But if, even at the time of the election, a majority of this House absolutely represented the view of the people, it does so only on one or two questions. It does not do so on many questions that come up and later on it does not represent the people properly at all. And yet this House, by the abolition of the Senate, would have complete control of all legislation, not merely on those items that have been discussed before the people, but on anything that the leader of the majority in the House chose to bring in. And we know that a government of a party is seldom elected absolutely on its own programme, but very often is elected mainly on the mistakes of its opponents. Abolition of the Senate, then, would make this House absolute. There would be no resisting its force; and I believe that, in every polity, there should be some centre of resistance against predominant power, or that power will become absolute. Any system of government that is of value is one in which there are checks, one in which no authority is given full power. The people cannot afford to give absolute power to one set of men. And, indeed, if you wish governors to govern well, you must, as far as possible, prevent them from having the opportunity to govern ill. The tendency towards machine politics, as it is called,—towards close organization,—is very great, and it would become greater if this were the only chamber that had control of the destinies of the country. Abolition of the Senate would, I think, if we look at the matter properly, demand that there should be some referendum, so that whatever might pass in this House could, under some circumstances, be referred to the people for their judgment. That would be the proper course. But, if you are going to adopt a course of that kind, you might as well use your Senate for a referendum. And I wish to point out here that all the theories of second ballot, and initiative and referendum, which many have considered necessary, are all proofs of the necessity of a second chamber and are necessary to enable one chamber to properly fulfil the functions of government. The laws passed even by two chambers are frequently imperfect and need change. How much more would this be so if we, in the turmoil of our work, passed the laws without any possibility for examination, reflection or change. I may also point out that, while there has been, for a long time, a feeling of dissatisfaction with the Senate, and a desire to change, no province in this country has ever asked for abolition. Some provinces have asked for change. The Ontario resolution of 1899, to which I have already referred, specifically asks for certain changes, but makes no demand for abolition. In fact, I think I may fairly state that all the arguments for abolition, certainly all that I have heard, and I have not heard those of my hon. friend from South Grey (Mr. Miller), are against the Senate as it is at present constituted, and not against the Senate as we would hope to make it. Has the Senate of Canada any merits? The Senate thinks it has. And I think so.

Mr. FOSTER. Ask Archie.

Mr. G. H. McINTYRE. Yes, I think we might safely ask him. His experience is not so long as that of some of the others, and so there might be others whose opinions would be of greater value. But his opinion should carry weight, and I think that opinion would be that the Senate has merits. The Senate does its work quietly—there are no fireworks. It is reported very little in the public press. It does not often enter into conflict. At the same time, I must concede that the evidence shows a considerable amount of work done by the Senate. The value of that work we must judge each for himself. If the Senate were continually at war with the Commons, it would naturally bring itself more into notice. And perhaps the Senate might say, as a reason for some of these quiet moments, that the legislation sent from this House is fairly perfect and requires very little change or amendment. I cannot, however, very well use an argument to show value in the Senate unless I believe in it myself. The Liberal party in this country has felt the pinch of an unfavourable Senate, and has been moderate in its approval of the Senate as compared with the Conservative party. If I were asking a Conservative friend to afford me an argument for the Senate, while the argument would not appeal to me as it would to him, he would probably quote to me the action of the Senate in relation to the Yukon railway and the Drummond County railway. I have heard Conservatives speak laudingly of the action of the Senate in these cases. As I say, that action does not appeal to me as it does to my Conservative friends, but it may be that the Senate will take similar action that will appeal to me and not to them. Whether I am right or wrong, I know that certain actions of the Senate have appealed very strongly to Conservative members of this House as being good and valuable actions. But does the Senate need to perform these actions every day in order to warrant its existence? It seems to me that if the Senate were, once in a session, to return to this House a Bill with imperfections and have those imperfections righted, and the sending out of an imperfect law thus prevented; if once in a parliament, it saved a lavish expenditure; if once in a generation it stood as a bulwark against an ebullition of popular feeling that was only temporary, it would abundantly warrant its existence. We are young as a people. In some matters we have not yet struck our level. We need a few checks to steady us in times of emergency.

Further, the representation in this House is a representation of local majorities. It is not easy to get representation for many minorities in this country. I prefer to think of our people as being Canadians, and Canadians only, but we know that there is a great mixture, and that, for instance, in the province of Ontario, which I know better than I know the others, there are Roman Catholic minorities that find it difficult to get a fair representation in this House. It is not the fault of either party, but simply an exigency of party warfare. The same may be said of German minorities in Ontario. The Senate, if properly constituted, would afford an opportunity for at least a fair representation of these minorities, a better representation than at present of the various portions of our country. If we are to improve the Senate, if there is a remedy that we can find, that remedy must recognize why it is that a body of men so able in themselves have failed to satisy this country. What are the faults? Well, as I see it, I think they may be said to be the lethargy that comes from either old age or advancing years; the lack of any feeling of responsibility to the people; too great a feeling of permanence and security; no particular incentive to work—nothing pressing them. I will say nothing here of the party bias that is to some extent present, because, while that has in the past affected action, I do not claim that it has been a very serious feature. Now, while these weaknesses are there, we know also that the Senate is endowed under the constitution with enormous powers. It can do things just as it pleases without a single check; and when you realize the theoretical power, at least, under the constitution, one almost begins to be thankful for the moment that the Senate has chosen the quiet and easy course. If it once were to prove active and obstreperous, there is no saying what it might do. And, certainly, we have no chance in any way, except by the force of public opinion, to restrain them. The real remedy, if we can find it, for this dissatisfaction with the Senate, must not affect only the Senate, it must ultimately in some way give an increased feeling of responsibility to members of the Senate. It must make that feeling of responsibility a real one, it must stimulate for good, and it must limit the potentiality for mischief. I would like to see, I believe every man in this House would like to see, such changes in the constitution of the Senate as would so entrench the Senate in the esteem of the people that when it had to differ from the House of Commons, we would at least respect its decision and sit down quietly and examine it, and not, as we do at present, satisfy ourselves by reviling it.

Can a remedy be obtained that will not only improve the Senate but make it a fairly satisfactory working body? Now many people acknowledge the weakness of the Senate, the great need of change, but lament that it is not easy, not possible, some will say, to make any change that will be of value. I have not often made statements in this House that may be called very strong, but I feel a little like making one now that may be by some considered strong. I will say this, that if you will allow me to preface the statement with the remark that no system of government will be actually perfect, will more than approximate your ideal, then I would say, not only is there a real remedy for this state of affairs, but there is more than one remedy, more than two. But in seeking a remedy I would say this, it will not be like an answer to a riddle, which, as you know, is one moment unknown, and the next, when it is given to you, is universally accepted as being full, complete and satisfactory, and you wonder you had not thought of it before. There is no such answer as that to the question, what is the best means of reforming the Senate? To ask for that is to forget all the weakness that is inheritent in any system of government.

I think the difficulties have been two with regard to the manner of reforming the Senate. In the first place, we have no clearly defined idea of what we desire, or what actual standard we wish to attain to. The other is, I think, that we have felt that we must seek out, or must obtain some new, or novel or striking form of remedy, something that will be new, something that will appeal to the people as being intricate and peculiar, something no doubt that you will be able to defend as logical. No such remedy of that kind need be sought for, it will not prove satisfactory to the people. Every system that we choose must depend to some extent, not merely on being logical, but it must depend on the wisdom, upon the moderation and upon the patriotism of the members who compose it. So I say that instead of looking for something novel and striking, we must proceed along the lines that we are accustomed to, that we are using in practical government at the present time. We know indeed that the British form of government, the parliamentary system has been very much admired. It has its great weaknesses, it is not really a logical system, it is a system of checks and yet much as it has been admired, it is not the invention of any man of genius, it is not really the result of conscious design. At every great time of crisis the opportunity has been taken to strengthen one branch of the legislature at the expense of some other, to establish some form of check against the predominant power.

Now, Sir, the present resolution, as you will see, does not dogmatize. I am only inviting the House to consider the suggestion of concurring with the Senate in order to examine into the advantages to be obtained by considering a number of propositions. The first refers to an age limit for retirement and a shortened term of service for new appointments to the Senate. This is not the first time that I have moved a resolution embodying that principle. Two years ago I moved a resolution in these words :

That in the opinion of this House, the constitution of the Senate should be brought into greater accord with the spirit of representative and popular government and the genius of the Canadian people, by amendments which in future appointments will: (1) abolish the life tenure of office by senators; (2) limit the tenure for one appointment to within the legal term of three parliaments; (3) provide a fixed age, not exceeding eighty, for compulsory retirement.

That was discussed at the time. I did not attempt to move it as a universal panacea for all the objections to the Senate. The object then was to effect the least possible amount of change that would at the same time make the Senate a fairly serviceable body. The opinion was expressed at that time that this particular resolution was inadequate to the situation, and I will not at the present time combat that opinion. But I will say this, that the principle there laid down, of the necessity of having a term limit, I still believe in. There I do dogmatize. I think that without that, no remedy you may apply to the Senate will be satisfactory to the Canadian people. With that, and with some limitation to the veto power, you may have more than one remedy that will make the Senate a fairly satisfactory working body. The life tenure is certainly not in accord with representative government, it is not in accord with the spirit and genius of the Canadian people. I need not dwell, I think, in this House, upon the somewhat pitiful effects of old age, when a man, no matter what his powers may be mental or physical, pretends to be doing duties that can certainly only be done properly by a man in middle age, not at least in advanced years. It is so painful a task that I prefer to leave this House to recognize that when a man passes eighty years of age it is only one man in a hundred that is capable of doing the work he should do in that legislative body. His judgment may be good in many ways, but he has not the vigour to apply himself as a legislator should.

The people demand a change in that respect. I think there is no doubt whatever that the people of this country feel and feel strongly that no governor should be placed over them who has a life appointment, who may be put in his position at thirty years of age, and no matter how long he may live, no matter how he may develop afterwards, he remains one of their legislators. If our Senate were not a fixed body then that would not be so great an evil, because he might be removed ; but when he becomes one of a fixed body and thereby shuts out others who are probably better fitted for the position, his presence is an anomaly and an injustice.

The second portion of my resolution refers to :

An extension to other parties than the present one of power to select persons for the filling of a portion of future vacancies in the Senate.

At the present time, Sir, as you know, the appointing power for the Senate lies entirely in the hands of the Governor-in-Council, which is the government of the day. The result of that is evident to you. I find no fault with either the Liberal government or the preceding Conservative government. Appointments have been political almost invariably. I do not see how, under our political system, it can well be otherwise if the appointing power remains entirely with them. And so, without finding fault with either the Conservative or the Liberal administration in that respect, I feel that we are not likely to obtain any real improvement as long as the appointing power remains with them. But what change could we have that would make the Senate a better body ? One change that has been strongly urged is the election of Senators instead of their appointment, an election by larger constituencies than those that elect members to the House of Commons. That would have this merit at least, that it would refer the constitution of the Senate back to the people, who are the source of power. In that respect it would be a decided advantage upon the present system. If there were no objections to that, I think we would long since have appealed to the people as the proper and correct course. We must recognize, however, that there are objections. We know that it was tried once in this country when we had the old Legislative Council of Canada.

There is a difference of opinion as to whether it was successfully tried or not. On the whole I am of the opinion that it was not considered a successful method of choosing a legislative council. The argument that we would then have too many elections is rather a strong one. We have at present our municipal elections, trustee elections, elections for the local legislature, and elections for the Commons. If, in addition to that, we had another, we would very seriously add to the work of the people and certainly very seriously add to the work of party organizations. You would have two bodies then virtually of the same substance, that would come from the same origin, chosen virtually in the same manner, chosen through the same party organization, and in every way similar bodies. Each of these bodies would claim to represent the people and to represent the people in the same way. There would of course be friction, but the friction in itself would not be objectionable ; the objection would come when each of these bodies would claim to properly, fully and in the same way represent the people. The government of course would be responsible only to the first Chamber, but the second Chamber would claim to fully represent the people just as the first does. If under such circumstances you found that the first Chamber, elected by the people, was Liberal and the second Chamber, elected by the same people with different constituencies, was Conservative, what would become of our vaunted representation? In that way the people would be represented certainly but in an exceedingly crude form, and we might easily have a state of affairs in which, coming directly from the people at slightly different times, one House would be Liberal and the other Conservative.

In addition to that only the very rich could enter the second Chamber. We know it is expensive enough at the present time to run an election in a small constituency. If you demanded that a man should run in a constituency half a dozen times as large, it would be almost an impossibility. If two Chambers of that kind were to agree you would be very likely to say that the second Chamber was superfluous ; if they were to differ you would say it was mischievous. It seems to me that with a second Chamber we should necessarily have it of rather dissimilar origin from the first Chamber if it is properly to represent the people, to make up in its representation what this Chamber lacks.

We might here fairly take the example of some other countries, not that they should be in any way conclusive, but to see at least what value may be in them. Taking a few examples we see that in France the second Chamber is based very largely on a very highly developed municipal system throughout the whole country, not by direct election, but by election of the municipal bodies. In Germany it is a federal system of fully equipped kingdoms. In Great Britain it is very largely hereditary. In Australia, the most recent of the larger commonwealths, it is elective, elected by the people as one body, voting as a single electoral body throughout the country. In New Zealand, that land of very advanced views, socialistic I might almost say, I found to my surprise that the Senate is appointed for life, but not on elective principles. In the United States it is chosen by the various State legislatures. At the Cape the senators are elected and in Natal appointed. Thus you see there is great variety and each country makes its choice to suit its own peculiar circumstances. While the simple expedient of limiting the term of a senator, leaving the appointing power as it is, would be perhaps a weak remedy, yet is is one remedy. The election of senators by large constituencies of the people, with the term limited, would also be a remedy that would make a very valuable body indeed. I fear that these objections that I have raised would prove to be really valid objections, but it would be so large an improvement on the Senate as it at present exists that if no other remedy were satisfactory I would cheerfully and willingly accept it as a remedy that would produce a fairly satisfactory second Chamber.

There are other features on which I would like to dwell ; there are other remedies that we might strive to make use of. If we take the example of France, where the second Chamber is chosen by the municipal bodies, we realize that in this country our municipal system is not organized in the same way, that it might change through any change in the laws of the local legislatures. Then the municipal laws are not alike in each province. I recognize also that it is scarcely the class of work to put upon municipal councils or municipal bodies, and so I would hesitate to urge—and I do not think it would be acceptable—any such scheme as basing the choice of senators upon our municipal system. Again Germany is made up really of separate kingdoms united for a special purpose; I do not think that the German confederation affords us any lesson. But when you come to the United States you do find something that may be of value in judging whether or not their experience will help us. In the United States they limit the number of senators to two members for each state, irrespective of the size of the state. These senators are elected by the legislature of the state. We have similar bodies. Our provinces are not as numerous as the States but we have the principle of provincial representation in our Senate. It seems to me that to some extent at least we should recognize these provinces in the appointment of senators, but if we were to throw on the legislative bodies the entire power of appointing senators for the provinces, we would probably find some objections. We might find, for instance, that giving the local legislature the power of appointment the legislature itself or the cabinet in it would be very likely to limit their choice to men who had made themselves known and felt in the arena of provincial politics only. That would perhaps be not entirely satisfactory. We would find also this danger, that you might have a Senate entirely opposed to the House of Commons on political questions, although the House of Commons perhaps would distinctly represent the views of the people on Dominion matters. That would have been the case under such a system during the great part of the career of Sir John Macdonald ; for while he must have represented the people of Canada very largely, very fully, yet the provinces were in the hands of the opposing party and would have supplied him with a Senate antagonistic in every respect.

These are very serious matters indeed to consider in thinking of the propriety of giving the appointing power entirely into the hands of the provinces. The fact that the provinces have provincial rights that need protection ; that the provinces bargained for certain special representation in the Senate not according to population, shows it would be fair to presume that they will not be fairly protected, if all the appointing power is in the hands of the Dominion government against whom the provinces apparently need protection. Thus I would feel that while it might not be desirable that the entire appointing power should be left in the hands of a provincial legislature, yet we might fairly leave a portion there, a portion equivalent to the actual reason why the Senate Chamber exists as a protector of the provinces. What that protection would be would be a matter of judgment, probably 25 per cent would be sufficient. We then have the local legislature as one body that will be permanent that has a right to a share in the appointment of senators. Logically it should and we might fairly leave a portion of that power with them. Of all other bodies there is none but the Dominion government that I think can fairly be appealed to. Universities might perhaps at times be given a slight representation, but with a fixed number of senators we could scarcely afford to let them have much say in the matter. The cabinet, this House of Commons and its members, represent the people of Canada. As I have said, they represent the people somewhat crudely, but they represent the people of Canada much closer than does any other body. And in that way I feel that they are more entitled to speak for the people of Canada than any other body, and that we may fairly leave the large number of appointments to the Senate with this body ; but not necessarily with the government itself. I would prefer rather that the government should be limited, limited very distinctly with regard to the number of their appointments to the Senate. If instead of appointing the whole number of senators the government of the day for fair protection, for fair chance to enforce its policy, should be limited to the appointment of say 50 per cent of the senators, that might be sufficient.

Now, if that were done you would have a certain variety of representation from the provinces directly, you would have a certain safeguard for the Dominion government of the day through its power of appointing say fifty per cent, but you have made no provision whatever for any proportionate representation from this House. It may be that the provincial governments would be all Liberal, it may be that the government at Ottawa would be Liberal. Justice demands that in such a case there should be the same principle applied that we apply in the formation of committees. I think fairness and justice demand that the opposition of the day should have some power to see that their views are presented in the Senate, some power of consenting to the appointment of a number at least proportionate to their own numbers in this House. This is only one form that I suggest; it is the form that appeals to me more than that of election, more than that of appointing senators by the local legislatures; more than that of simply changing the term for which a senator is elected. I prefer a composite form of selection, a selection not coming from any one single body. And if the local legislatures be allowed to appoint a small number corresponding to their need of protection, if the Dominion government were allowed to appoint say fifty per cent of the members of the Senate, and if the opposition of the day were allowed a proper representation in proportion to their numbers, then I think you would indeed have a Senate composite in its origin, a Senate representing more variety of views than at present. I am not introducing any novel mode of procedure, and yet I believe it would so largely improve the quality of the Senate itself as a working body, and so largely plant them in the esteem of the people that it would bring about a Senate that there would be very little objection to. We must remember that the same principle of patience and forbearance towards mistakes that the people now exercise to the Commons in as much as they know the Commoners come back for chastisement, would be exercised towards the Senate under these conditions. The people would know that this Senate though objectionable at the moment would change rapidly year after year, and that, if not directly, yet indirectly through some of their governing bodies they could reach the obstreperous senators and punish them if they so desired. This suggestion—I do not dogmatize on any special method; any of these methods that I have outlined would so largely improve the present condition of affairs that I think it would be well indeed if the House, if the Senate itself, especially if the government of the day would give them very careful consideration.

I have also suggested certain changes with regard to the work, and to the powers of the Senate. The Senate, at present, does not initiate very much in the way of legislation. Government measures are seldom introduced there. As you all know we have made this change, that we no longer introduce divorce Bills into this House; the matter of divorce is taken up and we may say handled entirely by the Senate, and we, as a rule simply concur in their findings. It has been suggested that other work might be thrown upon them. One distinguished member of the Senate did suggest that private Bills should be largely introduced there. I am not prepared to urge that, but I think a conference between the experienced members of both Houses might devise measures by which an increased portion of the work should fairly be thrown upon the Senate—not such a portion of the work as would rob this House of its proper and full importance before the people. That I would not like. I would not like to see in this country a second chamber equivalent to the Senate of the United States, nor do I think it would likely occur if any addition were made to the powers because in this country the cabinet is responsible to and must have a majority in this House and that would always place the fight in this House. It would centre interests in this House so that I have very little fear that the Senate would aggrandize power even if it got increased work. There is also this work the Senate may do, and which it is now doing: There are from time to time new questions which come before this country, questions too new perhaps for actual legislation. We appoint committees here to examine into telephones and telegraphs at very great length, and from time to time valuable information is acquired. On all such questions it seems to me the Senate of Canada might become a standing committee, a committee to search out new lines of legislation, to thoroughly examine all projected new lines, looking into all matters of public utility and matters of public ownership—matters such as the rural free mail delivery that has been so much discussed. The Senate might become a very useful body indeed if it were a permanent committee of examination in that direction, digesting as it were information for us and handing it down to be placed in safe and proper form amongst the laws of this country.

With regard to the powers of the Senate, I feel that the veto power under present conditions should not be placed in the Senate. Irresponsible as the Senate is, it is illogical that it should have the veto power. The senators possibly will not give it up readily, but with increased powers granted them in other directions perhaps they would be willing. I think the suspensory power very valuable; I think there should be an opportunity for them to say when a measure would come up from this House: We are not prepared to accept this measure at the present time, we will hold it over until another session so that we may ascertain the views of the people. But the absolute veto power I think should be removed, and if the Senate were willing to that end, then something in the form of a joint vote would be entirely desirable. In Australia where they have an elective system the Senate naturally must consent to Bills along with the House, and where they differ then they have a peculiar method of arranging. A joint vote may be asked for, but the two Houses may still continue to differ and in the end the governor is allowed, if he so desires, to dissolve both Houses and send them back to the country; and in the face of a dissolution of both Houses it is wonderful how the animosities will soften down and how the objections will be removed.

Now, Sir, in any remarks I have made I have not dogmatized particularly as to a remedy, except in one or two particulars. I have given views as suggestions, and I hope the gentlemen of this House will give them consideration as such. The form of my resolution is by no means vital. The particular points I urge are the points I think which should be considered. I have no particular desire that my particular form of resolution should be the one which the line of remedy should follow. I realize too that this is about the best time to take up such a question. It is true that the Liberals of Canada have for many years felt that the Senate should be reformed. It is true also that when the Liberals came into power they were not in a position to reform it because they did not have a majority in the Senate, or a majority feeling in that way. It is true that time has elapsed, it is true that we now have a majority. It was absolutely necessary not only that the Liberals should have a majority in the Senate but a large majority before they could undertake such a work. And it was necessary for time to elapse sufficiently to allow our Conservative friends to realize that the present condition of affairs meant to them an antagonistic Senate were they to enter into power. So that I think under all the circumstances this is actually the best time that such a question should be brought up, especially as there is no keen burning issue now before either House to kindle a special animosity at the moment. Any feeling of dissatisfaction or disapprobation towards the Senate is not the irritation of a moment, but a calm, ripe judgment of these people. I realize also that in opening up this matter I am opening a gateway to our hon. friends of the opposition to remind us that we have not been very prompt in fulfilling our old promises. I hope, however, that after enjoying themselves for a few minutes in that way, they will address themselves to the real question and help us with the ability that many of them possess to arrive at a solution. If I have done anything to promote a reform of the Senate or added anything of value to the discussion of the subject, I shall feel that I have at least done one good day's work for Canada.

Mr. E. N. LEWIS (West Huron). Mr. Speaker, it is with a good deal of reluctance and trepidation that I rise to speak to the resolution which, with the permission of the House, I have the privilege of bringing forward at this stage ; that resolution is as follows :

That in the opinion of this House it will be advisable at the next general election for the House of Commons for Canada to submit the following questions for the votes of the people:—

1. Shall the Senate of Canada be abolished?
2. Shall the method of appointment of the senators of Canada be altered?

My reasons for trepidation and reluctance are twofold. In the first place, this is a grave matter, which should be dealt with, if I may use the word, by the bull dogs of war of the front benches, not by one of the bull-terriers of the back benches of the opposition. I also wish to put myself right before the House in another matter. Unfortunately for myself, but probably fortunately for Canada, as the results will show, some two or three sessions ago I felt it my duty to bring before this House, in not a speech, but a statement concerning the waning marine interests of Canada certain facts, which it took upwards of four hours to deliver, and I have no doubt that that statement of matters with which a great number of members of this House were not conversant, wearied them. But I have this consolation, that the government have seen fit only lately to bring into force certain things which I then advocated, and which I have been urging on the Boards of trade of the maritime provinces, namely, keeping foreign shipping out of our coasting trade. When I do reluctantly rise to my feet, I wish to occupy only as short a time as the circumstances will permit.

Now, Sir, while I compliment him on his delivery and manner, I do not agree with my hon. friend who has just sat down (Mr. McIntyre (South Perth) that we are here as Elected Rulers. We are not elected rulers, but Elected Representatives of the people ; and my reason for rising on this occasion is that I feel that as such representative I have a message for this House and the government of Canada in reference to the Senate. There is a strong feeling throughout Ontario, particularly that part of the province to which I belong on this subject. I have no desire or expectation that my 'foot-prints on the sands of time will lie' but I hope for the good of Canada, and West Huron in particular that my shoes will scrape good and hard, as I pass by.

Now, I am not going to give utterance to my own opinions on this matter further than to say that I endorse the utterances of a number of gentlemen whose words I intend to quote. I bring forward this resolution because of what Dr. Falconer said in addressing the Canadian Club some months ago that it was a wise thing to let the people vote on the great questions of the day ; it educates the people, and enables those in parliament to see what the people wish, and we, as representatives, should carry that out. I intend to refer to the utterances of one gentleman in particular in regard to the abolition of the Senate, and I do this without any political bias whatever. Some hon. gentlemen may think that I am trying to make some political capital; but I am not. I am dealing with this question entirely on business principles. Now, Mr. Speaker, Sir Richard Cartwright, in 1896, at a great mass meeting at Massey Hall, in the city of Toronto, referring to the Senate used the words: 'When shall Providence remove this millstone from around the necks of the Canadian people.' ?. Sir Richard Cartwright was at that time viewing the Senate from the outside point of view. He has now all the experience of the Senate behind him, and I give all credit to his knowledge, his acumen and his ability. He now takes an inside view of the question, and the Ottawa 'Free Press,' one of the ablest of the Liberal journals of this country, stated that Sir Richard Cartwright had made a speech on the Senate which we could carry down the sands of time as one of the ablest speeches ever made in Canada. I only wish I had more eloquence to describe that speech, but amongst other statements in it was this : 'While there may be some doubt as to the good of the Senate to Canada, there is not the slightest doubt of its great danger and capability of harm.' Now, the hon. gentlemen of the Senate need not quaver in their shoes, because senators have vested rights, and whenever this country makes a promise or a contract, it carries it out, and I for one will advocate carrying out the word of Canada once given, whatever change may take place in the future.

Now, Sir, I believe there is great capability of harm in the Senate, and where is the harm ? The harm is to the poor people of Canada. There is no question that if the Premier, for the time being, appoints enough senators from his own side of politics—it matters not which party occupies the treasury benches—and he says to the leader of the Senate, 'I want such and such a Bill to go through,' or if the pressure is so strong that it goes through the House of Commons, and he says to the leader of the Senate, 'I want that Bill annulled,' the thing is done. I do not say this with reference to any government. But here is where the injustice comes in. A company, some small corporation wants a Bill through both Houses. It is a good and an honest Bill. It passes the Commons and goes to the Senate. The leader of the government, who has control of the majority in the Senate for party purposes has no interest with this Bill. What happens ? Some great corporation gets its grip on this Bill, which affects the poor people of Canada, and that is the end of it. I understand that has oc-cured numbers of times, and that is one of the great injustices we have to contend against. I can claim to speak on behalf of the people of West Huron particularly and of the province of Ontario. I go from house to house and from town to town. When I am on a railway, I do not travel by night but by day, and I ask the people I meet on the trains—people who do not know me—how they feel on this question. From what they say, the people of Ontario want some change. The hand writing is on the wall. The people want either the abolition of the Senate or some other material and effective change in that body. I ask you, Sir, to allow the people to vote on this matter, discussion will take place naturally and the government will then know what the people desire and that is what should be carried out.

Mr. H. H. MILLER (South Grey). After listening to the speech we have just heard from my hon. friend from South Perth (Mr. McIntyre) and the short speech made by my hon. friend from West Huron (Mr. Lewis) I realize that I shall have in my remarks to repeat some of the things which they have said. On the 6th February, 1649, a resolution was carried in the British House of Commons for the abolition of the House of Lords. That resolution was as follows:

Resolved, that the House of Peers in parliament is useless and dangerous and ought to be abolished.

On the following day the House of Commons of Britain passed another resolution—a resolution to abolish the monarchy. It is somewhat significant that while from the time of the coronation of Charles the Second to the present no number of persons in Britain have seriously thought of the abolition of the monarchy, there has always been in Britain a considerable number of persons agitating for the ending or mending of the House of Lords. The resolution which I have introduced has in view the same object as the Cromwellian resolution to which I have referred, but is not so severe in its language or extreme in its criticism. The resolution which I propose, seconded by my hon. friend from Renfrew (Mr. Wright), is as follows:

That the Canadian Senate, as an institution, has not proved to be of any decided benefit to Canada, and cannot be regarded as a necessity. That the disadvantages connected with and resulting from the maintaining of the Senate greatly outweigh the advantages and benefits derived therefrom, and that the Senate may with advantage and gain be abolished.

Mr. Edward A. Freeman , in 'Subjects of the Day' for February, 1891, in discussing the question of ending or mending the British House of Lords lays down the case thus:

The question is a practical one. First, if the institution is a good one, keep it. Second, if it is moderately bad, reform it. Third, if it is absolutely bad, sweep it away.

At first glance one would naturally conclude that he had fairly stated the case, but upon closer investigation and after more careful thought I differ from Mr. Freeman and am of the opinion that he has not fairly stated the case and that he has not accurately fixed his premises. I would say: First, if the institution is a good one and is necessary keep it. Second, if it is only moderately bad and is capable of being reformed so that it will be useful and worth to the people of Canada what it costs, reform and retain it. Third, if it is absolutely bad, or if, as it is now, or as it may be mended, it will be unnecessary and not worth what it costs, sweep it away. If we accept these three propositions, as stating the case, which to me seem reasonable, I think that the Senate must go. Not so much because it is even moderately bad or mischievous, but because it is comparatively useless and unnecessary and not worth what its costs the people. When I speak of the cost to the Canadian people it will be seen, as I proceed, that I mean to include more than the actual money cost of maintaining the institution. I suppose that we in Canada have a second chamber largely because our Canadian people, at and before the time of confederation, sought to imitate as closely as possible the parliamentary institutions of the mother land. Let us remember, however, that in Britain the House of Lords is the older institution of the two, and that while we may argue that a second chamber is necessary in Canada to guard the rights of the weaker provinces and to revise and reconsider the work of the lower House, in Britain the House of Commons came into existence as a check and safeguard and as a protection of the rights of the public against the encroachments, the injustices and the wrongs endeavoured to be perpetrated by the British nobility and the British lords. I have said that dissatisfaction with the House of Lords has existed in Britain for many years. It may be said in reply that the House of Lords and the Senate of Canada are altogether different institutions and that objections to the one are not necessarily valid objections to the other, and that consequently the same criticisms do not apply to both. In reply to that I would say that, in my humble judgment, the House of Lords of Britain is less objectionable than the Senate of Canada. For the greater part, the members of the House of Lords are neither elected or appointed. The peers take their seats in the upper chamber because of hereditary right, and it is that hereditary right which is most largely objected to. Our senators do not take their seats in the Senate because of hereditary right, but are appointed for life. In either case, death alone creates a vacancy. As a general rule, the members of the British House of Lords are men of very considerable means, great leisure and high degree of culture and education. There are some six hundred persons in Britain entitled to take their places in the House of Lords, and these people receive no indemnity and cost the country nothing. Out of the six hundred more or less entitled to seats in the House of Lords, not more than one hundred, usually less, are found occupying these seats and taking part in the work of the upper chamber. These hundred or less who are the working members of the House of Lords, are men of public spirit, who have a natural taste and inclination for political and public life. The House of Lords at work then may be said to be composed of a picked number of men from a select class. And again, in Britain there is always a check upon the House of Lords and an influence that may be brought to bear upon them ; that is, the power that lies in the Soveriegn of adding to their membership by creating new peers. That power was in evidence when in 1832 the House of Lords was induced to pass the Reform Bill to which they were really in opposition. They gave their consent to the Bill because of the promise that Earl Grey, the then Prime Minister, had obtained from the Sovereign that he would, if necessary, create an additional number of peers so as to bring the House of Lords to such a number as might be required to pass the measure. Our Senate is composed of men who are paid. Our senators are not superior to the members of the House of Commons either by reason of their position or by reason of their culture or learning. And it is impossible, I think, for any government, under any system, to choose an upper chamber for Canada that will be in some respects as well selected as is the House of Lords by the natural process of selection to which I have referred.

Again, with our Senate there is no check. There is no influence that can be brought to bear upon them to make them subservient to the will of the people, like the power of additional appointment in Great Britain. Our Senate is supreme. I object, Sir, to our Senate, not to our senators. And I do not object to our Senate, because it contains some old men. The word 'senate' itself is derived from a Latin word meaning, an old man. We have the old Latin Senatus, meaning an assembly of elders. And I am not in sympathy with those who are eager to employ and rely upon the vigour and strength of younger years rather than the more mature judgment and greater wisdom that comes with age. If you will glance at the gentlemen who compose our Canadian Senate to-day, I think you would find it exceedingly difficult to find among the younger members of the Senate three men more able or of greater usefulness to our country than Hon. R. W. Scott, the venerable leader of the government in the Senate chamber and the Secretary of State ; Sir Richard Cartwright, Minister of Trade and Commerce and Sir Mackenzie Bowell, the honourable and venerable one-time Prime Minister of Canada. And let me mention one other, one who, no longer a young man is rapidly approaching the time when he will be called an old man, Hon. G. W. Ross. Each of these men, with the possible exception of Mr. Ross, is well past any age limit that will be fixed, if it be found advisable to reform the Senate by fixing an age limit. It has been suggested as my hon. friend from South Perth has said, that our Senate be composed of men elected as are the members of the House of Commons, except from larger constituencies. In every recent discussion of the Canadian Senate, reference has been made, and in future discussions is likely to be made, to the now famous resolution passed by the Reform convention that met in Ottawa in 1893, that resolution reads as follows :

> The present constitution of the Senate is inconsistent with the federal principle in our system of government, and is in other respects defective, as it makes the Senate independent of the people and uncontrolled by the public opinion of the country, and should be so amended as to bring it into harmony with the principles of popular government.

Elect your Senate, and I at once admit, that, in the language of this resolution it makes the Senate dependent upon the people and brings them under control by the public opinion of the country. But, I have thought that one of the strong points, one of the virtues of the Senate, in so far, as it has strong points and virtues, is that very independence of the people, that very ability to stand uninfluenced, uncontrolled, unmoved by any sudden gust of popular passion, by any momentary impulse of the people. Elect your Senate and no one will propose, I think, to increase the total number of senators. Then, it will necessarily follow that the constituencies for the Senate must be very much larger than the present constituencies for the House of Commons, and it will inevitably follow that no man of moderate means will be able to carry on a campaign for a Senate election. For, as has been pointed out by my hon. friend from South Perth, as was pointed out by the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) during the debate of 1906, and as was urged by the late Sir John Macdonald at the time of Confederation, when he contended for an appointive rather than an elective Senate, no man of moderate means would be able to spend either the time or the money necessary to carry on an election in so large a constituency. Now, I have no feeling of antipathy, no feeling of ill-will, toward wealthy men as such. Though I am not one of them, I am glad that there are wealthy men in Canada. I would deem it a very bad advertisement for Canada, indeed, if no man, if no considerable number of men, had been able to acquire within our borders honestly-made fortunes. Yet, I do think it would be unwise, I think it would be an unfortunate thing to constitute a second chamber so that its members would be, for the most part and of necessity men of great means, men representing only the wealthy classes and the moneyed interests.

Again, it has been suggested that our senators should be elected by the several provincial legislatures. If we adopt that method of reform, we should be getting further away from the system of Great Britain and nearer to that of the United States. The Right. Hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), speaking in 1906 upon this subject, rather agreed with the idea of the election of our senators by the legislatures of the several provinces, and said that, possibly by adopting such a system, we might find the solution of the vexed problem of Senate reform. And, at the same time, he suggested that the members of the Senate might be elected by the several legislatures three at a time, and thought that by this means it would be ensured that at least one of the three would represent the political party in the minority at the time in the legislature. The right hon. gentleman said also that he would not be adverse to go further in the idea of giving protection to the weaker provinces and giving all the provinces, regardless of their area or population, equal representation in the Senate. Now, Sir, if we adopt these changes, I suppose it will not be deemed that any province ought to have a larger representation in the Senate than it has in the House of Commons. Prince Edward Island has now four representatives in this House. If four representatives in the Senate were given to each of the nine provinces, we should have a Senate of thirty-six members.

That total number of 36 it will not be possible to increase until, by addition or subdivision, we increase the total number of our Canadian provinces. That would reduce the total number of Senators to 36, and would, insofar as the reduction of the number is concerned, be welcome to me, as it would go a considerable distance towards the goal I desire to reach. But how, if the provinces are to have a representation of so small number as 4 in the Senate, are we to elect our Senators by the several provincial legislatures, 3 at a time? And again, while we are looking for improvement in the method of constituting our Senate to the practice of the United States, I find that the United States, like most other countries, is becoming dissatisfied with its second chamber, and that they as well as we are looking about for some method of reform, some change that will make their second chamber more satisfactory to them. I have been reading a very well written article upon the United States Senate in a recent standard American Encyclopedia. That article makes this statement:

> The question of electing United States senators by direct vote of the people instead of by the legislatures of the several states, has been agitated for many years. For this purpose an amendment to the national constitution is necessary. The legislatures of fourteen states passed resolutions in 1903 asking Congress to call a convention for the purpose of considering an amendment to the constitution. The states which passed the resolution were Oregon, California, Minnesota, Texas, Arkansas, Nevada, Washington, North Dakota, Kentucky, Missouri, Utah, Montana, Idaho and Kansas. In several states the rule has been adopted of placing the names of candidates for the United States senate on the ballots for members of the legislatures, leaving to the legislature nothing more in effect than ratification of the popular choice.

So in turning to the United States for examples in the matter of reforming our second chamber, it is to consider a system that after one and a third centuries of trial, the United States are becoming dissatisfied with and are endeavouring to change. A Senate elected by the different provincial legislatures is apt to be elected or appointed because of past political services, just as under the system now in vogue. Senators elected in that way by provincial legislatures are just as apt to be partisan as those elected or appointed under the present system. Under that suggested system of reform, there will always be in the Senate a partisan majority whether that partisan majority be larger or smaller except this, that the smaller the majority the more intense and the more in evidence will the partisan feeling be. It has been suggested by my hon. frined from South Perth (Mr. McIntyre) that we reform the Senate in one respect by shortening the term of appointing Senators to a period of years—ten years has been suggested, fifteen years has been suggested—rather than the present life tenure. One result of such a reform will be that from time to time we will have to dispense with the services of men who, by long experience have added very much to their usefulness, and in their place put men of inexperience who, because of their inexperience, will not and cannot be so useful. My hon. friend from Perth said that we might appoint a man, it may be at the age of 30, to the Senate, and we know not then how he may develop, or what in after life he may turn out to be, and therefore would have us conclude that we might in that way be perpetrating an evil and bringing upon ourselves a misfortune. Now I point out to the hon. gentleman, and I point out to this House, that every time we appoint a judge to the bench in Canada, whether to the County Court or to one of the Superior Courts, a much more important position, because that man in himself will have more power than any one senator can have in the Senate, we run the same risk, yes, a much greater risk, in appointing that judge, because we appoint him for life, and yet no evil has been found to result from that system. Turning again to the article from which I already quoted upon the United States Senate, I read this :

> Some of the states make it a rule to re-elect the same senators practically for life and this is especially the case with the New England States and in certain Southern States.

