additional programs to meet the position. Does anyone in this committee seriously believe this is the proper way to meet a problem which was serious in the wintertime, which is serious now and which, according to certain economists coming from the area from which the minister himself comes, may well reach such proportions that there will be one million people unemployed next winter.

Mr. Ricard: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Ricard: How would he explain the fact that in Canada now there are more people employed than ever before?

Mr. Pickersgill: There are more people.

Mr. Chevrier: There may be more people employed but there are far more people unemployed today than there were last year or the year before.

Mr. Ricard: The population is increasing.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend says that the population is increasing. But what is the government doing to meet the situation? The government is using half-way measures.

Mr. Ricard: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Chevrier: I will permit a question provided that extra time is granted to me.

Mr. Fulton: That is not what happened to me.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry but the Chair cannot allow the hon. member an extension of time if he permits a question.

Mr. Chevrier: In that case I will not allow a question Mr. Chairman, and I thank you.

I was saying that the program which has been announced by the Minister of Labour will not meet the situation as we on this side of the house understand it and as it is understood in the country. Let us see what some of these matters are concerned with. When the minister lost his temper in the house on an earlier occasion and I am not complaining of that fact—

Mr. Starr: You lose yours all the time.

Mr. Chevrier: It happens to me at times. I admit that fact at once. However, it is not a fact that I lose it all the time.

Mr. Starr: You harped on this one.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, I harped on it with every reason because it was, I repeat, your responsibility and that of your colleagues to meet the situation and you called upon us to tell you what you should do.

Mr. Ricard: No.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, you did. If you want me to do so, I will put on Hansard the intervention of the minister.

Mr. Ricard: Let us settle it.

Mr. Chevrier: As reported at page 1617 of Hansard of Tuesday, March 1, 1960, the minister stated:

> I have sat here hopefully and patiently waiting for some concrete suggestions as to how this problem should be met, but there has not been one.

And further on:

> I am sitting here waiting patiently for some concrete suggestions for immediate action and I will continue to sit here until I get some. Instead of making empty speeches about unemployment they should get down to concrete facts and treat the matter seriously. As members of this house they should put forward concrete suggestions.

We did that, Mr. Chairman. We put forward concrete suggestions. Concrete suggestions were put forward by the hon. member for Essex East, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, the Prime Minister and myself.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: You mean the next prime minister.

Mr. Chevrier: I amend that statement at once by saying that the next prime minister and myself put on the record some concrete proposals. What happened to those proposals? They were laughed at. I have not at my disposal the time in which to repeat those suggestions but I should like to put half a dozen of them on the record and recall them to the attention of the minister.

To help overcome technological unemployment we advocated the expansion of vocational training in order to develop new skills among workers. We advocated a national advisory board on economic development, automation and unemployment. We advocated a special capital fund to encourage industrial development in the Atlantic provinces. We advocated again, as we did in 1958, a national science commission to ensure the most effective use of our national resources. We urged the government to plan now against the danger of cyclical unemployment when the economic cycle turns downward again.

We must learn a lot more, we said, about seasonal unemployment than we know now. We advocated a special unemployment committee to study and analyse the problem. We must have the best brains of government, business, trade unions, agriculture and universities set to work on the study of seasonal unemployment.

I could go on but time is of the essence. What were we told from the other side of the house? In fact, these suggestions were laughed at by hon. gentlemen who sit on the side of the Minister of Labour. What did the Minister of Finance say? On March 31 the Minister of Finance said that the problem of unemployment would melt with the snow. That was in effect what the Minister of Finance told us at that time when he spoke at a meeting in Toronto. He said that with the coming of spring and with the melting of the snow the problem of unemployment also would melt and disappear.

Then again we were given some more advice by the Minister of Finance. He found a new formula which was to be added to the "Do it now" program and that was "work and save". It is an easy thing to make that statement in speeches but when it comes to putting it into operation, particularly by those who have no work, as can be seen, it is of no practical use whatsoever.

The Leader of the Opposition put on Hansard some months ago the fact that there were three kinds of unemployment, namely cyclical or economic unemployment caused by the ups and downs of business; technological unemployment caused in large part by automation; and seasonal unemployment brought about by climatic conditions. I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that the government has addressed itself to only one of these categories of unemployment, namely that of a seasonal or climatic nature. The program which has been set down as a four-pronged program deals with but one of the categories.

As has already been stated, when we put questions to the minister on orders of the day, the replies have been either in the negative or evasive. I have asked him repeatedly about the statement and the recommendations made by the federation of reeves and mayors of Ontario who held their convention in Cornwall and who requested of him the immediate establishment of a study to consider the scope of unemployment in this country. I asked him that question on three different occasions and on three different occasions he evaded it. If that is the way in which to deal with questions in the House of Commons—

Mr. Starr: I rise on a question of privilege. I do not want to interrupt the hon. member for Laurier but may I say this? He says that I evaded the questions. If he would be honest with himself and with the house and if he looked up Hansard I think he will find I answered his question in the way in which he asked it. He asked whether I had received any representations and I said no; and to this day I have not received any representations from that body.

Mr. Chevrier: That is not a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. It is true that the first question I asked was whether the minister had received representations. But then the next question I asked was whether he had seen this report in the press and he said yes, that he had read the press report. At that point he was interrupted by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate who asked him whether it was not true that at one time he was a member of the federation himself and he said that he was the mayor of the city of Oshawa. What is the inference from that reply? If that is not replying evasively to a question, I do not know what it is; and where is the question of privilege in a matter of this kind? I say to the minister that the hon. member for Essex East is right and so am I when I state without equivocation that to many of these questions the answers have been in effect evasive.

It has been said repeatedly in the House of Commons and elsewhere that the situation with regard to unemployment is serious in the province of Quebec. I believe it is more serious there than it is in any other part of Canada perhaps with the exception of certain areas in the maritime provinces. There were members from the province of Quebec who spoke here on several occasions. They dealt with one small aspect, the textile industry—and an important one indeed to Quebec—of the unemployment problem. But did they deal with the serious situation in the province of Quebec? Have they made representations to the minister and to the government?

Mr. Ricard: Yes; we have made representations.

Mr. Chevrier: I am glad to hear that. It is apparent that those representations have had no effect. I read now from the brief which was presented by the present premier of the province of Quebec on the occasion of the dominion-provincial conference.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Lesage promised during the last election campaign to regulate the position. He said that was his own responsibility.

Mr. Chevrier: If my hon. friend will hold his seat I will tell him what the premier of the province of Quebec said and then I will read what the Minister of Labour said with respect to this matter, and then he will see and perhaps understand once and for all what the true position is. I have not time to read the whole of the brief dealing with unemployment but I will start with this:

> The province of Quebec and the rest of the country are faced at present with serious economic problems. Unemployment is one of the most serious of those problems . . .
> The fight against unemployment has become one of the main duties of the state. This responsibility belongs to all spheres of government under our federal system. In Quebec, we recognized recently that the province has its share of responsibility and we intend to face it without delay. This is not the time to describe the measures that we shall take, but it might be noted, in passing, that we intend to establish shortly a council of economic orientation to serve as the planning agency of our economic and industrial life and which will have under its jurisdiction a bureau of economic and scientific research as well as an industrial development bureau.

Mr. Ricard: That was long before Mr. Lesage—

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to being interrupted, but if the hon. member wants to ask a question let him get off his seat, because there seems to be nothing in his head, as I intend to establish in a moment.

Mr. Ricard: I did get up a while ago and you refused my question.

Mr. Chevrier: I did not refuse you.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: The final statement with respect to this position by the premier of the province of Quebec is as follows:

> We have recognized that there is—

Mr. Ricard: There is a strong—

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I cannot carry on unless there is order from the other side, and I hope you will try and establish it.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

The Chairman: I must ask hon. members to permit the hon. member for Laurier to continue.

Mr. Chevrier: The rest of this is as follows:

> We have recognized—

He is referring to the province of Quebec.

> —that there is a provincial responsibility in this field but we have never claimed that it was an exclusive responsibility.

Let us see what the Minister of Labour said when addressing this house on March 3, 1960, as reported on page 1699 of Hansard. He said:

> This present government is responsible for that problem—

He was referring to unemployment.

> —and has been responsible for it. I, as Minister of Labour, answer on behalf of the government in this respect.

I think that makes it quite clear, and I hope the hon. member who interrupted me a moment ago will once and for all in view of those two statements realize where the responsibility for this matter lies. We have never stated that it lay anywhere else, but hon. members on the other side continue to misstate the position.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: May I point out that—

Mr. Chevrier: No. There is nothing whatsoever you may point out in the circumstances.

(Text):

Then there is this position.

Mr. Pigeon: You are afraid of it.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: I am certainly not afraid of you because you are so useless and repetitious—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: I am going to deal now with another matter, and that is a matter about which the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot claims to be an expert—

Mr. Ricard: No, I never did.

Mr. Chevrier: —and that is the question of the textile industry in the province of Quebec. The textile industry in the province of Quebec is a very important one, important not only to that province but also to other parts of Canada. But, Mr. Chairman, if you had listened to the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot the other day you would have thought that all the ills which had fallen upon that industry were the fault of the previous administration. All you would have to do to get a reply to what the hon. member stated is not to listen to me but to have listened to the hon. member for Sherbrooke, who gave a complete reply to what this hon. gentleman has said with reference to that situation.

I would think that the hon. member for Sherbrooke, while we may not always agree with him, at least knows what he is talking about. He knows something about the textile industry because it means so much to Sherbrooke. I would like to put on record some of the things which were said by the hon. member for Sherbrooke, and I would ask the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot to listen to this very carefully because it answers him completely. I am reading from page 3 of the translation section in Hansard of his speech which is to be found on page 7159 of Hansard for July 28, 1960. He said:

Some 20 years ago,—

I remind the house that that is when the previous Liberal administration was in office.

—Canadian textile products were getting about 75 per cent of the Canadian market. Today, they barely get 44 per cent of the national market.

The major cause of this situation is the quantity of foreign textiles flooding the Canadian market.

In 1959 United States mills sold in Canada six million more yards of cotton than did Canadian mills.

Besides, in that same year, 1959, Japanese textile exports increased by 56 per cent.

Now listen to this, Mr. Chairman. In the same city of Sherbrooke, on March 23, 1958, this is what the Prime Minister said about this problem:

Sherbrooke, a textile manufacturing city of 70,000, has been seriously hit by United States "dumping" of textiles and Mr. Diefenbaker made it plain this situation will not be permitted to continue.

"The textile industry... has not always been treated fairly in the past", he declared in a searching denunciation of the former Liberal government. "Its requests for better treatment have much too long been neglected".

Mr. Chairman, in the words of the hon. member for Sherbrooke, this is what the situation is today in 1960, much worse than it ever was before.

I ask my distinguished friend from Stormont who sits away down at the other end whether he remembers what the Prime Minister said in his own city about the textile industry; how he would do away with dumping; how he would move quickly to get rid of dumping of textile products on the Canadian market in the same way as the government had succeeded in getting rid of the dumping of agricultural products. And what is the position in that unfortunate city where its cotton industry has had three mills close down and 2,500 people put out of work? That is also the position to a large extent in certain parts of the province of Quebec, for instance in Valleyfield where the textile industry has suffered a tremendous drop in employment and the sales of its products.

I could go on and refer to what is happening in the city of Montreal; but no. Hon. members from the province of Quebec will rise in their places and say that this is a wonderful government, that it is doing great things. Still the number of unemployed mount, notwithstanding the fact that we find ourselves in the month of July when the problem should be disappearing entirely.

I have stated this before and it is worth repeating, because there are some hon. members of this house who understand nothing unless it is repeated. It has been said in this house that things were much worse during the days of the Liberal regime, but I would remind hon. members of this house of the program which was tabled in the house in April, 1945 by the then minister of reconstruction and supply, the Right Hon. Mr. Howe who was laughed at when I mentioned his name the other evening when I said that many of those on the other side of the house would like to have him today to direct the economy.

He tabled a program of eight points dealing with the initial period of reconstruction in the post-war era. What was the result? I should like the hon. member from St. Hyacinthe-Bagot, who made all sorts of affirmations about what had happened under the previous regime, to listen to this, because these are figures taken from the dominion bureau of statistics for the period 1946 to 1956, a period of little more than 10 years. During those 11 years the percentage of the labour force without jobs and seeking work was at an average of 2.8 per year when the experts say that 3 per cent is the equivalent of full employment. That was the situation from 1946 to 1956.

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Chevrier: May I be allowed to continue?

The Chairman: Does the committee consent to the hon. member continuing?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Starr: That will be all right.

Mr. Chevrier: I thank the Minister of Labour and those who sit in the committee for their kindness in allowing me to continue. It gives me the opportunity to put on record that between 1946 and 1956 the average percentage of the labour force without jobs was 2.8 per cent as I said, whereas according to the experts 3 per cent of the labour force is the equivalent of full employment.

Mr. Speakman: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question. Would the hon. member tell us during that 11-year period what was the highest percentage in any one year?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, I have it here and I will put it on the record. Here are the figures:

Year	Labour force	Proportion without work
1946	4.8 million	2.9 per cent
1947	4.9 "	2 " "
1948	4.9 "	2 " "
1949	5 "	2.6 " "
1950	5.1 "	3.2 " "
1951	5.2 "	2 " "
1952	5.3 "	2.4 " "
1953	5.3 "	2.5 " "

I cannot go on indefinitely—

An hon. Member: There are only two more.

Mr. MacInnis: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? The house has made time available to the hon. member, and surely he can answer one question.

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps the hon. member would allow me to put the rest of the table on the record and I will answer the question then if I can.

Year	Labour force	Proportion without work
1954	5.4 million	4.2 per cent
1955	5.5 "	4.1 " "
1956	5.7 "	3.1 " "
1957	6 "	4.3 " "
1958	6.1 "	6.6 " "
1959	6.2 "	5.6 " "

In 1960 the percentage rose almost to 9 per cent—8.6 per cent, I think, was the figure given by the minister's office.

Mr. Starr: Were these figures for the same month of each of those years and, if so, what was the month?

Mr. Chevrier: This was the average for the year. I believe the minister asked me that question before.

Mr. Starr: No, I did not.

Mr. Chevrier: Then I am sorry.

Mr. MacInnis: I wonder if the hon. member would now explain to the committee, if he can, the effects of the war and the Korean conflict on the figures in that period between 1946 and 1956.

Mr. Chevrier: I will deal with both. The last figure the hon. member mentioned was 1956 and we were far away then from either the Korean or world war II. Now let me deal with the first part of the question. The right hon. gentleman who headed the department of reconstruction and supply put a plan on record. He tabled it in this house and the government of the day followed that plan, and because of that plan the favourable position which I have indicated here in these tables taken from the dominion bureau of statistics came about; the figures indicate what happened, as a result, during that interval.

What I am complaining about now is that there is no plan, not even a halfhearted one, being followed by the present government. If there was such a plan, or if there was a committee set up such as we had at one time to deal with this problem, then perhaps the government would not be facing criticism such as has been made on this side of the house with regard to the weak attempt—I say this with respect to the minister and not as a personal attack—to deal with what is, after defence, Canada's No. 1 problem.

Mr. MacInnis: The hon. gentleman has failed to answer the question I put to him and he made reference to the plan which was put forward. Would he now explain to the committee the detriment to the maritime area of any plans put forward by Mr. C. D. Howe?

Mr. Chevrier: That plan was put into effect, and I have no doubt that it was of benefit to all parts of the economy of Canada.

Mr. MacInnis: That is not so.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member keeps interrupting. If he does not want to listen to what I have to say he should not be asking questions. I am attempting to say that this plan was of benefit to the whole economy of Canada and I have no doubt that that is a fact, and if the right hon. gentleman who was responsible for putting that plan into effect had not been at the helm in those days the situation in the area from which the hon. member comes would be a great deal worse than it is today.

Mr. MacInnis: That would take a lot of explaining to the servicemen of the last war.

An hon. Member: Oh, sit down.

Mr. Chevrier: What have we instead? Instead we have the remedies given by the minister a moment ago which can be summed up in two words; first, the "Do it now" program we had when the winter works program was originally announced and then, later, the program announced by the Minister of Finance to fight inflation, namely "work and save". Those were brave words as were the words of the Prime Minister which were used on so many occasions by the right hon. gentleman and which hon. members know so well, though the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi does not seem too sure of them.

"Work and Save" is a good slogan providing we have the kind of economy where it is possible to work and save, but when there were 800,000 people out of work and seeking jobs at the beginning of the year and 300,000 now, it is not the answer to this problem. The answer to this problem is a constructive approach, and a constructive approach has not been forthcoming from the Minister of Labour. Until one has been submitted which is deserving of serious study and consideration, I say emphatically that the difficulty in which we find ourselves today will not be solved.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago the hon. member for Laurier accused me of making statements in this chamber that were contrary to the facts. I said last evening that 23 textile mills in the province of Quebec closed their doors during the course of the Liberal administration. In order to keep the record straight I should like to place on the record the names of those firms which had to close their doors between the years 1951 and 1957. I do this for the information of the hon. member for Laurier who seems to doubt what I said in this regard. When he said what he did I think he had something else in mind concerning which were I to give proof in this chamber it would put in a shameful light the hon. member and his colleagues in the Liberal party. The list to which I referred is as follows:

Company	Approximate closing date
Actonvale Silk Mills	1952
British-American Silk Mills	1954
Canadian Silk Textiles Registered	1953
Classon Mills Limited	1956
Demetre Sault & Ciriez (Canada) Limited	1956
Eastern Woollen & Worsted Mills	1952 or 1953
Franco-Canadian Dyers Limited	1956
International Worsted Mills Inc.	1953
Kenmar Textiles	1955
La Filature de Saguenay Limitee	1954
Laurentian Textile Company	1958

Mr. Pickersgill: 1958?

Mr. Ricard: I continue:

Company	Approximate closing date
Mattawin Textiles Limited	1957
Roby Worsteds Limited	1952
Rouville Textiles Company	1955
Seneca Weavers Limited	1952
St. Andrews Woollen Mills Limited	1953
St. Johns Textile Mills Limited	1956
Soieries Boell Limited	1954
Sutton Silk Mills Limited	1952
Valleyfield Silk Mills Limited	1953
Wesley Mason Mills (Drummondville, Quebec)	1954
Wesley Mason Mills Limited (Cap-de-la-Madeleine, Quebec)	1953
Wolsey of Canada Limited	1954

That information was drawn from material published by the Primary Textiles Institute Limited.

Furthermore, I should like to ask the hon. member which minister in the last Liberal government said that the textile industry in the province of Quebec was heading toward its death. That was a former Liberal minister. Not only was he satisfied at the decline of the industry in that province but he longed to see the industry in that province wiped out.

Mr. Deschatelets: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Ricard: No. I will ask the hon. member to wait until I am finished. I will do the same thing to him that the hon. member for Laurier did to me.

Mr. Pickersgill: You will soon be finished.

Mr. Ricard: I wish to remind the committee that never in the history of Canada were the average weekly earnings of workers as high as under a Conservative government.

Mr. Chevrier: And employment so low.

Mr. Ricard: The Canadian worker enjoys an average salary of $75 a week under this government, a peak of achievement never reached by Canadian wage earners under a Liberal government. It took the Conservative government to ensure that Canadian workers would earn that much money.

As I said yesterday, it requires the effort of every Canadian citizen to create employment in our country. The creation of employment is not the sole responsibility of the federal government but is a responsibility shared by all Canadian citizens. Each of us must do everything he can to ensure the creation of employment in this promising young land of ours for the young fellows of today who will be the leading men of tomorrow in our country.

Because of the farsightedness of Canadian engineers and industrialists we have accomplished things in our country that are the pride of all Canadians. In Drummondville J. A. Gosselin Limited Company developed an apparatus used in the dyeing process in the textile industry, some kind of gadget never seen before. It has been exported to England where it has been greeted enthusiastically. This shows what our Canadian engineers and industrialists can do. I appeal to all Canadians to stop weeping about temporary conditions and to join together in a united effort to build up Canada better than it was under Liberal organization.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Ricard: Certainly.

Mr. Deschatelets: The hon. member mentioned earlier that a minister in the previous administration had made a certain statement. Could he give us the name of that minister, and also the reference in Hansard of the said statement?

Mr. Valade: Do you know him?

Mr. Ricard: I feel that, as usual, the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont has not been listening to my remarks, because I, myself, asked who had made the statement. Since I was inquiring about it myself, I am surely not in a position to inform the hon. member. However, I would be very glad to get that information, because I know that such a statement was made.

Mr. Deschatelets: You are more ridiculous than ever.

Mr. Ricard: Apparently, the hon. member has been taking a look at himself in the mirror.

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: Who has the thimble?

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, although this debate is taking place in the dying days of this sesion it is nevertheless an exceedingly important one. Recent statistics issued by the department show that unemployment is still a serious problem in Canada.

I have in my hands statistics of unplaced applicants as a percentage of the labour force. These show that in June this year there were 401,196 unplaced applicants. I have the figures for the same month back to 1956. In the year before this government took office, in this month, there were 191,000 unemployed in this category. In 1957, the next year, when the Conservative government had handled the administration of this country for half a year there were 270,000. In 1958 in the same month it was up to 526,000. In 1959 it was 320,000 and this year it is 401,000. Under this administration the government has been able to accomplish nothing towards reducing the general unemployment picture.

This government took office in June, 1957 and its administration since has been notable throughout for the widespread unemployment that has existed in the country. In case it might be said that the figures for June are unrepresentative, I have figures in my hand for all of the months of the same year and they show the same general trend. In January, 1957 the number of unemployed amounted to 526,000; in the same month in 1958, 816,000; in January of 1959, 775,000; and in January of this year, 772,000.

I think this is a disgrace to Canada. I do not understand why the minister in introducing his estimates did not deal with the central problem of unemployment. Apparently the government does not think that the problem is really important. It has not attached to the problem a high priority. The government has come forward with no plan that I know of to deal with this national emergency, for that is exactly what it is.

Widespread unemployment is surely a blot on our country, not only because of the hardship to the people who are unemployed but because of the general reduction in the production of our nation and because of the great loss of material wealth. When we have widespread unemployment as we have today I would estimate that the country is losing at the very minimum $2 billion of wealth production a year. The government which has been in office for three years has seen our country forgo the production of at least $6 billion of wealth because of unemployment. That is a very high price to pay for a Tory administration which is unconcerned and certainly unable to deal with this great problem.

Not only have the minister and the government been unwilling to present a program to deal with the problem but the government has not been able to forecast that conditions are going to improve. As a matter of fact, there are a great many forecasts from officials of the departments by way of speeches that have been made which indicate that within the next year or two we may face a much deeper recession than we now have. Instead of the government coming forward with a bold program we hear rumours of the government pulling a snap election to avoid having to call an election when we are in an even deeper recession than the current one.

The Minister of Labour is in a difficult position. He has to take more of the responsibility for this situation than other members of the government because he is the minister. I do not want to be unduly harsh on the minister but the government has failed the Canadian people. It has failed to put forward a policy to solve the unemployment problem. As a matter of fact, statistics released from government departments suggest that conditions in recent days are getting worse. I have in my hand the April index of industrial production found in the D.B.S. daily bulletin of June 29 in which there is the following:

> Canada's seasonally adjusted index of industrial production in April declined 2.4 per cent to 167.3 from the March level of 171.4.

An important index of economic activity in the country, the industrial index, shows a decline of 2.4 per cent. Another important index is the gross national product, and in the D.B.S. daily bulletin for June 22 I find the following:

> The advance in gross national product moderated in the first quarter of 1960. Apart from the third quarter of last year, the increase of 1 per cent was the smallest quarter to quarter gain in the value of production since the expansion began following recovery from the 1957-58 recession.

There is little indication there that we are getting out of the woods. Another economic index that is considered to be an important one in showing the buoyancy of our economy or otherwise is the index of new motor vehicle sales. Total sales of new passenger and commercial vehicles in April declined 2.7 per cent to 57,773 units from 59,360 in the corresponding month last year, while sales in the January-April period rose 1.9 per cent to 180,702 units from 177,334 a year ago. The retail value of that month's sales fell 4.2 per cent to $172 million from $179 million.

The index of motor vehicle sales indicates not only a general recession in the economy but shows the difficulty experienced in the sales of automobiles. Information is published by D.B.S. as to starts and completions of new dwellings from time to time, and the latest daily bulletin, that of June 28, states as follows:

> Starts on the construction of new dwelling units in urban centres of 5,000 population and over in May fell to 6,913 from 11,151 in the same month last year, according to advance D.B.S. figures.

This is another indication of a depressed economy. Another index that is considered an important one is that showing the number of railway car loadings. The D.B.S. daily bulletin of June 30 states as follows:

> Cars of railway revenue freight loaded on lines in Canada in the week ended June 21 numbered 78,867, slightly below last year's corresponding total of 79,233 cars.

Department store sales in May decreased slightly by .7 per cent to an estimated $116 million from $117 million in the corresponding 1959 month while the January to May total increased 1.7 per cent to $514 million from $505 million a year ago. The bulletin showing chain store sales indicates that chain store sales in May declined 4.3 per cent to $269 million from $281 million in the corresponding month last year.

All of these indications of economic conditions in the country show not only that we are in trouble but that conditions have been worsening. The widespread unemployment situation is having other adverse effects. When the government took office there was $852,729,000 in the unemployment insurance fund as of June 30, 1957; after this government had been in office for a period of just 12 months, the money in the unemployment insurance fund had dropped to $644.5 million or a loss in the first year of this administration of $208 million. After this administration had been in office a further year, the unemployment insurance fund had dropped to $434 million, a further drop of $210 million. On June 30 of this year, in spite of an increase in the amount of contributions made to the fund, the fund had dropped another $138 million to $296 million.

I should like the Minister of Labour to tell us how long, in his opinion, it is going to be until the unemployment insurance fund is bankrupt, and the government either has to borrow money or get money from the general revenues to replenish the fund or the people on unemployment will be denied benefits. The unemployment insurance fund is going into bankruptcy at a very alarming rate. Still the minister, in introducing his estimates, gave this committee and the country no hope that the government has a policy or a policy to solve unemployment. Members of this government support the present capitalist system. They like to call it a free enterprise system. The members of the Liberal party support that kind of system. Whether we support the present economic order as it exists, we support our democratic processes and our free parliamentary institutions. I think the communists must be smiling in the Kremlin when they see a nation like ours, perhaps with more wealth in relation to our population than any other nation in the world, hobbling along on one leg.

This government lauds the free enterprise system. It lauds its own efforts, and yet there are half a million people unemployed while the government has no policy. I think in this day and age, when we are competing in an ideological sense with the communist world, this government should be exceedingly concerned about doing everything possible to make our economy one of full employment, full production and a high standard of living. Yet, in my opinion, the government plays into the hands of the communists by allowing our economic system to hobble along while losing $2 billion worth of production a year. In the interest of strengthening our society, in the interest of the welfare of all Canadians, I hope the government will soon come forward with a positive policy for dealing with unemployment.

There was an announcement made in the house the other day that the government was going to appoint a royal commission to inquire into the automobile industry in our country. This was a welcome announcement. I hope that action to improve the chances of employment in this industry will not have to wait the royal commission report which may take years in its completion. Before anyone may misunderstand what I am about to say, I want to say that we in the C.C.F. party are opposed to tariffs being used as a method of combatting unemployment. We feel that the answer to unemployment in this and other industries is not to resort to the use of tariffs. There may be room for some planning, for some move toward the integration of the automobile industry of this continent.

We have in Canada automobile companies which are subsidiaries of United States parent corporations. In Canada our companies are asked, in the main, to produce exactly the same models as are produced in the United States. It would seem to me a much more sensible arrangement if in Canada our industry could produce fewer models and produce a more standard model which could be produced for the whole of North America. This kind of co-operation would remove the need for tariff protection and would bring about efficiency in the industry. I would hope it would go a long distance toward increasing employment in that industry. I only hope the government will not fold its hands and do nothing, waiting for years until the royal commission may make its report. May I say that I welcome the announcement and I hope the commission will be appointed immediately; that it can undertake its work within the next few weeks and that its report will be received at the earliest possible date.

Unemployment is a major problem in our country. As has been suggested on former occasions, this is the time for action by the government, this is the time to call a conference to consider this great national problem which should include within it representatives of provincial governments, municipalities, management and labour. It would be a conference to consider the economic welfare of the Canadian nation. This government, in this kind of conference, should not take the same attitude it took at the federal-provincial conference which just concluded. This kind of conference would require leadership. The last conference on federal-provincial fiscal relations found this government empty-handed; it went in without proposals. They said, this is just a talkfest and we will hear from the premier of each of the provinces. The suggested conference is the kind before which the government should place well defined proposals which would lead, when implemented, to the removal of unemployment in our country.

I have a number of suggestions I should like to make, Mr. Chairman. I think now is the time for a tremendous increase in investment. I should like to see a national investment board or a national investment corporation which would have available to it at least a billion dollars to be used for investment in industries, in roads, in schools, in hospitals, in housing, in works of all kinds that would lead to a reduction in unemployment. The government takes the opposite view. The government says we are following a tight money policy; we have a high interest policy. Instead of making funds readily available, our policy has been to curtail funds in the hope that this would reduce the inflationary trend. I believe the government has to change its course completely, and that there should be available to the provinces, to municipalities and to industries, large sums of money which would enable this kind of economic expansion.

Second, I would suggest that now is the time for this government to consider special projects in its relationship with the provinces. I do not know why the government is waiting to go forward with a second trans-Canada highway. This surely is a place in which there is a need for additional services. Here is a place in which more people can be employed than we have employed at the present time. I would suggest that in addition to a second trans-Canada highway there should be an over-all road policy whereby federal money will go to assist in the construction of the main east-west and north-south roads in our country.

I would suggest that more money should be made available for hospital construction and that the Minister of Public Works should make available for house construction in this country the same funds that were made available last year. In other words, there should be no reduction in the funds for home building.

Third, I would suggest that to improve the possibility of employment in winter there may be need for special incentive, such as special tax incentive or perhaps special depreciation incentive in order to encourage industries to expand and to provide employment in the winter months.

As a fourth necessary measure to help to solve unemployment in this country I would suggest there is the whole question of a great expansion in Canadian trade. This government has tied its policy to GATT. This government has failed to use new methods in order to increase our international trade. We have a Canadian-Soviet trade agreement. There is no indication, so far as I know, that the Canadian government is going to take advantage of the fact that the soviet government has agreed to buy $2 worth of goods in our country for each $1 worth we buy in that nation. I suggest that here is a place for government planning and action. The government should take steps to buy from the Soviet union a larger quantity of goods than we have bought in the past in order that we can expand twofold our exports to that country.

I would suggest further that now is the time for the government to consider steps to increase the incomes of Canadians, especially the incomes of Canadians whose incomes are low. If the government would bring about an increase in the old age pension from $55 to $75 a month I suggest that that injection of additional purchasing power in the hands of the elderly people in this country would be of assistance in increasing the demand for goods, thus resulting in a subsequent increase in employment.

I represent an agricultural area. The agricultural producers of Canada have often been criticized. However, there is one thing for which they have never been criticized, namely hoarding their money. If the government would do something to bolster farm income they can be assured that that income would find its way into the economy of our country and would be used to purchase farm implements, repairs, lumber and the other goods produced in our nation.

I would suggest to the Minister of Labour that he use his influence in the cabinet in order to provide an increase in the incomes of the western grain producers. I suggest that $100 million by way of deficiency payments would be an important contribution toward greater employment in our country.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): They ought at least to see the farmers.

Mr. Argue: The hon. member for Essex East says that they should see the farmers. Of course they should see them. I want to congratulate the Minister of Labour for seeing the automobile workers. The automobile workers were given a hearing and they obtained a royal commission but the agricultural producers on the prairies can no longer get even so much as a hearing.

Mr. Pickersgill: Or an answer to their letters.

Mr. Starr: We are on labour estimates, not on agriculture estimates.

Mr. Argue: This is a great economic problem facing the Canadian nation. We are in a deep economic crisis which has resulted in widespread unemployment. We in this group—those of us in the opposition—are not satisfied with a country that has at this time a half a million unemployed persons and a government that does not take the problem seriously. I suggest that before this debate is concluded the Minister of Labour should be frank with the committee and should state to the committee the proposals and the program of the government to deal with this problem.

Mr. Valade: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Argue: Yes.

Mr. Valade: Will the hon. member give his reference when he spoke about the increase in retail sales?

Mr. Argue: The increase in which?

Mr. Valade: The increase in retail sales. Will the hon. member give the source of his information?

Mr. Argue: Those figures are all taken from the dominion bureau of statistics daily bulletin. The figures for department store sales were taken from the D.B.S. daily bulletin of July 7 and those for chain store sales were taken from the D.B.S. daily bulletin of July 8.

Mr. Valade: May I be permitted to ask, as a supplementary question, whether the hon. gentleman is relying on the Financial Post as a substantial and reliable source of information for these figures on retail store sales?

Mr. Argue: Not at all.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): I should like to endeavour to clarify several misunderstandings so that we can get down to a serious discussion of a serious problem. Time and time again I have heard comment on or reference to—in fact I have heard it ad nauseam—the Prime Minister's statement: "As long as I am Prime Minister no one will suffer from unemployment". I want to make it clear that those are the exact words he used but that he did not at any time state that there would be no unemployment if he were prime minister. Obviously the only way in which to guarantee that there would be no unemployment in any country is to reduce that country to an anthill or a slave state.

Incidentally, I should like to comment that some few weeks ago I was talking to one of the Victorian Order nurses in Cornwall who has done a magnificent job there over many years. She mentioned to me that, as is obvious, when there is unemployment there is great demoralization of the people concerned but that, nevertheless, she had noticed that there was nothing like the absolute destitution—and mind you, it was bad enough—that she had experienced in the depression when she had previously been there, although I certainly do not wish to minimize the seriousness of it or the plight of those who are without jobs.

However, I think it is perfectly obvious to any reasonable and sincere person that the Prime Minister, in saying what he was saying at that time and what he has said on several occasions, was announcing his own social and political philosophy, namely that personal and human rights were to him far more important than property rights. I think it is because of that fact that he has done such things as raising the old age pension and extending the period of unemployment insurance benefits. On other occasions the Prime Minister has stated that just as soon as our productivity would increase sufficiently to warrant further relief to our elderly people, something would be done to relieve them. Since our productivity has increased—and the Leader of the Opposition has admitted this on more than one occasion—I feel quite convinced that something will be done before long to alleviate and assist the position of our elderly people.

The hon. member for Laurier several weeks ago in this house brought to our attention the critical unemployment situation in our respective hometown of Cornwall. I must say in all fairness that he did not exaggerate the problem which exists there and I must also thank him for his assistance although I doubt if it was given entirely on philanthropic grounds.

Mr. Chevrier: It was, I can assure the hon. member.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): Thank you. However, he mentioned the problem in Cornwall was acute, and I believe he also mentioned the discontinuance of the seaway construction and the closing down of Canada Cottons in that area.

That is true, but there are other factors which he did not mention. He did not mention, for instance, that the textile industry, especially in that area, had been in grave difficulties for over 30 years. He did not mention that this government has done more than any other previous government to alleviate the problems of the textile industry despite the fact that its hands were tied by the previous government, by GATT and by other international arrangements. Also he did not mention that a great many people had been thrown out of work in Cornwall by the curtailment of operations on the Cornwall canal, and perhaps many of his good friends are in that category. He did not mention the difficulties of the people of Cornwall in attracting new industry to the area, despite their great initiative in forming the industrial development corporation which he mentioned to take over the property of Canadian Cottons and provide floor space to attract new industry at very advantageous rates. He did not mention, for an obvious reason, that he more than anyone, the former minister of transport and head of the seaway authority, is responsible for the Cornwall canal now being on the United States side. I do not think I need to say anything further about that at this time.

Since the last war our country has been confronted with the unprecedented situation that although our production, exports, and incomes have all been increasing, unemployment has also been increasing. This happened after the initial post-war years when everything across Canada was booming and we could sell everything we produced to the war devastated countries of the world before they were able to restore their own industrial establishments. But since then we have had this peculiar situation of increasing production, increasing income and so on, yet at the same time increasing unemployment. This so-called structural unemployment is doubtless partly due to automation, or to what is euphemistically called the rationalization of industry.

I believe that much can be done by the judicious manipulation of tariffs to increase the degree of processing of raw materials for export and to expand secondary industry. Secondary industry, however, is not a complete answer. Howard Smith Paper Mills, in my own home town of Cornwall, has spent some $12 million on a huge new machine which will tremendously increase its production of fine paper, but will not substantially increase employment, although those who might otherwise be discharged are retaining their jobs.

Nor are massive public works any final solution as they were in the old days of horse-scrapers and wheelbarrows. The former minister of public works, Mr. Winters, once stated that the Canso causeway, which cost $23 million, employed only about 150 men at the height of construction.

The United States writer Galbraith, in a book called "The Affluent Society", contends that increasing automation will produce more consumer goods than we could possibly use. We all want two cars in our garage, but a third car would be more trouble than it is worth. Therefore, he contends, we must concentrate on producing more social capital, such things as more schools, hospitals, libraries, concert halls, parks, conservation, and the elimination of air and water pollution. In other words, we must emphasize those things that make life more liveable. The recent dominion-provincial fiscal conferences should result in more money being made available to the provinces and municipalities for the kind of local public works that will make more jobs and make our towns and cities better places in which to live.

Although the opposition on a previous occasion in this house when this matter was under discussion made about 25 specious suggestions dealing with unemployment, they all boil down to additional training facilities and the appointment of various committees to study the problem. The Senate, as we know, has recently set up a committee under Professor John Deutsch of Queen's University to make exhaustive inquiries into this problem, and we also know, as mentioned by the preceding speaker, that the Prime Minister has set up a royal commission to look into the problem of the automobile industry.

The Minister of Labour has also announced that the federal government, he understands, will pay 75 per cent of the cost of training programs undertaken by any province. Although trades training might assist younger and more mobile cotton workers in Cornwall to find employment elsewhere, I doubt if any industry is prevented from expansion by the absence of skilled help. A determined industry can always hire, train, or import any trained skills required. Mind you, I think the question of vocational training is very important, especially in some areas; but I do not think in itself it will do much to increase the over-all number of jobs available.

Although it is a dull subject which even our grandfathers worried about, I believe that tariff changes are fundamental to increasing employment. Shortly after the last war we had unlimited markets until the war-ravaged countries could reconstruct their industrial establishments. The dilemma which now confronts any federal government is that certain provinces, particularly the central and industrial ones, want the federal government to raise tariffs to protect our automobile, textile and other industries while the rest of Canada wants it to lower tariffs to help sell our raw materials, such as wheat, minerals, timber, and fish. It is the dilemma of conflicting interests in such a diverse and wide country as Canada with many divergent interests and industries. I think it is obvious that we must increase tariffs and quotas against countries like the United States, where we cannot increase our markets, and at the same time decrease them against other countries such as Japan, the British West Indies, perhaps parts of South Africa; in other words, any countries where we can sell more raw materials and more of our other products.

For instance, the United States only purchases from us what she cannot produce at home or buy cheaper elsewhere. That is a fundamental and very obvious fact. Even if we did raise obstacles to the sale of its refrigerators, magazines, et cetera, in Canada, it would not cut the size of the Chicago Tribune in half just to spite Canada, especially when the publishers of this newspaper themselves own one of the largest Canadian paper mills.

I think it is fundamental first of all to appreciate that although we need not fear economic reprisals from the United States, we must realize that whenever it becomes cheaper to substitute southern pine for Canadian spruce in the manufacture of newsprint the United States will have no compunction in doing so. I think the uranium industry knows this only too well.

On the other hand, Japan could utilize all the raw materials that this country could produce, provided that she could sell enough to us to pay for it. The economy of the West Indies federation is complementary to, rather than competitive with, ours and could provide us with a much needed tropic hinterland. If we were really serious about finding markets for our minerals, fish, timber, wheat, et cetera, no Canadian would go to Florida when he could go to Bermuda nor would we buy a single orange from California when they were available from Jamaica

A vast potential market also awaits us in South America's emerging middle classes. Latin Americans are very conscious that Canada is partly a Latin country and the legacy of goodwill towards us created by generations of devoted French Canadian missionaries in those countries should not be neglected.

I believe the answer to our unemployment lies in a drastic revision of our whole tariff structure with whatever changes in GATT and other international commitments may be required. The only alternative, although one which is in contradiction with that idea to some extent, would be to join the European free trade area or some broader Atlantic alliance. If we do neither of these things Canada faces increasing economic integration and eventually political integration with the United States. Certainly the people of Stormont, many of whose ancestors have, like my own, fought the country to our south on three different occasions to preserve Canada's independence, would never consent to our country becoming another Alaska and the greatest objection would doubtless arise from our citizens of French Canadian ancestry who would face not only assimilation but cultural annihilation.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sure the hon. member for Stormont will not resent my taking a moment to deal with three of the matters he has raised. I assure him that any intervention I make in connection with the constituency of Stormont is, as I said the other evening, in order to be of assistance to that constituency which I represented in the house for so many years. But I do wish to bring to his attention two or three points in connection with the matter the hon. member raised.

The first is that while it is true that the textile industry has been in difficulties for some years it was the present administration which promised to alter that situation, adverse as it was to the textile industry; it was the Prime Minister who made the statement in Cornwall that he would do away with the dumping of foreign goods which was taking place in the same manner as he had succeeded in dealing with the dumping of agricultural products. There can be no doubt about that. Notwithstanding that statement, the Canada mill, the Dundas mill and Glengarry mill closed down, putting out of work 2,500 people since 1957. I thought I should make that position clear.

The hon. member raised repeatedly the question of the canal being on the United States side of the line and said that this was responsible for the loss of jobs. There is one thing which should never be forgotten and it is that there were three international agreements dealing with the St. Lawrence seaway, the first in 1932 which provided for a canal in Canada and a canal in the United States—the Canadian canal under that agreement was at Crysler island and was, therefore, not in the constituency of Stormont—the second in 1941 when there was an agreement which provided for the two canals being on the United States side of the line and, third, the application which was made in 1952 and which resulted in one canal in Canada at Iroquois and the other canal at Barnhart island opposite Cornwall.

The point I wish to make is this: appreciating and anticipating that position, a plan was prepared by the Department of Transport to look after those people who might be put out of work as a result, and the hon. member has never seen me rise here to contest that plan, because as far as I know the Minister of Transport has put that plan into effect. It has not given jobs to everybody but, to use the words of the Minister of Transport, it has come very close to doing so.

Finally, I wish to say that the position on the Cornwall canal from the point of view of beauty and charm is, as the hon. member for Stormont knows in a horrible condition. I say with deference that were I on the other side of the house I would not permit that situation to continue for one moment because I was the one who as president of the crown corporation promised the people in the Iroquois and Cornwall areas that this condition would not exist, and I would carry out that undertaking. If the member for Stormont would make representations to the Minister of Transport I am sure he would remedy the terrible situation which now exists along the banks of the Cornwall canal and, in doing so, give the people of that area a great deal more work than they have today.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): Perhaps I could ask the hon. gentleman one or two questions with regard to what he just said. Did the former minister of transport contemplate two parallel seaways existing at one and the same time while the traffic pattern had not been formed? We still do not know what the eventual traffic pattern will be in this area. Further, does the former minister think—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Will the hon. member please take his seat while the chairman is standing? We are discussing labour items and not the question of where certain canals should go. I recognize the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt that unemployment is the most difficult and serious problem facing our country at this time. The fact that there are 80,000 people more out of work this year than were out of work at this time last year indicates that the problem is getting worse. The seriousness of the situation is underlined by the fact that this high degree of unemployment is being experienced at a time of year when job opportunities should be at their peak, when we are enjoying relative prosperity and a stable economy.

In my own province of Newfoundland there are 1,500 more people out of work now than there were last year at this time, and that is a serious handicap to the economy of our province where unemployment in peak periods is as high as one third of the labour force.

Whenever I think about this problem of unemployment I am haunted by the thought that should war break out tomorrow this problem would disappear. In a short space of time money and credit would be made available, our resources would be utilized and even though their labour would be directed into unproductive channels, men would be put to work. Employment would increase and instead of worrying about unemployment we would probably then be worrying about inflation. But war would be only a temporary solution. It would afford only temporary relief and it would be achieved at a tremendous cost of human sacrifice, sorrow and suffering, together with a great destruction of wealth and a vast increase in our burden of debt. With the return of peace there would be a short period of reconstruction and rebuilding, repairing the devastation, and then again we would be faced with unemployment.

That has been the pattern that has repeated itself over and over again during the past 50 years. Short of war, everyone seems to have his own particular favourite solution to this problem. Organized labour for many years has striven to at least alleviate the unemployment problem by introducing shorter working hours, a shorter work week and by urging retirement at age 65. The present government as its remedy has put forward a program of public works, of winter works projects, of housing construction and of vocational training and education.

Of all the elements in this program education is the only one which makes any permanent contribution. I say that because we know from an analysis of the problem that the greater percentage of the unemployed are people with little education and no skills. I welcome the extension of the program of vocational training which the minister has put forward. I should like to suggest to him that a special provision be made in this program for the training of cooks. There is a shortage of cooks, I believe, all across the country. There is certainly a shortage of them in my own province. We need them for our ships and lumber camps.

As for the other parts of the minister's program, each one of them creates just about as big a problem as it solves. The trouble with public works is that they do not produce any wealth. While they may provide temporary employment they also result in a permanent increase in fixed costs. The same is true of the winter works program. Our chief complaint in that connection relates to the basis on which the federal contribution is made. An analysis of the figures put on the record earlier this year indicates that the largest proportion of federal funds goes to the richer provinces where unemployment is least severe and the poorer provinces which suffer the greatest hardship and the highest proportion of unemployment get the smallest share of these funds. If the minister is going to introduce this program this year I would suggest that a new formula be evolved which would allow these funds to be distributed on the basis of need rather than on a mathematical basis of 50 per cent of shared costs.

The housing program, too, has its disadvantages. It is not good for the housing industry to be turning the housing tap on and off for the purpose of adjusting our unemployment problems. Under those conditions the industry is diverted from its true purpose. When it runs in fits and starts it cannot do adequate planning. In many cases it also results in the construction of houses which remain unsold.

For those of us who subscribe to a free economy it must be evident that there is something wrong with our free enterprise system when we have unemployment of this magnitude. Man was created with certain basic needs of food, clothing and shelter. Free enterprise exists to supply those needs. When we consider that two thirds of the world's population involving hundreds of millions of people lack even the bare necessities of life and many millions of others are in an only slightly better position—there are many hundreds of thousands even in our own country who have only the bare necessities—it will be seen that society must find a solution of this problem.

There is ample scope for our free enterprise system to find employment for the increase in our labour force. The question must naturally arise that if money and credit can be found and made available for the needs of war, why cannot the same thing be done about the needs of peace, which are human needs? I think the answer to that is that private enterprise responds to our demands and our demands are related not to our needs but to our wants.

It must be evident that free enterprise is not really free, because we have needs, we have the surplus manpower and materials required to meet those needs, yet the machine does not go to work to fill those needs. It does not do that because somebody controls the credit which sets the machine in motion, so that the people who control the credit really decide what wants are going to be filled. This is a matter which I think should be inquired into. Until we face this problem honestly I do not think we are ever going to discover the flaws in our free enterprise system which must be corrected if the system is going to function as it was meant to do.

Our socialist friends would solve this problem by changing the system. They would change the free enterprise system to a state controlled enterprise system. In support of that we see countries in the world like Russia and China where no unemployment problem exists. But the unemployment problem has been eliminated by means of work camps and various forms of slave labour such as we hear exist in China. People in these countries have secured employment but only by sacrificing their freedom. None of the remedies tried so far, and which I have just mentioned, has produced a satisfactory solution and in my opinion the reason is that we have not really got down to the basic cause.

Last night the hon. member for Vancouver East suggested that we face facts. I agree with him because I believe there is one fact that we constantly and consistently refuse to face. That fact is that the basic cause of our unemployment is human selfishness. That does not mean that we should start pointing the finger at each other because that statement applies to every single one of us. It is very easy, as some people do, to lay the blame upon the unions. I am not saying that organized labour and its unions are not selfish in some of their demands but they are no more selfish than management.

That is very evident when we note, for example, what happened in the case of steel. Some time ago there was an increase in wages in the steel industry which meant an increase of somewhere around $1.80 per ton in the price of steel. But what happened? The increase in price was not equal to the wage increase. The price of steel went up by about $4 per ton. That kind of selfishness is just as harmful to the economy as is the selfishness of unions.

The difficulty with wage increases is that they result in a sort of struggle between labour and management for a bigger share of profits regardless of what the effects will be upon the consumer who has to buy the product and the economy of the country as a whole. It is this struggle for profit, not profit itself, that is harmful. There is nothing wrong with profits. The only profits that are harmful are those which result from dishonest practices or from wrong motives. But the struggle to claim a share of these profits is resulting in an increase in automation much more rapidly than is good for our country at the present time because it means the disappearance of thousands of jobs which will never exist again.

It is easy to point a finger at some of the labour bosses who exploit the selfishness of the members of their unions but before we point the finger at them let us examine ourselves and see if we are not guilty of something of the same nature in our election promises. The trouble really lies in our basic motives. Free enterprise is not free because it is a slave to materialism. There is plenty in this world for everybody's need but there is not enough for everybody's greed. What is happening at the present time is that we are all engaged in a mad race through an economic jungle where every man is for himself and the devil take the hindmost. We are not dedicated to any great purpose either nationally or individually. We have nothing bigger to live for or to work for than our own self-interests and that is not big enough for the challenge that faces us today.

We cannot expect to retain our selfishness and reap the fruits of unselfishness. We cannot serve materialism and expect to reap the fruits of the spirit. We cannot have our cake and eat it too. We have tried to do that over and over again and we have got away with it for quite a long time, as the figures which the hon. member for Laurier put on the record a little while ago indicate. We were able to get away with it partly, I think, because we were able to draw on the moral capital which had been built up by our ancestors.

But the situation today is different. Not only is our moral capital beginning to run out but a new factor has entered the picture with the advent of automation, and as a result of that factor there will never again be a situation which will be exactly comparable with the past. Regardless of what the situation may have been in various years in the past, the consequences have now caught up with us and we are faced with a choice. We are faced with the choice that either we must sacrifice our selfishness to our country or we will sacrifice our country to our selfishness.

Unemployment is a tremendous threat to our economy, as the hon. member for Assiniboia has pointed out. If the problem is not solved there is a very great danger that our economy will collapse completely, and an economic break-down is always the forerunner of ideological penetration. We all know who are waiting and longing for that day to come so they can move in and take over our country. The proposals which have been put forward by labour and by government with respect to changing the system are in fact mere palliatives. They are like aspirin or mustard plasters. They merely deaden the pain; they do not cure the disease. I think we must stop kidding ourselves that a solution can be found in any of these directions because it is really a waste of time. There can be no permanent solution, no real cure, until we come to grips with the basic cause, and that cause lies in the selfish, dishonest and impure motives that govern each one of us. We need a new set of motives because our old ones have failed. Our greatest national need at the present time is moral recovery. Only then will we have the moral clarity to see what changes must be made, what adjustments are required in our industrial machine, what changes must be made in our monetary and credit systems and in our tariff policies. Only then will we have the moral courage to make the necessary decisions and, to accept whatever sacrifices may be involved. What we need more than anything else at this time in Canada is a great moral purpose, something to which we can dedicate ourselves, individually and as a nation.

Unemployment is mainly a symptom of that deficiency. There is such a purpose. It is to remake the world. The communists are dedicated to this. They are dedicated to the building of a world with a godless materialistic society. But there is a bigger idea than that, and it is to rebuild the world so that we can have a society that will be free from fear, hate and greed. If we are prepared to commit ourselves to that, if we are prepared to make that our national purpose, one of the biggest contributing factors to unemployment will be eliminated. Then empty hands will be filled with work, empty stomachs will be filled with food and empty hearts will be filled with an idea that really satisfies, not only here in Canada but throughout the world.

Mr. Macdonald (Kings): Mr. Chairman, in dealing with the estimates of the Department of Labour I should like to place before the committee a constructive proposal which would provide a great deal of employment throughout the maritime provinces. While I do not agree that the situation with regard to unemployment is nearly as serious as our friends opposite would indicate, I do feel that if this project were undertaken, perhaps as well as some others, it would serve to minimize some of the present unemployment in the maritimes now and in future years. I refer to the construction of a causeway between Prince Edward Island and the mainland.

I might say that this project has been mooted for a number of years; at least some kind of connection between our province and the mainland by way of a causeway, a tunnel, or even a bridge, has been mooted. The last two named have been deemed to be too expensive in initial cost and maintenance to be practical. It is generally considered that the causeway would be the most suitable. The terms under which Prince Edward Island entered confederation included the assurance of "continuous and efficient communication" with the mainland. This was a specific stipulation in the agreement. We feel at the present time that the causeway is the ideal means by which we can be provided with this efficient and continuous communication with the rest of Canada.

I might say that a great step in this direction was taken when the Borden government provided the ferry service between Borden and Cape Tormentine. Under present day conditions, this service is not good enough. We have three ferries operating in the summertime and they handle the traffic more or less adequately depending on conditions. However, as we all know, there are a great many disadvantages to a ferry service. For one thing, ferries are very expensive operations, and when the haul is short they are always operating at a loss. I know that the present government realizes our problem. As evidence of their good faith, they have given us a survey which, to date, has been very extensive. I might say that the previous government mentioned this project on various occasions. According to a letter received from the Department of Public Works, the former administration spent only $6,000 on a survey whereas, up until the present, this government has spent over $600,000. I feel this is a very good indication of their good faith in trying to decide whether or not this tremendous project is feasible.

This survey is continuing, and I might say that our people are quite satisfied that the government is doing everything it can in that regard. Just the day before yesterday I made a second trip to the national research council to see the model of the causeway set up there and discuss with the engineer in charge some of the problems that are being met. We are hopeful of good results. I should like to impress upon the government again the necessity for the construction of this causeway as a help in avoiding any increase in unemployment in the maritimes.

The causeway itself would be a very economical method of handling the transportation problems existing in that area. The story of causeways or bridges which have replaced ferry services is an interesting one. First of all, they give a very much improved service because they are available for use on a 24-hour basis and, in general, maintenance costs are quite low. This has been proven in the maritime provinces as a result of the construction of the Canso causeway and the Angus L. Macdonald bridge between Dartmouth and Halifax. In fact, I am informed that consideration is being given to the construction of a second bridge in Halifax because traffic has increased so much as a result of the convenience of the bridge. In general, as the graphs show, the revenues from ferry services rise very gradually and steadily, but in the case of the inauguration of causeways or bridges the revenues show an immediate sharp rise. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that such a project would be a very economical one in the long run.

Under the present set-up of the ferry service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland we have one icebreaker which is 40 years old, and which will have to be replaced in the very near future. We have a second one which will have to be replaced in about 10 years. And the service really needs a third ferry. If we calculate the cost of a new ferry at approximately $10 million, we get some indication of the high capital outlay required within the next 10 years to maintain this ferry service. In addition, there would have to be extensive dock alterations which would run into several millions of dollars. Also, there are the continuous dredging operations which are required wherever ferry services are operated. The present service is operated by Canadian National Railways, and the deficits incurred are charged up to the Department of Transport. Recently I asked the department for a list of the operating deficits over the past ten years and I should like to place them on Hansard.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I realize that the hon. member was trying to bring out the point that the building of this causeway would help unemployment. However, I think he should relate his remarks to that fact and not to the question of whether or not there have been deficits in the operation of the transportation between the island and the mainland.

Mr. Macdonald (Kings): I was attempting to develop the subject in order to show the necessity of the project so that hon. members would be acquainted with the need of this project and the consequent employment its construction would provide. I wanted to show the economic feasibility. The engineering feasibility has not yet been decided. However, if it is not proper to continue on that course, I shall abide by your decision, Mr. Chairman.

This project would take possibly six or seven years to build and naturally if you have a large scale project such as this one which is going to take that length of time for its construction it is bound to provided a great deal of work for a great number of people in the area affected. We feel that it would provide much employment for people in the maritimes in the actual construction and in providing the rock and fill necessary and which must be obtained from the mainland. All in all we feel it would have a great effect on the economy of the area. Not only in the construction itself, but in the increased economic activity which would result from the fact that the causeway is there, we feel it would be of great assistance to the general economy of the area in particular, by increasing employment opportunities. I strongly urge that the government proceed with this project if it is deemed to be feasible from an engineering point of view. If this is done, I am sure that a great deal of work will be provided for a large number of people in the maritime provinces.

Mr. Pearson: In the general discussion so far of the first item in the estimates of the Department of Labour practically all hon. members who have spoken have devoted the major part of their remarks to the subject of unemployment. That fact is understandable because, as has been pointed out by other hon. members, unemployment is our No. 1 domestic problem with the exception, of course, of national security itself. There are a great many other important matters that come within the jurisdiction of my hon. friend and no doubt we shall have an opportunity, when we reach the individual item to bring some of these matters to his attention. Meanwhile, the subject has been unemployment.

Previously, and in this debate, we have criticized the minister and the government for what we consider to be their inadequate action to deal with this problem. If we do that we do not minimize the devoted efforts that have been made by the officials of the department. We do not underestimate the complexity and the difficulty of the problems that confront them and the minister to whose sincerity and devotion in his work we have in the past paid our tribute and are glad to do so today. He presides over a department which, in our complicated industrial society should be, if it is not, one of the most important departments of government. We made this point in the debate last year, and I say this in no political sense, because this matter goes beyond the time of the minister's administration. In the development of our political governmental structure we perhaps have not given the Department of Labour the importance or even perhaps the resources that it should have in order to do the job we ask it to do. That job is becoming more and more important, particularly in this field of employment. When I say that, I do not underestimate its importance in other fields, especially in the field of industrial disputes.

Throughout the present session we on this side of the chamber have warned the government about the unusual and growing level of unemployment in this country. That warning has been repeated today and it was repeated yesterday. We have been pressing for immediate, effective and realistic action in order to deal with this problem. The minister may recall that during the debate on the speech from the throne, I referred to that matter as did some of my colleagues. I dealt with it during the special debate on unemployment which we initiated and again during the budget debate at the beginning of April. We on this side at that time, and earlier, warned the government against at least the possibility and perhaps the probability of a slow-down. In that warning we ventured to put forward some suggestions that we thought would be helpful but I am bound to say, as has already been said, that our suggestions do not appear to have been taken seriously. We thought they were practical and we thought they were concrete.

Having said that, I should also say that the government now appears to be creeping up on one or two of them. The reaction we obtained to those suggestions at the time—and that reaction has been referred to in this debate—was too often that of jibes and charges—and I am not thinking of the minister particularly in this regard—that we were fomenting an atmosphere of gloom and doom. As my friend the hon. member for Laurier repeated this afternoon, we were told by the Minister of Finance during the budget debate that this unemployment difficulty would disappear with the coming of spring. The Minister of Finance based his optimism apparently and his financial policies reflecting that optimism on the following expectation, and I quote from page 2674 of Hansard. I may say that this was during the budget debate. He said this:

> I expect that the forces of expansion will continue during 1960, and that the rates of increase we have experienced in 1959 should be maintained throughout the year.

He stated at that time that he was basing his forecast on an increase in the gross national product in 1960 of about 6 per cent. On this occasion he did not make any allowance for a change in the price level. Those were his predictions and they have an important bearing on this employment situation because if the employment policies or, even more, if the unemployment policies of the government are based on an optimistic prediction, we can begin to understand why nothing effective has been accomplished in that particular field. The facts do not bear out this prediction. I think it was my friend the hon. member for Assiniboia who this afternoon made that apparent by quoting from the dominion bureau of statistics publication National Accounts, Income and Expenditure, first quarter, 1960, page 1. Perhaps I can put the third paragraph on the record again. It reads:

> The advance in gross national product moderated in the first quarter of 1960. Apart from the third quarter of last year, the increase of 1 per cent was the smallest quarter to quarter gain in the value of production (seasonally adjusted) since the expansion began following recovery from the 1957-58 recession.

That is from the bureau of statistics official publication. We now also have official evidence that in the second quarter of this year economic conditions have not improved materially as compared with last year. There is some evidence of improvement in certain sectors and some evidence of decline in other sectors. These latest bureau of statistics figures are very disturbing to anyone who is worried about this economic position and its effect on employment, because these figures do show that the number of jobs is lagging behind the increase in the work force even though—and members on the government side are continually reminding us of this—the employment figures themselves are up.

In June, 1959 the labour force was 6,287,000. In June, 1960 it was 6,454,000, the highest figure I suppose we have reached. That was an increase from June to June of 167,000. But the significant and not so encouraging feature is that the persons with jobs were 6,053,000 in June, 1959 and 6,154,000 in June, 1960, an increase of only 101,000. In other words, the increase in employment is not keeping pace with the increase in the labour force.

If that is the situation there is bound to be serious unemployment, and all you have to do to get the figures for the unemployed is to deduct the persons with jobs from the figures for the labour force, and you get 300,000 unemployed in June, 1960 as against 234,000 in June, 1959, an increase from June to June of 66,000. In terms of percentages it is an increase from 3.7 per cent in the labour force in June, 1959 to 4.6 per cent in June, 1960. And all this at a time when the increase in the labour force was not as great as it would have been if we had had the kind of immigration we have had in recent years.

If you take the figures for the first six months in 1960, even on the lowest measure of calculation you get 7.5 per cent of the labour force without jobs and seeking work. That is higher than in the corresponding period of 1959 when it was 7.1 per cent. I hope the minister will not accuse me of being unduly pessimistic if I say that in the projection of that trend, unless it is stopped, the average for this year may well be worse than it was in 1959 when it was 5.6 over the year.

On June 30 the jobless claims for unemployment insurance were 35 per cent above last year. These figures are bound to give us cause for concern as we approach mid-summer and will soon be into autumn and winter, and there are other statistics which add to this anxiety. I will anticipate the minister's criticisms. He may say I am picking out a few of the depressing statistics, and I admit they are the ones that worry us. But if you read the current issue of the Financial Post, you will have to admit that there are some indices which are discouraging. The retail trade in May declined by 3.1 per cent. Building permits in the same month were down by 9.3 per cent. Industrial employment in May was below the level for May over the last four years. Railway car loadings, always an important index of general economic activity, in the week ending July 14 were down by 5.4 per cent.

They are some of the indications of the difficulties which are faced by the Canadian economy in the summer of 1960, difficulties which are bound to reflect themselves and are reflecting themselves in terms of unemployment. We say that this situation, signs of which appeared many months ago, requires special action, and needed action many months ago. If the government does not think the kind of action which we are talking about is required, we hope the minister during the course of this debate, or the Minister of Finance when we examine his estimates some time in the future, will give us the information on which he is basing his more optimistic view of the situation.

If we turn to the non-official but qualified economic forecasters we get some even more disturbing predictions. There is a firm in Toronto, a highly regarded firm of economic forecasters, Becket Associates—the minister probably knows them—and their analysis for July, 1960 refers to the "contraction in Canadian business activity continued to widen last month", that is June, and talks about spreading declines in business activities. And this at a time, according to the government, when we are in the midst of full recovery from recession. We are in the midst of expansion and have every reason for economic optimism.

If that is true, what is the situation likely to be if we find ourselves in the months ahead in the midst of a recession? There have been changes in the nature as well as in the volume of employment, and some of these changes in the nature of employment do, I think, have a bearing on our unemployment situation. More women are coming into the labour force and staying in the labour force, which has both social and economic importance. I think the regional character of our unemployment difficulties has been accentuated in the last year or two, although we always had it, and I will say something more about that later. Certainly the situation now is worst in those areas where it is most difficult to solve. Furthermore, employment, particularly male employment, is becoming more and more dependent on certain industries, on the service industries, on the construction industry, and less and less on manufacturing. That also has its significance for government policy.

Mr. Chairman, one out of four of our jobs today still comes from manufacturing in this country; but in 1959 there was 5 per cent fewer jobs in manufacturing than in 1957. This shifting nature of employment can easily be illustrated by a few figures, and I hope the committee will pardon me if I put a few of these figures on the record.

During the decade 1949-59 employment increased in this country by 19 per cent. But construction employment—and by the very nature of it, construction in this country is a seasonal employment to an extent probably not exceeded by any other kind of employment—increased by 30 per cent during that decade. Employment in the services industry increased by 39 per cent, while employment from manufacturing increased only by 11 per cent, which shows that manufacturing is losing its former significance in the economy as a producer of jobs. During the same 10-year period employment in agriculture was down 65 per cent.

Something else should be studied, and that is the nature and extent of our growth generally and whether it is enough to take care of our increasing labour force. If we allow for inflation and the increase in the population the increase in gross national product per capita in constant dollars from 1949 to 1959 was 16 per cent. That is the per capita increase in constant dollars in that decade.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): When the hon. member speaks of per capita income in terms of population is he taking into account the fact that during this period the population varied and increased?

Mr. Pearson: It is perfectly true the population increased and so did the gross national product. It works both ways—more people, more income.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): And you take it each year?

Mr. Pearson: Yes. From 1956 to 1959 the gross national product per capita in constant dollars has actually gone down 3 per cent. The effect of this on employment must be perfectly obvious. It seems to me to mean that if any recession should come it is likely to be more severe and more difficult to meet in terms of unemployment than the last one, so surely measures similar to those adopted in 1958, such as they were, will be even less effective next time. We should be planning for something else. This does not necessarily mean that a recession is inevitable but certainly we should be planning against that possibility, and we shall not be able to do this if the problem is not appreciated in parliament in terms of recent developments and unless there is an understanding of its nature and its causes. That is why we on this side of the house say we should be having the kind of examination which would enable the government to cope effectively with the economic difficulties which may be ahead.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In this house.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, in this house by a parliamentary committee. We have already put on record some of the causes of unemployment, and I think my hon. friend from Laurier mentioned some of them this afternoon but it is just as well to remind ourselves that unemployment in this country is not due to any one factor, to any one situation or to any one cause. There is the normal classical cyclical unemployment about which we know a good deal through past experience; an experience which has been so unhappy that it may perhaps hamper the efforts which we should be making to meet the other kinds of unemployment which is other than cyclical.

There is frictional unemployment where people are changing their jobs because there is a declining need for their skills, and moving from one area to another hoping that their skills may be useful in a new area. The minister has indicated that the government is doing something about this problem through retraining programs. We on this side press him to do more in this important field. Perhaps the minister has studied what has been done in Belgium, a country which has made great progress in retraining programs with less by way of resources than we have. Then there is seasonal unemployment which, of course, presents a particular problem to a country such as Canada. In addition, there is technological and structural unemployment. An electric power plant is built and the coal miners find themselves out of a job.

Mr. MacInnis: They are not going to be out of a job in New Brunswick.

Mr. Pearson: I hope not.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Robichaud said so.

Mr. Pearson: When the Canso causeway was built the ferry operators were out of a job, at least for a while. Today we might find 40 men running electronically a huge plant which used to employ 400. That is automation. Today in our economy there is often little relationship in certain industries between the value of a plant's production and the number of men it employs. That certainly has its effects on the employment picture. Then there are international causes. Some of our extractive industries in particular are dependent to a great extent on decisions taken in countries other than our own, although that situation may change as time goes by. We all have examples in the last 12 months in our minds of what can happen in terms of unemployment when another government lets us down as we have been let down by the United States in connection with the uranium industry. Then there are fiscal and economic causes—tight money and that kind of thing.

As hon. members will realize, we cannot solve this problem by any single approach because there is no single cause. No single remedy will do the job.

Economic instability, which causes unemployment, may arise, not only from the basic factors of the economy but also from a particular imbalance in certain regions. It is possible for full employment to be achieved within reasonable limits at a national level while some areas still experience serious unemployment. Our past experience shows that unemployment, when it arises, is always unevenly distributed through the country. Certain regions are more affected than others. This dissimilarity indicates that full employment cannot be ensured simply by a national program applied uniformly throughout the country. If we should try to follow this line of action exclusively a considerable degree of inflation would be reached before an adequate level of employment was achieved in the more depressed areas.

The limitations of a general approach to full employment applied uniformly throughout the country are particularly serious when we consider that our economy is not now and is not likely to be a homogeneous unit. The diversity in the basic factors of Canada's economy and in the conditions of its development have produced very different economic regions with different regional problems. These regions differ in such respects as the composition and the distribution of their population, their natural resources, their industrial structure, their climate and the degree of their economic development.

The actions of these forces produce different types of adaptation to economic change and evolution in our development. Some regions may show signs of decline while others experience a period of growth and development. Given areas may be quite sensitive to short run fluctuations while others remain relatively stable throughout the trade cycle. Different regions are not affected to the same degree by seasonal variations and the direct impact of irregular factors is often local.

Finally, in all these regional reactions there is a time lag which presents special problems.

If we combine all those elements we get a great variety of regional behaviours. Perhaps I may be permitted to refer to these elements as divisive elements in the economic sense. When combined we get a great variety of regional behaviours so we will not solve this problem by a single national approach to all these regional problems.

It is well recognized that in certain corcumstances a public investment program may be essential to achieve a high and stable level of employment. However, such a program must meet several requirements in order to be effective. It does not seem to me that a public investment program, although it is essential in times of recession, which was put into operation on a national basis without taking into consideration these regional differentiations and difficulties would be successful for the kind of thing we have in mind. As I have just said, we all recognize that in certain circumstances a public investment program may be essential to achieve a high and stable level of employment. I think that all governments in democratic countries, however capitalistic they may be in their orientation, agree on that. However, in a country like Canada if a program of this type were going to be effective in terms of employment it would have to meet several requirements.

Among those conditions which should be taken into consideration two particular requirements deserve our attention although at first sight they seem evident: we must know when to invest and what is the best kind of investment. A program applied in a haphazard way or one applied evenly throughout the country—even if it were not planned —might involve a tremendous amount of expenditures and yet not be very successful in dealing with the employment problem. If we want to obtain the most effective results with a minimum of expenditure—and that is what we are all after, I suppose especially the Minister of Finance—we must determine the strategic areas of the country where economic fluctuations are first felt and be prepared to act quickly in those areas. Some of those areas spring to mind at once and I do not need to name them.

Moreover, we must also be very careful in selecting the type of investment which is designed to have the most constructive results for the purpose we have in mind. The decision depends primarily on the economic structure of the area where government intervention seems desirable.

All these considerations that I have mentioned to the committee lead, I think, to a very important conclusion. If we want as a nation to deal effectively with the employment problem and at the same time to minimize the expenditure of public funds we must arrive at a regional formulation of certain national policies, and in order to arrive at such a formulation we must know in greater detail and much more concretely than we do now the different structures and the peculiar behaviour of our economic regions. On this side of the committee we say that if the board on economic development and automation, which we first advocated three years ago and which we still recommend, were to accomplish only that it would render a tremendous service to the country. If the minister can tell us that this is being done by some other source we would like to hear about it.

There are other things, too, that have to be considered carefully. I will only mention them because I do not want to delay the committee. We have to consider the effect of monetary policy on this regional formulation of our problems. I know and the minister knows that at this moment there is a regional approach to monetary policy being investigated in the Atlantic provinces by a royal commission. It would be interesting to know if the Department of Finance has any liaison with that commission.

There is also the question of fiscal incentives on a regional basis for economic development and employment. All of this means planning, planning for the benefit of the individual without depriving him of his initiative, and planning for the development of our country at the same time. I hope I will not be accused of being a socialist if I say that planning for employment is more and more necessary as our economic society becomes more and more complicated, planning with the purpose of giving the individual the opportunity for work, to make life better for him, to give him a better chance for development only if the individual has a better chance for development are we going to have the right kind of national development.

This means for the individual material development, material betterment. I know, and if I did not know I would undoubtedly be reminded, that man cannot live by bread alone; but he must have bread and he must have work by which he can earn that bread. I agree that he should rely primarily on himself to get that bread and even the cake that we like to have to supplement our bread. But the state also has a responsibility to make that possible and the responsibility of the state lies in the creation of sound policies, the creation of an economic climate which will give the individual citizen the best opportunity to look after himself through work under decent conditions and at a fair wage.

The state also has the responsibility of providing by social security legislation a cushion between the citizen and catastrophe, to help him in circumstances where he cannot help himself or support himself. That is why we have pensions, unemployment benefits and such things. They are a recognition of the social responsibility of the state to all its members.

All of this intervention—if you like—by the government, supplements in an essential way but I hope it will only supplement and not replace the primary responsibility of the individual himself and then of his community. This planning is needed now more than ever before especially in terms of unemployment which seems to be facing us now as a problem of almost endemic proportions. It is needed now more than ever before because of this situation and because the state is becoming an increasingly complicated mechanism where the individual is often at the mercy of forces outside his control or indeed, at times, outside his understanding.

Big corporations, big business, big unions, big demands to be protected and assisted, have made big government unavoidable, even big labour departments unavoidable. That is especially true as big, revolutionary changes are taking place. It would be very nice and comforting, as was mentioned by one speaker this afternoon, I think, if we could leave all these things to the free play of economic and social forces inside the state. That is not possible because for one thing the play is no longer free. Of all these responsibilities in planning that I have mentioned, the greatest and perhaps the most difficult—I think the minister will agree with me—is planning by government to keep people at work, planning for full employment and all that means.

I think the effort of the government in this respect has been inadequate. I think greater and more effective planning is needed. I think that planning should be as much social as economic. It has to take into consideration what I have already referred to, the revolution of automation which, as the minister has mentioned, is as important in this decade of the twentieth century as the industrial revolution was in the eighteenth century and almost as difficult for people to understand. We know what happened because of the lack of understanding of the industrial revolution in the eighteenth century. There was unrest, trouble and confusion then, and the forces of democracy and progress were held back because of that fact.

The revolution of automation of the 1960's extends far beyond the problem of jobs although that is an essential part of it, and if labour is to accept this revolution it must be explained to labour. I was glad to hear the minister say something about this in his opening statement. Labour must somehow feel that government and industry can combine with the worker through his trade union to cushion the impact on him of these changes.

Similarly, there is the problem of the older worker, I was going to say something about that but I will save it for another time.

If the government is going to do these things, Mr. Chairman, if it is going to plan for these things, if it is going to make this effort and made it more effectively than we think it has, it would have been a good thing to have had an advisory board of the kind we have mentioned to help the government during the last three years. I think it would have been a good thing also to have had a parliamentary committee working on this problem this session. We tried to get that and, as members know, we were unsuccessful. The other place was more successful. It has set up a committee dealing with this problem, a committee whose work is, I think, commending itself to the government. If that can be done in the other place, would it not have been much better if it could have been done on a joint basis or even done on a House of Commons basis alone?

Mr. MacInnis: Is the Leader of the Opposition sure that the members of his party could attend its meetings inasmuch as they have been complaining that there are too many committees?

Mr. Pearson: Oh, yes, we would attend as we are trying to attend all the committees which have been set up in the last few weeks of the session. We first asked that this committee be set up in March. That committee could have been set up in March, 1960. It could have had the same kind of expert staff which the committee of the other place has been fortunate enough to get, and it would have been a good thing if that had been done.

This problem has to be attacked not on one but on many fronts and it certainly should be attacked on the parliamentary front. I repeat that that attack has not been made effectively by the government and that is our main charge against the government in this field.

We have talked a lot about the responsibility for this matter. The responsibility rests on every level of government, municipal, provincial and federal and it rests on every individual too, every trade union leader, every business leader, every member of parliament. But there is a very special responsibility resting on the federal government of our country and the minister himself has accepted this responsibility because when he was talking about this problem on January 22, 1959, he said, as found on page 194 of Hansard:

The responsibility in these matters is ours.

We ask the government to discharge that responsibility.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, first of all I must say that I thoroughly enjoyed the interesting speech by the Leader of the Opposition to which we have just listened. However I should like to bring to the attention of members of the committee that for the first time this afternoon we heard an official denunciation of the classical doctrine of Liberalism which is that the economic forces of the country should be permitted free play. I am delighted to have heard that statement.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member whether he does not realize that the classical definition of Liberalism ended many decades ago?

Mr. Herridge: I do, Mr. Chairman, but it has taken the Leader of the Opposition and his predecessors several decades to admit it publicly in the house.

Mr. Pearson: You are talking about the nineteenth century.

Mr. Herridge: I wish to bring to the attention of the committee a few ideas recollected in solitude after I woke this morning to milk cows that were not there. I do not have a research staff or the facilities enjoyed by members on the government side, those on the cabinet benches, the Leader of the Opposition and other hon. gentlemen on his side. We have to search for our own information.

Mr. Pearson: You have the Canadian Labour Congress.

Mr. Herridge: Not this member.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. member whether they have first and second class members in his party?

Mr. Herridge: No. I should explain, Mr. Chairman, that we have specialists in particular subjects. Members of this group deal with certain subjects. However, I wish to have my say regardless of that because I represent the people of Kootenay West.

Mr. Henderson: Don't let them rattle you.

Mr. Herridge: I have had considerable experience in various walks of life which I think permits me to speak on these questions with some degree of objectivity. Many hon. members would not realize it but I have been a member of a trade union for nearly 20 years. I am also a microscopic employer and a peasant farmer so I have had some experience with several aspects of life where at times unemployment has existed.

Mr. Hellyer: Did you say you were a pleasant farmer?

Mr. Herridge: I trust I am, and pleasant in other ways as well. However, before going on with the meat of my address resulting from my research in solitude, I must say that I always listen with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo and I could well understand his approach. I listened to him with great interest, particularly to his reference to the moral aspect of the question as far as meeting the problem of unemployment is concerned.

I was interested in his admission that we live in an economic jungle. That is just what democratic socialists have said for years, and it is because we live in an economic jungle under a so-called system of free enterprise that democratic socialists aim to bring some law and order in the economic and social life of that economic jungle. I was very pleased to hear him admit that.

I have said before, and I emphasize again because I think it should be emphasized, that we are faced with a difficult unemployment problem at the present time, for particular reasons.

So far as the world situation is concerned, we are faced with the political dictatorship of communism on the one hand and the economic dictatorship of monopoly capitalism on the other. We, as democratic socialists, believe we have a middle course for remedying this situation through the recognition of democratic principles and the use of free parliamentary institutions. We believe that the state has a responsibility for unemployment and is the only authority that has the power to rescue the casualties of free enterprise and unrestricted monopoly capitalism as it exists today.

Before proceeding to the few other remarks I wish to make, I want to say personally, how delighted I was to listen to the progressive and sensible approach to this problem by the leader of the official opposition. I am sure, first of all, that no thinking person would try to make political capital out of the distress of fellow Canadians or take political advantage of their distress. I am sure that all the members of this committee face this peculiar, and in one sense, modern development in the spirit of working together to find a remedy for the situation. Here we have an abnormal and continuing unemployment which concerns us all and, so far as we are concerned, not only on account of those who are in need but also because of the great social waste which is involved. Surely we must recognize that it results from the greater increase in our productive capacity as a result of automation than the increase in employment opportunities.

The situation we have at present is, I believe, unique in Canadian history, that is unique in the sense it is a continuing situation during the summer months. Here we have, if my figures are correct and I have only been able to check them hurriedly, the highest total investment in the construction industry this year; we have for early months of this year, the highest total exports from this country. I understand there has been an increase in industrial production, an increase in total employment, an increase in employment income and an increase in corporation profits. Yet while that situation exists we have this unusual paradox of continuing constant unemployment on a large scale.

I am not going to repeat the things that have been mentioned by my colleagues who have dealt with this subject prior to me. I agree with what the leader of the official opposition said when he mentioned that this is a problem that will require co-operation between the federal government and other groups. While, in our opinion, the federal government must give leadership if it is going to solve this problem, we shall require co-operation between the federal and provincial governments, organized labour, organized farm movements and all organized sectors of the community. We believe that that co-operation is essential. However, I am not going to take much of the time of the committee now. We believe that the first thing that is essential is to have a study made of the situation to get the facts with respect to the causes of unemployment, the rate of unemployment and the nature of unemployment. Then we believe it is necessary for this government to accept responsibility for giving leadership in the development of an over-all national plan.

I was particularly interested to hear the leader of the official opposition use the word "planning" quite boldly today. I have heard it used on a few occasions in the past by members of the Liberal party, but rather timidly, in an undertone as it were. I say, for the first time in my experience in this house, the official Leader of the Opposition used the word "planning" boldly and with emphasis. I congratulate him on that account. We believe this planning is the responsibility, in the first instance, of the federal government. Then we believe that as a result of that planning there must be some public agencies or institutions established. This would be the result of the co-operation in the planning, in obtaining all the facts and information, between the federal, provincial and municipal governments and the other bodies I have mentioned. These institutions or agencies must be established so that we can devise an investment policy which will provide for large scale investment in socially desirable projects, self-liquidating projects, if you like, such as the Mica creek dam on the Columbia river, such as schools, hospitals, highways and housing. All of these are socially desirable investments because they are self-liquidating as a result of the profits they return in social services or in revenues to federal or provincial governments.

Then we believe there must be credit provided to financial these socially desirable projects. We recognize, as did the leader of the official opposition, the necessity for careful planning in fiscal policy. I say that if we are going to avoid inflation, credit will have to be used and planning will have to be given effect to, with some measure of control of profits and possibly some control of prices, as a result of negotiations between the various interests concerned. Credit will have to be provided for the carrying on of projects undertaken by the federal government, by the provinces, by municipalities and by co-operative institutions or organizations that undertake projects of this kind at the regional or local level. Then our fiscal policy and our taxation policy will have to be such as to provide tax incentives to private industry and to those wishing to undertake private developments at a time when they will have the greatest impact upon the unemployment situation.

I was very interested in what the leader of the official opposition had to say about diversification. We are all for diversification in planning projects. In my opinion, with complete centralization of power democracy will go out the window. We want diversification, of power and action, and that is why we suggest this planning as a result of co-operation and consultation between various authorities and groups in our society. Then we have to give consideration, as the leader of the official opposition said—I agree with him wholeheartedly—to the national and provincial aspects. There will also have to be regional diversification and some local activity. I also say, Mr. Chairman, that we have not yet really exploited to the full the goodness in people's hearts in local communities or attempted to mobilize this to meet the problem. I know this would not apply to the same extent in the large centres because the problem is much greater, but I know that with some organization and with some co-operation in the smaller centres between labour and management under a plan the problem could be taken care of locally. I am sure of that therefore, I suggest that is the next thing that is required.

In addition to the program I have just mentioned which would provide for those who are now trained and capable of undertaking employment in industry today we must recognize the fact that we have a large number of young people coming out of our schools. In many cases they are not willing to undertake academic studies, they are not concerned with university training since they have not, shall I say, that type of mind, but they would make excellent artisans, technicians and employees of that type.

We are getting short of skilled workers in some trades. From my own experience I know that good bricklayers, and good plumbers are in short supply particularly in the small communities in Canada because there is a tendency for them to go to the larger centres. On that account I think it is necessary for us to undertake a great expansion, first of all in the retraining of adults for other occupations, and that is possible up to a certain age with good effect, and then an increase in our training facilities for the younger people. I mention this matter with some particular knowledge and particular interest because it is one of great concern to the people in the Kootenays and to the people in the interior of British Columbia.

You notice, Mr. Chairman, that I can never make a speech without mentioning the Kootenays. I have always believed in acting as an advertising agent as well as an advocate of the people for the district I represent when I speak in this house. In any event, this is a matter of great interest to the people of the Kootenays because we are without any institutions of this kind and we have increasing numbers of young people coming out of our schools—a good percentage of whom are not going on to high training—who are denied the opportunity to secure this training as artisans, technicians and so on because of the cost involved in going to the large centres.

I suggest that is one aspect of the problem that must be given serious consideration and that any investment in this respect would be a good investment for the future. I believe this retraining is needed to meet the changing requirements of industry and the services in this country and to a certain extent the changing circumstances and requirements of agriculture.

In concluding my few brief remarks may I say this. When that is done I suggest that it is necessary to have an informed public and to have their co-operation. We must inculcate or promote a sense of personal responsibility for meeting the problem of unemployment.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Before taking my seat I want to say that we recognize the concern on the part of the minister with regard to this problem and we recognize that he has done certain things in an effort to remedy the situation but to a very limited extent. Therefore we suggest that much more is required if we are to solve this continuing problem now and in the days ahead.

Finally may I say this. There are two aspects of public policy that require public understanding and co-operation. One is the utilization, development and conservation of human resources and the other is utilization, development and conservation of natural resources. Those two programs require an informed, intelligent and co-operative public. I suggest that the leadership first must come from the federal government in order to secure this understanding and this co-operation in a program designed along the lines I have suggested.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the hon. member takes his seat, may I ask him a question?

Mr. Herridge: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. gentleman where he has been in the last 15 years? I have in my hand a pamphlet called "Employment and Income", with special reference to the initial period of reconstruction, which was issued by Mr. C. D. Howe when he was minister of reconstruction at the end of the war. I have just been looking through this pamphlet while the hon. member was speaking and I find that the words "plan" "plans" and "planning" occur on practically every page of this blue book, planning which gave this country full employment from 1945 to 1957.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Why did you not do something about it?

Mr. Herridge: In reply to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate may I say this. What he says is correct. There is a measure of planning in the pamphlet but I just want to mention that we did not hear it mentioned in the same terms in the House of Commons and with the same emphasis as was placed on it by the leader of the official opposition this afternoon. This planning was from the top. What we listened to this afternoon was not only the suggestion that governments should plan but that they should plan in co-operation with the people or the rank and file. That was the interesting aspect that appealed to me when I mentioned the planning referred to in the speech of the leader of the official opposition.

Mr. Pickersgill: I just commend the whole pamphlet to the attention of the hon. gentleman because that is precisely what it says. It says that it cannot be done by the federal government alone from the top. It appeals for co-operation and it even suggests lines of co-operation between provinces, municipalities and public bodies of every kind.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): You did not do much about it.

Mr. MacInnis: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. MacInnis: Will he tell the committee how the plans of Hon. C. D. Howe for the Atlantic provinces come into the picture?

Mr. Pickersgill: I want to say—

Mr. MacInnis: I prefer that you give to me a direct answer to the question I just put to you.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member is so fond of answering his own questions that he always seeks to answer them as well as to ask them. But if he will allow me to answer him, I would ask him what would have happened—

An hon. Member: That is not an answer.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, I believe I am a member of the committee. What I should like to ask the hon. gentleman is what would have happened to the community in which he lived if the stimulus to the economy of that area which was given to it during and after the war had not been given to it? What would have happened if a Liberal government had not provided the coal subventions which have kept the coal mines alive for so many years, which coal mines have started to close down only since this government came into office?

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): That is not true.

Mr. MacInnis: The hon. member asked me a question. Instead of answering he asked what would happen. He should have asked what did happen. I can place on the record, and I have it here, information showing that 34 coal mines closed under the government of the hon. member; that is to say 34 coal mines closed in Cape Breton in that time.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): And they did nothing about it.

Mr. Pickersgill: What about the subventions?

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few brief remarks on the first vote of the estimates of the Department of Labour, although, of course, I reserve the right to put questions when we get to other items of the estimates.

At the outset of my remarks, may I emphasize the fact that, as a result of poor organization of the business of the house, great demands are being made upon us; indeed some of us have had to attend a committee meeting between 6 and 8 p.m.

At all events, as a representative of a riding made up mostly of workers, I feel it is my duty to make a brief review of developments since the beginning of this session with regard to the problem of unemployment which is particularly serious.

The Department of Labour is nothing less than the orphan of the government. It has been the most neglected department, at a time when its problems were certainly heavier than those of the other departments, at least on the domestic front. I do not mean to reflect on the personal qualities of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr), nor on his engaging personality, acknowledged by one and all; but the fact remains that his department has been held up to scorn by his colleagues in the cabinet.

So little regard have they had for the Department of Labour that it has been the last concern of the government, and the Minister of Labour, forsaken by his colleagues, helpless in the face of the existing needs in Canada, would have had every reason in the world—and we would have admired him all the more for it—on such a question of principle, to resign from the cabinet which had so badly let him down.

Mr. Chairman, it is very easy, very simple, to go over what has happened since the start of this session. There has been more unemployment than at any time since the thirties. In the speech from the throne, as soon as we arrived in Ottawa, the government failed to attach the necessary importance to the unemployment situation. Indeed the unemployment referred to in the speech was seasonal unemployment. This was first evidence of a lack of vision. As soon as we had arrived, in January, a major problem was being underestimated.

Some time later, during the session, and more particularly during the budget speech on March 31, 1960, when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) was passing moratorium or agreement with his creditors, he gave the matter of unemployment just 16 lines in a budget speech that lasted a little over two hours. And if hon. members remember, the only reference made at the time to unemployment, which was then the worst we had had since the thirties, was this statement by the Minister of Finance:

> I have confidence, however, that employment will increase as the spring season will give rise to new job opportunities and as economy will keep on expanding.

There has also been legislation involving a winter works program. You will recall that, at the time, the government allowed the opposition to deal with unemployment in general, as well as with the winter works program. We said, at the time, that the winter works program was inadequate, and events proved we were right. Fifty thousand persons at the most, in the whole of Canada, were given temporary employment under that program, while at the time there were about 800,000 unemployed in Canada.

Eight hundred municipalities, at the most, were able to undertake such projects, assuming the largest share of the financial burden when, if I remember well, there are a little over 14,000 municipalities in Canada.

Quite recently the government again announced a winter works program for the coming winter, and again today a restricted program is announced, which will definitely not meet the needs that will be felt next winter.

In other words, the government policy on employment is a resounding failure. However, the opposition has not been chary of advice.

It will be recalled, for instance, that the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) put forward at least ten concrete and serious proposals deserving of consideration.

And if my memory serves me right, on the same evening when those ten proposals were put forward, the Minister of Labour said that opposition members were spending their time making barren criticism, and were not suggesting anything at all. The very next day, the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), summarizing the opposition's recommendations and suggestions, offered the government 25 concrete suggestions and proposals which, we believe, would have provided some relief to the unemployed.

I referred just now to the new winter works program. Already, the press in general has expressed the view that this measure would again be inadequate and, at this point, I would like to read a few words from an editorial of La Presse, of July 28, 1960. I quote:

> Since it has been decided to again provide the same type of help, it would seem that we are likely to run into the same problem next winter.
> It must further be recognized that this assistance, which is quite a burden on municipalities, is of benefit to only a small minority of the unemployed. Two years ago, it meant jobs for some 30,000 people. Last winter the number rose to 50,000. However, it represents only 2,000,000 working days, or an average of 40 days per worker. And the total of 50,000 did not quite represent 10 per cent of the 560,000 unemployed found in Canada in March 1960.

Mr. Chairman, you will recall that on many occasions we called for a thorough investigation, by the committee on industrial relations, into the whole question of unemployment and employment in Canada. Nothing was done.

Every suggestion we made with regard to unemployment was rejected. And when we consider the events of the past session, we note with amazement that the industrial relations committee is perhaps the only house committee that has not or has hardly met at all during this session. I wonder what explanation can be given in this respect.

Here is a government that likes to boast of having set up standing house committees, of having put members to work; yet the key problem, acknowledged by most Canadians during Gallup polls as being of greatest concern to them, is precisely the one that was not considered by the industrial relations committee.

We did all we could to warn the government. All we could do was to tell the government: here is an urgent problem, one of vital importance to most Canadians. But nothing has been done.

In this regard, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to frighten my hon. friends opposite, nor unnecessarily cause them to lose sleep o'nights, but I wish they would ponder this thought.

Of late, there have been elections in several provinces of this country. There has been, for instance, a provincial election in Quebec. I hope my hon. friends will realize that the major reason for the clean-up that has happened in the province of Quebec was precisely the fact that the former Union Nationale government had stated that unemployment did not concern them. The people of Quebec preferred to entrust the administration of their business to a Liberal government that was unafraid to say: we shall resolutely carry out our obligations with regard to unemployment.

In the case of New Brunswick, I am fully aware that special emphasis was placed on certain local issues that were thoroughly gone into, such as the hospital insurance question, but I am certainly convinced that if New Brunswick voters showed such concern for matters like the payment of hospitalization insurance premiums, it was first of all, because they were dissatisfied with a government which had not done what was required to fight the unemployment problem.

Under Conservative administration, Mr. Chairman, the Canadian unemployed—and we can say so today when we are about to leave—have been forgotten, abandoned, left high and dry. And in the light of the Prime Minister's famous promise, which, indeed, was the reason why a great number of Conservative members were elected, I say that the jobless have been misled by the government, because after having been elected, this administration refused to stand up to its obligations in the face of unemployment.

Mr. Pigeon: May I, Mr. Chairman, ask the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) a question?

Mr. Deschatelets: You may.

Mr. Pigeon: Does the hon. member recall the speech he made on March 15, 1955 as recorded in the French edition of Hansard of that date, page 2175, when he said:

> Mr. Speaker, the Liberal members from Quebec are rightly of the opinion that the unemployment problem cannot be settled through speeches.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I did make the comment referred to by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon), and I repeat it now: the unemployment problem cannot be settled through speeches, nor can it be settled by promises such as the ones you made.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the latest available figures disclose that on June 30, 1960 there were about 300,000 Canadians claiming unemployment insurance benefits.

Therefore, by whatever system we count them, there are 300,000 persons now unemployed and claiming insurance benefits.

If the Minister of Labour had allowed an inquiry into unemployment, he would have learned from his own experts, that about one third of the unemployed registered at our employment offices, have never actually registered because they are not entitled to benefits.

In any case, according to figures coming from unemployment insurance sources, 400,000 Canadian citizens are now reported to be out of work.

I already said it, and I repeat it tonight, those figures represent men with dependents, wives and children, so that in considering this over-all figure of 400,000, we can assume that today, at the end of July 1960, there are at least 700,000 unemployed in Canada, people unable to look after their families, or pay for the medicine they need, people who cannot, like their neighbours or the rest of the population, live a normal life within our economic structure.

Mr. Chairman, I read the statement made by the Minister of Labour when he introduced his estimates. I hope all our unemployed in Canada will read it; however, it would be very interesting to ask young people who have finished their studies in June, what job opportunities are being offered them today.

We could also ask tradesmen about their job opportunities at this time. And I hope I will not be telling the Minister of Labour something he does not already know when I say that, less than a fortnight ago there were a little over 600 plumbers in the city of Montreal who were looking for work and were unable to find any.

The minister referred to a new piece of legislation designed to promote the building industry in Canada. Before he prepares that piece of legislation I hope he will get in touch with his officers in the Montreal area because they will be able to tell him that, at this time, hundreds and thousands of workers in the building trades cannot find any work.

I was quite amused last night when the Minister of Labour asked the hon. member for Hull to mention the name of one unemployed worker in Hull who was looking for a job. I hope the minister's remark will receive all the publicity it deserves, and if so, I would advise him to hire additional secretaries right away, because his office will be flooded with applications within a few days.

On that subject, I should like to renew at this point the appeal I made early in this session to all unemployed, urging them to register as soon as possible at their nearest unemployment insurance office. I think that is a civic duty, because Canada's unemployed, whose number and needs are being denied, have a duty to prove to the federal government that even in the midst of July, we are faced with greater unemployment than in any comparable period in previous years.

Mr. Chairman, there has been reference to responsibility. At this point, I want to pay a tribute to the new premier of the province of Quebec who has recognized that, when it comes to unemployment, all levels of government have a responsibility and that they must try to find a solution. But, since the matter of the government's responsibility in the field of unemployment has been discussed already may I quote again an excerpt from a speech the Minister of Labour made on March 3, 1955 which we find on page 1694 of Hansard:

> Neither the municipal nor provincial governments can exert a great deal of control over the causes of unemployment, which are basically economic. The federal government is the only government which under the powers it possesses can exert control over those causes of unemployment.
> I feel it is at this time that the municipal and provincial governments should adopt a policy of doing nothing about the present situation in order to force the federal government to take the responsibility which is rightly theirs.

In that respect, Mr. Chairman, now that I have again put on record views expressed by the minister of labour in 1955, to the effect that it is a matter of federal responsibility, we could make a distinction which, I believe, is important. I think that seasonal unemployment is a responsibility to be shared equally by the provinces and of the federal government. There is also technical unemployment due to changes in industry and production methods. I also believe that in this field both the provincial and federal governments share equal responsibility. But in the field of cyclic unemployment, that is unemployment which is the result of monetary restrictions and fiscal problems, there is no doubt that it comes directly under the jurisdiction of the federal government, which has much greater fiscal powers and revenues than the provinces or the municipalities.

Mr. Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has run out.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I have a suggestion for the Minister of Labour. May I first ask him whether the Department of Labour is considering the possibility of amending the Unemployment Insurance Act in order to make the benefits available to agricultural workers? At present, as they have for years, farmers in this country are having a hard time finding farm labour, in view of the fact that job seekers are not interested in farm jobs because this type of work disqualifies them for unemployment insurance. Therefore I ask the government to consider the feasibility of providing for this, and I should like the minister to state his opinion on that point when he has the floor.

[Mr. Deschatelets.]

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, may I add a few words to complete the statement I was making a moment ago. I shall be very brief. I shall only repeat what the Canadian people generally are beginning to think. In other words, what is the opinion today of the average Canadian citizen on this government, particularly in relation to the failure of the means it has taken to solve the unemployment problem.

Mr. Chairman, the Canadian voters, as indicated by a recent Gallup poll, are disillusioned and concerned, because they find that the country is run by visionaries, idealists and dreamers.

In the course of this session, we have discussed all kinds of problems arising out of the imagination of the Prime Minister and his ministers; we have discussed the death penalty, we have discussed the bill of rights.

As for me, just before leaving the House of Commons, I wish to register on behalf of my constituents, people of the working class, their disappointment, their disapproval on the lack of action on the part of this government with regard to one of the most important domestic problems we face today.

Because of this situation, most Canadian voters today want a change in administration as soon as possible. They want a government headed not by dreamers, visionaries or idealists, but by men of action who will take drastic measures, if necessary, and who will fulfil their obligations whenever it is in the interests of Canadians.

(Text):

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, the question of unemployment has occupied the house for many hours in the last three sessions of parliament and particularly during the present session. It is my intention this evening, during the few minutes at my disposal, to bring once more to the attention of the minister and the government the present condition of the unemployment insurance fund, but before doing so I should like to place on the record again the statements which have been made in the past by the present Prime Minister, the leader of the government, concerning unemployment. In doing so I wish to quote his exact words as reported by the press of the country. My interpretation of the Prime Minister's remarks will be somewhat different from the interpretation given to the Prime Minister's declarations last evening by the hon. member for Bromo-Missisquoi—I mean Brome-Missisquoi. Judging by his actions in this house on many occasions, I think the hon. member needs a lot of bromo.

Topping the Prime Minister's list of campaign promises was his promise to spend $286 million in the first six months of 1958 to provide works projects for the nation's increasing number of unemployed. As reported in the Winnipeg Free Press of February 3, 1958, the Prime Minister said that his government would not allow the possibility of deficits in the national budget to stand in the way of providing works projects to try to take up the slack in employment.

I would ask the Minister of Labour today, what concrete measures have been introduced since 1958 to take care of the serious condition of unemployment? The facts are that on June 22, 1957, the day after the Conservative government took office, the number of persons without jobs and seeking work in this country, as reported by the dominion bureau of statistics, was 162,000. On the same date the number of applicants for employment registered at the national employment office was 266,000. Today, after over three years of Conservative government, the figures at the end of June for persons without jobs and seeking work is over 300,000, while the number of applicants registered for employment is over 400,000.

Again, as reported in the Ottawa Journal of February 15, 1958, the Prime Minister stated on the previous day, February 14, in a speech in his own town of Prince Albert:

> "We are defeating the problem," he said. Figures for the last few weeks showed a slower rate of increase in unemployment.

If they were defeating the problem of unemployment at that time, it has been a long and losing fight for the present government. Answering a question which was addressed to him at the time, where did unemployment come from, the Prime Minister had this to say:

> In the first place because we tied our economy too closely to the United States, losing our markets everywhere else. Second, because small businessmen were strangled by the tight money policy of the former government.

What did we get from the present government? A few months after assuming office, returning from a trip to the United Kingdom, the Prime Minister made his famous declaration on the diversion of trade; that is about all we got from the government, a speech from the Prime Minister on the diversion of trade. In so far as the tight money policy is concerned, there again we know what conditions were in this country, particularly during 1959. In the same speech in Prince Albert the Prime Minister stated that unemployment was 379,000 in February, 1955, and 308,000 in February, 1956, and this under a Liberal government. It is true that this was under a Liberal administration, but in February, 1958 the number of persons without jobs had risen to 538,000 and in February 1959 it was 559,000. Those registered for jobs at the unemployment office in February, 1959 totalled 798,000 and in February, 1960, 817,000.

Under a Liberal administration, in the month of June, 1955, according to a report given by the Canadian statistical review, the number of people without jobs and seeking work had dropped to 157,000; in June, 1956, it was 117,000; in June, 1957, 162,000. This, Mr. Chairman, was under a Liberal administration. The following year after the Conservatives took office in June, 1958 the number of persons without jobs and seeking work was 370,000; in June, 1959, 234,000; in June, 1960, 300,000. The number of persons registered at the national employment offices is still more revealing. Under a Liberal administration, in June, 1955, they numbered 231,000; in June, 1956, 189,000; in June, 1957, 266,000; but after the Conservative government had taken office the number registered at the national employment office rose in June, 1958, to 506,000; June, 1959, 308,000; and this year, June, 1960, 401,000.

The Prime Minister said:

> Did they talk about that then? Did they act?

We have a government today that is not only refusing to talk about unemployment, but a government that is refusing to act and the results are there to show it. On that occasion, the Prime Minister made his famous declaration:

> As long as I am Prime Minister, no man or woman is going to suffer from unemployment so long as public works will provide them the assistance they require.

This was at a time when the Prime Minister was speaking about a huge public works program which would total $1,185 million. What has been the result of this program? Is it still in the vision stage or has it turned into a mirage? I have another statement made by the Prime Minister, Mr. Chairman, as reported in the Toronto Star for February 15, 1958:

> Canada, he said, was experiencing unemployment because its economy was so tightly tied to that of the United States which also was suffering from an economic decline. No Canadian government could exert influence over the United States economy. But the Liberals were partly to blame for binding Canada's economy so closely to that of the United States.

I ask the Minister of Labour, what change has been made now that we have a Conservative government? Then in a national telecast, as reported in the Montreal Star of February 19,1958, the Prime Minister said:

> "As long as I am Prime Minister of Canada," he said in a live telecast, "everything than can be done—everything without regard to limit—will be done to the end that no one will suffer."

It is about time, Mr. Chairman, that the Prime Minister started converting some of his promises into action. Mention has been made in this house on different occasions of the winter works program for which we were asked last year to vote $15 million to cover the share of the federal government. Under present conditions, when our municipalities are overburdened with heavy taxes, at a time when the cost of money is at the highest point in our history, this is no time to call upon our municipalities to go deeper into debt in order to participate in this meagre assistance being offered by the federal government. The federal government offers to pay 50 per cent of the cost of wages, and that barely covers the extra cost of undertaking such projects during the winter months.

I could go on, Mr. Chairman, to repeat many more of the statements made by the Prime Minister concerning unemployment. What this government has done during its three years in office has been to dissipate the $500 million surplus left by the previous administration. They have forced this country into additional debt of over $1¾ billion. I want to come back, Mr. Chairman, to the position of the unemployment insurance fund. As I said, this administration has dissipated the unemployment insurance fund which was left by the previous administration. In his remarks yesterday the minister said that in the present estimates we would be called upon to vote a sum of $52,000,000, an increase of $13,500,000, to cover the federal contribution to the unemployment insurance fund. This amount will be far from sufficient to save this fund from depletion. When this government took office in June of 1957 the unemployment insurance fund was $852 million and according to the latest figures given in this house as reported on page 7019 of Hansard for Wednesday, July 27, as of June 30, of this year the unemployment insurance fund had decreased to $296 million. I would ask the minister whether in this last figure there is included the $10 million lost to the unemployment insurance fund in the last bond transaction.

Under present conditions and notwithstanding the increase in contributions of close to 30 per cent which was forced by this government on the workers of this country effective as of September 1 of last year the fund of the unemployment insurance commission will soon be depleted. I recall that during a committee meeting—I think it was in 1955—the officials of the unemployment insurance commission admitted that at any time the unemployment insurance fund fell below $500 million it would be in a dangerous condition. According to the figures for last year, with less unemployment and with fewer registered for unemployment insurance benefits than we have this year, the unemployment insurance fund from the end of May to the end of November increased by only $42 million. We can foresee that this year, during the present season, notwithstanding this extra contribution, the unemployment insurance fund will be increased by $60 million or $65 million at the most between June 30 and the end of November of this year; and from November on when we shall likely have, owing to lack of policy of the present government, more unemployment than we had last winter, the unemployment insurance fund will be gradually depleted.

I foresee a situation in which at this time next year the fund will be at a figure of approximately $150 million and when there will be in the fund barely sufficient money to cover the operations of the unemployment insurance commission for a further period of six months to eight months. This is therefore the time for the government to take action. This is the time for the minister to advise this house what are the plans of the government toward the unemployment insurance fund. I know that the minister cannot make this committee or the country believe that the fund is not in a serious position. The time has come for action and we expect that before the estimates of the minister are passed by this committee between now and tomorrow the minister will explain to the committee the policy of the government will regard to safeguarding this insurance fund for the labouring class of this country.

Before resuming my seat I would ask the minister this question in view of the statement he made in the presentation of his estimates on May 15 last year to the effect that amendments to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act would be up for discussion during the present session. I would ask the minister to advise the committee now when he expects to bring in the amendments to this act.

Mr. Starr: Not this session.

Mr. Robichaud: The minister told us previously it was not going to be done during this session. We know that it is too late now, although he made the direct statement last year that these amendments would be presented to the house for study during the present session.

The Chairman: Shall vote 164 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, Mr. Chairman. Before it is carried, if no one else in the committee wishes to speak, there are one or two things I should like to say because of some of the observations that were made just prior to six o'clock by the hon. member for Kootenay West who appears to have slept, like Rip Van Winkle, if not for 20 years, at least for the past 15 years; or, if not, to have been suffering from temporary amnesia when he was speaking. He suggested that my friend the Leader of the Opposition had taken an entirely new line, had departed from the traditions of the Liberal party in the twentieth century in what he said this afternoon. I think I can show the hon. gentleman very quickly that, far from doing that, what the Leader of the Opposition is doing is following in the footsteps of a leader of the Liberal party who gave a new orientation to this party which had the effect of giving us the kind of full employment we enjoyed in all the years after the war up until the time the present government came into office.

Some hon. Members Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman suggested that the advocacy of planning—and I do not mean planning in the sense some of the hon. gentleman's friends mean it—and economic planning at that, was something new for the Liberal party. May I say this. In the city of London, on May 30, 1945, in a nation-wide broadcast during the election campaign at that time, Mr. Mackenzie King said this:

> The achievement of full employment and social security will require no less careful planning, skilful organization and wise direction than has been needed in achieving a maximum war effort. In peacetime, the planning and direction of government must be exercised in such a way as to increase, and not to decrease, the opportunities for individual freedom and initiative. At the same time, individual freedom and initiative must not be directed to purely selfish ends. These great qualities must be harnessed for the service of humanity. It is the aim of our policies of full employment and social security to reconcile the maximum of individual freedom with the greatest possible measure of mutual aid in the attainment of human welfare.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Is the hon. member prepared to identify the ghost writer of that speech?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Mackenzie King had no need of ghost writers. If the hon. gentleman will go back to the end of a previous war he will find in a volume written by Mr. Mackenzie King many years ago—because I recognize the hon. gentleman's insinuation, I may say—many years before I knew Mr. Mackenzie King and while I was still a school boy, similar sentiments expressed in perhaps somewhat different language because that was prior to the days of broadcasting.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. gentleman is too modest.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would suggest that that is the kind of planning for which the Liberal party stood then and for which it stands now.

I should also like to draw to the attention of the hon. gentleman, because of another observation he made, something that Mr. King said in his last broadcast in that same campaign. It was a national broadcast which the hon. member for Carleton will well remember because it was a broadcast that was made in reply to Mr. George McCullagh when at the last moment he was substituted for the hon. gentleman's leader in their last national appeal before the election of 1945. I just recall that interesting bit of history although it is, I confess, somewhat irrelevant to the minister's estimates. But what I would read now is not irrelevant at all; it is completely relevant. This broadcast was delivered from Ottawa and in it Mr. King said this:

> The Progressive Conservative party has loudly proclaimed that it is the party of private enterprise, of capitalism; the C.C.F. has equally loudly proclaimed that it is the party of public ownership, of socialism. The Liberal party has never accepted extreme positions. We do not believe that more employment and prosperity will be created by the mere fact of changing the ownership of property from individuals or corporations to the state. Nor do we believe that our free way of life is threatened by the ownership and development by the nation of certain great undertakings. For the Liberal party, the test is what will best serve the general interest, rather than special interests, whether those special interests be the interests of a financial oligarchy or a particular class.
> Let me remind you that Liberal governments have been responsible for great national enterprises such as the Canadian National Railways which have served vitally in the defence of freedom in this war; like the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation which our Conservative opponents now seem prepared to hand over completely to private interest; like Trans-Canada Air Lines whose opportunity to develop civil aviation in the public interest has been safeguarded by the present government, despite every effort of our Tory opponents to hand this great national development over to private interests.

The Liberal party believes that the largest part of the employment required must be provided by private undertakings, and the present government is taking vigorous steps to encourage private and corporate enterprise; but, we are equally convinced that, in certain fields, the public interest calls for public enterprise in national development. In those fields, we have not, and, in the future, will not hesitate in the general interest to promote bold action by the state.

Lest hon. gentlemen say that that is a statement made before an election, we know what happened afterwards. We know that between 1945 and 1957 there was a condition if not of full employment, in many cases of overfull employment. It is true that in the winter of 1954-55 and 1949-50 there was a recurrence of seasonal unemployment, but there was no summer through that whole period when there was not full employment. And it did not all happen by chance.

It should not be forgotten that at the time Mr. Mackenzie King made those statements and talked about the planning done by that government at that time he was talking about the problem which was right on the edge of being faced by that government and was putting into useful peacetime employment two million men and women who had been in the armed forces or employed in war industry, the most colossal undertaking in the shifting of employment which had taken place up to then in the history of this country. And that was not done by chance; it was done by planning and by Liberal planning.

So I assure the hon. gentleman that if he has awakened from his slumbers or his amnesia is over he will find there has been a great deal of Liberal planning throughout these years.

Mr. Chairman, one only needs to recall some of those things which have been undertaken. One only needs to recall some of the things which over the years we have been responsible for, such as the St. Lawrence seaway, to mention perhaps the most spectacular of them all; at every stage when the economy needed the extra push and stimulus which it received when there were in the government of Canada men of foresight and forethought and planning. Because all the vision in the world is not much use if you have not got the administrative skill and the practical knowledge and the capacity for executive action that is required to turn visions into realities.

Mr. Martineau: Would the hon. member permit a question?

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Pickersgill: I would be delighted.

Mr. Martineau: Would the hon. member tell the committee where all these supermen have gone now?

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course, time takes its toll and it is ten years since Mr. Mackenzie King went to his rest; but it will be many, many years before the imprint he made on this country is forgotten. As for Mr. St. Laurent, who succeeded Mr. King and who served this country as prime minister with incomparable skill and administrative capacity, and a capacity to make decisions and get things done and not play politics and play constantly to the gallery, he served this country in the highest office past his seventy fifth birthday, and the last time he asked for the judgment of the people he got more votes than hon. gentlemen opposite.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: If hon. gentlemen would like me to go on with my biographical catalogue I would be glad to, except that I do not think the Chair would like it because I see the chairman looking rather sternly at me.

Now I want to make a comparison. I have here in my hand the latest blueprint for full employment of the present Prime Minister of Canada. We have not heard much from the Prime Minister about full employment since March. That was in the day when this government still believed that the unemployment would end with the coming of spring. A month later they began to have their doubts and since then they have talked very differently.

What did the Prime Minister say in the broadcast of March 3? I have read these words in the house before and perhaps it will be worth recalling the circumstances when the Prime Minister made this speech. On the evening of March 3, within two hours of the time that a debate on unemployment concluded in this house in which he did not deign to take part, he went on the air and this is what he said:

And as you know, there was the unemployment problem which we inherited.

Two years afterwards the Prime Minister was still talking that nonsense. But we do not hear much more about that today because whatever this government may have inherited in the winter of 1957 and 1958, and the hon. member for Laurier has put figures on the record today which make a mockery of that statement, I do not think even the Prime Minister's colossal gall would be sufficient to persuade the people of this country to believe that that inheritance has persisted up till now, particularly when we remember that last autumn the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Labour were all telling us that the recession was over and that everything was rosy in the garden.

If everything was rosy in the garden last October and November it is pretty difficult to blame the not very rosy situation in the summer of 1960 on inheritance from the former government. Whatever this government did inherit, if they are any use at all surely in three years they could do something about the situation they inherited, but the plain fact is that hon. gentlemen opposite simply move from one excuse to another. They blamed the Liberal inheritance as long as they could.

What are they trying to do now? They are trying to fob off the whole unemployment problem on the new premier of Quebec. They have to find somebody else to blame all the time. But one cannot get away from the plain fact which was put on the record by my hon. friend from Laurier and underlined so ably by my hon. friend from Gloucester just now. The fact is that the level of unemployment since this government won the election of 1958, when we were told that as long as the present Prime Minister was head of the government no one would suffer in this country through unemployment has been 50 per cent higher and most of the time 100 per cent higher. I am referring to percentages not to absolute figures; if you take absolute figures their record is very much worse. Let me go on a little further with the Prime Minister's program for full employment of March 3, 1960:

> As you know, there was an unemployment problem which we inherited. I do not want to see a single day of unnecessary suffering—

"Unnecessary suffering." Hon. members know the comment I made the last time I referred to this, and it is worthy of repetition, particularly as I have been quoting Mr. Mackenzie King this evening. We have gone from "no one will suffer" to "no unnecessary suffering but suffering if necessary". In two years that is the progress which has been made.

> "I did not want to see a single day of unnecessary suffering, and neither did my colleagues. The result was that we had to spend hundreds of millions of dollars to provide work from housing and public works and other projects.

If that was the right thing to do in 1958, why is it not the right thing to do in 1960? Why has the government dropped these ideas. Remember that great visionary press release which came out of the east block with all those projects, half of which were, of course, simply in the estimates which had been prepared by the preceding government and most of the rest of which have not been started? That, I suppose, is the hundreds of millions that were spent. What is happening now?

An hon. Member: No money.

Mr. Pickersgill: But here is what he had the gall to say; here is what the Prime Minister had the colossal impudence to try to tell the Canadian people on March 3. He said: "We planned for a deficit." When you think of what the Prime Minister said in 1957 in that election campaign about how wicked it was to overspend in the way the Liberal government was overspending and how wicked it was to be paying off public debt in the way the Liberal government was paying off that debt, and how he was going to reduce the expenditures of this country by half a billion, how he was going to reduce taxes and still balance the budget, what a change in thinking this represents. Hon. members will recall that promise of a budget made by the Minister of Finance in June, 1957—the one he got ticked off for by the Prime Minister who was over in London because there was a clash in the plans—that was before Mr. Roblin discovered this was a Fleming government and not a Diefenbaker government, and perhaps before the Minister of Finance discovered it, either. Anyway the Prime Minister said they planned for a deficit. Secret plans, probably, or, as my leader says, hidden plans. Perhaps we shall be able to discover it and produce it damatically on some occasion when we get back into power although I do not think the Liberal party will need to resort to histrionics of that kind.

Mr. Pallett: At that stage it will be an antique.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was an antique when it was produced. The Prime Minister went on to say: "We had to borrow money." Well, that is certainly an understatement. For 12 years, to enable this country to expand, the previous government paid off the debt of this country and made those funds available for the development of this country—and in two years this government put all that debt back. So when they say they had to borrow money they hardly exaggerated, and perhaps the climate they created then may have had a lot to do with the fact that winter is now extended into July. In 1958 winter went into June. It is winter in July now, and seasonal unemployment is an affair of all four seasons.

That, of course, is an achievement of this government. The Prime Minister went on to say:

> We were, of course, criticized for this, but when I thought of the families of the unemployed I knew for me there was no other course, deficit or no deficit.

An hon. Member: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Pickersgill: What we are entitled to know in a debate on unemployment is whether this is still the policy. Is the blueprint for unemployment now what the Prime Minister said on March 3 or what the Minister of Finance said in the budget, because they are diametrically opposed to each other. The Prime Minister said: "I knew there was no other course for me". Presumably if he knew it then he still knows it today. Presumably this is not something which is entirely in the past. Presumably if it was a good thing to have a deficit in 1958 it is an equally good thing in 1960. But that is not what the Minister of Finance says, although it is what the Prime Minister told the public in a broadcast entitled "The Nation's Business". One cannot blame the people of this country for being confused when this confusion exists right at the top.

Now I come to the Prime Minister's blueprint summed up in one sentence. This is it: "In the same circumstances I would make exactly the same decision again". We have the same circumstances. Where is the decision? What is the decision? What is the government's plan for dealing with unemployment?

I feel sorry for the Minister of Labour. No one can reasonably expect the Minister of Labour to have a plan for dealing with unemployment. As the hon. member for Essex East said earlier in the session, this is not a job for the Minister of Labour, it is a job for the whole government. We should be told by the government, by the head of the government, what the plans are, and those plans should be something much more significant and much more fruitful than the expansion of the winter works program to include a few town halls and the installation of a few street lights. As nearly as I can gather these were the additions which were made to this winter works program in the announcement made the other day before the federal-provincial conference began.