Thus again we see the United States largely departing in practice from the constitutional rules that we are now asked to imitate, to follow and to copy. It has been suggested that while our senators should be elected or appointed for a term of years, there should be a power to re-appoint. Now if we had this power of re-appointing, it seems to me we would be altogether likely, within a short time, to adopt the practice of certain states in the republic, and that re-appointment will be the practice rather than the exception, and it is possibly wise that it should be so. If not then it seems to me that another result of the power to re-appoint will be to make the senators more subservient to the reigning power. After having considered carefully all the plans I have heard suggested for a reform of the Senate, I object to them. I object to them because I have not been able to see in them anything which to my mind will mean a real reform, a real improvement. But I have been able to see in nearly all of them that which to my mind would likely lead to mischief and harm rather than good. If we are to have a Senate, then I agree with the words made use of, or the opinion expressed, by the hon. the leader of the opposition when he spoke upon this question in the debate of 1906. If we are to judge of that gentleman's present opinion by one of the planks in the Halifax platform, his mind has somewhat changed upon the matter of Senate reform since he spoke in this House in 1906, as his changed upon many questions, I quarrel not with him, because I yield to every man the privilege of changing his mind. But the words to which I refer, and which the hon. gentleman used in 1906, were these:

> There is not very much wrong with the present mode of constituting the Senate.

Of course the hon. gentleman went on to add, as we would expect him to do, that there would be nothing very wrong with the present mode of constituting the Senate if the present Prime Minister were stronger than he is, and would appoint the men that ought to be appointed. I think the leader of the opposition intimated that it would be a good thing and a proper thing if the leader of the government would appoint to the Senate, not exclusively men of his own party, but some from the opposition party. Now whether that be wise or unwise, whether it be reasonable or unreasonable, I frankly say that I do not expect to see, within any short time, the leader of any Canadian government, be he Reform or Conservative, appointing to senatorial or other high positions any large number of men from the opposite side. Yet upon that occasion the leader of the opposition was good enough, was fair enough, let me say, was generous enough to speak in this wise :

> I for one do not desire to be understood as reflecting on all the appointments that my right hon. friend the leader of the government has made to the Senate or even the majority of them. He has appointed very many able men, very many distinguished men to the Senate; Sir Oliver Mowat, the Hon. David Mills, and other men of that type, who although Liberals, were men proper to be appointed to the Senate of Canada, and their appointment justified itself not only to the Liberals but to the Conservatives throughout the country.

Then the hon. gentleman (Mr. R. L. Borden) went on to say that all of the appointments had not been so satisfactory, that some of them had not been well chosen and that some of the appointments had been a surprise not only to Conservatives, but to Reformers as well. I observe that the two gentlemen whom the leader of the opposition specially mentioned as having being good men and proper appointees are, and were at the time of his pronouncement, safely dead, as politicians in this day usually have to be in order to receive any degree of praise, any measure of commendation, from their political opponents. I am very glad, however, and I am sure the people of Canada will be glad to hear, that a large majority of the appointments recommended by the right hon. the leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to the Canadian Senate have been satisfactory even to the leader of the opposition and that he has no fault to find with them. I again say that if we are to have a Senate I quite agree with the idea expressed by the leader of the opposition and say that no better method of constituting the Senate is likely to be discovered or acted upon than the method we now employ. I oppose every plan that I have heard suggested because, as I have said, I see nothing in it that appears to me likely to be a real improvement, but should any method be discovered by which you will put into our Senate greater life, greater energy and greater activity or by which greater importance will be attached to it, I will the more strongly and emphatically object to it because it seems to me that it will bring the two Houses into collision and that there will be friction and mischief resulting. As it is now, our Senate is not seriously considered. The public pay it little attention—it pays little attention to itself. It is at present a comparatively unnecessary, a comparatively useless and expensive thing—that is all—but let it come to greater life, greater energy and greater activity, and you run the great danger of making it not only a comparatively useless and expensive thing, but a mischievous and hurtful thing as well.

To strengthen my position on this point, let me read these words of Lord Salisbury —and words of so eminent a man upon so important a question are well worthy of our attention and most careful thought. Lord Salisbury speaking of the British House of Lords said:

It is because most of those who sit in the House of Lords do not themselves select the profession of politics as a thing which they love but come to it by the operation of external causes, that we have a body that brings to the consideration of political matters a feeling which is described as one of languor, but which I would describe as one of good nature and easy-going tolerance, which enables them to accommodate themselves to the difficult part of playing second to the House of Commons. . . . Depend upon it, if you ever succeed in so altering the character of this House that it consists of determined politicians, who always attend all debates and attach the same weight and importance that are attached to their opinions by those who sit in the House of Commons, you will have pronounced the doom of our present system of government, you will be imposing upon the House of Lords a place in the constitution which will be fatal to the constitution as it exists.

We all agree that it would be unwise to retain and maintain our Canadian senate as it is. While we are racking our brains and puzzling our minds to discover, if it be possible, some method of reform that will make the Senate more useful and more tolerable to the people of Canada, let us ask ourselves why, after all, it is necessary for us to have a Senate ? Why is it necessary for us to have a second chamber of any kind?

The Hon. Mr. Gladstone attributed the degree of toleration of the British people to their House of Lords to the English love of aristocracy. He said:

In truth the love of freedom itself is hardly stronger in England than the love of aristocracy; as Sir William Molesworth, himself not the least of our political philosophers, once said to me of this feeling with the people 'it is a religion.' The great strength of the House of Lords in popular estimation does not, so far as I can judge, lie in its legislative performances, nor even in the vast possessions of its members, but in the admirable manner in which a large portion of them, without distinction of politics, perform public and social duties in their local yet scarcely private spheres; and it is the love not of equality but of inequality, among the people which makes the noblemen almost kings in their minor yet far from narrow circles and permits their fellow countrymen to contemplate, for the most part without the slightest admixture of envy, their favoured lot.

Sir, whatever there may be in Britain, there is not in Canada any such love of aristocracy as Mr. Gladstone here refers to. With all our diverse religions there is not among our Democratic Canadian people any such religion as that love of aristocracy referred to by Sir Wm. Molesworth, and it does not strengthen the argument for the maintaining of the second chamber of Canada that the strongest reason Mr. Gladstone could find for the existence of the House of Lords in Great Britain should be that love of aristocracy to which he refers. Two reasons mainly are advanced in support of our Canadian Senate. First, that it is necessary to have a second chamber to revise the sometimes hasty, ill-considered, ill-advised legislation of the House of Commons. I would ask, Sir, what superior knowledge, what superior wisdom is possessed by the hon. senators that enables them to or makes them capable of correcting errors of the lower House? The House of Commons devotes more time and a great deal more attention to its work than does the Senate. The House of Commons sits longer hours, it has shorter and less frequent intermissions, and knotty and intricate problems are more carefully and fully threshed out in special and select committees of the House of Commons than in the committees of the Senate. Again, the members of the House of Commons come more frequently and regularly in contact with the people and are therefore more in touch with the people and more cognizant with the popular views and sentiments than those in the upper chamber.

The hon. member for South Perth (Mr. G. H. McIntyre), speaking in 1906, attached some considerable value to the Senate as an authority to revise, but the hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) attached to it little or no importance as a revising power and said :

A second chamber is supposed to be a check upon hasty legislation. But this is an idea which has never made much impression upon my judgment at all events. Considering the course of such legislatures in the Dominion which are composed of a single branch, elected by the people, the legislatures of Ontario, Manitoba, British Columbia and some others, I do not believe that we need seriously apprehend any danger from the existence of one branch only of the legislature.

Sir, the great authority that must criticise, that must censure and deal with the legislation of the House of Commons is the people that are represented in and by the House of Commons, and to whom the House of Commons is responsible, and it would be an unwise thing, it is I contend an unwise thing to maintain any second institution that renders an excuse for the dividing or the shirking of that responsibility.

The second reason which is more commonly advanced in support of the Canadian Senate was well given in the other words of the right hon. the Prime Minister in the debates of 1906, when he said :

But one reason which to my mind is absolutely conclusive and paramount is, that under our system of government a second chamber is an absolutely needed safeguard for the smaller provinces because of possible invasion of their rights by the larger provinces.

Sir, with all due deference and with the fullest possible respect to the greater wisdom and the larger experience and the splendid ability of the rigiht hon. gentleman —in whom no one has greater confidence than I, and for whom no one has greater admiration than I—it would after all seem to me that in the first place this need of protection on the part of the smaller provinces is more imaginary than real, and that in the second place, such protection even if required is not given and cannot be given by the Canadian Senate. It is very clear that as our Senate is constituted to-day—Ontario having 24 members in the Senate, Quebec having 24 and each of the smaller provinces a considerably smaller number,—that the Senate does not and cannot afford any protection to the weaker provinces. But adopt if you will the change suggested by the right hon. the leader of the government and give to each of the provinces an equal representation in the Senate—it is not likely, in fact, it is scarcely possible that the rights of all the smaller provinces shall be attacked at the saem time in connection with the same question and along the same lines. But suppose that with nine provinces each having say ten senators to represent them, which would give to Prince Edward Island more than twice as many representatives in the Senate as she has in the House of Commons, and would make the total number of senators ninety, (which all will admit is a sufficiently large number) then suppose that an attempt were made to impose upon the rights of say any two of the smaller provinces at the same time and in connection with the same issue, what protection would there be, how could the twenty senators representing these two provinces protect the rights of their provinces against and in opposition to the seventy senators representing the other provinces ? I can easily understand that at the time of confederation the smaller provinces were fearful and nervous lest the larger provinces with whom they were allying themselves might at some time endeavour to intrude upon their rights, and that at that time the smaller provinces eagerly clung to any thing that might seem to afford them any possible protection in the event of such a case arising. But I do not believe there has been a single instance from confederation to the present time when any such protection has been required or when the Senate could have given that protection had it been required. My hon. friend (Mr. McIntyre) from South Perth—whom without any attempt to flatter I will say is at least one of the most thoughtful and one of the most able of the junior members of this House —quoted as the only instance, I suppose, that came to his mind, of the House of Commons acting rashly or unwisely, when it was necessary that any other power should check its impulse ; the case of one of the members of the press gallery being brought to the bar of the House. He referred to what appeared to him to have been the inclination of the majority of the members of the House at that time. Sir, I do not know what was the state of feeling of the members of the House of Commons on that occasion, I do not know how many were in favour of the procedure that did take place or how many were opposed to it, but this I do say, that if for a moment the House of Commons was disposed to do an unwise rather than a wise thing, that the Senate had nothing whatever to do with bringing the House of Commons to a realization of what it ought to do or what was its real duty on that occasion. The power that formed a check, if it was a check, was the power that was in the right hon. gentleman who leads the government. Sir, the real and the effective protection that must ever be to the weaker provinces must be, and must be based upon, that feeling that prompts a man to protect a woman ; it must be based upon that feeling that leads us always to sympathize with the weaker party in any struggle. The great protection of the smaller provinces must be that British love of fair play that is, and I trust always will be a trait in the character of the Canadian people. No political party could afford to endeavour to trample upon the right of any of the provinces, especially one of the smaller provinces. No party can afford to take that course, because even though actuated by only the most selfish motives, it would know that that smaller province, be it comparatively never so weak, may at some time hold the balance of power and decide what political party should rule or govern. And even though the members of any political party in the House of Commons should endeavour at any time and upon any occasion to impose upon the rights of one of the smaller provinces, public opinion and Canadian love of justice would frustrate that attempt. I quite agree with the idea expressed by the hon. member for South Perth, when in speaking in 1906 in connection with this suggested necessity for the protection of the smaller provinces ; speaking by the way in reference to the election of the senators by the people, he said :

I would rather put up with the anomaly we now have and consider that after all the provincial rights which theoretically need protection are not in very much danger.

The right hon. the leader of the government on the other hand laid great stress on the necessity for a Senate as a means of protecting the rights of the smaller provinces.

I want to point out to the House how opinions differ on this subject. The member for South Perth valued the revising power of the Upper Chamber ; the right hon. the leader of the government attached little or no value to the Senate as a revising power. The member for South Perth, for reasons that he stated, opposed the election of our senators by popular vote ; the right hon. the leader of the government for the same and added reasons agreed with him and opposed the idea of an elected Senate. But, we have to-day, the hon. James Young, of Galt, Ontario, a very able man who has devoted considerable time to the consideration of Canadian political and public questions, writing to the newspaper press and expressing no degree of admiration for the Senate as we have it ; holding the Senate as we have it in very light esteem, and advocating the election of our senators by popular vote as the only method that is likely to give to us a satisfactory Senate. And so it is—no one considers the Senate as we have it to-day to be satisfactory ; no two persons appear able to agree upon any system or method of reform that is likely to be satisfactory in practice. In fact, I may go further and say that one seldom finds any one person who is willing to lay down any suggested method of reform and say that he feels sure in his own mind that that will really decide the matter and prove satisfactory. Now, it appears to me that all this is very significant, and it goes far to prove that it would be unwise for us to maintain our second chamber as we have it to-day, that we are not likely to devise any scheme or method by which our Senate may be so reformed to make it acceptable or useful to the people, and that we ought, if we do the wisest thing to do away with it altogether.

One other reason is sometimes given, if reason it may be called, for maintaining a second chamber, and that is that other countries have their second chamber. If that be a reason, shall we have four houses because Sweden until lately has had four houses, and because Finland has to-day four chambers ? Different provinces of Canada, as has been pointed out, when they first framed their constitutions, I suppose animated by a desire to do as other people had done, provided a second chamber, and for a time legislated and governed by means of two houses. Though they have dispensed with their upper chamber, we will all admit, I think, that those particular provinces have been just as well governed and legislated for since they abandoned it as they were before, and just as well governed and legislated for as the provinces which have continued to maintain a second chamber. I will admit that the fact that other countries have their second chamber ought to make us very cautious as to what we do; and yet, Sir, if after careful consideration, if after patient thought, if after looking at this question on every side, if after our experience of forty years, we come to the conclusion that our second chamber, as it is or as we may amend it, is not necessary, is not worth what it costs to the people, then the fact that other countries have their second chamber is not in itself a sufficient reason why we should not abolish our Senate. I commend, Mr. Speaker, to your attention and to the attention of every member of this House the following words of Mr. W. P. Byles, who is now or was recently a member of the British House of Commons representing the west riding of Yorkshire; and I ask your attention to his language, not because of the hon. gentleman by whom it was spoken, for I have no knowledge of his parliamentary career, but because of the language itself. Mr. Byles said :

Some one may ask what I would put in the place of the House of Lords? I answer, nothing, only the conservatism of Englishmen, their abject fear of breaking the continuity of things would suggest to them in getting rid of one obstruction to manufacture another not quite so bad.

And I ask you whether, after all, our inclination, in so far as we have the inclination to maintain our second chamber, is not due to that very conservatism, that very abject fear of breaking the continuity of things referred to by Mr. Byles ?

Sir, I have spoken of the cost to the country of the Canadian Senate and I have said that I meant more than the actual money cost of the institution. Our Senate is costing us to-day over a quarter of a million dollars a year. Some attempt has been made, not in this House, but in the newspapers, to make party capital out of the fact that our Senate is costing us considerably more to-day than it did some years ago. I do not see that any party capital can be made of this question at all. In the last few years we have added new provinces to our Dominion, and those new provinces have of course the same right to representation in the Senate as the older provinces have. We in this House as well as the members of the upper House, irrespective of party, have voted an increased indemnity to ourselves and to the members of the other House. As a matter of course, the cost of maintaining the Senate has very largely increased, and it will be still further increased as our western provinces continue to increase in population. They will demand and must receive, if the present system is continued, a further representation. But be that as it may, our Senate is costing us to-day more than $250,000 a year to maintain. It is a large sum of money, but that is not the only cost; in fact, I think I can correctly say that that is not the greatest cost to the people of Canada of maintaining the Senate. I believe that our Canadian public are sometimes too ready to look with suspicion upon their government, whether that government be Reform or Conservative. Reformers used frequently to say that Sir John Macdonald used the Senate with its Conservative majority to assist him to play tricks upon the Canadian people, that he caused popular measures to be passed in the House of Commons and then caused those measures to be blocked and defeated in the irresponsible Senate over which he presumably had no control, but which in reality he fully controlled. I have no doubt that Conservatives are to-day saying the same thing of the present administration. It may be, Sir, that there has been little or no ground for that suspicion in either case; but the suspicion exists, and anything that tends to lessen the confidence of the people of Canada in the powers that govern is a great loss and a national misfortune. Again, the Canadian Senate has buried within it to-day, as within a musty tomb, a number of able gentlemen who in the Senate are not capable of exercising any powers or exerting any particular influence—gentlemen who outside of the Senate, and especially if in the House of Commons, would exert a powerful influence that could only result in good for the people of Canada. It would be a comparatively easy thing to select twelve men from our present Canadian senators who could find places in the House of Commons, and who in the House of Commons would exercise even more power and have greater influence than the whole ninety or thereabouts exercise to-day in the chamber they occupy. This is an idea that was fully grasped by Sir Robert Walpole, so long Prime Minister of Great Britain. Sir Robert Walpole caused Mr. William Pulteney, his one-time friend, but later his very able and active opponent in the House of Commons, to be appointed to the House of Lords, as Lord Bath. Walpole believed that there he could not cause him any further trouble or give him any further opposition, and telling his son, Horace Walpole, what he had done, and illustrating his words with a twist of his fingers, he said: 'I have turned the key of the closet on him.' Nineteen years afterwards, as Sir Robert Walpole, then himself elevated to the peerage, as Earl of Orford, met Mr. Poultenay for the first time in the House of Lords, he addressed him thus:

My Lord Bath, you and I are now two as insignificant men as any in England.

Both of them able men, men of great experience and splendid talents, realized that each had completely lost his influence when he went from the Commons to the Lords. This, Sir, is a great loss to the people of Canada. I have argued that our Canadian Senate is not required, that it is unnecessary, that it is not worth what it costs the people. I have said that I would not particularly argue against it because of its wrong doings, because of its harmfulness and mischief. But instances are not wanting of upper chambers having effectively strangled legislation to the detriment of the country—our own second chamber included. In 1888 our Atlantic fisheries dispute, which had for a long time been a cause of trouble between our neighbours to the south and ourselves, had been amicably arranged by treaty. That treaty had been signed by Mr. Chamberlain, Lord Sackville, the British minister at Washington, and Mr. Bayard, the United States Secretary of State. It had been approved by the then democratic government of the United States, but upon a strictly party vote it was blocked by the republican Senate of the United States, which refused to the president the power to ratify the treaty, and that vexed question, then so nearly settled, has remained a vexed and troublesome question to this day. Some years ago a politically unfriendly Senate, having a majority of a different political complexion to that then existing in the House of Commons, defeated a Bill passed by this House, and by defeating that Bill lost to Canada and gave to the United States a very profitable Yukon trade. And during the present parliament a friendly Senate—a Senate politically friendly—caused to be defeated a Bill introduced in this House by my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster), relating to level crossings upon railway tracks. That Bill had been approved by this House and had the approval, I am sure, of the Canadian people, but it was defeated in our second chamber. And who can tell how many lives have since been lost because of the action of the Senate on that occasion. It would seem ridiculous that the stockholders, illustrating the Canadian electors, of any large commercial company should elect their directors and that those directors should elect their executive and their president, representing the House of Commons, the Cabinet and the Prime Minister, and that any power should then nominate or create by any means a second board, not responsible in any way to anybody, uncontrolled by the president, oftentimes stubbornly antagonistic to the first board, and able to produce a deadlock in the management of the business and the control of that company's affairs.

I realize that the attempt to abolish the Senate is a very big undertaking. My hon. friend from South Perth (Mr. McIntyre) says it is impracticable and asks: 'Can it be done?' I realize that it is a big task, but if it is a right thing to do, that is all the more reason why we should not delay getting at the work. Anything that the people of this country desire, I am confident can be carried into effect. The Toronto 'Star' and other Canadian newspapers have said that the Senate cannot be abolished because it will not abolish itself. I do not believe this. I refuse to believe that the members of the Canadian Senate or others who desire to become members of that body will be so lacking in dignity and self-respect as to attempt to thwart the will of the people, if the desire of the people be evident to abolish our second chamber. The agitation is not against the senators, but against the institution. I do believe, however, that our present senators have rights which ought to be respected and protected. It is not any part of my resolution, but I suggest that imperial legislation be sought, under which it may be possible for us to maintain our Senate as it is, except that no new appointments be made in the meantime, until by death, resignation, or otherwise, the number of the senators be reduced to say fifty. Then let the Senate be abolished and its surviving members be permitted, during the remainder of their lives, to continue to use the title hon. and be given a life annuity of say $2,000 a year. Men of much greater minds than mine have been in very serious doubt as to the wisdom of maintaining a second chamber. Let me quote from one illustrious Canadian statesman and one of Britain. Sir Oliver Mowat, one of the greatest statesmen Canada has ever had, speaking on this subject in 1903, said:

> We are agreed as to the necessity of a fundamental reform of the Senate, if, for any reason, the Senate must be or should be retained.

It is my opinion that that word 'if' is the largest word in that sentence and was intended so to be. The Hon. John Bright, one of the greatest statesmen of England, one of the most beloved, and one whose career was the most illustrious, said, towards the close of his political life, in Birmingham, on the 4th August, 1884:

> When I was young, I read books on this question and was strongly in favour of two houses. I confess that, without now having a very strong opinion one way or the other, I am not so bound up with the belief in the necessity of two Houses.

In dealing at so great length with so great a subject, it may be said I may have been guilty of great presumption. My only excuse, Mr. Speaker, is that I believe, as earnestly as I have advocated it, in the abolition of the second chamber. I am confident that a very large number of our people hold the same belief. And they hold that belief, not because of any socialistic ideas, but because they consider that the Senate is not worth what it costs. And until I hear reasons stronger and more convincing than those I have heard, in favour of maintaining a second chamber, I shall continue to be in favour of its abolition as I am to-day.

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Minister of Labour). With the permission of the House, I would like to lay on the table the result of the investigation held by Mr. Mackenzie King, at Vancouver, into the influx of Japanese labour. I lay on the table that portion of his report dealing with oriental immigration.

Mr. SPEAKER. Unless the House consents this is out of order.

Mr. FOSTER. We have no objection to the information coming down

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. M. S. SCHELL (South Oxford). Mr. Speaker, in 1906, when a resolution on the same subject as that of the one now before us was presented in this House, it was my privilege and pleasure to second that resolution. I desire to express, briefly, my opinion on the subject and my appreciation of the way the country has been discussing it. Since a similar resolution was introduced two years ago, this question has become a live one. It has been generally discussed throughout the country; almost all our leading newspapers have devoted a good deal of space to the question of the reformation of the Senate. I do not know that any of them have gone so far as to favour abolition, though the many different propositions presented looking toward reformation, indicate not only the importance but the difficulty of the question. This afternoon, we have had three resolutions presented; one proposing reformation of the Senate, one proposing a referendum on the subject, and the third in favour of abolition. As to the referendum, I do not think the proposal to refer a question of this kind to the people for an expression of opinion is a practical one. With all due deference to the intelligence of the people of this country, I think the question is too complicated and too delicate to be submitted to popular vote in this way. When I first began to look into the subject, I was prejudiced against the Senate and thought little of the work it accomplished. But the more I studied the question and the more I looked into what is being done by our own Senate and by second chambers in other countries, the more was I convinced that these chambers are doing a most important work in the government of their several countries. If the referendum were made, and a majority favoured either abolition or some of the more drastic reforms suggested, would that be a sufficient reason for making the change thus favoured ? It must not be forgotten that certain of the provinces of this Dominion entered confederation under a specific understanding and contract, part of whose terms had to do with the constitution of the Senate and the mode of appointing members to that body. If a bare majority were to declare, in effect, against the carrying out of this binding agreement amongst the provinces so far as the constitution of the Senate is concerned, would that be a sufficient reason for making such a change ? It seems to me that a referendum upon such a subject would be entirely out of the question.

As to abolition, while that might seem comparatively easy, I am convinced that the more we look into it the more clearly should we see that that also is impracticable, and further, that it would be unwise, in view of our position as a country and of the practical effectiveness of the Senate as a legislative body. We find that, when the fathers of confederation discussed this question, they went fully into the merits of it. With not a single exception, I believe, they were all in favour of having a Senate under our constitution. In this connection I wish to give two brief quotations. The first is from the work of Mr. Clements on the British North America Act. Summarizing the results of the debate that took place Mr. Clements says :

By the fathers of our confederation the Senate of Canada was announced as answering both purposes, as affording a check on hasty or ill-digested legislation and also as protecting local interests and the autonomy of the provinces. The attainment of the former purpose was supposed to be made secure by the mode of appointment, the life tenure of the senators being held out as a guarantee for independence in the exercise of their legislative duties; while the equal representation in the Senate of each of the distinctly differentiated portions of the Dominion would make that body the guardian of ' provincial rights ' or at least of local as distinct from general interests.

Let me read also a brief extract from the speech of Sir John Macdonald on the same subject :

In order to protect local interests and to prevent sectional jealousies it was found requisite that the three great divisions into which the British North America Act is separated should be represented in the upper House on the principle of equality. There are three great sections having different interests in this proposed confederation. We have western Canada, an agricultural country far away from the sea and having the largest population who have agricultural interests principally to guard. We have Lower Canada with other and separate interests and especially with institutions and laws which she jealously guards against absorption by any larger, more numerous or stronger power. And we have the maritime provinces having also different sectional interests of their own, having, from their position, classes and interests which we do not know in western Canada.

These quotations show the views entertained by those who took part in drawing up our constitution in 1867. Having entered into a contract, a binding contract, with the various provinces on this subject, it seems to me that it is practically impossible for this government now to undertake abolition.

In the first place we would have the assent of every province in the Dominion, and from what I can learn I am confident that the province of Quebec would never for a moment consent to abolition, or to any proposal that would lessen the power or influence of the Senate. In this connection I would like to read a resolution that was introduced in the Provincial House of Ontario by the Hon. Sir Oliver Mowat, and seconded by the Hon. Geo. W. Ross :

That in the opinion of this House, the provisions of the British North America Act, respecting the constitution and powers of the Senate of Canada are at variance with the well understood principles of responsible government, and should be brought more into harmony with those principles by an amendment to the said Act, substantially providing that if the House of Commons passes any Bill and the Senate rejects such Bill and fails to pass it, or passes it with any amendment or amendments to which the House of Commons shall not agree, and to which amendment or amendments the Senate adheres, the Governor General may, by message, upon the advice of his Council, convene a joint sitting of the two Houses, at which the questions in controversy and the final passage of such Bill shall be decided by a joint vote of the two Houses after debate.

Further, that it is the opinion of this House that the British North America Act should be so amended as to provide that senators should be appointed or chosen for a limited term of years only, and not for life, as at present.

I read this resolution to show, in the first place, that while it was passed in the Ontario Legislature, and a similar resolution was passed in the Nova Scotia Legislature, when the matter came before the Quebec Legislature the then premier of the province refused to present a resolution to the House on these lines; he refused to take the matter up at all with a view to putting the provincial government upon record, even in favour of the changes suggested in this resolution. So I contend that we have no reason whatever to suppose that the province of Quebec would for a moment consent to the abolition of the Senate. And I believe firmly that all the eastern provinces in the Dominion would perhaps be almost as strongly opposed to such a proposal. I know that in Ontario there has been some feeling towards abolition, but I believe that even there, if the matter were carefully considered, and even were it practicable, the province of Ontario would be opposed to abolition. Hence I say that in discussing this question I do not think we need spend any time in considering whether it would be wise to seek for abolition.

The resolution that has been introduced by the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. McIntyre) looks first to an age limit. That is exactly on the line of the resolution that was introduced in 1906. For myself, I think it would be wise to establish an age limit. We all know that when men get to the age of 75 or 80 years, while they may be clear-headed and able to give good advice, yet generally speaking they have passed the time when we could naturally expect them to render the best service. However, there are exceptions, and I know there are men who, at 75, are a great deal younger than some men of 65, are clearer headed and better able to do legislative work than men at 65. We readily understand that; and yet I believe it would be wise to have at least some age limit, make it 80 if necessary.

But more particularly am I in favour of making a term limit. I think that when a senator is appointed for life, he no sooner gets his appointment than all incentive to active, energetic service is in a large measure removed; he knows that he holds his appointment for life, and he is not responsible to any person for his services, whether he is active or not. I believe the resolution of 1906 proposed a term of fourteen or fifteen years, I think perhaps twelve years, or the length of three regular parliaments, would be about the right length, and in that case their election would take place in periods of three or four years. I think perhaps a term of twelve years might be as good a term as could be provided. In that case, though a man were appointed for a term of twelve years, he would still feel an incentive to put his energies into his work and give his best possible service to the country, and in that way he would be more likely to render efficient service than if he were appointed for life. I would also, with the term limit, provide for reappointment. That would act as a further stimulus to a man to do his best. I do not care how ambitious a man may be, or how anxious to serve his country in any position, we all need a stimulus to do our best, and if a man has something to aim at and knows that he is responsible to the people who elect him or appoint him, there is a stimulus to do his best in the position to which he is called. I think therefore that provision should be made for reappointment.

Another provision in the resolution is for an apportionment of the legislative duties between the two houses. I think something might be done to make the upper chamber more useful, and by which a good deal of the work that is done in this House might be lessened and thus facilitate the transaction of public business. Some have argued that the upper House is not now accomplishing very much, that the work they are doing is of little consequence. A couple of years ago I took occasion to look into the work that was being done by the Senate, and I found that they were amending quite a number of Bills, averaging about 25 every year, and that they were initiating Bills to the number of some 30 every year. Now I think that is doing pretty well for the Senate, when we remember that the preliminary work is largely due to this House. In connection with the Railway Bill of 1903, I think they introduced 97 amendments, and I understand that 70 of these were accepted by this House. I understand that a Bill was sent up from this House to the Senate a year or two ago, a Railway Bill, with some 11 clauses, and that every clause was stricken out, and the Bill was returned to this House with only the preamble, and still it was accepted by this House as it was returned from the Senate. I mention that to show that the Senate is, at any rate, doing some work, and if they were given more work to do I believe they would gladly do it. Sir Richard Cartwright, in a speech delivered in the Senate on the reform of the Senate a couple of years ago, suggested that it would be wise to allow the Senate to take charge of private Bills. That proposition might very well be put into effect; it would certainly relieve this House of a large amount of business. We know that the sessions are becoming longer, and if the work could be thus divided it would be an important consideration. In that way the Senate could be kept busy practically all the time and could do the work as well as it could be done by this House. A private Bill having been passed by the Senate would come back here simply for confirmation.

There is another clause in the resolution introduced this afternoon to the effect and with a view to consider the question whether other changes might be made and that a committee should be appointed to look into this question. Such a committee could very well deal with and might arrive at a basis of reform that would perhaps meet with the approval not only of this House but of the country at large. Some have thought that we have not had the results that were expected from the work of the Senate. I wish to call your attention to the fact that this criticism was hardly deserved; there has been little complaint, little dissatisfaction after all with the work that has been accomplished by the Senate.

We are very young as a nation. Forty years is a considerable period in the life of an individual, but in the life of a nation it is very very short indeed, we are just on the threshold of our national development. A development is taking place in this country such as has perhaps never been surpassed in the history of any country and with the great west opening up before us so rapidly, I think it is clear to every one of us who has given this matter any study that it is more important than ever that we should have a second chamber to serve as a balance wheel, as it were, on the legislation that might be passed by this House. If the arguments urged by the fathers of confederation were important, I think they are doubly so at this period of our national history. With the different races and nationalities that are coming into our country, with the immigration problem that is facing us, with other questions that will naturally arise in the opening up and development of the great western country, I think that the further considerations that were urged by the fathers of confederation and by those provinces entering confederation for the protection of local rights and local interests, are to-day just as strong as or stronger than at the time they were urged. I had not intended to speak on this question, but this afternoon, when my hon. friend from South Perth (Mr. McIntyre), told me he was going to name me as his seconder, I thought it was necessary that I should at least say a few words to show my complete sympathy with the resolution. I am heartily in accord with it and I believe that it is time the government was at least making a move with a view to the reform of the senate. The agitation that has taken place in Canada, I think, is clear enough proof to us on this point and I hope the government will seriously and expeditiously take hold of this question and, with the assistance of the opposition, who I understand are also favourable to reform, as announced by the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) in his celebrated Halifax platform, bring this matter to a successful issue at a very early date.

Mr. GEORGE SMITH (North Oxford). Mr. Speaker, I regret that I was not present to hear the speech made this afternoon by the mover of the resolution which I purpose supporting, that is the motion for the reform of the Senate. We have in our Senate to-day unquestionably many of the ablest men in political life in the country, the greatest Romans of us all, and yet there is throughout at least the portion of Ontario in which I reside a certain feeling of disappointment with reference to the Senate. I believe there is a feeling amongst the senators themselves I have heard some of them express disappointment with the Canadian Senate as it is now constituted.

My hon. friend from South Grey (Mr Miller) stated that it was not a socialistic question. Perhaps it is not, but still to a certain extent socialistic questions arise in the discussion of such a question as this. In Ontario, a few years ago, during the Conservative regime, when the farming community were not enjoying very great prosperity, they were experiencing hard times, and they felt that the officials, the salaried men in the country, were receiving their regular pay and without diminution, while their own profit, their own incomes, were much cut into, and yet they were the parties who had to pay the piper. That feeling gave rise to what is known as the Patron movement. We know that when more prosperous times came that feeling passed away and the Patron movement vanished into thin air. That there is England to-day a similar feeling of discontent cannot be questioned. I have here the 'Westminster Review,' a high-class London magazine, of November, 1907. It contains an article headed 'The Rising Storm Cloud.' The writer points out that this wave of socialism which exists in England, and the existence of which was shown during the last general election, is partly due to the Boer war.

He points out that men who in the beginning of the war volunteered their services were promised by their employers that they would get their positions when they returned, but when the time of peril had passed and the volunteers came home these positions were not open for them and there was a feeling of dissatisfaction which was probably increased by the fact that General Roberts was given a large sum of money by a grateful country for the eminent services he rendered, but in this the men of the rank and file did not share, and a feeling of jealousy was created that these gifts went to the few while the many got nothing. The fact that such things have had an influence is shown by the rise and spread of socialistic feeling in Great Britain. Before the Boer war the Fabian society, a small band which led the socialistic movement, was few in numbers, but now the writer says, they can be counted by the tens of thousands. In that way the socialistic aspect of this question has some bearing. The storm centre of the fight and the struggle—for I believe they are in England facing a struggle between the Lords and the Commons—the struggle there is not as it is here ; the struggle there is for : Which should prevail ; shall the will of the House of Commons prevail or shall it not. That is the issue placed before the British people by the present Prime Minister, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman. The question in Great Britain is : How is the will of the people to be ascertained. I am informed that the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Lewis) suggested submitting the question to the people of Canada on a referendum. A writer in the December issue of the 'Westminster Review' in an article entitled 'The will of the people' advocates a referendum to decide the fate of the House of Lords. Possibly a referendum would be less objectionable in Great Britain than would be a referendum in Canada where the smaller provinces have representation in the Senate, so that to radically change the constitution of that House would disarrange our whole system. Probably we would not be in as good a position to take a referendum in Canada on such a question as they would be in Great Britain.

The resolution proposed by the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Miller) is in favour of the abolition of the Senate. I do not think the people of Canada as a whole,—I do not believe that even the majority of the people in Ontario to-day would favour the abolition of the Senate if it were pointed out to them that there were difficulties in the way, constitutional and otherwise. Why is the Senate unpopular in Canada ? That is a question that it is very proper to ask. There is a feeling abroad that the Senate is a sort of temple of rest. I do not wish to speak with any disrespect ; I am only voicing the opinions I have heard expressed and the statements I have read in the newspapers of Ontario ; there is continual reference to the quietude and peacefulness of the Senate. In fact the popular feeling seems to be that the senators go there, in the words of Goldsmith:

> To husband out life's taper at the close
> And keep the flame from wasting, by repose.

If the Senate had made good ; if the Senate had shown the people of Canada that they were worth the money ; if the Senate had been the useful check to legislation that I believe it can be—for I do believe in the bi-cameral system. I believe that history teaches us that the bi-cameral system has its usefulness. The fact that such countries as France, Spain, and others have attempted to get along with a single chamber and have gone back to the two chamber system is evidence in its favour. Mark you, I think two legislative chambers in a country is the limit ; I believe that three or four would be altogether ridiculous. But with two Houses, I think probably the best results are obtained. In this House of Commons we have certain checks on legislation; you have the first reading of a Bill, the second reading of a Bill, the consideration of a Bill in committee, the third reading you have to give certain notices ; all these are along the line of proper consideration and checks upon hasty legislation. Now, why is it that the United States Senate has deserved the encomiums it has received from statesmen; why is it that the late Marquis of Salisbury described the American Senate as 'marvellous in efficiency and strength.' Talking about this bi-cameral system I might quote Lieber, a writer on economics, who says :

> Experience is in favour of having a measure discussed de novo by a different set of men with equal powers and combined upon a different basis; that this and the three readings with notice and leave of bringing in, have a wonderful effect in sifting, moderating, discovering and in enlightening the country.

—and he goes on to say that the different stages through which legislation passes make for good government and careful consideration of measures. I think it was Washington who referred to the House of representatives as : 'A cup into which the hot legislation was poured,' and to the United States Senate : 'As the saucer in which this legislation was permitted to cool off.' Now, coming down to the elective principle, it is certainly more democratic than the nominative. We have it in Belgium where 83 are elected by the people and 27 by the county councils ; in Denmark where fifty-four are elected for eight years and twelve nominated by the government ; in the Netherlands where fifty are elected by the Staats and in Sweden where they are elected by the county councils. Even in Canada we have had the elective system. It was tried in 1856. If you read 19-20 Victoria, chapter 140, you will find a provision for an elective Senate. That law was repealed. It would seem that it was unworkable ; at least the fact that it was abolished and that they went back to nomination by the Crown shows that it was not a success at that period. Lord Elgin—I quote from Goldwin Smith's work on 'Canada and the Canadian Question,' page 164—Lord Elgin expressed his belief that :

> A second legislative body returned by the same constituency as the House of Assembly, under some differences with respect to time and mode of election, would be a greater check on ill-considered legislation than the council as it was then constituted.