Everybody has said that we desperately need more vocational training in this country, more technical training; that one of our difficulties is that despite the heavy unemployment we have there are still unfilled jobs because we have not competent Canadians in the right places to fill them. What do we find? We find in the estimates this year that the vote for vocational training has been cut down by over $1 million. It may be that this vote will have to be increased by virtue of the announcement made by the Minister of Labour the other day; I assume that did represent a change which would cost something. But I can say that that was not adequate, either.

What should be done today is what the Mackenzie King government did at the end of the war. At that time we had all these young people coming out of the armed forces many of whom had to go and fight for their country at the time they should have been getting their education. What did the federal government do? It paid for the education of every one of them who wanted it and was capable of taking it.

I do not expect the federal government to provide the vocational schools but they can help provide them. I do not expect the government to run them. The government did not take over the universities or technical schools at the end of the war. I do say, however, that when you have a problem as big as this one and when it has developed to the degree it has in certain provinces that simply have not the provincial revenues to bear themselves all of the burden and that if they do provide the training for these people may find that the people leave the province to secure jobs in another province, it is a national task.

Instead of paying 75 per cent the government should do as the Leader of the Opposition and several other hon. members on this side have suggested over and over again. The government should take over the problem of paying the cost for those persons who are unemployed and who are capable of benefiting from training of such a kind that will make them really employable.

There are a great many other things one could say about this subject but there have been a great many things said already. What I started off to do was to have a small and amicable quarrel with the hon. member for Kootenay West who is one of the most amiable hon. members in this chamber, and I was just led on from one thing to another.

I hope that the Minister of Labour who I think probably agrees with me—although I am not going to test cabinet solidarity by pressing him too far on this point—notwithstanding the fact that this is a Fleming government—will do his best at the treasury board in order to be in a position to do a little better than he is proposing to do about vocational training.

Mr. Herridge: Will the hon. member who is the distinguished archivist and historian of the Liberal party permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. Herridge: Can the hon. gentleman point to any lines in Hansard which indicate that the Right Hon. Mackenzie King ever spoke about planning in the terms that the Leader of the Opposition did this afternoon?

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think I could do that offhand, good though my memory for that kind of thing is. However, given 24 hours notice I think I would have no difficulty in satisfying the hon. member on that point. I would hazard a guess that if the hon. member would look at the debate on the setting up of the department of reconstruction which was done in 1944—there would be many other places to look but that is the most obvious one I can think of—he would find precisely what he is looking for.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I am sure we have all shared to some extent in the enjoyment that has been evident in the chamber in the past few minutes while the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was having a fine time painting word pictures in which he described the Liberal party as having all the wisdom that has existed from the time the world began while we poor people who somehow or other managed to persuade the Canadian people to employ us again were characterized as just a lot of newcomers who go from one stupidity to another.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, I did not say that.

Mr. Macdonnell: There are very few advantages in growing older but perhaps one is that your memory goes back a little and I should like to bring up one or two points to add to the pleasant picture we have had painted for us by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

The modesty of the hon. member is something that I always respect but when he has added to that additional qualities, when he is speaking not only for himself but for Mr. Mackenzie King and Mr. St. Laurent, then the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate reaches heights to which one can hardly follow at all.

I should like to remind the hon. member of one or two things. According to the hon. member the people of Canada were very fortunate that after world war II we were blessed with a government which did certain things and by its own efforts and wise planning produced for us 15 years of prosperity and after that, sad to relate, when they were defeated and the present government took office, everything began to go wrong.

Mr. Pearson: A very fair description.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am glad the Leader of the Opposition thinks I have been fair in describing what was said by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. In refreshing the memory of the hon. member I should like to go back to world war I. Many people have forgotten that there was a first great war, but there actually was, and I should like to recall what happened thereafter. It is important that we remember in our more sober moments that wars have actually taken place. It is good to remember that wars always leave the same situations. They succeed in diverting the working population from the usual things of life to things which we do not use in ordinary times and they leave a tremendous gap to be filled.

That happened in the 1920's. Those who have taken the trouble to learn about the twenties will recall that we had a grand time in that period. We thought we had discovered the secret not only of full employment but of perpetual prosperity, and it went on and on. I do not know if the government of that time took all the credit for it but at any rate we did not hear as much about it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Because we had unemployment after world war I.

Mr. Macdonnell: Then after world war II we had a similar situation. There was a world wide shortage and we enjoyed prosperity. I will not say that the government of the day did not help it along. I had a considerable respect for the government of that day although sometimes I succeeded in controlling myself and did not come out and express it. I never said that all the things that that government did were wrong. I am quite sure that I sometimes agreed that it was right. But the picture painted this evening by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate of the government of that period being possessed of all highest wisdom, going from one wise action to another, from victory to delirious victory, is a little more than I can stand.

Then the hon. member brought us to the situation that existed at the beginning of 1957. I think the phrase used was that we "inherited" some unemployment. What was the situation? We had taken over from a government that had been in office for many years. There was some unemployment. I doubt if even the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate would argue that everything was perfect in 1957.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, nor even in 1956.

Mr. Macdonnell: I imagine that under pressure the hon. member would say that what we did in 1957 as an immediate palliative in a difficult situation was very good. Then the hon. member brought us to 1958 and 1959.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. member would permit me to interrupt, I should not like to let that statement pass unchallenged.

Mr. Macdonnell: Is the hon. member rising to ask me a question or to make a speech? I think I can speak better without the hon. gentleman competing with me.

Mr. Pearson: The hon. member is a spur.

Mr. Macdonnell: When the hon. member brought us to 1957 I became very interested in his remarks. I often wonder if we do gain in political controversy by refusing utterly to be realistic and by just going all-out and painting extravagant pictures which any, shall I say, fair-minded or independent-minded person, would find very tiresome.

In 1957 we took measures which I think were very effective for the time being. Then in 1958 it looked as if things were very good. We described the situation as best we could and indicated that things were better. We may even sometimes have over-stated it a little. But I would remind the enthusiastic hon. gentleman that we are next door to a nation ten times as big as ours and what was happening here was happening there. I would also say that even though we were disappointed by what happened during 1959 and during the early months of this year, nevertheless the same thing happened in the United States as well. This picture that the hon. gentleman depicted of us as a lot of people who stupidly could not recognize what was going to happen and then suddenly found themselves with a task on their doorstep which they were not fulfilling was to me just the sheerest fantasy, just political enthusiasm running wild.

Let us be perfectly clear about the matter. Statements have been made by the Prime Minister and by the Minister of Labour about things that are being done. They are not all being done before the end of next week but they have been indicated and are being done. Much as I respect the speech made this afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition, and I did respect it, I do not know that it contained any great new earth-shaking remedies that we have overlooked and which would suddenly set the situation right. As a matter of fact, we know that we live in a world full of difficulties. We are not the only people in difficulty, and so I would ask the hon. gentleman to sleep on this and to come back in the morning and tell us what he really thinks about it all.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. Macdonnell: Don't make it too hard.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is a very easy one. The hon. member referred to extravagant language. I wonder what he would think about this sentence in a speech made on March 3, 1960:

> When we look at what has been achieved in the short space of time, we can only regret that this policy was not put into effect a good many years ago.

This was the Prime Minister talking about development.

Mr. Macdonnell: The Prime Minister does not set himself up to be a wizard and to be able to foresee everything that is going to happen. A great many things have already been foreshadowed by the minister. I would also remind the hon. member that with respect to the difficult situation that is developing, which we admit, we are not the only ones who have been taken by surprise to a great extent; the United States and other countries have as well.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does the minister intend to reply to the various requests that were made, notably the one just made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, for a statement of the government's policy designed to deal with the present unemployment situation?

Mr. Starr: If the hon. member would take his thoughts back to what I said in my opening statement he would realize that I listed the measures to be taken which were announced within the last week. In addition, I announced another measure to be taken with respect to home improvement loans under which the chartered banks have agreed to make money available for that purpose. I also referred to the closing sentence in the announcement the Prime Minister made last Saturday when he mentioned "other measures" that are now under consideration, and as decisions are arrived at announcements will be made. There is no question of the government sitting idly by and being content to rest on the announcements already made within the last week or so. Rather, other measures are now being considered and as soon as they are ready to be anounced announcements will be made.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say that I followed carefully the statement the minister made when he introduced his estimates. I recall the character of his speech. It was largely devoted to a review of the department's general activities. The minister did not say the government had a program under consideration at all.

Mr. Thrasher: Read Hansard and you will see.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister mentioned that the government had announced an acceleration of its housing program. He mentioned that there was going to be further financial assistance of a limited kind for vocational training. He referred to the liberalization to a limited extent of the winter works program. But he surely does not expect the committee to believe that enunciation represents a vigorous program to meet the problem of unemployment which is now serious, which was serious during the winter and serious last autumn. Surely the minister owes the committee a better explanation than the one he has given now and earlier.

I am going to ask the minister whether his department prepares for him an annual forecast some time in the spring or during the year of the unemployment or employment outlook for the coming months. Although we have not learned latterly of the terms, recommendations and analyses of the economic survey or hidden report, we do know that the Department of Trade and Commerce has such a survey made annually. We were told about it by the Prime Minister in the revelations he gave the house regarding this confidential document in 1958. We know that the Bank of Canada prepares a report and undoubtedly the Minister of Finance has such a report prepared for him.

The minister should tell us if there is such a report prepared for him. If there is, should he not table that report, should he not tell us what the employment and unemployment outlook seem to be for this summer, next fall and next winter in the judgment of his officials? We will be called upon shortly to provide moneys for the maintenance and support of a research branch in the Department of Labour, a research branch that is well manned and composed of competent individuals. These gentlemen are engaged for the purpose of assessing the situation. Has such a report been prepared? If there has been, does the minister not think that the house should be informed about its contents? Is there any reason why that report should not be made available? If the Prime Minister thought it was proper to reveal the contents of the economic survey prepared in the Department of Trade and Commerce, surely when we are discussing unemployment we should know from the Minister of Labour whether the kind of prognostications, for instance, made today by the Leader of the Opposition, are valid.

Are these exaggerations? Are these indications of the future sound? If they are sound, then we have a right to ask the minister and the government to outline a program that will be capable of mitigating the severity of unemployment as revealed in these foreshadowings of the future. How can we properly assess the capacity and the validity of the government's program to meet this problem unless we know whether the suggestions as to the future made by hon. members of this party are warranted?

Is there such a report prepared for the minister? If he feels it is a confidential document and that it cannot be given, are we not entitled to have from the minister, if not the actual report, its conclusions, its assessments, its portrayal of the situation? Is the Minister of Labour to be regarded as having satisfied the obligations that are his at the moment unless he gives us at least some general indication of what is contained in such a report, if there is such a report? If the minister says there is no such annual report prepared for him then, of course, that ends it, but I cannot conceive that in the Department of Labour, particularly having in mind the research branch, that that kind of foreshadowing is not given by the departmental officials.

We are entitled to know whether there is such a report, whether it is pessimistic, whether it is optimistic. Does it indicate anything that will confirm the suggestions made by the research organization to which the Leader of the Opposition referred, a body which has indicated that we are going to be confronted with levels of unemployment certainly comparable to what we have had during the past year and the previous year and the previous autumn?

Are these prognostications wrong? They are public. They have been made by these various bodies, and do they confirm the assessment made by my hon. friend's officials? Does the government, if such a report exists, accept the assessment made by these officials, if it has been made? Does the government think they are exaggerated or does the government agree with them? Surely we are entitled to know whether, in the opinion of the government, unemployment is going to be lower or higher in the ensuing period. If we are going to have a high level of unemployment, now in these last days of this session we are entitled to know from the minister what steps the government is now taking; not what steps it is considering taking after the damage has been done, but what steps the government is going to take in anticipation of meeting this problem. Surely that is not an unfair demand to make of the minister.

Then it seems to me we are entitled to know from the minister if these projections into the future are close to the mark, close to the estimate made, and whether the government is going to be prepared to answer the question which I asked the Minister of Labour when I spoke following his statement yesterday, and that is if unemployment is likely in the autumn and next winter to be as serious as last winter. Will the government call parliament together so that these plans and these programs can be considered or is the government going to allow this problem to drag until the next session of parliament is called? This is a proposition that was put to the Prime Minister, and one with which I do not believe he has sought to deal. It is one for which he has the responsibility to deal.

Mr. Starr: That is nonsense.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says it is nonsense, and I regret he says that.

Mr. Starr: I say that, if I might interject, because the hon. member has made this charge that I have the responsibility for calling parliament to deal with these matters; that I should make that announcement. The hon. member well knows that if he wishes that information he should inquire of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I did not say the minister was responsible for calling parliament together.

Mr. Starr: That is exactly what you said, that I should announce parliament will be called.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister is a member of the government and he can tell us whether it is the intention of the government, as the result of a collective decision made by cabinet, to call parliament together to deal with this problem if it reaches the serious proportions which have been suggested.

I should like to ask the minister another question. What organization has been set up in cabinet itself to consider this problem? I am not asking the minister to tell us what discussions have taken place in cabinet. This question was put on another occasion and the Prime Minister said that was an improper question, but the Speaker did not agree. It is surely open to us to ask whether the cabinet is organized to deal with this problem. Is there a cabinet committee? Who is the chairman of that committee? Is it the Minister of Labour? Is it the Minister of Finance, or has the chairmanship of that committee been assigned to the Associate Minister of National Defence? Is that the case?

If that is the case, why is it the case? Are we now tying the unemployment problem to national defence? Is that the policy of the government? Is the Minister of Labour himself a member of that committee? Is the Minister of Finance a member of that committee? These are questions which I feel the Minister of Labour himself must answer if he is to satisfy some of us who are now dealing with this problem.

Mr. Starr: I do not believe it is possible to satisfy the hon. member for Essex East at all.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says it is not possible to satisfy the member for Essex East. I will say this to the minister. What the minister has said thus far on this problem has certainly not satisfied the member for Essex East. It has satisfied no one in this party, and I am of the opinion it has not satisfied a substantial portion of the Canadian public, because the government in this discussion has sought to underplay and to underestimate the severity of this problem, if we are to judge by the reactions we have had from the minister.

I have one more observation to make. The other day the Prime Minister announced the establishment of a royal commission to examine into the conditions that exist now in the automobile industry. This was pursuant to a request made by the united automobile workers, who made representations to the government a month ago, one week after representations had been made by the management of the various automobile plants in Canada. It followed representations that had been made by the parts manufacturers in that industry. It took the government some time to make the announcement, in spite of the fact that as soon as the representations had been made for the establishment of a royal commission or a reference to the tariff board the Prime Minister intimated his sympathy and support for such a proposition. The Prime Minister thought perhaps the royal commission would be the best vehicle.

Having decided on this course the government should not feel it is discharging its responsibilities as to unemployment in that industry or, for that matter, in allied industries. The government should not feel this device, in itself, is capable of resolving the problem of unemployment generally. The royal commission is a long term project and it is not going to deal with the situation at once. Are we to wait until such a body reports before we have some statement of policy from the government, for instance with regard to the excise tax on automobiles, which the Prime Minister told us during the course of the election campaign would be removed because of the severity of unemployment. We have had no comment whatever from the minister on this particular subject, notwithstanding the fact it was announced by the Prime Minister as a method of dealing with unemployment in Canada. It is one thing to make an assessment, one thing to make a study of a problem, but these studies take time and they are not to be regarded as vehicles which enable the government to continue its program of procrastination, delay and lack of solutions.

I say these things to the minister. I say that my colleagues regard the minister as an unfortunate prisoner in this situation. We do not blame him personally, but he is the Minister of Labour, and to whom else can we address our remarks if we are not to address them to the minister on these estimates? He is the member of the government who has the responsibility in connection with what the people of Canada regard as the foremost domestic problem, possibly apart from national defence, although the problems there have international tones as well. So, as we get into the estimates that are now going to be discussed, we will be afforded an opportunity of dealing with certain aspects of the problem, but the minister still has an opportunity to rise in his place and examine this problem as it has been examined by the Leader of the Opposition today.

The speech made by the Leader of the Opposition today is one that I know will commend itself to the Minister of Labour. The Minister of Labour will hold it out as a model for all members in opposition, and I will agree with him. The point is that speech made by the Leader of the Opposition is the kind of speech, in part, that should be made by the Minister of Labour. He is the one who should make an analysis; he is the one who should lead in this problem instead of waiting to be prodded into replies, and replies which so far have not revealed that this government has a program consistent with its assurances or which is capable of dealing in a vigorous, fundamental way with a problem that is of great concern to the great majority of the people of our country.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Essex East evidently does not want to accept the statement that has been made by the Prime Minister. As he well knows, being a former privy councillor, no announcements are made until whatever the government wishes to undertake in the way of a particular project has been decided on definitely. I cannot make the matter any clearer to him. I doubt greatly whether he will be satisfied with anything at all, knowing him as I do.

Then to reiterate the words of the Prime Minister on July 23 as reported in Hansard at page 6817, we find the following:

—and that further projects and plans to meet the unemployment situation will be announced in due course.

The hon. member for Essex East has ridiculed some of the projects that have been put forward. He has called the municipal winter works program a bagatelle.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Starr: He has said it is not the fulfilment of the recommendations of the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Not fully.

Mr. Starr: I should just like to point out to him that in the submission of the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities of April 9, 1959 under the heading of "Unemployment and municipal winter works" this sentence is to be found at page 4:

The municipalities are of the view that the municipal winter works program has justified itself and they commend the dominion government for initiating the program.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not quarrel with that statement.

Mr. Starr: Then again on page 6, in paragraph 4, they say this:

They are also strongly of the view and urge that the range and nature of eligible projects be broadened and extended to include inside as well as outdoor local works, including construction repairs and maintenance on municipal buildings and institutions, water-works and sewerage disposal plants, parks and recreational facilities, maintenance and improvement of municipal sources of water supply and municipal dumps, work on traffic and street name signs, and similar municipal works and requirements.

We have done this in this new broadened program that we have announced, and the hon. member says that is not satisfactory.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not sufficient, I said.

Mr. Starr: That is not sufficient, the hon member says. I have here a letter from the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities dated July 26 over the signature of His Worship Mayor S. L. Buckwold, president. He is the mayor of Saskatoon and president of the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities. The letter reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Minister,

The widening of the federally-assisted municipal winter works program to include additional types of construction projects which will be eligible for federal financial aid is along the lines of the recommendations made by the federation to the federal government in April, 1958.

The municipal governments will welcome the announcement that federal financial assistance is to be extended to the construction, repairs and maintenance of municipal buildings, as well as outdoor winter construction and maintenance jobs. I am confident that many of them will avail themselves of the enlarged program that will now be possible with a resulting larger volume of local employment during the winter months.

The federal government is to be commended on the action it has taken with respect to this important matter.

Believe me to be

Sincerely yours,

S. L. Buckwold
President.

That letter in itself speaks entirely differently. I refer to the letter of the president of the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities. That is contradictory to what was said by the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He does not say anything different.

Mr. Starr: The hon. member for Essex East has said things that are not facts and at times there is some question as to the veracity of his statements.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Since my hon. friend has questioned what I have said or in other words has said that what I have said is untrue, let him point out one statement I made that cannot be backed up. What my hon. friend has now said is not different from what I have been saying. I said that this winter works program is a bagatelle, that it does not deal with the problem and the president of this organization does not say that it does.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, just in order to cite one instance that bears out what I have said with regard to his veracity, here is a statement made by the hon. member. I refer to Hansard, at page 4134, in the second column at the bottom of the page. There we find the following stated by him:

In the Moncton Times of May 17, 1960 at page 14 I find these figures. I presume the editor got his information by calling the local regional office. The number of live claims reported in that area—

These are the exact words.

—for April 30, 1960—

And I want to draw your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that the hon. member for Essex East says this with regard to the number of live claims reported in that area, that is the maritime area, by the regional office.

—was 714,000, as compared with 610,000 on April 30, 1959.

Then he goes on to say how much it represents. Mr. Chairman, that happens to be the total for all of Canada, not for that area.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is an obvious misprint.

[Mr. Starr.]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is an obvious misprint; anybody can see that.

Mr. Pickersgill: If that is the best the minister can produce, it is not worth much.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, no correction has been made of Hansard. It has been taken as a correct statement. He was misleading the house in what he said.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I rise on a point of order—

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —or on a question of privilege. The hon. gentleman has said that he questioned my veracity. That is an unparliamentary statement and I ask the minister to withdraw that statement at once. I am capable of making a mistake but my veracity will stand with that of the hon. gentleman any time.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I want to complete my case.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have asked the minister to withdraw that statement.

Mr. Starr: I cannot do so because I have more facts here.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Starr: I was curious, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I have risen on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Chairman: Order. Has the minister any comment to make on the point raised by the hon. member for Essex East?

Mr. Starr: Yes, Mr. Chairman. My comment is that I have further proof that he was trying to mislead the house in the statement that he made.

The Chairman: I was referring to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Essex East with regard to the discussion that was going on.

Mr. Starr: I looked up the Moncton Times—

The Chairman: If the minister will permit me to do so I will indicate to him that of course it is not in accordance with our practice to intimate that an hon. member has not spoken the truth. A difference exists when one says that a statement was not true. That is permitted. However, I would caution the minister that he was coming close to attributing to the hon. member an intentional misleading of the house, something which is entirely contrary to the rules. He might wish to indicate clearly that such was not his intention.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, the point was not that I was misleading the house. The hon. gentleman said that what I said was untrue. He attacked my veracity.

An hon. Member: He did not.

Another hon. Member: He did.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman said that what I had said was a reflection on my veracity. That is what the hon. gentleman has said. I ask him to withdraw that statement, and according to our rules he must do so.

Mr. Starr: If the hon. member objects to that statement, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am rising on a point of order.

Mr. Starr: If the hon. member objects to that statement and if it is your wish that I should withdraw it, Mr. Chairman, I will gladly do so.

I refer again to what was said and I want to repeat it. At the beginning of the paragraph which contains these words "In the Moncton Times of May 17, 1960 I find these figures". I obtained a copy of the Moncton Times dated Tuesday May 17. At page 14 there is an article headed "Spring employment boom seem for Atlantic area". As I look through this whole column or this whole write-up I do not find one figure that was quoted by the hon. member who gave the impression that these figures appeared in the statement in the Moncton Times.

That leads me to believe that I would have—

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister repeat the page reference in Hansard?

Mr. Starr: It is Hansard for Monday, May 23, 1960, page 4134, the last paragraph in the righthand column.

That naturally leads me to look very closely at some of the statements which are made by the hon. member for Essex East. He wants to know whether there are any reports on the outlooks in the labour department. The hon. member for Essex East was a parliamentary assistant to the minister of labour at one time and knows whether there are any reports or whether there are not. Most certainly there is no need for him to ask for any interdepartmental report which may be in existence, and I do not say there is one, to be revealed to him just because he wants to know. The same thing applies to any matters relating to cabinet decisions. Surely it is not intended that I should break my oath in any way to reveal what is going on in cabinet, in the privy council.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No one suggested that.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend from Essex East brought up some important points and asked some important questions of the minister to which he did not receive a reply. The minister spent most of his time dealing with some statements which the hon. member was supposed to have made in the house last May. If he did make them the minister had an opportunity to deal with them at that time.

What we are doing now is trying to get from the minister an assessment of the position which is facing us in this country at this time in connection with unemployment and what the government is going to do about it. It does not help the unemployed of this country very much to have the minister go back to May and find that the hon. member for Essex East said something which the minister does not like and which my hon. friend will undoubtedly deal with when he gets up.

I ask the minister whether he feels that the assessment we have made of the position is a reasonable one and whether he feels we are facing a difficult and dangerous situation in respect of unemployment. I have a great deal more evidence which I could put on the record, not evidence from our side but evidence which has been submitted by objective experts outside the House of Commons, as to the dangers and difficulties which are facing us in the unemployment situation in this country at the present time.

We are asking the minister whether he feels that there may be trouble ahead next winter, whether he feels that this winter works program which he has mentioned, which he says will be increased, is adequate to deal with the situation which may face us. It is the only program—I think I am fair when I say this—that the minister has put forward in this debate to deal with unemployment. I think the maximum figure under that program last winter that I have seen was some 40,000 jobs.

Mr. Starr: It was 51,000.

Mr. Pearson: It was 51,000. That was as a result of co-operation between the federal government and the municipalities, at a time when we had hundreds of thousands of unemployed, and these 51,000 jobs were not all created by this particular arrangement. A good many of those jobs would have been in existence through the policies of the municipalities themselves. If we allow that half of those 51,000 jobs were created specifically by the plans of the federal government in co-operation with the municipalities I think we would be fair. That would mean that 26,000 extra jobs were provided for a few weeks or a month or two to deal with a problem which faced the country in terms of three quarters of a million people at that time out of work.

If the minister says there is to be an increase in that program this year and we may get another 10,000 or 15,000 jobs, does the minister think that will be enough to deal with the situation which confronts or may confront this country in the coming winter?

Mr. Starr: No, I do not.

Mr. Pearson: If the minister does not think so, perhaps he will indicate to us what other plans the government has in mind.

There is one other question. The hon. member for Essex East made some reference to the organization of the cabinet in respect to unemployment plans. He was not asking for the betrayal of any cabinet secrets. We know the minister cannot be asked to do that and that he would not do it; but we do ask the minister, is there such a thing as a cabinet committee on unemployment which has been working? Surely we are entitled to know that. Surely we are entitled to know if there is cabinet machinery which is specifically dedicated to this particular problem which has been set up by the government, what that machinery is and who is its chairman. Surely that is a fair and reasonable request to make of the minister.

Mr. Starr: I have found the Leader of the Opposition to be a reasonable man at all times, unlike the hon. member for Essex East. Surely he can understand my position as Minister of Labour, that I can only announce the plans which have been formulated by the government. That is as far as I can go. In relation to the plans which have already been announced, I have quoted the words of the Prime Minister. I hope he can understand that nothing more can be said at this time on these estimates.

With regard to what has been done in the cabinet and whether there is a cabinet committee, the hon. member for Essex East knows that there is, and so does the Leader of the Opposition. They have read it in the papers and the hon. member has quoted the chairman of this committee. What else is there to know? Do they want to know where we meet or what hours we sit?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Who is the chairman?

Mr. Starr: The same designated member that the hon. member referred to.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Why is not the Minister of Labour the chairman?

Mr. Starr: The Minister of Labour is an active participant in that committee and there is no reason why the hon. member should say the Minister of Labour should be chairman. We alternate on many of our cabinet committees, and some of us are chairman on one and some one others.

Mr. Pearson: We have now learned—

Mr. Starr: You knew it all the time.

Mr. Pearson: —that the rumours we have heard that there is a cabinet committee on unemployment have a foundation in fact. There is such a cabinet committee and the chairman of that cabinet committee is the Associate Minister of National Defence.

If the minister will permit me I propose to deal with one other aspect of this winter works program which I meant to mention a few moments ago but forgot. This is going to be extended in some respects this winter and we hope it will result in some more jobs than those which were created by it last year. But there will be an increasing difficulty this winter, surely the minister admits, because of the fact that some of the municipalities—and my hon. friend who has some experience of municipal administration; he spoke about this last night—will be unable perhaps to take advantage of this program owing to their financial situation.

The submission by the federation of mayors and municipalities to the government of April 9, to which reference has been made more than once, contains this paragraph and I ask the minister to consider this as having a bearing on his new plan for winter works:

> By and large, however, it can be said that the financial difficulties that municipal governments are experiencing do not arise primarily from the increased operating and administrative costs of municipal government, nor even from the costs of normal local improvement requirements. The difficulties arise consequent upon the inability of municipal governments to finance the high costs and carrying charges of urban renewal requirements and the requirements occasioned by rapidly expanding urban growth... The difficulties of municipal governments are more in the field of capital costs rather than in the field of actual operating and administrative costs.

Does the minister not think that these figures may prejudice the success of this new and expanded scheme of winter works he has been telling us about?

Mr. Starr: That may be the case with some municipalities, I have no doubt. I have had experience with municipalities and their problems and I know the difficulties encountered but we are hoping that in the main it will not be so. We hope that interest rates will be lower—they are on the downward trend now—and we hope they will be lower still. However, new municipal work has been going on for years and I feel certain the municipalities will take advantage of this program and that it will be a more satisfactory program than last year and that many more people will be given employment as a result. That is as far as I am able to know at this time.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): We are very interested in this particular aspect of the minister's estimates and I also would like to ask a couple of questions. Possibly they may seem to be in a similar vein but I will endeavour to make them a little more explicit and a little less wordy, perhaps, than the questions asked by the hon. member for Essex East and the Leader of the Opposition.

The minister mentioned with pride that the association of municipalities had expressed appreciation of the winter works program. I should like the minister to say, as the labour spokesman of the government, if the government believes that this winter works program is a cure for this unemployment problem or whether it is just a palliative.

Mr. Starr: I have said time and time again, and the hon. member must know, that provision for 51,000 jobs is not a cure for unemployment. But we have announced other measures; we have announced the retraining of our unemployed people so that they may fill vacancies that now exist. We have announced an extended home building program; we have got the chartered banks to agree to making home improvement loans. Further, I want to repeat what the Prime Minister has said, namely that further projects are under study and will be announced as soon as decisions are reached. Certainly the winter works program is not a cure for the whole problem but it should help substantially.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I should like to ask the minister a further question and it is this: has this government given any thought to the problem of the slums, not as a big drive once in a while but as the object of a steady program of slum clearance? The slums grow and grow every day. In view of the unemployment situation has the government given any consideration to a clearance and rehabilitation program which will try to keep up with the growth of the slums on a national scale?

Mr. Starr: That is a matter which comes under the Department of Public Works. I must say at once that I am not acquainted with all that goes on in that department and its complete undertakings. My understanding is that a number of slum clearance schemes have been entered into with municipalities, but that is all I know.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Labour will, I am sure, regret what he said. I have attacked his policies vigorously; I have never attacked him personally as he has done tonight with one hon. member. As I said, we will not forget.

It is obvious from an examination of the record what was said on the day to which the minister directed our attention, May 23, 1960. He did not read the whole statement. In the paragraph above I was obviously dealing with the national situation because I said as reported at page 4134:

> I was saying that normally we would have had the unemployment statistics for the last available month given to us last Wednesday or Thursday.

Then I went on and said:

> The number of live claims reported in that area for April 30, 1960 was 714,000 as compared with 610,000 on April 30, 1959.

Now the population of New Brunswick is about 600,000 including men, women and children, those employed and those unemployed, and how anyone could draw the deduction as the Minister of Labour has done to the effect that I was saying this represented the total number of unemployed in that province is, of course, fantastic. I went on to say:

> If that is any indication, then whatever figures may be released later this week or later still, will be an indication that the situation continues to be serious.

It is obvious I was referring to the national figure. For the minister to suggest that I was trying to convey the impression that 714,000 as compared with 610,000 represented the unemployed or the applicants in that province is just too ridiculous to deserve any further mention.

Mr. Starr: I appreciate the hon. member pointing that out, but when he jumped into that last paragraph he did not start with the first sentence. He started with the second sentence. The first sentence reads as follows:

> In the Moncton Times of May 17, 1960 at page 14 I find these figures.

Now there are no figures at all and we find that the figures the hon. member quotes here—he continues—

> I presume the editor got his information by calling the local regional office.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Certainly.

Mr. Starr: I continue:

> The number of live claims reported in that area for April 30, 1960 was 714,000 as compared with 610,000 on April 3, 1959.

The record speaks for itself.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I just say to the minister that I hope he will not continue to make himself ridiculous. Does anyone deny that the local paper could call the local office and get the national figures? Does anyone suggest seriously that the figures for New Brunswick could be anything like that, when those are the national figures? I suggest to the Minister of Labour that by using the kind of argument he does now and as he did a moment ago he reveals a complete bankruptcy of policy with regard to unemployment.

Mr. Starr: It does not matter what the hon. member says about me personally—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I did not say anything about you personally.

Mr. Starr: I am just pointing out what the hon. member put on record in Hansard and led this house to believe. The hon. member had a copy of the Moncton Times on his desk a few minutes ago. He looked it up and did not find those figures and sent the copy away.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not a fact. Why does the minister persist in making statements which only reduce his stature.

Mr. Starr: I do not want to be reduced to the stature of the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If I was there I would do something about it.

Mr. Pearson: We have come to a sorry state of affairs if members of the house could be deceived by a statement which refers to 703,000 unemployed as applicable to a population as small as that of New Brunswick. If that is misleading hon. members they are, indeed, very easily misled.

But that is not what I got up to say. I wanted to repeat a point which I put to the minister a while ago. I have drawn attention to some of the difficulties and dangers of the unemployment situation which may face us this winter and in doing so I have tried to avoid what the hon. member for Greenwood rightly deprecated a few moments ago, namely the language of exaggeration. The figures that I gave indicate that there is in our view the likelihood of a situation which may well be as bad as that which prevailed last winter. I ask the minister whether he agrees that that is a reasonable analysis of what might happen in the employment field this winter in the light of the indices which are before us now?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I certainly hope the situation will be much better than it was in the last two winters.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister if he thinks his hopes are as well founded as the hopes he expressed to the Canadian people on "The Nation's Business" on February 4, 1960? I will place the hon. gentleman's words on the record and I think that all hon. members will judge the Minister of Labour by his own words and his own assessment made on February 4 this year over television to the Canadian people with respect to this situation. This is what the hon. gentleman said:

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Today, the recession is over and the rate of inflation is at the lowest point in many years, and well below the average rate for the whole century.

The policies we adopted and the measures introduced were effective in beating the recession and in keeping up a level of economic activity that provided more jobs for Canadians than at any time in our history.

Mr. MacInnis: Is that not all true?

Mr. Pickersgill: More and more people to have jobs?

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, Mr. Chairman, but perhaps the hon. member should address his question to the author of those words.

Mr. MacInnis: I should like to ask the hon. member if he is not referring to the very same minister he expressed the wish to have on his side not too long ago in this chamber?

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, yes, I think—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: —I think the hon. gentleman is right and I am not so sure the minister would not be a lot happier if he were on this side.

Mr. MacInnis: Certainly you would be. We are talking about your happiness.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. gentleman could contain himself, if I may quote the Minister of Justice, and make his speech a little later.

Mr. Pallett: The great interrupter objects to being interrupted.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, not very much. I do not think that hon. members can really say I have ever objected very much to being interrupted.

I should like to go on with what the Minister of Labour said in the assessment he gave on February 4, 1960 with respect to the economic situation and the labour picture because these words must be measured. This was a minister of the crown with access to all these secret documents that we are not allowed to see, although hon. gentlemen opposite do not mind exposing the secret documents of other hon. gentlemen, that being their idea of honour. They keep secret their own records but they attempt to distort, take out of context, tear off the covers of documents belonging to other people. A more shocking breach of constitutional practice never took place in the history of this parliament than the Prime Minister perpetrated on January 20, 1958, and there are some of us who will never forget that.

Mr. Aiken: You sure won't.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, we will never forget that example of the way in which the Prime Minister gets his temporary effects, and for the benefit of hon. gentlemen opposite, I underline the word "temporary".

Mr. Kucherepa: You have the date wrong. You are all confused.

Mr. Pickersgill: I go back to the minister's words. The minister was telling the Canadian people about the recession being over, about the rosy world in which we found ourselves in February of 1960. The hon. gentleman went on to say:

There is no defeatist attitude on the part of this government. We will take whatever measures are necessary—

But they will not tell parliament what they are, not even in August. I continue:

—in order that the expansion of our economy will continue and that we will move ever closer to the goal of full employment.

Look at the statistics month by month. There is only one way to describe the way in which we are moving closer to the goal as it has happened since the minister used those words, and that is by reference to Lewis Carroll's "Through the Looking Glass". I continue:

In the meantime, we will continue to take steps to alleviate the situation of those who, through no fault of their own are temporarily unable to establish themselves in the labour market.

I think that latter phrase is gobbledygook for "get a job". I continue:

There was never any room in this country for pessimism. There is less excuse today than ever before.

This was in February, 1960. I continue:

Wherever you look, the outlook is optimistic.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: The following words are extremely interesting:

More Canadians at work. Labour income on the rise. Exports up. Automobile production setting new records.

Mr. Starr: It has, too.

Mr. Pickersgill: I continue:

Canadians spending more and earning more.

Mr. McIntosh: That is right.

Mr. Pickersgill: Note these words:

Certainly in all this, no cause for alarm. There are many problems still to be faced. I would like to assure you of one thing. This government will continue to face up to the problems in the future as it has in the past.

That is exactly of what we are afraid. The government is facing up to the problems of the future exactly as it faced up to problems in the past. How does it face up to them? By turning its back on them and pretending they are not there as it does with this one. The minister went on to say:

We will meet these problems as we met the recession.

You see, it was over by then. I continue:

With the help and co-operation of the Canadian people, we will overcome the problems in the same way that the recession has been overcome.

There again, that is just what we are afraid of. We are afraid that the government is meeting this problem now in exactly the same way as it overcame the recession.

I assume that in making this assessment the minister was speaking honestly. I am not suggesting the contrary. I assume that the minister would not make this statement to the Canadian people without getting the advice of all the advisers of the government because that would have been a pretty dreadful thing to have done if he gave this kind of optimistic report and it was not justified by the advice he received from the economic advisers of the government. If the minister was so misled—so seriously misled—as recently as February of this year, what grounds has the minister for confidence that the hopes he just expressed to my hon. friend without giving any foundation for them—

Mr. Starr: May I interject now? As a Canadian I have the greatest confidence in the future of this country even though the hon. member seems to lack it.

Mr. Kucherepa: The hon. member lost his confidence on June 10, 1957.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, it is not that I lack confidence in the country. I lack confidence in this government, and I may say that that lack of confidence is shared every day by a growing proportion of the Canadian people. Evidence on every hand has shown this in the last few weeks. But the fact is that I am sure this country will survive this government as it survived the last Tory government. But why, sir, why do we have to suffer these things once in every generation?

Mr. Pearkes: Because you are so weak.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not a question I expect the minister to answer. That is a question I put to the Canadian people and I am confident how they will answer.

Mr. Bigg: Why not blow that through a pipe line?

Mr. Pickersgill: The question I do put to the minister, however, is the one put to him by the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Essex East. It is a question to which I think the elected representatives of the people are entitled to have a straight and careful answer. That question is this. What is the assessment made by the minister's officials and the other economic advisers of the government who presumably join together to advise this cabinet committee of which we were told—I presume they do not act in the dark—what is their considered joint advice as to the prospects for employment for the coming months and for the coming year?

Mr. Bourque: Mr. Chairman, last night in my argument I brought out the fact that on the basis of the 50 per cent that the government gives to municipalities for winter works programs a municipality would gain to the extent of approximately 8.70 per cent by doing a job in the winter instead of the summer. The government pays 50 per cent of the labour cost of any job and the minister told us the other day that labour represented 34 per cent in these jobs. I showed last night that municipalities would benefit to the extent of 8.70 per cent. Municipalities have to pay 5¾ per cent on their borrowings and very few municipalities are able to borrow money today at 5¾ per cent or at any cost.

At the end of 1958 the total outstanding debt of all the municipalities of Canada was $3,384,700,000. So far as taxes are concerned, the federal government collects 61.8 per cent of all taxes, the provincial governments 21.3 per cent and the municipalities 16.9 per cent. On the basis of these percentages it is practically impossible for any municipality to undertake any municipal works at the present time unless the federal government comes to its help. How can they undertake winter work programs under the 50 per cent plan when it will only give them an advantage of about 8.70 per cent and they have to borrow money at 5¾ per cent?

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely, Mr. Chairman, the minister is going to tell us what in the judgment of the government employment prospects for the next few months are. Maybe the minister cannot tell us what they are going to do about it because they cannot make up their minds. We know that they cannot decide anything, but surely the minister can at least tell us what he considers the problem to be or whether he thinks there is a problem. In February there was no problem, according to the minister, but surely now even the minister realizes, with the kind of figures we had for June, that there is a problem which is not going to fade away by itself. Surely he has enough respect for parliament to tell us what the considered assessment of the government is as to the magnitude of the problem.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I hope there is no question about my respect for parliament. I think it has been above reproach, but that has nothing to do with the question the hon. member asked. I want to say to him, if this is the information he thinks he requires, that I have had no indication from the economics branch as to what the employment picture looks like for the coming fall and winter.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Has the minister asked the economics branch what is their assessment of the future?

Mr. Starr: In certain discussions with them they have said it is too early to make a prediction yet.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the item carries, I see that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has just come into the house and I wonder whether I could ask the minister—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: —who is a member of the government and under whose department a very celebrated document is prepared annually, which the minister will well recall, if he can give us a brief summary of the views as to employment prospects that would have been contained in that document.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Ricard: Carried.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot says, "Carried". I would expect him, as the representative of a large industrial area, to join with the rest of us in trying to ascertain what are the prospects for employment in this country. The minister has said that the economics and research bureau has said it is too early to indicate what the situation will be in the future, but can the minister tell us what are the prognostications of the economics and research branch as to the situation for the balance of this summer and for the months of September, October and November.

Mr. Starr: Are you asking me?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course I am asking the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Starr: I have not received any report from that branch on the matter.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Has the minister sought to obtain a report for those months?

Mr. Starr: No, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

165. Economics and research branch including research grants and related expenses, $688,895.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, this is the vote for the economics and research branch. Last year the vote was $670,030 and the estimate for this year is $688,895, an increase of $18,865. Will the minister tell us why there is an increase?

Mr. Starr: Yes. Will the hon. member be patient for a moment until my officials arrive?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): While the officials are coming down perhaps I can lay the foundation for the question. The minister said a moment ago that he has not asked the officials of the research branch for an indication of what the unemployment picture is going to be in the future. He has said he has not asked them for an assessment of what the situation is going to be during the balance of this summer and for the months of September, October and November. Yet the Minister of Labour told us earlier tonight that the government was considering plans. How can the government consider plans for the future unless it has some indication of what the employment or unemployment prospects are? Surely the minister does not expect us to believe that there is such incompetence as is revealed in his answer to this question. Surely the Minister of Labour does not wish us to think that he has not ascertained from the research division what is their assessment of the picture in the next few months. If he has not, he has the officials in front of him now, and will they tell him so he can advise the committee before we pass this estimate?

Mr. Starr: Of the increase of $18,865, $14,000 is for salaries.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): New personnel?

Mr. Starr: No, general increases.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): How many people are in the research branch now?

Mr. Starr: There are 131 plus 5 seasonal.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There are 131 people in the research division of the Department of Labour and yet the minister says he does not know from his conversations with these officials what the prospects for employment are in the next five months. Is that the situation?

Mr. Starr: I am advised, as I have pointed out, that this is a very difficult situation to assess at this time, and any action taken by the government is being taken on the basis of the present situation and the experience we have had over the past two winters.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does my hon. friend think that the research officials of his department would find this situation more difficult to assess than the staff of the Bank of Canada, who have surveyed the situation for the foreseeable future? Do the research people in this particular branch disagree with the concern of the Bank of Canada, as stated by the governor in three different cities of this country within the last five months?

Mr. Starr: I am advised, and this bears out what I have said, that in their opinion this is a very difficult situation to assess. The same situation exists in the United States and to a greater degree at the moment. As a matter of fact, comparing the United States and Canada, 5.5 per cent of the labour force in the United States were unemployed in mid-June whereas in Canada the figure was 4.6 per cent. This is the dilemma with which the economists of the department are faced. There have been times in the past when their forecasts were out a great deal simply because of the difficult and conflicting matters that arose during the time of their assessments.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend has said it is a difficult problem. No one has questioned that. What my hon. friend does not hope, I am sure, is to have this committee believe that the research personnel in his department has not made an assessment of the situation for at least the next five months. My hon. friend has said that forecasts can sometimes be proved to be wrong. Of course, that is true. We are not asking whether they are right or wrong, we are asking whether they have made forecasts, and what those forecasts are. What policy is the government devising on the basis of those forecasts?

My hon. friend mentioned the United States. I wish he had gone on and pointed out that they have made forecasts there for the next year. My hon. friend might now tell the committee, if he is aware of the committee of the United States Senate, under the chairmanship of Senator Eugene McCarthy, which conducted an inquiry in most of the major cities of the United States with regard to unemployment, and which published a record of its hearings, published its assessment of the problem and its recommendations, for everyone to read. My hon. friend referred to the United States, as though seeking to imply that they have not made an analysis of the future. Let my hon. friend, if he has not got this analysis in his own department, and I can hardly credit that to be the fact, examine the analysis made in the United States. Surely from that, it ought to be possible for him to make a judgment, and having made this judgment determine policies based on it.

I should like to ask the minister how many economists there are in this particular division?

Mr. Starr: There are 43.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Forty three economists and yet my hon. friend wishes to stick to the statement he made that he cannot get from them any forecast for the next five months? Is that the situation?

Mr. Starr: That is the information with which I am supplied.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask—

Mr. Ricard: Carried.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot would like to help the minister get his estimates through I suggest that he stop these ejaculations when an hon. member seeks to get information.

I was going to ask the minister, when I was so politely interrupted, if he thinks it is more difficult for his staff, or for other economists to make forecasts now than it was in 1957?

Mr. Starr: I do not know why the hon. member refers to 1957. What happened then?

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask the minister if he thinks it is more difficult now to make forecasts of the employment prospects, more difficult in 1960 than it was in 1957?

Mr. Starr: I have not checked on that aspect. I did not anticipate a question of that kind.

Mr. Pickersgill: The reason I ask that question will be obvious to every hon. member in this committee. In 1958 the Prime Minister took an estimate a year old and blamed the previous government because he said that estimate showed clearly what was going to happen a year later. Of course, as everybody knows, that is utter rubbish, but that is what the Prime Minister said, and that is the grave indictment he made of the former government, that they had hidden the forecast made a year before.

Now the Minister of Labour tells us, practically in August, that it is too early to make a forecast of prospects for next winter. Whom do we believe, this minister or his great leader who said that the Liberal government knew a year ahead what was going to happen in 1958? This is the kind of thing that is destroying the confidence of the people in this administration. I do not believe the minister when he says that his staff has not made such a forecast. I, of course, accept his word if he says they have not given it to him, but I simply do not believe that even this government or the minister would allow a department to employ 43 economists and make no forecast of employment for the next year or the next winter. I just do not believe it at all.

[Mr. Starr.]

Mr. Starr: I am afraid the hon. member, Mr. Chairman, will have to accept my word for it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think I do. I accept the minister's word at once that he does not know; I accept that. But I say I do not believe that his officials have not made such a forecast. I am quite prepared to believe that the minister has not sought to get it, and is not seeking to get it. I do not believe it is hard to guess why, but I just do not believe that this government has as yet made the public service so incompetent and inefficient that this forecast has not been made, because if that is so I do not know what these public servants are being paid to do.

An hon. Member: You hired them.

Mr. Pickersgill: There have been additions, we have been told, to the staff. There have been changes in the staff. As a matter of fact, I think perhaps I made a mistake in not taking issue with whatever hon. gentleman said that we hired them. They were hired by the civil service commission in precisely the same way as public servants are hired now. We had no more to do with hiring them than hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches have now, unless hon. members occupying the treasury benches are behaving in a different way than we did, and I do not believe they are in this particular instance.

I do say we ought to know for what this money is being spent. We ought to know whether this forecast is being made, because after all I was a public servant for a good many years and I was a minister of the crown for some years, so I am not entirely ignorant of how the business of this country is conducted. I know quite well that unless the minister or someone on his behalf or someone on behalf of the Prime Minister has told these officials not to make such a forecast, that such a forecast exists.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister has told us the number of economists in the department. He has said that, notwithstanding this display of talent, he has not been able to ascertain from any of their studies, whether or not he can tell the committee what the prospects of employment and unemployment are in the next five months. My hon. friend from Bonavista-Twillingate has asked for a forecast for the next year. I do not dissociate myself from that request, but I am asking for a more limited one. I hope to get from the minister some enlightenment as to his understanding and appreciation of the situation. I think we are entitled to have this information, and perhaps by further interrogation, we may be able to get some declaration from the minister that will assist us in this matter.

The Minister of Labour heard today the prognostications made by the Leader of the Opposition, on the basis of reports prepared by competent individuals in voluntary and private organizations in this country. My hon. friend has no doubt read the reports of the Bank of Canada. My hon. friend, as a member of the government, surely knows the contents of the economic survey, the hidden report, prepared by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and divulged to this house by the Prime Minister in 1958. What do these reports indicate? Is the minister not in a position, on the basis of that information, if he cannot get it in his own department which I do not credit, to tell us on the basis of these other reports in other departments what is the situation? Is that the situation? I am asking the minister.

Mr. Starr: I do not know how many times I have to reiterate that I do not intend to go any further than I did originally by saying that there is no report for the next five months. It has not been brought to my attention, and I have been told that it is too early to make any forecast.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend has not answered my question. I did not ask him for reports of his department; I ask him to tell us what are the prospects, on the basis of information which he, as a member of the government, has from the Bank of Canada and from the Department of Trade and Commerce. I am asking the minister to give us that information. I am not asking him to table these reports because the government obviously does not want to do that although it did not hesitate to do so when there was a political advantage in so doing. I am asking the minister again to tell us whether, as Minister of Labour in this government, he can give us this information. If he refuses to give it, he warrants the criticism that we level against this government when we assert this government has no policy.

Will the minister deny that reports were prepared in the Department of Labour for the summer months during the years immediately prior to his coming into office? Will the minister say that he does not know that his predecessors were supplied by their economics research division with such reports? If that was the case—and I challenge the minister to deny that it was the case—then did the minister decide to cause that kind of a report or assessment to be discontinued? Does the minister know that such reports existed? If they existed, why were they cut off? This is the only conclusion we can draw from what the minister has just told the committee.

Mr. Starr: The hon. members know full well that reports come to the minister continually on a seasonal basis or whatever the case may be or however they may be necessary. Those reports were never made public. Those same reports come in to the minister and they are confidential reports. They were never revealed by the former minister who held the same portfolio as I hold nor do I intend to do so.

Mr. Pickersgill: Until the Prime Minister did it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We have made progress. The minister has now said that these reports exist but that they are confidential. That is at least something. I asked the minister this very question fully an hour and a half ago, and all that the minister did was to use language which indicated that these reports were not available.

Mr. Starr: Oh, no.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says no, but that is the situation and Hansard will clearly indicate it. What I am saying to the minister is this. I am not asking him to table these confidential documents. Under the procedures of this house we have no right to have them except there is a strong precedent, based upon the action of the Prime Minister in January of 1958. But now that the minister acknowledges at last that those reports are being prepared by the economics research division, whose vote we are now considering, I ask him to tell us what those reports indicate. What are their prognostications? Do they say that the kind of foreshadowing made today by the Leader of the Opposition is wrong? Are they exaggerated? Is the situation in the next ensuing period a pessimistic or an optimistic one? Surely the minister, now that he acknowledges that these reports exist, and now that we must presume that he has read them, cannot refrain from telling the committee what are the prospects and what are his views as to the situation in the next ensuing period. The minister cannot refuse now on the basis of past policy to give the house this information.

An hon. Member: Oh, yes, he can.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is a free parliament. The information my hon. friend is being asked for is something which the people of Canada have a right to know before we vote this particular estimate.

Mr. Starr: The only way in which reports can be confidential is if they are kept in confidence. If I revealed them to the hon. member they would not be confidential.

Mr. McMillan: The minister went on a television program last February and he made an optimistic report with regard to employment. Can he tell us whether that report was based on any reports from any economists in his department?

Mr. Starr: It was a report to the people from a person who has all confidence in the future of the Canadian economy. I always look with a great deal of optimism to the future of this great country.

Mr. Pickersgill: In other words, what the minister is now saying is that he did not have any basis for that statement except his own optimism. In other words, he went on the program "The Nation's Business" and he made this optimistic statement that the recession was over; that everything was rosy; that they had overcome all the problems or nearly all the problems; and that they would soon overcome the rest of them; and he had no basis for it except his own windy optimism. Is that what he is saying?

An hon. Member: Who is windy?

Mr. Pickersgill: That is the only interpretation that I can put on the minister's words. I am not going to ask the minister whether this particular official or that particular official gave him advice. The question which I asked him and which I repeat is this. Did the minister get a concensus of views from the economic advisers of the government before he went on television and, on his responsibility as a trustee of the people of Canada, told the people that the recession was over, that the outlook was optimistic and that we had no further cause to worry.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I am a member of a government that was elected with an overwhelming majority by the people of this country and I will perform my duties to the best of my ability.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is a new doctrine, Mr. Chairman. This is a new doctrine from the defenders of the rights of parliament. This is something new. They say, "We obtained a big majority, so the opposition have no right to any information".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: They say that the people of Canada do not need to be told what the facts are; that they do not need to be told the truth; that the advice of experts and professionals can be kept hidden from them; although advice a year old, because it was given to another government on a confidential basis, can be betrayed. That is the basis upon which the government operates, according to the minister, in conducting the affairs of this country. For a member of a government that was going to restore the rights of parliament, a government that was going to give to everyone in parliament an equal opportunity; that was going to uphold the rights of the opposition and the rights of the people to know how their affairs were being conducted, it seems to me that this is the most fantastic statement that we have yet heard from this fantastic government. It also seems to me that it is eleven o'clock.

Resolution adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Ricard: May I ask the house leader what the business is for tomorrow?

Mr. Pickersgill: I greatly appreciate the help of my parliamentary assistant, Mr. Speaker, but perhaps in all the circumstances I should ask the minister about this matter. I think he told us he would throw some light on next week's program this evening.

Mr. Churchill: We will carry on tomorrow with the estimates. If the Department of Labour is finished we will go on with defence. On Monday the chief legislative item to be considered is third reading of Bill No. C-58, an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code. If the committee on the bill of rights reports back to the committee, the bill of rights will be available for discussion on Monday. If there are any other items to be considered on Monday I will advise the house tomorrow.

Mr. Pickersgill: Did I understand the minister to say that when the Department of Labour was completed tomorrow we would begin with finance?

Mr. Churchill: No; defence.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sorry but I did not hear the minister.

Mr. Churchill: If I said finance, what I intended to say was defence.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is no doubt about it; it is defence?

Mr. Churchill: No, there is no doubt. The order is the same.

Mr. Ricard: I wish to thank the minister.

It being two minutes after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

[The following item was passed in committee of supply]:

Saturday, July 30, 1960

The house met at 11 a.m.

HUMAN RIGHTS

First report of special committee on human rights and fundamental freedoms—Mr. Spencer.

UNITED NATIONS

CONGO—ANNOUNCEMENT OF PROVISION OF CANADIAN SIGNALS PERSONNEL AND EQUIPMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the house has already been informed that the government has been giving consideration, in consultation with the secretary general, to the United Nations inquiry as to whether Canada would be in a position to provide signals personnel and equipment as part or in support of the United Nations force in performing their important role in the Congo. These consultations were necessary in order to ascertain in detail the requirements of the force commander and to relate them to facilities and personnel available in Canada.

I am now in a position to say that the government has decided to provide, subject to parliamentary approval of a resolution which will be placed on the order paper today, certain military forces, including equipment, for the following signals units: a signals detachment at United Nations headquarters in Leopoldville which will include a signals office, a message centre, 100-line switchboard and linemen and dispatch riders; five ground to air communication links; twelve mobile wireless detachments; eight cipher detachments, and a small headquarters for the command and administration of Canadian troops in the Congo. Preparatory action has been taken to provide for the formation of such new units within the services as may be required, the selection and immunization of soldiers, the concentration of troops and their equipment, and the movement of them by the most expeditious means, again subject to parliamentary approval of a resolution to that effect.

Since additional information is required on the tasks which the Canadian contingent will be asked to perform and on the conditions under which these tasks will be carried out, a reconnaissance party of six officers is being dispatched to the Congo immediately. It is due to leave Montreal this evening and to arrive in Leopoldville on August 1. In the meantime, awaiting parliamentary consideration, the members of the Canadian signals contingent are being selected and immunized against tropical diseases. Then immediate concentration within Canada will be provided for, and as I said a moment ago those chosen will be sent as soon as they are ready and transport becomes available.

The resolution in question will be placed on the order paper, as I say, and it will ask approval for participation of Canadian forces in the United Nations operations in the Congo. I think that is a step in keeping with traditional practice, and it is particularly important at this time that there be full recognition and acceptance by parliament of this step in the preparation and maintenance of a United Nations force. No more important or significant step has been taken in recent years than the one now being taken by the United Nations in the Congo, and the co-operation of those nations which it is believed are the most appropriate to make a contribution renders desirable full co-operation and anticipation of parliamentary approval.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister may be assured that in observing the traditions established in this house, certainly since the end of the first world war, that a project of this kind should be preceded by a resolution, he will find that such a resolution will be given strong support by the membership of this house. We recognize that in the turbulent days in which we live, the best way of maintaining order is by giving to the collective strength of the nations of the world, through the United Nations, the opportunity of making a contribution in the preservation of that order.

The Prime Minister has not indicated if Canada has been asked to supply more than the kind of forces he has outlined. To the extent, therefore, that we have been asked for these particular signals forces there will be general accord. The secretary general of the United Nations has stated that he envisages that this particular project of the United Nations in the Congo will not be of short duration, and that it may last for a period of as long as five years. In that event, it is to be anticipated that Canada will be asked to contribute more than specialized military forces, referred to in the statement of the Prime Minister.

I agree fully with what the Prime Minister has said, that this effort of the United Nations in which Canada will share to this limited extent at this time, represents the growing strength of the United Nations as an instrument for the preservation of peace. We have the precedent of the United Nations emergency force in the Middle East, an organism with which Canada has had so much to do. That precedent, backed up by the United Nations observation group in Lebanon and the presence of the United Nations in Jordan, is a precedent which has made possible the intervention of the United Nations in the Congo. Whether the United Nations military forces now in the Congo are para-military only, in the sense that the United Nations force in the Middle East is, or whether it is to be given greater power, is not yet clear. In any event, the Prime Minister may be assured that when this resolution comes before the house, it will receive the responsible consideration which its great objectives deserve.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): The members of this group endorse most heartily the announcement made by the Prime Minister concerning this contribution to the maintenance of peace in a troubled portion of the world. As a matter of fact we are delighted with this step being taken by the government, perhaps as a first step toward an even greater effort on the part of Canada in this direction.

We believe that Canada can best play an active role in the maintenance of peace by being ready on all occasions to supply to the limit of her capacity forces required by the United Nations in causes such as this.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NUCLEAR WARHEADS—INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS WITH U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of a sentence contained in the report of the defence committee which has just been made available to hon. members, to the effect that the Minister of National Defence expressed the opinion that arrangements now being negotiated, presumably with the United States, would make nuclear warheads available if and when required. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he could tell us what progress is being made in these negotiations.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I have nothing to add to what has already been said. I believe the defence estimates will shortly be before the committee of the whole house for consideration, at which time any inquiries can be made pertinent to this question. In the meantime, to make answers that are added upon answers cannot be of assistance.