There is a high opinion in favour of an elective Senate. Goldwin Smith with reference to that says :

> This elective system does not seem to have been a success, the labour of canvassing extensive electoral divisions being found so oppressive that the best men decided not to come forward.

With reference to the question of life tenure, that has been already discussed, and discussed ably, by the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Schell), and I am in full accord with the position taken by him, that there should be a time limit, as there is a limit of age beyond which members are not as capable of working and acting as they are in younger years.

If senators are to be elected, in what way will the elections be carried on ? That seems to me to be a very important point. One suggestion is the referendum. That is a direct appeal to the people, and it is a sort of irony of fate that Switzerland, that country of a single chamber, has had to resort to the referendum as a check upon hasty legislation, and the question whether this Bill or that, shall become law is referred directly to the people. We have had experience of what might be called the referendum. We had a plebiscite on the liquor question submitted by this government in 1898, in which there was a comparatively small vote. Throughout Ontario at the recent municipal elections we have had what was practically a referendum—a reference to the people, not for a law, but of the application of a certain law to a particular place—whether this law should be applied to a particular locality or not. In 1874 the Hon. David Mills, a constitutional lawyer of very high standing, brought into the House of Commons a resolution in favour of having senators appointed by the provinces, and if I remember rightly, Sir Richard Cartwright also last year suggested election by the provinces. Now, if we are to have election by the provinces, I would favour the position taken by many of the states of the American Union. It has been found that the election of senators by the several states has not been a success; influences have been at work in the election of senators which have been anything but a credit to those states. What remedy has been applied by the several states? The 'Political Science Quarterly' of 1905, referring to Arkansas, says at page 583:

> The last state convention adopted a resolution that the candidate for the United States Senate receiving the highest number of votes in the primaries should be declared the choice of the Democratic party for the United States Senate by the state convention, just as they declare the nominees of the party for state offices, and of course the legislature has no duty depending upon them but to cast their votes for the person declared the successful candidate by the state convention. This is absolutely equivalent to election by the people.

Again, on page 584:

> The recent laws in Minnesota, Michigan, Indiana and Massachusetts provide machinery which may readily be adapted to the nomination of senators; while the new laws of Wisconsin and Illinois proceed directly to that goal.

Again, at page 591:

> In one form or another the legislatures of thirty-one states—more than the full two-thirds prescribed by the constitution have communicated to Congress their formal approval of a proposed change in the constitution: indeed, if the votes in the House be taken as a fair representation of the will of the people in their constituencies, only two states in the union have failed to give their endorsement.

Concluding, on pages 592 and 593:

> Everywhere the movement for the direct primary is gaining ground. How will this advance affect the movement for an amendment authorizing popular election of senators?

Then for better or worse democracy will take the election of senators into its own eager and strong but unskilled hands.

Another suggestion, which was referred to by the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Miller) this afternoon, is that of the Hon. James Young. As I understood Mr. Young's letter, which appeared in the Toronto 'Globe' a week or so ago, he suggested that the country be divided up into certain groups, and that senators be elected directly by the people in those groups. That suggestion is along the line of what is known as the abolition of the ward system, the object of which is to extend the boundaries of constituencies so as to make personal canvassing an impossibility and to prevent the improper influencing of the electorate. If that system were put into force, the history of the past might be repeated; for in 1856 and some years afterwards that system was in operation in Canada, and was found to be a failure, because the extent of ground to be covered in each constituency was so great that good men could not be found to undertake the task of running, because of the great cost of elections, and other objections. If there were a system adopted which would be partly nominative and partly elective, I would suggest that the universities of the country be given representation in the Senate. In Scotland, the university is an institution which has made for stability. The sons of the peasantry are admitted to it on an equality with the richest in the land and take their places in the pulpit, at the bar and in parliament. In that way the university forms a link between the masses and the ruling classes and makes for stability.

To recapitulate. If the Senate is maintained, as it is at present, then I think that there should be some change or changes calculated to increase its usefulness and its responsibility to the people. In other words it should be given some special work. Let it initiate private Bills, as has been suggested by Sir Richard Cartwright. Let it be given something to do, and I have no doubt it will make good, and become deserving of public respect instead of being the object of the disappointed feeling that exists in the country to-day. If it is to be elected by provinces, then I suggest that we should follow the example of the United States, and have a law of primaries by which there will be proper regulations for each primary there will be provided safeguards such as exist in the general elections—a fixed time for voting, officials to take the vote, and punishments for infringements of the primary law. If the Senate were partly nominative and partly elective, then a selection should be made from the universities of a certain number of senators. I shall not, Mr. Speaker, take up the time of the House any longer and must thank hon. members for the kind attention they have given to my few remarks.

Mr. J. W. DANIEL. In asking the attention of the House, Mr. Speaker, to the few words I have to say regarding the matter under discussion, I would like at the outset to compliment my hon. friends who have introduced the motions now before us. They all have shown by their speeches that they have taken a great deal of pains and used a great deal of industry and given the matter a great deal of thought. My hon. friend from Perth (Mr. McIntyre) said he expected that any hon. member of the opposition who would speak on this subject would not fail to refer to the Ottawa platform adopted by the Liberal party in 1893. I am much obliged to my hon. friend for the suggestion. Were it not for that suggestion, I do not know that I would have made any reference to that platform ; but since he has expected some such reference, I should be sorry to disappoint him. Under the circumstances, I cannot refrain from reminding the right hon. first minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that he and his party undertook in 1893, when they appealed to the people to elect them to power, to reform the Senate, and the reason they gave was that the Senate was then in such a condition that it imperatively demanded reform. That was the declared policy of the right hon. gentleman and his party at that time. Yet although they have been in power some ten or eleven years, no effort, up to the present, have they made to carry it into effect. Possibly the changes that have taken place in the membership of the Senate, since the right hon. gentleman has come into office, have brought about a change of heart in himself and his followers. Possibly the right hon. gentleman may think that the Senate has now become sufficiently reformed for all practical purposes. Well, Mr. Speaker, from my point of view, I think that the Senate is in greater need of reform to-day than it was in 1893, when these hon. gentlemen made their platform. However that may be, we have before us three propositions advanced by different members—three motions, all of them intended to deal with this subject. Each of these motions deals with it in a different manner, and the mover of each gives different reasons for the faith that is in him. We have the doctors differing both as to the disease and the treatment, and this of itself, I take it, makes it absolutely plain that the subject is not by any means a simple, but rather a complicated and difficult one to deal with. If we look over the various countries which enjoy representative government in any shape or form, we find that the very large majority are governed by parliaments consisting of two houses each. One cannot help concluding that there must be some very good reason, indeed, for that great unanimity we see displayed in this matter in the governments of the civilized world. For my part, I say freely that, both from a theoretical and a practical point of view, I believe in the principle of an upper and a lower house. I believe in it, not only for this federal parliament, but also for the provincial legislatures. I have before my mind at present the province of New Brunswick from which I come, and I have not the slightest hesitation in expressing my firm conviction that that province has suffered very much indeed from the abolition of its legislative council some few years ago. Legislation has passed that provincial legislature, which, in all probability, would never have been introduced into it, had there been an upper chamber to pass upon that legislation. Our local legislature has passed legislation, some of it ill-advised, some of it vicious, which would never have become law had there been two houses instead of one. Therefore I believe I have good reason for supporting the principle of two chambers in any system of representative government.

On looking over the various countries, we find a great variety of modes and methods in which their upper chambers are either elected or appointed ; but in every case, without exception, the members of the upper house are placed in such a position that they are given greater stability in their position, greater length of time of service, and are relieved to a great extent from the necessity of yielding to party necessities and influences of that kind, and are consequently removed further than the popular chamber from any pressure which would induce them to pass panicky legislation or yield to popular clamour or passion or impulse which, though temporary, might be very strong and very pernicious. They are thus considered to be a useful check on hasty or panicky legislation which might be passed by the more popular house, or the house which has to appeal more frequently to the people for its verdict and re-election. Therefore, I think that there is very good reason and very good place in the theory of responsible government for a second chamber. A comparison is often made between our Senate and that of the United States, very much to the laudation of the latter as against the former. But, in my opinion, the senates of the two countries cannot be compared in any shape or form. The whole system of government in the two countries is entirely different. The president of the United States is elected for four years and is not responsible to parliament. No legislative body in that country can interfere with him. No one can control him. The only method by which he can be interfered with is by impeachment. He appoints his own cabinet, and that cabinet is not responsible to any one but the president himself. It is not responsible to the people. Therefore the president and his cabinet are given very great powers indeed. It consequently became necessary to devise some constitutional check on those powers, and that check was found in the constitution of the Senate. I may say that the powers given the president appear to be greater indeed than those enjoyed by the monarch of England. In fact, it has been said that the King of England may be described as a hereditary president in a limited monarchy, whereas the president of the United States is really an elective monarch in a limited democracy.

Because I believe, as a matter of fact, the powers of the people are really less than under our own form of government—at all events it is more difficult for the people to get at their representatives who wield this power than it is for our people to get at theirs. In the Senate of the United States was found a check upon that which were it in England would be called the royal power. No treaty can be passed in the United States without the consent of two-thirds of the Senate. Officers who are impeached must be tried before the Senate. In the appointment of judges of the Supreme Court, ambassadors and various other high and important officials not otherwise provided for, the consent of the Senate is to be given to these appointments. So that when the attempt is made to show a similarity between the Senate of the United States and the Senate of Canada, we find that the differences in the systems of government and in the conditions make it quite impossible to find a basis of comparison. Our own Senate has very large powers. It has the power of veto—an immense power in itself. It has the power of amending any Bill except a money Bill. So, though these gentlemen of the Senate are easy-going at the present time, after all, if they chose to take the bit between their teeth, they could give a very pretty play to the people of this country. My hon. friend from South Grey (Mr. Miller) spoke of giving more power to the Senate. It seems to me that he could not very well give that body more power than it has already. For weal or for woe they have power enough.

Certain changes have been proposed in the method of selecting members of the Senate. One of these is that our senators should be chosen, like those of the United States, by the local legislatures. If we consider the history of elections to the United States Senate I think the majority of us will not be likely to favour following the method of that country. In fact, the method has been proven so unsatisfactory that I think a majority of the states of the union, at all events more than thirty of them have made petition to Congress to change the method of election, they have had notable deadlocks in these elections. On one occasion, in the state of Deleware, the legislature took 217 ballots in which it spent 114 days, and still there was no election. The legislature of California cast 104 ballots on which it spent 67 days, and still no election. The legislature of Pennsylvania cast 97 ballots and spent 92 days, and still no election. In view of the facts, I, for one, would hardly care to advocate such a system. It has been said also that the Senate of the United States elected by this method has become simply a millionaires' club. A new gospel has been preached in the United States to the effect that it is harder for a poor man to get into the United States Senate than it is for a rich man to enter the Kingdom of Heaven. And I think there is probably a good deal of truth in it, or surely not so much would be said all over that country to the effect that wealthy men and the representatives of great corporations and trusts have made a point of getting into the Senate and using the Senate for their own purposes. At the same time, nobody can deny that the United States Senate is one of the most powerful legislative bodies in the world today, and that it has given, and is giving, an example of great debating ability and other qualities for which we look in a legislature of high degree. As to wealth, I see no reason why wealth should be a bar to appointment to the Senate. I would rather see a man of wealth appointed to the Senate than see a man appointed to the Senate in order that he may get wealth. I think that is a point that we may well take into consideration. At the same time I do not think that wealth alone should be represented. All the varied interests of the country might find worthy representatives in the Senate if the senators were properly chosen. There is another important reason why we should not have our senators chosen by the local legislatures. That reason is that such a system would give the Dominion government, whichever party happened to be in power, not merely another excuse, but another reason, and a very good reason, for interfering in provincial affairs. I think that our federal governments have interfered in provincial affairs probably more than is good for the country. I believe that the country generally gets better government when the local legislatures are in different hands from the federal government.

Another proposal made is the election of senators by the people. That, as every one knows who has run elections, would be an expensive process. While it is expensive to run an election in an ordinary constituency such as those which send representatives to this House, it would be immensely more expensive to run an election as senator in a constituency which might be a whole province. How many men would you find in this country who, for the sake of a seat in the Senate, would run an election in such a constituency? Only an extremely wealthy individual could undertake it. Or, if the place were not sought by men of wealth the contest would simply come down to the provincial party organizations putting up their several nominees. While that might not be the best plan of getting into the Senate able men who were best fitted to grace that body, I believe we would not have a better chance of getting good men than we have under the present mode of appointment. By nomination you can obtain men eminent in the various walks of life; but who would not for a moment think of attempting to run an election, and the probability is that even if they did they would de defeated. Still those men would be so highly esteemed for their character, and so eminent in their own communities, that their entry to the Senate would raise that body greatly in the estimation of the Canadian people. But you can never get men of that character by popular election, however desirable it is to obtain such men for the Senate.

There is no doubt at the present time in this country a good deal of discontent with the constitution of the Senate. In fact this is so well understood that the senators themselves I think would be glad to make a change in the direction of making that body more acceptable to the country at large. This discontent may be described as smouldering at present, but it may break out in the form of a popular agitation and become a burning question, and we all know that when the people get excited on any subject they are apt to go at too great lengths, and if they were to get excited against the Senate they would not be satisfied with simply mending it but would go to the length of ending it. Therefore I think it wise that we should preclude any such dangerous agitation by taking means at present to reform the constitution of the Senate and make it more acceptable.

The question of the abolition of the Senate has been brought up, and I agree with those who take the view that it is impossible to abolish it under the pact of Confederation. That is considered a sacred pact by the different provinces. Some of the smaller provinces indeed look upon the Senate as their only safeguard. Take the little province of Prince Edward Island. They were given four members in the Senate at confederation, and at that time I think six members in the House of Commons. Now they have four members in the House of Commons, and still retain their four members in the Senate. But as time goes on, as the province of Quebec gets more populous and as the unit of representation rises higher, the time may come when the representation of Prince Edward Island will be curtailed to such an extent that it is conceivable that it will disappear altogether. Therefore we can well imagine how strongly the people of Prince Edward Island would cling to the Senate as affording them representation, at least in one of the legislative bodies of parliament which could never be wiped away.

Then a referendum has been suggested to settle this question. Of course a referendum to abolish the Senate could only be adopted after the various provinces had consented to such a referendum. But it always appeared to me that a referendum was merely an attempt to shift responsibility from the representatives of the people to the people themselves. I have always held that the people sent their representatives here to legislate for them, to do the best they could in the public interest, and I do not accept the idea that whenever a somewhat difficult question comes up we ought to send it back to the people for their decision in any other manner than that already provided for by the election of representatives at stated intervals. But I think a time limit to the appointment of senators would be a popular move with the people; and possibly an age limit, although with regard to the latter point I feel more diffident about expressing an opinion. We know that some men are young at 70 and 80 years of age, and I think I am not exaggerating when I say that perhaps the ablest men of the present Senate are among the very oldest men in the Senate; I think there is no doubt of that. So I would be more careful about establishing an age limit. But I think that a time limit would appeal to the genius of our people, and would go a great way to satisfy them, and to remove some of the popular objections which certainly now exists against that body as at present constituted.

Again, the Senate has been accused of lethargy, and this has been attributed to the advanced years of so many of the Senators. But I do not think the lethargy of the Senate is attributable to any such cause; I think it is rather owing to the fact that there is so large a majority on one side of politics, and this has a tendency to discourage any activity and healthy rivalry between the two parties. The majority is in touch with the government of the day, and are satisfied to let things go just as they come from the House of Commons. I think it would put more vigour into the political discussions in the Senate if the two parties were more equal in numbers; if they were equal or approximately so, I am sure that the charge of lethargy now aimed against the Senate would no longer hold.

The Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) when he was in opposition had the idea that the proper way to appoint senators was from both sides of politics, so as to have the numbers in that body nearly balanced as to politics. There would then be a healthy rivalry and emulation in that body which does not now exist. Sir, I think that the government is responsible for the Senate. It has been urged against the Senate that they are an irresponsible body. They may be personally irresponsible, but I say that the government of the day is responsible for them. The government appoints them, the government is responsible to the people, and the government has this matter entirely in its own hands. Without any great constitutional amendment if the Prime Minister carried out in practice while in power the views which his party held while in opposition, when endeavouring to get into power, I do not think there would be discontent with the Senate. I think they would be more active and take a greater interest and have the confidence of the people to a very much greater extent than they now have.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). Mr. Speaker, I have expressed my regret, a regret which I know will be shared by the House as a whole, that such a small proportion of the members of this House have taken part in this debate and given us the benefit of their views. On the other hand the House is to be congratulated on the character of this debate; it has been judicial in tone, high and elevated in purpose and expression, and I am sure I will voice the sentiments of members on both sides of the House when I offer my hearty congratulations to my hon. friend from South Perth (Mr. G. H. McIntyre) for the manner in which he has introduced this subject to the attention of this body. His speech was judicious, elevated, eloquent and I may say that the tone he has started has been well kept up by all those who have participated in the debate. With reference to an observation made by my hon. friend who moved this resolution and which has been taken up also by my friend from the City of St. John (Mr. Daniel) it is a matter of history that the Liberal party for many years past, even I may say from the very outset of confederation, has held the opinion that the constitution of the Senate, such as it is provided for by the British North America Act, has been and is defective. The Conservative party were not of that opinion; but if I am to take up the last expression of their views in this matter as we have it from the leader of the party himself (Mr. R. L. Borden) in his speech delivered at Halifax, they have also come to the conclusion which we have harboured for many years, that the constitution of the Senate ought to be amended, that it is not satisfactory. Upon this point I do not believe there could be any two sets of views. But the difficulty is not in pointing out the defect, the difficulty is in suggesting a remedy. The Liberal party have been in office for twelve years and I say very candidly that up to that time we have not found a remedy which in our judgment would be adequate to the infirmity which we saw and denounced, and if the speeches which have been delivered by members of the opposition from the leader (Mr. R. L. Borden) to those of his followers who have expressed their views on this question, I have never found any concrete opinion as to what particular reform ought to be adopted. Change we may make at any time; but change does not always mean improvement and alteration is not always reform. If we are to move in this direction we would have to move very carefully in order to find out the remedy for an evil which we are all agreed in seeing. I have not at the moment to offer to the House any concrete and deliberate opinion of my own, any conviction which I have reached and would be prepared to offer to this House; but it seems to me that there are certain directions in which it is possible even at this moment, to offer some solution to an evil which they all agree exists.

In my humble judgment if any reform of the Senate is to be made,—and I think it ought to be attempted—the first reform that ought to be attempted should be in the line of reducing the number of senators. The present number seems to me altogether too large, but I shall come to that later on. Before coming to that, as no remedy has been suggested—I ought to make an exception in favour of the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Miller), who has offered a remedy and a very radical one, the complete abolition of the Senate, of the second chamber,—I must say to my hon. friend it seems to me that in view of the experience of the world and in view of our particular constitution the remedy suggested is altogether too drastic. So far as my information goes, of all the countries which have been blessed with representative institutions, I do not know one which ever had an unique chamber. An attempt has been made in some countries, but after being tried it has never been found to work and each and every country has had to return to another, a second chamber. Take for instance, France; after the abolition of the monarchy France attempted to be moved by only one body, the Convention, but the experiment did not last, and although France has attempted since that time many different constitutions, in every one we get the principle of double representation in legislative bodies. We have more reasons yet to adhere to a second chamber, on account of our federated system. The second chamber has been introduced in our constitution for the protection of the minorities. My hon. friend said this afternoon that he did not see what protection could be given to the smaller provinces in the second chamber. The protection is to be found in the fact that in the popular body, in the House in which we now sit the representation is based upon population, but in the upper chamber the principle has been adopted of equality of representation. That is the principle which ought to guide us, it seems to me, and this is the reason why I said a moment ago that the first reform which ought to be made, in my humble opinion, ought to be made in the way of limiting the number of senators. When our constitution was enacted, when confederation was framed, forty-seven years ago, the principle was adopted of having the Senate appointed from groups. Three groups were made, one from the province of Ontario, one from the province of Quebec and one from the three maritime provinces, and to each one of these groups twenty-four senators were assigned, twenty-four for Ontario, twenty-four for Quebec, and twenty-four for the maritime provinces. This principle was adopted from the American constitution. In many respects the American constitution is not equal to ours, but in one respect I think it is superior to ours ; in the constitution of the Senate it seems to me certainly superior. In the American Congress the House of representatives is elected on the principle of representation. The State of New York sends thirty-six members to the House of representatives whereas according to population, the State of Rhode Island sends only two.

In the United States Senate, the state of New York has two members and the state of Rhode Island has also two members, so that while in the House of representatives each state speaks according to the numerical strength of its population, in the Senate each state has an equal voice. The representation of the state of New York is eighteen times stronger in the House of representatives than is the representation of the state of Rhode Island, but in the Senate the state of New York has no more power than has Rhode Island, small as it is. Under the American constitution, while the states are represented in the lower House according to their population, in the Senate each is on a footing of equality. That principle was adopted to some extent in Canada, but it was adopted in a very imperfect manner.

The first reform I would suggest would be that we should come to the principle of equal representation of the provinces in our Senate, so that each province should be represented by a limited and equal number. At present we have about eighty senators ; the province of Ontario is represented by 24 senators, the province of Quebec by 24, the province of Prince Edward by 4, the province of Nova Scotia by 10, the province of New Brunswick by 10, the province of Manitoba by 4, the province of Alberta by 4, the province of British Columbia by 3. If I had to offer a reform it would be that all these provinces should be represented on the floor of the Senate by an equal number of senators. There are nine provinces, and if each province were represented by, let us say 6 senators, that would give us a Senate of 54 members which would be a pretty strong body, a body sufficiently large and not cumbersome. Our position geographically is such that it is not probable we shall ever constitute any more new provinces. The climate of the remaining territories is such that it is not possible to conceive we could make any new provinces out of these areas, and in course of time possibly all these territories will be given to the existing provinces to administer. If therefore we were to have six members for each of the nine provinces, that would give us a body of 54, and in that body so constituted the great provinces of Ontario and Quebec would have no more power than the small province of New Brunswick. But, it may be said, if we were to adopt that principle we would have the anomaly that the province of Prince Edward Island might be represented in the Senate by a larger number than it had members on the floor of the Commons. That is quite true, but to me there would be no insuperable objection in such a proposal. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Daniel) has alluded to the fact that the maritime provinces have had decade after decade the number of their representation in this House reduced until now, New Brunswick has only 13 members, Nova Scotia, 18, and Prince Edward Island only 4. And the hon. gentleman says that the fear is entertained in these provinces that if the province of Quebec, which is the pivotal province as regards representation, continues to increase in population as rapidly as heretofore, the representation of the provinces by the sea will be still further decreased. Well, we have to stand by principle, and the principle adopted at confederation was representation by population in this House of Commons, and if the principle of representation by population in this chamber is to be maintained we must take the good with the bad. The province of Ontario has lost a certain number of members in the last decade, and she has lost them without any murmur. The province of New Brunswick has lost one member, and the province of Nova Scotia has lost two members. The representation of these provinces in the House of Commons may be still further reduced although I do not think it will. But, suppose such should happen. then, if the idea which I am now advancing were carried into effect the representation of these provinces in the Senate would always remain the same, they would have nothing to fear in that direction, and the voice of one province would carry the same potentiality in the Senate as did the voice of any other province. I would like to ask the House to consider this proposition : That the number of senators ought to be limited to a fixed number, and that each province should be represented in the Senate by an equal number of senators. I mentioned six, but that is arbitrary ; it may be 5 or it may be 7, or it may be 8, or it may be 10; I do not care which for the present moment. But what I would insist on is that each province should be represented by an equal number of senators, that each province should stand in the Senate on the same footing, and that each province whether it be big or small should have a voice in the legislation, not according to the numerical strength of its population but according to its provincial entity. This would be the first proposal which I would submit to the House, but there is another.

At the present time senators are appointed for life. For my part I think that principle is wrong. I believe that senators should be appointed for a limited term. I care not whether it be for 10 years, or 12 years, or 15 years—it ought to be for a pretty long term—but I think senators ought to be appointed for a limited term. In the United States they are elected for six years, and experience has shown that men of very great ability and eminence have been re-elected term after term ; the late Senator Morrell represented Vermont for 25 years and Daniel Webster represented Massachusetts for almost as long a period. So, if we had men of eminence appointed to the Senate they could be reappointed after their term had expired. It seems to me that in order to preserve the independence of the Senate, in order to ensure that its usefulness and its vigour be maintained, it is preferable that the number of years for which a senator is appointed should be limited. I am sorry to say that at the present time it would seem as if the members of the Senate were looked upon as pensioners of the state. It should not be so, but it must be so if they are to be appointed for life. It was said by my hon. friend (Mr. Daniel) that the Senate is looked upon as an irresponsible body because of the character of the appointments which are made to it. While it is true that the Senate may be looked upon as an irresponsible body, it is equallly true that it is not because of the character of the appointments which are made, or of the manner in which these appointments are made, but it is because of the constitution of the Senate itself and which in my humble judgment is the weakest point of all. The British constitution provides for government by a limited power. There is no absolute power under the British system. The King is not absolute, the Lords are not absolute, the Commons are not absolute. The Crown is not absolute because the Commons can refuse supplies. The Commons are not absolute because the Commons can be dissolved. The Lords are not absolute because the Lords can have their membership increased, and thereby their power can be destroyed. I think it was my hon. friend from Perth (Mr. McIntyre) who cited the instance of the Reform Bill in 1832 when the Lords were induced to agree to the Bill because of the threat which was made to appoint a sufficient number of peers to overcome opposition, and to which the King had acceded. But if under our present constitution in Canada there was a dead-lock between the House of Commons and the Senate, nothing short of a revolution could solve the difficulty. For instance if the Senate were to oppose the Supply Bill, no constitutional remedy within our grasp could bring the Senate to a different view. They are limited in number, their number being fixed by law; therefore we could not increase it. So that we have in the constitution absolutely no remedy in that respect. This in my humble judgment is the weakest point in the constitution of the Senate. How that is to be remedied is another matter, as to which at this moment I have no suggestion to offer.

Perhaps I may say a word as to the manner of composing the Senate. At present the senators are appointed by the government of the day. I do not know that it is the best mode of selection. For my part, speaking in all candour. I wish as head of the government that we had not this power ; but it is in our hands, and we have to do the best we can, and to make the best appointments we can. But, Sir, what have we to put in place of this method of appointing senators? Some one has suggested popular election. To have senators appointed by popular election would be to go back to the system which prevailed in the old provinces of Canada in 1855 or 1856, when members of the upper house were elected by groups of counties—three or four counties at most forming a group. It was a moot question whether that system was good or bad. I think on the whole it worked fairly well. But I think we would not relish the idea of having more elections than we have now, and I do not know that this would be the best mode of appointing senators.

Then it has been suggested that we might adopt the American system of having the senators elected by the legislatures. At one time, I am frank to say, I thought a good deal of that system. There is no doubt that in the early days of the republic, up to the time of the civil war, the American Senate was one of the ablest bodies that ever sat as a legislature. Since the civil war, the Senate of the United States, while a very able body, does not in the minds of the American people occupy the position it formerly did, for character, prestige and ability. Somehow or other the impression has gone abroad that it has become an assemblage of plutocrats. I do not think that this reproach is altogether well deserved. There may be some truth in it, so far as the western states are concerned, but in the New England States the senators elected from Massachusetts, Maine, New Hampshire and Connecticut—have been men of very high order. At the same time, the American people, if I can judge aright from their press, are not in favour of the present mode of electing senators, and there is some talk of having them elected like the members of Congress.

Under these circumstances, perhaps it would not be advisable for us to adopt the system that has been found so unsatisfactory by our neighbours.

Then, what is to be done. The suggestion has been made, and it has perhaps some merit in it, that members of the Senate might be appointed by this House, in groups of three, each member of the House having only one vote, so that the opposition, by concentrating its vote on one, would always be sure to elect one of its own choice. There is a good deal to commend this view to one who looks at this matter impartially, though I am not sure that such a system would maintain the principle of provincial representation, which after all is essential in our federation system.

I am not prepared at this moment to suggest any final or definite system, except this, that we should adopt the principle of equal representation for all the provinces, and thus reduce the numbers of the Senate. Beyond this and the suggestion that the appointment should not be for life, but for a limited period, I would not be prepared to go.

But I think I should not sit down without offering a word of comment as to the manner in which senators are appointed. My hon. friend stated a moment ago that when I was in opposition I expressed the opinion that senators should be appointed by both parties. I do not know whether I ever expressed such an opinion. I said many things when in opposition which I may have forgotten. It is twelve years or more since I have been in opposition, and therefore my memory may perhaps be clouded on this point. At all events, I thought it would be fair that both parties should be represented in the Senate. When it comes to the appointment of senators, it is a difficult matter. With all the good will I have, if I were to advise His Excellency to take a man from the opposition side, I do not know that my action would be well received. My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Daniel) would hardly expect me to submit to His Excellency the name of a man who represented us to be everything that was bad, who had nothing good to say of us, who declared that we were corrupt and wicked and guilty of all the sins in the calendar. That would be, I think, more than Christian charity could be expected to endure. For example, I could not be expected to advise His Excellency to appoint the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster). Even if I were to offer to His Excellency the name of one of the lukewarm Conservatives, who is not very strong on one side or the other, perhaps gentlemen on the other side would be the very first to find fault with such an appointment. Therefore on the whole I believe these appointments have to be made as all of them are made. When we come to select men who we think are worthy of representing the country in the Senate, after all, the standard of merit which we are accustomed to apply under parliamentary government it is very difficult to depart from. Sir John Macdonald in his day had many appointments to the Senate to make, many more than I have had. He appointed one gentleman from the Liberal side; but this gentleman was a personal friend of his and one who on a particular occasion had stood by him in very trying circumstances. I am sorry to say that I have not yet found in the ranks of the Conservative party a man of such independent views as John Macdonald was in the ranks of the Liberal party. With all the diligence with which I have scanned the other side, I have not been able to find such a man. For this reason we have had to advise His Excellency to appoint men from our own ranks, and I am glad to say that the appointments made have generally been acceptable. Even though we have the power of appointment in our hands, for my part I hold the same view that I had when in opposition, that the Senate ought to be reformed; but I am sorry to say that up to the present time I have not been able to satisfy myself what would be the best and most adequate reform. I am still open to conviction, I would like to have more views expressed on this question and further suggestions made, and for this reason I hope that this debate will not be concluded this evening. Therefore I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. GEO. E. FOSTER (North Toronto). Before this debate is adjourned, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words. I have no hesitation in complimenting my hon. friend who moved the first resolution (Mr. McIntyre) on the speech in which he supported his motion. He has been complimented generally all around, and I would add my tribute, if he has no objection to take it, for the very moderate tone in which his remarks were couched and which gave evidence of much thought and care on the subject. With many of his statements I agree heartily. Some of the positions he took probably would find differences of opinion, as differences of opinion have been manifested by all the speakers. In fact we have had no very strong lines of agreement except in regard to one thing which I shall mention later. But my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who has just spoken, said, in one of his first declarations, that he had always thought, that the Liberal party had always thought that the constitution of the Senate was defective. I suppose what he meant was that it was based upon an improper principle. He also said that he was of the opinion that in the earlier days of confederation, the Liberal-Conservative party was not of that opinion, but that at present it had come to the conclusion that there was something wrong with the Senate, but whether that be in its constitution or composition or in the methods of appointment, my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) did not say. So far as I am concerned, I do not know that I would quarrel so much with the constitution of the Senate as with the methods of appointment. If the appointments to the Senate, and therefore its composition, had been carefully, loftily, honestly and in a proper spirit attended to, from the very inception of confederation up to the present, and if, as a consequence, the Senate had maintained its character and its influence, I am of the opinion that there would have been very few expressions to-day in this country of dissatisfaction with that body. The reason why people have come to canvass the matter and to express discontent with the present condition of the Senate is not on constitutional grounds at all. The question that presents itself to the public mind is whether the Senate is doing the work it ought to do, whether it is composed as it should be, and whether, in the last analysis, it is worth what it costs. The idea then that I have strongly imbued in my mind is that the discontent in any part of the country with the Senate to-day is not because of its constitution, but because of the manner and the quality of the appointments to that body. I am not going to make this a party question. I think that the discussion has been instructive so far, and it has been instructive because it has not been largely conducted on party lines. And although the temptation is great to say something with reference to the peculiar way in which my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has made some of his appointments, I do not propose to deal with that part of the question to-night. There will be other opportunities to do this. What I propose to do is to compare the different views advanced in this discussion, and I think that the expression of these views will be of some good to the country. But what I want particularly to emphasize is the fact that the chief objection is not to the constitution of the Senate but rather to the way in which appointments have been made, and the evident purpose for which the power of appointment has been used. It is that which has caused dissatisfaction. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) says that he and his party have objections to the Senate. They believe that it was not properly constituted. They made that their canvass before the country. They held that opinion before they came into office, and so far as I can understand, they hold it still. Well, how long is my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) going to hold that opinion and do nothing? It is up to him to move. He is the leader of the government. If there is anything to be done in order to reform or re-constitute the Senate or put it on a better basis, it is for him to take the initiative and do it. That necessity was important enough before 1896, is it less important now? It was important enough then to be made a plank in the party platform. Has it lost its importance since, and is it of no importance to-day? Ten years is a fairly long span of political life for a government. How long does my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) suppose he is going to remain in office? If he intends before going out to carry out his pledge to reform the Senate and put it on a proper basis, he is playing with time and chance. He may get a very sudden and unpleasant surprise one of these days. He may find himself one of these days on the outside instead of the inside, and then he will be haunted by the fearful thought throughout the remainder of his political career that he wasted some ten or eleven years doing nothing, that he procrastinated during all these years doing what he and his party pledged themselves to do, and that he is no longer in a position to perform what he deemed so essential for the good of the country. I would not like to see my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) suffering from so keen a remorse, and therefore advise him to lose no time in doing something besides giving utterance to nebulous and general opinions? He acknowledges that the system is bad, that the results are not good, and if he has any regard for its former pledge, it seems to me that it is the bounden duty of the right hon. gentleman and his government to propose a remedy and not satisfy themselves with merely discussing the question in an academical manner as he has done to-night. He held a very strong conviction on this subject fifteen years ago—a conviction so strong that he embodied it in a public platform, and it surely is now his duty to propose some plan based upon that conviction and consummate a reform which he and his party declared was absolutely necessary.

My right hon. friend says that he has not heard of any remedy proposed. A great many remedies have been proposed in the course of the general discussion. Remedies have been proposed this afternoon. But amongst them all my right hon. friend does not seem to choose. How long, I ask again, is he going to wait? Who, I ask again, is to propose a remedy? Is he to do nothing until, in some strange and mysterious way in the formative processes of the country, a remedy comes up readymade? It seems to me that a cabinet of all the talents ought to provide a remedy, which is demanded according to my right hon. friend's platform and his own pronouncements and contentions made many years ago and often and often since.

I do not agree that the main thing that the Senate was organized for as a part of this country's machinery of government was simply the protection of minorities. That narrows it to a basis upon which, I believe, no great legislative body can be founded. That is an incident of the formation of our Senate, but it is not the motive of the establishment of the second chamber. The second chamber was deemed to be necessary to protect the rights of the different provinces, but not this alone. When it was thought to be necessary to have a bi-cameral institution here, with the Senate a part of it, it was considered to be part of the office of the Senate to protect the minorities, and in the composition of it, it was so guided that it did become a protection to the different provinces as regards their minorities. But the moment you put all the stress upon this point, you make the basis so small that no broad body can be founded upon it. Too much stress has been laid on this as the province of the Senate. The idea of a Senate is broader and higher and stronger than that. The idea is that it shall be a check on the popular body. But not merely that either. Above all, it is supposed to be the repository of the mature wisdom of the country. To this end, that wisdom must somehow or other be placed in the Senate and the body set a little aside from the impetuous currents, it may be the not-too-well directed currents, of popular opinion. It is supposed that in a serener and calmer atmosphere than that of the popular body, men can be more responsive to the true interests of the country than can the popular representatives who sit in this House. This is the conception of the second chamber in every great country that has the bi-cameral system; that is the ideal worked out as circumstances will permit. The object is to have a House in which calmness, sobriety of judgment and mature wisdom are the great characteristics. My right hon. friend may talk as he likes about the Senate being an irresponsible body. The Senate is an absolutely irresponsible body when it is the creation of one man, I care not who that man may be. It may be a most responsible body though not elected by popular vote. When it is representative of the great commercial interest, the great educational interest, the great agricultural interest and other interests of the country and when you have men appointed each of whom feels that his duty to his country lies in placing at the service of the country his own particular excellence the second chamber will legislate more with a view to its responsibility to the people at large and the duty it owes to them than will the chamber made up of those who have to look for the popular support, who have to trim to a certain extent in order to keep even with the thought of their constituencies and who are haunted continually with the fear of going back to engage in the turmoil of a heated election in which they must meet all kinds of opposing currents. A body composed as a Senate should be is in a better position to do high and wise legislation for the country than is even the popular body. This is one of the reasons why I would like to see such a body in this country, and hope that the time may never come when we should not have a body as near like this as possible. But if the senators are for the protection of the rights of the minority in different provinces, how careful the appointer of those senators ought to be that every senator is a genuine representative of the province from which he is supposed to come. If that be so, is my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) altogether without offence in this respect? He shaved very closely if he did not actually infringe upon that which seems to him the fundamental reasons for the appointment of senators—that they should guard the minority rights of the provinces—when, but a year or two ago, he appointed two senators who, though they may have the province as their birthplace, are certainly not so closely identified with it by residence or business as to make them come quite up to the spirit of his own statement. Now, the right hon. gentleman says he thinks that the number of senators is too large. I agree with him entirely in that. The Senate is a very expensive body as is also the House of Commons. And when we say of the Senate or of the House that it is expensive, we are not using an unfair argument, because the matter of dollars and cents must be taken into due account and in the general business of the country it is wise that as little as possible of the people's money be spent in machinery of government, consistent with making that government efficient. Now, I believe that two things would be gained by having a smaller Senate. In the first place, you would spend less money in the machinery of government and so have more money to devote to development, and you would have a more effective legislative and revising body than you otherwise could have. I am entirely in favour of a Senate smaller in number by something like about one-half our Senate to-day. I believe it would be far better, and would make us a better chamber than the one which we now have. However, I do not find very much reason given by my right hon. friend for his mechanical distribution of senators. Now suppose we were to have a certain number of senators from each province—all the provinces equal in this respect. The older provinces would scarcely be satisfied with a smaller number than ten or twelve senators each.

When you come to the fixed, arbitrary number, the pressure would be great to get as large a number as possible. There might be strong hands and strong thoughts which would keep that down to the smallest possible; but the chances are that you would not get off with less than eight or ten to each province. Now what reason is there why a small province should have ten senators and four members? No one has a more appreciative idea of the worth and value of our little sister down by the sea, the province of Prince Edward Island, than myself; but it would seem something like overloading the business if that province sent up ten senators above here and four members below here. The pyramid would seem to be inverted, it is only a mechanical subterfuge. What was the reason of my right hon. friend? By what reasoning would he support simply a mechanical distribution? I doubt very much indeed, if the United States were re-making their constitution now, they would give little Rhode Island two senators and big New York only two senators. I know that is a grievance which is much discussed in the United States. It did not amount to a disparity of a glaring character at the time the constitution was made, with their small number of states grouped in the east, and about all equal in their populations and in their influence. But the inequality is glaring to-day when, with forty or fifty states, they find two senators in each, without any reference to the greatness, size or population of the different states represented. Any way, I listened in vain to find any reason upon which this remarkable mechanical division could be made. The only reason given was that it would help out the feeling of a province which had a small representation in the House by giving a great representation in the Senate. But I doubt whether that is good reason. However, my right hon. friend has given that as a suggestion, and as such it is necessary to think it over.

I am also in favour of limiting the period of service. It seemed to be raised as an objection by some speakers this afternoon that the state legislatures practically kept old senators in. Yes, and that might be for the very best of reasons. But they always have a recurring choice, the man is not there for life, and he does not feel that he never is again to go before the elective or the appointive body, and with certain classes of men—it would not be so with all men—the fact that they are never to be called to a day of judgment has, well, not a very restrictive force upon them as to what they may do, or how they may do it. A good deal of reason for the inactivity of a body constituted for life may be that there is no thought of their coming face to face with the people whom they serve, of ending their service except death bring it to an end. I would have not more than two terms or three terms of parliament for the life of a senator. Twelve years or ten years is arbitrary, and might not fall in well with the plan of election of senators. But two terms of parliament would be long enough I think for the life of those who are in the Senate. If the appointment remains even as it is, the vicious, bad system of appointment that we have had and still have in this country for senators, if it remains as it is, it would yet give men outside the chance to breathe when they see an improper appointment made to the Senate, for they would be able to say. Well, thank God, he can only sit there for seven or eight years, then there will be a chance for another choice. So I am in favour, as my right hon. friend and most others I think who have discussed the question, of a limited term.

Much has been said about an irresponsible body. Well responsibility is of various kinds. A member of parliament is a responsible party, because he has been elected and has to go back to the people who elected him. That is one of the elements of responsibility. But I will venture to say no one will contradict me when I state that the best member of parliament is always the man, not who is thinking he has to go back to meet his constituents in four years, but the man who is thinking what are the duties that he undertook when he came here, how he is fulfilling those duties, what are the things the country demands of him, and how can he best fulfil those demands. That, to my mind, is the highest guarantee of responsibility, and you can have that high responsibility in the Senate, even in an appointive Senate, provided the appointment is a proper one. I do not see much force then in that question of responsibility or irresponsibility.

But how do they get there—that is the question. My right hon. friend mentioned several methods, dissenting not very strongly from any, approving of none. After ten or fifteen years he knows no more than any of the rest of us. Well, there is one thing that I do not like. Turn it over from the boss of this parliament to the boss in the local legislature, and still you have the appointments of a boss. In these days when the caucus rules and parliament amounts to little, it is the man at the head who makes the appointment, it is the man at the head who is the appointing power, and who puts the man in the Senate, and the man in the Senate is his creature, to a certain extent, because the other man is the absolute creator. What good would it do in the way of improvement to transfer the appointing power from the head of the House of Commons to the head of a legislature of one of the provinces? It would still be in practice, a one man appointment, and it is the one man appointment that I object to, unless the appointing man is absolutely wise and foreseeing, as a man of that kind ought to be.

But my hon. friend has simply given his whole case away in the two or three sentences with which he closed. I was sorry to see my right hon. friend make that closing. He is simply treating as trivial an immensely important question, as this country understands it, and as this country will make the men who sit here understand it, if not now, before many years—treating an immensely important question as a man would jolly a set of boon companions. He evacuated his high position, he burlesqued the whole question, he acnowledged the whole vicious weakness of the system, when he said, Yes, my views were good once, straight views, honest views, right views; but when the position changed the principle changed. When I saw my opponent making appointments I said to myself: The appointive system is bad, very bad, it is vicious, very vicious; but when the opportunity came to me and I had to make the appointments, I could not see it in that light. That is the cardinal defect of my right hon. friend. Not only in this matter but in other matters where he has made his public pledges and apparently meant to carry them out; when he got where he had the power to carry them out and felt the claws of party tugging at him in the opposite direction he failed to carry out the right ideas with which he started and the right pledges which he made.

And so to-night, in his few closing sentences, he simply made light of the whole question and excused himself from a great national duty by the persiflage of abdicating a position where he knew what was right, he always maintained it when others had the responsibility, but when the responsibility was put upon himself, although he knew what was right, he did not do it and how could he when the party was tugging at his coat tails ? I say that is not a position I should have advised my right hon. friend to have taken. Who should appoint them ? I say I am opposed to one man power appointment, and the confession, the rather humilating confession of my hon. friend here to-night, confirms me in my opinion. I would fear even if my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) got into power and became the leader of the government that if he had not more backbone and strength than my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) we might hear him saying in this House : I knew what was right, I believed it, I advocated it, I pledged it ; but now I am in office, shall I carry it out or not ? It weakens your faith in the possibility of such a thing being done. I believe myself that my hon. friend would carry out what he to-day believes to be right, and if he pledged it to the people would see that it was done ; but it brings a great quaver into my heart, it sends a tremor of dread through my mind, when the right hon. gentleman who stood so sturdily for the principle of right and advocated it for eighteen years, succumbed, according to the confession he made to-night, simply because he felt he could not stand the party pressure, could not do as he wanted to do. One man power then is a pretty slight reed on which to rely. If it is not to be one man power appointment what is it to be ? Where can we place an appointive power that will be just, that will be always measuring up what is best for the country, not what is best for one party ? That is where the cardinal defect comes in. I venture to say my right hon. friend has not made an appointment to the Senate by simply going into his closet, shutting himself up, taking into account the interests of this country, the best service that could be given to the country, and then, apart altogether from the clacquers or the followers, the men who wanted changes, men who should have been satisfied with the position given them by the people, deliberately, strongly, honestly sought for the best man outside of petty party considerations, and put that man into the Senate. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) did not do it ; I am not going to say that others who preceded him did it ; but until we have some fair ground for believing that some time a man will arise who will do that, so long I shall have my fears with reference to the appointment of a second chamber by one man, the leader of a party and the instrument of a caucus, for such it has come largely to be at this time.

My hon. friend has made the suggestion, the legislatures. This would amount to about the same thing as one man power. But my hon. friend has a brand new idea and this is really a contribution to the discussion. He rather looks favourably upon this House, this exceedingly calm-minded and non-partisan House, this House composed of men who never think of the exigencies of party, but are always fixing their minds upon the good of their country, and suggests that they shall settle themselves down into a judicial frame of mind some day and elect or appoint the senators. That would be adding another story to the House sure enough. But I think we have about all we can manage now, and to have interjected into all the opportunities for party manœuvring and party management, the struggle for the inmates of the other House, would be the last straw that would break the camel's back, would be the load above which would probably crush the institution below. I do not see how we could ever manage that.

Where in the last analysis will you go? Are you a true democrat or are you not? Does our government rest upon and take its origin from the will of the people or does it not ? It seems to me that in the last analysis you have to cut the Gordian knot of how you will make appointments to the Senate by relying on the good sense, the good temper and good judgment of the people for whom governments are made and who make governments—and I am not afraid to trust them. I would have different constituencies, I would have the term absolute, I would have recurring or transfusing parts of the Senate so that the current would be flowing in fresh from the country every six years or thereabouts, so that the Senate would be in fair touch with the great lines of public opinion; and then I would leave it to the people to say who the senators should be. They would make mistakes but could they make such mistakes as have been made? I will venture to say the people would not make a translation of a member from the Commons into the Senate; they would fill vacancies when they occurred, but would not make vacancies for the sheer joy and delight of filling them and if you make your constituencies broad enough and give this into the hands of the people, allow them to exercise their choice, I believe the people would come up to the situation and would give you a better Senate than you can get in any other way through party management or appointments by dominant parties, whether in the local or the Dominion legislature. And I would not be very desirous of having these circuits small sets of counties in a province; when each province has its number of electors I would let that province be the electoral division and the larger it was the better it would be, the larger it was the less room there would be for electioneering and all the costs thereof. I do not know but what it would be the very best thing that could happen that your constituency would be so large that it would be impossible to carry on this kind of electioneering that we have in the straightened, narrow and comparatively small constituencies. In some way or other it has in the last analysis to be left, I believe, with the people themselves. No mechanical medium will suit the people better than to have the direct choice of its senators and there is wisdom enough in this country of ours, if we put forth our best energies, to devise a method by which these constituencies can be formed and elections carried on. This would be profitable in the long run to the country. It would cost something to carry on another set of elections, it is true; but if a Senate is worth having it is worth while to pay for wise selection.

It is better to spend a little more money and get a Senate that is an expression of the will of the people than it is to spend less money and get a Senate that is largely the expression of one man or of one party.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister) delivered a message from His Excellency the Governor General, which was read by Mr. Speaker as follows:—

GREY:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I thank you for the address which you have adopted in reply to the speech from the Throne.

Government House,
Ottawa, January 20, 1908.

GRAND TRUNK HOTEL SITE, OTTAWA.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works) moved that the House go into committee on Thursday next, to consider the following proposed resolution:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to confirm the sale and transfer to the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada of part of Major's Hill Park, in the city of Ottawa, for the sum of $100,000, and to authorize an agreement to be made with the said company in the terms of an order in council under date of September 26, 1907, and further to authorize payment of the proceeds of such sale, viz.:—the said sum of $100,000 to the Ottawa Improvement Commission, to be applied by them for the purposes of the commission under the instructions and directions of the Governor in Council.

He said: I desire to acquaint the House that His Excellency the Governor General has been informed of the contents of this resolution and recommends the same to the favourable consideration of the House.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Before the motion passes I would like to ask whether the order in council referred to has been laid on the table of the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, it has been and it is attached to the motion. The clerk has a certified copy of the order in council.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Of course, I think it is desirable, before the motion is taken into consideration, that the order in council should be before members for a length of time in order that they may make themselves acquainted with its purport.

Motion agreed to.

FRANCO-CANADIAN TRADE TREATY.

On the orders of the day being called :

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) when we may expect the detailed information that has been so often asked for in reference to the French treaty.

Mr. FIELDING. It is being printed and in so far as it may be possible to comply with the various requests I think most of the requests will be covered by the return. It is now in the printer's hands.

SUPPLY—JAPANESE IMMIGRATION—MR. LEMIEUX'S MISSION.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Minister of Labour). Mr. Speaker, I must crave the indulgence of the House for more than a few minutes, so as to state as fully as possible the result of my mission to Japan. Before doing so, however, I wish to declare most emphatically that none of the reports which have appeared in the press concerning the negotiations themselves, or their result, and which have unfortunately found place in the Canadian press, are accurate. Nothing has transpired of the conferences which were held behind closed doors at the Foreign Office at Tokio, and I am inclined to believe that that very secrecy is perhaps the cause of the onslaught made on the Canadian representative by the correspondent of the associated press of America. I have no apology to offer, nor will I claim any credit for the silence I have kept. I simply did my duty.

The object of my mission to Japan is clearly defined in the report of the committee of the Privy Council on the 12th October, 1907. It reads as follows :

The Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier recommends that in view of the recent unfortunate occurrences which have taken place in British Columbia, as a result of the largely increased influx of oriental labourers into that province, and in view of the fact that there has been a treaty of Peace and Commerce between His Majesty the King and the Emperor of Japan since the year 1894 and that Canada became a party to that treaty less than two years ago, the Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, Postmaster General and Minister of Labour, do proceed immediately to Japan to discuss the situation with His Majesty's ambassador at Tokio and the Japanese authorities, with the object by friendly means of preventing the recurrence of such causes as might disturb the happy relations which have under the said treaty existed between the subjects of His Majesty the King in Canada and elsewhere, and the subjects of His Majesty the Emperor of Japan.

The committee concurring in the foregoing recommendation, submit the same for approval.

The House will notice that I was to discuss the situation with His Majesty's ambassador at Tokio and the Japanese authority ; not with the ambassador of any other country.

Having received the above direction from council, I accordingly left Ottawa on the 23rd October, proceeded to Vancouver, B.C., where I sailed for Japan on the 29th, reaching Yokohama on the 13th November following. Before relating the negotiations which have taken place at Tokio, between the Japanese authorities, the British ambassador and myself, I may state briefly the causes of the anti-Asiatic agitation existing in British Columbia and which culminated in the deplorable riots of Vancouver in the month of September last. For many years past, and beginning with the discovery of the gold mines of Cassiar and Caribou, and later on, with the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, what is known as Oriental labour has been gradually imported in British Columbia. Practically, it is the only province in the Dominion where any strong feeling exists against Asiatic immigration, it being the only one where that immigration is settled. The Chinese coolies were the first to come. As long as the construction work of the Canadian Pacific Railway went on, their presence was not considered so objectionable. Labour was scarce, and the speedy construction of the new transcontinental in the mountain section, required a large number of labourers. But soon after the completion of the road, when the coolies left the railway camps to become residents of cities, towns and villages, there to compete in the field of labour connected with various industries, a strong prejudice began to manifest itself, a prejudice more or less apparent wherever the two races, Mongolian and Caucasian, have come into contact in every part of the world.

In 1884, a commission was appointed by the Dominion government consisting of the late Sir J. A. Chapleau then Secretary of State, Mr. Justice Grey of British Columbia commission, by the late Nicholas Flood Davin, who afterwards became one of the most distinguished members of the House and who prepared the very able report of that commission. That commission was to investigate and report upon the question of Chinese immigration, from its various aspects. As the result of the report of that commission, in 1885, the government of the day introduced a measure imposing a head tax of $50 on every Chinese immigrant. Later on, as the Chinese still came in large numbers, this head tax was doubled. The legislation imposing a head tax of $100 was passed in 1900. As the agitation against Asiatic labour was not abating and as exclusion was demanded, a new commission was appointed by the present government in 1900. I well remember as a younger member of the House in 1900 listening to the speeches delivered on the subject by the British Columbia members, that one of the ablest of these speeches was delivered by the Rev. Mr. Maxwell, then a talented member of parliament. After a thorough investigation, the commission came, as regards Chinese immigrants, to the following conclusions:

> Your commissioners are of opinion that the further immigration of Chinese labourers into Canada ought to be prohibited;
> That the most desirable and effective means of attaining this end is by treaty supported by suitable legislation;
> That in the meantime and until this can be obtained the capitation tax should be raised to $500.

As a treaty such as the one contemplated by the commissioners could hardly be negotiated with China, parliament increased de novo the capitation tax from $100 to $500. Whilst it cannot be said that this head tax has stopped immigration from China, it has, however, effectually restricted it to such numbers as to cause no more alarm, and to-day there is practically no Chinese question in British Columbia.

Besides, the anti-Asiatic feeling existing in British Columbia is not directed so much against the Chinese population as against the Japanese and the Hindus. This differentiation is due to the fact that the Chinese do not assert a position of equality with the whites. They confine their activities to certain limited menial work, thus avoiding competition with the whites who look after more profitable work. They are generally in demand as domestic servants, laundrymen, cooks, labourers in clearing forest lands, market gardeners, inside workers in canneries, and above ground workers in collieries.

As already stated, the importation of oriental labour into Canada was confined to Chinese coolies. The Japanese immigrants were also coming to British Columbia, but in much smaller numbers. In the last report alluded to (page 399) the commissioners expressed the opinion that as long as the immigration to Canada did not abnormally increase, the imposition of a head tax on the Japanese might be deferred. The commissioners had been made aware of the instructions sent to the local authorities in Japan by the Minister of Foreign Affairs, which reads as follows:—

> Department of Foreign Affairs,
> Tokio, August 2, 1900.
> To the governors of the prefectures—
> You are hereby instructed to prohibit entirely for the time being the emigration of Japanese labourers for the Dominion of Canada or for the United States.
> (Sgd.) VISCOUNT AOKI,
> Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. May I ask the hon. gentleman where that is to be found?

Mr. LEMIEUX. It is in the report of the commissioners.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I have seen it there, but I did not know where they had got it.

Mr. LEMIEUX. After having recommended this policy of the Japanese government as 'most opportune and eliminating all cause of friction and irritation between Canada and Japan,' the commissioners state:

> Nothing further is needed to settle this most difficult question upon a firm basis than some assurance that the action already taken by the government of Japan will not be revoked.

That such an assurance as that suggested by the commissioners was given, at the time, is quite certain. There was, so to speak, between the Japanese authorities and the Dominion government a tacit understanding that the flow of immigration from Japan would be so regulated by the governors of the several prefectures as not to exceed a reasonable figure.

The existence of that understanding is disclosed by the many communications exchanged on this subject between His Imperial Majesty's consul general in Canada, Mr. T. Nossé, and the Prime Minister. I will have to refer at some length to that correspondence, but the outstanding fact remains that the Japanese authorities so regulated the emigration from Japan as to cause no feeling of alarm in the labour market of British Columbia.

It was only after Canada's adherence to the treaty concluded in 1894, between Great Britain and Japan, that the question of Japanese immigration became acute.

But before dealing with the sudden influx of Japanese immigrants in British Columbia, and its consequences, it may be of interest to state here that, until 1894, the only treaties which Japan had concluded with other nations were, owing to peculiar circumstances, one-sided, and considered by many as highly detrimental to the interests of Japan. The presence in them of provisions about extra territorial rights, tariff rates, &c., had long subjected Japan to serious material disadvantages and to a keen sense of humiliation.

I do not wish, Mr. Speaker, to be historical in the statement I have to offer the House this afternoon, but having visited Japan, having seen a little of official Japan, having read a great deal about that country, may I be permitted to state that there are in the history of modern Japan three days which must ever be borne in mind. These three dates are the three landmarks of modern Japan. They are, first, the revolution which restored the emperor to the throne of Japan, after dissensions which lasted during centuries, during which the authority of the emperor had been baffled by the shogunate. That revolution took place forty-five years ago. Then there was the introduction of parliamentary government in 1889, and finally what is now called in Japan the treaty revision of 1894. That treaty revision marks a new era in the history of Japan. Before that time Japan was not considered a great power but placed on the same footing as China by the powers of Europe and America. As I have already stated, the treaties of Japan with the other nations gave foreign nations in Japan, extra territorial rights. Besides, she had been obliged to give humiliating tariff rates, and indeed was subjected to keen indignity. But in 1892, the Japanese government decided that at last Japan should unshackle her bond and revise her treaties with the great powers.

For many years Japan had concentrated her efforts in the problem of what is now known as treaty revision, and every possible obstacle that stood in the way of that great goal was steadily removed. When, in 1892, this long standing affair was taken up, Great Britain was of all the powers the first approached, as she held larger interests than any other in the question. The negotiations bore fruit, and a revised treaty was concluded with Great Britain on July 17, 1894. The other powers followed suit. The revised treaties were put into force on July 17, 1899. Thus, for the first time, Japan gained admittance into the comity of nations on the status of equality.

By Clause XIX of the treaty of 1894 it was made optional with Canada and other British colonies to adhere to the treaty. Article XIX of the treaty reads as fillows:

> The stipulations of the present treaty shall be applicable, so far as the laws permit to all the colonies and foreign possessions of His Britannic Majesty, excepting to those hereinafter named, that is to say, except ten:
> India, the Dominion of Canada, Newfoundland, The Cape, Natal, New South Wales, Victoria, Queensland, Tasmania, South Australia, Western Australia, New Zealand, provided always that the stipulations of the present treaty shall be made applicable to any of the above-named colonies or foreign possessions on whose behalf notice to that effect shall have been given to the Japanese government by Her Britannic Majesty's representative at Tokio, within two years from the date of the exchange of ratifications of the present treaty.

For various reasons, which I will mention later on, it was only in 1905 that by a minute of council dated September 26, that Canada became a party to the treaty.

This minute of council is based upon a report from the Secretary of State, in which he recommends:

> That a cable despatch be sent to Mr. Lyttelton advising him that the government of Canada is prepared to adhere absolutely and without reserve to the treaty of commerce and navigation made between Great Britain and Japan in 1894 and supplementary convention signed in Tokio in July, 1895.

In view of the expiration of the two years allowed by Article XIX of the treaty of 1894 for the adhesion of British colonies, it became necessary to conclude a special convention so as to give effect to the stipulations of the treaty applicable to the intercourse of commerce and navigation between the empire of Japan and the Dominion of Canada.

The convention was signed at Tokio on January 31, 1906. It came into effect immediately after the exchange of ratifications and, as stipulated:

> It shall remain in force until the expiration of six months from the day on which one of the high contracting parties shall have announced their intention of terminating it.

The treaty was submitted to and sanctioned by parliament during the session of 1907. It will be noticed by the first paragraph of Article 1 of the treaty that the Japanese are unequivocally given the same rights as any British subject in Canada. It reads as follows:

> The subjects of each of the two high contracting parties shall have full liberty to enter, travel or reside in any part of the Dominions and possessions of the other contracting party, and shall enjoy full and perfect protection for their persons and property.

Before I proceed any further, I wish to answer at once an objection which has been raised by some newspapers. It was stated that the government should have accepted the suggestion made by Mr. Chamberlain several years ago, namely, that Canada might adopt a policy based on the Natal Act. It has also been stated that we should have striven to obtain an arrangement with terms similar to that of Queensland. The National Act would be nothing less than a means of excluding the Japanese from Canada, and I have no hesitation in saying that it would be a most unfriendly act towards Japan. As regards the special arrangement with Queensland, it is contained in the protocol, signed in Tokio, March 16, 1897. In that protocol, Queensland, although adhering to the treaty, reserves her rights as regards the immigration of labourers and artisans. The treaty can be abrogated on six months notice. I must say that the Foreign Office at Tokio emphatically declare that Queensland has never availed herself of this protocol.

There was one reason why Canada could not at that time have an arrangement such as that of the Queensland protocol. The offer was made to the Canadian government, soon after 1894, to adhere to the treaty. But you will find in the minutes of council the reasons given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and by the Minister of Customs, why Canada could not, especially in 1897, adhere to the treaty with Japan. We had just inaugurated the very wise and popular fiscal policy of the present Minister of Finance, the chief feature of which was the giving of a preference to the mother country. It will be remembered that we had heavy battles to wage in order to obtain the denunciation of the German and Belgian treaties, under which those nations were to participate in most favoured nation treatment. In the treaty with Japan there was a most favoured nation clause. It was not yet decided whether we could obtain from Great Britain the denunciation of the German and Belgium treaties so as to give full benefit of the preference to the mother country. That being so, we might well hesitate before we enter into any bargain with any other nation.

Now, coming to the merits of the case, let me say that, during my stay in Japan, I inquired whether the provisions of that protocol were still in existence. I was told, not only by the Japanese authorities, but by the British Ambassador at Tokio, that since Queensland had become a member of the Australian commonwealth—Australia having refused to adhere to the treaty—this protocol was a dead letter. Besides, in the correspondence exchanged at the time, between the British minister at Tokio, Sir Ernest Satow and the Minister of Foreign Affairs in England, Lord Salisbury, the former pointed out that, though Japan had temporarily agreed to the protocol with Queensland, yet, at the moment any British colony should exclude the Japanese, Japan would simply give the necessary six months notice and the treaty and the protocol would be at an end. Therefore the objection counts for nothing, for the reasons I have just stated. The policy of this government has always been to let Japan herself regulate and restrict voluntarily the emigration of her subjects; any other policy would not have been successful with that nation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, before I proceed any further let me ask this question: What has been the real cause of the agitation in the province of British Columbia? It is unquestionably the unreserved interpretation of that Article 1 by some enterprising immigration companies, that has of late given rise to the agitation against Japanese immigrants in Canada. This Article 1, in spite of instructions given by the Japanese government, in spite of the assurances supplementing those instructions given to the Canadian government by the Japanese consul in Canada, this Article 1 has been taken advantage of by some enterprising immigration companies operating at Vancouver, in the province of British Columbia, at Tokio in Japan and in the Hawaiian Islands. I stated a moment ago that there was a tacit understanding between the Japanese government and the Canadian government. As a matter of fact, during the years which elapsed from 1900 to 1907, there was hardly any complaint from the province of British Columbia as regards the flow of Japanese immigration. In fact, the Japanese government cannot be charged with bad faith, the Japanese government adhered to their policy of restriction, and respected pledges repeatedly given by their consul. Not only have they sent instructions to their governors, but in order to set at rest the minds of those who believed that they were intending to flood the western coast of America with their subjects, the Japanese government passed a law known in Japan as the law for the protection of immigrants. In his very able report, Mr. Mackenzie King refers to the application of that law. The House will see at once how cautious the Japanese government are as regards the emigration of their subjects.

Mr. J. D. REID. When was this law passed?

Mr. LEMIEUX. In 1896. I will read a synopsis, which the members of the House will find on page 4 of Mr. Mackenzie King's report:

> Emigration from Japan is regulated by the general Act which gives the government power to issue instructions from time to time as to the passage of persons who may be permitted to emigrate, and under what conditions this emigration will be allowed. These instructions are issued to the governors of the several préfectures into which Japan is divided. Under this policy, emigration from Japan can take place only with the consent of the government.

I wish to draw attention to this feature of the policy of the Japanese government:

> Under this policy, emigration from Japan can take place only with the consent of the government, which consent is given by the foreign office issuing a passport. Without the permission of the foreign office no one can obtain a passport, and without a passport no one can emigrate. Emigration may take place upon the initiative of individuals desirous of going to another country, or at the instance of emigration companies formed for the purpose of promoting emigration. All emigration companies are under the supervision and control of the government. They are obliged to carry on their business in conformity with the Emigration Act and instructions issued by the government, and to give security in the nature of bonds that their duties will be properly discharged and the obligations placed upon them duly met.

The application of the law referred to in this report and known as the Law for the Protection of Emigrants being concomitant, if I may so speak, with the tacit understanding arrived at between this government and the Japanese government, had the desired effect.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. May I ask the hon. gentleman a question at this point? He has referred three times to a tacit understanding. I merely wanted to know what it was and by what means it was arrived at.

Mr. LEMIEUX. A little later on I will refer to the tacit understanding and will give the terms. I was saying that the application of that law, the synopsis of which I have just given, being concomitant with the tacit understanding arrived at between the Canadian government and the Japanese government, had the desired effect. First of all, it prevented any undue inflation of the labour market in British Columbia; secondly, it justified the Dominion government in refusing to give their assent to any drastic legislation adopted by the legislature of British Columbia against the subjects of a friendy power, and, thirdly, it also justified the Prime Minister in using language which I will shortly quote. We all remember that objection was taken by my hon. friend the representative for New Westminster (Mr. Kennedy) to our adhesion to this treaty. It was a mild objection in this sense, that the hon. member only referred to the possible difficulties and troubles that might arise in the future as regards the large number of Japanese and oriental labourers in the province of British Columbia. The Prime Minister used the following language:

My hon. friend has brought to the attention of the house once more a question which has for many years been the cause of much agitation in British Columbia. There is not only in British Columbia, but in every Anglo-Saxon community quite an aversion to any kind of Asiatic labour. I would, however, observe that so far as Japanese labourers are concerned, my hon. friend will agree that for the last five or six years there has been no Japanese immigration to speak of into British Columbia. Some few years ago when we increased to $500 the poll tax which had been in existence for many years against Chinese immigration, we persistently refused to extend the same prohibition against Japanese immigration. The reason which we gave at that time was that Japan was an ally of Great Britain, and we could not treat the Japanese as we had treated the Chinese population. This was accepted by British Columbia itself, and I may say that our task in that respect was made easy because the Japanese government has restricted the immigration of their own people. At the present time the Japanese government does not allow immigration from its own provinces, with the exception of a very few from each province. I think it is not more than four or five from each province, that is all that the Japanese permit to leave the Empire of Japan, and therefore, practically there has been no emigration to British Columbia from that country.

That was on January 15 of last year. Thus, on the faith of that tacit understanding, and after that statement officially made by the Prime Minister in Parliament—not only hon. gentlemen who sit at your right, Mr. Speaker, but hon. gentlemen who sit on your left—sanctioned unanimously the treaty with Japan. It is in that light that Canada's unreserved and absolute adhesion must be read. Our expectations that Japan would not avail herself of the letter of article 1 of the treaty were, however, disappointed. No sooner had the treaty been passed, no sooner had it been mooted in public that Canada had adhered unreservedly and unconditionally to the treaty than suddenly, for causes which we know too well, the flood-gates were thrown open wide and oriental immigration began to pour into the province of British Columbia. It poured from two different sources, first, from Japan direct, and, second, from the islands of Hawaii. Some of the immigrants came to Victoria and Vancouver as bearers of permits to Canada, some others came with permits for Hawaii only, some others came with permits for the United States only, and many of them came without any permits at all claiming their rights under the treaty.

Let me give this House a few figures. During our fiscal year 1904-5, that is to say, from the first July 1904 to the thirtieth June 1905, three hundred and fifty-four Japanese arrived in Canada. From the first July 1905 to the thirtieth June 1906, one thousand nine hundred and twenty two Japanese arrived. In 1906, the beginning of the fiscal year was changed from July first to April first. In the six months, from the first of July to the thirty-first of December, two thousand two hundred and thirty-three Japanese arrived and from the first of January to the thirty-first of October 1907, eight thousand one hundred and twenty-five Japanese arrived in the Dominion, thus showing an exceptionally large and progressive increase.

Sir, the first question that we must ask ourselves is: Who was responsible for that large influx of labour? I answer without any hesitation that the Japanese government themselves are not responsible for the violation of the understanding existing between the two countries. No charge of bad faith can be made against them. The parties responsible are mentioned in the report prepared by Mr. Mackenzie King and which was distributed to members of this House last night. The parties responsible were the members of an imaginary company existing at Vancouver and having some ramifications in Japan and another firm operating from the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. We should get the names of these companies.

Mr LEMIEUX. They are in the report. Speaking again of the responsibility of the Japanese government I wish to impress the House with this fact—I cannot state it too often—that the Japanese government are opposed to any such immigration from Japan. For economic reasons, the Japanese government are not anxious to see their subjects coming in such large numbers to America. We all know that the sphere of influence of Japan to-day in the far east is Korea and Manchuria, and the Japanese government are doing their utmost to channel immigration and colonization towards Korea and Manchuria. Every Japanese subject who comes to Amercia or Canada is a decided loss to the treasury of Japan, and I cannot repeat too strongly, Mr. Speaker, the Japanese government cannot be charged with bad faith. They are not responsible for the large and sudden influx of October last.

I have already explained that the most objectionable oriental labour in British Columbia is not the Chinese labour. The most objectionable and for totally different causes are the Japanese and the Hindoos. It is rather a compliment, as my hon. friend from Nanaimo (Mr. Smith) said the other day, to the Japanese to say that they are more objectionable than other oriental labourers in British Columbia, and Mr. Speaker, it is easy to understand the compliment. The Japanese in British Columbia do not confine their activities to menial work.

The strong objection against the Japanese is owing to the fact that they enter into closer competition with white labour than the Chinese. The consensus of opinion is that they are keener competitors against the workingman, as they have more energy and more independence than others. The Japanese are employed in the fisheries and in the lumber industries, and occupations incidental to these, such as boat building and getting out shingle boats, cord wood, &c. They are also employed in the mining industry, on railways, in sealing, as domestic servants, in farming, land clearing and market gardening, and as tailors. Many are also employed as waiters at hotels. Some of them, and not a few, are also engaged in business. As I have already stated, this sudden influx of Japanese immigrants was brought about by the combined action of enterprising emigration companies, who operated at Vancouver and Tokio. By referring to Mr. King's report, the House will see that there was one large company, having headquarters at Vancouver, which, working in conjunction with another firm at Tokio, was engaged in bringing Japanese labourers under contract direct from Japan. Another firm was working at Honolulu, but its work was distinct from that of the Vancouver company. I need not dwell at any length on the modus operandi of these various companies. My deputy minister, Mr. King, in his very able report, shows clearly how their combined efforts at Vancouver, Tokio and Honolulu, brought about the crisis in British Columbia. To prevent the recurrence of such influx in the future, and to revert by friendly means to the understanding which had heretofore existed between Canada and Japan, was the chief object of my mission.

Let me now describe as graphically as possible the state of public opinion in British Columbia. That there is in that province, as well, as in some of the western states of the American Union, a strong prejudice against the Asiatics in general, is too obvious. The increased membership of the Exclusion Leagues at Vancouver, Seattle, San Francisco, the dissemination of anti-Asiatic literature, and the several riots that have taken place during the last few months, clearly indicate the existence of an organization, the influence of which cannot be over-estimated. Whilst it may be argued that the present agitation in British Columbia as the outcome of —on one hand—the greed of employers who import cheap labour, and on the other, the resentment of labour unions, who, as a result, clamour against the lowering of wages, yet it must be borne in mind that the interests at stake in the Asiatic immigration problem are far more serious, far more complex, than the quarrel between the unions and the corporations.

I have already stated that the anti-Asiatic prejudice has always asserted itself wherever Mongolian and Caucasian had come into contact. More especially, in an Anglo-Saxon community like ours, where democratic institutions prevail, the introduction in large numbers of alien races not familiar with our principles of self government, cannot but by itself, be fraught with danger. One must bear in mind that there are now over 25,000 Asiatics in British Columbia, practically all of whom are male adults. There are about 75,000 male adults of the white race in the province. So that, if to-day, every fourth man in that province competing for a living is an Asiatic, are not the reasons for effectual restriction far more compelling than one would at first imagine? These orientals belong to a civilization developed through the centuries, along lines totally and radically different from ours. There is a well nigh impassable gulf between the two. On the other hand, a circumstance which makes this question still more complex and exceedingly difficult to handle, is the fact that the stream was started by our own people. Otherwise, the orientals would have found no employment in Canada. It is the difference of interests between labour and capital that these races enter in, and it is by virtue of that difference that the tremendous economic weight of their industrial efficiency is brought to bear upon the whole industrial system of British Columbia. It is a truism in political economy that men who can work fourteen and fifteen hours a day, who live with a frugality of which we have no conception, must prove formidable competitors in the field of labour. Be that as it may, the fact remains that British Columbia object to a vast alien colony (exclusive, inscrutable, unassimilative, with fewer wants, and maintaining intact their peculiar customs and characteristics, ideals of home and family life, with neither the wish nor the capacity to amalgamate) which gradually by the mere pressure of number may undermine the very foundations of their province. They have to safeguard the future and the distinctiveness of their race and civilization, and in their passionate and unalterable conviction, they cannot be protected unless the free ingress of orientals is restricted and regulated. As in every Anglo-Saxon community, there exists a deep-seated popular determination to exclude from even the sparsely settled territories, the concentrated masses of the orient.

Such are the economic factors coupled with race antipathy and incompatibility of ideals, that are at the bottom of all agitation against the influx of oriental labour.

There are, Mr. Speaker, two sides to every question. I have dwelt briefly upon the strong racial prejudices that exist against the presence of Asiatic labour in British Columbia, as well as in all white communities, and it is only fair that I should now endeavour to sum up in a few lines the result of my investigation as regards public opinion in Japan on that vexed question. In doing this, I am merely enunciating in the briefest, and perhaps crudest form, such views as were expressed to me, privately and publicly in unofficial circles. Being a proud and sensitive people, the Japanese cannot admit that such racial prejudices will last for ever. Japan, they say, owes her recognition by the nations of the world, to her successful wars and the proof of military and naval power which she has displayed. But, above all, they claim that her new form of government, her educational progress, should be an object lesson to dispassionate and fair-minded observers; that her standards of civilization are on a par with those of western nations. Japan can not, will not and must not be expected to give away the rights which belong to her subjects as units of a nation claiming and deserving to receive at the hands of western countries the consideration that marks their intercourse with one another.

But what they regard as the crux of their grievance against not only Canada, but, even to a greater extent, the United States, is this: America admits immigrants from Europe and refuses or proposes to refuse to admit those from Japan. This, they claim, is not only unfair in itself, but is a flagrant contravention of the treaty in which they are guaranteed equal treatment with that accorded the subjects of all other countries. They cannot well refrain from viewing this as an aspersion on their nationality, and consequently will not be satisfied until this discriminatory treatment is removed. From a purely business point of view, the Japanese naturally deplore that such unfortunate incidents as the Vancouver riots should be allowed to occur, as it is most certainly to be feared that unless they are speedily prevented, the ill-feeling which their countrymen are now constrained to harbour against the people of a single section, may finally have an unhappy effect upon the development of commercial relations between the two countries.

They use another argument which seems to me to be very eloquent indeed. They say that in 1853, when Commodore Perry came to Japan, he invited Japan to open her gates to foreigners, and that she would gain admittance to the comity of civilized nations only on condition that she would have free intercourse with all their people. They say: 'We had many revolutions; we had bloodshed in the streets of Tokio, Kioto, Kobé and Nagasaki. Many refused to admit foreigners, but the central authority, listening to the advice of the western nations, open the gates of Japan. To-day the very people who gave us that timely advice fifty years ago, are refusing to open their own gates to our people.' They say further: 'Japan is a favoured country; we have the broadest form of toleration; our constitution allows any minister of a Christian church to come to Japan and enlist the Japanese people in its ranks. We listen to ministers of the Gospel. We know from what we hear that Christianity is a religion of love and charity. Is it love, is it charity, which is being taught in America against the Japanese? They say all these things, Mr. Speaker, and when one listens to such arguments, one is silent.

Let me now refer, Mr. Speaker, to the understanding which existed between the Canadian government and the Japanese government prior to 1907. Before I proceed to fully acquaint the House with the negotiations which have taken place at Tokio, I wish to refer for a moment to the assurances given by Mr. Nossé, Consul General of Japan, of a voluntary restriction on the part of his government. These assurances are subsequent to the instructions of the 2nd August, 1900, given by Viscount Aoki, Minister of Foreign Affairs.

The letters and telegrams addressed by His Imperial Majesty's Consul General to the Prime Minister, on various occasions, establish beyond the shadow of a doubt the existence of a system of voluntary restriction on the part of Japan. A brief synopsis of Mr. Nossé's correspondence bearing on this point naturally finds its place here.

In a letter dated Montreal, February 3, 1903, Mr. Nossé answers as follows, a query made by the Prime Minister about the number of Japanese who are allowed to emigrate each year :

In answer to your inquiry as to why so large a number of Japanese were allowed to emigrate to Canada during the past year or so, I beg to say that the Japanese government has been restricting for more than the last two years, the issuing of new passports to all intending emigrants to Canada. It is total and absolute restriction, and there is not any limited number allowed for each year as you have stated. The only Japanese who are allowed to leave Japan, under the present system, for Canada are:

1. Those who hold passports and also certificates for the Japanese consul at Vancouver certifying that they are residents in Canada and only returning to Canada.
2. The families of Japanese residents in Canada coming out to join them, upon approval of the Japanese consul at Vancouver.
3. The merchants and students duly qualified.