UNITED NATIONS

CONGO—SUGGESTED OFFER OF CANADIAN INFANTRY BATTALION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question arising from his earlier announcement. Would the Prime Minister state whether in conversation with Prime Minister Lumumba today he will inform him that Canada is prepared to make either an English speaking or a French speaking battalion available for service in the Congo provided the request is received through the United Nations?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): This is a question very similar to the one which, I note from Hansard, was raised yesterday by the hon. member for Assiniboia. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated in his reply, any troops that are sent by Canada to the Congo will be under the authority of the United Nations, and there has been no suggestion by the United Nations that Canada should provide infantry units.

CONGO—REPORTED NEED FOR MEDICAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. It is reported in the press that the prime minister of the Congo will be requesting medical personnel and equipment from Canada. Can the Prime Minister make some statement on this matter?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not had the privilege yet of talking to Prime Minister Lumumba, but it is apparent from press reports that the field of his requests is not too greatly limited. I think the opportunity will come to the hon. gentleman to secure the fullest information in connection with this matter when the resolution is before the house next week respecting the United Nations force. I trust that at that time he will place his views before the house and obtain whatever information is then available.

DISARMAMENT—REPORTED U.S. SUGGESTION RESPECTING COMMISSION MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Can the Prime Minister say whether or not Canada has yet received a reply from Mr. Padillo Nervo, the chairman of the disarmament commission, regarding Canada's request for a meeting of the disarmament commission prior to the meeting of the general assembly of the United Nations.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I think that question may await the return of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He will be here on Monday.

FIRES

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE BY DEFENCE DEPARTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. C. Henderson (Cariboo): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister tell the house whether his department will be able to help fight the forest fires now raging in British Columbia.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Yesterday I received a request from the attorney general of the province of British Columbia for assistance in connection with various fires which are now raging so freely in British Columbia. I at once acceded to his request. Helicopters and aircraft have been dispatched from Vancouver, and other search and rescue aircraft are standing by for use if required. According to reports of the action which was taken yesterday, a number of fire fighters were rescued in the Kamloops area before the fires closed in on them. All holiday personnel have also been rescued from the lake area, Lac le Jeune, just south of Kamloops.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): A supplementary question. Is the minister prepared to supply infantry or ground troops if requested, where manpower is short in fighting some of these large fires in the Kootenays?

Mr. Pearkes: As the hon. member knows, such requests must come through the attorney general of the province. No such request for ground personnel has yet been received.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

SUGGESTED LACK OF PROTECTION FOR MAIL TRUCKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Postmaster General. In view of the fact that the Postmaster General seems to be unable to give adequate protection to mail carried by truck, is the hon. gentleman considering the advisability of getting out of the trucking business?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, every time we have a mail theft the hon. member for St. Denis returns to this house to ask a similar question. I am glad to welcome the hon. gentleman back after his long absence. To suggest that we are not able to give adequate protection to mail carried by trucks is, of course, to suggest something that is not true. The hon. gentleman might be aware of the fact, for example, that in the Montreal area alone this week there have been six bank robberies and holdups, and 17 such occurrences there since the beginning of June.

The only way of carrying the mail in large parts of Canada is by truck. We are doing that effectively and efficiently, giving it adequate protection. We are carrying it in a degree of safety which compares very well with the degree of safety that exists in relation to banks and other institutions in terms of robberies. We are going to continue carrying the mail by truck, extending it every reasonable protection.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The minister spoke of my absence from the House of Commons. The fact that robberies occur the minute after I return to this house indicates that I am not responsible for that kind of robbery.

Mr. Fulton: What kind are you responsible for?

Mr. Hees: Bank robberies?

Mr. Denis: I am wondering if the Postmaster General is working for the police. If he is I suggest that he look after the robberies in his own department instead of worrying about others.

INQUIRY AS TO DELIVERY OF CATTLE BY MAIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Postmaster General. According to a newspaper report, in England Jersey cows are being delivered by registered mail. Is the minister equipped to give Canada the same kind of service?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, neither Jersey cows nor the kind of bull in which the hon. member indulges are properly the concern of the Canadian Post Office Department.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO BOYCOTT OF SOUTH AFRICAN GOODS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister, in the light of a news announcement carried on the C.B.C. last night, whether the government is giving consideration to following the example of another commonwealth nation, namely Ghana, by ordering a boycott on all South African goods so as to express our disapproval of apartheid.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is certainly launching into a new field in a question of that kind. I had not heard of it being the responsibility of any of the ministers to order boycotts.

GRAIN

BAIE COMEAU, QUE.—EFFECT OF OPENING OF NEW ELEVATOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Following the recent opening of the 12 million bushel grain elevator at Baie Comeau, Quebec, on the north shore of the St. Lawrence river, can the minister outline what effect this new elevator capacity will have on the handling of this year's grain movement?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): This is a very important development indeed, and I think congratulations are due to the Cargill Grain Company Limited of Winnipeg for their enterprise in having this elevator erected and in operation so early. It is only about a year and a half since they started their building operations. The fact is that this elevator will provide extra storage for Canadian grain and will add at least 7 million bushels of storage capacity. During the course of next winter we shall see what effect it has on the shipment of Canadian grain. It is expected that they will be able to ship the year around, and this will be of advantage.

It is important to note that United States grain may use this particular elevator, as has been the custom with other elevators on the eastern seaboard and in the St. Lawrence region. The arrangements made by the board of grain commissioners with the Cargill company are to the effect that 60 per cent of the storage capacity of this elevator shall be available for Canadian grain.

[Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace).]

FINANCE

"CANADIAN ECONOMIC OUTLOOK FOR 1960"—REQUEST FOR TABLING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): In order to assist the committee of supply in considering the unemployment problem, will the Minister of Trade and Commerce table the "Canadian Economic Outlook for 1960"?

Mr. Speaker: If I am not mistaken, an order of the house was made with regard to this matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: There was an order with respect to the volume for 1959, sir. Is the minister going to give an answer?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is asking for the tabling of a confidential report, and last evening the hon. member for Essex East said that this was contrary to the usages of parliament. I think perhaps we shall not do it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister recall an exalted precedent?

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

CONGO—INQUIRY AS TO PROVISION OF UNIVERSITY SCHOLARSHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct another question to the Prime Minister. In view of the C.B.C. report of yesterday evening to the effect that Prime Minister Lumumba has already received offers from foreign countries to make 300 university scholarships available to Congolese students starting this September, and in view of the fact that Canada is ideally situated to help in this matter because of its four French-speaking universities, will the Prime Minister state how many university scholarships Canada will make available to French speaking Congolese students this fall?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman will agree that the question is somewhat premature. Any requests of this nature that might be put forward have to be related to Canada's other commitments under the various scholarship schemes now in effect. As the house knows, we have embarked upon a wide scholarship scheme, particularly since the commonwealth trade and economic conference of 1958. Having regard to the position in which the universities find themselves, this is a matter that will have to be given the most complete consideration by the universities, and also on the basis of our other commitments.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

VANCOUVER—REQUEST TO EXPEDITE PLANNING OF NEW BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Taylor (Vancouver-Burrard): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour if he would consult with his colleagues in order to expedite the planning and construction this winter of the much needed dominion public building in the Mount Pleasant area of Vancouver.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I realize the necessity for this accommodation in Vancouver, and I wish to assure the hon. member that this project will get my fullest support.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF LETTER FROM SOVIET PREMIER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I have one more question for the Prime Minister, and then I shall subside. This matter was just brought to my attention this morning. Has the Prime Minister received a reply to his letter of June 30 to Mr. Khrushchev? If so, would he consider requesting the consent of the house to having it published as an appendix to Hansard? The suggestion was made to me that it would be informative to the Canadian people who are interested in this matter.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The original letter and reply were tabled, and I think it would be simply cluttering up Hansard to add from week to week further letters from Mr. Khrushchev which are merely a continuation of his alibi for having assured the discontinuance of the disarmament conference. In any event, I think the U.S.S.R. embassy has made available to a great many Canadians that reply, the last in a series of alibis.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

165. Economics and research branch including research grants and related expenses, $688,895.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I was in the midst of making some observations at the time the committee rose at eleven o'clock last night. I think I could complete them very briefly. Perhaps, however, in order to preserve the continuity it might be worth while to recall to the minds of hon. members precisely what it was that was being discussed at that time.

What was being discussed was the question raised by the Leader of the Opposition as to whether the Minister of Labour was prepared to give to this committee a comprehensive appreciation of the prospects for employment over the next few months and the coming winter. In the course of that discussion the minister told my hon. friend from Essex East that he considered it was too early to make any such forecast. I believe that was the position taken by the minister, that at the beginning of August it was too early to make any forecast as to what the employment situation is likely to be. We realize that forecasts are only forecasts, but what is the position likely to be in the coming winter?

I stated, and I want to repeat it, sir, that I believe such a forecast already exists, unless the minister or the Prime Minister or someone on their behalf has told this branch of the minister's department not to make it. We know from past experience when we were in office that forecasts of this character were made, and were certainly made this early in the year. We know also that the government is very anxious to keep secret now what the Prime Minister was not so anxious to keep secret when he could get a cheap political advantage out of it two years ago. We know from the refusal of the Minister of Trade and Commerce this morning that the forecast made in his department is not available to the house or to the Canadian people, though there can be no doubt it exists unless that one, too, has been cut out by this government because it is afraid to have such forecasts made.

The plain fact is that this government has done everything in its power, throughout the whole of the year 1960, to stop any flow of information to the Canadian people about economic and employment prospects for the coming year, except the optimistic statements made by the Minister of Labour last February and those made by the Prime Minister in March on television, which apparently were backed up by nothing beyond their reading of the stars. At least we have not been told what they were backed up by.

Then the minister, in order to reinforce his position, to reinforce this new constitutional position, this new respect for parliament, this new consideration for the rights of people, said last night when he was being pressed:

Mr. Chairman, I am a member of a government that was elected with an overwhelming majority by the people of this country and I will perform my duties to the best of my ability.

In other words, this minister apparently does not consider it necessary to have any advice. He has the backing, or he said he had two years ago, of the overwhelming majority of the Canadian people, so he can do what he pleases without consulting anyone, without telling the House of Commons what he is proposing to do, without taking the people into his confidence. In other words, "We have a majority, so whatever we like to do we do not need to bother explaining to you". This is the new doctrine of the Conservative party. It is not really a new doctrine, because it sounds very much like—

An hon. Member: An old Liberal one.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest that the hon. gentleman go a little farther back into history. This is exactly the same attitude that was taken by Mr. Bennett when he was prime minister between 1930 and 1935. It is a typical Tory attitude. I challenge any hon. member to show, in the whole of the period when Hon. Milton Gregg was minister of labour in this country, that he ever took any such attitude or ever refused to give parliament any information that was available in his department.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the hon. member say I was wrong if I told him I have a strong recollection of Mr. St. Laurent taking exactly that position on a certain occasion?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not the position taken by this government with regard to the economic survey.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Greenwood asked me a question which I think was really a declaration, but I take no exception whatever to his declaration. His recollection was that he remembered some occasion when Mr. St. Laurent had taken a similar position. I do not happen to recall it, but I should not like to quarrel with the hon. gentleman. However, I should like to see the particulars. There are, of course, many communications that come to the Department of External Affairs and to the other departments of government which every government might properly keep confidential. But surely the estimate of the prospects of employment does not fall into this category; or if it does, what are they afraid of? If it does, what is it that concerns them?

This is something that it is hard indeed for me to answer. I admit that a forecast made by a civil servant for the guidance of ministers, such as the "Economic Outlook for 1957" which was tabled in this house by the Prime Minister on January 20, 1958 or a document of that sort should not be made public. I make that admission at once. What was that document for? That document was not for any other purpose than to assist ministers in working out policies; and to ensure that ministers would get the utmost frankness in the advice that was given to them and to protect the validity of the forecasts themselves it is necessary to protect the anonymous public servants who prepared such forecasts. It seems to me that is a reasonable position to take, particularly in the whole economic realm where such forecasts could easily have the effect, if they were published prematurely, of influencing the economic climate in a way that might be adverse to the national interest.

If the Minister of Labour is arguing that to give a forecast of employment for next winter is going to influence the level of employment next winter, I wish he would make that argument. If he wants to make that argument I am sure that we would listen to it with great interest and would consider carefully what there was in it. As for myself, at first blush I do not see how it could have any such effect. However, if the minister feels that it is in the national interest to conceal any official forecast of this kind or to hide it, in the light of the speech made by the Prime Minister on January 20, 1958—which speech presumably set the tone for the present government—I think the minister would need to do a great deal of explaining in order to clarify that situation.

But if he has no such explanation, and if the only reason he is hiding this forecast is that it is a gloomy report, as I suspect is unhappily the case, may I say this. If the only reason he is hiding it is that he knows this government has no policy, has no measures by means of which to cope with this situation, then I say he is derelict in his duty to the Canadian people and is not showing for parliament the regard that this government promised the people of Canada it would have when it obtained its mandate two years ago.

The Chairman: Shall item 165 carry?

Mr. Pearson: Is the minister going to say anything in reply to what my hon. friend has just said?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, the same questions were asked yesterday. I have nothing further to add to what I said yesterday in respect of these matters.

Mr. Pearson: This is a strangely negative attitude for a minister to take to our efforts to get information as to what the employment situation or the unemployment situation is likely to be in the coming winter and what the government is planning to do about it. We are now approaching August.

The winter period will be on us before long. We have been told that there are 43 economists in this branch of the Department of Labour whose job presumably—and I am sure they are highly qualified—is to give the minister advice on the economic outlook and particularly on the employment outlook. Yet the minister tells us that notwithstanding these 43 economists and the advice which they no doubt are giving him and the work in which they are no doubt engaged, it is too early to make any forecast, based on that advice, as to what the situation is likely to be in the autumn and winter. Surely that is a terrible reflection on the lack of planning in the government at the present time in respect of this vital problem of employment.

We were told last night that there is a cabinet committee under the chairmanship of the Associate Minister of National Defence working on this problem. Surely they must have before them some information on which they can make their reports, some information perhaps produced for them by, among other sources, these 43 economists that we are now talking about. What kind of situation is this cabinet committee planning to meet this winter? What kind of situation are the minister and his department planning to meet? All the minister told us last night was that it was going to be extremely difficult to figure out what kind of situation he will be obliged to meet. We are in August or are about to be in August, and all we learn about the situation that may confront us this winter is that it is going to be extremely difficult to find out what that situation is going to be.

That is a shocking basis, Mr. Chairman, for any kind of planning to meet the situation. With great respect I suggest to the minister that he owes it to this committee to tell us more than he has told us. As a matter of fact he has told us nothing.

The Chairman: Shall item 165 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, Mr. Chairman. Does the minister intend to reply to what the Leader of the Opposition has asked?

Mr. Starr: If the hon. member had been listening he would know that I did reply to the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): With due respect, may I say that I do not think the reply of the minister deserves the designation of a reply. He did not address himself at all to the point made by the Leader of the Opposition. Certainly he did not touch on what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate insisted should be revealed to this committee. If the minister does not wish to tell us about the assessment made by his own officials in this division, may I ask whether he will tell us what is the assessment of other departments of government with regard to the prospects for employment in the next ensuing period.

I asked the Minister of Labour a question. Does he propose to sit there and not reply? In that event, does he expect us to pass this item?

An hon. Member: Who are you?

Mr. Cardiff: I am getting sick of this.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And the people of Canada are sick of the inactivity of this government.

Mr. Starr: I said yesterday, Mr. Chairman, that confidential reports can only be confidential if they are kept in that category.

Mr. Pickersgill: I said yesterday, and I intend to repeat it, that this is not the basis on which this government obtained a mandate from the people. This is not the basis on which they advertised. Everybody in this house who was here remembers what happened, and those who do not remember know about what happened. I refer to the disgraceful public performance of the Prime Minister on January 20, 1958; the shocking performance of the Prime Minister.

An hon. Member: It shocked you.

Mr. Pickersgill: It certainly did shock me, because I did not believe that any man who carried on a performance of that kind would ever get support for it from anybody.

An hon. Member: A comedian.

Mr. Valade: You are a good comedian yourself.

Mr. Pickersgill: By saying "yourself" does the hon. gentleman suggest that he means the Prime Minister is a good comedian?

Mr. Valade: I meant the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman had better be less ambiguous next time if his remark is not to be taken as applying to his leader.

Mr. Valade: Everybody knew what that was about.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member says that everybody knew what that was about. I will tell you what it was about. That document was a forecast of the economic climate for the year 1957, made in the month of March, 1957. That is what it was. It was made in March, and from March until the following

January is ten months. I ask you to follow this argument, Mr. Chairman. Ten months later the Prime Minister came along with that forecast and said the Liberals knew what was going to happen and they hid it from the people. Here we are at the beginning of August, and it will be only six months until February 1. It will be only ten months until next summer. Yet the Minister of Labour, the follower of a leader who says that the Liberals knew ten months previously what was going to happen in the winter of 1957-58, says he does not know now what will happen. He has not anyone who can tell him. This government does not know. It is too early to make any forecast. Whom do you believe? Do you believe the Prime Minister in that performance he put on in January of 1958, or do you believe the Minister of Labour today?

I also ask, when did this doctrine of confidentiality which the minister is relying on so much become a principle of this government? The Prime Minister saw fit, for political purposes, for partisan purposes—I would go further; in an attempt to mislead the people of this country—to use a document which belonged to the previous government and which he had no constitutional right to make public at all. It was a performance which I do not think would have happened in any other British parliament anywhere in the world, and I did not expect it to happen here.

Mr. Martineau: On a point of order, I do not think this comes under the purview of the labour estimates.

Mr. Pickersgill: On the point of order raised by the hon. member, I am seeking to show that the government is now, with respect to the very subject of unemployment, refusing to do what the Prime Minister did on January 20, 1958.

Mr. Aiken: Will the hon. member permit a question; I think he wants to be fair. Is it not a fact that what the Prime Minister complained about in 1958 was not that the reports which had been given to the government were not revealed, but that in addition the former government gave the people the opposite impression of what the reports actually were?

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not remember whether the hon. member was here but that does not happen to be true. We were said to have hidden it. Do you not remember?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: That was the main point made by the Prime Minister; "they hid it". It was the hiding that the Prime Minister made the biggest fuss about, and the Prime Minister said it took him six months to find it. That, of course, is a statement about which I think the less I say the better, because anything I did say would be unparliamentary. But I do say that a prime minister who took six months after he came into office to find a document which was in the files of every department of government did not know very much about the job he had undertaken. I also say that a prime minister who was so incompetent and so unobservant that after six months he could not see for himself what were the facts, but had to rely on a document prepared in the previous March to find out what the facts were in December and January is not fit to be Prime Minister of this country.

The plain fact is that the Prime Minister told the federal-provincial conference in November 1957 and the Minister of Labour told a meeting in Montreal in December 1957 that the unemployment problem was not serious.

Mr. Pearson: We were over the hill.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes. Then when they had to face the facts in January this shocking performance was trumped up in this house. Now we are having another shocking performance. We are having a minister of the crown saying, "We have such a huge majority that we do not have to account to the representatives of the people in parliament". If that is the kind of government it is, I suppose we are in a minority and there is no way that we can force them to give the facts to the people.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the situation about the early hidden report is so well known it hardly needs to be repeated. The Prime Minister took the confidential report, tore off the page marked "confidential", selected certain passages from it for partisan purposes, and that was that. We are asking the minister if he will give us some information which bears on the unemployment situation from those reports which have been made to him. We are not asking the minister to bring in the reports if they are confidential, or to quote from them; we are asking him to give the committee some information which will help us to establish the seriousness of this problem which must have been brought to his attention by some of these economists who are making reports to the government.

Mr. MacInnis: Would the hon. member permit a question? Did I understand him to charge the Prime Minister with tearing off the cover of a confidential report and then use it as otherwise?

Mr. Pearson: That is exactly what I said, and it has been stated more than once in this house.

Mr. MacInnis: It was never stated in this house while the Prime Minister was here.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, over and over again.

Mr. Pearson: Just read the record and you will find out what happened. If the minister is unwilling to say anything at all about that, I wonder if he would care to comment on a report, which is not official but which is authoritative and which he must have read, entitled "Labour research, January-April 1960", published by the research department of the Canadian Labour Congress, which gives a very worrying view of our economy in terms of employment and which supports that view by statistics from official sources. I have studied this report, and I am sure the minister has studied it, and I wonder if he would care to state whether he feels that the prognostications made in this report as to the kind of situation we are likely to face this winter are reasonable, and whether this particular report might serve as the basis for the kind of planning required to meet this situation.

Mr. Starr: I read that report some weeks ago. I am unable to state every particular contained in the report at the moment, but I have found this; that if you have five reports from five economists about what may happen in the future or the very near future, in most cases you will find you have three, four or five different viewpoints.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the minister whether, since the discussion last night, he has had an opportunity, or has taken the opportunity, to discuss with the director of this economic research division or any of its personnel the questions put to him by hon. members last night. The minister has finally acknowledged that there was a confidential report made to him; and now having ascertained that fact may we ask, will the minister tell us whether or not, as a result of efforts made between eleven o'clock last night and eleven o'clock this morning, he has been able to get information which this committee requires, before we can properly pass this particular estimate?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, yesterday I said that any forecasts for the coming winter months could not be made until some time toward the end of August. This is true, and no report has been given me because of that circumstance.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If the minister has been given no report by his officials on this matter, something which is hard to credit, has he examined the reports of the Bank of Canada and the reports supplied to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, which clearly indicate that forecasts are made for other departments of the government; and what is the minister's estimate and judgment of those assessments?

Mr. Starr: I endeavour to read all the reports which are available in order to assess in my own mind what the situation may be, but based on the experience in the past two winters, and based on the present situation it is evident that this government views the situation as serious, because of the measures that are being taken and other measures that are to be taken to deal with it.

Mr. Pearson: If the reports from the minister's own economic division on the situation which may confront us this winter in terms of unemployment are not available until the end of August, then on the basis of what information is the cabinet committee on unemployment, headed by the Associate Minister of National Defence, operating? Where does that committee get its basis of information?

Mr. Starr: Hon. members of the opposition have given us the basis of the information. They say there are reports available, a Bank of Canada report and other reports.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Just before the Leader of the Opposition spoke the minister made an admission that we have been asking him to make for some hours. He said—and he will correct me if I interpret him wrongly —that the government, after examining the reports which have been made, regards the situation in the immediate future as serious.

Mr. Starr: Based on past experience we say that unemployment is a serious situation, and as long as unemployment exists it is always a serious situation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We are not talking about what is in existence. We are talking about what the situation is likely to be in the immediate future. I understood the minister to say that the government regards the situation in the ensuing period as serious. If that is a correct statement, and I understood the minister to say that, I regard it as an advance on the position the minister has taken thus far in this debate.

Mr. Starr: I can correct that right away. I said that based on our experience in the past two or three winters and on the present situation as it exists at the moment, this government regards unemployment as a serious situation and has taken the lead in a number of projects, and others will be undertaken in the future.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Quite. As I say, that statement, confirmed by the minister, advances us considerably.

The minister said in reply to a question put by the Leader of the Opposition that he would not have any estimate until the end of August. I ask him the following question. Is it not a fact that his predecessor was supplied with a report for the summer period? Is it not a fact that his predecessor was supplied with a report prepared in the month of May, forecasting the employment situation in the summer period? If that is a fact, and I assert it to be a fact, has the minister discontinued that practice? If he has not discontinued the making of such a quarterly report, will he then explain to the committee how it is he cannot give us any estimate on the situation during the summer until the summer is over, namely, as he said, until the end of August?

Mr. Starr: No practice has been discontinued, as I said yesterday in the debate. I must remind the hon. member that these reports are confidential.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister keeps saying that they are confidential, and he would not make a confidential report available. But as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has pointed out, this government did not regard confidential documents as being confidential and as not capable of being produced in this chamber. That is the position.

Mr. Creaghan: After they are outdated.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member says "After they are outdated". All he and his friends have to do is read the remarks made by the Prime Minister in 1958 and note what he had to say about a confidential document which he used to his advantage at that time but which, since that time, this government has refused to give to the house.

We are not asking for confidential documents to be produced. We are saying that this government has created a precedent for itself, and it would not be difficult on this account for the government to make such documents available. But since the government takes the position it does, we are asking that the Minister of Labour, at a time when we are discussing if we should pass these estimates, should simply tell us in general terms what recommendations and what assessments are made by the officials with regard to the future so that we in this parliament may determine if the provisions the government has in mind are adequate. We are not asking for something which is unreasonable. This persistent refusal on the part of the Minister of Labour to give us this information can only result in one conclusion, and that is that this government has no policy whatsoever to meet unemployment.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hon. members say "oh". Let them deny that there is anything lacking in the logic of my conclusion. The hon. member who is interjecting now is a respected and responsible member, and I am sure he cannot deny the logic of what I am saying. Either I am right or parliament as we understand it does not exist in this country.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): An hon. member says "nonsense". I understand parliament to be a place where the elected representatives of the people have the right to ask from those entrusted with the responsibility of government information which will justify voting of moneys asked for by Her Majesty's government. That is the constitutional position. We have had from the Minister of Labour in response to our request a refusal to give information which it is an inherent right of this parliament to receive, and if the minister persists in refusing to give this information then it is our responsibility to determine whether we shall let these estimates pass. That is our responsibility, and it is a grave decision to make, but it is a decision we have to make if our democratic practices mean anything.

Mr. MacInnis: Does that mean you are going to ask for a cut in them?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member who comes from a labour constituency, should be the first to rise and support what I am saying. The hon. member comes from what is a depressed area, notwithstanding his denial of that fact last night. The hon. member comes from a constituency where last winter thousands of men were out of work; over 6,000, as my hon. friend reminds me. I come from a constituency where there are now between 6,000 and 8,000 unemployed, and it is because of this that I feel I have a duty in this committee to elicit from the Minister of Labour whatever information he can give us in order to determine what can be done in this country to meet this problem. Surely that is not unfair. Surely that is not asking the government or the minister anything that is improper. If the Minister of Labour says this situation is an extremely complicated one, and the government cannot be expected to have all the solutions to this problem—

Mr. Bigg: You never did.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member says that we never did. Well, we never had the problem.

Mr. Bigg: Well, I know all about the problem, and from 1935 to 1939 the boys were walking the streets—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, the hon. member is right; from 1930 to 1935 thousands of people did walk the streets—

An hon. Member: He said 1939.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What I am saying is this—

An hon. Member: Take your time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hon. gentlemen may make it difficult for this discussion to continue if they wish. They may cause delay but it will not make any difference, because we propose to discuss these estimates until we feel we have discharged our responsibility. There is no doubt about that. We can stay here for a long time.

Mr. Speakman: So can we.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Apparently that is what we are going to do, because we are going to get answers to these questions or we are going to know why.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Don't be so pompous.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I ask the Minister of Labour if he will tell us that the problem is such that it is unfair to expect the government to provide solutions. Then that becomes a matter for argument. But that is not what the minister says. The minister just refuses to make any statement. He refuses to make any declaration other than the fact that this is a confidential report.

I ask the minister to reconsider that answer in the light of this discussion. If the minister will give us a statement based on what he believes are the realities; if he excuses the administration from responsibility and gives valid arguments for this, there can be no criticism of that position, other than to point out, if that is the situation, that he government will not be regarded as having realized its assurances to the Canadian people. But the simple issue now is whether or not parliament is entitled to receive this basic information.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, it is obvious from the discussion which took place last night in the hour and a half before we adjourned at eleven o'clock, and from what has been said thus far in our sitting today, that it is not the intention of the Minister of Labour to file any reports or information he has received, because as he has reiterated time after time they are confidential documents. In view of that fact we cannot help but wonder if he could not make that information available by following the precedent established by the Prime Minister in tearing off the front page of the document. It was on that basis that we got the information before, so how about tearing off the front page again?

Mr. Speakman: I should like to ask the hon. member a question, Mr. Chairman. Can the hon. member prove that?

Mr. Winch: You will find it in Hansard.

Mr. Lambert: You will find many false statements in Hansard.

Mr. Winch: You will find there was no front page.

Mr. Lambert: And who tore it off?

Mr. Winch: We do not know who tore it off.

Mr. Lambert: You said it was the Prime Minister.

Mr. Winch: It must have been some member of the government, because no hon. member of the opposition could have torn it off.

Mr. Lambert: How could you know? How do you know what transpired in the six months of its existence prior to its being brought into this chamber? How do you know whether the cover was on or off?

Mr. Winch: I do not know about that. I only know that when it was brought in the cover had been removed, and if it was a good precedent then it is good now.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I suggest that what is happening at this moment indicates that we are discussing matters which are quite irrelevant to the estimates of the Department of Labour. This has been obvious, I think, for some little time in the light of the remarks made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Essex East. We can see now where this type of discussion is leading. It is a discussion of something that happened in another parliament in connection with the Prime Minister and a report issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce. This has no bearing whatever on the item that is now before us concerning the economics and research branch of the Department of Labour. I most respectfully suggest that all this discussion is completely irrelevant, and that hon. members should turn their attention to discussion of the item before us.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I hope you will not accept this invitation of the minister to close off this discussion of the economic situation in this country and our desire to get information from the department most concerned about that situation, the Department of Labour.

Mr. Lambert: Even if you seek to get it by means of irrelevant discussion.

Mr. Winch: I do not think I am irrelevant, but if I am let me say that I would rather be irrelevant than irresponsible.

Mr. Bigg: The hon. member succeeds in being both.

Mr. Winch: The item we are now discussing relates to the economics and research branch. That has to do with all matters relevant to labour and therefore all matters relevant to employment and unemployment. If discussions in previous parliaments under the present government and the present Prime Minister have established that this question of advice to the government could be discussed, it is just as relevant today as it was then. Because of the irresponsibility of the government it seeks to use these things for its own political expediency, denying information to parliament except when the government wants parliament to have the information. If there is any irrelevancy and irresponsibility it has been demonstrated on the other side.

Apparently today we are to be denied that information, with the cover on or off. That being the case, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour if he will comment with respect to a statement made at the end of April by such outstanding men as Mr. David Mansur, real estate consultant, Mr. W. H. Evans, president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, and Mr. James Coyne of the Bank of Canada as reported in the Star. On the basis of a survey taken, these three men have said that next fall will witness a turndown in the economy, and next winter will see unemployment worse than last year and indeed it will equal the postwar peak of unemployment.

These men are all good Canadians. I mention that because the minister told us last evening on three occasions that he was a good Canadian. I do not doubt that for a moment. In fact I do not doubt that all hon. members of this committee are good Canadians who look forward to a great future for Canada.

In view of the statement made by these good Canadians will the minister tell us if he agrees with their analysis? If he does not, how and why does he disagree? If there is any agreement at all, what in the view of the minister will be done to meet the situation? What is being done about it now?

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I can only reiterate what I said in response to the same question earlier. It is quite evident that the government are concerned about the situation. We have expanded our effort, are contributing to the training of unemployed workers on a higher scale of cost to the federal government, and the Prime Minister has said that other projects are under consideration. One has to have respect for the opinions of these people but based on our own experience in the past two winters and based on the present situation as indicated by the studies of the dominion bureau of statistics, it is surely quite evident that the government is taking steps to see that the situation does not worsen in the coming months.

Mr. Winch: I think everyone here will commend the government for all the steps that have been announced. There is no question of that. But I should like to put this question to the minister. He quoted three times last night a statement of the Prime Minister—I forget the exact wording—that new consideration is being given to the matter and at the appropriate time other policies may be announced. In view of the fact that we are now very close to August, will the minister inform us why, on the basis of information they must have within the department, within the government and outside, it is the policy to withhold announcements until parliament is no longer sitting. I expect we shall not be sitting more than another week—

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winch: I gather some hon. members want to go home. I do, too. I have been home only six days this year. I would like to get home, but I am staying here until this house has concluded its business and prorogued, because that is the job for which I was elected.

Mr. Johnson: So are we.

Mr. Winch: Quite a number have left already. In view of the present serious situation, and what looks like a worsening one, why are announcements not made by the government while parliament is in session and can deal with government policy?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, with respect to those matters on which decisions have been arrived at, the decisions have been announced in this House of Commons. I refer to such matters as housing, municipal winter works programs, training for unemployed workers, home improvement loans and so forth. With respect to all those things and which decisions have been arrived at, announcements have been made. There are other matters with respect to which decisions have not yet been arrived at, and we are doing everything possible to expedite them as much as we can.

Mr. Winch: How are they going to be financed; by treasury board order? Because you will not have the authority of the estimates. We would like the minister to have authority for whatever is required to take care of the situation.

Mr. Starr: I am not the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, surely we had the right to expect, when the minister's estimates are brought before the house in the closing days, we hope, of the session, that the minister would give us a comprehensive analysis of the economic and employment situation in this country, and a comprehensive statement before parliament broke up of what the government was going to do about it, because once parliament is not in session it is more difficult. And, if the situation does worsen, it might even require parliament to be reconvened.

We have not had that. The minister said a few moments ago that the government is going to do everything it can to prevent the situation from worsening. He has not been able to give us much evidence of what has been done, but the government is going to do everything it can to prevent the situation from worsening. Naturally we would support any move that the government can or will make to that end but, Mr. Chairman, the situation has already worsened when compared with what it was at this time last year.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is as bad as it was in 1958.

Mr. Pearson: Last night the minister told the committee—and I quote from Hansard at page 7254—in answer to a question of mine:

> Mr. Chairman, I certainly hope the situation will be much better than it was in the last two winters.

I was talking about the unemployment situation during the winter time. On what does the minister base that hope? This morning he has told us that the situation is serious in terms of unemployment, and it certainly is likely to get more serious as the autumn and winter approach. He said this morning—and we all hope, of course, that the situation will be much better this winter than it was during the last two—that the situation will be much better this winter. I should like to know whether the minister can tell us on what he bases this hope. There must be something in his mind which justifies this somewhat optimistic conclusion, at least an optimistic hope, that while the situation is serious—and I know it is more serious than it was this time last year—nevertheless he hopes it will be much better than it was during the last two winters. That is the short run position and the problem we must cope with at the present time is the short run problem.

While I am on my feet I should like to remind the minister, if he needs any reminder, that the long range problem is just as serious, just as complicated and just as difficult. During the decade 1950 to 1960 one million jobs were added to the economy of this country. During the decade 1960 to 1970, if this country is to approach or maintain anything like full employment, we shall need two million jobs. Now, we have the short run situation, which is serious. We have the long run situation, which is serious. In so far as the former is concerned the minister hopes it will be much better than it was during the last two winters. Can he give us some information on which we can share that hope with him?

Mr. Starr: It is quite obvious, Mr. Chairman. I am hoping that with the measures I have already announced and with the measures which we shall undertake, we shall alleviate the situation this winter and it will be much better than it was. It is on that that I base my hope, and I have every right to do so.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It seems to me that the hon. member for Vancouver East has put a very important question. The minister says he is satisfied, that if we have an unemployment situation comparable to last winter, the program of the government will be capable of providing jobs for all who need jobs. The minister will certainly agree that he is straining logic when he makes that statement, because all that the winter works program was able to provide was some 51,000 jobs. The government through the minister is not serious when it suggests that the three measures that represent its present program are capable of providing work for the numbers who have been out of work during the past winter.

That being so, what is the answer to the question put by the hon. member for Vancouver East? If in the month of September or October the number of unemployed rises to the level of the corresponding period last year, what program will the government resort to in order to provide jobs for those people who are out of work, recognizing that the present program, on the basis of the experience of the last two years, has not been able to provide a substantial number of jobs?

The government has said it is considering other plans. When are those plans to be put forward? When are the programs based on those plans to be realized? Are we to wait until next winter? Is that the situation? If that is the situation, the minister can tell us. But what is going to happen to those people who are out of work? The government, as the hon. member for Vancouver East has said, cannot bring forward those plans without the approval of parliament. Parliament has to pass the necessary money; and the government must give the committee an indication if it will call parliament together in the fall, as suggested by the Leader of the Opposition, to authorize it to embark on the programs which the minister says it is now considering.

The minister has not touched on this phase of the problem at all. Of course it is not the only phase that he has ignored in this discussion. It is another question which has to be answered, if we are to feel that we have discharged our responsibility with regard to the request of the government that we should pass this particular estimate and the other estimates of the Department of Labour.

Mr. Starr: I listened to what the hon. member had to say, and I think I have answered practically all the questions time and time again, so I have nothing further to add.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I have come to the conclusion that the Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Essex East and the hon. member for Vancouver East are hardly being fair to the minister, because it is quite evident that the government has no program, is planning no program and intends no program, and that the unemployed are to be treated in exactly the same way as the western farmers are being treated by this government.

Mr. Winch: There is one point that does disturb me. I am quite prepared to accept the word of the Minister of Labour and the Prime Minister that studies are now being undertaken with a view to giving further consideration to the unemployment situation, and through that consideration plans for greater employment. A few minutes ago I asked the Minister of Labour about the financial end and his answer was that is a matter for the Minister of Finance.

Quite honestly, I do not believe that is something the Minister of Labour can expect us to swallow. If the government does have something in mind the Minister of Labour obviously knows the plans they are considering, and surely he must have been in communication with the Minister of Finance as to how that is going to be financed. He must know how they are going to finance something in the future. I think we in this house have a right to know how they are going to do it if the House of Commons is not in session. My understanding is and always has been that the House of Commons and the Senate are the only bodies that can authorize the expenditure of money.

Now, I presume the plans of the Minister of Labour must involve the expenditure of federal funds. Can he tell us, because he must know, how the financial angle is to be handled and how, when those plans are at the point of being promulgated, the government is going to obtain the authorization of the House of Commons to do those things? Is there going to be a special session of the House of Commons or is it going to be done under authority of order in council, anticipating that at the next session of parliament a supplementary estimate will be passed? Surely this is one of the simple questions that should be asked by a member of the opposition. I hope the minister can give us a little more detailed reply than he gave to my question a few moments ao.

Mr. Starr: I do not know what particular financing the hon. member has in mind or what particular project he has in mind when he is so worried about financing. Let us take, as an example, the municipal winter works program. This is being financed by a supplementary estimate which will come before the House of Commons possibly during the next session of parliament, at which time parliament will be asked to approve it. An announcement was made in that respect. There will have to be a supplementary estimate for the additional cost of training the unemployed workers. This will be brought before parliament at the next session. Whatever the projects are, so far as I know at the moment, whatever the projects may be which will be approved, an announcement will be made and there is no doubt but that the proper method of financing will be used in that respect.

Mr. Winch: In other words the governor general in council can use a blank cheque in connection with a policy about which this parliament knows nothing.

Mr. Pearson: I wonder if the minister can tell us how many, if any, of the members of this economics and research branch are working on the committee that was set up some five months ago to try to find a new method of measuring unemployment?

Mr. Starr: There are two members.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister whether this committee has completed its work, and whether the Department of Labour representatives on it have reported to him in regard to that work? I ask this, Mr. Chairman, because it is obviously a matter of interest and importance to this committee, when discussing labour estimates, to have before it the work that has been done in this field. It would have been of great assistance to us if that work, which has been going on now for more than five months, could have been completed so we would have the report before us.

I know that the measurement of unemployment is not nearly as important as unemployment itself, but in order to assess the problem it is useful to have the proper statistics. There is a great deal of controversy now on this subject. This committee was set up for this purpose, and it has been working now for many months. Can the minister indicate whether there is any likelihood that we will have a report from him, during the discussion of these estimates, on the work of the committee?

Mr. Starr: I am advised that the work of the committee is nearing completion, and that they expect to write their report and make a report to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and to me during the latter part of next week.

Mr. Pearson: I think it is very unfortunate that a report of this importance, which has a direct bearing on the consideration of these estimates, will be made to the minister concerned a few days after we have finished the discussion of these estimates.

Mr. Thrasher: You still have trade and commerce.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, we still have trade and commerce, and perhaps the minister will take up the matter with his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce to assure that when those estimates come before the committee we might have that report.

There is an interesting paragraph about this problem of the assessment and measurement of unemployment in this labour research bulletin to which I have already referred, which indicates that our present methods are not very satisfactory. We know that, because if they had been we would not have set up this committee. There are two procedures followed at present. One may result in the setting of a figure for unemployment which is too high, whereas the other may result in a figure which is too low. In commenting on this the labour research bulletin had this to say:

> The government figures give people without jobs and seeking work as a percentage of the labour force. This is not the same thing at all. The labour force includes not only wage and salary earners and the unemployed, but also employers, own accounts (the self-employed) and unpaid family workers in a business or on a farm. In 1959, these people averaged over 18 per cent of the Canadian labour force, so that the difference between labour force and labour supply was substantial. To measure unemployment against a conglomerate mass of workers, employers, the self-employed and unpaid family workers is really not sensible.

Then further down it goes on to say:

> So the sensible thing to do is measure unemployment against the total of "paid workers" (the neat d.b.s. term for wage and salary earners combined) plus the unemployed.

That seems to me to make sense. I think that is in accord with the international labour office method for the measurement of unemployment, which we have not adopted in this country but which perhaps this committee may recommend. If that does make sense, Mr. Chairman, it shows that unemployment, as a statistical measure in this country, is even more serious than one would gather from the dominion bureau of statistics figures given to us from time to time.

Mr. Lambert: You are comparing apples and oranges to arrive at that conclusion.

Mr. Winch: That is what some of the unemployed cannot buy, apples and oranges. I feel that our discussion on item 165 and the previous item amply demonstrates why some members in this house thought it would be preferable to adjourn in June and come back in September, at which time the committee could have considered any proposal this government had in mind with regard to unemployment. This proves that we were right in making that suggestion.

I should like to ask a question of the minister under this item 165. If my memory is correct, and I think it is, the last information the Department of Labour issued on the number of those who were seeking employment in Canada indicated that there were 124,000. I think it said there were 124,000 who had been unemployed for four months or more. In view of that information, available to and supplied by his department, I should like to ask the minister whether, under this item for the economics and research branch, any special study is being made of the problem of those who have been unemployed for many months—I refer to the 124,000 for four months or more—as to the particular trades or professions in which they have been trained, with the idea of evolving any proposals to take care of that situation.

What I have in mind is this. Among that 124,000 is there any particular group or are there any groupings of trades or professions, and is any kind of research being undertaken with regard to them in an effort to try to solve the problem?

Mr. Starr: We have not that information here at the moment. We can check and see whether we can get that information.

Mr. Winch: It is not so much a matter of wanting a break-down; what I want to know is this. You have that problem of 124,000 out of those 300,000 applicants, I think it was according to the last statistical review. Is any special study being made by the minister's economics and research branch as to whether they break down into certain trades and professions, with a view to taking some remedial action?

Mr. Starr: I am told they are not certain whether there is any special data pertaining to these people mentioned by the hon. member, but generally speaking, on the whole manpower situation, our economics and research branch are continually studying and assessing the various categories.

Mr. Winch: I should like to ask this question. If any data are available, are they mostly of a trained or untrained classification? I am referring to the 124,000.

Mr. Starr: I am told that we can check on the matter right away. However, at the moment that information is not available to me.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, this seems to me an appropriate moment to make a suggestion that I have been turning over in my mind since the minister answered the Leader of the Opposition about this attempt to reconcile statistics, and the report of this joint committee on the matter. While the minister has said that this report may be available in time for consideration of the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, it seems to me that procedure would not really be satisfactory to the committee for this reason. The Department of Trade and Commerce is merely the vehicle through which the bureau of statistics reports to parliament, but this is the department that has some responsibility in the matter. Particularly in view of the need for the minister to wait for certain information asked for by the hon. member for Vancouver East, it seems to me that the most suitable way of meeting this problem would be to have the minister let this item stand and go on with the rest of his estimates. Then at the end of the committee of supply, after all the other departments have been taken up so there will be a maximum amount of time to get this important document or this essential information and for all members of the committee to study it, we could resume the consideration of this particular item. I ask the minister to consider that suggestion.

[Mr. Winch.]

Mr. Nugent: You would then want it held until the government could consider it?

Mr. Pickersgill: On that point may I say that I do not think it is a matter of the government considering this document. I would think both departments would welcome all the criticism of the document they could get before they decided to scrap the existing statistical basis and adopt a new one. I am making a serious request to the minister. At the same time I should also like to ask him a question about this study. I should like to ask him whether the committee, in its studies, have consulted Mr. Arthur MacNamara, who has perhaps greater experience in this field than anyone else in this country and who has, of course, a continuing connection with the minister's department or with a certain organism of the government connected with the minister's department.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He is chairman of the unemployment insurance advisory commission.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes; he is chairman of the unemployment insurance advisory commission and, as I happen to know, he has extremely strong views on this question. I should be greatly interested in knowing whether he has been consulted in the course of this study.

Mr. Starr: In answer to the hon. member for Vancouver East I want to say that I am now informed that these categories he mentioned are mostly untrained, but no specific data is available on the occupation characteristics of those who are unemployed for more than four months.

The Chairman: Shall vote 165 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister indicate what he proposes to do about my request?

Mr. Starr: What was your request?

Mr. Pickersgill: The suggestion I made to the minister was this. In order to enable the committee to consider this report and to do so in the context of the minister's department, where it should be considered rather than under the Department of Trade and Commerce, my suggestion was that he should allow this item to stand until all the other business of the committee of supply has been done and then have it called. By that time, if his prognostications are correct, the report should be available to us. The other question which he might answer at the same time, is whether or not Mr. MacNamara was consulted by the committee.

Mr. Nugent: What if the report is delayed?

Mr. Pickersgill: In that case it could not be considered.

Mr. Starr: In answer to the last question, as to whether Mr. MacNamara was consulted, may I say that the answer is no, according to members of the committee. As to the first part of the request, the answer as far as I am concerned is no, because these are the same tactics that were adopted by the hon. member last year.

Mr. Pickersgill: Really, Mr. Chairman, I think we deserve a better answer than that. I was not speaking just for myself. I was speaking for my friends on this side of the house; I refer to the official opposition in this House of Commons. I do not think this is an answer that the minister would like to leave on the record unmodified, namely the suggestion—and after all, it is unparliamentary—that these were the same tactics I used last year. There is an implication in that answer, and it is contrary to the rules to attribute motives.

However, I am making nothing of that matter. What I am saying is this. The request I made was made two years ago, as I think the minister will find, not last year. As the minister will recall, I made a reasonable request at that time. I requested that we should let one item stand until the winter works program was announced. What happened? The then house leader, who is now Secretary of State for External Affairs, and the Prime Minister, when asked formally by my colleague the hon. member for Laurier, all refused that reasonable request.

When was the winter works program announced? It was announced in September. Where was it announced? It was announced at a provincial Tory convention in the province of Saskatchewan. Therefore if the minister objects to my tactics, I would remind him of the history of that incident. I had not intended to raise this matter at all. It was the minister who did so. However, when it is suggested that these things should be dealt with by parliament and not at provincial Tory conventions, it seems to me that the opposition is on fairly sound ground.

I repeat the request to the minister, as it is a reasonable one. Since he expects this report next week, and since it would be quite as easy to deal with this item then as it is now, I ask the minister to reconsider his answer.

Mr. Winch: May I just say one word on this matter, Mr. Chairman. I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I am rather afraid that there is now on the part of the government a tendency to forget the principles which they espoused with regard to a democratic parliament for so many years when they sat on this side of the chamber. It is the responsibility of the opposition to offer critical analyses and make constructive and alternative proposals. I believe that is what we are trying to do, but how can we do it if all possible information is not before the members of the committee? We do want to help the minister in solving this problem, but the only way we can do this is to have full information.

I would ask the minister whether by postponing this vote for a matter of two, three, four or five days it would be possible for him to supply anything more by way of factual information, reports or advice so that all members of this committee can do a better job in representing those who sent us here and in assisting him in the most difficult problem he is facing.

Mr. Starr: I do not know what factual reports the hon. member refers to.

Mr. Winch: I understand there is one which will be filed in two or three days.

Mr. Starr: There is the report of the committee which is working in an endeavour to recommend a measure of employment with regard to the future, but that is all.

Mr. Robichaud: Reference was made this morning to certain forecasts in a report recently issued by economists in this country to the effect that the number of unemployed next winter could be much higher than it was in the past two winters, and some had gone as far as to say that it could be over the one million mark. On the other hand we have the Minister of Labour saying last night that he certainly hoped the situation would be much better next winter.

The minister must have some basis on which to express this hope, and when he was asked a while ago what he was basing this statement on he said it was based on the announcements made by the government. The only announcement we have had so far which could provide any relief to the unemployed is a very moderate extension of the winter works program, a program which was announced at a provincial Conservative convention in Saskatchewan last year which resulted in the 54 Conservative candidates losing the election, 40 of them losing their deposits.

We have an accelerated housing construction program which will come into effect in early fall. Housing construction in many areas of the country is almost impossible during the winter months, and I would ask the minister whether, in making this statement to the effect that he hopes the situation will be better next winter, he is taking into consideration the recommendations which have been made to him in the reports he has received from the economics and research branch of his department. If he has, then there seems to be quite a contradiction between the minister's statement and the reports which have been referred to this morning of certain economists in the country.

A while ago some government members objected to the production of such a report, saying that the one referred to by the Prime Minister two years ago was a report which had been produced in the past. I ask the Minister of Labour what objection he has to making available to this committee the report he received last May forecasting the labour conditions for the summer months. I think we should have a reply to this question.

Mr. Starr: The hon. member has repeated now that which was said earlier by his leader, and I have answered his leader on both those points.

Mr. Tucker: I have a couple of questions for the minister. I would like to know if he could break down the 55,000 people helped last year by the winter works program. In my section of the country for the last two years the winter works program has been in operation it has been absolutely useless, because we have about 110 inches of snow and three or four feet of frost. Our council journeyed to Toronto on two different occasions to meet the government about this, and they came back on both occasions empty handed.

Mr. Pearson: The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate made what I thought was quite a reasonable suggestion, which the minister turned down, in respect to this report on new methods of measuring unemployment. We are told that this report will be available next week. We have been told that we will be permitted to discuss it on the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce. However it is true, as the minister will admit that his own department has a primary relationship to the matters which will be considered in this report. We will undoubtedly be told this by the Minister of Trade and Commerce when we try to get information out of him about it.

Therefore I ask whether, when this matter comes up for consideration on the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, the minister will be able to make himself available to the committee at that time so we can question him about it when the report is before the committee.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We are awaiting a reply from the minister.

[Mr. Robichaud.]

Mr. Starr: What was the question?

Mr. Pearson: It was a very simple one. When this report of the committee on statistical methods for measuring unemployment is before the committee on the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce next week, would the minister if possible—and there may be something which will make it quite impossible—be available to the committee at that time so we can question him about this report, as well as the Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. Starr: The estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce are the responsibility of that particular minister, and I do not feel I should make myself available on the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is a matter of considerable importance; because if parliament is going to adjourn or prorogue within the foreseeable future—at any rate that is the hope—we may be confronted with a situation where once parliament is not in session, the government might resort to a standard of measurement of unemployment that may not be as satisfactory or as scientifically desirable as possible. It could be that when we come back here next January, if that is the government's intention, the government by that time will have accepted or devised a formula which will not fully reveal the extent of unemployment in this country

Five months ago the government announced through the Minister of Labour that an interdepartmental committee had been set up to study this problem. We have three standards of measurement in Canada; the dominion bureau of statistics figure, the unplaced applicants figure, and the number of live claims. Under the international labour office standards, the dominion bureau of statistics figure of people without jobs and seeking work, added to which is the figure of people on temporary lay-off, is in the judgment of that body perhaps the best standard to use.

It is difficult for us to understand how it could have taken all this time for this interdepartmental committee to come forward with a report. It certainly is open to us to suggest, as did the Leader of the Opposition, that it is a rather interesting coincidence that the government hopes to be able to present the report of this interdepartmental committee just as we are about to prorogue. That, I think, is not an unfair argument, particularly when we recall how difficult it was to get from the minister any indication as to what progress is being made.

One excuse was that one of the members of the committee was away, and on that account the hon. gentlemen could not get information as to the progress being made. Then when we asked whether the minister had inquired, he said no; and when it was pointed out how unfortunate that position was, the minister said, "Does the hon. gentleman think I would not make inquiries?" So all the facts concerning the situation warrant our belief, or our suspicion, that this particular timing has been arranged by the government to suit its own convenience.

Can the minister tell us whether there will be any change made in the standard of measurement without this house being given an opportunity of debating the merits of any change that may be contemplated.

Mr. Starr: The hon. member has been very severely criticizing the members of this committee for not bringing in a report in time to satisfy him—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was criticizing the minister, not the members of the committee.

Mr. Starr: I must say he is most unfair in doing that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, there has been no criticism of any member of this committee. What I and others have been doing is to criticize the government and not any member of this committee.

Mr. Starr: As usual the hon. member has no point of order. He merely wishes to interrupt and straighten out what he thinks should be said. The members of this committee are very valued civil servants of the highest calibre drawn from the three different departments. There were times when two or three of them were away and the committee did not meet as a result. Consequently a delay occurred. But I feel certain that whatever method of measuring unemployment is recommended by this committee, if it is adopted by the government as a measure of unemployment, because of the calibre of these people it will commend itself even to the opposition.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Can the minister say whether the economics research division assists in the preparation of the annual report of the department?

Mr. Starr: They contribute to the report on their section.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes. I have before me the report of the department for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1959. In view of the responsibility of the Minister of Labour in the matter of unemployment, I make some observations about the table of contents and the actual content of this report.

The work of this department is important, and the various matters which engage the attention of the department are of equal importance. But since unemployment and employment are among the ministerial responsibilities of the hon. gentleman and his officials, I should be grateful to the minister if he would explain why there is no mention in this report, in so far as I am able to ascertain, of the problems of unemployment at all.

I have before me page 6, the table of contents. I have looked at the introduction, where I would expect to find some reference to unemployment. I find, for instance, in the first sentence, the following: "The department's activities to stimulate winter employment gained momentum during the year". However, there is no detailed discussion; there is not one paragraph of discussion concerning the problem of unemployment.

In 1958, in 1959 and in the current fiscal year we have had much unemployment. It is difficult to understand why there would not be in this report of the Department of Labour a discussion of the problem which has occupied the attention of this committee since yesterday morning. I see at page 38 a reference to the work of the economics and research division. There are passages dealing with relations between labour and management, labour organizations, strikes and lockouts, wage rates, working conditions and so on, but I see no reference to the question of unemployment. On page 40 I see a heading "Employment and the labour market" but there is certainly no discussion of the problem there or any proposed remedies. I see on page 41 the heading "Seasonal employment". All that is said there is:

> Increasing concern about winter unemployment led to detailed further study during the year of seasonal employment problems. A statistical summary of seasonal variations throughout industry and in different regions of the country was prepared for the national winter employment conference in July.

I see, too, that seasonal unemployment in British Columbia is the subject of a special study. By the way, when the minister was asked for some information he could possibly have produced the results of these surveys and studies, which might have provided answers to some of the questions, at least, which we have been asking. But will the minister explain to the committee why in the report of the Department of Labour there is no substantial reference to or discussion of what is the most important responsibility of the Minister of Labour, and what is the most important single domestic problem facing Canada at the present time?

Mr. Starr: Never at any time has the annual report contained any such thing as the hon. member for Essex East has in mind. The annual report of the Department of Labour deals with the activities of each branch of the department, not with the state of the nation. However, we do make mention on page 40 of the report, under the heading "Employment and the Labour Market" to the Current Manpower and Labour Relations Review which appeared in the Labour Gazette copies of which have perhaps been sent to the hon. member and the question of unemployment is discussed very fully in the Labour Gazette.

166. Annuities Act administration, $1,194,357.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Could the minister tell us the number of pension plans covered in group contracts which were written up to the end of the last fiscal year?

Mr. Starr: For the fiscal year ending March 31, 1960 group certificates issued amounted to 11,564.

Mr. Batten: Mr. Chairman, under the Government Annuities Act passed in 1908 a government annuity is a fixed yearly income purchased from and paid by the federal government. The minimum annuity is $10 and the maximum $1,200, or $100 per month. In table No. 4 on page 29 of the report of the department we notice that interest in this plan has been relatively stable over the years. From 1955 to 1959 the number of individual contracts has been in the vicinity of 6,000 and the number of group certificates has ranged between 15,000 and 18,000.

I have had some inquiries concerning this plan, based on the fact that the maximum annuity of $1,200 per year is probably not worth as much now as it was 10, 20 or 30 years ago. My question to the minister is this. Would he give me an explanation of the section in table No. 3 at the bottom of page 28 dealing with the amount of the annuity where it refers to "over $1,200"?

Mr. Starr: These are carryovers from the time the maximum of the government annuity was above $1,200. At one time it was even up to $5,000. These are carryovers that have been in existence.

Mr. Batten: Is it possible at present to buy an annuity in excess of $1,200?

Mr. Starr: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Batten: Is any consideration being given to increasing the maximum allowable, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Starr: Not at the moment.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Pearson: I wonder if the minister could tell me—perhaps I should know—how these annuities are now being marketed, how they are being sold.

Mr. Starr: Through our government annuity representatives in various parts of the country, and directly to people who write to the annuities branch. We have annuities representatives as we had in the past. They are also sold through direct communication with the annuities branch here in Ottawa.

Mr. Batten: Are there annuity agents in all the provinces of Canada?

Mr. Starr: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

General administration—

526. Annuities Act—To authorize the payment of interest, in the current and subsequent fiscal years, out of the government annuities account, on premiums being refunded that were paid under a contract entered into with Her Majesty pursuant to subsection (3) of section 6 of the Government Annuities Act where such premiums are in excess of the amount required to purchase the maximum annuity payable under that act to an employee of the purchaser; the said interest in respect of premiums being refunded shall be calculated at the rate of interest applicable to the premiums at the time they were received and such interest shall be payable for the period from the day on which the excess premiums were received by Her Majesty to the day on which the refund is made, $1.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, can the minister tell us how many pension plans are underwritten by group contracts as for the last fiscal year?

Mr. Starr: Approximately 1,100.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That would cover how many employees who are actually in the working force?

Mr. Starr: About 258,000.

Item agreed to.

167. Industrial relations activities including the administration of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act, the Female Employees Equal Pay Act, the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act, the Annual Vacations Act, and regulations, and the promotion of labour-management co-operation, $595,271.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, this item covers the administration of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. As I mentioned in my remarks last evening, I should like to remind the minister that when his estimates were under discussion last year he stated on May 15 that during the present session this act would be amended. Twice this session, in reply to questions I addressed to him, the minister said the act would not be amended during the present session. On one occasion I believe the hon. gentleman said that amending the act would require lengthy preparations. Would the minister give us a definite explanation as to why the act was not amended this session, as promised by him on May 15 last?

Mr. Starr: I made a detailed study of the possible amendments. I felt that because of the far-reaching effects they may have on the lives of many thousands of Canadians, this matter necessitated an even more intensive study. This I am proposing to do; and in this course of action, I might say to the hon. member, the Canadian Labour Congress concurs.