On the 5th February, 1903, the Prime Minister again made inquiries of Mr. Nossé, to ascertain what regulations are made by his government as to the number of Japanese allowed every year to emigrate from Japan to Canada. He answers as follows, in a letter dated Montreal, February 6, 1903 :

I beg leave to state that prior to the fall of 1900, the number of her passports issued to Japanese emigrants for Canada used to be about fifty per month, but since then the Japanese government have wholly stopped the issuance of new passports to any intending emigrants for Canada, under a provision of the Emigration Protection Law, and no passports are, therefore, issued at present, to the new emigrants, except to the merchants, students and tourists, duly justified. It is, therefore, practically the total restriction, on the part of the Japanese government of the emigration of their people to Canada. The system is most rigidly observed in Japan, as every passenger is examined on board the steamer prior to her departure, and those who are found without passports are ordered back on shore by the police authorities, under the penalty of heavy fine.

On February 2, 1903, Mr. Nosse writes as follows, from Montreal :—

I have the honour of transmitting to you herewith inclosed, the lists of Japanese arrivals in British Columbia for the months of November and December 1902. I beg to call your special attention to the considerable decrease in the arrivals in British Columbia of Japanese who intend to stay there permanently, the proof of the Japanese government strictly observing their policy towards the emigration of their people into this country. I regret to note, however that there was an unsually large number of Japanese arrivals at Vancouver from the Hawaiian islands through the notoriously dishonourable work of an American concern there, but I am glad to say that by the combined efforts on the part of the Japanese consuls at Vancouver and Honolulu, the practice was timely stopped. As you may understand through the newspaper cuttings herein inclosed. I am informed by the Japanese consul at Vancouver that these passengers were ordered to leave British Columbia for the United States, where they originally expected to go, but not to British Columbia.

In the lists referred to in the above letter, it appears that 255 Japanese had arrived at Vancouver and Victoria in November 1902 and 261 in December, 1902.

The next communication from Mr. Nossé to the Prime Minister is in the form of a telegram, dated Montreal, March 30, 1903. It reads as follows :

In answer to my cablegram to the Imperial Japanese government advising them to continue the policy of restricting their people emigrating in any large number into British Columbia. I have received a cable instruction to the effect that I have to give your government the renewed assurance that the Japanese government are not desirous of forcing their people into British Columbia against the wish of the province; and that they are willing to enter into an agreement with your government by which they may bind themselves, if their present policy of rigid restriction is not deemed satisfactory to your government.

(Signed) T. NOSSE,
Consul General of Japan.

In a letter dated Montreal, July 18, 1903, he says :

I have the honour of assuring you once again that the Japanese government is not disposed to issue the passports any more than necessary. Any number of new permits under 200 per annum cannot be said to be very large, considering the fact that in this number not only the wives and children of the old residents, but also merchants and students and even the consul and his family are included.

On the 13th August, 1903, Mr. Nossé transmits a statement showing the number of passports issued by the Japanese government for emigrants to Canada in the years (1901, 1902, 1903) and he adds :

In this table, you will please notice that during last three years, the number of passports issued has not exceeded 200, and not a simple permit was given to an immigrant.

In a letter dated Montreal, March 19, 1904, Mr. Nossé informs the Prime Minister that he has served His Excellency the Governor General with an official protest on behalf of his government against the re-enactment of a British Columbia Immigration Act and he adds :

My personal explanations to you at our last interview, I trust, have convinced you that the Japanese government has been faithful to her promises and the people in British Columbia have no real cause for agitation.

He concludes by asking the disallowance of the Act. In his answer of the 21st of the same month, the Prime Minister says :

I told you at our last interview that the government of Japan had fulfilled their engagement towards us, and that on our side, we should act accordingly.

In a letter dated Ottawa, May 9, 1905, Mr. Nossé tenders thanks on behalf of his government for the prompt measures taken by the Dominion government in disallowing British Columbia legislation, and he adds :

Whilst trusting in the Canadian government's justice and good faith, the Japanese government will always adhere to their policy of voluntary restriction on their people emigrating to British Columbia.

Can anything be clearer than these assurances given the Canadian government by the Japanese government through its consul general ?

Now comes another feature. On September the 18th, 1905, six or seven days before this government acceded to the treaty with Japan, which they did by minute of council passed on September the 25th or 26th, 1905, Mr. Nossé wrote to my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher). I must state the circumstances under which that letter was written. The Canadian government had decided to accede to the treaty with Japan, subject however to certain restrictions concerning (1) coastwise navigation, and (2) immigration.

Having learned that such conditions would be asked by the Canadian government, Mr. Nossé wrote a letter in which he stated, amongst other things, that :

The emigration will be always restricted voluntarily by Japan, and I do hope very much that Canada will depend on our good faith and will not try to put any restrictions by right of treaty.

This letter was communicated to council and as it contained an assurance of 'voluntary restriction' and a 'pledge of good faith', the government adhered to the treaty unreservedly.

Mr. GALLIHER. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) please give the date of that letter ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. That letter was sent on September 18, 1905. The treaty was adhered to by minute of council September 25 or 26, if I remember well.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. May I ask whether these documents which are being read here have already been laid on the table of the House ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. They are all public documents ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Not private and confidential ?

Mr. BUREAU. They are only copies.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I have already explained that, as the delay of two years, mentioned in article 19 of the treaty, had expired, and this government had adhered to the treaty on September 25, 1905, a special convention was rendered necessary, in order to ratify, so to speak, the position of the government.

Mr. D. ROSS. If the minister will allow me a moment, his dates do not fit in. On September 25th, the telegram was sent by this government asking the imperial government to secure ratification of the treaty. The treaty was not ratified on September 25, 1905.

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend (Mr. Duncan Ross) is right. But, at all events, the important point is this—that the letter written by Mr. Nossé containing that unqualified assurance on behalf of his government, and pledging the good faith of the Japanese government was anterior to the minute of council adhering to the treaty. The first minute of council, which was discussed and which was about to be passed when the reservations regarding the coastwise navigation and restriction of immigration, was, perhaps, the minute of council of September 25th. But my point is that this letter was given between that first minute of council and the final minute of council by which Canada adhered to the treaty. You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that, beginning with the letter of Viscount Aoki of August 2, 1900, until this last letter of Mr. Nossé, pledging the good faith of his government, the chain of assurances is perfect.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. May I ask whether the order in council to which the minister has just now alluded containing that exception or restriction has been laid upon the table ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. The first minute to which I alluded was not, properly speaking, a minutet of council, because it was just being prepared when Mr. Nossé heard of the reservations which would be made as regards our adherence. This order in council was null and void and the formal order in council was passed later on. The first one was not passed ; it was only a draft.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Whether a draft or not, it is part of the negotiations up to that time, and, as the minister has alluded to it, it ought to be brought down.

Mr. ARMAND LAVERGNE. In what capacity was the letter of September 18th addressed to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) by Mr. Nossé ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. He had only one capacity ; he was consul general——

Mr. ARMAND LAVERGNE. No. What I wish to ask is why was the letter addressed to the Minister of Agriculture ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. The reason is obvious. The Minister of Agriculture had taken, as he has done ever since, a very deep interest in the commercial relations between Japan and Canada. This was just a year or so after his return from Japan, where he had represented Canada as commissioner at the Osaka exhibition. And Mr. Nossé, being more intimate, probably, with the Minister of Agriculture, addressed himself to him.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I suppose the draft order in council which has been referred to was based upon some recommendation. Would there be any objection to bringing it down ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The whole correspondence has been carefully brought down. If there is anything my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) desires after he has looked into the matter, he can request the production of it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not wish to interrupt the Postmaster General ; but, in the course of his statement he has seen fit to allude to a draft order in council, which, even though not passed, must have been based on some recommendation, and which, up to that time, expressed the views of the government with respect to the proposed adhesion to this treaty and in consequence of which certain communications now relied on came from the consul general of Japan. I should suppose that, in all fairness to the House to which that argument has been dressed, the draft order in council, though not passed, should be brought down.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I may tell my hon. friend that whether it was an order in council or only a memorandum, I cannot say positively. I was not then a member of council. But my impression is that the question had been discussed and the adherence of Canada to the treaty was made known to the Japanese Consul, subject, however, to the reservations I have mentioned. I cannot say positively if it was an order in council or a memorandum or a discussion. But, at all events, the letter will show.

Mr. D. ROSS. May I ask if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) has that letter ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I have not it here ; it has been laid on the table. At all events, as I was stating, since August 2, 1900, when Viscount Aoki issued his instructions prohibiting all emigration to Canada until the adhesion of Canada to that treaty, I claim that there ws a perfect chain of assurances that emigration would be restricted and so regulated as to cause no alarm in the province of British Columbia. The investigation made by Mr. King shows that, from January to October, 1907, inclusive—

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Before the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) leaves the other question, would he be good enough to give us information on one point. It would seem pretty obvious that the draft order in council to which attention has been called must have been communicated to the Japanese consul in some way otherwise he would not have referred to it in a letter to the Prime Minister ; and, for that reason also, I think that memorandum, which obviously formed part of these negotiations, ought to be brought down immediately, before the discussion proceeds. But there is one point on which I expected the hon. gentleman to speak, and he has not spoken. What was the apparent authority—I use that expression advisedly—what was the apparent authority of the consul general of Japan to bind the Japanese government in respect of this matter ? I ask that question because the hon. gentleman has repeated over and over again that every assurance made by the government of Japan has been kept, there has been absolute good faith. Does he included in that these assurances given by Mr. Nossé.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Certainly I do. Mr. Nosse was the consul of Japan in Canada, he was the representative of his government, and surely when he gave the Prime Minister of this country written pledges, written assurances, bearing the crest of the imperial government, the Prime Minister was bound to accept them.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am afraid I have not made myself very plain. We all understand of course that he was the representative of the government of Japan in this country for certain purposes, but not for all purposes. He could not make peace or declare war, to give an extreme illustration. What I desire to know is whether a purpose such as this was within the scope of his apparent authority as a representative of the Japanese government ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Well, that is another question. But surely my hon. friend will not deny that in a country like this, the natural channel between the two governments is the consul general. If my hon. friend will look at the correspondence—I do not know if it is included, it had no reference to the question of immigration—he will see in that on one occasion the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Japan, after the war was declared between Japan and Russia, sent a memorandum of the Japanese government to the Canadian government through His Imperial Majesty's consul. Therefore, he was the channel, the only channel of communication, between this government and the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Japan. But at all events, this is an academic discussion. Perhaps assurances coming from the Japanese ambassador in London, and through the foreign office in England, might have been more regular; but still we had here the Japanese consul, and when he was offering those assurances to the government, we could not consistently deny his authority and refuse to accept his assurances.

Mr. MONK. Will the hon. gentleman state if at any time he was asked to exhibit his authority for such an important engagement as that ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. There was no necessity of asking him to exhibit his authority, inasmuch as the assurances were kept from 1900 to 1907. There was no occasion to question his authority. The assurances were that the Japanese government would so regulate and so restrict emigration as to cause no influx of Japanese labour into British Columbia. They kept their promises, they lived up to their assurances ; this government therefore had no occasion to question the authority of the Japanese consul.

Mr. BRISTOL. When these representations came from the Japanese government, was a treaty virtually signed by the consul at Montreal ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. The treaty was signed at Tokio.

Mr. BRISTOL. One thing is certain, Mr. Speaker, the assurances were given, they were lived up to, and the policy of this government in accepting those assurances that had been lived up to was a wise policy.

Mr. MACPHERSON. Did the government of Japan ever repudiate the authority of the consul general in this matter ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am going to refer to that in a moment. I state now that the Japanese government has redeemed in an absolute and complete manner the pledges, the assurances given by Mr. Nossé. In a letter from Mr. Nossé, of January 24, 1904, to the House, this passage occurred, which I will read :

I had the honour of addressing Lord Minto, Governor General, transmitting to His Excellency the highest appreciation of the imperial Japanese government on the action taken by the Canadian government upon the British Columbia legislation. Baron Komura instructed me to convey his sincere thanks to you, and further to express to you his personal appreciation of your good and friendly feeling towards his countrymen in Canada. With this purpose I am going to Ottawa next Monday, and I wish you would be good enough to receive me at your convenience, as I am to stay at the capital for a few days.

So the House can see that Mr. Nossé, the imperial consul, was the natural channel in negotiations between the Japanese government and this government. On that question there can be no doubt whatever.

Now I come to 1907. The investigation made by Mr. King shows that from January to October, inclusive, 1907, 8,125 Japanese immigrants arrived at Vancouver and Victoria, of which number 3,690 went to the United States, leaving a total for Canada of 4,429. Let me now examine how these figures are made up. Of this latter number, 2,779 came from Hawaii, over which the Japanese government claim no jurisdiction and no control, as the Hawaiian islands are American possessions. Then 900 came direct from Japan, brought over by the Canadian Nippon Supply Company through emigration companies in Japan. It is true that passports were given to those immigrants, but I repeat again, no bad faith can be impugned to the Japanese government, because false representations were made to them that the men were really wanted in British Columbia by certain companies, and contracts to that effect were produced.

If you distribute the balance, 741, deducting the returning residents to Canada, and 151 immigrants destined for the United States, you come to the conclusion that the number of Japanese coming into Canada in the ordinary way was 290.

That large immigration, however, alarmed British Columbia, and I was sent to Japan, as I have already stated, to make such representations as would stop in the future any recurrence of these troubles.

Mr. A. LAVERGNE. A Japanese emigrant cannot leave Japan without a passport ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. No.

Mr. A. LAVERGNE. Have those who leave for Hawaii passports also?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes.

Mr. A. LAVERGNE. From the Japanese government?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes. It seems to me, Sir, that if, as a result of my negotiations with the Japanese government, we have succeeded in barring the avenue from Hawaii and if, on the other hand, it is now possible to so restrict the immigration from Japan, as to revert to the order of things existing before 1907, when, on account of special circumstances, the regulations were relaxed, not through the fault of the Japanese government, but through false representations, which were made, as is evident to any one who reads Mr. Mackenzie King's report, my mission might not have been unsuccessful.

It seems to me, Sir, that if I have found the Japanese government not only willing but anxious to meet the views of the Canadian government so as to stop for ever any large influx of immigrants, and consequently any further agitation in British Columbia by redeeming in the most absolute manner the assurances repeatedly given by their consul between 1900 and 1907 my efforts might not have been in vain.

And, Sir, I claim that this is the result of my mission to Japan. Let me now refer to the negotiations—that is to say in so far as I am authorized to make them public—because one must bear in mind that the question at issue is one affecting not only Canada, but also, as a result of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, the British Empire itself.

Upon my arrival at Tokio, on November 14, I immediately called at the British embassy. Our ambassador, Sir Claude MacDonald, had been instructed by the Foreign Office in London to present my credentials to His Excellency Count Hayashi, Minister of Foreign Affairs, which he had already done. It was agreed that for negotiations both countries would be represented as follows: Japan: by His Excellency Count Hayashi, Minister of Foreign Affairs, Baron Chinda, Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs, and Mr. Ishii, Director of the Bureau of Commerce; Canada; by His Excellency Sir Claude MacDonald, British ambassador; the Hon. F. O. Lindley, secretary of the British embassy, and Mr. Joseph Pope, Under-Secretary of State for Canada, and myself.

I cannot refrain from stating here at once that Canada owes a debt of gratitude to His Britannic Majesty's ambassador at Tokio. From the early stage of the conferences he took a deep interest in the question itself. Not only did he identify himself with the case, but—a circumstance of the greatest advantage and of far-reaching consequence—he also secured for the Canadian contention the 'full support' of His Majesty's government. He was present at every conference and spared no effort to bring the negotiations to a speedy and successful issue. It is my duty to declare that I received from this experienced diplomat so well versed in all the intricacies and undercurrents of politics in the far east, such aid and counsel as proved invaluable to me. I also received from the Hon. Mr. Lindley and Mr. Pope all the assistance which a long experience and thorough knowledge of the various points at issue could give. Indeed none could have evinced more interest and displayed more intelligence and more loyalty in the discharge of their duties.

From the Japanese authorities, and more especially from the Minister of Foreign Affairs, I am pleased to state that I received the most courteous hearing. In Count Hayashi I found a true friend of Canada and a true friend of Great Britain. He was animated with a sincere desire to reach such an arrangement as would be mutually beneficial and equally honourable to both countries.

The House will easily understand that in dealing with such a delicate problem I am not at liberty to divulge conferences and documents of a confidential nature.

Mr. MONK. Would my hon. friend tell us how he was accredited to the government of Japan? I did not quite understand that part of his explanation.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I read the order in council by which I was appointed at the beginning of my remarks this afternoon. I will read it again if my hon. friend desires.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. MONK. That is not what I was asking. I was asking how the hon. gentleman was accredited to the government of Japan.

Mr. LEMIEUX. If my hon. friend will read the order in council he will see what my authority was to be there.

Mr. MONK. That is not what I was asking. What did my hon. friend bear as an ambassador accredited from Canada to Japan? In what quality was he there? That is what I am asking.

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend is rather inquisitive. He has the order in council and he is reading it now. I went to Japan. The Canadian government did what should be done under similar circumstances; the home government in England was informed that I was leaving Canada to discuss this question with the British ambassador; instructions were given by Sir Edward Grey to Sir Claude MacDonald to present my credentials to the Minister of Foreign Affairs in Tokio, and, these credentials being presented and I being personally introduced, we began immediately to negotiate the arrangement which I will explain.

Mr. MONK. I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but he has not answered the question I put to him. My hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) during my hon. friend's absence asked my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in what quality the Postmaster General had gone to Japan, and, if I am not mistaken, my right hon. friend could not state, or did not state at that time, exactly what was his character upon that mission. What I am asking my hon. friend is, was he there as the plenipotentiary or had he other powers and from whom did he hold those powers?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Before the hon. gentleman resumes I would like to say that two telegrams which would evidently show that seem to be omitted from the corespondence.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Which telegrams?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Telegrams of the 17th and 22nd of October. Lord Elgin in a despatch of the 30th October refers to two telegrams, one from him of the 17th October and the other from His Excellency the Governor General to Lord Elgin on the 22nd of October, and I do not find either of these in the correspondence.

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend (Mr. Monk) would like to know whether I was a plenipotentiary or an ambassador. I do not claim any such titles. I was there as the representative of my colleagues, as the representative of the Canadian government; this was a labour issue and I was selected because I happened to be Minister of Labour. But, Sir, although I represented a colony, although I was not wearing the insignia of an ambassador, I am pleased to state, very modestly and very humbly, that I was royally received by the Japanese government; and I may assure my friend from Jacques Cartier, that the British ambassador himself, who is probably the best known diplomat in the far east, did not feel humiliated to associate himself with the simple minister of the Canadian government. I have learned the principles of international law from the lips of my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) at Laval University, and I am surprised that my professor should question the power of a Canadian minister to represent his country abroad. It is from the teaching of my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) that I realized that I had some authority to go officially to Japan especially with an order in council appointing me.

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) seems to have difficulty in answering my question, although the question I put seems to me a very simple one. Was he accredited by the British government in some special quality? It seems to me that is not a very complicated question.

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend (Mr. Monk) has forgotten his spectacles this afternoon and he has apparently not read the order in council. Had he read the order in council he would find in what capacity I went there. As to my credentials I have already stated twice that they passed through the proper channel; there has been no revolution in Canada since October last, we are still a self-governing country; the home government in England was advised that Sir Edward Grey was going to Japan to discuss a purely Canadian question, and immediately wired to the British ambassador at Tokio to accredit me at the Foreign Office, which was done.

Now, Sir, I was proceeding to say that in a question so delicate I was not at liberty to divulge the result of conferences and the contents of documents of a confidential nature. The interests involved demand that in a circumstance like this, I should be guarded in any statement I make, lest they should suffer from any indiscretion. After all, this is more than a party issue; it is a national issue. Whilst an ill-timed word might elicit commendation on this side of the ocean, it would, perhaps, have a contrary effect on the other. Remember that public opinion in Japan is as keen, as sensitive as it is here. The Diet of Japan is as instinct as our own parliament to the greatness of its country. Our duty is not to unduly embarrass a friendly government, but to look forward to the results achieved. I will, therefore, ask parliament to trust the representatives of Great Britain and Canada in this matter. First, the written assurance I have received from the Minister of Foreign Affairs that Japan will in the future restrict her emigration to Canada is the best evidence that the new arrangement or accord is now on a satisfactory and permanent basis. It reads as follows:

Tokio, December 23, 1907.

Monsieur le Ministre,—

In reply to your note of even date, I have the honour to state that although the existing treaty between Japan and Canada absolutely guarantees to Japanese subjects full liberty to enter, travel and reside in any part of the Dominion of Canada, yet it is not the intention of the imperial goverment to insist upon the complete enjoyment of the rights and privileges guaranteed by those stipulations when that would involve disregard of special conditions which may prevail in Canada from time to time.

Acting in this spirit and having particular regard to circumstances of recent occurrence in British Columbia, the imperial government have decided to take efficient means to restrict emigration to Canada. In carrying out this purpose, the imperial government, in pursuance of the policy above stated, will give careful consideration to local conditions prevailing in Canada, with a view to meeting the desires of the government of the Dominion as far as is compatible with the spirit of the treaty and the dignity of the state.

Although, as stated in the note under reply, it was not possible for me to acquiesce in all of the proposals made by you on behalf of the Canadian government, I trust that you will find in the statement herein made proof of the earnest desire of the imperial government to promote by every means within their power, the growth and stability of the cordial and mutually beneficial relations which exist between our countries. I venture to believe, also that this desirable result will be found to have been materially advanced by the full exchange of views which has taken place between us, and it gives me special pleasure to acknowledge the obligation under which I have been placed by your frank and considerate explanations regarding the attitude and wishes of your government.

I avail myself, &c., &c.,
(Sgd.) TADASU HAYASHI.

The Honourable Rodolphe Lemieux,
Postmaster General and Minister of Labour for Canada, Tokio.

In this letter, the Minister of Foreign Affairs gives Canada the official assurance that the imperial government have decided to take efficient means to restrict emigration from Japan. I will be asked at once: What are those efficient means, and where is the guarantee of that restriction? My answer is that during the course of our conferences, a series of most stringent regulations accompanied by instructions addressed to the local governors and to the consuls in Canada were adopted. I can assure the House that the British ambassador and myself are satisfied that these regulations are sufficient for our purpose, and that they will be honestly enforced by the Foreign Office at Tokio.

Mr. OWEN. Will the hon. minister tell the House to what extent the Japanese government promised to restrict emigration?

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend is too inquisitive. I will not answer, not from disrespect for him, but because if I did answer, I would commit an act unworthy of a Canadian representative and unworthy of myself. There is, however, one feature of those regulations which I am authorized to make public. We all know how strongly has been resented in British Columbia the presence in large numbers of Asiatic labour. As Minister of Labour, I was most anxious to decrease the pressure of surplus alien labour in that province. As a result of the negotiations, all emigration of contract labourers, artisans included, is now prohibited—unless they come at the request of the Canadian government. This means that, hereafter, such companies as the Nippon Supply Company, the real cause of the whole trouble last year, will be unable to co-operate with the emigration companies of Japan in sending labour under contract to this country. Of course, bona fide students, merchants and tourists from Japan will, as before, continue to enjoy freedom of entrance into the Dominion.

As regards emigration from the Hawaiian Islands, the question is settled..

Mr. SLOAN. Might I ask on that point if the attention of the hon. minister has been called to a despatch from Vancouver in the Toronto 'Globe' of January 17, in which it is stated: 'Upwards of a hundred Hawaiian Japanese arrived here on Sunday?'

Mr. LEMIEUX. I know that my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior sent a telegram the day before yesterday inquiring whether or not that report was true. I also know that he has received a telegram in reply; I have not seen it yet; but I see in the 'Evening Journal' of to-day the following despatch, which may be an answer to my hon. friend's question:

Mr. LEMIEUX.

Victoria, B.C., Jan. 21.—Advices received here per the Australian liner 'Miowera,' from Honolulu, state that the steamer 'Dean of Ruthven,' chartered to carry Japanese from a Hawaiian port to British Columbia, sailed without any of them owing to the attitude of the Canadian immigration department and the increasing difficulties in effecting a landing at this port.

At all events, I may tell my hon. friend, as regards all immigration from the Hawaiian Islands, except tourists, students and merchants, the question is settled for ever. The Japanese government admit that they have no jurisdiction and no control over the emigrants coming from Honolulu to Canada. Our Alien Labour Act provides against the importation of contract labour from the United States. Hawaii is an American possession, and, therefore, our Act applies. If its provisions are not found sufficient to meet all requirements, they can be amended accordingly.

It may not be necessary to amend our Alien Labour Act, in view of a recent order in council prohibiting immigrants from landing or coming into Canada unless they come from the country of their birth, or citizenship by a continuous journey, and on through tickets purchased before leaving the country of their birth or citizenship. This regulation applies to the Atlantic and Pacific ports, and applies indiscriminately to all countries. It will exclude the Hindus coming from Hong Kong and Shanghai. The position of the Japanese government is this: 'We do not wish to impose our people upon countries where they are not wanted, where their presence is liable to draw us into international entanglements, but we object to any discrimination against them; if you treat them as you treat all other immigrants, we shall have no objection.' The order in council passed by this government will in future prevent any Japanese coming from the Hawaiian Islands, because they do not come from the country of their origin or citizenship.

With the avenue from Japan carefully regulated, and the avenue from Hawaii completely closed, I can announce to the country that we have eliminated from this issue any features that could give rise to apprehension of any future trouble in regard to oriental immigration. Besides, we are all aware of the propaganda of certain emigration companies operating in Japan. My deputy minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, points out in his report that such companies are chiefly responsible for the large and sudden increase of contract labourers in British Columbia.

At my last interview with Count Hayashi, the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Japan, I called his attention to this fact. He informed me officially and he has authorized me to state before the Canadian parliament, that he had practically suppressed emigration companies in Japan. There were, I think, seventeen of these companies. The deposit required by the government was increased so much that three of them only have been able to continue, the other fourteen have been suppressed. He stated to a deputation of shareholders in those companies, that in future as between high diplomatic interests and those of emigrants, the latter would yield. The three emigration companies remaining in Japan are especially subsidized to invite emigrants, not to the United States and Canada, but to Manchuria and Korea. In future the companies would be prevented by special regulations from carrying on any work of emigratiotn to Canada and the United States.

I hope I have convinced the House, Sir, that the arrangement concluded with the Japanese government is satisfactory, though I am prevented for state reasons, from unfolding many of its essential details. It is not the first time in the history of parliamentary government that in matters of foreign policy, a minister upon his own responsibility, has withheld from the public such information as he may have judged contrary to the interests of the Crown. The principle has been sanctioned on many occasions in England, and there is a wealth of authorities on the subject.

The House, I feel confident, will accept the assurance given officially by Japan to the British ambassador at Tokio and to His Majesty's government in Canada. A trial of six months—or even less—will be the best proof that this assurance has been given in good faith.

After all, Sir, there are only two alternatives. Canada must either abrogate the treaty or accept the arrangement. Assuming that we would abrogate the treaty, which can be done by giving six months' notice, what would be tne result? The abrogation of the treaty would, in so far as Canada is concerned, result in the loss of important commercial advantages, with a market of 50,000,000 people. Look at the possibilities of our trade with the orient. The question of our wheat trade alone with Japan, where during the last ten years, the consumption has increased by 800 per cent should ever be borne in mind, not to speak of the many other articles which Canada can supply her with, such as oatmeal and oats, lumber and pulp, lead, copper, asbestos, aluminum, leather and hides, butter, cheese, fish, horses, cattle, canned milk, canned fruits, wool, bacon, agricultural implements and machinery of all kinds. We may not as yet, have derived from the treaty such advantages as were anticipated, although our exports to Japan have risen from nothing to the half million dollars mark, in a very short time, but the completion of the Grand Trunk Pacific, the increase of transportation facilities, with cheaper rates than the existing ones, cannot fail, especially in the case of our cereal trade, to be productive of most satisfactory results.

On the other hand, would Canada impose upon the Japanese a poll tax of $500? This is practically exclusion, and it is contrary to our policy, in so far as the Japanese are concerned. It would be resented, and rightly so, as a most unfriendly act by Japan, a great nation which admittedly, during the last half century, has risen to a high level of civilization, and has become one of the world's great powers.

The dignified assurance given by Count Hayashi on behalf of his government, is a solemn engagement which Canada is bound to accept in good faith. The fact that it is given of her own free will, makes it the more binding to Japan.

This question brings us on very delicate ground. Exclusion would mean a serious breach in the treaty of alliance between the mother country and Japan. Can we consistently ask the allies and friends of Great Britain to brand themselves before the whole world, as an inferior race—which they are not? They are, on the contrary, the rising power in the far east.

I have already stated that the revision of the treaties in 1894, had been for Japan, the means of entering the comity of civilized nations on a status of equality. To now recede from that position would arouse her national pride and rekindle with renewed intensity the anti-foreigner's movement in the orient. Indeed, this question is of supreme interest to our allies. No government, no public man in Japan, could attempt, without courting popular anger, to disregard it.

In conclusion, Sir, this arrangement is, in my humble judgment, a fair and honourable one. The Japanese government, I know, are not anxious to encourage the emigration of their labourers where they are not wanted, more especially where their presence is liable to draw their country into international entanglements. The fact that they have already suppressed the emigration companies on the ground that they became a dangerously exasperating factor, shows plainly what course they are determined to take.

Acting in that spirit, and with a view to meet our desires, they will voluntarily take such measures as will prevent any further trouble, thus maintaining the cordial relations which should exist between allies, and restoring peace and order in that fairest of the fair provinces of the Dominion.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Carleton, Ont.) May I venture to congratulate the hon. gentleman, Mr. Speaker, on the very eloquent speech he has just made, and although I was not absolutely able to follow the line of his argument in some instances, no doubt I may be better able to do so when I read his remarks in 'Hansard' later on. I observe that he did not answer the question which was put to him by my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. MacPherson), although he promised to come to that later on. Perhaps before the matter is resumed, he may be able to give the House information on the particular point which was touched by that inquiry. I should like, also, that the missing documents among the files be brought down.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. What documents?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. One is a despatch of October 17th from Lord Elgin to His Excellency the Governor General, and the other is from His Excellency the Governor General to Lord Elgin, dated October 22. I observe also that my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) did not, so far as I was able to follow him, refer to the document mentioned by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) in his speech of 1903. During the sitting just before the Christmas holidays, that hon. gentleman told us that he had that document in his hands at the time, though he did not produce it or lay it on the table of the House. I think it desirable that this should be before us.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. What document is it?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not know. It was not produced. It was referred to by the Minister of Agriculture in 1903, immediately after his return from Japan. The document, as the hon. gentleman stated it, was a written assurance given to him by the Japanese government to the effect that the policy adopted by the Japanese government in the past would be persevered in for the future. No doubt, the Minister of Agriculture can enlighten the Prime Minister on that point. And the Prime Minister himself certainly knows more about it than I do. Then, I venture to suggest that the document alluded to by my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) the minute of council, the terms of which were alluded to, should be brought down that we may know what considerations were before the government when they undertook to engage in this treaty.

In view of the enormous mass of correspondence brought down this afternoon, and in view of the exhaustive report of Mr. King, Deputy Minister of Labour which has only now been laid upon the table of the House, and also in view of the very long statement made by the Postmaster General, I would not propose to dscuss the subject at this juncture. I should prefer to look over this correspondence and read carefully the report which has been made and which has a very important bearing upon the whole subject. And, as I propose, for the present, Mr. Speaker, to introduce another subject to the House. I shall be glad if you will call it six o'clock.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. With regard to the draft minute of council referred to, the Postmaster General was not in the cabinet at the time negotiations were concluded. I am not aware that there was a draft minute of council. There may have been only discussion. If there was a minute, it will be brought down.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not profess to know what it was. I was relying altogether upon the observations of the Postmaster General and upon one letter from the Consul General of Japan which conveyed to my mind the idea that a proposal of some kind had been submitted to him as a basis for a treaty between Great Britain, in right of Canada, and Japan.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY—JAPANESE IMMIGRATION.

House resumed on the motion of Mr. Fielding for Committee of Supply.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. When the House took recess at six o'clock, some of my hon. friends from British Columbia spoke to me of their desire to proceed with the debate upon the matter which has been the subject of the remarks of my hon. friend the Postmaster General. I at once announced my readiness to yield the floor to any of those hon. gentlemen in order that they might proceed with the discussion of a subject which is of very great moment to their province, and indeed the whole Dominion, but especially at the present moment to the province of British Columbia. However, coming to me again just now, they asked me as to my own intention of bringing up that matter. I explained to them, as I have already explained to the House, that on account of the large mass of documents brought down to-day, and on account of the somewhat voluminous character of the report of Mr. Mackenzie King, I did not feel inclined to discuss the subject this evening, but preferred to make myself somewhat better acquainted with the documents to which I have just alluded. But I said to them also that, if possible, I would proceed with the discussion of the subject on Thursday next, and certainly not later than Tuesday next, provided an opportunity were afforded by the House being moved into Committee of Supply. I understand that the dates I have alluded to are satisfactory to the gentlemen from British Columbia. But as I have said before, if that suggestion is not satisfactory I shall be happy indeed to yield the floor and let them proceed with the discussion of the subject at once. The proposal I understand is satisfactory to the hon. gentlemen from that province.

PRODUCTION OF ORIGINAL DOCUMENTS.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. There is another matter I would like to bring to the attention of the House, which is not connected with the subject that has been under discussion this afternoon, but it relates to an incident that has taken place during the present session, I mean the question as to how far the representatives of the people of this country assembled in parliament are entitled to access to original documents connected with the transaction of public business in this country. This is a very suitable occasion to bring that subject to the attention of the House, because all the liberties of the Commons of England, and our own are founded upon this right. All the liberties of the Commons of England were in the first place obtained by their insistance upon the right to refuse supply until grievances were redressed. In the earlier times of the parliamentary history of Great Britain that fact stands out prominently above all others that the rights of the Commons of England not only to the redress of grievances, but their very right to enact the laws of the land, depended upon their firm insistence on their right to withhold supply, unless the laws they demanded were framed and unless the grievances for which they sought relief were redressed. So the old tradition stands to-day not only in the parliament of Great Britain, but in the parliaments of all the self-governing countries in the empire, that upon a motion to go into Committee of Supply you can always discuss grievances, because the redress of grievances must precede the granting of supply to the Crown. This subject to which I propose to devote a few minutes this evening, is one which depends upon certain general principles. So far as those principles are concerned, there cannot be, I am sure, any great difference of opinion between hon. gentlemen in this House. In the great work of Mr. May upon Parliamentary Practice, a work recognized as the standard authority in all English speaking countries having parliamentary institutions, at page 507, of the Tenth Edition, the principle is laid down in these words:

> Parliament is invested with the power of ordering all documents to be laid before it, which are necessary for its information, Each House enjoys this authority separately, not in all cases independently of the Crown. Accounts and papers relating to trade, finance and general local matters, are ordered directly, and are returned in obedience to the order of the House, whence it is issued, but returns of matters connected with the exercise of the royal prerogative are obtained by means of addresses to the Crown.

The practice was in this parliament before 1876, that documents of all kinds were brought down by means of an address to the Crown. Later on that practice was modified, and the rule to-day is that documents of a purely departmental nature are brought down under order of the House, while documents which are technically in the possession of the Crown are brought down by means of an address to His Excellency the Governor General. Then in the first volume of Todd's work on parliamentary government in England, the principle is stated still further:

> It is imperative that parliament should be duly informed of everything that may be necessary to explain the policy and proceedings of the government in any part of the empire, and the fullest information is communicated by the government to both Houses from time to time, upon all matters of public concern. For it is in parliament that authoritative statements are made, or information it given, by ministers upon public questions and no action in parliament should be based upon declarations of policy made elsewhere.

That refers of course not only to information respecting policy, but it refers also to all proceedings or actions in which the representatives of the people assembled in parliament can have any interest.

Now, the cabinet, as constituted in English speaking countries to-day, may be said to have three distinct functions. In the first place, as members of the Privy Council—a very old institution indeed in Great Britain and an institution which has been in existence in this country from the earliest times—they advise the Crown. As heads of departments created by statute they have the very important function of presiding over those departments and dealing with the expenditure of vast sums of public money. Then, I think they may be said to have a third status, that is to say as, in a sense, a committee of the House of Commons, as members of the House of Commons constituting the cabinet and being liable to be removed from office whenever they have lost the confidence of the majority of the representatives of the people. In this country they administer the public domain by virtue of a statute passed by this parliament, and it is in connection with the administration of the public domain that the incident to which I have just now alluded had its origin. They administer the public domain and they have power, under the authority conferred upon them by statute, to make grants of the public domain under certain conditions. The incident to which I have alluded arises in connection with the asserted right of a member of this House to have access to certain public documents connected with the grant of a portion of the public domain, and that assertion has gone to this extent that the member in question believes it to be his right—and for that reason he has challenged a vote of this House—not only to have copies of these papers brought down, but, upon his statement as a member of parliament that he believes an inspection of the originals to be essential, he has asked that he be allowed to inspect the originals either in the office of the department, in the presence of the deputy head of that department, or to have these originals brought into this House in order that they may be inspected here.

I understand thoroughly that the rule, or the general principle to which I have called attention this evening, is one that has certain limitations and certain exceptions. Perhaps the two exceptions, or limitations, to which attention may chiefly be called in the discussion of this subject are, in the first place, that documents of a confidential nature may not be disclosed to the House, because, of course it is absolutely clear that in the carrying on of government, especially the government of a great empire like Great Britain and, to a more limited extent, in the carrying on of the government of a great dependency of the empire, such as Canada, there must be documents of a confidential nature and the House should always be willing to accept the words—the assurances—of a minister of the Crown that certain documents are not of a character to be brought down, and that it is not in the public interest that they should be brought down and disclosed to the representatives of the people. Sometimes the reasons are only of a temporary nature, as for example, when negotiations are proceeding and documents which may not be brought down while negotiations of a public character are proceeding may afterwards be brought down without any detriment to the public interest. Then, there is another restriction, another limitation which is that you must not create, by your demand, whether for originals or copies, such inconvenience as would be detrimental to the public service, such inconvenience as would prevent the public service from being carried on in the ordinary and usual way and in the public interest. I am thoroughly prepared to admit this qualification, but I am bound to say that, in so far as the incident to which I have alluded shows, no detriment to the public interest, which is apparent at least to my mind, can be created by the inspection on the part of a member of parliament of a half dozen documents in one of the departments of the government. There is no possible ground of inconvenience that can be put forward as a good answer to that right which has been asserted by one of the members of parliament during the present session. The best proof of that is that the right has not only been asserted, but has been conceded by the government from time to time up to the present session. In the discussions which have taken place in this House it has been asserted that my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) was endeavouring to create a new precedent. It is not my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, who is endeavouring to create a new precedent; it is the gentlemen on the treasury benches who are endeavouring to create a new precedent by denying to that hon. gentleman a right, which, up to the present time, has been conceded to him and has been conceded to him without any public inconvenience as far as I am aware. If the argument of inconvenience were a good one, what would follow? It would follow that any committee of this House—the Committee on Public Accounts for example—could not legitimately or regularly call for any original documents to be placed before it, because, if the assumption put forward by ministers of the Crown were correct, the public business of the country could not be carried on because of the temporary absence of certain files from a department of the government. The argument of inconvenience either does not go far enough or it goes too far. If it will absolutely paralyse the Department of the Interior, or any other department of the government, to permit members of parliament to look at certain documents in a file of that department, if it will paralyse the operations of the Department of the Interior, or any other department of the government, to have certain files brought and placed in the custody of the clerk of this House, for twenty-four hours, then, it can equally be said—it might be said with even greater force—that it will paralyse the operations of any department of the government to have their files carried into the Committee on Public Accounts and allowed to remain there day after day. Therefore, that argument will not do as far as this is concerned, and some better answer to what has been asserted as the right of the members of this House must be put forward on behalf of the government if they desire us to believe that it is sincerely put forward.

Now, another suggestion has been made and that is that these documents should not be inspected because they relate to title. I am not aware of any principle of parliamentary procedure or practice which would prevent any member of parliament from having access to the original or a copy of any public document because that particular document related to a title to a portion of the public domain granted by the gentlemen upon the treasury benches as trustees for the people of this country. This public domain does not belong to these gentlemen. The public domain which they are administering belongs to the people of the country and no department of the government, administering that public domain as trustees for the people, should have the right to say: We will grant titles of such a character, under such conditions and under such circumstances that we cannot permit and we will not permit the representatives of the people in parliament to see the documents affecting those titles. That cannot be any answer, but if it could be conceived that under any possible circumstances it would be an answer, it certainly cannot be an answer to the demand which has been put forward in this House for this very simple reason that these documents have fulfilled their office as the title has been granted and that title cannot in any way be affected by a perusal of these documents by any member of parliament.

Now, the other chief exception to which I intended to call attention was the rule as to confidential documents. I have already alluded to that briefly. But, surely, it cannot be pretended that any documents relating to a title granted by a minister of the Crown, or by the cabinet as a whole, or by the Department of the Interior, can be of a confidential character. I submit therefore that upon that consideration there is no possible reason whatever why documents of this character should not be brought down, and I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that the rule which has been put forward by the government, in the first place by my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) and acceded to, I regret to say, by my right hon. friend the leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), is absolutely subversive of the public interest, and I trust that it will not be persevered in by the gentlemen who sit on the treasury benches.

It has been said that production of copies is enough, and so it is sometimes, and for the most part it is accepted. But if any member of this House, upon his responsibility as a member sees fit to say that he desires the production of the originals or the inspection of the originals, why should not his motion in that respect be acceded to for the very same reason that his motion is accepted when he demands copies to be laid on the table of the House. It has not been the practice of this House in my experience to demand any special reason from any gentleman in this House who moves for copies of documents connected with the government of the country. The motion is acceded to as a matter of course, and for the same reason, when an hon. member rises in his place and declares that he believes it necessary in the public interest that he should have access to these documents his request should be granted, unless the case can be brought within one of the exceptions of which I have spoken. The suggestion has been made that the production of copies would subserve every possible purpose that can be subserved by the production of the originals. It is only necessary to allude to two or three of a dozen illustrations to show that that reasoning will not hold good. The handwriting may be of the utmost possible importance, the date of the receipt of the document may be of the utmost possible importance, and it did prove of the utmost importance in one case which was discussed in this House either last session or the session before. In that case the stamp of the department, showing the date that a particular document was received in the department proved to the satisfaction of every hon. gentleman in this House that a particular letter which purported to be written in Montana was really written in Ottawa and, that an application for a grant of the public domain made in that case was not really made in the interest of or on behalf of the man who purported to make it, but was made on behalf of another man and another interest altogether. I need not multiply these illustrations; it is necessary to give only two or three to justify any hon. gentleman of this House in coming to this House or going to a department and demanding that as a representative of the people of this country he shall be permitted to inspect the original of that document, a copy of which may have been brought before the House. I admit that you can impose limitations so as to prevent public inconvenience or to prevent the business of the country from being unduly hindered. That is all well enough and to that I take no exception, but I do take exception to a rule laid down by the Department of the Interior or any other department which says that a representative of the people shall not be permitted to inspect an original document and shall not be allowed to have that document laid upon the table of the House. Under these circumstances I beg to move:

That all the words after the word 'that' be omitted and the following substituted therefor:

Subject to such considerations of public policy as can be validly urged in any case it is the undoubted right of the peoples' representatives in parliament assembled to be informed of everything necessary to explain the policy and proceedings of the government and for that purpose to have an opportunity of seeing and examining all documents connected with the transaction of public business; and the denial of such right by the government justifies the refusal by this House of further supplies to the Crown.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). I have no objection whatever to take to the principles which have been enunciated by my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) both in his speech and in his motion; but I want to call his attention to one fact in connection with it. The whole matter arises out of a discussion which took place a few days ago in this House and to which I shall have to advert. No one denies and certainly no one on this side of the House intends to deny, that it is the right of the members of parliament assembled here for the purpose of carrying on the business of the country to be informed of everything that concerns the public interest. No one denies either, that members of parliament have the right to have access to all the records of the government and to all the archives, if they believe that in the public interest they should have such access. Nor do I conceive that this privilege has been denied on the occasion to which my hon. friend has referred.

Mr. FOSTER. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I say most advisedly that the principle had not been at all denied on the occasion to which my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) alludes. Nay, more, this right is exercised daily in the House of Commons. But, in the exercise of this right as in the exercise of every right there are certain rules to be followed. The hon. leader of the opposition, who is a distinguished member of the Bar, knows, perhaps better than any one else that in the enforcement of rights whether in the high court of parliament or the subordinate courts of the realm, certain rules have to be rigidly enforced because a deviation from them would result in confusion and loss, perhaps to the parties themselves. It is a privilege exercised every day in the House that members on one side or the other call for information, but every one knows that demand is made in a manner fixed by the rules of the House, that is, by the government bringing down copies or perhaps extracts. Todd says:

> When copies of correspondence are moved for by private members it is customary to ask for extracts, leaving to ministers the discretion as to despatches which it may be advisable to lay before parliament and as to those which it may be expedient in whole or in part to withhold.

That is to say, a member of the House has the right to ask for information and this information is conveyed in the form of copies of the documents, and sometimes it may be advisable to bring down the whole record and sometimes extracts only should be brought down.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That is with respect to documents, portions of which may be confidential.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not qualify, but I will even accept the qualification, at all events some reliance has to be placed on the discretion of the Crown as to whether entire copies or only extracts shall be brought down. But the point I want to come at is, that as a rule the information which a member desires is conveyed to him by the copies of the documents which are on record. I can see very well that there would be occasions where a member, for good and sufficient reason, may think that the information he is seeking would best be obtained by viewing the originals and not the copies. But as a matter of fact, ninety-nine times out of a hundred the object of the member asking for this information is served by producing copies. But there may be other occasions where, perhaps, for reasons which are known to himself, and which I would not question, and which he can state to the House, a member may think that the copies would not give him the information which the originals would. So far so good, and if he so states, it seems to me that he is entitled to have the originals. But what was the position taken the other day and again to night by our hon. friends opposite? It is that a member of the House, in asking for information which he is entitled to demand from the government, and which parliament ought to force the government to bring down, he can ask indifferently for originals or copies as he chooses. I ask my hon. friend if this is a reasonable interpretation of the rule. The rule is to produce a copy, but the position taken by my hon. friends was that a member, without giving any reason at all, could ask for either the original or a copy.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. But if he gives a reason is he not entitled to the original?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Then the demand ought to be complied with.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Would the right hon. gentleman like me to answer him at once?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Very good.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I suggested, in an endeavour to make the matter plain, that there is really no difference in his position with regard to the one or the other. The copy may be denied him if he makes an oppressive demand; the original may be denied him if he makes an oppressive demand. But the rule with regard to the original is exactly the same as with regard to the copy; it depends on his stating in the House by his motion as a member of parliament that he desires that information in the public interest.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I deny that proposition. The rule of the House is that he can have the information and the invariable custom and practice of the House is that he shall have it by means of copies. First of all, the House itself is to judge whether or not the information is to be supplied to him. On this point I quote Bourinot, at page 371 of the last edition:

> It is clearly laid down by the most eminent of English parliamentarians that it is incumbent upon the mover to state the reasons upon which his motion is founded, that the House may judge of the necessity, importance and expediency of calling for the papers which are the subject of that motion.

As a rule, when a motion for papers is made we do not challenge the motive of the member making it, but if the motion is challenged, and we say there is no good reason for bringing down the papers, then it is for the member to give reasons which will satisfy the House. I will quote also from Todd on the same point:

> It is the rule of parliament that no papers shall be laid on the table of either House unless some sufficient reasons have been stated for their production. It is irregular to move for the production of papers merely to further the interests or views of private persons, or except for the purpose of founding or facilitating parliamentary proceedings. Government have refused to grant papers unless it be intended to found some proceedings upon them.

For my part I would not go so far as the authorities. This is a democratic age and the rights of democracies are perhaps more extensive now than they were at the time that rule was made. For my part, the moment a member gives a good reason for the production of papers, the production of the papers shall take place. But the rule of parliament is sufficiently served if copies of the archives of the government are brought to the House. The matter is not very important, and I think we ought to be able to agree, as men of common sense, as to what is a fair interpretation of the rule of parliament on this point. I agree that hon. gentlemen opposite, as representatives of the people, are entitled to full information in order properly to discharge their duties. But let me call attention to the rule just now laid down by my hon. friend, not in his motion, but as a deduction from it. We have up to the present time already granted some 75 or 80 motions for papers. Now, if it be the privilege and the right of every member when he moves for papers to insist on having not the copies but the originals, we should have laid upon the table of this House at this moment 75 or 80 files of the archives of the government. Does anybody conceive that that is a reasonable interpretation?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I never stated any such rule.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No, my hon. friend never stated any such rule, but he stated that whenever a member of parliament asked for information it was his right, without giving any reason, to ask either for originals or copies. If that is his right, he can insist upon it, and we might have, without any rhyme or reason, 75 or 80 of the files of the departments at the present time on the table of this House.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. If my right hon. friend will permit me, I said that even a demand for copies might be so oppressive that the government of the day would be justified in resisting it. I conceded that at once, but I said that it seemed to me that the same principle applied to originals as to copies. You grant copies on the statement of a member on his responsibility as a member; you should also grant access to originals, within certain limitations, for the same reason.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Very well. I will take my hon. friend's statement. He says that on some occasions it would be the privilege of the government to resist such a request for papers. How are we to judge whether a request ought to be resisted or not if a reason is not given for it? This justifies the rule which I have quoted from Todd and Bourinot, that a reason must be given before a demand is made.

Mr. HAGGART. I beg pardon. The reason may be given after the order is made.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I think my hon. friend will have to revise his memory. In the ordinary discharge of business we do not ask for the application of this rule, but the papers are granted as soon as the motion for them is made. But if the hon. gentleman makes a motion of that kind and has good reasons for making it, he should give his reasons at once so that the House may judge on the necessity or expediency of granting the motion. Coming to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden), he has taken a more rational view of the case than my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Haggart). The leader of the opposition admitted that there may be circumstances in which such a demand might be oppressive. That admission shows that reasons must be given for the demand. My hon. friend puts on the same parallel the production of originals, but there may be occasions when a demand for the production of an original would be oppressive and when therefore it would be proper not to accede to it. What was the position which we took the other day? It was this. We said, show us some reason, if you have any, why the originals called for should be brought down. Was that the position taken by my hon. friend from St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames)? Let me quote the language of my hon. friend, and if I refer to a past debate, I ask the permission of the House before doing so.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. We have no objection.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This is what my hon. friend said :

> We contend that we have a perfect right to ask for the originals and the government must plead very good reasons to justify it in refusing access to such papers.

Mr. FOSTER. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. But my hon. friend is reversing the position. He makes a motion without giving reasons, and contends that it is for the government to show reasons why the papers asked for should not be produced. Well, I submit that he should have stated his reasons for the production of these papers. If he had stated them, his demand would have been complied with at once. But he made this a test case, and he drafted this motion purely and simply to test whether or not hon. members have the right to insist on the production of originals——

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Not all the originals—nine out of ten.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This motion has been drafted purely and simply to test whether or not hon. gentlemen are entitled to obtain originals without giving any reasons for their demand. My hon. friend from St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames) may have had good reasons for his request. That I am not denying, and if he had said we ask for those papers because we have good reasons for looking at the originals, his demand would have been complied with at once. But that was not the point of view he took. The point of view he took, in bringing this motion, was to make it a test case in order to decide whether, without giving any reason, he is entitled to the production of the originals. I say that he is wrong, and that is why his motion was refused the other day.

I now come to the motion of my hon. friend which reads as follows :

> Subject to such considerations of public policy as can be validly urged in any case, it is the undoubted right of the peoples' representatives, in parliament assembled, to be informed of everything necessary to explain the policy and proceedings of the government, and for that purpose to have an opportunity of seeing and examining all documents connected with the transaction of public business; and the denial of such right by the government justifies the refusal by this House of further supplies to the Crown.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

I have not a word of exception to that motion. It meets my views. It states a truism ; but in the application of this truth, I simply go back to the position taken by the authorities and by my hon. friend himself, namely, that in the exercise of this right an oppressive demand might be made which the government would have the right to refuse. That being the case, it is necessary that the reasons for the demand should be given. If my hon. friend from St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames) or any other member should ask for the original papers and give good reasons for his request, certainly his demand will be immediately complied with. But when he says that without any reasons whatever he claims the right to have the archives of the government brought down and laid on the table, I do not agree with him. For the reasons I have given I have no objection in agreeing to the motion of my hon. friend.

Hon. GEO. E. FOSTER (North Toronto). My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) gets down out of a tight place quicker than he crawls up to a good one. This is about the most remarkable exhibition of agility I have ever seen. The right hon. gentleman saw fit to ignore every thing that preceded the absolutely tyrannical refusal made the other day in this House, and which was initiated before the other day in the hon. gentleman's department in which the question arose. This case has a history. A year ago or less, when a member on this side wished to look at original documents in a department, when he wished, for instance, to examine some part of a file, he could call for the papers to be brought down and then the minister of the department in question would have to put the department to the expense and trouble of having those copied. But frequently, as a matter of courtesy, the minister would inform him that as there might be certain papers in the file which he did not require, he could come to the department and look through the files and find out what papers it was necessary he should have, and thus save the inconvenience and expense of having copies made of those which were not necessary to him. That practice is well known to all members of the House. Again instead of asking for the papers to be brought down, an hon. member would mention that there was certain information he desired, and invariably the minister would be kind enough to ask the hon. member to come to his department and look over the papers and thereby perhaps do away with the necessity of having copies made of any part of the file. Up to a few months ago, that course of procedure was invariably followed. But then my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver)—I do not know for what reason, and I am not aware that the door of his department was ever strongly barred or bolted or banged in the face of members of his own political persuasion—took a crotchety opinion into his brain, as he sometimes does, and decided to become an autocrat in his own department. He forgot that he was simply the hired man, the paid servant of the people, and supposed that he bossed the whole job or owned it. Therefore he came to the conclusion that he would entrench himself behind some authority, which he supposed to be good, and issue his ukase. He deposited himself upon the broad bulk of his deputy minister, and his deputy minister, after sundry labourings, brought forth a document which was to serve as a basis for all after action. There were no 'ifs' or 'buts' in the document prepared by his deputy. Mr. Cory reasoned out the whole matter as his minister wished him to do. He came exactly to the conclusion that his minister desired, and that conclusion was absolute. He recommended to his minister that, in all case the copies alone should be given and that the originals should not be allowed to pass out of the possession of the department. The deputy came to that conclusion and made that report after my hon. friend from St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames) had asked in the motion first put by him before the House, for the originals of the applications which he wanted and wanted for a very good purpose. That, then, is the precedent history. The hon. member for St. Antoine, having been used to the courtesies of the department in other years, expected to be treated in the same way this year. But he received a letter from the Minister of the Interior that he, the minister, had made a new rule in the department, the new rule being that no member of parliament should be allowed to examine the original files in his department. Now, that was a rule absolute—no reason given, no discussion, no discretion allowed. Under this rule, the masters of the situation became subservient to the servant in the situation.

But there is more. Never until this session have I known any serious attempt made to prevent the members of the Committee on Public Accounts from having opportunity to peruse at their leisure the papers brought before the committee. Original documents brought before the committee were always left where they could be examined by the members. But we had not been assembled in the Public Accounts five minutes this year when notice was served upon us that the latitude of previous years would not be continued, and that we were not to be allowed to peruse original documents as before. More than one minister gave it to be understood that these documents were necessary in his department, and could not be given out, because they might be lost, causing inconvenience to the department. Further, a minister, new in his department issued instructions to his officer: If the Public Accounts Committee call for documents, I will deliver the documents into your charge; take them to the committee; whilst the committee is in session, these documents may be inspected, but as soon as the committee disperses, bring back these documents to the department. I need not tell the right hon. leader of this House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that under that procedure no business can be done by the Public Accounts Committee. These documents are bulky, in many cases, and it takes hours and hours of quiet, of study, of assiduous attention, to cull from them what you need for the examination of witnesses. I have stated what actually happened in the committee. The matter was brought up in this House, I believe, and the Prime Minister caused his minister to climb down, so far as this matter was concerned. He did not give his ultimate decision, but he declared that it should be the rule hereafter—and he might have added that it has always been the rule hitherto—that these original documents were to be left in the charge of the clerk of the Commons. Then this other matter supervened. My right hon. friend must recollect the position in which members of the opposition are. They are thwarted in every move they make towards free investigation. The leader of the House and his party made it a chief plank in their platform that the parliament of Canada has an inalienable right to the utmost freedom of investigation of charges made, and of examining into public business. And they moved vote after vote of censure upon us when we were on that side of the House, because, they said, we would not give them the facilities for this free examination of public documents. So the opposition, headed off at every turn in this House and in the committee, must stand firm; it must not allow any of the rights sanctioned by custom, even of recent times, to be taken away; otherwise their function disappears, their usefulness is gone. These antecedent and concomitant circumstances must be taken into account in discussing this question.

Now, as to the point that there was no reason given for the production of these original documents. In the first place both speeches of the hon. member for St. Antoine give reasons. Moreover every hon. gentleman on this side who spoke cited one or more examples to show that it would have been impossible to gain required information had not original documents been supplied. They also cited features of almost any set of papers which could not be fully understood except by viewing the originals—memoranda upon the documents, dates, signatures and so on. Every man who has examined evidence knows that, very often, if these cannot be seen, you cannot get at the facts. But I want to remind my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) of one most specific statement made by the hon. member for St. Antoine. That hon. gentleman came down to particulars. I would like the right hon. gentleman to listen to this :

It is my right in the House to ask this information to be placed where I can see it, and in due time I will give all the information I have with reference to these limits in a form that will quite satisfy the Minister of the Interior. Here is the return we have been speaking about.

This motion was founded upon a certain return asked for. My right hon. friend goes into an analysis of the reasons why, in this specific instance, a refusal was given :

Here is the return we have been speaking about; it contains 453 pages. I have read that return from cover to cover. Now, there are nine pages of that return which can be illumined if I may see the originals. As to all the other pages the copies are all I want. But there are nine pages there with respect to which the copy does not tell me all I want to know or which I have the right to know if I understand my rights in this House of Commons.

Mr. OLIVER. Does my hon. friend say that these nine pages differ from the originals?

Now you see the whole purpose of the Minister of the Interior. And the Prime Minister and every other hon. gentleman who spoke on that side laid down the dictum : Make your complaint, swear to it and we will take into consideration whether we will let you have the original documents or not. This is all implied in the question of the Minister of the Interior : Does my hon. friend (Mr. Ames) say that these nine pages differ from the original.

Mr. OLIVER. He could not and tell the truth.

Mr. FOSTER. So, neither by the courtesy of the Minister of the Interior nor by the will of this House, was he allowed to have a look at these originals.

An hon. MEMBER. Did you hear what the minister said ?

Mr. FOSTER. Perhaps the minister will be good enough to repeat what he said.

Mr. OLIVER. I said he could not say they were different and tell the truth.

Mr. FOSTER. He could not say that they differed and tell the truth. The member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) tells the truth and does not lie, and the minister simply gives him a chance to get these original documents by forcing him to lie in this House. Let him tell me, says the minister, that the originals and the copies are different, and he shall have the originals, and if he gets up and says he could not if he were truthful say they were not, he would not get them. Therefore my hon. friend from St. Antoine has to give a lie in this House in order to get original papers.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. How could he tell unless he sees the originals?

Mr. AMES. I say that these nine pages will in all probability clear up certain doubts which I have regarding peculiar events in connection with some of these transactions, and I say that the handwriting of some of these nine pages may have a very important bearing on the case.

My hon. friend goes into particulars, he gives the only reason he can possibly give, being a truthful man. He cannot swear to it before this House; or pledge his word that the original differs from the copies. But he has made an investigation into these 450 pages, the atmosphere of that transaction invites him; he gets, as every man gets in the examination of a file of papers, into the spirit of the transaction, and to a certain extent into the mind, and wish, and development, and trend of the men who are making applications and are following out the business. That inevitably takes place, and after having devoted that time to it he says, I see things in those nine pages which lead me to believe that if I had the originals I could clear up for myself doubts which I now have. Could there be a more reasonable reason given?

I say that the handwriting of some of those nine pages may have a very important bearing on the case.

So it might. Applications for timber leases, for grazing leases are made by different persons; in the copies that come down there is not the handwriting of the different persons, it is simply a typewritten copy. I have looked over those papers myself, and I know exactly the point of view of the member for St. Antoine, and I agree with him in saying that he is absolutely at sea unless he can see those applications and see the handwriting upon those original applications with reference to the matter, and maybe some other things in connection therewith. The hon. member for Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Duncan Ross) made an argument to the effect that a man's title to his timber limits might be involved. Now, my right hon. friend will see the insufficient case upon which the Minister of the Interior and himself refused to the House the information that the member for St. Antoine wished. Not a state reason, those were not state papers; yet one of his humble followers based his whole argument, as denying this motion, because these might be state papers. They were not state papers.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. My argument, if the hon. gentleman will read my whole statement, was to this effect, that original papers had been laid on the table of the House and had disappeared, and there was no good reason why they should not disappear again, and as they were appertaining to titles of people who were doing business with the Interior Department, that was a very good reason why the original papers should remain in the custody of the department who was responsible for them and not laid on the table of the House where they might disappear.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend's reasoning is not good. In the first place, is it possible or impossible for a paper to disappear in a department? Did that ever occur?

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. I do not think so.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, my hon. friend has not had much experience in administering departments; I have had some, and I have known papers to disappear, and I think there are few ministers in this House that have not known papers to disappear. The Minister of Justice himself came into this House no later than last year and had to explain rather an intricate case by declaring that those papers some how or other had got mislaid and he could not get them, and therefore his answer was incorrect. Papers do get mislaid in the departments. What would my hon. friend think if I made a motion in this House that all the papers should be taken out of the Department of the Minister of Justice simply because in some way a paper had disappeared? But the disappearance of a paper is not the essential thing. Let the Minister of the Interior, let the clerk of the House, let the clerk of the committee, take any means that are reasonable to protect the papers. That is what they have to do. The main thing is to get the information; the responsibility for guiding the sources of information and there guiding them back again to the proper repository is for the minister to see to. It is no reason to say that because a paper may disappear you should not have the information. Where would we be on an assumption of that kind? Again, I take exception to my hon. friend's argument in this respect. The title of a man to a coal lease or a grazing lease might hang upon these. Might hang upon an absolutely closed and settled set of applications. That is all this means. These are applications, they are dead papers; that is, they are dead in so far as they have lived out their usefulness. The claims of a dozen applicants, we will say, have been submitted, a decision has been made, the successful applicant has been singled out and the proper title has gone to the successful applicant.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. Does the hon. gentleman know that in this instance the title has gone to the successful applicant?

Mr. FOSTER. It is a two-year old concern.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. Well, I do not know anything about it; I do not know the particular application. As I understand these regulations, the applicant does not get his title until he completes his survey of that particular timber limit. My point is that when he has not got his perfected title to this timber limit, all that he has to show that he has any claim to it at all are the papers in the Department of the Interior.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I will undertake to say that if my hon. friend looks into the departmental file of those applications as they lie there to-day and are passed upon perhaps he will find that no title is dependent on those papers. So the particular circumstance upon which the minister has chosen to fight out this question—and the right hon. gentleman took occasion to back him up very strongly—is the weakest case there could possibly be. Not a state paper; not something which is in progress, the bringing down of which might militate against the interests of the parties involved, as for instance, when tenders are in, and a member of the House should ask for those before they had been passed upon and the award had been made. Those going things, public documents, international papers and the like of that, those are papers of which I am quite willing to admit the greatest care should be taken, and if an imprudent member like myself were to ask for them in the course of their progress, before they were in a position to have been passed, relating to unsettled affairs, then I should consider the House was perfectly right if it felt indisposed to give them. In England that has been done over and over again. Just the other day the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, when asked for a set of papers by motion, said, Well, they have not yet filled their course; they are matters of still unsettled correspondence between ourselves and the home government and I cannot bring them down. Nobody made any objection.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Does my hon. friend contend that a member of the House, entitled to full information, can ask indifferently for originals or copies without giving any reason at all? Is that his contention?

Mr. FOSTER. Well, two cannot stand at once. I will wait until my right hon. friend gets down. My right hon. friend asks me whether I think a member can simply ask for these papers without giving any reason at all.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. For originals or copies?

Mr. FOSTER. I say that never took place. I will just leave that for a moment until I refer to what my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) says:

In the first place——

My hon. friend says referring to the matter of papers being lost:

—the minister can take any precaution he likes to see that these papers when they are laid before this House are properly safeguarded.

In fact my hon. friend said: Let me go and look at them; you may bring in the whole Dominion police, you may stand them all around me, you may have a whole cordon of these policemen around me—I do not care how many—all I want to see are these nine pages; put all your artillery and infantry of watchfulness at work, but just simply let me look at these papers in your office. No, Sir; the door is to be closed and no member of parliament is to come into my department and see any of the papers of the country in which he is a business partner! That was where the first trouble arose and my right hon. friend, before he got up in the House and said: I fully endorse the position taken by my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior—should have acquainted himself a little more as to the position that the minister took, and if he had done so I do not think he would have made such a statement.

Ten minutes will suffice me to look through them.

A pretty reasonable thing for a member of parliament who wants to see papers! After detailing all the things that he has detailed, why he wants them, he goes on to say that he does not desire to cause the department any inconvenience:

Ten minutes will suffice me to look them through; he can have them back in ten minutes in his department if he wants them. What I am asking for is not the original lease which has been passed between the various owners of these timber limits and the government; that is the official document in which the rights of the lessees have been set forth. What I am asking for are three applications made for timber limits and six tenders in connection with timber limits, in all nine documents, nine pages. Is that a very enormous amount of work for the department to produce these nine pages?

The inconvenience is there reduced to a minimum. If the wheels of the Department of the Interior had been stopped for five minutes it would have been a very short time and would have caused very little inconvenience. The argument of inconvenience as it is there is at the worst for my right hon. friend and at the best for my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, because if anything it only involves five minutes of inconvenience. My hon. friend says simply: Let me in, put the documents on the table, let me have five minutes at them, surround them by all the safeguards and then take them back to the minister of the department. Then my hon. friend continues:

Adopt any method you like, move any amendment you want, but establish the principle that when we on this side of the House have what we consider good and sufficient reason we may have the right to see an original document, or else, be prepared to take the odium throughout the country that you do not wish an original document to come to light.

Did not the position taken by my hon. friend fulfil every condition that the right hon. leader of the government laid down here this night? And yet, in the most curt, arbitrary manner the Minister of the Interior, the right hon. leader of the government himself, and every man who stood up to fight the opposition on that request of my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, refused it, and refused it, as I have said, with scant courtesy. Now, the right hon. leader of the government has had a little time to grow cool. I hope it will be a lesson for the Minister of the Interior and also a lesson for himself. But, the Minister of the Interior must learn, as he ought to have learned from the lessons which have been administered to him in this House, that he is not the autocrat of the House and that he is not the autocrat of the department in so far as to keep the partners in the country's business out of his office, and the right hon. leader of the House, if I may advise him, would learn wisdom if he would not take it for granted that all his ministers are as wise as himself. He has saved the situation to-night, and I think he deserves the thanks of the House, and of you, Mr. Speaker, for that. He climbed, not as gracefully as I have seen him do other evolutions in the House, but still he climbed down.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior). Mr. Speaker, I would like to take exception, in so far as the Department of the Interior is concerned at any rate, to the very definite statement made by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) in the early part of his remarks that every endeavour was made to prevent the opposition from getting information. Since I have had the honour of having charge of the Department of the Interior, the members of the House will bear me out in saying—their remembrance will be the same as mine—that never in the history of parliament has there been such a demand for information from the Department of the Interior, or any other department of the government, and never has that demand been acceded to as fully and as readily and with as little question. My hon. friends on the other side of the House absolutely tied up the business of the Interior Department during the session before last until I had to place the facts before the House and put upon them the responsibility for the fact that the business of the country could not be properly carried on through that department. I say that my hon. friend is not warranted in any degree in that statement in so far as the Department of the Interior is concerned, a fact that must necessarily have been within his knowledge from his long parliamentary experience. I repeat that never in the history of the country has there been a demand upon a single department for information such as had been made upon the Department of the Interior during this and the past two sessions, and never has the demand been acceded to as readily and as fully.

In regard to the matter in question, or which is stated by my hon. friend to be the matter in question, that is, the right of the hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine, to inspect original documents on the files of the department, my hon. friend no doubt changed his point of view when he changed his seat in the House. I understand that the business appertaining to the Department of the Interior is placed under my control as a trust to be discharged in the interest of the people of the country. That while it is the right of parliament to have all information in connection with that department it is only the right of parliament to have that information, and it is my understanding of the trust placed upon me that it is not the right of any individual, whether he be a member of parliament or not, to have access to the documents in that department. As I understand the trust placed upon me, in discharging the business of the people—the people who are behind members of parliament and who send them here—it is that documents placed in that department, the property of the people, or representing the property of the people, shall be duly and properly cared for. If parliament sees fit to issue an order, parliament is supreme. Parliament can turn the Department of the Interior inside out if it pleases, but it is not the privilege of an individual member of parliament to do so, I submit. If I am instructed to the contrary, well and good, I will accept the instruction. But in so far as I understand my duties and responsibilities, they are to carefully guard and care for every paper and every interest that is in that department, and the fact that a certain gentleman has been honoured with a seat in this parliament does not give him any more right to investigate the private business of other people which is in charge of the Department of the Interior, than it does any other citizen.

Mr. LAKE. If this resolution is passed by the House, does the minister still intend to refuse to members of parliament the privilege of looking at the files in this department.

Mr. OLIVER. Unless otherwise instructed by the House I certainly do. I do not accept this resolution as instruction on that point. If the House so instructs me then the responsibility is taken off my shoulders and I care not. But so long as the responsibility rests on my shoulders I feed bound to discharge that responsibility according to my conscience.

Mr. BRISTOL. I would ask the minister if it has not been customary in his department for a long time past, to allow members of parliament to examine original documents, just as Mr. Ames said he was allowed to examine the Galway-Brown papers ?

Mr. OLIVER. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. BRISTOL. Was it done without your knowledge in the department ? When did you first learn that your officers had been accustomed to show original documents in that way ?

Mr. OLIVER. I never learned they were accustomed to show original documents in that way. If they have been accustomed to do, as I will take occasion to show, it was contrary to my orders and contrary to the orders given before I entered the department.

Mr. BRISTOL. I understood from statements made here that it was quite customary to do so formerly.

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend has a misunderstanding in that connection as he has in many others.

Mr. BRISTOL. Never mind the others, I am speaking about this one now.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Will the minister say there are no files out of the department now.

Mr. OLIVER. I cannot say. They are not out with my knowledge. Will the hon. gentleman say there are files out of the department ?

Mr. FOSTER. How about that sacred trust of yours if they are going out without your knowledge.

Mr. OLIVER. Does the leader of the opposition say there are files out ?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not know it but I have heard it on good authority.

Mr. OLIVER. I would be glad to have the information more accurately.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. You had better go and find out.

Mr. OLIVER. I say I don't believe there are.

Mr. J. D. REID. Did not the minister invite members from this side of the House to go over to his department last session and the session before, to inspect original documents ?

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly not. But in the case mentioned by the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) there was a question raised before the House as to the correctness of a return and in order to facilitate business, in order to assist in clearing up any doubt or question there might be in that direction, permission was given to the member to look over the originals.

Mr. J. D. REID. That were in your department.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, as a matter of courtesy and for the purpose of facilitating the business.

Mr. J. D. REID. That is the very point we are raising now.

Mr. OLIVER. Precisely, but that was an exception and not as a rule.

Mr. FOSTER. Any more exceptions besides that ?

Mr. OLIVER. There may have been other exceptions but I will take occasion to show that they were exceptions and not the rule. I think my hon. friend will agree, before I am through, that it would be a very improper rule. Let us understand what is the nature of the documents that are in charge of the Department of the Interior and which are particularly the object of the curiosity of my hon. friends opposite. They are transactions between the government as representing the whole people, and individual citizens. They are transactions, which if they are not completed those papers should not be put in jeopardy by being released from the responsibility of the department. My hon. friend knows that transactions in regard to timber limits are never closed ; that the license is renewed from year to year ; and that at any time a question may be raised as to the right of any person who holds that license, and that the only evidence there is as to the right is the documents upon file in the Department of the Interior. It is not a matter of interest particularly to the government whether these files are here or there, but it is a matter of very definite interest to the people whose title to their property rests upon these files. It is in the discharge of the duty of the department to these people that I say I do not think it is advisable either that the files should be released from the custody of the department or should be available to any person who may choose to inspect them. But, my hon. friend may say that a member of parliament, not only has the standing of being a member of parliament but that his position as a member of parliament places him so that he only looks over these files as a matter of public interest. Unfortunately, members of parliament represent individuals—individual voters and people having individual interests—and there is nothing to hinder any individual who wants to acquaint himself as to the business of another individual asking a member of parliament to go into the department and discover for him information that he wants, information in regard to the personal interests of that other individual, using the member as a medium for acquiring information. Now, I think my hon. friends will agree that it is not proper that the business of a department should be so conducted as to permit that. The files are there and copies of them have never been refused the House, so that all the public interest in connection with the transaction can be decided by the House and so that every member of the House has an equal opportunity to inform himself in regard to the business upon these files. But if these files are to be kept in the department subject to the inspection of individual members of the House at pleasure, one member informs himself and the rest of the House which is equally entitled is not informed, and the hon. gentleman who informs himself, whether for his own benefit or for the benefit of private individuals for whom he is acting or for the purpose of discussion in the House, is placed at an absolutely unfair advantage as against other private individuals or against other members of the House. What I say in regard to timber limits applies to other transactions dealing with the public resources of the country. We are not asking for secrecy because of transactions in which the government or its friends are or may be improperly interested. We are not asking for secrecy at all, because, as the leader of the House has pointed out, if any member of the House will give a public reason for the production of these documents all risks will be taken and they will be produced.

Mr. BOYCE. Did the Minister of the Interior give that as a reason when he refused access to these documents to the member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) ?

Mr. OLIVER. What I said to the hon. member (Mr. Ames) was that I did not wish him to examine the documents in the department because I did not want to allow anybody to do so and I did not wish to make an exception in his case. I said that if he wanted to get the documents the proper course was to get a resolution of the House and then the responsibility was lifted from my shoulders.

Mr. TAYLOR. And you voted his resolution down.

Mr. BOYCE. What I referred to is the ground taken by the minister in the House when the motion was made.

Mr. OLIVER. What I said in the House was that if my hon. friend (Mr. Ames) would show cause, would give a public reason for the production of these documents I for one would certainly agree to produce them and he would undoubtedly and unquestionably have a right to them. But he did not give any public reason. In all the reasoning my hon. friend from North Toronto read in the report of the speech made by the hon. member for St. Antoine, no reason was given except the reason of curiosity.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. OLIVER. Well, will my hon. friends say what reason was given? Was it because the documents before the House were not copies of the originals ? Did he say that he believed they were not ? He did not say that ? Did he say that the originals were forgeries ? Did he give any reason except that of curiosity for the production of those documents ?

Mr. BRISTOL. Will my hon. friend allow me ? He seems in search of information. He has information of his own as to what a public reason is, and when he states it we shall all know. Now, Mr. Ames said :

I say that these nine pages will in all probability clear up certain doubts which I have regarding peculiar features in connection with some transactions; I say that the handwriting of some of these nine pages may have a very improtant bearing on the case.

That is all he reasonably could say unless the Minister of the Interior will suggest some public reason.

Mr. OLIVER. He might say that he believed the handwriting was a forgery.

Mr. BRISTOL. How could he say that without seeing it ?

Mr. OLIVER. The fact that there was in the mind of the hon. member for St. Antoine a suspicion that there might be something wrong in those documents, I submit to common sense people was not a reason why he should be put in possession of other people's property.

Mr. BRISTOL. On what principle then does my hon. friend think the courts of this and other countries require the production of original documents ?

Mr. OLIVER. Because they have a substantial reason.

Mr. BRISTOL. What about the titles to land ? You could not proceed for a moment without producing the originals.

Mr. FOSTER. Better give it up.

Mr. OLIVER. No, I do not think I had better give it up. I say that the rule is laid down very clearly that if a reason is given, the documents can be produced.

Mr. BOYCE. Will my hon. friend allow me a question ? He says that if a reason is given for the production of the documents they can be produced. Does he remember that in objecting to the production of the originals on January 13, he gave as a reason a letter from his deputy, dated December 6, which closed by saying, with regard to those papers : 'I would strongly urge that any attempt to compel the department to produce the same should be resisted.'

Mr. OLIVER. That is the advice of the deputy.

Mr. BOYCE. Which you follow.

Mr. OLIVER. Which I follow unless I am otherwise instructed by parliament, and so far I have not been otherwise instructed by parliament.

Mr. BOYCE. Because you helped to vote it down.

Mr. OLIVER. Because my hon. friend from St. Antoine did not give a reason for what he wanted. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to draw attention to just one or two other points in this connection. My hon. friend from North Toronto said that there was not any danger of any documents being mislaid. I have made some inquiry in this connection.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend, I think, misunderstands me. I could not have stated that there was no danger of any documents being mislaid. That would be a general assertion which no man of any common sense would make, surely. But I did say that even though there was a danger of their being mislaid, that was not sufficient reason for their being denied.

Mr. OLIVER. I accept the hon. gentleman's statement ; possibly I was wrong. What I would like to say is that there is a possibility of documents being mislaid, and it is fair for the House and fair for the country that the responsibility for those documents should not be divided—that there should be no responsibility for them outside of the department. I think everybody will agree that that is in the public interest in the transaction of public business.