Mr. Winch: Through the auspices of the commonwealth parliamentary association and the House of Commons I had the opportunity last year of visiting Australia, Singapore, Indonesia, Thailand, Malaya, Israel, Pakistan and the United Kingdom. Within a few days of my return to Vancouver, after an absence of three months and based on discussions I had with industrial and political leaders throughout the world, I made a speech for which I have since been condemned and commended. I said that I felt it was my responsibility to say that I thought Canada was facing a serious crisis in the months and perhaps the years ahead. I said if we were to maintain our standard of living and our competitive position as an exporting nation, there would have to be greater co-operation and collaboration among labour, industry and government.

I retract not a word of my speech made last December following my trip. Circumstances unfortunately have borne out the correctness of my statement. I say unfortunately, because there have been developments in Canada since that time which amply demonstrate the correctness of my conclusions. We face serious unemployment in Canada today and perhaps the problem will be more acute in the months and years ahead. We face increased competition from abroad, and threats of economic combinations. We are confronted with the possibility of cold war such as we have never before witnessed.

I therefore feel there is now an absolute necessity to have co-operation and collaboration among labour, management and government in the interest of all the people of Canada. Unless there is that co-operation and collaboration, critical as the situation may seem at the present time, conditions can get worse, and no one in this house or in Canada wants to see conditions get worse. I feel so strongly on this matter that that is the reason I rose.

I am not retracting one word I said, popular or unpopular though it may be. We have to face major responsibilities in these critical times. We have to recognize, as I said yesterday, that automation is marching onward. We have to recognize—and I think this is of the utmost importance—and I am afraid too many in labour, management and government do not, that we are no longer in a seller's market; we are in a buyer's market. Since we are in a buyer's market, the interests of Canada demand a social consciousness on the part of all people. They demand that one segment of the economy shall not damn everybody else for everything that is wrong; and I apply that, sir, to government, management and labour.

I said when I returned last summer that one of the greatest needs, if labour and management could not get together, was for government to take the initiative in bringing them together. Government should take the lead within our capitalistic economy because, although I am a socialist and want to see socialism, I am a practical socialist and the practicality of socialism is ham and eggs on the table tomorrow morning for everybody if they like ham and eggs; if not, whatever they like or desire.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, although you may have thought I was out of order I am not, because I wanted to make those remarks as an introduction to a question on this item. I notice that the last part of item 167 has to do with the promotion of labour-management co-operation. Will the minister give us the fullest possible explanation of what, through the medium of his department, is done in the realm of labour-management co-operation; not only what has been done by the money expended in the past but in particular what will be done, the activity and the policy, in the fiscal year to which those estimates apply.

I know I am very often guilty of repetition, but I do want to reiterate that in my personal, and I will say humble, opinion we have now passed the time when government, with the knowledge and reports it should have; industry, knowing the competition they are now facing in a buyer's market and not a seller's market; and labour, that must have employment in order to live, have to get together and put their cards on the table—when I say that I mean it—and not completely condemn or damn each other, because undoubtedly there are mistakes on all sides. They should not try to find excuses, but should put the cards on the table so people can be employed, so they can produce and either consume or sell the produce so that government can function and meet its responsibilities.

This is the only item I know of under which the government can take a greater initiative in trying to bring about co-operation and understanding. If I say any more it will be repetition. I hope I have said enough to show how seriously I view this situation, and how important I think it is that on the initiative of government, management and labour relations should be improved. Would the minister be so kind as to say what is planned in so far as the government and this particular section of his department are concerned to bring about something which I maintain is absolutely necessary and long past due? Unless it can be done, serious as the problems now are, they may be more serious and more critical in the not too distant future.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the hon. member for Vancouver East for his contribution in respect of this vote, because I think it is very worth while. This is a matter that is in the minds of a great many people who have this interest at heart. I must confess to the hon. member that it is a very important matter in my own mind. What has been done in connection with this vote has been only on the plant level. We have helped in every way we could to organize committees on this plant level to promote efficiency in operation, reduce waste, promote safety measures and accident prevention. There are some 1,582 committees that we work with at that level for this purpose, but I think that is not enough. I think labour, management and government in fact should go beyond that. I want to thank the hon. member and assure him that this is also uppermost in my mind, to see what can be done in that sphere.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I also listened with great interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East, who has so much knowledge of and interest in this field and who has expressed that interest and knowledge inside and outside this house over the years. I agree with him that industrial disputes which lead to strikes and the interruption of work are too expensive in our economic society to be tolerated if anything can be done to prevent them. They are wasteful; they impose a burden on the cost of production of goods in Canada at a time—and my hon. friend has said this—when that burden may prevent us developing our export trade and meeting the competition of other countries, and thereby prevent us from giving the kind of employment which we all want to see in this country.

I mentioned last night that employment in manufacturing is not as relatively important in our economy as it was, but is still responsible for one out of every four jobs in Canada. Therefore we cannot afford this kind of thing any longer, any more than we can afford not to have a trade union movement as the basis of collective bargaining to prevent industrial disputes. The procedure for the purpose, of preventing industrial disputes, as the minister has said on more than one occasion, can be improved, can be made more effective, can be modernized, can be brought perhaps into a closer relationship with the industrial and labour situation at the present time.

The minister told us two years ago that he was going to amend the act. He has now told us it is such an important matter that more time is required. However much time is required, I hope those steps will be taken in the next session at least, and that we shall pass amendments to this legislation which will help the country to more effectively deal with this problem than has been the case recently; though I do not think we have too much with which to reproach ourselves in this country. Certainly our record is not perfect, but it is not nearly as bad as that of some other countries. In any event, we must improve on the present industrial relations disputes mechanism to make co-operation among labour, management and government in the settlement of such disputes more effective. No mechanism alone, however, is going to improve this problem. It is a problem which requires the exercise of wisdom and self-restraint on the part of all the elements in our society which are affected.

Some months ago I read, and perhaps the minister did too, a paragraph in a British white paper on the economic implications of full employment. It was presented by the United Kingdom Prime Minister to the parliament of that country about a year ago. There is one section of that white paper which deals with conditions of price stability, and it is a paragraph that seems to me to have a bearing on the whole question of industrial disputes. It reads as follows:

> ... If the prosperous economic conditions necessary to maintain full employment are exploited by trade unions and businessmen, price stability and full employment become incompatible.

This may seem to be labouring the obvious, but we do not always, in our economy, understand the obvious or perhaps we do not always act on the obvious. It goes on to say:

> The solution lies in self-restraint in making wage claims and fixing profit margins and prices, so that total money income rises no faster than total output. In the absence of such self-restraint, it may seem that the country can make a choice—albeit a painful one—between full employment and continually rising prices, or price stability secured with some danger to the level of employment that might otherwise have been achieved.

On this subject of industrial disputes and how to improve our present procedures, I read the other day a very interesting article in a magazine called Saturday Night. The article was entitled "Common Sense Laws to Prevent Strikes" and was signed by somebody called Frank Howard. I wonder whether this is our colleague in the house, the hon. member for Skeena, although there is no implication to that effect in this article. If it is not the hon. member for Skeena I should apologize—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Why should you apologize?

Mr. Pearson: I apologize for attributing to him an article, even if it is sensible. I should not give him credit, even for a good article, if he did not write it. This paragraph begins:

When labour goes on strike, or management resorts to a lock-out, there is only one way to settle differences—apart from government imposed arbitration.

Perhaps I might interpolate here that government-imposed arbitration, which perhaps is essential in certain emergencies, should certainly be restricted to a minimum; because compulsory arbitration by government will inevitably lead to government intervention and finally government control of the business or industry in which the government has arbitrated. Then he goes on to say:

The two sides must get together and talk out their differences. It is at this point that we need drastic changes, both in the law governing industrial disputes and in the procedures we have set up to handle these disputes.

Then he proceeds to recommend some changes. I would be interested, if the minister saw fit to comment, in hearing his observations on some of these changes that are recommended in this article by Mr. Frank Howard. I am only going to pick out some of the more important ones, at least the ones that seem important to me. He says:

First, we should eliminate the use of conciliation boards, even though they have effected some settlements. Their work is repetitive of that of conciliation officers.

Then he goes on to add:

At the moment, time and lack of authority handicaps the conciliation officer and restricts him in his efforts to assist the disputing parties. We should give him the power to arrange meetings of the two parties and the right to ensure attendance at such meetings.

In other words he would eliminate the board and exalt the importance and authority of the conciliation officer. Then he says this:

A time limit should be set within which each party should indicate to the other and to the Minister of Labour whether it intends to accept or reject the recommendations of the conciliation officer . . . Following this, and if rejection is made by either party, a strike or lock-out vote should be allowed.

Then he goes on in connection with this procedure by making this proposal, which I think is both interesting and important.

The strike or lock-out vote must be by secret ballot.

He has a good deal to say about the use of the courts and judges in the conciliation of industrial disputes. I should not have said "the courts"; I should have said judges. He says:

More and more as union-management relations have developed we have seen the entry of judges of the courts into those relations. Judges are schooled in the ways of jurisprudence. Their lifetimes are spent in dealing with words and the interpretation thereof.

I would suggest that a section of the court be established to deal with questions of interpretation of, and disputes arising out of, collective agreements. But, the activities of such a labour court should be confined to dealing with grievances and must not be extended to the field of negotiations.

He then says:

If two parties to a collective agreement want to name a permanent arbitrator then they should be allowed so to do and should not have to take their differences to a particular person or place for an adjudication.

This is an interesting article, especially if it should be an article written by a member of parliament, and it puts forward some constructive suggestions which no doubt will be considered by the minister when he is working on the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. If he would comment on some of these points I have put before the committee I would be glad to hear his views.

Mr. Starr: First of all may I say that I do not believe this Frank Howard is our colleague.

Mr. Pearson: May I just intervene, then, to withdraw, ex post facto, any reference to the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Starr: Some of the things he suggests in the first part of this article have been in effect in the federal jurisdiction for many years, and with some success. The same suggestions have been made by other people in the provincial jurisdiction but not the federal jurisdiction. We have received no representations at any time from any of those affected by the federal Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act that conciliation boards should be abolished or the services of conciliation officers should be eliminated. Our experience has been that about three quarters of the disputes under federal jurisdiction have been settled by conciliation officers. They have performed very useful functions in this regard. The balance of one quarter of the disputes with which we have had to deal have been settled by conciliation boards.

I am not going to comment on what the experience has been in the provincial field; that is an entirely different matter. In these circumstances, and in view of the experience we have had, I feel that this is a good procedure. Certainly in my estimation anything in which success is to be found should not be thrown overboard by something else that may not be as thoroughly tested as is this procedure.

168. Civilian rehabilitation branch including payments to the provinces to implement a program for the rehabilitation of disabled persons, in accordance with terms and conditions approved by the governor in council, $217,170.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister mentioned this item in general terms in his statement in chief. This has to do with what may seem to be an unexciting assignment on the part of the department but which in fact is one of its most constructive responsibilities. It has to do with the rehabilitation of disabled persons; and of course, whatever the federal government is able to do in this desirable field depends on the kind of arrangements and collaboration that can be established between the provinces and the federal government. Can the minister tell us how many cases of rehabilitation the department has provided for in co-operation with the provinces? I think the number of cases in 1955 was about 1,000. I am speaking now from memory, of course. Can the minister give us an answer to this question, and tell us something about this particular vote and what is happening under it?

Mr. Starr: The number of rehabilitation cases in which full details are available during the fiscal year 1959-60 was 1,459. Of this number, 940 were males, 519 were females and 1,097 were dependants.

Mr. Robichaud: I have a few more questions to ask on this item and I think they should be answered by the minister. I understand that this item covers payments to the provinces to co-ordinate and develop activities for the rehabilitation of disabled persons to the amount of $150,000. Can the minister tell us how many provinces are sharing or participating in this plan? Another thing that is of interest to me is to note that the amount of $67,000, or approximately 46 per cent of the total grant, is required to administer this branch. In other words, even in this year's estimate there is an increase of $7,320 to cover the expenses of this civilian rehabilitation branch. I think the minister should clarify these matters before the item is passed.

Mr. Starr: The main function of this branch is to co-ordinate the services of the various departments which are interested in this type of work. There are nine provinces participating with which we have agreements at the present time.

Mr. Robichaud: What province is not participating?

Mr. Starr: Quebec.

Mr. Robichaud: What amount is being paid? Is an equal amount paid to each province, or is the amount in proportion to the population?

Mr. Starr: Whatever each province asks, that amount is being paid. The amount varies.

Mr. Robichaud: Why was there an increase of $7,000 in the administration of this branch this year?

Mr. Starr: The increase represents a general salary increase.

Mr. Robichaud: One thing that seems rather surprising to me is that it should take $67,000, or 46 per cent of the total amount, to administer a grant of $150,000. To me that is a rather surprising amount.

Mr. Starr: There is an extremely complex problem involved and a complicated type of undertaking in respect of the administration of this particular branch. They are engaged frequently in conferences of various sorts with various departments and with the provinces. It most certainly takes a great deal of time and a staff of some size to perform this function.

Mr. Herridge: Under the various workmen's compensation boards certain rehabilitation work is done for men who have been injured in industry. What relationship is there between this vote and the activities of the boards in that respect? Is there any degree of co-operation in that type of rehabilitation?

Mr. Starr: There is co-operation but no actual participation with the compensation boards of the various provinces.

Special services—

169. Special services branch including the promotion of a program for combating seasonal unemployment, the organization and use of workers for farming and related industries and assistance to the provinces under agreements entered into with the provinces by the Minister of Labour with the approval of the governor in council, $502,075.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is a vote that has been reduced from last year, when the total amount requested was $588,786. The minister this year is asking for $502,075. This item covers the special services branch, which includes the promotion of a program for combating seasonal unemployment. I hope the minister will be in a position to tell us why, at a time when seasonal unemployment is so high, the government should find it desirable to reduce this vote. The minister undoubtedly has a good explanation, but in the absence of that explanation he will not wonder if I have some concern. There are other items that might be reduced, but at a time when there is so much unemployment, and particularly as some of it is seasonal, we ought to know why the reduction has taken place. The minister might tell us—

Mr. Starr: Will the hon. member allow me to answer one question at a time? I get confused when I get about three or four questions at one time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I beg the minister's pardon.

Mr. Starr: It is a little confusing to me.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But the minister is sitting down. I do not understand.

Mr. Starr: I am getting the answer to the first question.

An hon. Member: The minister is getting the information.

Mr. Starr: We have participated in an immigration hostel in St. Paul which now has been closed down because there is no further use for it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is that in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Starr: No, it is just outside of Montreal. The total cost was some $86,000. That practically takes care of the amount that is shown as a decrease under this branch.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the minister tell me what is being done pursuant to the vote on this item? The minister will understand that if seasonal unemployment is a factor, as the minister indicates and to the extent that he indicates in the present level of unemployment, this is a vote on which we should be given a comprehensive statement as to what is being done to combat seasonal unemployment.

Mr. Starr: This special services branch was organized in April, 1950 to handle projects which developed from time to time and which did not fall within the purview of the other branches. The main programs at present that we undertake are listed as follows: the federal-provincial farm labour program; the organized movement of workers between Canada and the United States; organization and development of the program to combat seasonal unemployment—I may say that is the do it now program—the municipal winter works incentive program. This branch also acts as liaison with associations and employers in the various industries with regard to their manpower problems.

Mr. Pickersgill: Since this is the item on which it is possible for us to discuss the winter works program, I would like to ask if the government gave any serious consideration to the suggestion which was put forward repeatedly by members of the official opposition, that instead of this 50-50 cost sharing basis some other formula should be devised more in keeping with the equalization formula for the payment of assistance to the provinces under the tax-sharing arrangements act.

As has been repeatedly shown by the hon. member for Gloucester, the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo and the hon. member for Humber-St. George's in speeches which I happen to recall earlier in the session, these winter works are concentrated mainly in the provinces which relatively need them the least, because they are the areas where the province can afford to pay its share. I think it would be interesting if the minister would tell us how many of the 55,000 jobs provided last winter were in the four Atlantic provinces, and how many were in Ontario.

Mr. Starr: What is the first question you want me to answer? Do you mind if I take them one at a time?

Mr. Pickersgill: Not a bit. I will ask the factual question first, and it is this. Of the 55,000 jobs, if that is the right figure—and I do not know what 55,000 jobs mean—

Mr. Starr: That is incorrect; it is 51,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: I beg the minister's pardon; 51,000. I would presume that a job for one day is a job and a job for three months is a job, but they are very different things to the person who has the job. It is really job-days which are significant, and if the minister could tell us how many job-days there were in Ontario and how many job-days there were in the four Atlantic provinces I think it would help us to see whether this program is really providing the most help where it is most needed.

Mr. Starr: The estimated number of man-days of work provided in Ontario totalled 539,075. The number of man-days of work provided in the province of New Brunswick totalled 55,100; in the province of Nova Scotia, 135,778; in the province of Prince Edward Island, 100 man-days and in Newfoundland, 18,166 man-days.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the minister would not mind giving the figure for the whole country.

Mr. Starr: The estimated number of man-days of work provided totalled 1,938,839.

Mr. Pickersgill: The next question I want to ask is this. The minister will certainly see that the number of man-days of work provided in the province of Newfoundland, which unhappily had relatively the highest level of unemployment of any province, is ridiculously small, to put it mildly. It is relatively a good deal smaller than the 100 days in Prince Edward Island, because in Prince Edward Island, because of the nature of the economy and the fact that the island is not very heavy industrialized, the unemployment was relatively not very great. But in Newfoundland unhappily it is relatively very great.

The minister will also see that the relief provided by this program in Newfoundland was very, very small indeed. It is for that reason, of course, that we put forward the suggestion that instead of paying a 50-50 share there should be some formula worked out dependent, in part at any rate, on the level of unemployment in the area, so that those areas with the highest level of unemployment, and therefore the least capacity to pay their share—

Mr. Lambert: What kind of unemployment do you mean? Seasonal or traditional?

Mr. Pickersgill: For the benefit of the hon. member for Edmonton West perhaps I should explain that I was talking about the winter works program, and presumably the government designed the winter works program to deal with seasonal unemployment. That is all I was talking about, and I was concentrating exclusively upon it.

It so happens that seasonal unemployment, taking one year with another, in the province of Ontario is relatively less, I think, than in any other province of Canada except possibly Prince Edward Island. It just happens to be one of the facts of life which we have to face. In other words, the seasonal problem in Ontario is the least serious compared with any other province, notwithstanding the fact that one third, if I can keep in my head the figures the minister gave me, of all the money is paid to Ontario.

Some hon. Members: No; one quarter.

Mr. Habel: It is 30 per cent to 32 per cent.

Mr. Pickersgill: My hon. friend from Cochrane, who is better at arithmetic than I, says 30 per cent to 32 per cent. Even according to my rough reckoning that is not very far from one third, and I will let hon. gentlemen split the hairs if they want to. It will not alter the fundamental point I am making, that you have in Ontario one third of the money spent in the province best able to pay its own way and which has the least or relatively the least seasonal unemployment.

We do not think, having regard to the national character of this problem and the fact that this money is being paid out of the national treasury, that the 50-50 formula is a suitable one, and we put forward very strong views which the minister told us at the time we put them forward would receive careful study along with all our other suggestions. I would ask the minister what conclusion was reached after that study.

Mr. Starr: There is no such thing as a 50-50 formula. As a matter of fact this is not a cost sharing program with the provinces at all. This is a program which has been brought forward by this government to help in the municipal works program, and it was suggested by the municipalities themselves. Naturally we cannot deal directly with the municipalities because the municipalities are the creatures of the provinces, so all our work in this field must be done through the appropriate departments of the provincial governments.

At least six of the provinces have also helped in this regard by contributing 25 per cent and in one case 30 per cent of the balance of the payroll costs of this municipal winter works program. So there is no such thing as a formula that is 50-50. It is a direct contribution from the federal government through the provinces to the municipalities to encourage them to do certain works in the wintertime in order to alleviate the unemployment in those municipalities; also to lessen the financial cost with which the municipalities are burdened with in regard to unemployment assistance and other matters.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister says it is not a 50-50 formula. Will the minister assert that there is any case anywhere where the federal government pays more than 50 per cent of the labour costs?

Mr. Starr: This is the only program.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister says it is not a 50-50 program, and I say that the minister and I do not talk the same language. After all, that is all we have responsibility for, what comes out of the federal treasury. My understanding of the winter works program is that the federal treasury pays 50 per cent of the labour costs—

Mr. Starr: Payroll costs.

Mr. Pickersgill: Very well; payroll costs; the minister can call them anything he likes. But if they pay anything different from 50 per cent I would like to know. That is what I should like to know; if the federal government pays any other figure than 50 per cent. I say it does not matter whether the rest is paid by the provincial treasuries or by the municipalities. The plain fact is that in certain provinces these works cannot proceed because the municipality or the province, or in many cases both, simply cannot afford to lay out the other 50 per cent plus all the other costs of the project. I say that we recognize this principle in the fiscal field —the principle of the proper equalization of these payments—and if the winter works program is to be spread relatively uniformly across this country and do good where it is most needed, a new costsharing formula is required. The minister promised us that the government would consider that—

Mr. Starr: I certainly did not.

Mr. Pickersgill: I can turn up the pages—

Mr. Starr: Go ahead, turn them up.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and show the minister where he talked about our constructive suggestions and said that every one of those constructive suggestions would be considered. If all he meant was the same kind of consideration that is being given to the western wheat growers' proposals, it would be simpler to tell people at the start that it was intended to do nothing about them. I should like to know whether the minister has really given any consideration to this matter. There are ministers in the cabinet from some of these provinces, and I would hope they have made very strong representations in cabinet council to see that a fair deal is given to their provinces and to the municipalities in those provinces.

Mr. Starr: I can tell the hon. member that no representations have been made by the municipalities or by the provinces on behalf of the municipalities with regard to the suggestion he has made. Only yesterday I read a letter from the president of the association of mayors and municipalities, who are most directly affected by this and who have not been reluctant about bringing forward suggestions; and no suggestion of this type has been put forward either by the municipalities which we are endeavouring to help or by the provinces with whom we are working.

Mr. Fleming (Okanagan-Revelstoke): I hesitate to intrude upon the time of hon. gentlemen opposite, but I should like to advance a suggestion for the consideration of the minister which is to some extent an outgrowth of the winter works program. I think it would go a long way toward dealing with this problem of seasonal unemployment and even, to a considerable extent, with the type of unemployment known as hard core unemployment.

Hard core and seasonal unemployment can be the consequence of failure to utilize most effectively the reservoirs of resources, skills and knowledge which already exist. It can be proven, I believe, that in many areas unemployment is most severe where an imbalance of development is found; where primary industry is not supplemented by secondary industry; where a single industry, either primary or secondary, maintains an entire region. It is in these circumstances that very often we find the most severe conditions of winter unemployment occurring and where there is growing evidence, also, that continued long term unemployment is likely to occur. The problems, to a large extent, originate in the inadequate utilization of existing resources, skills and knowledge, and the solution must therefore lie, at least in part, in a more effective use of these elements.

If we consider the contribution of the Department of Agriculture, not only the federal department but the departments of agriculture of all the provinces as well, we find that diversification, together with increased production and efficiency, have resulted from study, experiment and advice flowing steadily from these departments to the farmers concerned. Where advice based on study and experiment has been heeded, improvement has followed; but where advice has not been offered, or where it has been given and gone unheeded, there is a history of decline. This is positive evidence that close co-operation between a department of government and the people connected with an industry can have a beneficial effect.

Today we have been discussing the winter works program. Part of its effectiveness has been because of the utilization of voluntary committees of citizens in communities throughout the country in co-operation with the Department of Labour, national employment service offices in various communities and other associations concerned. My opinion is that if we could combine the type of service which has been effective in the agricultural industry with the method of reaching the people who need help through the use of committees similar to the voluntary citizens' committees which are now at work, we might achieve some very effective results. The majority of government departments, through their specialized branches dealing with economics, marketing, scientific research and so on, possess immense stores of knowledge concerning all resources in the industrial, commercial and agricultural fields. To be of greatest value this knowledge must get into the hands of people who can use it in developing the economy. There has to be an interchange, a flow of ideas, from the government to the people who can put this knowledge to work.

The means of doing this at the present time seems to exist in Canada only to a limited degree. My suggestion is that this lack of facilities might be offset by the use of regional development councils. Councils of this type do exist in Canada now. They also exist in the United States. But there is no national program of development councils, no ordered program which would achieve this result of utilizing most effectively all the resources of knowledge of all levels of government, municipal, provincial and federal.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit a question? Did I correctly understand ihm to say there was no national program?

Mr. Fleming (Okanagan-Revelstoke): I said there was no national program of regional development councils of the type I have suggested. They exist now in regions but their work is on a local rather than a national level.

I believe that the way we can achieve the best results from this all-embracing program would be to provide a means by which these councils could readily obtain all the information which exists in all the departments of government that might be concerned. I believe that the onus for creating these councils lies with the regions which require help, regions where economic development is lagging or is in a state of imbalance. The communities within a prescribed area would form a council embracing representatives of municipal governments, business, industry and labour and this council would apply to the responsible government authority for a study of the problems of the region.

This is why I feel that the special services branch might be the one most affected by an idea of this kind. The regional council would come to a special designated authority in government and ask that a survey of its resources be made to determine what steps and assistance could be used to bring about an elimination of this state of imbalance. The federal government would act as a catalyst in bringing together all the resources of specialized knowledge that would have an application to the problem of the region under study. I would assume that the federal government, acting as a catalyst, would also have to secure the participation and cooperation of all the provincial governments, because those bodies also have a tremendous store of useful knowledge that could be valuable in a scheme of this sort.

Perhaps I may be permitted to give a specific example to show how this plan might work if it was acceptable. For the purposes of my illustration let me choose a region dependent on agriculture, forestry and tourism—and if hon. members closely examine this illustration they will recognize that its economic constitution parallels that of my own riding—with only a small proportion of secondary industry and that largely seasonal. This region would request a study of its deficiencies and its strength. Representatives of the Department of Agriculture, the new department of forestry, the Department of Labour and in this instance the dominion travel bureau would be assigned to meet with the regional development council that had been created in that area. In consultation with the council the strength and weaknesses of the regional economy would be very closely assessed. Out of this would come a series of meetings at which officials of the specialized branches of government would, through the council, bring to the attention of the region the knowledge that could be put to work in its development.

I feel that the primary function here is to stimulate the latent initiative of the people in the region, because so much of the solution of the problems with which we are faced must originate with the people themselves. Government cannot do it all. Therefore the people in regions that are experiencing difficulty must be shown what they can do. Their own initiative must be tapped. They must be given a clearer conception of what might be done and a better understanding of their own potential, as well as what might be achieved through their own resources and what types of outside aid might be most profitably sought.

The role of government as I see it is to reveal possibilities not previously realized, to provide counsel, to encourage and lead toward balanced development. This is not simply the responsibility of government alone but is a responsibility that should be spread through the entire community. This plan would serve to make readily available to the people in the region affected the knowledge they may need to help them realize their own potential.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I am sure the committee has listened with interest to the speech that has been made by the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke. As a matter of fact one wonders why more hon. members on the government side do not take part in this highly interesting discussion concerning this most important department.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Montgomery: We do not get a chance. You fellows talk all the time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would be very happy to hear the whip of the Conservative party speak on this matter, because the hon. gentleman represents a constituency like mine where there are many workers who are very much affected by this proposal.

Mr. Pallett: The greatest industrial expansion in the history of the riding is taking place right now.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is interesting, because that is the riding where the greatest dislocation occurred when the Avro contract was cancelled.

Mr. Pallett: I invite the hon. member to read the last few issues of the Brampton Conservator the contents of which indicate that a tremendous industrial expansion is occurring in that area.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am glad that my hon. friend recognizes that the measures undertaken by the former government led to expansion in many areas in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lambert: That is pure political humbug.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says "That is pure political humbug". No one should know better than my hon. friend what is humbug.

Under this item we have the opportunity of discussing the winter works program. The minister has sought to indicate by reading the letter of the president of the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities that this group endorses the program in its entirety. If the minister intended to create the impression that this letter was an endorsation of the program in its entirety, I am sure he will now agree that such is not the case. Undoubtedly the program was welcomed by the association of mayors in our country, just as it was welcomed by every hon. member of this committee. The criticism levelled by those in this party and by the mayors of Canada is that, welcome as it is, the program is inadequate and incapable by itself of meeting the problem of current unemployment.

I submit to the minister that notwithstanding the refinements and modifications announced by the Prime Minister last Saturday, the government has not taken into consideration the points raised by the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities at page 4 of the representations they submitted to the government in 1959. They observed that:

> The difficulties arise consequent upon the inability of municipal governments to finance the high costs and carrying charges of urban renewal requirements and the requirements occasioned by rapidly expanding urban growth—The difficulties of municipal governments are more in the field of capital costs rather than in the field of annual operating and administrative costs.

This is the heart of the criticism, yet this program does not touch the matter of capital cost, which is the main concern of the municipalities. This program is one in which the government shares with the municipalities and with participating provinces to the extent of 50 per cent of the payroll. That is the extent of the assistance provided by the federal government. It is absurd to suggest that this program can be represented as a vigorous onslaught on unemployment.

The minister told the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate a moment ago that least year 51,000 men were put to work under this program, but we know that in the month of March or thereabouts, on the basis of the lowest figures there were somewhere in the neighbourhood of half a million people out of work, 55,000 on the basis of the dominion bureau of statistics figures.

Last Saturday the Prime Minister, of course, did not mention the 25-point program put forward by the Liberal party this session, all of which were referred to by the Minister of Labour as inconsequential proposals. One of them, No. 7, provided for the modification of this program to make it more acceptable to the municipalities, as recommended by the federation of mayors and municipalities. The Liberal party did not put forward anything constructive, said the Minister of Labour, but last Saturday the Prime Minister made an announcement containing some of the very recommendations made by members of the Liberal party this session.

Mr. Lambert: The hon. member should be in Stratford.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let me tell the hon. gentleman where he should be. He should be in this committee giving careful attention to this problem, because he represents a city where there are lots of people who are vitally concerned with the effects of a program like this.

Mr. Lambert: They get on with it, too.

Mr. Speakman: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege arising from the remarks made by the hon. member for Essex East concerning the attendance of the hon. member for Edmonton West in this chamber. The hon. member for Edmonton West is one of the most faithful attenders in this committee.

Mr. Pickersgill: Whose privilege is that?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If I have offended the hon. member for Edmonton West or the hon. member for Wetaskiwin I want them to know I take it back. Of course the hon. member for Edmonton West is a very active attendant in this committee, and no one complains about that. I am sure he is a very sincere and devoted member. What I was complaining about is that I would like him to be as attentive to this matter as he is in respect of his attendance in this chamber.

The government takes the credit for this program. It says that as a result of its contribution to it, this represents a vigorous program designed to take care of the unemployed of our country. It speaks as though it was responsible for most of what was done by this limited program. Let up analyse the representations made by the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities, and see how insignificant is the 50 per cent share of the payroll cost of winter works projects carried out by the municipalities. I refer to page 1 of the representations made by the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities to the government in 1959. Here is what that body says with regard to the break-down of contributions to the winter works program:

> The estimated total costs (labour, materials, etc.) of the approved projects aggregated $81,375,000.

They are now speaking of last year.

> It is expected that the direct payroll costs will mount to $27,358,000, toward which the dominion government has undertaken to contribute $9,279,000, or 17.6 per cent of the total costs of the works expected to be undertaken between December 1, 1958, and April 30, 1959.

In these very figures we have the answer, we have the portrayal of the limited character of the federal government's program with regard to winter works about which so much vaunting has taken place, particularly by the Prime Minister when he spoke to this nation over television on March 3 last. This winter works program, to the extent that it goes, is welcome; but it does not meet the problem of unemployment. We have the statement of the mayor of Ottawa with regard to the inadequacy of this program, which was made only a few days ago.

It should not be forgotten that this program, in so far as the federal government is concerned, covers only 50 per cent of the payroll. It does not make any contribution toward the cost of supplies, and it does not deal with many of the indoor projects, suggested by the Canadian federation of mayors. I ask the Minister of Labour if he will deny that 50 per cent of the labour payroll costs represents only about 10 per cent of the cost of a project. If that is the case, one sees more clearly the limitations of this program which the Prime Minister in particular refers to with such satisfaction, as a method of providing work for the large number of unemployed.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Thrasher: Would the hon. member like an answer to the question he put? The municipalities themselves estimate that the percentage is 34 per cent, not the 10 per cent which he indicated.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says the 10 per cent is wrong and that it is 34 per cent? Will the hon. member explain? I referred to the statement made by the federation of mayors and municipalities and I quoted from page 2. Does my hon. friend recall what I said?

Mr. Thrasher: These are the estimated figures that came in from the municipalities for individual projects.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It should be 34 per cent instead of what I read?

Mr. Thrasher: Thirty four per cent.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is the estimated figure. If my hon. friend says that, I accept it. This is the first chance I have had in this house to congratulate the hon. gentleman, who comes from my county, on his appointment as parliamentary secretary.

An hon. Member: It has taken a long while.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend does not want me to make any comment on that. I was taking advantage of the first opportunity to congratulate a man for whom I have the highest esteem. I said I was advised that it was about 10 per cent of the cost. The parliamentary secretary corrects me and says it is about 34 per cent. I have here the statement made by the organization in 1959. It will be found on page 2, under the winter works program:

> The prescribed range and nature of works eligible for payroll assistance restricted such works to outdoor construction projects. This consideration acts to the detriment of those municipalities located in the more northerly sections of the country where, depending on the severity of winter weather, outdoor construction costs can be 50 per cent higher and more than in other parts of the country... the payroll saving costs to these municipalities is, therefore, much less than the face value of the 50 per cent federal sharing in such costs or of the combined federal and provincial sharing in those provinces which contributed a further 25 per cent or 30 per cent to the total payroll costs.

Therefore it cannot be argued that this program is one which fully satisfies the municipalities. It certainly is not one which satisfies the municipality from which I come; it certainly is not one which satisfies the city of Toronto, and it certainly is not one which satisfies the city of Ottawa. As the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate pointed out, the cities to which I have referred to are areas, where there is a greater capacity on the part of the municipality to bear its share of the burden. But in most areas, apart from my own city of Windsor, which is one of the areas where we have and have had a persistent level of unemployment, the winter works program, because it exacts a heavy contribution by the municipalities, does not enable in those municipalities as ready an opportunity of participation as cities like Toronto and Ottawa, where the municipal revenues are higher.

It is pointed out also by the association of municipalities, that whatever benefits do exist in this program are perhaps in large measure cancelled out by the cost of interest on municipal loans. Many municipalities, in order to undertake projects, have had to borrow. In order to participate a municipality itself must be prepared to make a major contribution. The only way a major contribution can be made in the case of municipalities which do not have the resources is by seeking credit. Everyone knows that pursuant to the financial and fiscal policy of this government, credit has not been obtainable in the last two years, except under exorbitant and unusually high interest rates.

Under this vote we are given the opportunity of pointing out what are the limitations of this program, limitations which certainly had not been analysed by the Prime Minister in the announcement he made last Saturday and which went all over this country as though a very comprehensive approach was being made to the solution of the problem of unemployment. Under this vote there is something else the minister can tell us, namely what the Department of Labour is doing; because after all a large sum of money is being voted, or is being asked for, namely $500,000. Since unemployment to a large extent, according to the minister, is seasonal, what is being done by the government to meet this seasonal unemployment?

I recalled to the minister last night, the work being done in the United States on this aspect of the problem. With regard to the comprehensive report made by Senator Eugene McCarthy, the chairman of the joint congressional committee on unemployment, I may say that body went from one end of the United States to the other examining this problem. When I find that we have in this country a statement as meagre as that which has been given us on these estimates, compared with the exhaustive analysis and report made, and made public, in the United States, I wonder whether a full appreciation exists on the part of the government as to how serious this problem is. We have pockets of unemployment in our country that have persisted now for some time. Are we to go on saying that this society of ours can do nothing about this problem? Our society can do something about this problem. Our society can do something if the government is prepared to take those steps which will at least permit it to make the proper assessment which, under this vote, should be made available.

Mr. Winch: May I ask, at the same time, if the minister will answer a question which I have in mind. It has to do with the position of a municipality which may desire to take advantage of the winter works program. Evidence has been given here last night and today that some municipalities may be most anxious to take advantage of these programs but may be caught because of their inability to put through the necessary plebiscites for loans to obtain the money. My question is this. Has the minister who is in charge of the winter works program given any consideration or sought the advice of the Minister of Finance concerning the possibility of applying or renewing an act, the title of which I cannot remember exactly, concerning municipal financial aid? I believe that under this act the federal government made certain moneys available to the municipalities at low interest rates. Has consideration been given, in relation to this winter works program, to applying this financial aid act which I believe is still on the statute books?

Mr. Starr: To my knowledge no consideration has been given to applying this particular act to which the hon. member has referred. However, I assure him that I will certainly look into it and take up the matter with the Minister of Finance.

In reply to the hon. member for Essex East, may I say that I realize how vitally interested he is in this problem of seasonal unemployment. From time to time he has expressed his opinions about it. I want to say to him that, so far as seasonal unemployment is concerned, in our winter works campaigns we have some 175 committees organized at the local level. These committees are organized to tie in with the local employment office activities. These committees are comprised of public spirited citizens from trade union organizations, management, women's institutes, service clubs, chambers of commerce and so on, as well as municipal and provincial bodies and governments. These are people of high calibre, outstanding citizens in their communities who are helping in our efforts to combat winter unemployment. Many useful suggestions have come from these bodies, and many have been implemented.

We have had some success in combating seasonal unemployment, although it is extremely difficult to give an accurate figure or measurement of that success. I want to thank these people, on behalf of the government, for their efforts, which are put forward on a voluntary basis. I should like to extend the same thanks to the local radio and television stations and the newspapers which have donated freely of their time in connection with municipal winter works campaigns and the do it now campaign. We believe that as a result a great deal of this unemployment in the wintertime will be alleviated.

Mr. Macdonnell: I should like to make one comment on the remarks made by the hon. member for Essex East. I believe everyone in this house feels, and indeed it has been said, that the Minister of Labour has been greatly concerned about helping in every way he can by the use of this particular program, under which 50 per cent of the cost of a special works program undertaken in the wintertime is paid for by the federal government. This program is of comparatively recent origin, and it was designed to meet special conditions. I would just point out to the hon. member what he seems to have forgotten entirely; that in complaining about more not being done he has forgotten to tell us which federal tax he would recommend raising.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend asks me a question. I would not hesitate, if I had given the assurances which were given by the Prime Minister, to fulfil those promises to take every way possible of doing so even if it involved the implication in my hon. friend's question.

Mr. Winch: We in our group are in agreement, and we would point to the corporation tax and the capital gains tax.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is one thing I should like to point out before this item passes. I have had a little bit of arithmetic done for me—I say "done for me" because I did not actually do it myself—in connection with this winter works program. I believe that the lowest possible level of unemployment last winter, even taking the dominion bureau of statistics figures for every month from December right through until April, was about half a million. This figure of 1,930,000 working days divided among 51,000 people, according to this arithmetic I have, means 38 days of work each. I do not say that to disparage what has been done, but merely to bring these things into their proper proportion. It does seem to me that before we inflate and exaggerate these things we should know what the facts are. The unfortunate fact is that if you take the number of unemployed in the areas where the burden is greatest, you will find the number of days of work provided would be away below this figure.

I know the minister will say that when these works are performed they provide supplementary work in other ways, and that of course is true. Supplies are used and equipment is used. However, I would question very much, after two years of winter works programs, whether many of the winters works that have been done across this country under this program would not have been done anyway. That again is not to disparage them. It is desirable to encourage some of this work in the wintertime; there is no doubt about that.

However, I should be interested in being told this. Of course the minister can say that this matter is not within his competence, and he is right if he says that; because the decision as to the projects rests with the municipalities or with the municipalities and the provinces, and not with the minister. All he does is veto them if they do not come within his categories. I should be greatly surprised if any independent appraisal would show that many things were done under the winter works program that would not have been done anyway at some time during the year in which they were done.

Mr. Brunsden: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the hon. gentleman mean me? If he does, I am complimented.

Mr. Brunsden: Is the hon. member suggesting that the winter works program should be abolished?

Mr. Pickersgill: No.

Mr. Brunsden: And that we make no contribution to Canadian employment?

Mr. Pickersgill: No. I am not suggesting that at all although in fact, as far as the province which I represent is concerned, it would make little difference whether or not it was abolished. I say that because the government will not listen to our argument that the federal treasury should pay for this national problem in proportion to the severity of the problem. In the hon. gentleman's province, according to one of his colleagues here in the House of Commons, there is practically no unemployment at all. Nevertheless I understand they get a considerable share of this winter works program.

Mr. Brunsden: He is a good member.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am talking about the whole province.

Mr. Brunsden: I said he is a good member.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not know what the city is that was mentioned by the hon. gentleman, because it was not about that city that I was told by another hon. member. However, there is no doubt that a considerable share of this money goes to the province of Alberta where there is, according to what we read in the public print, no debt; where they are rolling ahead—

Mr. Brunsden: That is provincial.

Mr. Pickersgill: These are provincial and municipal matters. As I was saying, presumably in Alberta the province should have no difficulty, with their ideas—they seem to have a great deal of support in that province—in doing this without any federal help at all. Yet far more winter works are done in Alberta in proportion, if not absolutely, than in all four Atlantic provinces where there is a really serious problem. That is precisely the point I am seeking to make. In my opinion this crude approach or this 50-50 approach just does not cope fairly with the problem where it is most intense.

Item agreed to.

Vocational training co-ordination—

170. Administration, $112,905.

Mr. Robichaud: This is one of the most important branches now operating under the Department of Labour. References have been made in this committee by members of the opposition to the need to increase the facilities for vocational training in this country. That was recognized, especially after the statement made by the minister on July 23 when he made a special announcement in this house respecting the training of unemployed workers. On that occasion the Minister of Labour said it had been demonstrated many times in Canada and elsewhere that training is an avenue to steadier employment and to improved working and living standards.

In his announcement the minister stated that as a means of stimulating still further training of unemployed workers throughout the country, the government had decided to increase its contribution in this field from 50 per cent to 75 per cent of the total cost. But here again the government placed upon the provinces certain conditions when assuming this increase in cost. In other words, this increase would be paid only after the province reached a certain minimum which would equal its participation in previous years. At the time these estimates were prepared by the department the Minister of Labour as well as the government must have been well aware of unemployment conditions throughout the country. I cannot see how, at the time of the preparation of the estimates, they could decide to reduce the item for vocational training co-ordination by $1 million.

Furthermore, when we look at the details of these items, which are shown on page 241, we notice that in the payments made to the provinces there is a reduction. I may be slightly out of order, Mr. Chairman, but I am taking together items 170 and 171 which pertain to this branch. I am now referring particularly to item 171. By adopting this procedure I thought it would be easier for the minister to answer my questions.

Referring to the payments to the provinces, we note that in the amount for vocational and technical school assistance there is a reduction of $1,100,000. This reduction comes at a time when everyone seems to recognize that there is in this country a shortage of skilled labour and a need for further training. Referring to the training of unemployed workers, I notice that while last year we spent $525,000, this year we are called upon to vote an amount of $610,000, an increased of $85,000. Will the minister advise this committee whether any estimates have been arrived at as to the extra amount that may be required in order to meet the commitments which were announced in the House of Commons on July 23 last, when the minister made the announcement respecting the training of unemployed workers?

Mr. Starr: It is difficult at this time to estimate the cost for this present fiscal year owing to the increase in the federal contribution. As soon as we have some indication from the provinces—and the provinces have been advised of this formally—then of course we will be in a position to estimate the cost. This estimated amount will, of course, be brought before parliament in supplementary estimates.

As to the reduction of $1,100,000, this comes out of a program that was established in 1957. It is a five-year program for capital projects, that is to say the building of schools, to which we contribute 50 per cent. This contribution over the five-year period was in the amount of $25 million. Certain allotments out of this $25 million have been made to the various provinces. The provinces indicate to us their requirements for the ensuing fiscal year and we pay them from that $25 million in that fiscal year. The reason there is a reduction of $1,100,000 is that this is the amount of the requests which have come from the provinces. That is the lower amount they need for this year. If they had requested the same amount they had last year, most certainly that contribution would have been made. It is based on requests from the provinces for capital expenditures on vocational schools.

Mr. Robichaud: Can the minister supply us with further information with regard to the building of schools under this program? Can he give us details as to the assistance which is being given to the province of New Brunswick, or which will be given during the fiscal year 1960-61; and can he tell us what particular schools will be covered by this assistance?

Mr. Starr: I think the hon. member wants to know how much New Brunswick is prepared to pay during the fiscal year 1960-61, or how much is requested for capital projects?

Mr. Robichaud: Yes. The reason I ask is that in New Brunswick there is an urgent need, perhaps more urgent than in most of the other provinces, for this vocational training.

Mr. Starr: For the period of five years New Brunswick submitted to us a program for schools in various areas in the province. I am afraid I will have to read them to the hon. member and put on the record the municipalities in which these schools are proposed and the amounts which are allocated from our vote to the provinces.

First of all there is the New Brunswick technical institute at Moncton, $980,349.26; Andover high school, $277; Bath high school, $219.55; Bathurst high school, $1,193.97; Campbellton high school, $574.34; Caraquet high school, $825; Carleton vocational school at Woodstock, $216.25; Centreville, $173.56; Edmundston, $22.55. It is a very long list; does the hon. member require any more?

Mr. Robichaud: Perhaps it could be supplied later.

Mr. Starr: Yes, I will supply it later.

Mr. Pascoe: Mr. Chairman, I intended to wait and speak on item 171, but it has been referred to now. Under this item I would like to draw to the minister's attention the increased contribution by the federal government for special training of unemployed workers, as announced in this house last week by the Right Hon. Prime Minister. I am particularly interested in this program, because for the province of Saskatchewan most of this training will be done at the new technical institute in my home city of Moose Jaw.

Classes for unemployed workers were carried on last winter at the institute in Moose Jaw, although the building was only partially completed at that time. Training was given in four classes; motor vehicle repair, carpentry, plumbing and sheet metal work. I believe these classes were very successful.

In last winter's training program the federal government paid one half the cost. For this winter's training classes the federal government will pay 75 per cent of the cost provided a certain minimum number of trainees are enrolled. That is my main reason for speaking now, Mr. Chairman. I want to point out that Ottawa will now pay three quarters of the cost if the provinces make the necessary effort to meet the minimum requirements.

On page 241 of the blue book the estimate of federal payments for training unemployed workers is $610,000, up considerably from the amount estimated for this purpose in the last fiscal year. This is only a preliminary estimate, as pointed out by the Minister of Labour, because as the Prime Minister indicated in his announcement last week, supplementary estimates will be necessary if the provincial governments take full advantage of the federal offer.

Mr. Robichaud: Will the hon. member permit a question? In order to have the record straight, will the hon. member refer to the announcement made by the Minister of Labour, not the Prime Minister?

Mr. Pascoe: The Prime Minister also made an announcement last week, if you would read it. I think all members will agree that money for this purpose will be very well spent. As the Minister of Labour has indicated on other occasions, there are employment opportunities for skilled workers. I believe he said there are vacancies right now for such skilled workers. In view of this fact the program that will be carried on in Moose Jaw this winter, and for which the federal government will pay 75 per cent of the cost, is a very important move toward providing more and better paid jobs.

You will notice that I have repeated three or four times this major assistance from Ottawa of 75 per cent of the cost. I do this with a purpose, Mr. Chairman, because the Saskatchewan government in past years has given the federal government very little credit for this assistance. I have two newspaper clippings to which I wish to refer. One is headed "Saskatchewan Scores First", and the first paragraph of the article reads:

> Saskatchewan has scored another first in the launching this year of a special winter training program for the unemployed—

A second newspaper clipping is an advertisement headed "Government of Saskatchewan, Department of Education, Winter Training Program for Unemployed". The advertisement outlines regulations for these training classes, particularly in regard to dates and duration of courses, types of training, qualifications for applicants, transportation and living allowances. Perhaps the minister can give more details in this regard.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would like to refer to one paragraph in the Minister of Labour's statement. Reading from Hansard of July 23, page 6820, here is the paragraph I wish to emphasize:

> It has been demonstrated many times in Canada and elsewhere, Mr. Speaker, that training is an avenue to steadier employment and to increased working and living standards. We must do all we can in the interests of individual workers, their families and the country as a whole to raise the level of our manpower skills.

I think this is a challenge, Mr. Chairman, that the provincial governments should accept to the fullest extent possible, especially when Ottawa is paying most of the cost. I would like to ask the minister whether unemployed workers are fully informed of this opportunity to improve their working skills, and if they can take the courses referred to while they are drawing unemployment insurance.

Mr. Starr: They will be informed by the unemployment insurance offices where they are registered, and of course they will be eligible for unemployment insurance providing they have made the contributions to receive it.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, this is a very important branch of the department's activities, and in our opinion will grow more important as the years go by, particularly under the circumstances we have been discussing in the last two days. I was one who was concerned with this reduction in the estimates of over $1 million, but I can understand that in view of the minister's information. But apparently in respect to this vocational training scheme the initiative is left to the provinces, and after listening to the hon. member for Moose Jaw he certainly demonstrated that the province of Saskatchewan has seized the initiative.

Mr. Pascoe: But we are paying for it.

Mr. Herridge: But it took the initiative in the first place in co-operation with this government, and I congratulate the government of Saskatchewan on that account. Now, that is tit for tat.

I rise particularly because this is a matter of increasing and growing concern to the constituents I have the honour to represent. Over the last five years various local organizations and groups have recognized the necessity for some type of vocational training institution in the southern interior of British Columbia, and on that account they have made representations to the provincial government to take advantage of this scheme, so far without result. In view of coming events in British Columbia this fall they may get a more favourable reaction in the immediate weeks ahead.

As a result of this failure on the part of the provincial government to take the initiative and make application to the federal government for assistance in this field of vocational training, there has been nothing done to date to provide the facilities which are sorely needed now. Interest in this is growing. There have been meetings of various organizations. I have had resolutions sent to me and I have received letters from various groups and from people who are supporters of all the parties in Canada, women's groups and so on.

First of all, I should like the minister to say what he thinks is the best course for local people to follow in prodding the provincial government into action. Then I wish he would inform the committee of any proposals for the extension or construction of vocational schools or the extension of vocational training in British Columbia this year. Also, would he be good enough to inform the committee whether, in connection with assistance to students, a person drawing unemployment insurance can continue to draw that insurance while receiving assistance from this fund.

Mr. Winch: May I ask one or two questions in the same vein? Earlier this afternoon I asked the minister about the 124,000 people who have been unemployed for four months or more. As I understand it, the vocational training scheme is going to provide instruction in new technologies, and that cannot be done properly in one month or in six months. Can the minister tell the committee whether training of this sort would apply to the 124,000 people I have mentioned and, if so, what arrangements have been made or are being made, with the provinces to ensure that the men who are undergoing training will receive assistance in respect of themselves and their families? They have to live while they are undergoing this training, and I should like to know what the arrangements are.

Mr. Starr: A person who undergoes this training must be referred by the unemployment insurance commission, and if he is eligible for unemployment insurance he is able to draw unemployment insurance. In addition, the provinces may make an allowance in respect of that person and his family during the period of training, to which this government contributes as part of the overall cost of training that person.

Mr. Winch: Is there any time limit? If a man is being retrained, for example, that is bound to take considerable time. How long may a man continue to receive assistance?

Mr. Starr: During the whole period of the course, whatever the time may be. Some courses are shorter, some are longer; but for the whole period of the course the person being trained is eligible for that allowance.

Mr. Winch: I presume that no matter how long the course may be, if insurance benefit runs out there is an arrangement between the Department of Labour and the provincial government concerned. I presume the man will receive welfare payments, or is there a payment the same as unemployment insurance?

Mr. Starr: We must not lose sight of this fact, that the organization of these courses must be a provincial responsibility. It is the provincial governments which undertake to arrange these courses, not the federal government. We say we are prepared to pay 75 per cent of the cost of training an unemployed person providing the provinces undertake to establish and supervise these courses; and if they make allowances for the upkeep of the persons being trained we gladly contribute to the extent of 75 per cent.

Mr. Winch: The federal government also pays 75 per cent of the cost of maintenance?

Mr. Starr: That is right.

Mr. Batten: I believe that vocational training is important to Canada, and I think it is particularly important at this time. We live in a large country, a country which is going through an acute transition stage toward becoming an industrial nation. I think it is fair to say we have reached some industrial stature even now, but I certainly believe the years ahead will show that we are capable of reaching a greater industrial stature than we have attained at the present time. In order to do this Canada will have to provide for those industries we have now and for those we will have in the future the type of skilled labour which those industries will demand, and we must do this not only to provide work for those who live in this country at the present time but also to maintain our exports, which provide jobs and a living for a large percentage of our population.

Industries as they go forward, whether it is a matter of improving old plants by automation or of introducing new processes, are going to require different types of skills, and I believe it is the responsibility of Canada to train young people so they may have the skills which industry demands. I know I am not in order when I say that I believe we are not spending enough in Canada on education generally. That, of course, is a matter for the provinces, but here is one field of education where the federal government could play a very important part.

I think we spend all too little on education in Canada. I have said before in the house, and I am going to repeat it now, that during wartime we spent millions of dollars so that men could fly through the air like birds; we spent millions of dollars to see that men could swim through the water like fish, and we spent millions of dollars to see that men could be carried over the surface of the earth as machines for destruction. I think it is about time we spent a little to see that men may walk the earth in peace. I say again that we in Canada have not spent enough on education generally, though I recognize that this is not a field into which the federal government can inject itself.

However, here is one aspect of education in which the federal government can play an important part. Last year, on education generally, Canada spent between $1 billion and $1.5 billion, and of that amount $57 million was spent on vocational training. In other words, 3.7 per cent of the total amount of money spent on education in Canada within the last year was spent on vocational training or, to put it in other terms, out of every dollar spent on education in Canada only four cents was spent on vocational training.

Here we are as a growing nation faced every year with the problems of young people coming out of school and looking for employment, yet we spend only 4 per cent of our total expenditure on education for vocational training. There may be those who believe that all students should go through school and follow an academic course leading to the arts and professions and so on. I think nature has decreed that a large percentage of our people are equipped to do that kind of work, but nature has also decreed that there are those who are going to have to make their living with their hands. I believe we have large numbers of young Canadians who have great native talent, but it needs to be trained. We spend billions of dollars to refine our raw materials for our factories but we spend very little—four cents out of every dollar spent on education—to refine the human resources that will process these raw materials.

In Canada we must look forward to the years ahead when our people are going to be engaged in some form of industry. I have disagreed in this house before and will do so again with any type of 50-50 policy initiated by the federal government. In some cases it works out very well, but in others it does not. In the case, for example, of the trans-Canada highway, as I mentioned in this house on a number of occasions, it works out to the advantage of some provinces but with respect to others it is an imposition. In the case of vocational training that statement is equally true, because the provinces which need the money most are those which can least afford to get the greatest advantage out of the program. In Newfoundland, for example, at the present time 37.5 per cent of the total revenue of the province is spent on education, yet last year we had only 694 students enrolled in trade courses, 175 as apprentices and 303 in vocational high school.

Mr. Brunsden: What was the total school population, the total number of students?

Mr. Batten: Yes, in this particular type of training.

Mr. Brunsden: The hon. member did not understand my question.

Mr. Batten: I believe we should be training larger numbers of students in the manual skills, that will enable them to be employed by people who need the skills which they are able to provide.

I receive many letters from my constituents asking me to find jobs for them in one manufacturing concern or another. Some of these people I know very well and others I do not know at all. I sometimes have to write these people and ask what they can do. If they are unable to do anything but ordinary labour, then it is clear that in these days when so many jobs are being done by machinery these people have nothing to offer a prospective employer.

Surely every Canadian should be able to do something well. I believe this form of vocational training is particularly important to our young people. I do not know how many of the young people coming out of school at the end of each school year are employed the following year, but if a large percentage of these people are unemployed, and if they make up a fairly high percentage of the total unemployed persons in this country, this only points up the greater need for this program.

I was pleased to hear the minister announce the other day that the federal share of the cost of training unemployed workers would be increased from 50 per cent to 75 per cent. That means that if the provinces are able to pay next year the same amount they paid last year, the total amount of money spent on training unemployed workers will be doubled. That is the mathematics of the statement the minister made. If we can increase that amount by 100 per cent we certainly will be doing a lot more than we have done in the past. I commend the minister for the statement he made, and will be interested to see how the plan works out when the department has had time to carry it into operation.

However, I wish to point out that assistance is required not only for the unemployed workers but for the whole vocational training program. Extra money is needed by every province to see that those who have been endowed by nature with some particular skill will have an opportunity of improving that skill by training so they will be able to give to the industry of their nation the new skills which are required not only by the introduction of new industries but also by the employment of automation in the old.

I do not believe that automation is going to mean fewer jobs. It may have that effect at any given time, but over the long run I believe automation will produce more jobs. It will do so, however, only for those who are equipped to take them; that is the important thing. As we look forward into the future I believe we must have an increasing concern about vocational training for our young people so they will be able to take part in industry that has benefited by automation. I have never felt that automation was a good word or one that accurately describes the process, but perhaps in the absence of a better one we will have to retain that word.

We do have automation in this country, and we have to face that fact. I think it is important that we train our people to face the type of life with which they will be confronted when they leave the confines of their local schoolrooms and go out looking for jobs.

I think, too, that we should give a little more encouragement to those who try to improve themselves. May I raise again a pet problem of mine. I have in my riding a number of men, some of them over age 20, who were engaged in various occupations long enough to qualify for unemployment insurance benefits. Due to an improved capital expenditure program on education which has been carried out in Newfoundland over the last few years, small settlements began receiving the advantage of regional high schools which were able to provide educational training which these small settlements had not enjoyed hitherto.

These men who were out of work and drawing unemployment insurance were able to do one of two things. They could sit at home, collect unemployment insurance and do nothing, or they could attend the local school and take some courses thereby improving their educational standing. But the moment they entered the local school they were no longer able to draw unemployment insurance. I do not think that is the type of encouragement we should be giving to Canadians who want to improve their general educational standard or undertake vocational training in order to equip them to accept better jobs.

There may be some arguments for and against the case of university students, but I will not go into that now. I am dealing with the case of the unemployed worker who could have stayed home and done nothing and drawn his unemployment insurance, or who could have gone to the local school and improved himself, thereby making himself a more valuable employee for the next employer who might engage his services. By seeking to improve himself this type of student is immediately penalized for his initiative and loses his unemployment insurance. I do not think this is the way we should encourage young Canadians.

Further investigation of vocational training should be made. I suggest that this is an excellent problem for the standing committee on industrial relations to discuss next year. I also suggest that the committee of the other place on unemployment will not be doing its job well if it neglects this problem. I say, too, that at the federal-provincial conference which is to be held in the fall consideration must be given to vocational training across Canada as it applies to the federal government and all the provincial governments, so the provinces will know where they are going, what they are doing and how best to advertise among their young people the type of training that is made available by the different levels of government.

We must indeed encourage our young people to meet the standards which a growing country demands, which the industry that is responsible for making the country great, demands; but I think, too, in our program of vocational training there must be a system whereby the standards reached by those in training in various parts of Canada will be standardized. The levels of training must in some way be standardized so that those who are trained in one part of the country can be employed in some other part of the country where there is a demand for that particular type of service. This, too, is a matter which needs some consideration.

I am not going to proceed further with this, although it is one of my pet subjects. Again I want to commend the minister for the increase in the grants which are being made by the federal government for the training of unemployed workers. I sincerely suggest to him that this increase from 50 per cent to 75 per cent for the training of unemployed workers should be extended to the whole field of vocational training.

[Mr. Batten.]

Mr. Brunsden: Will the hon. member permit a question? I asked this question before, but I think the hon. member who has made a real contribution to this debate missed the point. He quoted certain statistics. What is the relation of the number taking vocational training in the province to the school population as a whole?

Mr. Batten: I can give the hon. gentleman that information, Mr. Chairman, but I think they would be rough figures. I do not have them before me, but the figures I gave for those engaged in vocational training were 694 in trade courses, 175 apprentices and 303 in vocational training. That would be roughly 1,100 students. The total school population of Newfoundland is somewhere around 65,000 to 70,000.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, I listened to the comments of the last speaker with considerable interest, because I wish to speak along the same lines myself. It is sometimes difficult to rise in one's place and speak about education because as we know this is largely a provincial matter, but I hope these grants for vocational training open the subject wide enough to enable us to explore some of the issues which are intimately connected with this question, and one of them I think is the age at which our children leave school. I suggest to the minister that in this program of educating the public of Canada, and particularly the people who are interested in this matter on the provincial level, consideration be given to getting the provinces to agree to keep all children at school until the age of 18, and possibly the age of 20.

After the war it was my privilege to give vocational guidance to those soldiers who were coming out of the armed forces and seeking to rehabilitate themselves. The greatest problem we had was that a great many of those young men, I would assume about three quarters of them, had no skill whatsoever apart from their military training except that of being able to drive a car or a truck. Today, as has been so well put, we are becoming increasingly industrialized. It was all right at one time to leave school and go home and help your dad on the farm when you were 16, because the skills you had to learn were learned at first hand at the plow behind a team of horses; but even on the farms today you are not going to make a decent living, and you are certainly not going to be a successful farmer, one who has a knowledge of our agricultural industry, unless you have considerable technical skill.

As has been said also, the provinces are less able to finance this scheme of technical education, which covers a wide field. It covers not only industry and manufacturing but mining, metallurgy, exploration for oil, survey of our natural resources, and this great new forestry department which is to be set up. I think there will be great need there for technical men of all kinds. It should provide an opportunity to put a lot of our young people to work in the woods, and to provide them with schooling while they are there. Perhaps even the age of 18 is too low; perhaps if you could keep them in school until the age of 20 it would assist not only in keeping all those young people from coming out as unskilled unemployed but would increase their capability once they did get out.

Mr. Winch: And free education up to the age of 20, I presume.

Mr. Valade: There is no such thing as free education; somebody has to pay for it.

Mr. Bigg: Yes, I would go so far as to say that any young person who shows the proper initiative at school, who does the right amount of work—and I think most children who do work hard show reasonable marks—should have every opportunity to continue his schooling certainly up to the age of 20. I can speak from first hand experience. Some people say, "Well, if you have the courage to go to school and the ability, you will get your education". That is not always so. During the 1930's, and this applies right up to the war—I do not blame Mr. Bennett for this any more than I blame Mr. King—it was almost impossible for a boy born and raised on a farm to make enough money to put himself through college, and I myself did not graduate from college until 1953. This may have had something to do with native ability; nevertheless there was an economic block.

If as a federal government we can lead the way in educating the provinces and the individual members of the public to spend the necessary funds, I think it will be an investment in natural resources second to none. Our young people are the greatest natural resource there is.

I also wish to say at this time that it is not good enough just to educate them. We have to create opportunities for future employment here in Canada. I get tired of hearing and reading from time to time the statistics of the technically trained young people who go south of the line. I think we are responsible for producing thousands of well trained, well educated young men and women, and not enough attention is paid to maintaining the standards of pay and opportunity here in Canada. I am not going to labour the point here, but I certainly want to put my moral support behind the last speaker and, of course, behind our ministry who are taking this forward step. As to the amounts of money provided, I am in sympathy with the provinces which do not have a great amount of money, but I think they themselves can do more to encourage vocational and technical training at the provincial level.

I should like also to say something about equal standards of education across Canada. Again this is perhaps a little bit out of line here, but it is very difficult for families who are working at occupations where they must follow the work and who must take their children out of school in one province and put them in school in another. Often they may lose a year and sometimes more of their school training. I should like to see something done to standardize education across Canada and also to standardize the licensing requirements for certain professions, such as the nursing profession, for instance. A nurse has to get a licence in each province across Canada. It seems to me that a nurse who is properly trained in Montreal is quite capable of looking after sick people in Winnipeg or Vancouver.

Educational standards are certainly something that need attention, because members of the armed forces continually meet problems in that connection. If a man is stationed at Dartmouth in Nova Scotia and goes to Cold Lake in Alberta, he will find that adjustments have to be made in the level of education of his children. I will not say whether they lose or gain, but there are adjustments to be made. It seems to me ridiculous to have 10 standards of education in a country like Canada, where our population has to shift from province to province. It is certainly affecting the free movement of our labour force, and if it is going to affect the education of our children then I say anything that encourages the young people with initiative to stay at school and improve their technical ability will add to the economic welfare of our country.

Mr. Starr: The hon. member for Kootenay West asked a question regarding this item. He asked for a suggestion as to how to prod the provincial governments. Of course the proper procedure is to have the local school board approach the department of education of that province. I think it is the department of education in the province which institutes these programs, and that would be the proper procedure.

Now then, out of this $25 million allotment for a period of five years, British Columbia has been allocated $1,859,100. British Columbia has submitted three projects to us for approval and they consist of vocational schools at Burnaby, Prince George and Nanaimo. The date we have made available $933,582.08 out of this allotment.

Mr. Pearson: This discussion indicates one thing, Mr. Chairman; that there is no difference of opinion in the committee as to the importance of vocational training for the development of skills which are becoming more and more important to our society. This vocational training is important not only in respect of the young people—we have been discussing primarily the young people—but it has a bearing on employment problems because of the necessity for the retraining in the right vocational skills, of those who are unemployed so they may find work. Reference has already been made to this.

It is impossible to develop these vocational skills without the right kind of vocational training. At least I thought it was until I read in the newspaper a few weeks ago about a teen ager who could not read or write but was sufficiently skilled to manufacture a very complicated type of bomb which he used to blow up a neighbour's car. Normally, however, I think it is fair to say that vocational training is needed for the development of vocational skills.

Mr. Brunsden: He must have been a Liberal.

Mr. Pearson: The bomb worked. As our society becomes more industrialized the importance of this kind of training increases. Some years ago I was in the Far East, and I remember attending a dinner in Singapore where I sat beside a Chinese lady who was in charge of education for Singapore. I cannot imagine any more difficult problem than being responsible for the education of the population of Singapore. She was telling me something to which reference has been made already in this discussion, that all the young people wanted to get an academic education. They all wanted to be lawyers, doctors or civil servants. She said something I have never forgotten, and it has application to our own country; that it is more important in these days to turn out educated technicians than people who are educated merely technically. This, of course, is why vocational training is so important.

It is satisfying to learn that the government has recognized that importance and is doing what it can in this field. I read from the minister's statement the other night at page 7146 of Hansard:

> I may say that at the present time vocational training facilities are filled to capacity and there is a need for additional facilities.

This has been underlined by the remarks of all speakers this afternoon.

> To meet this need the provinces are being encouraged to establish additional facilities and to take advantage of capital funds which are available under these agreements.

As we know, these agreements provide for the sharing of the capital costs of these facilities on a 50-50 basis. As has been pointed out, some of the provinces find it difficult to meet their share of the cost of establishing facilities of this kind. Perhaps it is not possible for the minister to answer this, but I wonder whether he can give the committee any information as to how often developments in this field have been held up, not because of the lack of a federal contribution but because the provinces themselves are not financially in a position to take advantage of the agreement.

Mr. Starr: The information I have received is that we do not know, nor can we state, why certain provinces are not moving as rapidly in the direction of these schools as are other provinces. There may be various reasons. They may want to allot their funds to a different type of school in which we do not participate. However, most provinces with which we have agreements have been moving very well in this direction, and have been taking up in full the allotments that have been set aside for them.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps the minister would agree that it is often the poorer provinces, where the need is greatest, which have difficulty in carrying out the agreement.

Mr. Starr: That may be possible.

Mr. Robichaud: I should like to add a word before this item passes. I should like to emphasize once again the importance of this item to the economic growth of this country. The government should recognize that it is responsible for employment and should, therefore, make special representations to the provinces inviting them to take advantage of this offer in connection with vocational training. Under this program, as has been suggested, schools should be built to provide this vocational training. In too many cases the youth of this country leave the primary schools unprepared for anything but unskilled labour.

I am sure the minister would agree that if vocational training were given it would be needless for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to advertise in the Belfast newspapers for skilled workers to come to this country. I am pleased to note that the unemployment insurance commission has been cooperating in this program.

Before resuming my seat I should like to put on record a paragraph from page 14 of the unemployment insurance commission report for the year ending March 31, 1959, which reads as follows:

> Direction to vocational training—Direction of individuals to vocational training courses under various dominion-provincial agreements and to courses in training centres approved by the commission resulted in many people receiving training in occupations where demand for workers had exceeded the supply. During the year, a total of 4,510 claimants received unemployment insurance benefit while attending vocational training courses. This was more than double the number of claimants directed to training during the previous year.

My reason for placing this paragraph on record is to show that less than 1 per cent of the unemployed in this country are taking advantage of this opportunity to attend vocational schools. I think they should be induced to take advantage of this training. This would be one way for the Department of Labour to help in solving our unemployment problem.

Mr. Hellyer: The case for vocational training has been very well put this afternoon by a number of hon. members, particularly the hon. member for Humber-St. George's, who I thought spoke eloquently and beautifully on a serious and far-reaching problem and offered a solution which was constructive and which should commend itself to all hon. members of this committee.

I appreciate and commend the government for its new move to increase the federal participation in the joint training plan with the provinces with respect to technical training. However, I do not believe they have gone far enough. I think this is a half measure, and will not meet the problem that at present faces us. In any of these problems the most important thing to do is to face their magnitude. This is something the government has failed to do. This fact was patent both from listening to and reading the debates of the last two days. Unemployment in this country has reached the level of hundreds of thousands of people, not just a few thousand. Among these hundreds of thousands of people, particularly in the case of the male unemployed population, the level of education is unfortunately not great. I have not the actual statistics here with me; I wish I had. However, I was interested to note that the large majority of the male unemployed had a grade 8 education or less.

Here is a tremendous opportunity. Here is something which must be done. However, the government is not going to accomplish it by offering a partial payment to provinces which are going to take up the challenge. The provinces were here in Ottawa this week looking for extra financial assistance. They are already overburdened and overpressed. Unemployment may have been considered at one time to be a provincial problem, but it is no longer that. It is a federal problem. The federal government has in fact, taken over, the main and primary responsibility for unemployment in this country, and the problem of technical training is directly and inseparably connected with the problem of unemployment. In this labour force there are hundreds of thousands of people who need additional technical training, people who need either new skills if they have been displaced by automation or a skill in cases where they have never been fortunate enough to receive adequate training in the first place. There is a tremendous opportunity for an investment along the lines suggested by the hon. member for Kootenay West last night when he was suggesting investments which are self-recovering, or which put back into the national economy more than they take out.

In discussing this matter on previous occasions I have said that it is a problem of considerable magnitude which must be faced on the basis of that magnitude. The expenditure involved in order to meet this problem might, by the time it became fully in force, amount to $100 million or $200 million a year. It is that order of magnitude which is required, not an expenditure of $8 million a year in participating with the provincial governments. Nor can we expect the provincial governments to raise the extra money required so that through this joint operation the job may be done effectively. This job will be done effectively only when the federal government accepts the responsibility and pays the whole shot. There is no way around it. Under the present distribution of responsibility and taxing authority as between the levels of government, there is no other way in which the challenge can be faced. I therefore urge the minister to take another look at the problem, to re-assess it, to consider the magnitude, and to come back to the House of Commons with a recommendation which is worthy of the minister and worthy of the problem he faces. I can assure him that he will get a sympathetic reception from all parts of this chamber.

Vocational training is an investment which would return much to the Canadian economy. It is an investment which would return just as much as the program which was put into effect after world war II, when thousands of young people like myself had the advantage of higher education at the expense of the government. That program was part of a rehabilitation process, and that is what is required now, namely rehabilitation of people who are unemployed through no fault of their own.

Startling was the revelation recently that only one person out of ten in our unemployed labour force has the skills necessary to accept the jobs offered. Statistically, what could be more startling? What could be more revealing in respect of the nature of the problem? The other nine people required more training before they can accept the jobs that are presently available in our national economy. We recommend that something appropriate be done about this matter.

As the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has said on numerous occasions, it does not make sense that people drawing unemployment insurance should not be able to take advantage of the technical training at the same time. It is far better that these people should go to school in the wintertime and learn something which will enable them, once they return to the labour force, to be more productive, more happily and more usefully occupied.

This is a program that does not need long consideration. It does not need an advisory council. All it needs is a government with the courage and imagination to put it into effect. We hope the minister will give it the necessary consideration, will recommend it to his colleagues, and will have them recommend it to the House of Commons.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Order. It seems to me that it is the wish of the committee, as I interpret it, to consider both items 170 and 171 together. They are the items dealing with vocational training, the first under the head of administration and the second with the way in which vocational training operates. If that is the wish of the committee it will facilitate the debate. Do I understand that is agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Brunsden: Had opportunity offered last evening for me to participate in this debate, Mr. Chairman, I would have immediately said that I was happy that no representatives of the unemployed were in the gallery. We heard raucous laughter. We heard a lighthearted approach to a serious problem, and I felt at eleven o'clock that we had made no contribution to it. Today I feel that there has been an approach, a contribution and a soul searching with respect to the fundamental problem of unemployment, and today I wish the unemployed representatives were here.

Of all the cabinet posts in the government, in my opinion the most unenviable one is that of the Minister of Labour. Speaking not as a member of the government but as a member of the House of Commons I should like to say I am deeply convinced that our present Minister of Labour is doing a most conscientious and thorough job with respect to the most difficult problem in Canada. Let me say to him, Mr. Chairman, through you that I am not too greatly swayed by statistics, particularly the Martin bureau of statistics.

There are thousands of statistics with respect to unemployment. One speaks in his own environment and from his own experience. I live in a small town of approximately 3,000 people. I know that each month certain of our elder citizens become incapacitated. They retire, and they have an arrangement whereby they may enjoy unemployment insurance for a year or 18 months. They say it is by right; I am not so sure that it is. Nevertheless they are in the picture of the unemployment insurance situation in Canada. There are many younger people, and those of us who perforce must live in Ottawa over a period must hear them talking. They work for so long and then they say they can enjoy their unemployment insurance now.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Order. Are the remarks of the hon. member dealing with unemployment insurance exclusively? The committee is considering vocational training.

Mr. Brunsden: I will bow to your decision, Mr. Chairman. These are the young people who I wish would enjoy vocational training. These are the young people I wish would be encouraged to enjoy vocational training. These are the young people who by virtue of vocational training tomorrow will make better Canadians.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Shall items 170 and 171 carry?

Items agreed to.

Government employees compensation—
172. Administration of the Government Employees Compensation Act, $112,170.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I would like to raise a question on this item, which is for the administration of the Government Employees Compensation Act in the amount of $112,170, followed by a statutory item with regard to payments of compensation respecting government employees in the amount of $1,900,000, making a total vote of $2,012,107.

I would like to make a brief comment befor asking a question as to how it affects workmen's compensation for government employees. As we all know, workmen's compensation comes completely within the jurisdiction and administration of the provinces. I can only speak for my own province of British Columbia, under which I have quite an understanding of compensation.

I believe it was back somewhere around 1917 that workmen's compensation first became law in British Columbia. At that time the chairman of the board was a man who had been an outstanding citizen, Mr. E. S. H.

Wynn, who held his position for many years. But in those days of the administration of workmen's compensation there was that section which said that in deciding workmen's compensation or workmen's compensation pensions the benefit of the doubt went to the applicant. Unfortunately E. S. H. Wynn is no longer chairman, and under the new government of British Columbia it is now almost impossible to get the benefit of the doubt or to make an appeal in a workmen's compensation case. I am very sorry to have to say that, but that is my estimation and my understanding.

Now, why do I raise this matter here on this vote, which is a federal matter? It is because over the last year or two I have received a number of letters from those who are covered by provincial workmen's compensation but in whose cases the money is being paid by the federal government. Federal employees, at least as far as those in British Columbia are concerned, are finding that the benefit of the doubt no longer exists. It is almost impossible for anyone, either a member of parliament or a member of the legislative assembly or anybody else, to get a review on a question of the benefit of the doubt, or to get any results at all.

In view of that disgraceful situation which exists in British Columbia because of the kind of government in the province today, and in view of the fact that it now costs this government in administration and payments over $2 million, I would ask the minister to help and protect federal employees who come under provincial workmen's compensation. I would ask him whether he has in his department what I might call a workmen's compensation advocate who is responsible for payments to provincial authorities on claims for workmen's compensation or claims for pensions, and at the same time whether he has a medical adviser in his department. As far as I am concerned I would be glad to support the appointment of a compensation advocate to take up the cases of unfortunate employees of the federal civil service who may have trouble in getting satisfaction from provincial governments and are not obtaining the benefit of the doubt, which I think is an important point of law.

Mr. Starr: We have no advocate in the department at the moment, nor have we as such a position for a medical adviser. But we do avail ourselves in many cases of the medical advisers in the Department of National Health and Welfare if medical advice is necessary. Also, where an appeal has been made to us and we feel there is some ground for it, we bring it to the attention of the provincial compensation board on behalf of a federal employee and ask for a review of the particular case.

Mr. Winch: If the minister's experience is the same as mine as far as the present government and the board in British Columbia are concerned, he has not got anywhere on a single case. So a reference to the provincial government of British Columbia is useless. Is consideration being given to including in this department an advocate and a medical officer? If not, do all federal employees know that if they cannot get what they think is just from a provincial workmen's compensation board there is a means to appeal for help to the minister's department? Is that known to all federal employees; because I am getting many letters on this matter?

Mr. Starr: Yes, they are well aware of that, and if they approach us, as has been the case in the past, we ask for a review by the provincial board.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, before making these few remarks the minister might save my making them at all. Am I right in saying that this item would cover the compensation of the employees of the giant Yellowknife gold mine in the Northwest Territories?

Mr. Starr: No.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Then could the minister tell me whether they come under federal jurisdiction?

Mr. Starr: They are under the Northwest Territories ordinance. They have their own provisions.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Well, I did not know how this question could be raised in any other way. If I am out of order, Mr. Chairman, I will at once accept your ruling, but I think this is a matter of major importance and I think it should be raised on the floor of the house.

Mr. Starr: May I interrupt the hon. member and say it should properly be raised on the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs, because it comes under the jurisdiction of the commissioner of the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Am I at liberty to proceed, Mr. Chairman?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): If the hon. member relates his remarks to the subject of employees' compensation he will be in order.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): That leaves me in an awkward position, Mr. Chairman, because I had been intending to raise this matter on these estimates. It has to do with the position of employees of gold mines, and I was under the impression that this matter came under federal jurisdiction. It has to do with what is called compulsory aluminum dust therapy, which I understand is practised in all the gold quartz mines in Canada, which would include those under federal jurisdiction in the Northwest Territories. This is a matter of importance because of the experience we have had in the Porcupine gold mine area, and I am sure the same applies elsewhere though possibly not to the same degree because there are not the same numbers involved.

This aluminum dust treatment was brought about by the McIntyre foundation—I am not sure of the name—as a cure or means of prevention of the scourge of gold miners, namely silicosis. From the point of view of company compensation costs it may have worked successfully, because certainly the incidence of silicosis has dropped sharply since the introduction of this therapy. But since this treatment began the incidence of tuberculosis in the gold mining areas has increased threefold, and the incidence of carcinoma, which is a fancy word for lung cancer, has increased at a terrific rate and there are fears among the people involved in the mining industry as to whether there may be some connection between the increase in these dangerous diseases and the treatment they have been receiving.

Some work has been done in this connection, and from this work and study we find that the medical association of Germany has banned the use of this aluminum dust on human beings. The British medical association has said in regard to this particular treatment that it is at present in the stage where experiments could possibly be conducted on animals but not on human beings. Last, but not least, the United States medical association has said that the McIntyre foundation, which manufactures and sells this aluminum dust to all the gold mines across the country, is not qualified even to experiment in this field. Yet to my knowledge all the gold miners in the industry are forced to take this treatment whether they want to or not; the dust is blown ino the rooms when they change their clothes before starting a shift and when they come off shift. The treatment is forcibly applied to them, and they have no choice whether to refuse it or not.

The results of the treatment in its present state have not been proven one way or the other. I feel that if miners want to take this treatment voluntarily then possibly they should be able to do so, but I think it is wrong that the federal government should be implicated in any way, especially as medical associations in the United States, Britain and Germany are not agreed that it is of benefit to the workers. In fact the evidence we have at the present time is that the contrary is true.

I feel that the federal government has the responsibility of seeing that a stop is put to this compulsory treatment of miners, at least until such time as we have some assurance from medical authorities that it is in the interest of the employees and not just a means of curing a problem as far as the companies are concerned by eliminating silicosis, while replacing it with tuberculosis and lung cancer which are not subject to compensation. I think this is a terrible thing, and I believe the federal government should ensure that they are not in any way responsible for the continuation of this practice that we see across this country.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): The Chair was never told whether the federal government did have an administrative responsibility for this question, and I think perhaps justice has been done to the hon. member who wished to make these remarks. Perhaps he should have chosen another occasion. I hope the committee will bear with me, and that hon. members will not extend the subject to all mines in Canada. Shall the item carry?

Item agreed to.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): The next item is item 173, then item 174—

Mr. Starr: There is a supplementary item No. 527, under the heading "Special Services", to extend to May 31, 1960 the period in respect to the application of the municipal works incentive program.

Special services—

527. To extend to the 31st day of May, 1960, the period in respect of which payments may be made to a province and in respect of Indian bands under the municipal winter works incentive program as contemplated by vote 615 of the Appropriation Act No. 1, 1960, $1.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the minister, on this item, if he can tell us what are the estimates of the cost for the fiscal year 1959-60, that is the additional cost of the program as announced by the Prime Minister a week ago today?

Mr. Starr: Approximately $12,250,000.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is that the estimated contribution of the federal government?

Mr. Starr: That is right.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What has been the cost to date of the winter works program as far as the federal government's contribution is concerned?

Mr. Starr: That is the amount of the federal contribution to the payroll costs of all the projects that have been submitted to us and approved to date. We have not yet received all the accounts from the provinces.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think the minister misunderstood my first question. My first question was, what is the estimated cost of the addition to the program announced by the Prime Minister a week ago today?

Mr. Starr: I explained that earlier in answer to a similar question. I explained that we have just sent out the letters to the provinces announcing this extended program. It is very hard to assess now what programs the municipalities will undertake in connection with this extension.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Surely an estimate has been made by the treasury. In any event, would I be correct in saying it would not be more than $3 million?

Mr. Starr: What is contemplated now is a supplementary estimate somewhere in the neighbourhood of $25 million.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That would cover the whole project in so far as the federal contribution is concerned?

Mr. Starr: That is the federal contribution to the payroll costs of what may be undertaken next winter.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The total cost of the winter works program for the fiscal year 1960-61 will be $25 million. Is that right?

Mr. Starr: No, just the federal government's share.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes; that is what I am talking about. My question was this. What is the estimated cost of the program covered by the refinements and modifications announced by the Prime Minister a week ago today?

Mr. Starr: We had an estimate of $15 million for the past winter. Probably we will be increasing this estimate by $10 million, to $25 million.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Did I understand the minister to say that the increase in the federal share resulting from the improvements and modifications comes to an estimated $10 million?

Mr. Starr: Yes, that is as close an estimate as we can make. Of course if the municipalities undertake projects under the expanded program that will necessitate more than $25 million on behalf of the federal government, we will have to come back to parliament and ask for a further supplementary vote.

79951-0—462

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Was the figure of $12 million which the minister gave me a few moments ago the cost of the program to date for the fiscal year 1959-60?

Mr. Starr: Yes, that is the estimate so far.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Can my hon. friend tell me what is the total estimated cost of the winter works program by all levels of government?

Mr. Starr: Seventy four million dollars.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): So that out of $74 million the federal contribution was $12 million?

Mr. Starr: Those are the earlier estimates.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There is no doubt that that is the situation; an estimated $12 million out of approximately $74 million is the federal contribution?

Mr. Starr: Those are the estimated figures, yes.

Item agreed to.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): The final three items of this department are Nos. 173, 174 and 528, supplementary. They all deal with the unemployment insurance commission. Is it agreeable to the committee that all three be taken together?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Unemployment Insurance Commission—

173. Administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act, including expenditures incurred in connection with other duties and responsibilities assumed and carried out as required by the governor in council on the recommendation of the Minister of Labour in accordance with section 4 of the act, $36,136,000.

174. Transfer of labour to and from places where employment is available and expenses incidental thereto, in accordance with regulations of the governor in council, $37,500.

528. Transfer of labour to and from places where employment is available and expenses incidental thereto, in accordance with regulations of the governor in council—further amount required, $237,500.

Mr. Speakman: I, like the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke, am rather hesitant to intrude on the time of the front benches of the opposition, but there are a couple of suggestions I should like to bring to the attention of the minister and the committee under this item.

I wish first to make an appeal to the minister and through the minister to the government for the inclusion of farm labour under the Unemployment Insurance Act, so these people may draw unemployment insurance benefits when they are out of work. At the present time there are many thousands of labourers required on farms in Canada, and particularly in western Canada. This requirement will increase in the next three or four months by a very large amount, and people will not be available to fill the requirement. I suggest that the principal reason for this will be that these people will not take employment on the farms because they cannot get unemployment insurance stamps in their books.

A good many years ago the agricultural industry, particularly in western Canada, was able to fill its requirements for additional labour by young people drawn from other parts of Canada, and I think particularly from the maritime provinces, Ontario and Quebec. This was a very fine arrangement for western Canada, because we have in that area today many of those young people who came west 25, 30 and 35 years ago, liked what they saw, established themselves and are now some of our finest farmers. This is a practice which has ceased almost completely since the harvest excursions which took place in those years were discontinued.

To many of us, and particularly those in this committee who represent agricultural constituencies in the west, one of the most serious problems we have is the lessening of our farm population and, with the decrease in the population, the disappearance of what we commonly know as the family farm. In this debate a great deal has been said about self-employment and family help. This is very important not only to western Canada but to the economy as a whole, because it provides a good deal of employment. I am sure much is going to be said on these items with regard to unemployment and the numbers of unemployed. If the appeal I make to the minister and the government to make available to farm labour the benefits of unemployment insurance were acted upon, it would do very much over the next four months to decrease the number of unemployed in Canada.

In conclusion I suggest to the Minister of Labour that he give very serious consideration to my next recommendation. I suggest to the minister that the national employment service prepare a weekly list of job openings to be sent out to rural and small urban post offices so the people in those areas who are without work will know of employment vacancies which are available and can make application. This is not done at present because these people draw their unemployment insurance benefits by mail on a semi-monthly basis. They do not have an opportunity to learn about these employment opportunities. By the provision of these lists and their posting in the local post offices it would give our people in the rural and small urban areas an opportunity to make application for such employment as is available.

[Mr. Speakman.]

Mr. Herridge: The front benchers of the opposition are delighted to have the backbenchers of the government intrude on our time to support policies with respect to the inclusion of agricultural labour under the Unemployment Insurance Act, which we in the opposition have urged for a number of years; so there is no need to apologize for participating in this debate, as we are delighted to receive their support in this connection.

Before coming to the core of my remarks, which the press gallery will probably consider parochial, let me say this is a serious thing. In association with other hon. members I have brought it to the attention of the government over the years. Farmers suffer a disability because when they seek help the workers want to make sure they will retain unemployment insurance stamps in the event they become unemployed. I have had this experience when on occasion I have had to hire a man for three or four hours. On this account opportunities for casual employment with farmers are lost. In association with the previous speaker I urge the government to give consideration to the representations made on the subject by many organizations, and particularly the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the federation of agriculture of British Columbia and the British Columbia fruit growers' association.

I do want to take this opportunity to express my appreciation of the good work undertaken by the regional staffs of the unemployment insurance commission and the employment service in Nelson and Trail. It is not easy to fill positions under these circumstances; it requires a great deal of patience, and owing to human impatience and human weakness on occasion, and sometimes human discourtesy, arising largely out of misunderstanding of the act or the regulations, very often we meet someone who really thinks the officers administering those acts in the local offices are trying to do them out of something, without realizing that the responsibility of the officer is to administer the law and the regulations. On that account I want to express my appreciation, and the appreciation of the labour organizations in the district, of the work that has been done throughout the years by the officers and staff of the Nelson and Trail regional offices of the employment service of Canada and the unemployment insurance commission.

I want to make a couple of other points. I do urge that every opportunity be given the regional officers to visit the smaller communities. They have had more opportunity in recent years, but I know it is very difficult for them to get away on occasion because their work is centred in those two larger centres in the constituency I have the honour to represent. But I think it would be to the advantage of the administration and of the employers and employees concerned if these regional officers had an opportunity to visit the smaller communities periodically. I believe in these personal visits, they give them the opportunity to get closer personal contact with the employers, employees and members of the representative organizations in the small communities upon whom they depend to quite an extent for the efficient working of the act at some distance from the larger centre. I also suggest that they be given this opportunity in the winter months particularly when we, owing to weather conditions, sometimes get large numbers of men laid off rather quickly because of the depth of snow and climatic conditions which occur at 3,000 feet.

There is one other point on which I should like to touch. Once again I want to protest against two government agencies being responsible for employment placement; first the employment service and, second the immigration service. I think the national employment service should be the sole agency responsible for the placement of individuals in employment. Because of the way it is done under present conditions it causes considerable ill feeling and unnecessary ill will, and in my opinion it is most unfair. Therefore in conclusion I do urge the minister to use his good offices as a member of the cabinet to point out the weakness of the present system and try to get the government to accept the policy of having one agency, the national employment service, to find employment for persons whether they are Canadian citizens, residents, or immigrants.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, before making some comments on this item I wish to thank you for your suggestion that we might discuss items 173 and 174 together. May I say I am very pleased indeed to see you sitting in the chair at the moment, and as we come to the end of the session I recognize that you have been diverted to other important matters during the course of the session which have not gone unnoticed by hon. members.

I too, like the hon. member who has just taken his seat, am very happy that the hon. member for Wetaskiwin, who is momentarily out of the chamber, chose to participate in this debate. When the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke spoke about an hour ago I expressed not only my pleasure in his participation but in his contribution. Those of us in the opposition who have the responsibility of scrutinizing government policy welcome whatever help we can get from hon. members who sit behind the ministry, particularly when their observations are of an objective kind, in keeping with the high standards of objective scrutiny which we in the Liberal party endeavour to maintain toward these important matters.

I also join with the hon. member who has just taken his seat in paying tribute to the personnel in the unemployment insurance commission, the commission itself, the officers in Ottawa and those in the various offices in the country. I should like in a special way to pay tribute to the personnel of the unemployment insurance commission offices in my own city of Windsor, who have been faced with a very heavy responsibility arising out of the high level of unemployment that has prevailed there during the past three years. I am sure that the citizens of Windsor generally are grateful and would want me to say to the minister that there is much appreciation by industry, by the unions and by the citizens generally of the devotion to service of the personnel in the Windsor office.

The manager of the Windsor office, Mr. John Sharrer, is to retire some time within the course of the next four or five months, I understand. I do not know the exact time, but I understand that his retirement is imminent. I should like to say that Mr. Sharrer has been a devoted public servant. He has sought to inform the public of his responsibilities, of the terms of the Unemployment Insurance Act, and he has contributed in no small measure to whatever alleviation of the problem of unemployment was at his disposal.

I am happy to say this, because when he was appointed I felt that the direction of that office should go to someone who resided in the city of Windsor. Of course the appointment was not at the disposal of the government of the day; it was a matter that rested as the minister knows, with the civil service commission. But I felt that where possible the procedures of the civil service commission ought to recognize local talent. Nevertheless, the fact is that this gentleman has performed a notable service, I want to pay him this inadequate but well deserved tribute.

The unemployment insurance administration has to do not only with the granting of benefits to those who have legal entitlement, but with the administration of a very large operation. It is the custodian of large sums of money, contributed to mainly by the two principal contributors, the employees and the employers, with the federal government contributing a much smaller amount. When one considers the criticism that was levelled at the unemployment insurance scheme, when first established, one wonders whether criticisms that are directed toward social legislation take into account the actual achievements of such measures when they are put to full use. In this period of high unemployment, where would we be but for the unemployment insurance act and the unemployment insurance fund? I am sure it is the concern of all of us that the fund be maintained in such proportions as to always be able to provide the contractual benefits which exist as a result of the arrangements made among the beneficiaries, the contributors and the state.

The concern that is now in my mind is that if the prognostications concerning unemployment in the ensuing period are valid, the fund is going to be tested in the next 12 months as it has not been tested since the act first came into being in 1941. The government, I am sure, has been giving consideration to this matter. The government, I am sure, has been giving consideration to the definite possibility, that it will be called on to replenish the fund. Notwithstanding the fact that last year it increased the contributions of the employers and employees, the revenue was estimated to be in the neighbourhood of $75 million to $78 million, although I understand the actual revenues were not as great as anticipated. If I am wrong in that connection the minister will possibly indicate the extent of the inaccuracy. These increases in contributions were imposed without changing the basic pattern of benefits. In spite of the increases in revenues, the fund continues to be in a precarious state.

The Minister of Labour was asked by the hon. member for Gloucester, early this session, what amount was to the credit of the unemployment insurance fund on June 30, 1957, 1958, 1959 and 1960. The minister replied to this question on July 27 last. He indicated in that reply that as of June 30, 1957, the fund stood at $852,729,261.78; as of June 30, 1958, at $644,520,634.54; as of June 30, 1959, $434,152,690.64; as of June 30, 1960, $296,187,477.10. I direct the attention of the committee to the drop from 1957 to the present time. The present level of the fund, on the basis of this return, which I believe is not the final word in the matter, nevertheless reflects the seriousness of the state of the fund at the present time. Unless the government can show a greater potential revenue than we have thus far had in the experience of the fund's operation, if we have a comparable level of unemployment there will not be enough money in the fund to provide the benefits acquired by right by those who, being out of work, require this particular form of assistance in order to provide for themselves and their families.

This is, of course, a serious matter, but I do not believe the problem can be allowed to rest at the figure given for June 30, 1960. I have in my hand the unemployment insurance commission report for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1959, the last available report. I direct the committee's attention to page 25, where under the title "Claims", the report presents the following:

> The increase in the volume of initial claims which commenced towards the end of 1957—

The words "end of 1957", should be underlined.

> —continued until October 1958, resulting in a record number of initial claims being filed.

Then on page 31 of the report, in the second complete paragraph under the title "Unemployment Insurance Fund", we find this:

> Benefit payments during 1958-59 amounted to $478,631,077.67. Revenue from all sources amounted to $234,242,110.31.

I jump over the next sentence, which is not relevant to my point, and I quote:

> The excess of benefit payments over revenue was $244,388,967.36. This left a balance in the fund at the end of the fiscal year of $499,811,157.51. Benefit payments exceeded revenue in all months except August, September and October.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this cannot and must not be allowed to escape our attention. On April 23 last, the Minister of Labour—his words will be found at page 3009 of Hansard—told us the unemployment insurance fund had incurred a financial loss of more than $10 million during the fiscal year 1958-59 as a result of the sale by the commission, under the authority of the investment committee, of government bonds. The committee, of course, will recall that under the act, the investment committee is made up of the governor of the Bank of Canada and the deputy ministers of finance and labour. We know that during the fiscal year 1959-60 and the first two months of this year, another $10 million was lost by the fund, as a result of the sale of government bonds. These two losses in these two different fiscal years were actual losses. I am not now talking, although I will, about the unrealized or book losses.

In any event, these two actual losses represent very impressive amounts, particularly when we take into account the nature of the fund, a fund made up, as I said, of contributions from employees and employers each amounting to more than 80 per cent of the fund, while the contribution of the state is less than 20 per cent of the fund. We refer to this fund not as a government account. It should be regarded for what it is, a trust account. We should remember that the amount of cash in the fund or the amount of securities in the fund belongs not to the state, but to the workers, to industry, and only a very small part to the government, representing the taxpayers of Canada.

Of the $20 million which was lost as a result of the sale of government bonds and securities during the last two years, more than $16 million was owned by the workers and industry and less than $4 million came from the state. If the loss of $20 million incurred by the fund during the last two years had been due to unmanageable factors, there would be no justification for criticizing the investment policy of the fund. However, I contend that the $20 million loss could and should have been avoided, if there had been the kind of management of that fund which I believe in the case of a trust fund must exist, because of the high obligation imposed on trustees of resources which belong to those who have no manageable control in the fund itself.

Until the end of 1957 there was no real incompatibility between the responsibilities of members of the investment committee and their responsibilities as officers serving the government of Canada in other capacities. However, since that time the large deficit resulting from the actions of the government in the field of fiscal policy has shown there is now a real and important difference between the policies which ought to be followed with respect to the investments of the unemployment insurance fund and the course of action which the government believes it should follow in the management of the public debt. The heavy unemployment during the fiscal year 1958-59 caused a severe drain on the unemployment insurance fund, as is indicated by the figures in the reply given to the hon. member for Gloucester.

An hon. Member: How much?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In 1957 the fund was $852 million in round figures, and on June 30, 1960, some $296 million. As I say, that figure of $296 million is not the last figure, if you take into account the actual losses I have mentioned and the book losses to which I will make reference later. Having in mind the necessity for maintaining the liquidity of this fund in the face of the unemployment problem, I believe these losses could and should have been avoided, particularly if the fund had been maintained in a more liquid state, something which I say was desirable having in mind the heavy drain on the fund itself. There can be no doubt, as subsequent events have revealed, of the necessity of maintaining the liquidity of the fund. Hence the trustees of the fund in 1958 should have sold government securities at every profitable opportunity in order to increase its cash holdings.

This means also that, to the extent that the fund decided to purchase government securities, it should have bought three-month treasury bills, short term government bonds or other securities maturing at an early date. However, during this period the aims sought by the government in the field of debt management were the very opposite of the financial requirements of the unemployment insurance fund itself. Indeed, we know that the government was trying to meet its huge cash requirements by selling as many bonds as possible to the public. The government also attempted, through the conversion loan, to lengthen the term of public holdings of its bonds. In other words the avowed purpose of the government was to reduce the liquidity position of the public, while the basic requirement of the unemployment insurance fund was to increase its liquidity as much as possible. There was therefore a sharp conflict of interest between the fund and the government.

The basis of my criticism is that the investment transactions of the fund were not, during that period, in my judgment conducted in the interests of the fund, but were determined exclusively by the requirements of the government, and as a result the fund lost $20 million. I am not alone in this view. I have before me a view expressed by Mr. A. H. Cameron in a speech he made on June 9, 1960 in the city of Kingston. I wish to quote his words. I regret I do not have the newspaper which reported him, but I can get it after I have finished. He said this:

> In the first quarter of 1959, U.I.C. sold $129 millions, including $30 millions conversion 1972's, and $45 millions other longs, realizing large losses, until a government loan postponed further selling. The story is similar this year. This liquidation reflects U.I.C.'s prior aid to debt management. Facing a winter of obvious unemployment, (after a large early 1958 bond liquidation) U.I.C. converted all its Victory bonds, even its reputed $89 millions 1959 and 1960 maturities—buying no bills until October, 1958. These short Victories would have helped in meeting claims—without large losses.
> Mr. Coyne later told a commons committee that U.I.C. could not have sold its $308 million Victories during the conversion— . . . "It was too large for the market to take. It would have ruined the market . . ." One might ask, "What market?" since over 2,000 larger bond accounts could deal in Victories with only one dealer officially representing the Bank of Canada or Loan Committee. The only real market was in Bank of Canada. This implies the bank denied to U.I.C. the cash prices it offered the public, the banks and others.
> The conflict of interest—U.I.C.'s needs versus debt management, (not apparent while the fund grew or government ran cash surpluses), was created by parliament placing bank and finance officials on the U.I.C. committee. Government widened the benefits in 1958 so that the fund entered 1959 with increased outgo, shorn of its more liquid Victories by the loan. Had an independent trustee forced $300 millions in Victories on Bank of Canada for cash, he would have faced a reinvestment problem, but U.I.C. had as much right as chartered banks of Canada's short paper—or even specially created government short paper. Had this happened, 1959's sales would have pressured the short market, not the long, for the converted Victories would have been in Bank of Canada.

Then he concludes as follows:

Subordinating U.I.C.'s liquidity needs to debt management, was of transient benefit, for many long term bonds soon were sold—at a loss to U.I.C. Debt management problems during the loan would have been greater if U.I.C.'s interests had prevailed. Yet the U.I.C. committee would have been spurning the loan conceived in their other capacities. I pray that parliament will never again place public servants in such an impossible dilemma. The stopgap aid to debt management is not worth the result.

In view of the criticisms we levelled last session on this point, it seems to me that the government must take full responsibility for the actual loss of $20 million, as a consequence of the conversion loan and of the government's debt management policy. But this is not the whole situation. The par value of the bonds left in the fund was estimated recently at about $296 million. This compares with more than $900 million at the end of 1956 and, in view of the present unemployment outlook, represents a dangerously low level.

However, the real value of those bonds, if they had to be sold at present, is much lower than the amount of $296 million. The price of the conversion bonds held by the fund is comparatively low, and if those bonds had to be liquidated it is not likely that the proceeds would exceed $250 million. Who in this committee, in the face of the prognostications of unemployment, even assuming it does not rise to a level higher than the period through which we are now traversing, will deny that that is a very serious situation? With the amount of $250 million in the fund will we see the depletion of the fund. We should have from the Minister of Labour, and from the Minister of Finance if necessary, a statement as to what the government proposes to do before we finally pass these items. It could very well be that at the end of 1961 nothing will be left in the fund which on June 30, 1957, stood at over $852 million.

Is it the intention of the government to do nothing until the fund has been depleted? Will the government reimburse the $20 million lost by the fund as a result of the mismanagement of that fund? What steps does the government intend to take to replenish the fund? Although the minister denied, correcting himself the next day, that the fund had borrowed money from the government this year, the government did through the Minister of Finance loan to the fund some moneys in the months of April and May of this year. I think the general totals of those loans are not too far different from the total loss of the fund to which I have directed the committee's attention.

Now, Mr. Chairman, last night I indicated what were the realized losses of the fund, what the realized losses were for the fiscal year prior to this one, and what the book losses were a year ago. This year the book losses are something in the neighbourhood of $42 million as compared with a book loss in the previous fiscal year of some $60 million. So the market value of the fund now, less advances, is not much more than $260 million, and not the $296 million reported by the Minister of Labour on July 22, 1960.

In spite of the recent improvement in the bond market the fund at the end of June showed a book loss, as I said a moment ago, of $42 million. There are no securities now left in the fund which nature before 1968. That will be found by examining the unemployment insurance securities portfolio. Unless there is a further sharp improvement in the bond market, or unless the government makes a substantial contribution to restore the cash position of the fund, a serious loss on bond sales will be sustained next winter, when the seasonal drain on the fund begins.

Apart altogether from that, no one can deny that the fund is in a precarious state. We have the right on this estimate, in fact a duty, to ask the Minister of Labour for his comments, and to ask him to indicate what the government proposes to do to put the fund in such a state that if it is called upon to provide assistance to the unemployed in the next ensuing period, there will be no difficulty in doing so.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I am very happy to have the opportunity of following the hon. member for Essex East, because I had intended to deal very largely with the subject he has just dealt with, and to do so completely on its merits and not, I hope, be led away by political considerations. But one never knows. Certainly the ex-minister had a fine time to himself, indulging in that delightful practice of wisdom after the event. I have seldom heard more wisdom after the event in such a short time, particularly with regard to securities.

Mr. Chairman, when I was in business I had some experience in the field of securities, so I can well realize how the hon. member was enjoying himself by indulging, with his uninhibited joy, in wisdom after the event. All I can say on that matter is that as much as I respect the hon. member and his judgment in many ways, I would not consider him a great authority on the matter of securities. I would much rather trust the experienced and skilled men who actually deal in these securities. But there was never anyone who dealt with securities, however skilled and prudent he was, who could not afterwards be shown with a little after the event wisdom to have made what looked like a mistake, and we have had a classic example of that this afternoon.

Having said that, I must say I quite agree with the hon. member for Essex East when he says that this fund is in danger, and it is because of that fact that I want to speak about it this afternoon. I want to raise a question which I believe goes to the very root of unemployment insurance. I want to point out that perhaps, without anyone ever intending it, over these last years we have almost I will not say inevitably but unconsciously and unintentionally slipped into the situation where the fund has become less and less an insurance fund and more and more a general welfare fund. Indeed, perhaps it is not going too far to say that there is a widespread disposition to regard it more and more as a kind of universal Santa Claus.

Let me say here that I do not want anything I say to be interpreted as criticizing harshly the people who have taken benefits from the fund which strictly speaking were not intended, because I intend to make the point that this change in attitude "growed like Topsy". People began to extend it, and then it was extended a little more and a little more. I will not go into a lot of detail because I believe every hon. member here today can illustrate for himself the various leniencies, extensions and stretchings out of this fund which has made it serve purposes for which it was never intended.

Let me say quickly, lest I forget later, that the reason this has come about is not wholly because of claimants on the fund, but is also due to the attitude of employers who have found it convenient for various reasons to make a kind of informal broadening out of the purposes of the fund. Whatever the reason is, I feel one should face the fact that the situation is serious and calls for action.

Of course another of the secrets of the hon. member for Essex East in his speech this afternoon is that the fund has been depleted in the last couple of years because we had unemployment. I must say I am awfully grateful to him him for that, because otherwise one might not have known. Of course it has been depleted because of unemployment, and we recognize that it has been depleted to some extent because of government action, and we are all responsible for that.

I do not propose to go into detail, but I hope this afternoon, as far as my voice will reach—of course it will not reach as far as Churchill's—to direct the attention of a few, or perhaps more than a few, to the fact that as I said a moment ago the fund has lost its character as an insurance fund. I am not going to attempt to apportion responsibility; what I am trying to do is create a feeling that something should be done, and that we should all share it. Money is being consumed for reasons which were never intended and, furthermore, this means that unemployment figures have been distorted and exaggerated, to what extent I am not going to attempt to estimate; but anyone who has thought about this will agree that it has led to the distortion of unemployment figures in a way which was never intended and in a way which has added a great deal to the difficulties of the Department of Labour and the unemployment insurance commission.

Imagine a situation such as this vis-à-vis the income tax department or the customs department. Unfortunately, with regard to insurance we have this situation, and I think it is best to understand what the situation is. When I and my neighbours on my street insure our houses we realize what we are doing; we are clubbing together so that if there is a fire, money is available to compensate the owner. We do not expect to get that money back. It is perfectly clear that when we contribute to such a fund we are not entitled to get our money back. Yet with regard to unemployment insurance there is this strong psychological feeling; "there is our money in that fund, and we are entitled to get it back". People who would not dream of expecting the return of money in other circumstances get a feeling that this is their money and that they are entitled to get it back. In the first place they overlook the fact that it is not their money; that in fact they have paid less than half of it, and more than half has been put up by the employers and the government.

While I am not prepared to say how much of that money goes out over and above what would go out if the fund were on a strictly insurance basis, the instances I have seen indicate a very substantial amount indeed. Some of the figures are staggering. And, as the hon. member for Essex East has pointed out, over the past three years there has been a depletion of some $600 million.

I want to say a word about the attitude of employers, because that is very important. The co-operation of employers is needed to enable this stretching out or broadening out process—I do not know exactly how to describe it—to be carried on. This does not happen in connection with income tax; employers give accurate figures there, but in connection with unemployment insurance, apparently prompted by a desire to be good fellows and partly because in various ways it is very convenient to them to have the insurance fund come in and take over care of people who are rated as unemployed, they do assist, and assist in a way which is very surprising and which I do not think would happen if we could persuade them to look at this question in a realistic manner.

I believe that what has to be done—and I do not despair of it—is that people have to be given a new point of view toward this question. Of course I do not think people are going to become more conscientious tomorrow than they are today, and I have no doubt this will need to be accompanied by strict regulations. Nevertheless we cannot simply leave this up to the people in the unemployment insurance commission. Public opinion has to be behind this. As the hon. member for Essex East reminds us, this is not chicken feed that we are talking about; this is a very important matter.

I hope I have not appeared to be speaking in a pious tone, and I hope I have not given the impression that I regard myself as superior to other people. I do not, and I hope I have not given that impression. I wanted to bring up what I consider to be a serious situation and to suggest a rational solution. I imagine that those who were responsible for creating this fund years ago did not anticipate the development which has now arisen. They thought they were setting up an insurance fund and nothing else, and that is what it should have remained.

I agree entirely with the hon. member for Essex East that this thing is bound to come to a head and that it needs serious consideration and action. As I said, it has grown like Topsy. It is clear there is going to be a heavy unnecessary drain unless we do something about it, but I am bold enough to believe that the people of this country, even if they slipped inadvertently into a false situation, when they are convinced of it they will face up to what has happened. I believe this has been done to some extent at any rate by inadvertence.

Mr. Hellyer: It is not inadvertence. It is bad management.

Mr. Macdonnell: Oh, I am trying to be non-political for just a few moments.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask a question?

Mr. Macdonnell: I shall be finished in a minute or so, and I will try to answer questions then.

I believe that if we pull ourselves together —and I mean all of us, because this fast and loose attitude has been very widespread— something may yet be done to remedy the situation. I hope someone else may have something to say on this subject; I hope I am not the only one to say something which may be a little unpopular. I suppose the only sensible thing to do is to get back to the insurance basis, and I believe if this is properly put to the people of this country they will do it, because they are not without common sense.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask a question? It was suggested by the intervention of the hon. member for Trinity. The hon. gentleman disparages the argument of responsibility for this situation. He is an experienced businessman, having been a distinguished trust officer. Will he deny that from 1957 on there was a conflict of interest that justifies the charge of mismanagement?

Mr. Macdonnell: Yes, I would deny it. These were responsible people of character in charge of this fund—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No one suggested they were not people of good character.

Mr. Macdonnell: I deny the conflict of interest entirely.

Mr. Robichaud: My remarks will be very brief. I have had occasion many times in this house to express my opinions concerning the status of the unemployment insurance fund. I referred to this situation when I spoke last night on the first item of the estimates of the Department of Labour.

The hon. gentleman who just resumed his seat has acknowledged that the fund is presently in danger, and I would say to him that it is not necessary to be an authority on securities in order to see that the fund is indeed in great danger. The hon. member went on to say that in its present condition this fund is less an insurance fund than a general welfare fund. When the unemployment insurance commission was created under a Liberal administration it was created to be an insurance fund, and it was maintained as such by the former administration.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Robichaud: I hear an hon. member, greatly concerned, say "No, no". The unemployment insurance fund is a trust fund which has been established to protect the working class of this country, and it has been built up through the contributions of the workers, the employers and the general public.

The records show that the fund was in good condition under the previous administration. When the present government took office on June 30, 1957 there was left in the fund the sum of $852 million. As at June 30 this year the fund was down to $296 million.

We know that under the present conditions of unemployment, under the conditions which were admitted this morning by the minister, and in view of the forecast given us for the next eight or 10 months, we must acknowledge that notwithstanding the increase of 30 per cent in contributions which was introduced last year and which has been in effect since September 1, 1959, the unemployment insurance fund on this same date next year will contain only in the vicinity of $150 million. I am sure the minister will agree that this amount is not sufficient to take care of the situation. Before this estimate is passed the minister should tell us what are the plans of the government for replenishing the fund.

Before resuming my seat I want to express my concern about certain applications of the act and the regulations of the unemployment insurance commission. I know there have been abuses, and a fund of this kind is subject to them, but there rests on the officials of the department the difficult responsibility of stopping, preventing and correcting such abuses. Because the fund is in a difficult condition is no justification for certain employees having advantage taken of them.

I wish to refer briefly to the family employee. Case after case has been brought to my attention since last fall. These people were denied unemployment insurance benefits because they were employed by their fathers. In most cases the employer was in the lumber, trucking or some other business and employed two or three of his sons instead of hiring strangers as his employees. I do not see how the commission can justify a decision that would deprive those members of the family of the benefits to which they are entitled.

This has happened in New Brunswick and Quebec. When these members of the family made application for unemployment insurance they were told that if they wanted to receive benefits they should not stay at home with their father but should get out on their own or room and board with a neighbour. This situation cannot be permitted to continue. In most cases these were married men with families. They were employed by their fathers in employment that would qualify them for unemployment insurance. They should be entitled to receive it.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, I have often felt that my speeches were stolen by hon. members of the Liberal party in this chamber, but this was the first time I felt that an hon. member of the Conservative party had stolen in the main what I intended to say. I refer to the remarks made by the distinguished hon. member for Greenwood. I did not agree 100 per cent with what he said about this fund, but I endorse the greater portion of his remarks.

When the fund was originally set up it was established on insurance principles. Proof of that can be found in the way the fund grew. At one time we had close to a billion dollars in the fund. Then the Liberal party found that it was too good a vote catcher to resist, and they let the political implications of the fund get the better of the insurance principles. Unfortunately when the present government took over it did as it has done in respect of so many things, and carried on and expanded the problems created by the Liberals. The situation has worsened since the Conservatives took office. As the hon. member said, the fund today represents no insurance principles at all but is a kind of mixed up welfare fund.

With increasing frequency we see in the newspapers and elsewhere evidence of the fact that the fund is not so much abused as chiselled. Many hon. members know this from cases brought to their attention. I do not know how you draw a distinction between an abuse and chiselling, but apparently that distinction exists in the mind of the public. As the hon. member for Greenwood pointed out, people who would never think of chiselling in any other way think the fund is fair game. The past and present governments must share the responsibility for this type of thinking among the public today.

I have received letters from constituents complaining that they have paid into the fund for the last 10 or 12 years and never drawn a cent out from it, and inquiring if they could not be paid a dividend of some kind. I believe that underlines what the hon. member said about there being no accurate concept in the public mind about the insurance principles of the fund. I have discussed this with various people. Certainly I have no offhand solution to offer the government today, but I believe an investigation of the situation should be made so the matter could be corrected in the future. I will, however, throw out one or two suggestions which I hope will be of some value.

I recommend that the government embark on a program to educate the Canadian public with respect to the meaning of the unemployment insurance fund. The government could point out that if somebody does not pay in there will be nothing to draw out, and that if you take out more than you put in someone will have to pay double or there will be nothing to take out.

I also urge the government to consider devising some kind of incentive. Again I cannot offer a detailed plan. Perhaps it could be worked in conjunction with the old age pension, and a dividend given upon retirement to people who have paid in all their lives and never had occasion to draw out. This would be a means of driving home to the public the fact that the fund is not a barrel into which they can all reach. This is in conjunction with the program of public education to which I referred.

As long as there is a little chiselling here and a little there we will have difficulty. As the old Scottish saying goes, "Many a mickle makes a muckle". The day will come when the position of the legitimately unemployed will be made completely hopeless. If the fund has decreased by $200 million a year over the last three years there must be something wrong. Either unemployment is worse than the government has admitted or something else is wrong. There is only a little over $200 million in the fund right now, so at the rate of decrease over the last three years the government has only one year to learn what the trouble is and correct it. It behooves this government to take action rapidly if it does not want to face an extremely serious problem within the next year or so.

Mr. Southam: Mr. Chairman, I want to take only a few moments of the time of the committee, but in rising to speak on this item I should like to reiterate what the hon. member for Wetaskiwin has said with regard to the unemployment insurance fund as it affects farm labour. Last year the minister mentioned that he was setting up a committee to make a special study of unemployment insurance as it affected the seasonal unemployed with reference to the farming industry, fishing and pulp wood cutting. I should like to say that I was very pleased at that time, and I want to commend the minister for taking this action. It is another indication, of course, of how seriously our government is taking the problem of unemployment in Canada.

As a result of the recommendation to set up the committee I sent out a questionnaire to all reeves and councillors in my riding of Moose Mountain, some 200 in number, asking for their opinion on this matter. I might say for the information of the minister that I received a very good cross section of replies. Percentagewise about 75 per cent to 80 per cent of the people replying suggested they were in favour of the government taking some action along this line. In mentioning the fact that they were in favour of the application of unemployment insurance to farm labour they did not say whether it should be on an optional basis.

[Mr. Martin (Timmins).]

We have a peculiar situation in the farming industry in Saskatchewan. We have a number of large farms which are following the trend of the agrarian change which is taking place in this industry owing to automation. As a result, some farmers who may have only one son in the family, with the co-operation of automation, can carry on an economic unit; whereas on the other hand a farmer down the road with no sons in the family finds that in order to carry on an economic unit and follow the trend that has developed in the farm industry he has to have access to farm labour.

In looking at the labour market we find that the farmer's son, if he is not employed in farming, has to leave the province of Saskatchewan to find employment, because basically it has been an agricultural area, and owing to the lack of industrial development there compared with some other parts of Canada the young men have to leave. The result is there is a shortage of qualified farm labour. We would be doing ourselves a great service in Saskatchewan in particular if we could develop some type of unemployment insurance that would affect farm labour and help to maintain our population.

It is interesting to note that 30 years ago we had approximately a million people in Saskatchewan. As a result of automation developing in the industry our population slipped to 865,000 a few years ago. That trend has been reversed, and at the present time we have about 902,000 or 903,000 people in Saskatchewan. If we had maintained the normal population growth of other provinces over that same period we would have had today around 1,400,000 people, but that does not need any explanation from me. Hon. members realize what it means to a province like Saskatchewan, or any other part of the country, from an economic point of view; therefore I think we should take a serious look at this proposition to see whether something can be done to include the agricultural industry in unemployment insurance.

Mr. Starr: Will the committee allow me two minutes to answer the hon. member who has just spoken regarding agricultural employment? I know of the interest of many hon. members on all sides of the house in this subject, and I should like to tell you, Mr. Chairman, that an interdepartmental committee is studying the extension of coverage to agriculture. However, there is a decided dearth of statistical information of the kind needed to assist the committee in arriving at its conclusions. As a consequence it has been necessary for the committee to make a survey of certain types of farming in certain areas to obtain some estimate of the likely costs. This sample has of necessity been small, but it does provide some guidance. The survey is going on now.