Mr. FOSTER. Suppose I ask my hon. friend a question. Suppose the Crown has a suit and certain papers of the department are absolutely necessary to that suit being carried to a conclusion. Suppose the Crown's lawyer says, I want those papers to take to my office and have them thoroughly looked over, and I want them taken to court. Will my hon. friend go so far as to say that the moment he delivers them over, his responsibility ceases ? Surely not.

Mr. OLIVER. His responsibility remains, because he allows them to go out of his hands ; but if the House orders those papers to be brought down to the House, then surely the responsibility of the department ceases.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think so.

Mr. OLIVER. Surely the responsibility is then on the House.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the minister must follow them.

Mr. OLIVER. Should a paper be mislaid, the proof of the fact could not then be made. If the department were anxious to shuffle off responsibility, it would be glad to have original papers brought to the House, and have the responsibility placed on other shoulders. Let me draw the attention of the House to a fact which occurred during the session of 1906. An order was issued for a return, on a motion of the Hon. Geo. E. Foster, for papers relating to timber berths Nos. 1158, 1175, 1192, 1219, 1231 and 1232, including the original tenders and copies of all other papers. The return was prepared in the usual way, that is, by having copies made of all the papers, and the return was sent down to the House of Commons in this form. The hon. Mr. Foster raised the objection that the original tenders should have been included in the return. On his request the original tenders were therefore produced, and have not since been returned to the department. The department has not now the original tenders in these cases, but only copies thereof.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know how that matter stands. This is the first I have heard of it since two years ago. Where has the Department of the Interior been all that time that it has not asked me for those papers ?

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend took the responsibility or got the House to take the responsibility for those papers. It is no concern of ours where they are. They were taken out of our custody, and the parties who were the owners of those timber limits are short to that extent of their titles to the timber limits.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend will allow me. Of course, a good many persons handled those papers. I am not saying where they are at the present time. I am very free to say that I have not them in my pockets, nor do I know that I have them anywhere amongst my earthly possessions.

An hon. MEMBER. You did not take much care of them.

Mr. FOSTER. That does not follow. I might have taken the greatest care of them, and they might have been lost in transmission through the hands of others.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. How can the Department of the Interior get them back without a resolution of this House ?

Mr. FOSTER. Ask the Minister of the Interior.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. It is a matter of procedure.

Mr. LAKE. Has the minister asked whether they are in the records of this House at the present time ?

Mr. OLIVER. What is the point?

Mr. OLIVER.

Mr. FOSTER. As to whether these original documents are in the records of the House at present.

Mr. OLIVER. These documents were called for on the responsibility of this House and, on the demand of my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster), they were taken out of the custody of my department. I presume they are in the custody of the House, but they cannot be a part of the record of the House and a part of the record of my department at the same time. Parliament, of course, is supreme. If parliament decides that these papers must become a part of its records, that decision must be complied with. It is not my business to find fault with the decision of parliament. I assume that my hon. friend had good reasons for his demand. Is he now going to persuade the House to the contrary by informing us that he had no reasons when he moved for the original documents, that he knew nothing about the transaction, and that he actually tampered with property belonging to these people without cause or provocation ? That is a fair statement of a simple question, and I must say that, charged with the responsibility of administering the Department of the Interior, I cannot conceive, except subject to the dictation and authority of the House, that this is a proper discharge of the responsibility placed upon the department.

Mr. FOSTER. You will have to fight that out with the First Minister.

Mr. OLIVER. There is no dispute between us. The incident I have mentioned occurred in the session of 1906. In the session of 1907, on the occasion of a discussion regarding grazing leases, my hon. friend from St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames) was allowed, at his request, to go into the Department of the Interior and inspect the original documents in that particular case, but that permission was granted as an exception and not as a rule, as I will have occasion to show a little later on. What happened this session? On the opening of this session, there were placed upon the Order Paper notices by the hon. member for Algoma West (Mr. Boyce) asking for original applications and tenders with regard to four timber berths; by the same hon. member for original applications and tenders regarding five timber berths; by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Lake) for similar papers regarding four timber berths; by the hon. member for Renfrew (Mr. Wright) regarding five timber berths, and by my hon. friend from St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames) regarding three timber berths. Thus, at the very beginning of the session we had demands made for the original applications and tenders with regard to twenty-one timber berths. So that the instance which I have already alleged as occurring in the session of 1906, at the request of my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) was to be repeated in twenty-one cases at the very beginning of this session. I submit, if I have any responsibility at all for a proper discharge of the work of the Department of the Interior, that it is desirable that the question should be brought to an issue, and that we should know whether the responsibility placed in our hands with regard to private individuals, transacting their private business, shall be dealt with in this way or not. I submit to the judgment of the House whether or not I was justified in asking that the motions be changed so that the originals should not be called for, and the hon. gentlemen acceded to my request.

Mr. FOSTER. You should let me have the title page or number, or whatever it is, of the subject of these papers, and I shall try and perform the duty which the hon. minister wishes to divest himself of, namely, of seeing that these papers are brought back.

Mr. OLIVER. Whose duty is it?

Mr. FOSTER. It is the hon. gentleman's, not mine. If this is to be taken seriously, something more has to be said. I ask and receive an order of the House for certain papers. For what reason? In order that I may examine them. I get those papers, as any other member may, and have them sent to my room where I can examine them. I am carrying out my parliamentary duty when I get the information and make the examination, and it is my duty then to see that they are sent back to the record office whence they were sent to me. I do not suppose my hon. friend meant to say that I was tampering with the papers.

Mr. OLIVER. No.

Mr. FOSTER. It is possible that among the multiplicity of papers I do examine every session some may have, in some way become inclosed in a drawer of my desk, but I do not think so. My impression is that the record office is very careful to send me in each case a notice that I have such and such papers and notify me to return them. I assure my hon. friend that I did not mean to purloin any paper or in any way tamper with it at all. I was perfectly honest in the matter, but I shall take care to trace the thing out, so long as he has not the willingness or the ability to do so and see whether he can get them back from the record office or not.

Mr. OLIVER. We all agree with that that the hon. gentleman was not dishonest, but he was absolutely regardless of the private rights concerned in these particular interests.

Mr. FOSTER. I must enter my caveat against that.

Mr. OLIVER. I wish to repeat that the House granted the motion of my hon. friend that these documents should become a part of the record of the House. Well, they cannot be a part of the record of the House and at the same be a part of the record of the Department of the Interior, and until they are released from the custody of the House, they are not at my disposal, even if I be the autocrat my hon. friend suggests I am.

Mr. FOSTER. If you wanted them badly you could get them.

Mr. OLIVER. I certainly would not expect to get them out of the custody of the officers of this House, in whose hands they were placed by the order of the House. It has been suggested to me that if my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) had taken the interest he ought in these matters, which he apparently did not, when he had satisfied himself regarding the documents, he would have asked for a resolution of the House to return the papers to the department.

Mr. FOSTER. My only interest was to get the papers and examine them, which I did. My next interest was to get them back to the record office from which I got them. If my hon. friend had carried out his duties as trustee, he would have had a motion made to have them returned to his department.

Mr. OLIVER. I might mention also that if there were a fair amount of give and take as between members on the other side and the government departments, it would greatly facilitate business. Let me bring before the House the instance of the documents relating to the North Atlantic Trading Company, which were produced before the Committees of Agriculture and Public Accounts in the session of 1896. These documents, which are not of course private matters in the same sense as documents regarding timber berths, and which were documents perfectly proper to be brought before a committee of the House for investigation, were furnished to the committee on the 4th April and they were returned on the 23rd July. I submit that, speaking for the department interested in those papers, that was not a fair or reasonable way of transacting public business and was not giving that department a fair opportunity to transact public business. I think it was an arbitrary exercise of the authority of the two committees to retain the documents for that length of time. So far from the Department of the Interior in any of its branches having attempted to conceal anything or prevent the House from getting information. I have placed these instances before the House to show that the Department of the Interior has been seriously hampered in the transaction of the public business at the instance of members on the other side of the House without due cause or reason.

Now, with regard to the precedent in connection with examining original documents in the department: I have already pointed out why it is not fair, it is not reasonable, it is not desirable that there should be a general right, on the part even of members of parliament, to go into the department and demand an examination of these documents. It is not fair to the people whose business is contained in these papers. It does not matter whether it is fair or not to the department or its officers —that is not the question. But it is not fair to the people whose business is carried on the files of that department. As to the rule in that matter, I notice that on June 16th, 1905, a memorandum was addressed to the chief clerks and heads of branches of the Department of the Interior, as follows:—

It is requested that, in future, no papers or documents attached to the official files of the department are to be shown to any person or persons outside of the department without a direct order from the deputy minister.

Be good enough to note the above and instruct the officials of your branch accordingly.

By order,
(Sgd.) P. G. KEYES,
Secretary.

I note further a memorandum dated October 14, 1904, which was before I took office, addressed to the chief clerks and heads of branches of the Department of the Interior:

Attention has been called to the fact that copies of departmental orders in council, and other important documents have been given to outside people without the knowledge or approval of the head of the department. As the Minister of the Interior is the custodian of the records of the department, and he alone has the power to authorize the giving out of any information contained in departmental papers, no such information should be furnished to any one without his consent. Even when an official of the department is summoned by subpoena of the court to produce departmental documents, such documents should not be produced or any information given without the knowledge of the head of the department.

The officials of the department are asked to remember that its records must be regarded as confidential, and that no one has any right to disclose to outside inquirers the contents of any files or public documents of the department. Such information can only be given out through the proper channels.

I am to request that you will be good enough to impress the importance of this matter upon the officials of your branch.

(Sgd.) P. G. KEYES,
Secretary.

I notice this memorandum also, dated May 7th, 1898:—

With reference to persons coming into the department and examining papers, it is to be understood that only those files with which they have to do directly and for which they have authority to make an examination are to be shown to such persons. This rule applies to every person coming into the department to examine documents.

(Sgd.) JAMES A. SMART,
Deputy Minister.

That is to say, the man whose business is shown upon a certain file may examine the file in regard to his own business, or his authorized agent may do so, but no other person should be allowed to examine that file with regard to that man's business. This was addressed to the chief clerk of the patents branch, and also to the chief clerk of the registration branch.

Here is another memorandum from Calgary, dated December 4th, 1897, which throws some light on the subject, showing that this was not a new autocratic ruling on my part, but simply carrying out the thoroughly understood principle of the department and insisting that it should be acted upon:

Office of the Superintendent of Mines,
Calgary, Alberta, December 4, 1897.

Sir,—On reaching my office on the 3rd instant I was served with a subpoena by the counsel for the defence in the case of the Queen v. Arthur Collyns and Romain Gervais, and the subpoena ordered me to produce all the papers in my possession regarding the entry to the west half of 34-16-1 west of the 5th meridian. There has been, as you are aware, considerable correspondence over the entry of Romain Gervais to the southwest quarter of said section. I collected all the papers in my possession regarding this matter and appeared in court. When I was called upon to produce them I protested against doing so unless ordered by the court. At first the judge was inclined not to insist on their production, but afterwards he decided that I must produce them. I had a discussion with the judge over the principle at issue, that is whether any official of the department could be compelled to produce documents out of his office unless under the authorization of his minister. Had I considered that in the case at issue there was anything in the public interest that should not be divulged I should probably have refused point blank to produce the papers even had the judge ordered me to do so, but as there was nothing in them which was detrimental to the public interest in the slightest degree, of course I saw no reason to refuse or demur to the order of the judge. However, I would desire instructions in this case. When I appeared in court the counsel for the defence asked me to hand him the papers. This I refused. I told him that if he desired to see the papers that he had plenty of time to have written to the department to ask for authority that I should show them to him and obtain, if he desired, certified copies of any document he might require. Would you therefore kindly instruct me what is to be done in cases like this. It might be well that a general circular be issued to all officers of the department giving the necessary instructions on the point raised in this.

Your obedient servant,
WILLIAM PEARCE,
Agent.

The Secretary,
Department of the Interior, Ottawa.

Mr. Pearce had been an officer of the department for many years at a time when the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) was a member of the administration, and this letter of Mr. Pearce was written a year after this government acceded to power. In reply to Mr. Pearce, the following letter was written:—

Ottawa, 21st December, 1907.

Dear Sir,—I duly received your letter of the 4th instant, Ref. 13945, with regard to the production of the papers in Court in the case of the Queen vs. Collyns and Gervais. In reply I beg to say that the ruling in this case is that no papers which belong to the Department should be taken out of the offices, either at Ottawa or at any of the outside agencies for any purpose whatever, without special authorization from the Minister.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) JAS. A. SMART,
Deputy Minister.

William Pearce, Esq.,
Superintendent of Mines.
Calgary, N.W.T.

I have a circular dated 11th May, 1892, which reads as follows:—

It has been brought to the attention of the Minister of Justice that, in some instances, persons having claims against the government, either in preparation or in suit have been allowed personally, or through their solicitors, to have access to departmental records connected with the claim or to inspect departmental files for the purpose of obtaining therefrom desired information and that such a course has been found to be prejudicial to the government's interests.

The Minister of Justice is of opinion that no inspection of files or records for the purposes above-mentioned should be allowed unless under the advice and direction of this department and he desires me to request that in future any such application should be referred to this department.

You will understand, of course, that the present letter is not written for the purpose of making any charge or conveying any blame in respect of past matters, but simply with a view of safeguarding the interests of the government in respect of claims, present or prospective.

I have the honour to be, sir,
(Sgd.) ROBERT SEDGEWICK,
Deputy Minister of Justice.

The Deputy Minister,
Department of the Interior, Ottawa.

Ottawa, July 14, 1892.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 28th ultimo, and inclosures, and in reply and to state that the interpretation placed upon my recent circular on the subject of the production of departmental files for examination by outsiders is not correct. The suggestions of that circular were not intended to apply only to such papers as might be made the foundation of a claim for damages or other monetary considerations but generally to all files of correspondence and other papers. So far as your department is a registry office, any one desiring to do so ought to be permitted to see instruments affecting title, but departmental correspondence and documents dealing therewith should not be shown except, perhaps, in special cases.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
ROBERT SEDGEWICK,
Deputy Minister of Justice.

My hon. friend from North Toronto has entertained this House for a considerable time to-night, denouncing me personally for having, as an autocrat, introduced an arbitrary rule into the administration of my department; which, on the evidence of the records, was a rule which, was a standing rule and a confirmed rule when my hon. friend was a member of the government of Canada; a rule which, on the evidence of those documents, have been continued ever since, and which I leave to the judgment of this House is a reasonable and proper rule, and necessary for the proper safe-guarding of public business. I want to draw this distinction between the position as it has been taken by myself and the position taken when my hon. friend was a member of the government. The first of the two last circulars I have read intimates that information is to be denied for fear information will be acquired that may be used as an attack upon the government.

For the purpose of obtaining therefrom desired information, and that such a course has been found prejudicial to the government interest.

Now, I want to point out that this case brought before the House by my hon. friend from Montreal, and emphasized so strongly, and I think so unfairly to-night, was not a case of protecting the government against the people, but it was a case of protecting the people whose business was in charge of the government. We do not ask for any advantage in protecting the government; but we do ask that if we are to be held responsible for the safeguarding of documents which are necessary to the title of the people's property, we be permitted a fair and reasonable opportunity so to safeguard them. So far as the government interests are concerned, the right hon. leader of the House has said on a previous occasion, and said again to-night, that private interests will have to take second place, and that if any member will give a reason, a public reason why these original documents should be placed before the House, they will be placed before the House without the slightest hesitation. We are in the position of undertaking to safeguard the interests of the people, and all we ask is that when our friends opposite have an argument to make, they substitute statements for insinuations and responsibility for innuendo.

Mr. THOS. CHISHOLM (East Huron). As a representative of one of the constituencies of this Dominion, I feel called upon to rise and enter a protest this evening. The Minister of the Interior who has just sat down has been continually referring to the House. The House will do this, and the House will do that. Well, we know only too well what that means. We know that it means that there is a very large and subservient majority sitting at the back of the present government, and we know how fairly sometimes that majority acts in regard to these matters. Now, I have been in the House for three or four years, and I have been very carefully, and I think impartially, watching the trend of affairs, and I notice that there are very few ministers who have so much trouble, so much agitation and worry about their departments as the Minister of the Interior has. See what occurs when we are going over the estimates. Take the Minister of Agriculture. I know some people try to badger him, but how seldom have they been able to put their finger on any suspicious circumstance in his department? Very seldom indeed. I think there must be something wrong in the Department of the Interior when we find the minister so often in trouble. Another thing I have noticed is that that hon. gentleman cannot apparently quote correctly anything that a member on this side of the House may have said. I think we can put him down as the champion misquoter of the American continent. He always twists, and turns, and gets things wrong end foremost. Now, a man with the experience he has had as editor of a newspaper, certainly should know better. I cannot think it possible that he deliberately and wilfully does these things. He seems to have no idea whatever of logic, no idea of what reasoning is. He thinks that an assertion, if made with sufficient vehemence, is a proof. Why, Sir, his logic is something like that of the man who said that because a pair of boots cost $2.50, a load of hay should cost $20. There is no relation between the things at all. I notice also that when he finds a difficulty in defending himself, he loses his temper and abuses those poor men who were in this House twenty years ago, he attacks old time Conservatives. Now, I suppose there are not now more than half a dozen of those old men in this House at the present time. What is the use of attacking dead men? They cannot come here to defend themselves. The questions of to-day are live questions, and they should be treated by live people and not by dead people. Anyway, if those Conservatives did make mistakes in their day and generation, were they not punished for it, were they not driven from power? Does the Minister of the Interior mean that the Liberals of the present day, having committed offences similar to those which the Conservatives in the old days committed, that in all justice, and fair play, and common sense the Liberals should be treated as the Conservatives were, and that they too should be driven from power? I scarcely think that was what he had in his mind. But certainly it is the natural and logical conclusion to be drawn from the line of argument that the minister generally adopts. In future then let him talk to living people and leave the dead ones alone.

Now, I think that I am not a very stiff politician, I think I am able to see the good points in the government. I think this government is not managing things quite so badly as some people appear to believe. I can see that some of the departments are being run fairly well. I am well pleased, for instance, with the department of the Postmaster General; and there are others. But I must say that I think the Minister of the Interior has entirely lost his head, he has simply gone wild. He has been entirely spoilt by the very large and subservient Liberal majority which sits at his back. Well, if they were all like him we could not live in this House. He simply feels himself too strong, and consequently he is arrogant, he defies public opinion. Now, just imagine a case. Suppose that some person in this House, or in some city, has a large factory or a large establishment, and he has a number of managers employed to look after the different departments. Suppose that the owner of that factory goes in some day and wishes to look over the books, and as he looks them over he finds that a certain company has been getting something like $300,000 of his money.

He says to the manager of a department: What did you do with this $300,000 ? The manager replies : I will not tell you, Sir ; if I did somebody would commit suicide ; I will not tell you ; it would not do. Mind you the proprietor might say, it was my money and I want to know what you did with it, Sir; you are only the manager of this department. Would not the proprietor become suspicious ? I say that is what is happening now. The members on this side of the House are becoming suspicious and therefore they want to see the original documents. That man who owned that factory might come down next morning and he would send his attorney, or his accredited representative to this department. I am the accredited representative of 20,000 of the people who own the whole of that department, who own the documents in it and on behalf of these people I am asking the manager that I may be allowed to see these documents. But, we are denied that privilege. What would the proprietor of a large establishment believe if he went into one of the departments and found that $300,000 of his money had been paid away and if upon investigation he had found that there was no company of the name given at the time the money was paid, would he not get suspicious ? That is what is wrong here. The people of Canada are getting suspicious of the Minister of the Interior and they want to investigate the affairs of his department to see whether their suspicion is well founded or not. In the interest of the minister himself it would be far better for him to have these documents carefully examined. The people are the owners of this country, the government are simply the managers and we the people's representatives have the right to know what is going on. I would ask the minister to comply with our request, because I, myself, do not think there is nearly as much wrong as his peculiar way of acting leads us to suppose. I do not think that things are as bad as he makes people believe they are, and I think that if he would just be a little more civil and let some parties see these documents it would be all right and I would be very glad, for his sake, if he would do so. I am going to say right here that I have gone down to his department time and again since I came to the city and I have always been treated with the greatest civility. I do not think he is as bad as he looks. I think if he would just keep his temper a little better and if he would use a little more of that sunny smile and learn some lessons from the right hon. leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) this whole matter might be satisfactorily settled. I hope however, that he will let us see the documents so that we may see what there is to justify this suspicion that is abroad. I do not think that there is as much wrong as some others do.

It has been referred to time and again that original documents have to be taken into court. This is the highest court in the land. What would a judge think if a solicitor were to take into court copies of original entries? Would he not wish to see the day book and blotter and would not the proprietor of a large establishment want to see the day book and blotter if he became suspicious as the people of Canada are at the present time? I hope the minister for his own sake will let us see the original documents. I have risen as much for his sake as for the sake of the people, and I therefore hope that he will accede to our request.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS (Yale-Cariboo). Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to prolong this discussion, but as one who has considerable business to do with the Department of the Interior I am bound to say that the other members of parliament have some rights in respect to this matter as well as the hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine (Mr. Ames). I represent 175,000 square miles of territory.

Mr. J. D. REID. And how many people ?

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. I represent over 8,000 electors, a great many of whom have business with the Department of the Interior. They are 3,000 miles away from the Department of the Interior ; they want homesteads, they want timber limits, they want grazing leases, they want all these things from the Department of the Interior. The man who has to see about getting them for them is the member for the district.

Mr. FOSTER. It is hard work, too.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. It is hard work. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) I know will sympathize with me in that regard. I have to do the business of these people with every other department of the service here. I surely have some rights as well as the hon member for Montreal, St. Antoine.

Mr. BRISTOL. Have they been disputed?

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. They have been invaded by the suggestion of the hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine.

Mr. J. D. REID. Did the hon. gentleman ever see any original documents in a department ?

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. If you will be patient I will tell you what happened. Generally there is a good deal of red tape in the Department of the Interior as well as in other departments, and it requires a member to be persistently after the officials of the department to get what he thinks should be got for his people. I call up the deputy, or the head of the patent branch, or some other official with whom I want to do business, I tell him what I intend to go for, I tell him that this business will be found on a certain file, or he tells me that, I go over there but he cannot do the business of that particular settler, or homesteader, or of that particular man who wants a timber limit or a grazing lease without having that file in his hands. He cannot have that file in his possession if the demand of the hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine, is going to be acceded to. It will be in the possession of this House, not in the possession of the proper officer of the Department of the Interior and, consequently, it makes it impossible for me to transact the legitimate business of the people of my constituency with that department. The hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid) asked me if I had ever seen an original file. I have seen hundreds of original files. I have seen them this way: I go there for the purpose of facilitating the business of my people who have business to do with the department. The file is in the possession of the officer who has to do with that particular business.

Mr. J. D. REID. I do not understand in this particular case, where the difficulty that the hon. gentleman speaks of, would arise, because as I understand it, the hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine, went over to look at the file of the department.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. I do not know anything about this particular case; I do not know the merits of this particular case. What I object to is that parliament should lay down the rule that it has the right to transfer the original files and documents from the Department of the Interior, the essential machinery with which the business is done, to the custody of this House so that it is absolutely impossible to transact the business of the Department of the Interior.

Mr. CROCKET. Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that he did not know the merits of this particular case?

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. I said so.

Mr. CROCKET. Did the hon. gentleman not vote on the resolution the other night?

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. Yes. What has that to do with the merits of the case?

Mr. BOYCE. Was the hon. gentleman ever refused access to an original document in the Department of the Interior or any other department?

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. I never asked for access to any file in the Department of the Interior in the same manner that the hon. gentleman for Montreal, St. Antoine, asked for access to a file in that department. I have not any curiosity to find out what other people's business is in connection with the Department of the Interior. I go there for a business purpose to transact the business of my people. I am not like the hon. member (Mr. Ames) who never did anything in his life but find fault with what everybody else did. I go to the Department of the Interior for a legitimate purpose, I do not go poking my nose into other people's business. Now, in discussing this matter the other night I challenged the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) to give me a single instance in which he brought down original documents, when he was minister, in response to a motion made by a member of this House. I repeat the challenge.

Mr. HAGGART. The Minister of the Interior has just stated that he brought original documents down in answer to a motion, and they were lost.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. That is not an answer to my question?

Mr. BARKER. You have challenged any member of this House to give you an instance, and I can tell you that in the investigation of the purchase of 1,300,000 ties by the then Minister of Railways, the whole of the original papers were brought down.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. Investigation where?

Mr. BARKER. In the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. Oh, yes.

Mr. BARKER. But the original papers were brought to this House and I saw them here before they were in the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. I don't see what that has to do with the statement I made. I challenged the ex-Minister of Railways to show one single instance, wherein while in charge of the Railways Department or any other department of the public service, he brought down original documents and laid them on the table of this House in response to a motion moved by a private member. I repeat the same challenge to the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) who was rather the 'Poo-Bah' of the past administration.

Mr. FOSTER. What does that mean?

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. And I will say to him, that if ever original documents were brought down in response to a resolution moved by a private member of this House in connection with any department over which he presided, it was during the week he was on strike. Now, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) had a great deal to tell us to-night about this matter. Surely the House should take a reasonable and a business view of this question. Let me give you a homely illustration. A man does business with a bank, he is doing an ordinary mercantile business, he does business by the usual system of monthly accounts, he gets a large advance from the bank, this bank has a perfect right to say to this man: We want a statement of your business affairs; but if that bank said to the man: Take your books on the 31st day of the month and put them in this bank and we will keep them as long as we please, and if in consequence he could not make out his monthly accounts because he had not his books, that man would go broke. Let me give you another illustration—a man is in the newspaper business, he does business with a large number of people, one of his customers comes in and says: You have overcharged in connection with last month's account; the newspaper man turns up his books, shows that particular individual his personal account, discusses the account with him, but he does not show him the account of every body else who does business with that particular office. What the hon. member (Mr. Ames) wants the Interior Department to do is just as if the newspaper proprietor showed this particular customer every other person's account. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Ames) wants to lay it down as a principle that he or any other private member of this House has a perfect right to go into the Department of the Interior and to look into the files of every body who does business with that department. He wants to go further than that, he wants to lay it down as a principle that these files should be transferred from the Department of the Interior and placed upon the table of the House, but surely the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) knows the procedure of this House sufficiently well to know that once official documents are placed on the table of this House they are no longer the property of the Interior Department and cannot be returned to the Interior Department without an order of the House. The hon. gentleman had one experience himself, quoted by the Minister of the Interior, wherein he very carelessly asked for original documents two years ago and to this day they have not been returned to the Department of the Interior, and the Department of the Interior has absolutely no machinery by which it can get these original documents back, and that, as the result of a motion which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) himself tells us he forgets all about, does not know it ever happened, was not of sufficient importance to charge his mind with. But it might be of very great importance to the man who had business with the Department of the Interior and whose original documents those were. It might be of great importance to him that they are for ever lost to him so far as the Department of the Interior is concerned. Surely, hon. gentlemen opposite are not anxious in their legitimate search for knowledge, to disturb the ordinary business methods of the departments of the public service in this country. They are simply playing politics when they say: They have a right to get original documents from the various departments in whose custody they are and placed in charge of a responsible minister.

Mr. BOYCE. Would the hon. gentleman allow me a question ?

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. Certainly; three.

Mr. BOYCE. The hon. gentleman said there was no machinery whereby the Department of the Interior could get these documents back.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. I said so.

Mr. BOYCE. Does the hon. gentleman overlook the fact that the Minister of the Interior who presides over the department might make a motion in this House to get the documents back and that the same power that took them has the right to return them.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. I said the Department of the Interior had no machinery.

Mr. BOYCE. It has a minister in this House.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. The House can order them returned if it chooses to do so, but the Department of the Interior itself has no machinery to get these documents back.

Mr. BOYCE. It could get them back by a motion of its minister in this House.

Mr. W. B. NORTHRUP (East Hastings). The right hon. gentleman who leads the House having so kindly accepted the amendment of the leader of the opposition, I think the least I can do in common courtesy speaking on this side of the House, is to defend him from the attack just made on him by the hon. member for Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Ross). Of course, I do not wish for a moment to say a single word that could in any way be offensive to the hon. member (Mr. Ross), because as he frankly told us, he knew nothing whatever about the merits of the case, which all who listened to his speech must recognize as a superfluous observation. Now, as reference was made to the motion discussed in the House the other evening, and as I have charged the hon. member (Mr. D. Ross) with stabbing his leader in the back—unintentionally I admit—perhaps I may be allowed as other members have done to refer to the record to see what really did take place ; what the position of the Minister of the Interior then was and what his position to-night is. I am quite willing, in justice to the Minister of the Interior, to admit that if one could shut his eyes to all evidence and obliterate every impression from memory, and then listen to the hon. minister, he possibly might be convinced and remain convinced until the hon. gentleman spoke at another time. What was the position the hon. gentleman took the other night? There is no room for any difference of opinion in regard to it. The motion made by the hon. member for St. Antoine was not a motion that he had a right to do this or that or the other thing, but a motion asking the House to order the return of certain documents. In support of that motion he made a few remarks, among other things saying that he wanted the originals down.

We contend that we have a perfect right to ask for the originals and the government must allege very good reasons to justify them in refusing us access to such papers. This motion has been drafted purely and simply to test that one question.

The issue is surely simple enough. The hon. member for St. Antoine moved for certain original documents, and brought his motion to test the question whether or not this House would order those original documents to be laid on the table of the House. The Minister of the Interior was not taken by surprise at this question being raised, because it occurred in consequence of his own acts. He had advised the hon. member for St. Antoine to make this motion, and had fortified himself in this very case by appealing to his deputy to lay down rules to govern this House; and so, when the Minister of the Interior came to speak, he spoke deliberately, after full consideration, and with reasons to advance to justify his supporters in voting down the motion of the hon. member for St. Antoine. Therefore I think I am justified in saying that he gave his best reasons, the only reasons he knew, why that motion should be voted down; and what were the reasons he gave? He told us that he had referred the matter to his deputy and his deputy had given him a memorandum. The memorandum of the deputy was clear and distinct, and it took these grounds. It said:

While it has been customary in some cases, in answer to an order from special or standing committees of the House, to submit original documents for examination, such documents have never been left with committees of the House, except in the case of this department, when on one or two occasions original files were left with committees of the House, and were not returned until after considerable delay, which caused great inconvenience to the officers of the department dealing with the matter to which these papers related.

In the case of other departments I learned that while in some cases they have been required to produce original documents, such documents, as a matter of fact, never left the hands of the officers of the department submitting the same, and under the circumstances I am strongly of the opinion that this practice should be followed in future. I need not point out that, if in answer to an order of this kind, original papers were submitted to the House they would therefore become a part of its own official record, and would for ever after remain in its custody. This, in so far as the general transaction of public business is concerned, would lead to serious complications, and if the practice of calling for original documents were thereafter indulged in the result would be that the records of the department would soon be depleted.

As regards the production of memoranda or statements of facts passing between the heads of branches and the minister or deputy minister of a department, the deputy ministers whom I consulted have expressed the opinion, in which I fully concur, that these do not as a matter of fact form part of the official record, but are merely written communications which otherwise if time permitted could be conveyed verbally as between the officers concerned, and that the same can have no direct bearing upon the consideration or settlement of the cases to which they may refer. With regard to these papers, therefore, I would strongly urge that any attempt to compel the department to produce the same should be resisted.

And here is the ground on which the deputy minister has presumed to lay down a rule for this parliament:

In my opinion these notices of motion should be amended by providing for returns of copies of the documents which constitute the official record of the transaction under notice.

That was the argument which was submitted to the minister by his deputy, and adopted by the minister, as will appear from the following quotation. The minister made very few remarks, occupying less than a column of 'Hansard,' so that there is no room for difference of opinion as to the ground he took. He took only one ground, and that was clearly and distinctly taken. The only reason he advanced up to that moment for justifying his refusal of the motion is thus stated in his own words:

Under these circumstances it seems to me necesary in the public interest—the very public interest that my hon. friend alluded to; the interest of the state—that this request should not be granted. If it is necessary and in the public interest that this document should be produced in the original, as this memorandum says, what has been done in the past may be done again. The files may be called for by a special committee, an officer of the department may bring these files before the committee, they may be examined by members of the committee in the custody and under the responsibility of the officers of the department and then be returned to the department.

He has no objection to the original documents going before a committee, because they would continue under the control of one of his officials, but so far as the House was concerned, he said:

But to transfer the original documents from the department whose business they form an essential part of, to this House where they will only constitute a record, as has been set out very fully in this memorandum, is an infringement upon business methods which it is impossible for the department to consent to.

Now, you will see that it was a matter of utter indifference to the department what ground was given for the production of the documents, because the reason the minister alleges for not producing them is, not any informality in the manner of asking for them, but simply the inconvenience to the department; and when the minister finished his remarks, dozens of his supporters, convinced by his elaborate argument, applauded him to the echo, and felt that he had given them sufficient ground for voting against the motion. But the right hon. the Premier followed. He was shrewd enough to see the utter absurdity of the defence put up by the Minister of the Interior and did not attempt to follow him. He gave a distinct reason of his own for declining to produce the original documents. It was not because the House had any objection to bringing down these or any other original documents; but he said, we must have a reason given to explain why they are asked for. As I said before, what possible difference would it make to the officers of the Interior Department whether a reason were given for the production of the documents or not?

Their reason for refusing their production was the inconvenience to the department. The right hon. the Premier says:

My hon. friend says that the inconvenience or convenience of any officers of the departments of the government should not stand in the way of information being given. I agree to that entirely; the convenience or inconvenience of any department is not to stand in the way of any legitimate information that is asked for being supplied.

The right hon. the Premier gave as a reason for declining to produce certain documents that sufficient reasons had not been alleged, while the excuse given by the Minister of the Interior was that it would be inconvenient to the department to produce them. In the fact of these adverse reasons, the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo (Mr. Duncan Ross) comes in at half past ten at night and informs the House that he knows nothing of the merits of the case.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. If the hon. gentleman is going to quote me he should quote me fairly. I did not say that I knew nothing of the merits of the case. I said that I did not know anything of the merits of the particular application that was the subject of the motion of the hon. member for St. Antoine. That is an entirely different matter. I did not know anything of the merits of the particular timber limits he was asking about.

Mr. NORTHRUP. That illustrates my hon. friend's conception of the question before the House on which he voted, it is to be supposed intelligently. What possible difference could it make to any member of this House what were the merits of that timber limit in British Columbia? The question before this House was not whether John Smith, Thomas Brown or William Jones should have the timber limit, but whether this House should order that certain original documents in possession of the Minister of the Interior should be brought down.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. What are the merits of that particular case, except voting on a question of practice?

Mr. NORTHRUP. I am afraid that at this hour of the night it would be impossible to enlighten my hon. friend, but if he will read the speeches made the other night on the one hand by the right hon. the Premier and on the other hand by the hon. Minister of the Interior he will find at least two explanations of the vote he gave, and they differ entirely from each other. But it is an advantage which my hon. friend frequently has of taking his choice and justifying his vote either way he likes. I have said enough to show that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver), when he asked his supporters to vote down this motion, had not any just defence for his request, according to the opinion of his right hon. leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) judging by the statement of the right hon. gentleman that the convenience or inconvenience of his subordinates was of no importance compared with the convenience of the House. I was rather amused at the zeal displayed by the Minister of the Interior the other evening to protect the interests of the people whose title deeds were in his possession. Such was his zeal in their behalf that he could not let these title deeds come before the House, and he deliberately stated that such a thing had not been done in the past and would not be done now. And to-night to prove that it had not been done in the past, he declared that it had been done once on the request of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) and that the papers never came back. That is logic for you. And so interested was he in those documents that although they had been brought down a couple of years ago on the motion of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), and had not been returned to his department, he had not taken the least care to see that they were again returned to his custody. Why, how does this bear out the argument he made that the business of the department could not go on without these files being brought back to it?

Mr. D. ROSS. How could he get them back?

Mr. NORTHRUP. My hon. friend has been told so often that I think I would be called down by the House if I were to repeat what has been so frequently said. The hon. minister gave us some rather amusing episodes of occurrences in days gone by. It seems that some official was at one time served with a subpœna to produce certain documents, and he consulted some legal light and was told he should not obey the subpœna without the consent of his minister. If that consent were given it was perfectly legitimate and proper to take the documents in question to the uttermost ends of the earth, but if the consent of parliament were given, it was most improper to bring them from the eastern block to this chamber. I acknowledge that it would be improper that solicitors and their clients should be allowed to go into the Department of the Interior and pry into documents that might be used in law suits. A sounder doctrine the hon. minister never gave utterance to, but surely he can see the difference between a solicitor and his client going to the department to pry into documents which might be useful for private purposes and a representative of the people going to that department to inspect documents that belonged to his clients, the people, and which may be utilized for the benefit of the people. If he cannot see the difference between the two cases, it is impossible to make it clear to him, but on that point he differs entirely from the right hon. leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier).

Mr. E. BRISTOL (Centre Toronto). We have heard a great deal of discussion to-night on matters which are not before the House. The question before the House is a simple one, and perhaps it would not be out of place to call attention to what we are really discussing. The resolution before us is this:

Subject to such considerations of public policy as can be validly urged in any case, it is the undoubted right of the people's representatives, in parliament assembled, to be informed of everything necessary to explain the policy and proceedings of the government, and for that purpose to have an opportunity of seeing and examining all documents connected with the transaction of public business, and the denial of such right by the government justifies the refusal by this House of further supplies to the Crown.

We have the right hon. the First Minister agreeing with the leader of the opposition in this principle, and I think, therefore, we need not discuss the points that have been brought up by the hon. member for Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Ross), who evidently does not share the opinion of his leader, and confine ourselves to the subject before the House. Let us examine the resolution which was moved by the hon. member for St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames). On the 13th January the hon. member for St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames) moved for a return laying upon the table of this House the original applications and tenders in respect of timber berths 1107, 1108 and 1179. That is what I would call a specific instance of the general proposition here laid down. The right hon. the First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) does not state that there was any good question of public policy on which to base a refusal to pass this order, but says that he does not find that the hon. member for St. Antoine division gave any reason for his application.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. He said himself that he might give reasons, but would not because he wanted to make it a test case.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. He did give reasons before the debate was concluded.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No.

Mr. BRISTOL. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) said that if the hon. member for St. Antoine division had given some reason for his motion, which a reasonable man would accept, he would certainly have agreed that it was the undoubted right of parliament to have these papers. I would ask the right hon. gentleman why, if the hon. member (Mr. Ames) did not state his reasons in opening his remarks, but did so before the close of the debate, and gave good reasons for making the application, the right hon. gentleman should be so technical and object to the motion because the reasons were given not at the beginning of the application, but at the end. That is the most extraordinary proposition I have ever heard and one which I fail to comprehend. I am not able to find any precedent, nor is the right hon. gentleman able to refer to one, to show that the time for giving reasons must be in the first part or the middle or the concluding sentence of the speech supporting that motion. But when we talk of reasons, we are met with some considerable difficulty, because the Minister of the Interior says there must be some good public reason. He will not find that laid down in any of the authorities, and he did not say what in his opinion constituted a public reason. If he did, that would be of great assistance to hon. members who might desire to give some reason for a similar motion which would be satisfactory to the minister's mind. I myself am afraid that no reason we might give would be in the minister's opinion a sufficient justification for calling for the production of the documents asked for.