I should like to put on record the following departments which are represented on the committee: unemployment insurance commission, finance, agriculture, bureau of statistics, insurance and privy council.

Mr. Winch: A number of phases of unemployment insurance have already been raised on this item 173, and undoubtedly before it is passed additional phases will be brought to the attention of the committee. It is not my intention to speak on phases already raised or to prophesy what may yet be raised. My purpose in rising at this time is to draw the attention of the minister to either certain regulations or interpretations of regulations. I do so, Mr. Chairman, because I note that the hon. member for Cape Breton South has honoured us with his presence. The hon. member has not spoken during the discussion of the estimates, but he has made a great number of interjections, especially regarding certain views expressed on problems in his own riding of Cape Breton South and suggestions that from an employment point of view it could be called a depressed area. That seemed to upset the hon. member, although he has not made a speech on it yet. Will the minister consider either changing certain regulations or stating what are the interpretations of certain regulations as they apply and have applied to the present situation in Cape Breton and Cape Breton South, because I believe, sir, Glace Bay comes within the constituency of the hon. member.

Mr. MacInnis: If the hon. member does not mind I should like to make an observation. When the hon. member for Essex East was speaking he said nothing about Glace Bay, New Waterford, or the surrounding towns. He emphatically said the city of Sydney, Nova Scotia. If he would just look at a recent statement by the mayor of Sydney he would see that it is in sharp contrast with what he said.

Mr. Winch: I take it now, sir, that the hon. member takes it that no reference was made to his own constituency?

Mr. MacInnis: No, you do not understand what was said at all. He referred specifically to the city of Sydney. I do not for a moment deny there are depressed sections in that area; I am speaking specifically of the city of Sydney. The mayor of Sydney recently referred to the prosperity of that city, and it does that city no good to have somebody who does not understand the situation there go about preaching that it is a depressed city, and by so doing discouraging any new industry or any new business which might wish to come into that city. This is only another approach that is detrimental to that city, the Liberal approach in the maritimes.

Mr. Winch: I now understand the confusion of the hon. member.

Mr. MacInnis: You are referring to the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Winch: I am sorry; I have the floor, if you do not mind.

Mr. MacInnis: Yes, but speak factually.

Mr. Winch: My hon. friend is confused in that he did not recognize, as I think most of us did, that the hon. member for Essex East was referring to the report of the employment office in Sydney, which covers the entire area, including the hon. member's constituency.

Mr. MacInnis: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Winch: As soon as I sit down, yes.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): The member for Essex East said the city of Sydney.

Mr. Winch: The city of Sydney is the regional office for the entire area, including the constituency of the hon. member who has just spoken.

Mr. MacInnis: On a point of order—

Mr. Winch: I said I would be very happy to—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Winch: I am sorry; I beieve I have the floor.

The Chairman: The hon. member is rising on a point of order.

Mr. MacInnis: My point is this; that the hon. member now speaking is interpreting the views of the hon. member for Essex East, and not only was the hon. member for Cape Breton South confused but this whole committee was confused with what he had to say about the unemployment situation in Moncton when he claimed that there were so many thousand unemployed.

Mr. Winch: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Robichaud: The hon. member does not know the difference anyhow.

The Chairman: According to the rules, if the hon. member has an objection to any statement he may rise after the hon. member who has the floor has completed his remarks and make his correction.

Mr. Winch: May I say that the hon. member is certainly confused now, because he is referring to Moncton and I am speaking about his own constituency.

Mr. MacInnis: But he was talking about Moncton.

Mr. Winch: I would be very happy if the hon. member would make a speech instead of interjecting so often. As a matter of fact I wonder why he is here, because he only interjects and does not make speeches. I said I was very happy that the hon. member had honoured us with his presence, because I should like to ask the views of the Minister of Labour in connection with certain regulations as they exist, and certain interpretations made thereof, with relation to representations that have been made by the united mine workers of America at Glace Bay, in the hon. member's constituency. The best way for me to introduce this matter is to read directly the information that comes to our hands. I have here, sir, a telegram received by us this month which states as follows:

> Local 4520 UMWA in session tonight respectfully request that present UIC regulations be amended to conform with the basic understanding governing payment of benefits. Some 450 coal miners employed in No. 4 colliery Dominion Coal Company Limited in Glace Bay are completely without income for a period of two weeks due to cut-backs in the Nova Scotia coal industry and regulations that prohibit payment of UIC benefits. Respectfully request use of your good office to have this extreme injustice eliminated.

We in this group, sir, to the best of our ability try to help people in all constituencies. This matter was taken up, therefore, with the unemployment insurance commission, and the reply we received was:

> Section 152 of the regulations provides that the waiting period may be waived if
>
> (a) a new period of entitlement immediately follows the end of a previous period of entitlement, and
> (b) the claimant's aggregate earnings in the last two weeks of the old period of entitlement are not more than one week's benefit plus allowable earnings.
>
> The situation with regard to the 400 miners is that they were laid off during the week commencing 12 June and their periods of entitlement ended on 18 June. Their new entitlement started on 19 June, but they cannot meet the conditions in (b) above because their earnings in the weeks commencing 5 June (when they worked) and 12 June were too high to permit of the waiver.
> I am advised that the miners received payment of unemployment insurance benefits for the week commencing 12 June but as previously stated the week commencing 18 June was the week in which they were required to serve their waiting period and therefore they received no benefit payment for this period.
>
> Yours sincerely,
> Laval Fortier
> Chief Commissioner

Now, sir, in view of the telegram I have read, in view of the answer received from the chief commissioner, may I ask on behalf of the united mine workers, local 4520, at Glace Bay, in the constituency of the hon. member for Cape Breton South, whether this interpretation of the regulations was wrong or whether the regulations could possibly be amended, especially in view of the fact that the unemployed workers at Glace Bay say this is an extreme injustice which they would like to have eliminated.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. Starr: This matter was first brought to my attention by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, who at that time was in the offices of the local union and who made available to me the information to which the hon. member refers. I was then in communication with the president of the union on the long distance telephone. I immediately brought it to the attention of the unemployment insurance commission, and the interpretation of that regulation is correct.

This has been brought to the attention of the union, pointing out that under this regulation the miners were not entitled to benefits. The only thing that can be done is to either have the regulation amended or to submit this regulation to the unemployment insurance advisory committee, the membership of which is composed of representatives of labour and management on an equal basis.

Mr. Winch: May I ask the minister if he has referred the request of the united mine workers in Glace Bay to the advisory committee?

Mr. Starr: No, Mr. Chairman, because the regulation is there. If consideration is given to obtaining the advice of that committee on whether this regulation should be in existence, then that consideration can be given and the regulation submitted for their advice.

Mr. Winch: Do I understand, then, that the minister does not feel he has a responsibility when matters of this nature are brought to his attention by any member of this house, and that he should refer them to the advisory committee, asking their advice?

Mr. Starr: This regulation has been in existence for some time and has applied in many instances of the same nature. Now, if it is felt by the commission that this regulation is unfair then the commission, in consultation with me, may agree that consideration be given to submitting this regulation to the advisory committee.

Mr. Winch: Does the minister not agree that if he receives a complaint of this nature, and he says he received it from the hon. member himself, he should refer it to the advisory committee?

Mr. Starr: We receive complaints from all over Canada about every regulation that is applied by the unemployment insurance commission. Surely the hon. member would not suggest that on the basis of the complaints we have received about every regulation in the Unemployment Insurance Act we should submit every one of them to the advisory committee?

Mr. Winch: Not on an individual basis, but if it comes from a responsible trade union or if it comes from a member of this house, yes.

Mr. Starr: We have had representations on almost every regulation from time to time over the years from responsible groups of people and representatives of the workers.

Mr. MacInnis: I am in danger of being accused of filibustering if I speak, because the opposition seems to take that attitude toward any backbencher on the government side who speaks. I should like to say this, sir, to the hon. member for Vancouver East. When this question arose I, along with the president and secretary treasurer of the local affected, not 4520 but 4530, my own local in Glace Bay, in conjunction with the officers of the united mine workers, followed through with every possible step to alleviate this hardship.

Mr. Winch: On what date?

Mr. MacInnis: I do not remember the date, but it was the date on which the matter arose. I was present in the offices of the united mine workers and I communicated with the Minister of Labour in Ottawa, the minister of labour in Nova Scotia, and made efforts to communicate with the premier of Nova Scotia because this regulation was causing hardship among the members. The Caledonia local, 4530, has thanked me along with the president and secretary treasurer, for the efforts we made in this connection.

As to the regulations, they are well aware of the fact that the unemployment insurance advisory commission has labour representation in order to look after the interests of labour. They realize that this is an insurance to us. We then attempted to get the unemployment insurance assistance benefits, and we made every effort in this regard to help the miners over this rough period they were obliged to go through because broken time in the mines at that particular period, affected their unemployment insurance for that coming week. What brought about the three week period without any remuneration was the fact that the set-up in the mines is such that when you work a week, you do not get paid for that particular week you work but the following week. That is what contributed to the hardships down there, namely the fact that they were obliged to wait three weeks in order to draw their salaries from the company.

Mr. Winch: That is a long wait.

Mr. MacInnis: Certainly it is a long wait. I appreciate that fact. I may tell the hon. member for Vancouver East that I am well aware of everything that has affected the miners in that area. I do not need the hon. member for Essex East or the hon. member for Vancouver East or any other member of the committee to point out to me the difficulties through which the miners have been going, not since 1957 but back to 1945 and further, when the previous administration was in power. Let me tell you that the present conditions prevailed under a Liberal administration. In the province of Nova Scotia 23 coal mines closed down in the period from 1946 to 1956.

Mr. Winch: How many closed down in the last three years? How many are closing down now?

Mr. MacInnis: None of the big operations have closed down in the last three years. They are facing it, but we are doing everything possible to avoid it. I will tell you now that 23 coal mines closed down in that period between 1946 and 1956, and none of the larger operations have closed down since this government came into office. Some smaller operations have closed down, but there are also a few small operations which have opened up with the assistance of the Nova Scotia government.

In order to remind the hon. member of what is going on, may I say that the telegram he received was from the president of local 4520, the brother of the only remaining C.C.F. member in Nova Scotia. As to the area about which he is concerned, I might remind him that regardless of the situation in Nova Scotia as it is today, the miners' union, the steel workers and the workers of Cape Breton have put their trust in the Prime Minister and Bob Stanfield, and rightly so.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): To get away from the political implications for a moment, may I turn to something else. The minister mentioned that one possible solution for this particular problem that has been raised has to do with amendments to the existing legislation. From what he said I gather that either the amendments or recommendations for them would come from the advisory committee. But he also said that before they could recommend any changes, complaints would have to be forwarded to them by the minister or the commission. My question is this. How can the advisory committee realize that there are any complaints and that there is any need for amendment of the existing legislation if the great number of the complaints mentioned by the minister never get past his office?

Mr. Starr: I will say this, Mr. Chairman. I will submit this regulation, or ask the commission to consider this regulation; and if in their opinion they feel that it should be considered by the advisory committee, then they will forward it on to the advisory committee.

Mr. Winch: What is the make-up of this advisory committee? Who are on the committee? How are they appointed, and how long do they hold office?

Mr. Starr: There are four employer representatives and four employee representatives. On the employee side there are two representatives from the Canadian Labour Congress, one representative from the Canadian and Catholic Federation of Labour, and one representative from the brotherhood of railway employees. On the employer side there is a representative from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, a representative from the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, a representative from the Canadian Construction Association and one representative from the Canadian Railway Association.

Mr. Winch: Do the committees meet of their own volition, or do they meet only when something is referred to them? In other words have they the power of initiating recommendations to the labour department?

Mr. Starr: Under the act they are empowered to report the state of the unemployment insurance fund, and to meet when the commission submits for their recommendation a certain regulation.

Mr. Winch: In other words the advisory committee can meet only on a direction of the commission, and can deal only with matters which are referred to it by the minister or through the unemployment insurance commission. Is that correct?

Mr. Starr: It is an advisory committee to the commission.

Mr. Winch: It can meet only when something is referred to it. It cannot meet of its own volition or bring in its own recommendations?

Mr. Starr: That is right.

Mr. Winch: Do you think that is a democratic procedure?

Mr. Starr: That is the way the committee is set up under the act.

[Mr. Martin (Timmins).]

Mr. Herridge: As to persons who are possibly entitled to draw unemployment insurance for some months but who become university students, can they continue to draw unemployment insurance?

Mr. Starr: Each case is considered on its own merits.

An hon. Member: In some cases it can be done.

Mr. Herridge: In some cases?

Mr. Starr: Yes, having regard to the availability of the student for work. That is the basis on which he can draw unemployment insurance.

Mr. Winch: May I ask for a further point of information on something I have never been able to get quite clear from reading the act. To my knowledge there are a great many persons who have been previously employed but who want to try, when they are unemployed, to get out on their own and earn their living. I know a great number of such persons in my constituency. They may be electricians, carpenters or painters. If they endeavour to help themselves in this way and they hit a bad period, as they do, in order to be covered when they are endeavouring to do this are they entitled to contribute to unemployment insurance?

Mr. Starr: If they go into business for themselves and, during the period of the first two years, become unemployed, they may apply for unemployment insurance benefits because of the fact that it is within the two-year period only that a person can claim benefits. Then if it is found that they are genuinely unemployed in that respect they would be eligible for unemployment insurance.

Mr. Winch: How do they contribute in this period? I am greatly interested in this matter. When you have these people who want to try to get out and help themselves, and who are doing so, is there any way in which, during that temporary period of a year or two years when they are trying to help themselves, they can pay in to unemployment insurance?

Mr. Starr: No; no self-employed person can be insured.

Mr. Winch: In other words they are not eligible at all?

Mr. Starr: No.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: That completes the estimates of the Department of Labour.

Mr. Winch: While we are waiting for the next department to be proceeded with, it may be a good time for me to say this to the minister. He may have thought that he has had a rough time. He has a rough job. However, we all appreciate the courtesy with which he has treated us.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

217. Departmental administration, $3,212,477.

The Chairman: This item will be found at page 44 of the blue book, the details at page 290.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that it is now seven minutes to six and I understand the minister has a full statement to make, may I suggest that we call it six o'clock?

The Chairman: Is the committee agreeable to calling it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the house leader, just for the convenience of members, to outline the business for Monday and Tuesday and for as much of next week as he wishes to?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, in the hope that next week will be the last week of the session I will outline what remains before us.

On Monday we will take third reading of Bill No. C-58, to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code. Appearing on Votes and Proceedings tonight will be a resolution concerning the appointment of a judge for Prince Edward Island, and the house might like to consider that as the second item of business on Monday. That will be followed by the committee stage of the bill on human rights and fundamental freedoms.

If that discussion does not carry over to Tuesday, we have for Tuesday the resolution mentioned this morning by the Prime Minister concerning Canada's participation in the United Nations force for the Congo, followed by the report of the committee on procedure which I would ask to be taken up later on Tuesday. I will also move concurrence in the report of the civil service commission tabled on July 14 and shown in Votes and Proceedings on page 774, referring to the staff of the House of Commons.

Business of the House

As it is impossible to estimate at this moment the termination of the session, it may be necessary to call interim supply on Tuesday. The estimates which remain for the house to consider are, in this order: national defence, finance, trade and commerce and privy council.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the leader one other question. Is it the intention to proceed right through with the committee stage of the bill of rights until it is finished?

Mr. Churchill: That is, running over Monday and Tuesday?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Churchill: I would think that would be the wish of the house.

Mr. Winch: May I ask a question of the house leader. In view of the importance placed by the Prime Minister this morning on the motion asking for the authority of parliament for the sending of certain of our forces overseas, might it not be advisable and proper to have that called first on Monday so as to have the authority of parliament and our expression of support?

Mr. Churchill: If the house so desires. The resolution will appear in Votes and Proceedings and the rules require 48 hours' notice, but if the house gave consent it could consider that on Monday.

Mr. Winch: I think in view of the importance of the matter and the fact that we do not know how long we will take on other business, it might be a nice thing if that were introduced first and received the support of the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure that would be agreeable to us, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, if we had unanimous consent that would be very proper, that we should proceed in that way on Monday. I suggest that is the apparent feeling of the house, in view of the statements which have been made by the two hon. gentlemen.

Mr. Speaker: I am advised that the notice would be sufficient, but in any event is the house agreeable to so order if necessary?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed. Is it agreed that I call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

LATIN AMERICAN MINES LTD.

Question No. 431—Mr. Martel:

1. Is Latin American Mines Limited licensed under the authority of the secretary of state?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

OMISSION OF SUPPLY ITEM FROM ORDER PAPER

Mr. Speaker: I think I should call the attention of the house to a clerical omission from the order paper. Under government orders there should appear a further item reading:

July 30—House again in committee of supply (the messages of His Excellency the Governor General with estimates, supplementary and further supplementary estimates, referred)—The Minister of Finance.

PUBLIC WORKS

NORTHWESTERN QUEBEC—STATEMENT ON INVESTIGATION INTO CRIMINAL ACTIVITIES

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I think the house will be interested to know that the investigation which was commenced several weeks ago into possible criminal activities in certain public works projects in northwestern Quebec has now advanced to the point that it appears that criminal charges should be laid.

Accordingly my colleague the Minister of Justice is appointing counsel to assess the evidence now available, to advise as to the course of further criminal investigations, and to draft the charges that should be laid. The house can be assured that the completion of this aspect of this investigation and the laying of charges against all those who may be involved in a criminal way will be pressed with the greatest possible speed.

EXPROPRIATION ACT

AMENDMENT REQUIRING NOTICE TO INTERESTED PARTIES

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-88 to amend the Expropriation Act.

Mr. Pickersgill: Explain.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This bill proposes to provide for an amendment to the Expropriation Act to require the minister in the name of the crown to give notice of intention to all interested parties of the crown's desire to take over particular properties.

I sincerely hope we can have passage of this bill this week in order to make more effective the end result of the bill of rights.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

JUDGES ACT

PROVISION FOR ADDITIONAL JUDGE IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee later this day to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Judges Act to provide salary for an additional judge of the supreme court of judicature of Prince Edward Island.

Motion agreed to.

UNITED NATIONS

CONGO—PARTICIPATION OF CANADIAN FORCES IN CURRENT OPERATIONS

On the order: Government notices of motion:

July 30—The Prime Minister—(a) The following proposed motion:—That it be resolved by the... House of Commons:

That it is expedient that the Houses of Parliament do approve the participation of Canadian forces in the United Nations operations in the Congo, and that this house do approve the same.

(b) The following proposed motion consequent upon the adoption of motion "a" above:—

That a message be sent to the Senate informing Their Honours that this house has adopted a resolution approving of the participation of Canadian forces in the United Nations operations in the Congo, and requesting Their Honours to unite with this house in the approval of the same by filling up the blanks in the resolution with the words: "Senate and".

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 2 of standing order 21 this government notice of motion stands transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders later this day.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

SAUGEEN INDIAN RESERVE—LAND FOR ROAD ALLOWANCE

Question No. 134—Mr. Howard:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, and other documents exchanged between the government or any department or agency thereof and any other government, person, or corporation, since January 1, 1956, dealing with the surrender of land for a road allowance of approximately seven miles in length from the Saugeen band of Indians to the corporation of the county of Bruce.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): We shall be glad to produce whatever correspondence is available having regard to this particular deal, but I draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that there was no formal surrender of land or formal resolution regarding the surrender of land. On that basis we shall be glad to produce the correspondence.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE, 1960—ADDITIONAL COST

Motion No. 135—Mr. Pickersgill:

For a breakdown of the estimate of the additional cost to the federal treasury of the provincial proposals at the public sessions of the federal-provincial conference on July 25 and 26, 1960, provisionally fixed by the Minister of Finance at approximately two billion dollars.

Motion agreed to.

"CANADIAN ECONOMIC OUTLOOK FOR 1960"

Motion No. 136—Mr. Pickersgill:

For a copy of the "Canadian Economic Outlook for 1960", prepared in the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there is no such document for 1960.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member wish his motion to be withdrawn?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me there is no reason why the motion should not be passed. If there is no such document it obviously cannot be complied with.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, it would not be in accordance with the practices and usages of parliament to pass a motion concerning a document which does not exist.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, just a few days ago there was tabled in this house in answer to a motion for the production of papers a return showing no correspondence between the federal government and the Saskatchewan teachers' federation. I suggest with all deference that it is very much in order to have on the order paper a motion for the production of papers which may result merely in demonstrating that no such papers exist. Such motions have often been passed. I think the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is perfectly right when he says it is in order that this motion be passed. If no such document exists, of course, it could not be complied with.

Mr. Churchill: Speaking to the point of order, Mr. Speaker, the example given is not analogous at all. A search would have to be made for correspondence. It might not be within the knowledge of the minister at the time whether that correspondence was in existence. After the motion was passed a nil return was produced, but in this instance I have given the information.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, in order to avoid any further complications, if the house will give unanimous consent I will be very pleased to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member, because otherwise there is a difficulty presented in that the house is asked to accept a motion which involves necessarily a refusal to accept the word of the hon. gentleman, given from his place in the house. Does the house give unanimous consent to the withdrawal of this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

RESUMPTION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT DEBATE—ANNOUNCEMENT OF POLICY RESPECTING WESTERN FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the state of the order paper, which is now pretty clear, could the Prime Minister give some information to the house about the arrangement for a private members' day to discuss capital punishment?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have already spoken with the house leader in this regard. I am very anxious to have a day set aside for a continuance of the discussion of this subject, and this will be done as soon as an arrangement is made between representatives of the opposition and the house leader. As referred to earlier I will be very happy to have that day fixed by agreement. Otherwise it will be somewhat difficult to have a day fixed. We want to have a day set aside for the purpose of this discussion, as was made clear. All that is needed now is an agreement among those whose responsibility it is to facilitate the business of the house.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Prime Minister if it was not the intention of the government that there would be a conference among the house leaders as to when this could be arranged? There has been no indication that such a conference is about to take place or has taken place over the last several weeks.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I suppose the answer to that question should be given by the house leader. We want the conference to take place, we want the day to be set aside, and we want the discussion to take place.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in order to clear this up may I say that preliminary consultations were held on Saturday with hon. members on the other side of the house. I was informed that an answer would be forthcoming today. We have not yet had an opportunity today to have further consultations.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the house leader with whom the preliminary discussions were held?

Mr. Churchill: If all these things must be disclosed, yes, but it is normal for whip to consult with whip. I consulted with the hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. Herridge: Quite correct.

Mr. Chevrier: No one consulted with me.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member was not here.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): On the general question of legislation, or action that will be required by the house for the remainder of the session, can the Prime Minister say whether parliamentary action will be required during this session to implement the government's proposal to bolster western farm income?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, after we have concluded the matters that are before the house at the present time, then the house will be advised in this regard.

Mr. Argue: Before the Prime Minister makes this long sought statement in the house, will a conference be held with the farm organizations to discuss this general question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That, too, will be made clear at the same time.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Prime Minister whether one can draw from what he has said that there is no doubt there will be a declaration of policy by the government on this matter before we prorogue?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I simply point out that when parliamentary action has been taken on those matters now before us, then it will be appropriate to consider the matter in question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Agriculture a supplementary question. Is it clear that an announcement will be made by him, or by a member of the government, including the Prime Minister, of the government's policy with regard to the demands of the western farmers through the western liaison committee and the thousand farmers who came to Ottawa a year and a quarter ago?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite evident that I would have nothing to add to what the Prime Minister has already said in regard to this matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: The short answer is no.

Mr. Argue: A well behaved minister.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

SOUTHAM PRESS—SUGGESTED STUDY OF PURCHASE OF PUBLISHING COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice. I regret not having given him notice of it. I wonder whether the attention of the minister or of the combines investigation branch has been drawn to a newspaper article—I am reading from a newspaper story of Saturday, July 30—which indicates that Southam Press, a large concern in the newspaper field, has purchased MacLean Publications, a publishing company, and whether this indicates it will result in any study by the combines branch.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I did see the press article on Saturday. I think it referred to the acquisition of MacLean Publishing Company, not Maclean-Hunter. There is a distinction. I have not had a chance yet to consult with the director on the matter, but I shall do so at the first opportunity to see whether his attention has also been drawn to the article.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

FORT WILLIAM, ONT.—REQUEST FOR DONATION OF STEAM LOCOMOTIVE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. The Fort William junior chamber of commerce is trying to secure a steam locomotive to be installed in a park area as a monument to the era of the iron horse. For one of its discarded engines the Canadian Pacific Railway wants $15,000. The Canadian National Railways donated one free to the town of Rainy River. My question is, is the minister in a position to inform the house whether the Canadian National Railways have more of these engines to give away? If not, what are they doing with those old locomotives?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for indicating his intention to ask this question. I will pass his question along to the management of the Canadian National Railways. As soon as I have received an answer I will pass it along to him.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

NATIONAL GALLERY—REPORTED RESIGNATION OF ASSOCIATE DIRECTOR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I can ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration whether the associate director of the national gallery has submitted his resignation.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge and belief the answer is no.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the hon. lady say whether she has seen the story which appeared in the Toronto Star of July 30, to this effect? If not, will the hon. lady have a look at this story and inform the house tomorrow?

Mrs. Fairclough: I have already read the article in question, and there are so many discrepancies in it that I cannot credit any of the statements contained therein.

ATOMIC ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO DISPOSAL OF U.S. ATOMIC WASTES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether a company by the name of Crossroads Marine Disposal Corporation of Boston was manufacturing at Nanaimo, British Columbia, containers for the disposal of atomic wastes, and the minister said he would look into the matter. I wonder whether he now has any information to give the house.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have found on investigation that a firm known as International Anti-Radiation Limited was set up in Nanaimo, British Columbia, last year to manufacture spherical containers of high density concrete, reinforcing steel, dense glass, lead and polyethylene, in which radioactive wastes might be disposed of to the sea. This company, according to press reports, has signed a contract with a United States firm, licensed to dispose of low level United States radioactive wastes, for the use of these containers in its disposal operations.

The company has not been authorized by the atomic energy control board of Canada to receive or dispose of radioactive wastes in Canada or in the waters adjacent to Canada. Since no permit is required for the construction of containers provided radioactive materials are not placed therein, the company's construction activities are not affected, but the board has not approved the use of these containers for the disposal of radioactive wastes from Canada. It has advised the company that the suitability of the containers could be considered only in connection with an application to dispose of specific wastes. Similar arrangements are in effect in the United States but, so far as the board is aware, the atomic energy commission has not approved the use of these vessels for the disposal of United States radioactive wastes.

The subject is one of importance from the standpoint of protection for the public. Interested members might refer to the report of the committee on research which was made to the house some time ago. They will find there, in the statement made by the president of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, some reference to the care that is taken with regard to radioactive wastes, and it is interesting to note that the safety record of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited is very good indeed. No lost time injury has occurred in 15 years in the operations of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, and this has been due largely to the supervision and control exercised by the radiation hazards control branch and the co-operation it receives from operating personnel throughout the project.

Mr. Argue: So that the answer will be clear, is it a fact that although these containers are manufactured in Canada, they will be sent to the United States and will be used for the disposal of United States atomic wastes in United States waters and not Canadian waters?

Mr. Churchill: They will not be used for Canadian purposes whatsoever. Whether or not the company has a firm contract to ship them to the United States, and whether or not they will be used by the United States for the purpose indicated is not within my knowledge, but they are not intended for Canadian use and no radioactive wastes can be disposed of in Canada or adjacent to Canada in Canadian waters without the consent of Canada.

SHIPPING

LAKE ST. FRANCIS—GROUNDING OF FREIGHTER UNDER U.S. PILOT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport, notice of which I have already sent him. Is the minister aware that a United States pilot operating in Canadian waters, apparently in contravention of the Canada Shipping Act, recently grounded the freighter Astertal in lake St. Francis? What action does the minister, as the pilotage authority, intend to take in this case?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we are looking into that report.

[Later:]

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Transport a supplementary question. When he is looking into the matter I raised a moment ago, I wonder if he would inquire whether a United States pilot authorized to pilot a ship in international waters can take a ship right through to the city of Montreal, when Canadian pilots have not a similar right to operate in purely United States water.

Mr. Hees: Yes, I will get that information also.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

MANITOBA—POSSIBLE CHARGES IN RESPECT TO CHINESE IMMIGRATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether the R.C.M.P. investigation is still continuing or has been concluded with respect to any further charges which may be laid in the province of Manitoba in connection with the recent Chinese immigration investigation.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I am not able to give my hon. friend an authoritative answer. I think I had better find out what the exact situation is before I attempt to do so.

Inquiries of the Ministry

UNITED NATIONS

DISARMAMENT—REPORTED U.S. SUGGESTION RESPECTING COMMISSION MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): On Saturday last I asked the Prime Minister, and he promised to obtain a reply from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, if the government has yet been advised as to whether there would be a meeting of the disarmament commission prior to the general assembly of the United Nations, to deal with the question of disarmament.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Padillo Nervo, the chairman of the disarmament commission, is now in the course of inquiring of the different members of the commission with regard to a date for the meeting. Tentatively it has been set for August 15; at least the suggestions are that it may be on August 15.

FINANCE

"CANADIAN ECONOMIC OUTLOOK FOR 1959"—INQUIRY AS TO PREPARATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if the hon. gentleman could say whether there was prepared in his department a document entitled "The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1959"?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes; and the house had that before it earlier, and expressed its opinion.

UNITED NATIONS

CONGO—PARTICIPATION OF CANADIAN FORCES IN CURRENT OPERATIONS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) moved:

(a) That it be resolved by the ... House of Commons:

That it is expedient that the Houses of Parliament do approve the participation of Canadian forces in the United Nations operations in the Congo, and that this house do approve the same.

(b) The following proposed motion consequent upon the adoption of motion "a" above:—

That a message be sent to the Senate informing Their Honours that this house has adopted a resolution approving of the participation of Canadian forces in the United Nations operations in the Congo, and requesting Their Honours to unite with this house in the approval of the same by filling up the blanks in the resolution with the words: "Senate and".

United Nations Forces in Congo

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think I should commence by placing on record the two resolutions that were passed by the United Nations security council, so the entire transaction which has made necessary the action now being taken will be before members of the house.

On the 13th July a resolution introduced by Tunisia was passed which reads:

The security council,

Considering the report of the secretary general on a request for United Nations action in relation to the Republic of the Congo,

Considering the request for military assistance addressed to the secretary general by the president and the prime minister of the Republic of the Congo (document S/4382),

Calls upon the government of Belgium to withdraw their troops from the territory of the Republic of the Congo;

Decides to authorize the secretary general to take the necessary steps, in consultation with the government of the Republic of the Congo, to provide the government with such military assistance as may be necessary, until, through the efforts of the Congolese government with the technical assistance of the United Nations, the national security forces may be able, in the opinion of the government, to meet fully their tasks;

Requests the secretary general to report to the security council as appropriate.

Then there was a revised draft resolution on the 22nd July, sponsored by Ceylon and Tunisia, which in part read as follows:

The security council,

Having considered the first report by the secretary general on the implementation of security council resolution S/4387 of 14 July 1960 (document S/4389),

Appreciating the work of the secretary general and the support so readily and so speedily given to him by all member states invited by him to give assistance,

Noting that as stated by the secretary general the arrival of the troops of the United Nations force in Leopoldville has already had a salutary effect,

Recognizing that an urgent need still exists to continue and to increase such efforts,

Considering that the complete restoration of law and order in the Republic of the Congo would effectively contribute to the maintenance of international peace and security,

Recognizing that the security council recommended the admission of the Republic of the Congo to membership in the United Nations as a unit,

Calls upon the government of Belgium to implement speedily the council resolution of 14 July 1960, on the withdrawal of their troops and authorizes the secretary general to take all necessary action to this effect;

Requests all states to refrain from any action which might tend to impede the restoration of law and order and the exercise by the government of Congo of its authority and also to refrain from any action which might undermine the territorial integrity and the political independence of the Republic of the Congo;

Commends the secretary general for the prompt action he has taken to carry out resolution S/4387 of the security council and his first report;

Invites the specialized agencies of the United Nations to render to the secretary general such assistance as he may require;

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Requests the secretary general to report further to the security council as appropriate.

Those are the two resolutions upon which action is now invited and the approval of parliament asked. The constitutional position in this regard was set forth by the former prime minister, Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, on November 20, 1956, when an order in council was passed which authorized the maintenance on active service of not more than 2,500 officers and men as part or in immediate support of the United Nations emergency forces in the Middle East.

A special session of the house was called and the order in council was duly tabled, at which time the then prime minister stated that it has always been the constitutional requirement and the constitutional practice that the government has to take the responsibility of making a decision, and then puts itself in the hands of parliament so that parliament may determine whether it will provide the funds to implement that decision, or whether it will refuse to provide the funds and get another government to carry out the policies that parliament wants to have carried out.

That has always been the position. That will always be the position, so long as this party has the responsibility for public affairs in this country. A supplementary $1 item in the estimates was debated and approved, without a vote being taken, on November 29.

Mr. Pearson: I wonder if the Prime Minister could give us the Hansard page reference he has just mentioned?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have the copies of Hansard here. I thought I would simply summarize, and if there are any questions they can always be checked in Hansard and I will refer to the specific pages if required.

Today I had the opportunity of discussing something of the situation in the Congo with Air Commodore Carpenter of the R.C.A.F., who returned yesterday from the Congo. He was in charge of the air lift there, and those of other nations who saw something of the work he has done have given him high commendation.

He pointed out the situation as he saw it there in a way that could not be understood by simply reading the records and statements from those in the area. The views he expressed indicated something of the situation in that country. It is a vast country, situated on the equator, depending in the main on waterways, 1,000 miles on the Congo river and some 4,000 other waterway miles. Its communications generally are based on those waterways.

When independence came at the end of June the political and business administration ceased to exist. Those Belgians with experience withdrew, and the result was that there was uncertainty in all parts of that country. With the withdrawal of the Belgian administration, with businessmen leaving and with other Belgians immediately departing from the country, there was brought about a situation which became difficult for the people of that country.

In saying that it is no criticism whatever of the action taken by the Belgian government or by Belgian nationalists. The Congo had achieved its independence. It had an administration to take over. But the difficulty apparently was this, that there was not that training and experience which is so necessary for administrators to have when suddenly propelled into a position of national responsibility. With the businessmen leaving, the result was that unemployment mounted and food in general became very scarce; for although the Congo supplies 97 per cent of all the food consumed in the country, no one had the money to make purchases. A dangerous situation resulting from hunger was the consequence.

In these circumstances I think I should also place before the house discussions which I had on Saturday with the prime minister of the Congo. He said he came to Canada because in the thinking of the people of his country Canada occupied a position of independence, coupled with a reputation for coming to the assistance of other nations with plans without strings attached.

Following his visit he made certain statements to the press in an interview, and I should like to make very clear the events which took place. He did not ask for any aid or assistance on the part of Canada directly or in any way outside the ambit of the United Nations in joint action. He indicated that he felt that in view of the bilingual nature of our country and the need for having French speaking technicians, Canada, he hoped, would provide a reservoir for the supply of needed agriculturists, teachers, doctors, nurses, lawyers, radio technicians, information and administrative officers and the like. He wanted a list, if he could secure one, of Canadians who might be available to go to the Congo in the event that financial arrangements to that end were made by the Congo government with the individuals in question.

I stated that we would communicate with universities, the national research council and professional bodies to the end that the needs of the Congo, would be made known to them, and he emphasized that any arrangements made would of course be made directly by representatives of his government. He further stated that he would like Canada to participate in an investment program in his country, and I frankly told him that Canada, a country in a stage of great development, was herself in need of capital and that in this regard I did not expect that his hopes would be attained.

Also on Saturday I met with some Canadian missionaries who had just returned from the Congo. They were representatives of the Baptist and Mennonite faiths, and were brought to North America by airlift some ten days or two weeks ago. They informed me that while there was a feeling of antagonism against the whites in general, at no time had they been directly or physically interfered with; and I think it is proper to say that among all the missionary representatives of Catholic and Protestant denominations and faiths from Canada, none has been subjected to personal physical violence.

However, the interesting reaction of these people and the reason they came to Ottawa was that they felt that at the earliest possible date they should return to their responsibilities and fields of service. They felt that the missionaries of the various faiths and religious denominations in Canada would want to return there as soon as a reasonable degree of order had been re-established. They pointed out what is known to all of us, that wherever there is anarchy, chaos or economic dislocation there is a field for communist operations. They spoke in the highest terms of the treatment they had received. They also indicated the need of action being taken by the nations of the world to assure that the conditions existing in that country, wealthy but unfortunate in so far as civil disorder is concerned, should receive the attention of all of us.

In that regard it is obvious that the U.S.S.R. is using the situation prevalent in that country to assure that those conditions shall be magnified. Indeed, in the last few weeks the attitude of the U.S.S.R., particularly since early in May, has been one of aggressive and continuing threats. Only on Friday Tass, the official Soviet news agency, carried a government statement to the effect that it had become clear that "the aggressors in the Congo were acting with the encouragement of all the colonial North Atlantic treaty powers." This was a continuation of Premier Khrushchev's earlier view expressed on July 15, in which he referred to imperialist aggression in the Congo. Finally it was stated that Russia was ready to consider giving the Congo extensive economic assistance and "will not shrink from taking decisive measures to rebuff the aggressors who, as it has become quite clear, are acting with the encouragement of all the colonist powers of NATO."

That statement is hardly in keeping with the fact that the U.S.S.R. as a member of the security council must have voted for, or given its support to, the resolutions of the security council which I outlined at the beginning of my remarks. Indeed, on July 21 Mr. Khrushchev threatened to send troops to the Congo, although the Soviet representative in the United Nations security council voted for or supported the decision that no troops of major powers should be included in the international force.

The course of action taken by the U.S.S.R. in the past several weeks in the Congo incident is a continuance of the belligerent and even blatant attitude now being taken in many parts of the world by that country. It is of interest, too, that while Prime Minister Lumumba when he was in Washington refused to meet with the charge d'affaires of the Soviet embassy there, while he was in Ottawa he met with the ambassador of the U.S.S.R.

I repeat in summary what I have said, namely that the need of action being taken to restore equilibrium in the Congo is underlined by the fact that the U.S.S.R. has been making the threats to which I have referred. Indeed, in addition that country has endeavoured to supply foodstuffs directly to the Congo without going through the United Nations organization. All this if successful, could not but have an adverse effect on the strength, the authority and the responsibility of the United Nations.

During the years Canadians have advocated the need of an international force under the control of the United Nations to be available whenever required. I looked up some of the debates in parliament, and I am simply going to refer to them so as to make clear to hon. members the nature of the particular discussions which took place in this regard.

I spoke in this house on October 19, 1945 on the United Nations agreement which was then before us for consideration, and I said this, as reported at page 1308:

> I know this charter will be approved, and, I hope unanimously, by parliament, but approval will be only lip service to its idealistic principles unless parliament faces the realistic problem of assuring not only by words but by pledges that Canada will contribute to and make available to the security council the necessary armed forces, assistance and facilities including the rights of unhampered international air passage across Canada and the use of her airports for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Then again, prior to the United Nations meeting in April, 1945, at San Francisco, I said speaking on the conference, as reported at page 163 of Hansard of March 23 of that year:

Are we going to incorporate a further provision whereby we in Canada shall determine not only the number of men we will supply and the nature of other support we may give, but in addition stipulate that the men we mobilize for an international force shall not be used beyond the confines of Canada? The Prime Minister finally used these words:

> "As they stand, the acceptance of the proposals would in no way commit Canada to send forces beyond Canadian territory at the call of the security council. If any such commitment were sought, it would be embodied in a later agreement freely negotiated by the government of Canada, and coming into effect only after it had been approved by parliament."

With that statement I am not in disagreement in so far as it requires that this agreement, like any other of the kind, under the proposals, must be presented to parliament. But what is serious about that statement is that either unintentionally or designedly, page 26 of Hansard, on which the Prime Minister's remarks are reported, makes for controversy in this country at a time when there should be a united front. Surely one of the outstanding lessons we learned in the failure of the league of nations was that when the member nations of the league had the right to determine the degree of their obligation the league ended as an instrument to prevent war.

Then at page 164 I said:

> The warning of 1919 comes back in 1945. The league of nations failed because it never had the power or strength of a real league. It failed because it lacked the united responsibility of all member nations to keep the peace; because it reserved to any and all of them the right to decide if and when and where they would co-operate to assure peace.

And a little later:

> If we take away from our responsibility to contribute our part everywhere in the world we add to the probability that eventual impotence will come to the security council, for other nations may well follow our lead in this regard.

After referring to the fact that the one great contribution Canada could make in the building of a new world free from war would be to make available to the United Nations the strategic airports given to us by nature, I went on to say, as reported at page 165 of Hansard of March 23, 1945:

> In that way we can do our part toward rendering available posts from which great international forces will be able to move in order to prevent aggression, not only within the confines of Canada but everywhere in the world where duty calls and parliament allows.

Our view at all times was that an international force available anywhere in the world was the one means whereby the high idealism inherent in the United Nations organization would become effective in the interests of world peace.

In addition, I think I should also refer to the discussion which took place in this house on January 31, 1956. At page 723 of Hansard of that date I set forth the views that had been expressed on earlier occasions. On that occasion the house was discussing the situation in the Middle East. I said that as far as I could see the only immediate hope was to set up an international force to protect and assure the boundaries. I went on to say:

> I suggest to my hon. friend who interrupted that one of the things he can do, with his influence in the United Nations, is to see to it that something in the nature of an international force is established to the end that this dangerous situation shall be obliterated. If it is not, and war breaks out, we shall have war all over the world—

I simply point out these instances in the past, beginning in March of 1945, to indicate that throughout that period of time the Conservative party took a strong stand on behalf of an international force.

An international force has now been set up to meet the delicate if not indeed the frightening situation in the Congo. I say that because unless a degree of order is established there, what is taking place in the Congo may, in the nature of things, be expected to expand. There will be a total of 12,140 in this international force consisting of 14 battalions and 5 companies representing nine countries: Ethiopia, Ghana, Guinea, Liberia, the Mali federation (Senegal and Sudan), Morocco, Tunisia. Haiti and Burma may also contribute. Ireland has already sent its force, one battalion, and Sweden has transferred 635 persons from the Gaza area. In addition to these there are military advisers from Canada, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Italy and Denmark.

I should pay the tribute of Canadians to the outstanding work done by all who have gone to the Congo, to the advance party of officers, and in particular Colonel Jean Berthiaume, chief of staff to Major General Von Horne, United Nations commander. Colonel Berthiaume is in charge of getting in troops and of deployment, and has earned the commendation of all who are contributing to the force. As I said earlier, the airlift has been in charge of Air Commodore Fred Carpenter, R.C.A.F., who has also made an outstanding contribution that has won widespread commendation.

What have we done? What has been Canada's contribution? I simply outline it for the record without going into particulars. Following the initial request the government authorized the secondment of five Canadian officers who volunteered from the United Nations truce supervisory organization in Palestine. Three of the five are now in Leopoldville. When it was reported that there was the risk of a food shortage the government decided to provide pork and dried powdered milk to which reference has already been made. These supplies were airlifted by R.C.A.F. North Star aircraft.

United Nations Forces in Congo

The secretary general asked for the secondment of certain specialized personnel, including five Canadian officers serving with national contingents of the United Nations emergency force in Palestine. The five Canadian officers, all of the rank of captain, are specialists in movement control, equipment and transport. Then there was a request for signals and logistic support for the United Nations Congo force. On receiving that request, Canadian and United Nations authorities consulted as to the precise needs to be met in the Congo.

On July 28 Canada authorized provision for the United Nations force in the Congo of up to 500 Canadian armed force personnel including a signals detachment numbering some 200, as well as a small Canadian headquarters detachment. Arrangements for sending the selected personnel to the Congo are going forward, and parliament is now being asked to approve the action in this regard.

In response to an appeal for medical personnel to serve in the hospitals of the Congo, the Canadian Red Cross society recruited from Canada two teams of trained medical personnel each composed of one surgeon, one physician trained in tropical medicine and three nurses. All these are French speaking. Both teams left on July 28 and are expected to arrive in Leopoldville today. Further, in response to a request from the secretary general, the Canadian government has placed at the disposal of the United Nations the four North Star aircraft which airlifted supplies to the Congo, for the purpose of transporting supplies and equipment for the United Nations force in the Congo on the shuttle service between Pisa and Leopoldville.

In addition we are acquiring at once two Caribou aircraft from the de Havilland corporation for airlifting supplies to Canadian forces. A third will be made available in September and a fourth in October. The feature of these aircraft is the fact that they can take off from short runways. Even though only two such aircraft are available at the moment, this action will ensure that the Canadian force there will receive proper commissariat assistance.

Furthermore, we are in a position to supply six or seven R.C.A.F. officers to organize the United Nations air transport force. That force is made up of airmen from Yugoslavia, Sweden, Norway, Brazil and the Argentine. In addition to those named, India will provide certain pilots and air force personnel. This country's contribution will total 75 pilots. In order to organize this extraordinarily complex international force into a unified whole the necessary R.C.A.F. officers to whom I have just alluded will be supplied.

That, in general, represents Canada's contribution to the force. What is taking place is, I think, one of the greatest steps forward toward the ultimate establishment of an international force. Indeed, there has never been in all history anything like the force that is now being mobilized from among the various nations that I have referred to, or in all of mankind's march to the achievement of peace in the world. All through modern history hope has been expressed. In the middle ages the international lawyers claimed that the only way in which peace could be achieved would be through a force readily available to meet whatever situations might arise before they expanded to such an extent as to assure the outbreak of war.

The reason the armed forces on foot were mobilized from among the nations I have mentioned was to assure the peoples of Africa, and I think Asia too, that the nations comprising the white race were not, as it were, organized into a group or international organization against the coloured race.

I trust that the house will give unanimous acceptance to the course we have followed, for it represents a major step forward to that day when, wherever difficulties may arise anywhere in the world, as I stated in March, 1945, the nations comprising the United Nations will all make available to an international force whatever is requisite to assure peace.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will have listened with great interest to what the Prime Minister has said, both in regard to the resolution before the house and in regard to the background for the action we are being asked to support in this resolution, including something of the history of an international peace force. We on this side of the house would like to comment on both aspects of the Prime Minister's statement.

The resolution states:

> That it is expedient that the Houses of Parliament do approve the participation of Canadian forces in the United Nations operations in the Congo—

In this resolution as I read it, Mr. Speaker, there is no limitation on the nature or extent of that participation, but there is the limitation that the participation is designed to cover Canadian forces in the United Nations operations in the Congo, and cover no other form of assistance that might be required. Notwithstanding that there is, perhaps understandably, no limitation on our participation within this particular category, we on this side are happy to be able to support a resolution of this kind and, indeed the action that has been taken by the government outside the terms of this resolution.

We would say that the course adopted by the government in bringing this matter to the attention of the house in this way is the proper constitutional course to take. Also, in the matter of action that is taken under this resolution in the supply of forces, I take it that the government will table, as would be required under the Canadian Forces Act, any order in council which has been passed putting members of our armed forces on active service for this purpose. I think the act itself—I believe it was passed in 1950—requires that this should be done within 10 days of the action having been taken.

This is a new assignment for the United Nations and for Canada in its participation as a member of United Nations, Mr. Speaker. It is a new assignment as indefinite as it is likely to be far reaching and important, not only in respect of the immediate emergency which has occurred but in respect of the development of the idea of United Nations help of this kind in the future.

We are bound to ask ourselves the question as Canadians, as a member of the United Nations, what are we taking on? Indeed, what is the United Nations taking on? A few weeks' or a few years' assignment? A temporary job in helping to restore order as part of an international police and peace force or a long job, again as a member of the United Nations, to help to administer and assist economically a state of some 15 million people which has achieved its independence in circumstances which are not easy for the people of that state? Indeed, Mr. Speaker, this latter assignment, which is related to though not specifically part of this resolution, may be an even more important and certainly far more expensive one than that which we are being asked to take in the purely police and military side of the undertaking.

The Prime Minister has pointed out that the authority behind the recommendations of the Secretary General of the United Nations, who incidentally has accepted this new assignment in his usual swift, efficient and devoted way, lies in two resolutions of the security council of which all members of the security council, I believe, approved. In any event, no member voted against the resolutions, including the Soviet union which, if it had wished to do so at that time, could have vetoed either or both of these resolutions.

These resolutions provide for the members of the United Nations on invitation from the secretary general—I am paraphrasing one of them now—to contribute forces, peace-preserving forces, for a United Nations contingent to go to the Congo. From what the Prime Minister read from the second resolution, I think it may be interpreted as providing for other forms of assistance, because it does refer to the technical agencies of the United Nations which the secretary general might call on to help him in this field.

Acting on this authority the United Nations, through the secretary general—my information is only from public sources but I assume it is accurate—and the Congo state have now signed an agreement, of the details of which I have no knowledge, with the U.N., that the United Nations forces will remain in the Congo until the mission of peace has been fully accomplished. That mission of peace may require more than the provision of police forces; it may require the provision of economic and other kinds of help.

I am not quarrelling for one minute with the advisability, the wisdom, of the secretary general entering into this kind of agreement on behalf of the United Nations. It was well that he should have done so, but it does underline the possibly far-reaching nature of the commitments which we are undertaking as a member of the United Nations, and which we should be glad to undertake. I read this morning that the statement covering this agreement had been circulated to the members of the security council by the secretary general himself, and it would be very interesting to know whether this reported agreement has been circulated to Canada which is proposing, and rightly so, to take such a constructive and active part in this operation.

The situation, as the Prime Minister has pointed out, is not an easy one, and in many respects it is a dangerous one. There is the obvious impatience of some elements of the government of the Congo, including, if we can give credence to press reports, the deputy premier, to get the last relic of Belgian authority out of the Congo in the least possible time, to use the United Nations force primarily and swiftly for that purpose and presumably, once that has been done, to get the United Nations out also except in terms of economic and financial help. If this course were followed then, presumably, with the United Nations forces out of the Congo, the assistance given would be under the administration of the Congo authorities.

There is another kind of impatience with respect to the Congo, and that is the impatience of others at the lack of order, the lack of discipline in this new and free state, and some impatience at the administrative weakness of the present government, a weakness which is understandable in the light of the immediate background and the less immediate background of their ascension to power in their own country. So we read even in this morning's paper of rising tensions, of charges that the United Nations forces—I thought the Prime Minister quite rightly referred to one of these this morning—are in danger of assisting in what has been called colonialist intrigues; indeed, are in danger of being accused of complicity in those intrigues.

It is discouraging to hear these reports out of the Congo at a time when the United Nations is moving with speed and efficiency to assist. We also read and have heard reports over the week end of the development of separatism in this country, which has a heritage of tribal separatism, a separatism based on the historical forces of tribalism which, if they prevail, might lead to an even worse disaster than has been the case up to the present.

Then we have the problem of Katanga, the richest and most highly developed part of the Congo, without which it is difficult to see, on the basis of the information I have, how the rest of the Congo could ever become a viable economy without great support from the outside world. So this situation is a terrific challenge to the Congo and its people and to the United Nations and its members. I was reading this morning in the Globe and Mail the statement of a United Nations official just back from the Congo, who was quoted as saying:

> The Congo needs artificial respiration. Ninety per cent of the technicians and administrators are gone.

The Prime Minister made some reference to that difficulty.

> The government doesn't work. The railroad doesn't work. Nothing works. And on top of that tribal warfare can be expected at any moment.

I wish this were too gloomy a view of the situation. I hope that what the United Nations has asked its members to do and what they are doing will prevent the realization of this gloomier prediction. Yet it is quite clear that United Nations intervention in the situation was essential to prevent disaster. Those people who sometimes say that the United Nations does nothing except talk, pass resolutions and waste time and money in New York should ask themselves now, what would be the situation in the Congo if there had not been a United Nations to call on in this emergency?

I think all Canadians will be happy to back up anything the Canadian government may do to play our own part effectively in this essential work. That part will require administrative and technical help; and, as the Prime Minister has pointed out, perhaps Canada is in a special position to contribute this kind of help because of the bilingual nature of our population. It is unfortunate that there is now, so far as I know, no permanent organization in the United Nations which could have moved into this technical and administrative field with a corps of trained international technicians and administrative experts.

I know this suggestion has been made more than once, and this situation does underline the importance of having available not only armed forces for police and peace purposes, but a corps of international civil servants trained to assist in situations of this kind. This will take a long time, but I think it is high time that the process should begin, because the situation which we find in the Congo may well be repeated in other countries which have newly achieved or are about to achieve independence.

There is the other aspect of this matter. We will be asked to contribute a contingent to the police and peace preservation corps. Once again, however, the United Nations has found itself faced with an emergency and the necessity of taking ad hoc action to meet that emergency. How much better it would have been if there had been at the disposal of the United Nations, for immediate use, trained, equipped contingents from the various members of the United Nations. Instead the secretary general, as he had to in 1956, has had to call on those whom he thought were qualified to help and from whom he thought help would be desirable in the first instance, in this case Asian and African countries, followed by help by other countries.

I think probably the secretary general would say that the principles adopted in 1956 for the establishment of the United Nations emergency force at that time have been of great assistance to him upon this occasion, even though he had to operate in a rather different way, because at that time the assembly did pass resolutions which established the principles for the organization of a force of this kind, and also laid down the principles regulating the relationship of such a force to the peoples and governments which they were seeking to assist. But this situation does underline again the necessity of pressing ahead at the United Nations for some kind of an organization which will make unnecessary in the future this kind of improvised action.

I do not mean by that—the secretary general has already expressed his own doubts about this—a permanent United Nations police force established in some particular place or places under direct United Nations control. I mean having forces available in the various member middle powers and smaller powers, kept in those countries but earmarked for United Nations use; trained for that purpose in the administrative, technical and signals field as well as in the combat field, and ready to move at a moment's notice on the authority and approval of the government and parliament of the country concerned, if it happens to be a free democracy.

The Prime Minister talked about the desirability, which was recognized years ago by him and many others, of some form of international peace and police force behind the United Nations Charter. Indeed, the idea of an international force behind international law goes back to the very dawn of history. It has been an ideal which has inspired many men all through history, from the days of the Greek leagues to the holy Roman empire, through the middle ages with the grand design of Henri Quatre, on to the holy alliance of the nineteenth century, a kind of autocratic expression of the whole idea, until we reach the league of nations.

There was a clause in the league of nations covenant which did provide for the implementation of such force behind international law, in the development of which I must confess Canada did not play, in those days—and I am now talking about the 1920's—too creditable a part. We were more concerned at that time with keeping out of trouble than trying to prevent trouble, for reasons which seemed very sensible at that time. But looking back now at the trouble we have got into since 1914, it does not seem to be so wise.

When the United Nations charter was drafted at San Francisco, every speech made there, and I sat through a great many of them, was about the necessity of getting behind the charter and building on the mistakes of the old league of nations and its covenant; making sure, once again, that if we were in trouble we would have this kind of force. We made our own share of declarations at that time, for that purpose.

As a result of those speeches and those ideas, there were included in the charter provisions which seemed to be a recognition of the mistakes that were made in the league covenant. Provision was made in the charter for an international force which would have been strong enough not only to put an end to brush fires and to police situations with which we are confronted today, but an international force which would have been strong enough to prevent wars, because it would have included contingents from the great powers. There would have been an international force on a grand scale.

But the cold war began, and an international force of that type became merely a provision in a document about which very little was done, if anything, to implement, except to set up in New York a military commission of the permanent members of the council, which is still in existence and which I gather meets formally every month or two.

The cold war made that kind of international force impossible. During these years, after 1945 and in the 1950's, a great deal of attention was given at United Nations to finding some other kind of force which would take the place of the one that was so abortive in the charter, because it included only the permanent members of the council who could call on others for help if necessary. I remember that at the United Nations the Canadian delegation took a very active part in the resolutions that led to the establishment of a peace observation group, and I remember the Canadian delegate, at the very earliest assembly, making a plea for the building up of this kind of international peace and police force.

The Prime Minister has referred to the difficulties in the Middle East before they broke into war in 1956, and he mentioned the desirability in the spring of 1956 of establishing an international peace force to assist in the maintaining of peace in that very dangerous area. I recall very well the discussion on this idea that took place in the committee of external affairs, when it was pointed out that the Canadian and other members of the United Nations had already taken up this question of a peace and police force for the Middle East, and that it had been rejected at that time both by the Arab governments and the government of Israel, as well as by officers of the United Nations, as premature and not practicable.

So there was the situation when the crisis and the necessities of 1956, in the autumn, made necessary that kind of swift action which should have been provided for months and years before. If at that time there had not been this crisis, it is very doubtful whether the United Nations emergency force would have been set up. Also if at that time delegations at the United Nations assembly had voted against the inclusion of this item on the agenda, on the motion before the United Nations assembly, there could not have been any international force. Furthermore if then there had not been approval by the United Nations assembly of the action taken, for reasons which seemed perfectly good to them—reasons advanced by the governments of the United Kingdom and France—for intervening, there would not have been any United Nations emergency force and we would not have had anything on which to build in 1960. It was the establishment of the United Nations emergency force which has at least given us a foundation on which we could build in 1960.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about the Korean crisis?

Mr. Pearson: The Prime Minister says, what about the Korean situation. That was another kind of intervention. That was United Nations intervention but not the kind of intervention through an international police and peace force which I am talking about, because it was an intervention made possible by a decision of the security council, such as was visualized in San Francisco in 1945, but which was made possible only because the Russians did not turn up at the security council meeting. If they had the opportunity over again they would veto any action of that kind. It was also a decision to put the United Nations force under the administrative control and military direction of a single member of the United Nations, the United States of America. It was also action taken in Korea after there had been a declaration, accepted by the United Nations, of aggression in Korea. So it was not quite the same, either in origin or in the action taken, as the decision in 1956, which did set up a United Nations emergency force under United Nations control consisting of contingents from the middle powers, which is the way I suspect it will have to be done in the future in this kind of situation.

Since 1956 there has been very little progress indeed in building on this foundation for the establishment of a permanent United Nations emergency force, for reasons which I do not need to go into now. But I think the situation in these early days underlines again the desirability of doing this on a permanent basis, and it emphasizes the misfortune of the United Nations in not being able to make any progress in the last two or three assemblies.

The Prime Minister mentioned the attitude of the Soviet union toward what has been proposed by the United Nations to assist in this Congo situation. Experience in the last 15 years has shown beyond any possibility of doubt that communist governments will not only refuse any constructive support for an initiative of this kind through the United Nations, but that they will do their best to confuse and frustrate the purposes of the United Nations and misrepresent those purposes in the eyes of the public of the country where the United Nations is intervening, in this case the Congo. Anarchy is their opportunity and chaos is their ally. Perhaps that helps to explain the sinister—I do not think that is too strong a word—statements which have come out of Moscow in the last few days.

The Soviet union began to show its hand in this matter after it had given us at least some reason by accepting the original security council resolution to believe that it might take a different and more constructive stand. It has shown its hand, as the Prime Minister mentioned, by talking about aggression on the part of the NATO forces in the Congo, a statement which of course is a cynical falsehood. The United Nations purposes and the purposes of those members of the United Nations which are participating in this operation are above reproach, and I am sure all of us hope that the action of the United Nations will be as effective as its purposes are good.

We know that Canada can play an important part in this action. We learned the other day that the nature of our contribution at the present time—I am talking now about the military side of it—is to be the provision of administrative, technical and headquarters personnel. That is what was required of Canada in 1956, and there were some members of this house who made not very flattering observations at that time, about that kind of participation. But this would appear to be the way in which Canada can serve best in this kind of United Nations operation, at least at the present time. Perhaps our experience in the United Nations emergency force, as indicated to the secretary general and those advising him on those matters, shows how Canada can best serve in this situation by providing personnel on the administrative side, the signals side, the technical side, the liaison side and the headquarters side. If it had not been for that kind of work by the Canadian forces in the Palestine United Nations emergency force it would have been infinitely more difficult for that force to be as successful as it was. The Canadian forces in UNEF, as I am sure the Canadian forces will be in the Congo UNEF, were the backbone of the force owing to the essential nature and efficiency of their contribution to its operation.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister mentioned something about the visit of the premier of the Congo last Saturday and the request for assistance which he made, I think the Prime Minister was very wise indeed in emphasizing that while we want to do everything we can, both in the policing and economic fields as well as in the administrative field, to help this new and struggling state, this must be done through the United Nations. Not only is that the best way for us to participate; it is the best kind of assistance from the point of view of the Congo itself, because it will then be above all form of political suspicion, and I hope no member of the United Nations will emphasize direct assistance at the expense of United Nations assistance.

In short, Mr. Speaker, I hope we will do what we can in this field of developing a police and peace-preserving force, and I hope the Prime Minister's desire that this assistance through the United Nations will prove to be possible. We are happy on this side to support this resolution.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, after the order of business was announced on Saturday afternoon last the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) suggested that this resolution be dealt with first this morning. In my opinion the ready acceptance of the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate on behalf of the official opposition of what I consider a most appropriate and happy suggestion symbolizes the unity of the members of this house in dealing with this important matter this morning. A question affecting a neighbour concerns the whole world and should be discussed prior to dealing with, shall I say, the vicissitudes of our domestic house.

I listened with great interest to the explanation of the Prime Minister with respect to the resolution which he presented to the house; that it was based on previous resolutions adopted by the United Nations security council and on procedure and practice established by the previous government. I can not help thinking—I do not know whether it is because I am growing somewhat in years—of days gone by when I hear problems of the present being discussed. I remember that someone said, and if I am correct it was a French writer, that to understand the world is wiser than to condemn it; to study the world is better than to shun it; to use the world is nobler than to abuse it; to make the world lovelier, better and happier is the noblest work of man or woman.

I think this resolution introduced by the Prime Minister this morning provides Canada with an opportunity to contribute her share within the framework of the United Nations effort toward making this portion of the world, a somewhat unhappy portion of the world at the present time, a lovelier and happier place in days to come. For that reason we in this group give our wholehearted support to this resolution.

However, the first essential is peace. We cannot carry on administrative practices or social undertakings without law and order.

So the first thing we have to establish is peace, and in my opinion peace is the golden wisp that binds the sheaf of opportunity for the people of the Congo, and we are doing what we can by adopting this resolution resolution unanimously to build that wisp. In my opinion, by this action the parliament of Canada is making quick use of the opportunity available to it in this extraordinary situation in the Congo and of the machinery at hand to demonstrate our readiness to accept our responsibility as a member of the United Nations.

The members of this group are of the opinion that the Belgian government is to a great extent responsible for the present unfortunate situation. I remember as a boy when the conscience of Europe was shocked by what was known as the Belgian atrocities, but that situation was remedied and the people of the Congo have received many economic advantages as a result of the development there. I say at this time on behalf of this group that we consider the government of Belgium to be responsible to a great extent for the present state of affairs, because there was no preparation for independence, no training of people to take over administrative tasks, no training of doctors and all those other persons whose work is required to carry on the activities of a modern state. Possibly there is some truth in the reports over the C.B.C., in our press and in United States and European papers that in some quarters it was hoped that the Congolese administration would collapse and that a Belgian administration would be required to return, together with its civil service and also, of course, its business interest. There may be truth, also, in the other reports that the mutiny at Leopoldville ruined this opportunity. But certainly from a number of reports it is obvious that there was an almost complete lack of preparation for independence.

When I consider this situation I cannot but remember the remarks made before a group of the commonwealth parliamentary association by the premier of Northern Nigeria last winter, when he spoke of that country's coming independence on October 1 of this year. He spoke of his country's long-awaited independence and said they recognized, many of them in Northern Nigeria, that they were not yet fully prepared for independence; that until a civil service staff had been trained and they had men to carry on medical services, this would not be the case. During that short talk to this group in the parliamentary association he paid tribute to the preparation for independence which had been made by the United Kingdom government.

Now the United Nations forces have a tremendous task, but the situation does provide its member nations, and Canada too, with an unusual opportunity of using their forces, both military and civil, in a positive policy for peace.

I see the Secretary of State for External Affairs is looking at me, and I cannot resist quoting a few lines from the Globe and Mail of July 30, 1960, because the Globe and Mail is a paper which in general supports the policy of the present government—

Mr. Green: Who told you that?

Mr. Herridge: Perhaps I should say that historically it has supported Progressive Conservative policy, but in recent times it has been critical at certain points. It is strange, I think, that in recent months we have so often found ourselves in agreement with the Globe and Mail on international affairs. This editorial is entitled "Defence, a Positive Policy". It reads in part:

> We believe there can be a positive policy on defence. We believe men at arms can be employed as effectively in waging peace as in waging war —more effectively, indeed, because the waging of peace goes on all the time, all over the world, while the waging of war is only a possibility. We believe that in Canada's defence program there should be a strong emphasis on the use of troops to prevent wars rather than fight in them. We believe that Canada should play a major role in the formation of a permanent, multi-national police force; and that Canada should be one of the major contributors—of money, material and men—to such a force.
> It is a great tragedy, in our view, that Canada is so little identified with the United Nations emergency force now restoring the peace in the Congo. The United Nations action in central Africa precisely typifies the kind of service an international police force, drawn from middling and small nations, can render. It can keep the great powers out of a troubled situation, keep them from directly confronting and threatening each other in that situation, by stepping into the situation itself.
>
> The UNEF is doing this in the Congo. The only trouble is that the African UNEF, like its Middle East counterpart, was hurriedly and belatedly organized to meet a specific situation. What we suggest is a standing United Nations police force, ready to swing into action immediately, anywhere in the world.
>
> But Canada can scarcely crusade for such a force when it has shown so little interest in the Congo action—which secretary general Dag Hammarskjold rightly describes as the greatest enterprise the United Nations has ever undertaken. And Canada can scarcely contribute to such a force if in trying to tag along with the super powers, Canada has ceased to produce conventional forces.

Then it goes on briefly:

> More recently, external affairs minister Green revealed that the United Nations had requested 100 Canadian signallers for Congo service, but that he was having difficulty in finding them.

Mr. Green: May I ask the hon. member a question? Does he think those paragraphs he has just read from the Globe and Mail editorial are fair?

Mr. Herridge: Would the hon. gentleman mind repeating his question? I did not hear it.

Mr. Green: Does the hon. member think himself, that the paragraphs he has just read from the Globe and Mail criticizing the action of the Canadian government, saying it was not interested in the Congo and so on, are fair comment?

Mr. Herridge: I shall be quite fair in my reply. I do not think it is quite correct to say that the Canadian government is not interested in the Congo. I read that sentence in the context of the whole of the editorial. I do not think it is quite fair to say that the Canadian government is not interested, but I think the tenor of the whole article is that the Globe and Mail wishes the government had shown more immediate concern with the situation.

May I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, when we recessed for lunch to take on some bodily sustenance—there are some who believe that the hon. member for Kootenay West is a saint but even that hon. gentleman requires material restoration periodically—I had just concluded reading some paragraphs from the Globe and Mail of Saturday, July 30. I read complete paragraphs, not omitting sentences with which I do not agree, then later explain my disagreement with a certain sentence or certain words. Before I had an opportunity to do that on this occasion the Secretary of State for External Affairs, with out of character impetuosity, asked me a question with respect to one sentence. If I heard him correctly the sentence was:

> But Canada can scarcely crusade for such a force when it has shown so little interest in the Congo action—

The hon. member asked me if I thought that statement was fair. Let me explain. I was going on to say that while I agreed with the tenor of the article, I thought that statement was unfair. However we are very anxious to be sure that Canada is doing her fair share in making contributions of personnel from the armed forces or the civil administration. When the Prime Minister or the minister replies to comments made on this side of the house I trust we will be given an idea of Canada's contribution according to her population as compared with the contributions of other members of the United Nations.

This group was somewhat concerned at what seemed to be hesitation on Canada's part in taking action. We looked for the "ready, aye, ready" attitude especially on the part of this government. The Republic of Ireland has already mobilized and recruited a special battalion for service in the Congo. In this respect Canada is in a particularly fortunate position, the Congolese being mainly French speaking people. We have three battalions of the Royal 22nd regiment stationed at Valcartier, including in their groups a number of senior commissioned officers and non-commissioned officers who have had considerable experience in actions on behalf of the United Nations in various parts of the world. This regiment would be a credit to Canada having won its spurs and laurels at Courcelette in the second world war. We should give consideration to using these French speaking Canadian troops if required. I am not suggesting that this group knows all the background and details but when the minister replies we would like information on this question.

I support the attitude taken by the leader of the official opposition on the organization of the U.N. force. We do not support a centralized United Nations police force, but support the idea of trained troops in each country ready to be utilized on short notice in a United Nations police force for any particular service or action. Much more could be done in future than has been done in the past for preliminary staff arrangements and organization so all nations would know how to proceed to immediately mobilize the forces required to meet any particular circumstances.

With respect to Canada's contribution in civil affairs, I wish to quote a brief paragraph from another Globe and Mail editorial of today which states that the first task is to restore order so that white and black alike can live in peace. It goes on to say that this presents great difficulties, as follows:

> No less formidable are the civil problems facing the United Nations in the Congo. Practically all the Belgian doctors and nurses have fled the Congo; there is no one to take their place. Technicians, managers and civil servants are needed to take the place of the retreating Belgians. The vacancies cannot be filled with Congolese; in the whole vast country, with its 14 million people, there are only 16 university or college graduates.

This group believes that the United Nations should work for the reunification of the Congo so it can progress to better advantage because there will be a balance as between various areas in the country, and all the wealth will not be centred in one splinter state.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question, Mr. Speaker? Would the hon. gentleman suggest that the United Nations force should be used in the event there was anything of a disruptive nature in Katanga, in order to ensure that Katanga would remain within the Congo state?

Mr. Herridge: That is a fair question. Circumstances are so fluid that it is difficult to give a definitive answer. I am content to leave the decision to the secretary general, the commanders and the senior officers of the United Nations.

As a result of lack of training in years past of civil service personnel and all the rest of it, the first thing to be done after peace is established will be the training of administrative personnel. That is the first thing to be done before there can be any development in the country. The second will be the provisioning and training of technical personnel. Then one of the immediate problems will be that of health of the people in this region. As a matter of fact, my recent reading has indicated to me that the question of health is a most serious one in the northern and central portions of Africa. Why? Because so little has been done for those people, although there has been great wealth extracted from the region for many years. I was reading yesterday that the life expectancy in northern and central Africa is just under 30 years at the present time.

Attention should be focused on our out of balance approach to this situation not only in the Congo but in other African states and backward nations. To illustrate, last year the United States spent in the neighbourhood of $40 billion on armaments and contributed $3,500,000 to the World Health Organization. I am not going to lay blame on any one country or the other at this time but this situation must be recognized. We are all concerned in this, and as members of the United Nations we must all share some responsibility. All I am mentioning the figures for is to indicate what one nation can spend on armaments and what it is spending in the development of the World Health Organization, which is the organization that the United Nations will use in the Congo and does use to promote health in other regions of the world.

The other factor that has been mentioned is the cost to the United Nations of U.N. action in the Congo. This is a very important undertaking. In the opinion of the members of this group it is one of the greatest tasks the United Nations has handled since its formation. It may be of some duration. The United Nations may be required to stay in the Congo for some years, to the advantage of the people of the country and for the preservation of world peace. Anyone who is in the know at all at the present time knows that this is a very serious situation in so far as the western world is concerned. That is why we have to pull our weight, and no nation should shirk its responsibility.

The matter of cost has been raised, and cost must receive consideration. There will be cost to Canada in respect of our forces and in respect of other contributions, and it looks as though the cost will be considerable. We in this group suggest this. Over the years thousands of millions of dollars have been taken out of the copper mines and other mines of Katanga. Today we read—and the Prime Minister mentioned it this morning—that food is one of the immediate problems in the Congo region; that there is a shortage of food in a few days. We are of the opinion, although we are not suggesting permanent confiscation of private property, that the United Nations should take over the rich mining business that now exists and administer it during the tenure of its mandate, and then leave it to the people of the region and the established government at the conclusion of the mandate to decide what should be done with those properties. In the meantime use the profits of these properties to provide the health, technical and other services required by the people of the Congo. Surely we owe that to the people of the Congo who have suffered from this exploitation, possibly one of the worst examples of exploitation in modern colonial history. I think we, the white people, owe that to the black people of the Congo, to indicate our concern for and interest in their future, and our anxiety to make amends for past injustice.

However, regardless of our efforts to establish law and order, peace will prevail in the Congo only as a result of our continuing and united effort to make life worth living for the people of the Congo. That is the approach we have to take. The policy we have to assume in the United Nations is food instead of guns and health instead of disease. Those should be the slogans of the United Nations forces.

As I mentioned before, one of the first problems in these early days is the shortage of food. Let Canadians show their pride in the Canadian contingent to the Congo by acceptance of our full responsibility to the United Nations and to the people of this stricken area. We must do everything possible in my opinion, to inform the people of Canada of our contingent's activities while in the Congo. Today we meet a growing cynicism, a growing lack of faith on the part of our young people particularly. When this force goes to the Congo, I make the suggestion to the Prime Minister, let us make certain that its activities are made known to the Canadian people; let us see that interest is aroused in the activities of this force, this defence of peace. Let us be sure that its activities are made known to our high school children and to our public school children of an age sufficient to understand. Let us speak with some pride of our participation in this organization; let us have a continuing interest as the result of information by the government of Canada given through the press and other agencies. We must arouse public interest and pride in our participation in this very important work which I am quite sure many people do not fully appreciate at the present time.

This latest task, Mr. Speaker, of our nation and of the United Nations is a key task; it is possibly one of the most important tasks ever undertaken by that body or by its agencies. Canada's record in the Middle East, in the United Nations emergency force on the Arab-Israeli frontier, and on other United Nations teams in other parts of the world is unblemished and is respected everywhere.

In conclusion on behalf of this group I extend best wishes for a successful mission to all the officers and personnel of the Canadian Congo contingent.

Mr. Pearkes: May I ask the hon. gentleman one question before he resumes his seat? Does he subscribe to the quotation he read from the Globe and Mail that there was difficulty in obtaining 100 signallers. Because I want to assure him that my department has had no difficulty whatever in getting the number of signallers required from the personnel available. The only delay there has been is in knowing the type of signallers that were required. It is no good sending a radio operator if somebody is required to run a line exchange, and there is no good sending out linesmen if dispatch riders are required. We had to wait until we knew the type of signaller that was required, but there has been no difficulty in getting signallers to go there.

Mr. Herridge: In reply may I congratulate the minister on the excellent tuition he has received from the hon. member for Essex East in making a speech while asking a question.

Mr. Pearkes: I wanted to correct the erroneous idea of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Herridge: I want to ask a question. Some members of the armed forces have said that to date all they have been issued were their berets and some underwear. The clothing has not arrived. Would that be true?

Mr. Pearkes: The services are all issued with bush clothing.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the resolution before the house, introduced by the Prime Minister, reads in part as follows:

> That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the participation of Canadian forces in the United Nations operations in the Congo, and that this house do approve the same.

I am assuming for the purposes of the remarks I wish to make that we are talking about the present United Nations operations and the present decision of the government of Canada, in answer to the request of the secretary general, to dispatch certain personnel of the Canadian armed forces, notably, those who have special experience in the matter of communications, that is, the group known as signallers. Anything I say is predicated on that understanding of the character of the resolution.

I well remember the statement made by the Prime Minister in 1957 at the general assembly of the United Nations when he said that Canadian foreign policy was predicated, among other things, upon the commitment, which Canada undertook as a signatory to the charter of the United Nations. That being the case, the remarks made by the Prime Minister on Saturday last, were warmly approved, and deservingly so, because the situation in the Congo now is one that calls for intervention not by any individual state but by the collectivity of states represented by the United Nations itself. Any intervention in that situation on the part of any great power would have been, as the President of the United States himself noted, a dangerous intervention. It may be that the United States, apart altogether from its appreciation of the dangers in the Congo at the present time, was not unmindful of the dangers that could have flowed from their action in 1957 when, apart from any action taken by the United Nations, the United States dispatched some 12,000 marines to Lebanon although I admit in answer to the request of the president of that country.

I believe the government has taken a sound course in proposing, as all speakers thus far have supported, that this is an action in which only the United Nations can take part. Only through collective intervention would it be possible to answer the charge, irresponsibly made, that this is an effort to bolster up the colonial power. This action on the part of the United Nations clearly is no such thing.

In the first part of his statement this morning, the Prime Minister referred to the two basic resolutions of the security council, that of the 14th July and the other of the 22nd. The first resolution calls on the government of Belgium to withdraw its troops from the territory of the Republic of the Congo. That process is now under way, and to the satisfaction, I believe, of the secretary general. In this resolution, the United Nations also instructs the secretary general to take certain steps, among them the provision by the government of the Congo of such military assistance, as may be necessary until, through the efforts of the Congolese government, with the technical assistance of the United Nations, the national security forces may be able, in the opinion of that government, to meet fully their tasks.

There are two observations I wish to make about this portion of the resolution. In the first place, this is the first time in the history of the United Nations, apart altogether from Korea—which was an action taken by the United Nations following a declaration of aggression by that body—that the United Nations is providing military assistance. No military assistance was provided in 1956 on the occasion of the Suez crisis. The resolution of the United Nations at that time clearly authorized the dispatch of what was called a para-military body, that was to exercise an effort to preserve the peace between Israel on the one hand and the United Arab Republic on the other, through the exercise of what I call the police power.

No such limitation is provided in this particular action taken by the security council. It is noteworthy that the action taken by the United Nations in Suez was an action taken pursuant not only to the resolution of the security council but also to a resolution passed by the general assembly of the United Nations. The resolution of the 14th of July last would, I think, warrant the conclusion that the Prime Minister himself drew, that any technical assistance, which might be provided by this country, would go through the United Nations. I believe this is a wise course for the government to adopt. That would not preclude, of course, any bilateral arrangement that Canada might want to make in the light of later events. But I certainly agree with the position taken by the government, that at the present time the proper way to channel whatever material aid Canada might wish to give should mainly be through the United Nations.

The second resolution of the 22nd July recognizes the Republic of the Congo, and whether that includes Katanga is certainly not clear. However, it is noteworthy that the Republic of the Congo as of that date did include, I believe, the province of the Congo known as Katanga. In any event, the wording of the resolution of the 22nd July, "recognizing that the security council recommended the admission of the Republic of the Congo to membership in the United Nations as a unit", warrants the view that the security council by implication, at any rate, did recognize that the sovereignty of the government of the Congo extended to Katanga.

It may be, however, that the secretary general, who is a very wise, cautious and prudent man, will not seek to rely upon the general character of such a resolution in his effort to see that the trouble in the Congo is not extended, and will seek to deal with Katanga in a manner that will not encourage needless friction between that part of the country and the main part under the government of the Congo itself.

The main resolution also invites the specialized agencies of the United Nations to render to the secretary general such assistance as he may require. That too would seem to confirm the view, taken by the Prime Minister, that whatever material and economic aid is extended should be through the United Nations or its subsidiary bodies. However, I would simply point out that it may be that the international development association, which we approved in the house this session, will be one of the agencies by which in the ensuing period some assistance could be given by countries which wish to extend capital at satisfactory rates of interest in a manner not possible under the existing terms of the international bank's functions.

There is another basic document which I think should be referred to at this time, and that is the agreement announced in yesterday's New York Times, between the government of the Congo and the United Nations, presumably signed for the United Nations by the secretary general and by the responsible representative of the government of the Congo. It is, I think, a very basic document, because it clearly establishes that as far as the United Nations is concerned its presence in the Congo is at the invitation of the sovereign power. In clause 1 it is observed:

> 1. The government of the Republic of the Congo states that, in the exercise of its sovereign rights with respect to any question concerning the presence and functioning of the United Nations force in the Congo, it will be guided, in good faith, by the fact that it has requested military assistance from the United Nations and by its acceptance of the resolutions of the security council of 14 and 22 July 1960—

So the United Nations is there, not for any purpose of aggression, ridiculous as that charge may be, but under duly constituted authority pursuant to those sections in the charter of the United Nations which empower the security council to act in matters that threaten the peace, or where the peace is actually in danger.

This is, I believe, the most important single act taken by the United Nations up to now in dealing with situations that threaten the peace. That may seem to be too general a statement in the face of Korea, but I would simply point out again that Korea was a situation in which there was actually war on the part of the members of the United Nations who supported the declaration of aggression against the communists of north Korea.

This is the first major testing ground where the United Nations is prepared to dispatch armed forces of a military character. The United Nations emergency forces in the Middle East are not of that character; they are specifically referred to as a para-military body. The United Nations observation group in Lebanon was merely an observing group, and the United Nations supervisory force under General Von Horne in Jerusalem is merely a body that exercises police power in its purpose of maintaining peace between two contiguous countries.

All we can say is that there is no violation of the charter of the United Nations in so far as article II(7) is concerned. This is not an intrusion by Canada, or by those other nine nations who are participating in the United Nations forces in the Congo. This is, by no stretch of the imagination, a violation of the domestic jurisdiction clause, because we are in there as a result of the invitation of the sovereign power. It may be that the question of Katanga will have to be dealt with again by the security council, or it could be that the issue arising out of the dispute between that province and the parent body will have to be determined by the courts. In any event, it is clear that whatever action has been taken by the United Nations thus far cannot be regarded, I believe, as an attempt to prevent one substantial body of opinion in a given national state from asserting the traditional right of self-determination recognized in the charter of the United Nations.

It is significant that in the matter of the two resolutions to which the Prime Minister made reference, and which brought comment from me, the Soviet union voted affirmatively. That represents a different position than was present, of course, in certain other situations in the past, all of which serve as precedents for the gradual build-up of experience in the United Nations toward what ultimately must become, I believe, the normal role of that body, namely to try and keep the peace through the instrumentality of the collective will rather than through the instrumentality of any given nation.

There are now some 10,000 soldiers, wearing nine different uniforms I believe, in the Congo; and it is to the credit of the United Nations, to the credit of its officers, and notably the secretary general, that this organization has been effected in such a short time. The command has been given to General Von Horne, a distinguished Swedish soldier who has had great experience with United Nations troops, particularly in Jerusalem, operating both in the Gaza strip and in Israel.

It is significant that he is reported as having said that he has not yet been able to set up an effective system of communications between his multilingual forces scattered over an area of some 1,500 miles. So the particular request to the government of Canada at this time, in the face of this statement, seems in my judgment particularly appropriate; because that is the kind of military assistance which at this time is requested by the United Nations.

The Prime Minister, and I think quite properly, this morning spoke of this whole matter as a strong argument for giving to the United Nations the kind of sanctions which were intended when the United Nations charter was first discussed at San Francisco. The fact is that if the necessary sanctions have not been provided, the fault must largely rest with the Soviet union, who have persistently refused to give effect to article XLIII of the charter of the United Nations. But it is significant that the charter of the United Nations, through article XLIII, was never intended to eliminate the necessity of agreement between the member states and the security council in regard to the supply of armed forces from any contributing country. Articles XLIV, XLV and XLVI of the charter of the United Nations clearly, I believe, confirm what I have just said.

But the Prime Minister, of course, is not alone in recognizing the desirability of the United Nations acquiring a strong United Nations peace force, or police force, or a United Nations force, depending on whichever nomenclature one wishes to accept. The Leader of the Opposition in 1957 wrote this in the April issue of Foreign Affairs:

> Are we to go on from crisis to crisis improvising in haste? Or can we now pool our experience and our resources, so that the next time we, the governments and peoples whom the United Nations represents, will be ready and prepared to act.

His views are supported by some very eminent people who have had considerable experience in the field of foreign affairs, among them the former foreign secretary in the United Kingdom, Mr. Selwyn Lloyd, who said in an article written by Mr. Leslie Munro at page 210 in Foreign Affairs of January, 1960:

I have realized that it is a topic upon which one must carry with one a consensus of world opinion. The realities impose upon us the necessity to hasten slowly. I understand the limitations. It could not be a fighting force. It could only be put into position by a decision of the United Nations. Its deployment would depend upon the agreement of the countries concerned. I also acknowledge the practical difficulties.

Then he goes on:

I hope that during this assembly some indication will be given of the views of other governments upon what I have been saying.

Then Sir Leslie Munro goes on to say:

Mr. Lloyd seems to have adopted the proposal of Mr. Lester Pearson in the article I have mentioned, when Mr. Pearson suggested that "member governments, excluding the permanent members of the security council, should be invited to signify a willingness in principle to contribute contingents to the United Nations for purposes that are essentially non-combatant, such as, for example, the supervision of agreed cease-fires and comparable peace supervisory functions."

It may be that the kind of force Mr. Lloyd is speaking about and about which the Leader of the Opposition spoke is not precisely the kind of force that the United Nations through the security council decisions has asked Canada and other nations to provide. When I said Mr. Lloyd and the Leader of the Opposition, I meant to include also, of course, the Prime Minister, who has undoubtedly shared with these two gentlemen the view that the United Nations must build up in the form as suggested those forces which could in due course be used by the United Nations for dealing with particular situations.

The difficulty of realizing the kind of force that the Leader of the Opposition had in mind is reflected in the attitude taken in 1957 by Mr. Krishna Menon, the minister of national defence for India, and the attitude of other countries which regarded the particular effort as one that had implications with which they were not at that moment prepared to fully concur.

So I believe that this action represents the most important single act taken by the United Nations, apart from Korea, which was of a different character. In that case there was an act of war based upon a declaration of aggression, and it seems to me that the only precedent for the kind of action that is being taken today, particularly on the economic side and on the side of trying to bring stability to a government at the invitation of that government, was the kind of action taken in the early twenties by the league of nations when that body stepped in and effected a rehabilitation after the financial collapse of Austria. So we may today, perhaps to an extent greater than our anticipation, be dealing with one of the fundamental developments in international organization, and we hope in the maintenance of peace in the world.

I said at the beginning that this resolution is of a general character, and not being able to foresee the events which could arise in the Congo, in Africa, I believe it is our responsibility in this house to anticipate in the light of our constitutional responsibilities what situations could confront us and make sure that in consultation we will not in any way be dissipating our powers.

The Prime Minister was right this morning in saying that a decision of this character was one which in the first instance must be made by the executive, by the cabinet. Only the cabinet, under our form of government, can be presumed to be informed of all the facts involved, and it is right for the Prime Minister to say that the government takes this decision and then comes to parliament, in accordance with our constitutional practices, to obtain ratification or disapproval of the executive act.

That was the position which Mr. St. Laurent took in November, 1956, when the government of Canada proposed that this parliament should be called upon to support the resolution of the United Nations establishing the United Nations emergency force in the Gaza strip. The words of the prime minister of that day ought, I think, to be on record for our consideration and for notation at this time. I refer to what Mr. St. Laurent said as reported at page 19 of Hansard for November 26, 1956, at the bottom of the left hand column. He was referring to an observation made by the then hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who had been dealing with the implications of the Canadian Forces Act of September 8, 1950. Mr. St. Laurent went on:

This is at page 494 of Hansard, the second column, and it reads as follows:

Then the then prime minister quoted the words of the then hon. member of Winnipeg North Centre:

"From what the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) has said tonight, and from what has been said previously by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and on other occasions by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), I feel they are with me in this, so I do not think I have to argue it. I did think it was possible, however, that the house might be so preoccupied with other matters this session as not to get this issue right into the open and have it made perfectly clear. I hope before we leave—it could be now, or later in this debate, or later in the session, but certainly soon—it will be made perfectly clear just how the matter stands as to the responsibility of the government to parliament, which is there all the time, but which is particularly clear and important in this matter of putting our forces on active service."

That statement by the then hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre contained the observations of a man who, whatever we may say about some views which he holds and no matter what may be our criticism of those views, nevertheless must be regarded as a man who would share with us a belief in the strength of the United Nations in situations such as the one with which we are now dealing. He was concerned, in recognizing the desirability of giving the United Nations power in the matter, that there should be no delegation by parliament of functions that parliament has no right to delegate.

Mr. St. Laurent then went on:

Well, when that suggestion—I will not say that challenge—was made, I immediately rose in my place and said:

Then Mr. St. Laurent quoted what he said, and it was as follows:

I think the matter should be made perfectly clear at once, so there can be no misapprehension or uncomfortable feeling about it anywhere. When this bill is passed and becomes law it is the intention of the government to comply with the letter and spirit of section 33, in so far as its policy has been announced with respect to Korea.

Then Mr. St. Laurent continued:

Section 33 is the section that provides that if an order in council is passed, as the section authorizes in express terms, putting our forces on active service parliament, if it is not then in session, will be called within ten days to deal with the matter.

Then Mr. St. Laurent continued his quotation:

"The intention of the government is that if any other service should be required of this special force, which of course is not being created solely because of the Korean incident, if any police action, for instance, that has a warlike character should be required of it elsewhere than Korea, the government would of course have to make its decision, but it would immediately call parliament, make that decision known and leave it to parliament to approve or disapprove of it. I think that is the only way the Canadian people would feel they were getting the protection they expect from the representatives."

And then further on page 495:

"If anything else should be required at any future time in order to carry out similar commitments, the government of course would have to take the responsibility of making its decision, but would certainly have to place itself in the hands of parliament within the ten-day period for ratification or disapproval of that decision."

The course the government has pursued in this matter is precisely that. That is why the Leader of the Opposition said this morning that the course taken by the government, in accordance with our traditional practice, was to be commended. I refer to these words because I want it clearly understood that so far as I am concerned the resolution which is properly now before the house will always be considered in the light of what our constitutional practice is, a practice which the Prime Minister himself has recognized.

The Prime Minister this morning was anxious, I am sure, to establish what I, certainly, and I do not believe anyone else really controverts, namely that as a supporter of the United Nations—and he has shown that—he wanted also to establish the fact, as we all do, that the United Nations in its evolutionary process of becoming an important instrument for the preservation of peace in the world, must have behind it the sanctions to make its work effective, particularly in specific situations. I agree with the Prime Minister, and the Leader of the Opposition stated this this morning, that the reservations made about article X, for instance, of the covenant of the league of nations, perhaps especially in the light of events today, were not the kind of reservations which were calculated to give the league of nations the potential strength its authors intended.

The Prime Minister referred this morning to some remarks of his which will be found at page 162 of Hansard for the first session of 1945, when he said as reported at the top of the right hand column of that page:

Will Canada become a leader among any nations if the policy she adopts is not to allow any of her manpower to be sent beyond the confines of the dominion without parliamentary sanction?

In fairness to the Prime Minister I do not want those words to be interpreted as meaning that he does not approve of the kind of action which he himself has initiated in this instance. I take it he was advocating there the desirability of a United Nations force which would impose sanctions to achieve its purposes and ends.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Read on.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Prime Minister asks me to read on, and I do so:

In other words, unless provision is made for each nation to enter into agreements as to the extent of the contribution that it will make to the central organization.

I thank the Prime Minister, because I think that does clearly modify the interpretation which one could have placed on his words. This agreement he had in mind would, I hope the Prime Minister will agree, be an agreement that in any event would be submitted to parliament for ratification, just as the particular act that we are dealing with now has been referred to parliament.

I do not know whether the Prime Minister mentioned it this morning, but at page 163 he is reported as quoting the words of the then prime minister, Mr. King. In the left hand column on that page hon. members will find these words:

> As they stand, the acceptance of the proposals would in no way commit Canada to send forces beyond Canadian territory at the call of the security council. If any such commitment were sought, it would be embodied in a later agreement, freely negotiated by the government of Canada, and coming into effect only after it had been approved by parliament.

Then the present Prime Minister went on to observe:

> With that statement I am not in disagreement in so far as it requires that this agreement, like any of the other kind, under the proposals, must be presented to parliament.

So the Prime Minister would seem in this particular instance to share the view I have stated about the effect of the resolution with which we are now dealing; that if the situation in the Congo should develop —and we all hope it will not—into more substantial and dangerous proportions, any act which in the first instance must be taken by the government will not be taken without parliament being given the fullest opportunity of considering the nature of the obligation. I am not now referring to technical assistance. I am not now referring to economic assistance. I am referring to action which would involve the use of forces on active service outside the territory of Canada.

This does not mean I am not in favour of fully supporting the actions taken by the United Nations. I subscribe fully to what has been done, and if the United Nations should determine that in the interests of stability in that country, in the interest of world peace, there is no course open other than that member states should contribute in various ways best thought to deal with the situation, there will be no hesitation as far as I am concerned about doing so, and I am sure this would be the view of this parliament and of the people of our country.

The fact is that whether we like it or not there are evolutionary processes going on and, in the case of Africa, processes which we asserted for ourselves at one time in our history and which we must say cannot be denied to others. What we do want to see is that in the realization of these rights nothing is done to endanger the peace of mankind or to further the aggressive tendencies of any country which does not subscribe to the basic peaceful purposes of countries such as Canada. We want to give the United Nations every support we can in the interests not only of building up through a specific mechanism a system of world order, but as the only means in our interdependent world whereby we can contribute to the establishment of peace.

That cannot be done by private intervention, whether the private intervention of a great power or of a series of small powers. It can only be done, it seems to me, through the mobilization and exercise of the conscience of mankind as represented through the United Nations. That being the objective, I hope I correctly interpret the resolution which is now before the house.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the resolution before the house has been dealt with very fully and adequately by the hon. members who have already spoken. I do not intend to trespass on the time of the house for long, but there are two points with which I should like to deal.

The first has to do with the place of the United Nations in what has been taking place in the Republic of Congo. For me, the actions of the secretary general and of the United Nations are extremely significant. I agree with the Leader of the Opposition when he said that there has been a new and long forward step taken in these particular actions.

The appeal to the secretary general was made by the Republic of Congo on July 12, which is not quite three weeks ago. On July 14 the resolution was adopted which was read this morning by the Prime Minister, and which in substance called for military assistance and also for technical assistance. It is almost unbelievable that within such a short space of time there could be thousands of troops serving under the United Nations flag actually on the spot in the Congo.

There was some suggestion by the hon. member for Kootenay West that Canada might have sent a battalion. The situation is that the secretary general—and very wisely, I think—decided that the troops to go in the first place should be from Africa. This is one of the finest features about the whole action taken by the United Nations.

For in addition to getting troops into the Congo, the United Nations has been successful in having foodstuffs flown in, and is gradually providing administrative services for the new nation. I thought a listener might have taken the inference this morning from some of the remarks made that the United Nations has no administrative machinery available for a crisis of this kind. The fact is that there are several thousand international civil servants under the United Nations. From my experience in New York last year I know they are internationally-minded. They do not serve in New York as Canadians for example on the United Nations staff. There has been built up in that staff a United Nations loyalty. Many of these men have been used in this crisis. Take, for example, Dr. Bunche. He was in Leopoldville within a matter of hours, and has been doing splendid work there ever since. There are a number of others from the United Nations permanent staff who have been participating in the actions taken to meet this problem which arose so suddenly.

At the present time the United Nations is organizing technical assistance for the Congo, and I understand has almost completed a plan under which it will be possible for member nations such as Canada to make a contribution which will have the effect of building up proper technical assistance for the Congo. At the present time the secretary general himself is in Africa. He has had conferences with members of the government in Leopoldville. Before that, on his way to Africa, he conferred with members of the Belgian government. I believe that the United Nations, by the actions it has already taken and is in the process of taking, may very well solve in 1960 the most difficult problems arising in Africa. The British and the French have been able to launch independent nations on that continent with great success, and now the actions of United Nations may largely round out the picture and make it possible for that continent to make progress in the way we would like to see it done. It just may be that this test which the United Nations has been facing so successfully will be the turning point in the whole process of establishing new independent nations in the world.

One other subject with which I should like to deal for just a few minutes is Canada's part in this whole crisis. The hon. member for Kootenay West took some comfort and relish from reading editorials from the Globe and Mail. I do not take quite so much comfort from their editorials these days. However, I noticed that the official opposition did not quote them; they know better.

I suggest to hon. members of the house and to the Canadian people that Canada is playing a greater part than any other nation in maintaining and building up the peacekeeping machinery of the United Nations. So many Canadians are so extremely modest and bashful about Canada's role in world affairs. They seem to take the attitude that everything their country does is just not as good as what every other country is doing, and that there are so many ways we could be improved. On the whole they suggest that we should be a little ashamed of ourselves, and all that sort of nonsense.

We have to have faith in Canada, and we have plenty of reason to have faith in Canada in so far as her relations with the United Nations have been concerned from the very start of that great organization. We have roughly 900 young Canadians with the United Nations emergency force in Palestine, the second largest contingent in that force. No other nation with any large number of troops there has undertaken a second role in the Congo. The Swedish troops have been moved to the Congo from Palestine on a 30-day basis. This is not a new contingent from Sweden but is a temporary transfer of the battalion from Palestine to the Congo. Ireland has troops in the Congo but, of course, she has none in Palestine.

Canada is involved in this business more deeply than any other country in the world. This is true also of the members of our Department of National Defence and of the Department of External Affairs. We are participating in the various truce organizations and commissions in southeast Asia, Israel and in other parts of the world where Canada has or has had young men taking part in work, in effect, for the United Nations. We have more trained men in that category than any other nation. This is a role which we can fill very well and which we have filled with great success. These young men have brought great credit to our nation. I am sure that will be the case with the young men who go out to the Congo within the next few days.

Canada stands firmly behind the United Nations. I repeat, Canada is doing more today than any other nation in the world to help support the peace-keeping efforts of the United Nations. We are deeply interested in a United Nations force. Eventually I would hope that some sort of United Nations standing force can be devised. So far there have been many difficulties which have made it impossible to complete such a program. For example, take this Congo situation. If there had been a standing force of the United Nations it certainly would not have had sufficient African troops in it to enable the secretary general to send several thousand Africans, as has been done within the last two weeks.

The Leader of the Opposition suggested today that member nations should have forces in being earmarked for service under the United Nations, just as we have had one of our regular army battalions allocated for that particular work. This, of course is a good idea; but circumstances vary so much that Mr. Hammarskjold has not thus far considered it practical to have a standing force for the United Nations. Who could have foreseen that trouble of just this kind would have arisen in the Congo? I do not think anyone in this house would have been able to sit down six weeks ago, or certainly six months ago, and work out a plan for a United Nations force to meet a crisis that was likely to arise in the Congo. I merely point out these facts to show that the problem is not one of people wanting to have a United Nations force, but is one of working out the details. Mind you, I hope that eventually this will be done.

I am very grateful, Mr. Speaker, to have the unanimous support of the house for this resolution. I am confident that there will also be support from coast to coast in Canada, and I believe Canadians can look to the future of this force with considerable optimism. So far the United Nations has been immensely successful in what it has tried to do to meet the situation in the Congo, and I see no reason why that success should not be continued; provided, of course, that the Soviet and anyone else who is trying to interfere will just not meddle and will leave the United Nations to work out its own plans.

Some reference has been made to Katanga province. This is the most difficult feature of the whole situation. Law and order are prevailing in that province and apparently have been for some time. There seems to be quite a strong movement for secession from the Congo republic, and the question of self-determination arises, as the hon. member for Essex East rightly pointed out. This is a particularly difficult problem and the United Nations has made it clear that there will be no interference with the internal affairs of the Congo. For example, the statement of principles governing the use of the United Nations force in the Congo was made public by Mr. Hammarskjold on July 18, and we find this with regard to interference in the internal affairs of the Congo:

> Likewise, it follows that the U.N. units must not become parties in internal conflicts, that they cannot be used to enforce any specific political solution of pending problems or to influence the political balance decisive to such a solution. It is only on this basis that the U.N. can expect to draw on member states for contributions in men and material.

We had a request by cable about two weeks ago for recognition of Katanga as an independent state and I believe a similar request went to quite a few other countries. I explained to the house subsequently that Canada had not replied to that request. We do not believe that we can help work out this problem by getting involved in it under present conditions. Mr. Hammarskjold, as I have stated, is now in the Congo or will be back within the next day or two, and is certainly well aware of the nature of this problem. I am hopeful that it will be possible for him to work out a reasonable solution. No one knows just what type it will be. Perhaps a confederation will be established in the Congo rather than a unitary state such as they now have; but Canada has felt that her wisest course with regard to this particular aspect of the Congo problem was to refrain from making statements at a time when conditions were as inflammable as they are at the present time.

Mr. Pearson: Will the minister permit a question? Notwithstanding the fact that this Congo operation is being conducted under the authority of a resolution of the security council, does he not think it would be helpful to have an advisory committee of participating governments helping the secretary general in working out the principles and procedures required, a committee such as was so effective in connection with the United Nations emergency force some years ago, and on which Canada would be represented?

Mr. Green: There has been no suggestion as yet, Mr. Speaker, that a committee of that kind should be set up, but it does seem to me that it would be very much worth while, and Canada would certainly be on it if for no other reason than the fact that we shall have forces actually in the Congo.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the Prime Minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to go over ground already covered. Naturally I am pleased with the unanimity of support given to the motion. However, there are one or two observations I think I should make arising out of an apparent conflict in points of view regarding Katanga, as expressed by the hon. members for Kootenay West and Essex East.

The hon. member for Kootenay West, if I understood him correctly, contended that everything possible should be done on the part of the United Nations to keep Katanga in the Republic of Congo. By nodding his head he indicates that I have correctly interpreted his views. On the other hand the hon. member for Essex East, realizing as he must the difficulty inherent in a proposition such as that advanced by the hon. member for Kootenay West, took rather a diametrically opposite stand. Personally I believe that if the United Nations, either directly or indirectly, were to interfere in the manner necessary in order to attain the objective of the hon. member for Kootenay West, the consequences would be very serious.

Indeed, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated in the course of his remarks a few moments ago, in the statement of principles enunciated by the secretary general it was made perfectly clear there should be no interference by the United Nations forces with civil government in the Congo. I might also underline that the principles governing the use of the United Nations forces, which were enunciated by the secretary general on the 18th July, are to the following effect:

> The authority granted to the U.N. force cannot be exercised within the Congo either in competition with representatives of the host government or in co-operation with them in any joint operation. This applies a fortiori to representatives and military units of other governments than the host government. The U.N. operation must be separate and distinct from activities by any national authorities.

I feel I should bring that to the attention of the house for the reason that it epitomizes what I believe is a necessary declaration which is inherent in any organization such as the United Nations force. To do otherwise would place United Nations forces in a position of participating in civil disorder within a state, whether directly or indirectly, on the side of either the existing government or conceivably, should circumstances arise, on the side of the forces of a revolutionary government, and of becoming involved in the recognition of that government. It would be a dangerous course to follow. I feel that what Mr. Hammarskjold has set forth in his declaration is the only course that could possibly be accepted if we desire the United Nations forces operating under the direction of that organization to be effective and to be removed from all nationalist considerations.

Second, a question was raised as to the cost. The original estimate by Mr. Hammarskjold was $2 million. He found, however, before plans were very far under way that this amount would not represent even a small part of the actual cost, and the estimate now is that the cost to the United Nations will be $15 million for a period of three months.

The Leader of the Opposition said something this morning about the length of time the United Nations force might be expected to be in the Congo. There have been all kinds and types of estimates up to five years. When one looks at what has taken place in the Middle East, where the issues subsequent to December, 1956 have been less exacerbated than they are in the Congo and yet such a long period of time has elapsed since that force was set up, one can only conclude that if order is to be restored in the Congo, if anarchy is to be displaced, if peace is to be maintained, the period during which the force will be in operation there may be far beyond anything today anticipated.

I should like to make one further reference, and it is not by way of criticism. I deplore anything in the nature of an attack on any country that is friendly to us. I am not here to weigh the difficulties of the past. I recollect the events to which the hon. member for Kootenay West made reference, but from the information that is available I feel there is every indication that the Belgian government through the years has made a worthy contribution in elevating standards in the Congo, and has made available means of transportation far and beyond those existing in many other countries of like physical circumstances. Just a few days ago I had a very similar reaction to attacks made on the President of the United States in his personal capacity. While all of us in the course of debate sometimes go beyond the limitation that each of us should impose upon himself, it is my opinion that as a general rule the best course for nations and for national assemblies to follow is not to place our allies and friends under criticism which cannot have any result that will be beneficial to us or to the freedom for which we jointly stand.

In order to indicate to the people of Canada and to our allies everywhere that unity which has been so apparent here, that realization that each of us is indeed internationally his brother's keeper, I think it only proper that we should have the opportunity of voting on this resolution, to the end that our unity will be a matter of record.

Mr. Herridge: Would the Prime Minister permit one question before the vote is called? Does the Prime Minister consider the present government of Katanga a legal government which represents the will of the people of that portion of the Congo?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there are many elements in that question. I would not want to give an answer to it because any answer I might give would not be based on a full knowledge of the facts and, in any event, if it were it would be presumptuous to make any personal determination.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Diefenbaker) which was agreed to on the following division:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate informing their honours that this house has adopted a resolution approving of the participation of Canadian forces in the United Nations operations in the Congo, and requesting their honours to unite with this house in the approval of the same by filling up the blanks in the resolution with the words: "Senate and".

Motion agreed to.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Government house,
Ottawa, August 1, 1960.

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Charles Holland Locke, a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Administrator of the government of Canada, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 1st August, at 8 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
E. Joly de Lotbiniere
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT—CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING MERGERS, MONOPOLIES, ETC.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-58, to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill has received very complete and detailed discussion both on second reading and in the standing committee on banking and commerce, and also in committee of the whole house. Therefore I do not propose at this stage to say anything further, although of course I shall be prepared to reply to any hon. members who may feel they should say something at this stage.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is no reply.

Mr. Fulton: I find that I have for a moment misapprehended the rules of the house. There being no reply on a motion for third reading it is perhaps desirable that I should say a word or two to lay before the house the outline of what this bill will accomplish.

I would list the accomplishments of the bill as follows: first of all, it consolidates and clarifies the definitions which have previously been contained in at least two different places. It does this by bringing under the Combines Investigation Act the definitions which were formerly contained in the Criminal Code. Also, as I have said, it clarifies the definitions of monopoly and combination. This process of consolidation and clarification will, I believe, be of assistance not only to those who have to operate business but also to those who have to enforce and interpret this legislation.

Second, it consolidates all the legislation under one act. It removes from the Criminal Code certain provisions having relation to this type of trade practice and places them all under the Combines Investigation Act. This is a step which was recommended by the MacQuarrie committee. The legislation clarifies the law with respect to combinations. It does this by making it clear that the per se rule against harmful combination is maintained. By keeping the definition under which the jurisprudence has developed we have maintained that jurisprudence itself. This part of the amendment clears the air with respect to practices which may benefit the economy. This is done in the amending section 32 contained in the bill. There has, of course, been a good deal of criticism with respect to this part of the legislation, but may I remind hon. members that there has been to my knowledge no disagreement with the fact that arrangements directed exclusively toward such matters as the pooling of resources for research and similar matters would produce real benefit to the economy in terms of placing our industry in a position more competitive with that of other countries.

Third, the change with respect to the combination provisions goes on further to protect the interest of the consumer by making it clear what are the harmful effects of combinations which cannot be allowed even though those effects might be accompanied by certain beneficial arrangements such as the one I have just mentioned. So it is a fact that this legislation clarifies the law with respect to combinations and that it would be of great assistance to the economy generally by encouraging those practices which will benefit the economy about which there formerly has been doubt as to their permissibility, while at the same time protecting the economy by making it clear that those beneficial arrangements cannot be allowed to be an umbrella for other arrangements harmful to the economy.

Fourth, the legislation provides the alternative remedy of injunction or dissolution order instead of the sole remedy by way of prosecution leading to conviction now open in dealing with restrictive trade practices. Again this is based on a recommendation of the MacQuarrie committee which made a thorough study of combines legislation and whose report contained a recommendation to the effect that the provision of such an alternative remedy would be of great benefit. The type of case in which this alternative remedy might be used is, of course, the type of case where certain mergers might be concerned or a marginal case in connection with a combination where it is not clear whether or not it comes under the per se rule. In cases such as this the MacQuarrie committee pointed out that the advantages of such an alternative procedure as against the procedure now open to us would be considerable. The committee pointed out that the use of a restraining order has been found particularly useful in such cases in the United States.

Of course, there has been criticism in this house of the provision of this alternative procedure, largely on the ground that it leaves discretion with the minister. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that the minister in the ultimate analysis will be responsible for determining what remedy is used, but that is the kind of decision which ministers are constantly required to make in a responsible system of government. There is nothing unusual or improper in it, and I think it is necessary to dispel the illusion which has been created by opposition spokesmen and others about this matter that the minister is going to be able to make his decisions, and exercise his discretion, in secret without the knowledge of parliament. That is a complete illusion. The minister will not be able to make any such decision without reporting to parliament or being held fully accountable by parliament.

Fifth, the legislation provides an alternative forum in which issues regarding arrangements in restraint of trade can be tried and disposed of. This alternative forum is by way of a procedure to allow us to bring these cases before the Exchequer Court of Canada instead of having to bring them in the trial courts of the provinces as up to now we have had to do exclusively. We believe it will be advantageous to build up a body of judicial experts in this field inasmuch as a great deal of what is involved in cases of this type is concerned with the economic and related effects of these arrangements on the economy generally.

May I point out, however, that with respect to the change that nobody is deprived of any right whatever to have his case tried in the trial court if he so desires. With respect to prosecutions, these can only be taken to the exchequer court by the consent of both the crown and the accused, so the accused is not deprived of his right to trial by jury, if he is an individual, or, in the case of a corporation, of the right to be tried in an ordinary trial court if they wish it. As for the crown, the crown is not compelled to take a case to the exchequer court where the proper remedy is held to be by trial and conviction. This is simply the provision of an alternative forum which should provide a body of expert judicial interpreters of the issues involved in many of these cases, and it would also provide a more expeditious method of bringing some of these cases to finality.

The next group of improvements I should like to mention—and there are four of these—is in the field of measures to assist small business and the consumer generally. The first of these important amendments is that made in section 34, which makes clear those things which may be done by way of discontinuance of supplies to merchants who are guilty of unfair competitive practices or of practices bordering on the dishonest. A great deal has been said by way of discussion of this particular feature of the bill and many false illusions again, have been created.

In the discussion in committee of the whole house I pointed out what kind of undesirable or unfair trade practices it is that we have in mind in this section and which if indulged in by merchants, would warrant the discontinuance of supplies, and there was not one member of the committee who had any disagreement to offer or suggest that he proposition that if anyone was found indulging in that type of competitive practice it was a perfectly proper and fair thing for the supplier—those supplying him with the goods by which he was carrying out those practices—to discontinue supplying them.

This, of course, will be a very great measure of protection to the honest small businessman and merchant who at the moment finds himself powerless to protect himself against this kind of unfair competitive device, the kind represented by loss leader selling and misleading price advertising, and to whom at the moment no one is able to bring any measure of assistance. As a result of this bill we believe he will find his protection greatly increased.

The next measure by way of assistance to small business is a measure which strengthens the provisions against predatory pricing practices. Those practices are now dealt with in section 412 of the Criminal Code. We have, of course, consolidated that section into the Combines Investigation Act and have strengthened it by the inclusion of a provision which makes it clear that where practices are being followed which have the tendency of eliminating competition or a competitor then the administration, the combines branch, can take action on that basis without having to wait until somebody has actually been driven out of business as is the case at the present time.

The next item in this field is the measure dealing with the question of promotional allowances. In this respect the legislation adopts the views expressed by the Stewart royal commission on price spreads and the views of the restrictive trade practices commission itself. We have adopted the views of those two bodies in the reports that they have submitted as to the undesirability of promotional allowances and by our legislation, I believe we will have done one or possibly both of two things: first, to bring about the elimination of these allowances or, alternatively, if they are not eliminated then the legislation will at least restore a large element of competitive equality as between those to whom these allowances must be given.

Again, under this category of measures to assist small business we have introduced a provision which will establish a penalty against those who indulge in misleading advertising with relation especially to advertising regarding prices. Under this group of four main measures we will, I am convinced, have gone a considerable distance toward protecting the competitive position of the small merchant in our economy. This was one of the deliberate objectives with which we set out to introduce these amendments.

A further provision of the bill, and a very important one introduced more lately than some of the others, is a provision which makes it clear that industry can make cooperative arrangements for strengthening their own and Canada's position in export markets provided those arrangements do not have any damaging effect in the domestic market. I do not think it is necessary for me to elaborate more than was done in our earlier discussions on the necessity and desirability of this provision. I am certain that enough has been said to convince the house that the position of Canadian industry in export trade is becoming increasingly hazardous and difficult as a result of the competitive practices and the strength of the competitive influences being brought to bear against them and that any measure such as this which can ensure that our industry can make its cooperative arrangements in that field without damage to the domestic economy is to the advantage of Canada as a whole. This, then, is a summary of the effects and purposes of the legislation.

I should like to deal for a brief moment with some of the criticisms. The criticisms have been made on the most extraordinary basis that I have heard in a debate in this house for a long time. They have been made on the basis that measures which clarify the law as to what Canadian business may do, measures which improve the position of Canadian business without allowing any unfair or undesirable practices which will damage the economy, are somehow or other to be rejected simply because they were introduced by a Conservative government. The whole basis of the criticisms of the opposition was on a basis of suspicion, conjecture and the creation or attempted creation of prejudice against this measure because it happens to have been introduced by a government which is Conservative in character.

As I said in moving second reading of this measure, this is an extraordinarily short-sighted policy on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite because as I reminded the house then, and as I should like to remind the house again, it is not as though the country itself had no interest in the welfare of Canadian business. It is a fact that practically every segment of our economy both jointly and severally has an interest in the welfare of business itself.

Men who work have a very direct interest in the welfare of business and in seeing that business is able to provide employment. At times like this when hon. members opposite express great concern over unemployment I have been amazed to find the extent to which for political purposes they are prepared to attack a measure which is designed to improve the position of business without damaging the position of the consumer or of the economy. Again, as I have pointed out, not only do men who work have an interest in the welfare of business but also the Canadian people generally have such an interest. Certainly the economy generally depends to a large extent upon the welfare of business. Indeed, the general revenues of the treasury are dependent to a large extent upon the business which pays taxes.

If, therefore, we can do as we have done here, without holding any special brief for business as though it were an organization that was not subject to the overriding public interest; without holding any special brief in that sense, if we can do as we have done here, introduce a measure which clarifies the law, which makes it clear by way of encouragement that certain beneficial practices can be carried out without danger, thus encouraging our industry to improve its competitive position; if, as we have done, we can introduce a measure which improves and protects the position of the small merchant who is so vital a cornerstone or of a truly free and independent economy; if we can bring in a measure, as we have done, to make it possible to improve the position of our exports on the international markets, and all this while maintaining adequately and absolutely the necessary safeguards for the interests of the consumer and for the general welfare, then it surprises me indeed that the bill would be attacked in the way it has been.

These will be the results of the legislation. These results will, of course, become more and more apparent after the legislation passes, and when as I hope advantage will be taken of those proper arrangements which can be made under the legislation, these results should become apparent. But at the same time it is also a fact that the ability of the administration to deal with improper, unfair and restrictive trade practices which are still prohibited by the legislation will be made easier. The task of the administration itself has been made more flexible through a combination of the alternative procedures that are provided and the alternative forum that is made available.

So that on all these grounds, plus one other which I should like to remind the house of, I commend the bill to the House of Commons for third reading.

That third ground or third topic which I should like to deal with is to dispel the illusion which hon. members opposite have sought to create, and believe have sought unsuccessfully but nevertheless very definitely to create, that somehow or other after the passage of this bill all these things are going to be left to be decided by what has been called the process of private law. In fact, Mr. Speaker, what the opposition invites the house to assume and what they have said there, and particularly with reference to section 34, is that on the passage of the bill all those who are charged at the present time with the administration and the enforcement of combines legislation will, if they do not take leave of their senses, certainly take leave of their sense of responsibility, will lose interest in their responsibility and will lose sight of the fact that it is their responsibility to enforce this measure.

I have pointed out already that particularly in respect of section 34 this bill does not change the law, it merely clarifies it. How then can it be suggested that the law having only been clarified to make clear what may and may not be done, the officials in charge of enforcing it will be any less able or any less interested in enforcing it than they have been up to the present time? Of course, they will be no less able and no less interested. Bear in mind that on every occasion on which one of those practices which it is now made clear may be followed is in fact carried out, then there can still be a complaint made. There may be a complaint by anyone who feels himself aggrieved and no doubt there will be complaints. The limits within which those practices may be carried out are clearly defined in the act and anyone seeking to protect himself or defend himself in the course of the investigation of a complaint will have to satisfy and the same general administrative officers under the same legislation, that in fact he had justification for taking the action that he did, and that his action did not in fact constitute one of the practices prohibited and still prohibited by this legislation.

Therefore, for hon. members opposite to talk about introducing some sort of private administrative law is nothing more nor less than for them to charge that not only the government but the responsible officials who report to the government, and whose reports when made must be made public, will themselves abdicate their responsibilities. Well, sir, of course, I reject out of hand any such improper assertion, any such improper assumption, and I assure this house that the officers who will be responsible for the detailed administration of the act will continue to administer it objectively, vigorously and fairly as they have done in the past and that the government will expect that kind of administration and itself will give that kind of administration to this legislation.

Therefore, looking at the bill as a whole, I can say safely that it should produce benefits to the economy by the clarification and the consolidation that it represents, and produce very real benefits in terms of strengthening Canada's position in international trade as well as improving the position of our domestic economy; that the measure will be administered fairly and flexibly and is capable of more fair and flexible administration as a result of the amendments; and that finally, while not in any sense weakening the protection of the consumer against the kind of practice which the legislation from its outset has been designed to protect him against, it will in fact improve the position of the consumer because of the direct effect that these amendments will have on their tendency to eliminate unfair competitive devices so as to make it impossible, or at least more difficult than ever for the setting up of monopolies and the elimination of competitors.