Mr. OLIVER. The statement by an hon. member of any specific impropriety in the dealings of the department with the matter in hand would be a sufficient public reason.

Mr. BRISTOL. I think that the hon. gentleman is asking more than any parliamentary body in the world has ever asked. He is asking an hon. member to state there is some impropriety. Well, in the first place, it is not necessary that there should be any impropriety alleged in respect of public documents as a reason why they should be called for and examined. There might be many reasons apart from any impropriety. There might be, taking the chain of documents, a great deal of impropriety arising out of any one of them in connection with others. Let me refer him to a consideration of the matter as a business man. As I understand we are dealing with the original tenders and leases relating to three separate timber berths. My hon. friend knows as well as anybody that there is not any court of justice in any civilized country which would for one moment take cognizance of anything but the original documents unless it were proved that the originals had been lost or destroyed. If there is going to be any inconvenience caused by producing these documents or if the documents are of a precious character, such as registered deeds, they are produced in the custody of the registrar or one of his clerks. The cases are precisely analogous. The clerk of the department hands these documents over to the clerk of the House for the information of the House, and if the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) desires to have them back after this House is through with them, it is his duty to bring the matter to the attention of the House and obtain an order of the House to have these documents returned.

Now, imagine any business being conducted on such a basis as that. Surely, the responsibility of the minister does not end when he sends documents to this House. The officer of the House, of course, is in charge of these documents ; but the duty of the minister is surely to look after his own documents and to see that he gets them back within a reasonable time. Or, still more, I submit that the minister should see to it that, when an order is made for the production before this House of an original document, that that order shall contain such provision as protects his department. And, as the hon. member for St. Antoine said, if the document is produced for ten or fifteen minutes or in the case of the Public Accounts Committee if it is produced for three or four hours and left in the custody of a clerk, it can be sent back and there is no inconvenience and no possibility of keeping the document out of the custody of the minister for two years. If this discussion does nothing else, surely it will lead to there being no more cases of documents being kept in this House for two years, and then only coming to light because an energetic clerk wants to give the minister something to say against the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster).

Coming back to the matter before us, the point is not whether a member has or has not a right to go into the Department of the Interior. I have not heard anybody claim that right, and I should be surprised to hear anybody claim it. Of course, the minister is supreme in his department. If, as a matter of courtesy, he shows an original file, to save the country expense, or to promote the public convenience, that is a matter of business discretion. He has a right to grant it or refuse it. As a good business man, no doubt he will do as he has done in the past. It seems to me that we are simply wasting time over something which should never have been disputed for a moment. I think the Prime Minister, when he reads the rest of the speech of the hon. member for St. Antoine, which he did not hear, will say that the hon. gentleman did give good reasons upon which a reasonable man could be asked to act. Under the circumstances, it seems to me, the Prime Minister should be the first to ask that this resolution be passed, the order made and this whole question got out of the way. It is idle to suppose that hon. members on this side would take up time with arguments to secure documents merely out of curiosity. That is an insult to the members of this House and a reflection upon the intelligence of the electors who sent us here. The first minister could not say that no reason was given for the production of the documents, but that he had not observed, as a matter of fact, that reasons were given. Possibly the hon. member for St. Antoine did not give reasons until just at the close of his argument. But no case could be more plainly stated or more clearly within the lines of the Prime Minister's own argument. Because the member for St. Antoine says that the question of handwriting in the originals and other matters might be of value. And he says :

> Adopt any method you like, move any amendment you want, but establish the principle that when we on this side have what we consider good and sufficient reason we may have the right to see an additional document.

And so on. That is exactly in line with the concession of the first minister this evening. Are we to have another seventy pages of ' Hansard ' devoted to this matter ? Are we to allege improprieties which nobody is in a position to allege at the present time ? Or. is the absence of such allegations to be made the ground of refusal ? I submit that the whole matter amounts to this, if such argument is to be presented, if such sophistry is to be used in regard to the argument of the hon. member for St. Antoine, there will be no case in which a member can get production of documents because there will never be a reason alleged that the government will be ready to regard as justifying the production of original documents in this House when the government does nothing to have them produced.

Mr. A. C. BOYCE (West Algoma). I do not rise to prolong this discussion, but to comment for the moment upon the extraordinary attitude of the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to night, as contrasted with the attitude he took on January 13, when the motion of the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) was made. He stated and reiterated here to-night that, if the hon. member for St. Antoine had stated his reasons, the documents would have been brought down without hesitation. But contrast that position with the position that the right hon. gentleman took on the motion of the hon. member for St. Antoine on January 13 last. The hon. member for St. Antoine moved that the original documents be produced and laid on the table. And how was he met ? Granting for the moment, and for the sake of argument that, up to the time when the right hon. gentleman replied, no sufficient reason had been given for the production of the documents. Did the Minister of the Interior say that the right hon. gentleman as leader of the House, took any such ground ? No, Sir. Reference to the records of this House will show that the Minister of the Interior first, and then the right hon. Prime Minister, did not base their refusals of this motion upon any such reason. If I may be pardoned for reading a very short extract, I will refer to what the hon. Minister of the Interior said in his speech following that of the hon. member for St. Antoine. As has been shown, he says that he has submitted this matter to his deputy and he reads a letter from the deputy which is duly on our records on page 1179 of 'Hansard'. I would refer to the fact that that letter is dated December 6, 1907. And, in a debate which came up on January 13 this is made use of by the minister as an absolute denial of the right of the hon. member for St. Antoine to the production of the papers for which he moved. And what position does the Prime Minister take upon that motion ? At the close of the speech of the hon. member for North Toronto, he uses these words, quoting the Minister of the Interior :

My deputy will be somewhat inconvenienced if these papers are brought down in the original form, and he asked me to refuse and I say to the House that I do refuse, and that the members shall not have these papers. Surely the Prime Minister will never subscribe to such a doctrine.

The Prime Minister says, at page 1183 :

I am sorry to have to say that not only have I no hesitation in endorsing the doctrine laid down by my hon. colleague the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver), but if the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) permits me to say so, I am very much scandalized by the argument he has just put forward.

And he says, at page 1184 :

If the hon. gentleman were to allege that he has reason to believe, as a member of this House, and alleges that a certain document has been tampered with that would be a very different proposition.

Did he make any remarks or inquiry such as, I submit with the utmost respect, is due to the hon. member for St. Antoine as to whether there were special reasons for the production of the documents if the reason for moving the motion were not sufficient ? He did not. He simply said to this House, as endorsing the speech of the Minister of the Interior, that the reasons for refusing access to these documents and the non-production of these documents in this House were decided before any hon. member in this House had an opportunity to speak and were decided by the Deputy Minister of the Interior on December 6th, 1906. That is in marked contrast with the words of the right hon. gentleman now, when he says that if the member for St. Antoine had stated his reasons the documents would have been produced without any hesitation. I merely drew this matter to the attention of the House to show that the right hon. gentleman has somewhat changed the position he took when this matter was under consideration on the 13th of this month. At that time he was prepared to back up his Minister of the Interior at all costs and at all hazards, and to refuse access to and production of those documents, in conformity with the letter of the Deputy Minister of the Interior dated on the 6th day of December, six weeks before the motion was made. He said in so many words that he endorsed the attitude of the Minister of the Interior in carrying out the advice of his deputy minister. Therefore the concluding words of the letter of the deputy minister are of great importance.

In regard to these papers, therefore, I would strongly urge that any attempt——

Any attempt, coupled with a reason or without a reason—— —to compel the department to produce the same should be resisted.

I ask, Sir, whether that is consonant with the right hon. gentleman's words here to-night thrice repeated, that if the hon. member for St. Antoine had stated any reasons the document would have been produced at once. I think, Sir, these two opposite positions of the Prime Minister present a very remarkable anomaly.

Amendment (Mr. R. L. Borden) agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Two o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

Mr. E. N. LEWIS (West Huron) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 78) to amend the provisions of the Criminal Code respecting offensive weapons.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Explain.

Mr. LEWIS. This Bill proposes to amend the provisions of the Criminal Code respecting offensive weapons, in reference particularly to the discrepancies in, and the inadequacy of the punishment for offences against persons using or carrying same. It is proposed to amend section 120 of the Criminal Code by inserting therein next after the word 'air gun' in the third line, the words 'or any sheath knife, bowie knife, dagger, metal knuckles, revolver, razor, skull cracker, or other offensive weapons.' In section 2, subsection 24 of the Code 'offensive weapon' is defined but it does not cover the word razor. My contention is that any person who is discovered by a police officer with a razor in his possession without any justifiable cause has it with the intention of commiting some indictable offence. He should carry a razor in his trunk or with his shaving brush, or in some such way as that, and not carry it around in his pocket.

The Bill proposes also to amend chapter 146, section 121, Revised Statutes of Canada, by adding at the end of the section the following :—

Or, on indictment, to a like fine or to imprisonment for any term not less than one year or more than five years, with or without hard labour.

Under the present law the imprisonment is six months. My intention is to leave it to the Justice, where a person is found guilty under this section, to impose a minimum penalty of one year or a maximum penalty of five years, with or without hard labour. Then this Bill proposes to amend section 123 of the Criminal Code by adding the words 'revolver or pistol' after the word 'shot' in the third line thereof ; and by adding at the end of said clause the words :

A revolver or pistol shall not be sold to any person unless the purchaser of same produces to and leaves with the vendor a permit in writing from the police magistrate, justice of the peace, or chief of police, allowing him to purchase such weapon.

The original section prohibits second hand shops or pawn shops, &c., from exhibiting certain weapons for sale, but, revolvers or pistols are not covered by that. I therefore propose to add a clause to cover 'revolvers or pistols.' It has been very truly said by some newspapers recently that a foreigner coming to Canada, seems to be under the impression that he is coming to a wild western country and that he needs a revolver ; he sees on all sides revolvers displayed for sale and thinks it the proper thing to buy one. The intention of my amendment is to prohibit the indiscriminate display and consequent purchase of revolvers.

The Bill also proposes to amend section 274 of the Criminal Code by adding the following subsection thereto :—

(2) Every one is guilty of an indictable offence who unlawfully wounds or attempts to wound or inflicts or attempts to inflict grievous bodily harm upon any other persons with any revolver, knife, stiletto, razor, or other offensive weapon; and upon conviction shall be punished with not less than two years or more than five years imprisonment, and in addition to such punishment shall also be sentenced to be whipped.

My proposal is to add to this section in the present code the words 'revolver, knife, stiletto, razor, or other offensive weapons.' The present code imposes a penalty of three years for an offence under this clause and this Bill proposes to make it five years. I would ask the hon. gentlemen who are concerned in the administration of the law in this parliament to pay some attention to these amendments, and if the Bill should go to Committee of the Whole other amendments which are necessary to the different sections might be added, or, I have no objections that my proposals may be changed if necessary in the direction of making the law more efficacious. I have no doubt in my mind that some legislation is necessary on the lines proposed by this Bill and is looked for and desired by the people.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

Mr. E. N. LEWIS (West Huron) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 79) to amend the provisions of the Criminal Code respecting assaults on women and children.

He said : The Bill proposes to amend section 292 of the Criminal Code by striking out the words 'two years' in the second line thereof and inserting after the word 'and' in the second line the words : 'in addition thereto shall be sentenced to be whipped.' That makes it obligatory to sentence the convicted person to be whipped, whereas under the code as at present it is not obligatory. Then, the Bill proposes to amend section 301 of the Criminal Code.

Section 301 of the said code is amended by inserting therein after the word 'and' in the second line, the following words, 'in addition thereto shall be sentenced.'

That is making in addition to the sentence already imposed a whipping obligatory.

Section 302 of the said code is amended by inserting therein next after the word 'and' in the last line thereof the following words: 'in addition thereto shall be sentenced.'

Section 302 applies to an offence of this nature against a girl under the age of 14 years, and the penalty imposed by the present clause is two years' imprisonment.

Section 291 of the Criminal Code is hereby amended by adding the words 'where the said offence is committed by a male upon a female, the penalty shall be a fine not exceeding $100 or imprisonment not to exceed one year, with or without hard labour'.

The purpose of this amendment is that by adding these words :

Where the offence is committed by a male upon a female, the penalty shall be a fine not exceeding $100 and imprisonment not exceeding two years.

Is to make a difference between a common assault upon a woman by another woman, or a man upon another man, and an assault by a man upon a woman or girl. Where the assault is by a man upon a female the sentence is increased.

Section 299 of the said code is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

2. Every one who commits rape on a girl under the age of fourten years is guilty of an indictable offence and shall, on conviction thereof, be sentenced to death.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT—AMENDMENT.

Mr. G. O. ALCORN (Prince Edward) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 80) to amend the Dominion Elections Act.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Explain.

Mr. ALCORN. Hon. gentlemen will be aware that at the beginning of this session, as at the commencement of the last two sessions by the speech from the Throne, legislation was promised with regard to the election law of this country. Notwithstanding that fact no such measure has been brought down by the government, and it is therefore considered proper that a Bill should be presented with reference to that subject. The Bill which I have now the honour to present is one which deals with a large number of matters provided for by the Election Act.

The opening section is with reference to the matter of personal expenses of the candidates at an election. Hon. gentlemen are aware that the definition of personal expenses in the Act is extremely meagre. Having recourse to the Ontario statutes of 1898, 61 Vic., chap. 5, it has been sought to introduce into this Bill such further definition of the term 'personal expenses' as is afforded by that Act, and, therefore, it is here provided that personal expenses should include:

The reasonable and actual travelling expenses of such candidate, and the reasonable and actual expenses of his living at hotels or elsewhere for the purposes of and in relation to such election (not including expenses for treating);

2. A reasonable and bona fide rent or hire of halls or other places used by the candidate personally in which to address public meetings of electors; the like rent of committee rooms actually used; and the expenses incurred in heating, lighting or cleaning same when necessary;

3. Tolls on toll roads;

4. The reasonable, ordinary and actual hotel expenses of one speaker for each meeting (not including expenses for treating) who accompanies the candidate and speaks at a public meeting addressed by the candidate;

5. Reasonable charge for the hire and keep of horses and hire of conveyances (including boats) for the use of the candidate in travelling to and from public meetings, and in canvassing in the constituency; and reasonable and ordinary charges for the services and maintenance of a driver when one is employed or used by the candidate;

6. Reasonable charges for the use by the candidate personally of not more than one conveyance at the same time and the services of a person as driver on the day of the poll. The carriage of voters to the poll in such conveyance personally by the candidate shall not be a violation of this Act;

7. Reasonable expenditure by the candidate for postal, telephone, telegraph, express, cartage and public messenger service; for stationery, printing, bill posting and advertising; and for actual professional services performed;

8. And all other expenses which by this Act he may lawfully incur and pay.

Provision is added that the onus of showing that the personal expenses of the candidate are fair and reasonable rests on the candidate.

By the Act as it now stands any person who performs services or who has sold supplies for the purpose of the election or has done anything for which he has received payment with reference to the election is disqualified. Having recourse to the Ontario statute, it has been thought well to modify that to some extent and therefore this Bill provides that:

Notwithstanding anything in this Act contained the receipt of the ordinary and reasonable charges

(a) by the owner, possessor or caretaker of a hall or other place in which bona fide public or committee meetings are held, for the hire, heating, lighting, care or cleaning of the same;

(b) by toll-keeper for tolls on toll roads;

(c) by an inn-keeper for the lawful accommodation of a candidate, a public speaker lawfully accompanying a candidate, or of a driver of the vehicle in which they travel, or for the keep of their horses;

(d) by a printer for lawful printing or advertising in relation to an election;

(e) by a bill-poster for bill-posting done in relation to an election;

(f) by a regularly established livery-keeper for the hire of horses and vehicles lawfully used for the proper purposes of the election;

(g) by persons otherwise entitled to vote who perform services or supply to a returning officer in the ordinary course anything necessary for the purpose of enabling the returning officer to carry out the requirements of the Dominion Elections Act;

(h) by persons otherwise entitled to vote whose halls, rooms or places have been taken for use for a nomination meeting or for a polling booth;

(i) by an official agent of a candidate for his services as such official agent;

(j) by one clerk and one caretaker only, if actually and bona fide employed for the necessary and lawful purposes of an election, at each committee room actually used during an election, shall not disqualify the persons so receiving the same from voting, and shall not be held to be within the meaning of the disqualifying words of any oath which may lawfully be put to any voter at the polls.

None of these things shall disqualify the person receiving them from voting.

A further section proposes to amend section 67 with regard to the hiring any paying for teams and horses and carriages.

The change sought to be made is to introduce a provision with regard to bringing within the scope of the Act the providing of transportation by railway, tramway, boat, or vessel, free of charge, or at a diminished rate, by passes or the like, making these all unlawful acts. The candidate so offending is to forfeit $100.

A new feature is:

Every person by himself or by any one on his behalf demanding or receiving from any candidate or his agent or any person payment for the use of any horse, team, carriage, cab or other vehicle, or any boat, steamboat or other vessel for conveying voters as aforesaid, shall forfeit the sum of one hundred dollars to any person who sues therefor with costs.

The following section relates to writs of election and deals with the persons to whom the writs shall be addressed. It is sought to reintroduce the former practice of addressing the writs to certain provincial officials as returning officers. The provision is that the writs shall be addresed in Ontario to the sheriff or the registrar of deeds; in Quebec, to the registrar of any registration district or the sheriff of prothonotary of any judicial district in that province.

In the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, to any sheriff whose shrievalty includes the whole or any part of the electoral district for which such writ is issued; in the province of Manitoba to any sheriff; in the province of British Columbia to any sheriff; in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta and in the Yukon territory to any sheriff, to a registrar or deputy registrar of titles or to a superintendent of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police.

Then if through lack of sufficient number of these officers, or their disqualification, inability or refusal to act, the writ cannot be addressed as provided by subsection 2 of this section, the Governor in Council (or the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, where such officer may be nominated by him), may direct to whom the writ is to be issued.

If any person to whom the writ has been issued refuses or is disqualified or unable to act, the Governor in Council (or the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery where such person has been nominated by him) may appoint another person to act as returning officer.

It is further provided that not more than one writ of election shall be addresed to the same returning officer at one time. This is to prevent what was done in the Nipissing case, which was discussed in this House a few years ago. It appeared that in that case two writs of election were issued and addressed to the same returning officer at the same time.

Then where any person other than a sheriff or other official mentioned above is appointed returning officer, he shall be a person who would be a voter in the electoral district for which he is appointed, if he were not so appointed.

Taking a provision from the Ontario Act I have provided that in case a writ has been issued to a person whose appointment is subsequently superseded, a new writ may be issued, or the new returning officer may act under the writ already issued as if the same had been addressed to him; and if valid proceedings have been had under the first appointment, the validity of such proceedings shall not be affected by the new appointment.

In the list of penalties, I have thought it desirable to propose this provision :

Every person who at a time when by this or any other act he is disqualified from acting as returning officer, deputy returning officer, election clerk or poll clerk, nevertheless so acts, he shall be disqualified from voting at any Dominion election during the period of seven years from the date of his first official act as such election officer and be also liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year nor less than six months with or without hard labour.

Hon. gentlemen must be aware that a great deal of difficulty arises frequently at the polls in knowing precisely what form of oath should be administered to a voter, and also with regard to the instructions which are issued by His Excellency to the election officer. I have introduced a group of sections with the view of meeting this difficulty under which the returning officer must provide a sufficient number of copies of the Act, having affixed to them copies of the instructions containing all the forms of oaths both provincial and federal which may be put in each province to an elector, such returning officer will send three copies to each deputy returning officer, namely, one for himself as at present, and two which will be hung up in prominent positions in the polling booth. He shall also furnish a sufficient number of detached copies of the instructions with accompanying forms of oaths so as to provide four of such copies to be given by the returning officer on the day of nomination to each candidate or his official agent, and four for use in each polling place. The effect of these provisions will be to remove all the present difficulty regarding the forms of oath by having a sufficient number of copies of the Act, instructions and oaths available for all persons and for all purposes at each poll.

I have introduced a provision to the effect that the instructions together with the forms of oaths therein referred to and the orders in council approving the same made conformable to the requirements of the Act shall be published in the 'Canada Gazette' within one month next after the coming into force of this Act, and thereafter when and so often as any change shall be made in the issue of such 'Gazette' next following the making of any order effecting such change. And within the first twenty days of every session of parliament a copy of the instructions and accompanying forms of oaths then in force and of the orders in council relating thereto shall be laid before parliament.

Very much inconvenience is frequently felt owing to the want of knowledge as to who the election officers are to be—i.e. the deputy returning officers and poll clerks. The present Act requires notice to be given by the returning officer on application to him. I propose to compel the returning officer to send by registered post to each candidate and to his agent a list of all the deputy returning officers and poll clerks who will act in such election, six days before the election except in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta and the Yukon territory where a shorter time shall suffice.

It is also provided that except in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta and the Yukon territory, no person shall be appointed a deputy returning officer or poll clerk who is not a resident of and a voter in the municipality, parish or other local territorial division wherein the polling subdivision in which he is to act is situate or in the case of unorganized territory who is not a resident of and a voter in the electoral district.

And no person shall be appointed a deputy returning officer or poll clerk who has at any time been convicted of crime.

As the law at present stands, there are five constituencies, namely: Chicoutimi, Saguenay and Gaspé in the province of Quebec, and Comox-Atlin, Kootenay and Yale-Cariboo in the province of British Columbia, in which the deputy returning officers themselves fix the day of nomination and polling, and in which ordinarily the polling day is fixed at a date somewhat later than in the other electoral districts.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. It is absolutely——

Mr. SPEAKER. I must call hon. gentlemen to order. There is too much conversation going on to enable the House to hear what the hon. gentleman is saying.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. It is absolutely impossible to hear the hon. gentleman on this side and I would ask him to speak a little louder. I heard him make some reference to my own constituency which I did not quite accurately catch.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That is no reason why hon. gentlemen opposite should not permit hon. gentlemen on this side from hearing what is said.

Mr. ALCORN. Evidently the hon. member from Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Ross) did hear his own constituency alluded to. A group of sections has been introduced in this Bill for the purpose of making the polling day the one day throughout Canada, and that is to be effected in this way. I provide that in the cases of the five electoral districts I have mentioned, the writs of election shall be despatched to the returning officer in time to allow the lapse of 22 clear days between the day of their receipt by such returning officers and the day thereby fixed for the nomination of candidates. And the day so appointed in those five constituencies, shall be one week earlier than the nomination day in the other electoral districts. The effect would be that the returning officer will have fourteen days in which to perform his duties, i.e. to issue and post his proclamation and make other necessary arrangements. There will then intervene the eight clear days during which that proclamation must remain posted up in all electoral districts. He will also have fourteen days between the day of nomination and polling in which to distribute the ballot-boxes and other requisites for holding the poll and complete his other duties. If it be a fact, which I believe it is not, that in these five constituencies, owing to their area, the returning officer is to a large extent precluded from performing his duties within the time assigned in the case of other electoral districts, that difficulty will be removed by the scheme I have mentioned, namely, by giving him fourteen days both before and after nomination within which to do his work instead of the number he has at present. The governor shall name the nomination day and the polling day, and the polling day shall be the same day in those as in all the other electoral districts.

A clause is introduced with regard to printing ballots, namely, that the printer shall, upon delivery of the ballot papers to the returning officer, file an affidavit setting forth a description of the ballot papers so printed, the total number so printed, the number supplied to the returning officer and stating the fact that no other ballot paper was printed or remains in his possession or control. It is also provided that this affidavit will form part of the return and will go with the return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery.

In view of what has been known as the Lott-Sibley trick ballot boxes, a further section is inserted dealing with the opening of the poll; it provides that the deputy is to ascertain that the box to be used at the polling station is a lawful ballot box and contains no device by which a ballot paper might be secretly stored therein, or having been deposited therein during the polling might be secretly diverted; and he is to ascertain that the box is absolutely empty before it is locked and the public permitted to vote.

It has been much discussed whether a witness who has voted ought to be allowed to state for whom he voted. A clause has been introduced here, because of the difficulty experienced in getting at the bottom of election frauds on many occasions, allowing a witness to state how he voted, but not compelling him to do so. If he does so, the statement may be received in evidence.

Amongst the sections with reference to penalties it is sought to introduce one to the effect that any person being concerned in the printing of ballots who supplies a ballot paper or what purports to be a ballot paper, to any person other than the returning officer, shall be made subject to the penalty prescribed in section 25, and that there shall also be a penalty for any one who manufactures, imports into Canada, has in his possession, supplies to an election officer, or uses for the purposes of an election, any ballot box, containing mechanism by which ballots may be secretly stored therein or secretly diverted.

With reference to the secrecy of the ballot, it is sought in the case of any election officer, returning officer, deputy returning officer, poll clerk or constable to increase the penalty to imprisonment for 12 months and in the case of any other person who violates that section, a fine of not less than $200 or more than $300. It is also sought to disqualify every person who so offends.

We are accustomed to hear and particularly to read in the public press, assertions to the effect that certain great corporations own governments in this country and are able to affect the course of legislation in this House and in other legislative bodies. With a view to deal with that a clause is introduced providing that any corporation which shall give, pay, lend, contribute or expend any money to or for a candidate—

Mr. TALBOT. What about the corporations who own the opposition ?

Mr. ALCORN. Who own them ?

Mr. TALBOT. You spoke about the corporations who own the governments ?

Mr. ALCORN. My hon. friend will no doubt introduce a Bill to deal with that. Perhaps I cannot do better than read that clause to give hon. gentlemen an accurate idea of its scope.

No corporation shall directly or indirectly by itself or by any officer, director, or employee, or by any other corporation agency or person on its behalf pay, give, lend, advance, deposit, receive, transmit, forward, deliver or pay over or by any device contribute or expend or offer or promise or aid or facilitate the contribution, application, delivery, payment or expenditure of any money, property, security, or valuable consideration, or offer or promise to procure or to endeavour to procure any money, property, security, or valuable consideration to or for a candidate or to or for any person on behalf of any candidate or to or for any person in order to aid or influence the election or defeat of any candidates or in order to promote the success or defeat of the candidates or prospective candidates of any political party in Canada or in any electoral district in Canada, or in order to aid or defeat the objects of any organization, association or party maintained for political purposes in Canada.

2. Every corporation, which violates any of the provisions of this section shall forfeit the sum of $5,000 to any person who sues therefor with costs.

3. Every officer, director, or shareholder of any corporation which violates any of the provisions of this section, or who participates in, aids, abets, advises, consents to or acquiesces in any such violation, and any person who solicits or knowingly receives any payment, gift, loan, advance, deposit or contribution, prohibited by this section is guilty of the indictable offence of bribery and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, and shall also forfeit the sum of $1,000 to any person who sues therefor with costs.

4. Every person who directly, or indirectly, by himself, or by any person on his behalf, pays, gives, lends, advances, deposits, or by any device contributes, or expends, or offers or promises any money, property, security or valuable consideration, or offers or promises to procure or to endeavour to procure any money, property, security, or valuable consideration, to or for any candidate or to or for any person on behalf of any candidate, or to or for any person, in order to aid or influence the election or defeat of any candidate, or in order to promote the success or defeat of the candidates or prospective candidates, of any political party in Canada or in any electoral district in Canada; or in order to aid or defeat the objects of any organization, association, or party, maintained for political purposes in Canada, which or some part of which money, property, security, or valuable consideration, such person expects or intends shall be reimbursed, repaid, or replaced to him or any person on whose behalf or in respect to which or any part of which he expects or intends to be indemnified by or on behalf of any such corporation, or in respect of which or some part of which money, property, security, or valuable consideration, such person accepts reimbursement, repayment or indemnity from or by such corporation, is guilty of the indictable offence of bribery and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, and shall also forfeit the sum of $1,000 to any person who sues therefor with costs.

5. Every officer and every employee of the government of Canada or of any department thereof, every contractor with such government or with any department thereof (including the officers of a corporation contractor) to whom or whose assigns public money may as incident to such contract become payable, and every officer or employee of the government of any province of Canada or any department thereof who directly or indirectly pays, gives, lends, advances, deposits or by any device contributes, or offers or promises any money, property, security or valuable consideration, or who procures or solicits or endeavours or offers or promises to procure or solicits any money, property, security or valuable consideration to or for a candidate, or to or for any person on behalf of any candidate, or to or for any person in order to aid or influence the election or defeat of any candidate or in order to procure the success or defeat of the candidates or prospective candidates of any political party in Canada, or in any electoral district in Canada, or in order to aid or defeat the objects of any organization, association or party maintained for political purposes, or who becomes the trustee or custodian of any money or property for any of the purposes aforesaid, is guilty of the indictable offence of bribery, are liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, and shall also forfeit the sum of $200 to any person who sues therefor with costs.

A further clause is introduced to this effect:

Every officer and every employee of the government of Canada or of any department thereof and every officer or employee of the government of any province of Canada, and every person who is ordinarily resident without Canada who acts before or during an election as the agent of a candidate in the management or control of his election, or as canvasser, locator, organizer, agent at a poling place, or in any capacity for on behalf of or in the interest of such candidate, at such election or in respect thereto, shall be guilty of an offence and liable upon indictment or summarily to a penalty not exceeding $100, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months or to both in the discretion of the court.

By way of re-introduction of a Bill presented to the House in 1906, clauses are introduced dealing with the publishing of pamphlets during an election, intended to affect prejudicially the election of candidates. The clause then introduced is now re-introduced, together with one providing that every bill, circular, placard or poster having reference to an election should bear upon the face of it the name and address of the printer and publisher. Then with reference to attempts to bribe constituencies by promise of public works there is this clause:

Every person who, during an election, in order to induce or in such manner as might induce any voter or class of voters to vote for or against any candidate, or to refrain from voting, by public speaking, by any writing, or printed publication, or otherwise offers or promises to procure, or to endeavour to procure. the expenditure of the public moneys of Canada, within an electoral district or districts, on condition that electors procure the return of a particular candidate, is guilty of bribery.

This, it will be observed also deals with publications in the press. It has also occurred to me that the provision with regard to counting ballots at the close of the poll is extremely indefinite in the present Act, and it has therefore been thought well to introduce in place of section 172 the Ontario provision with regard to counting ballots. One effect of that will be to avoid the catastrophe which occurred in the South Wentworth election, Seeley vs. Smith, by which the returning officer having numbered the ballots got the whole of those ballots thrown out. The section sought to be introduced would contain this provision, inter alia:

No word or mark written or made or omitted to be written or made by the deputy returning officer on a ballot paper shall void the same, provided the number of ballots in the box agrees with the number of voters who voted, as shown by the poll book.

A series of clauses are introduced for the purpose of bringing into effect almost verbatim in this country the provisions of the English Act as regards returns of election expenses. Hon. gentlemen will be more or less familiar with the English practice in that regard. The sections are very lengthy, and I will merely say that a return the correctness of which is sworn to both by the candidate and by his official agent, is sent to the returning officer by the official agent of every candidate within a prescribed time. These returns will show in minute detail not only all moneys expended, but all moneys received, including the particular persons from whom, and time when all such moneys were received As to the expenditure the utmost particularity is required showing to whom, when and upon what account every dollar is expended. As in the English Act provision is made for the case where a man may be out of Canada at the time when the election return is due. Fourteen days are allowed after his return to Canada within which to make his declaration. Also if from any inadvertence or cause over which he has no control, the return is not filed within the prescribed period, he may make application to a judge who has jurisdiction to make an order excusing him and directing that such returns be filed within a time limited by his order. The remainder of the Bill contains the schedule, consisting of the form of returns of election expenses, and also of the statutory declaration to be made by the candidate and his agent.

Another subject dealt with by the Bill is the case of a member who has been returned for two or more electoral districts. In that case if there are in the hands of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery returns showing that that has been the case.

The member shall within thirty days next after the day on which a poll was last held in any such electoral districts, elect by a writing with certain attendant formalities for which of such several electoral districts he will sit.

Such writing shall be transmitted to the Speaker, but if there is no speaker, or if the member be himself the Speaker, then and in either of such cases transmitted to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery.

Upon receipt by the Speaker of this writing a vacancy shall ipso facto exist in the representation of the electoral district for which such member was elected and for which he shall not so elect to sit.

In case the member shall refuse to elect and shall have consented to his nomination in one only of the electoral districts for which he has been so returned, a vacancy shall ipso facto, arise on the expiration of the above period of thirty days, in the representation of the electoral district, and in each of the electoral districts for which such member shall have been so elected, but to his nomination in which he did not so consent. If the member consented to his nomination in all or in none of the several electoral districts from which he has been returned, a vacancy shall ipso facto arise in all the electoral districts from which he has been returned other than in that the return from which first reached the clerk of the Crown in Chancery.

Provision is then made preserving the rights of all persons who may have title to petition against the return of the member for any of the divisions for which he has been so returned, and a clause is added to the effect that upon the receipt of every return the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery shall endorse in handwriting upon that return its proper consecutive number of the day, hour and minute that it is received.

I have the honour to move the first reading.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). I know it is not the custom to discuss a Bill when it is introduced. But I have heard all that my hon. friend has read of his Bill, and I just want to call the attention of the House to the fact that it is in elections that we find how an election Act works out. Now in an election that is going on to-day, and where I had the honour of addressing the electors, I had occasion to observe the fact that there is not a clause in our present Election Act which shows what should be the qualifications of a voter, whether he should be twenty-one years of age, or a British subject. This leads to a great deal of confusion. The only thing I find which relates to that subject, is in form P, defining the qualification of electors. Hon. gentlemen will find that there are included in that form the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, and the Yukon Territory. It may be that we here understand what the clause means ; but the deputy returning officers, whether willingly or unwillingly, refuse to administer that form of oath to any voter, because they pretend that it only relates to the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta and the Yukon Territory. Under the circumstances, there remains nothing at all in the whole Act which shows what should be the qualifications of a voter.

Mr. BRODEUR. That is in the Franchise Act.

Mr. BERGERON. So I have told the deputy returning officers, but they will not use any thing else but this form ; and it is very hard, between nine o'clock in the morning and five in the afternoon to call in a justice of the peace to interpret the law. The deputy returning officers, whether through ignorance or ill-will, will not use any thing but this. If you remind them that there is a clause in the Franchise Act covering that point, they will answer that they have nothing to do with the Franchise Act. I now suggest to my hon. friend (Mr. Alcorn) that he should have a clause in his Act making it quite clear what are the qualifications of a voter in elections. Another thing which has been discussed very often in this House—I do not know whether my hon. friend has included it in his Bill—is the oath. There is no oath at all in the Act. A sheet is given to the deputy returning officer and until lately that sheet was the oath administered according to the law of the local legislature, but, as a matter of fact, it was an oath that meant nothing at all. As the law implies the oath we want is one to prevent the elector from polling his vote illegally. There is nothing in the oath to state whether or not a man is a British subject or twenty-one years of age. There is one clause in it which is supposed to have the effect of preventing corruption but which is very incomplete. I do not see why there should not be a complete oath printed in one of the forms which would make it necessary for the deputy returning officer to administer a proper oath. I do not know whether my hon. friend has thought of putting in a clause which would prevent a minister of the Crown from promising a county that if it elects a ministerial candidate it will get all it needs, while if it elects the other candidate it will be in the cold shades of opposition and it will not get any thing. I believe that this is high corruption and that there should be a clause that will prevent a minister of the Crown from acting in that manner. These are some of the suggestions I want to make to my hon. friend who has introduced this Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PRESENTATION OF PETITION.

Mr. J. D. REID. Mr. Speaker, I would like, with the consent of the House, to introduce a petition. I may say that this is the last day and that the lawyer who had this petition in charge forgot that the House met at two o'clock to-day. This petition is also being introduced into the Senate.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is irregular and it cannot be introduced unless the House consents.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Carried.

2. Are there copies or extracts from any portions of such land registers and state papers in the Dominion lands office at Winnipeg, known as land register 'B'?
3. Is there a copy of land register 'B' in the Department of the Interior at Ottawa?

Some time ago an application for the bonus given under the Cold Storage Act, was made by the Edmonton Produce Company, of Edmonton, through Mr. T. S. Williamson, the principal member of the company. While the application was pending Mr. Williamson died and the department has not been advised whether or not the application will be further prosecuted by his representatives or associates.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works). The information extends over quite a long period and I would ask my hon. friend to put the question in the form of a motion for a return.

Mr. LEFURGEY. I call attention to an error in the question as printed. The first period should read from 1873 to 1878 and not to 1876 as printed. I do not think it is very difficult to answer the question in the form in which it is put.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. It stands as a notice of motion for a return.

ST. PETER'S BAY MAILS.

Mr. A. MARTIN (Queens) asked:

1. Was a contract entered into between the Post Office Department and H. Boswell Finlay for carrying the mails daily for four years from the railway station to the post office at St. Peter's bay? If so, what was the amount paid yearly under this contract?

2. Was a second contract entered into for carrying the same mails a second time each day? If so, who is the contractor and what is his remuneration?

3. Is he carrying out his contract now?

4. Are the mails now carried a second time daily?

5. Is it the intention to cancel the contract with Mr. Finlay? If so, on what grounds?

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Postmaster General):

1. Yes. $120 per annum.

2. No, but on the advice of the inspector that the rate of payment to Finlay was too high the department decided to cancel the contract and invite tenders for a new contract to include a second service each day, which the department has been asked to provide.

The new contract was awarded to Barnaby O'Hanly at $100.16 per annum—$19.84 cheaper for the semi-daily service than was paid to Finlay for once a day service.

3. Yes, since 1st January instant.

4. Yes.

5. Answered by No. 2.

ST. PETER'S BAY POST OFFICE.

Mr. A. MARTIN (Queens) asked:

1. Has the appointment of Mrs. Mary Finlay as postmistress at the head of St. Peter's bay been cancelled?

2. If so, for what reason and on whose recommendation?

3. Was an investigation demanded by a numerously signed petition?

4. Was the investigation granted? If not, why not?

5. When was Mrs. Mary Finlay appointed?

6. Was a petition forwarded to the Department or Mr. Hughes, M.P., asking that Mrs. Mary Finlay be retained in her position as postmistress?

7. If so, what was the number of signatures thereto?

8. Why was not the prayer of petitioners granted?

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Postmaster General):

1 and 2. Representation having been made to the department that the head of St. Peter's bay post office was inconveniently located and should be removed to a more convenient site, near the bridge which crosses the bay and where it would serve the people living on both sides of the bay, it was decided to make the proposed change. The change in site involved a change in the postmastership and on the recommendation of Mr. J. J. Hughes, M.P., Mr. Barnaby O'Hanly was appointed as postmaster.

3 and 4. No petition for such an investigation was received at the department and no investigation was made.

5. On the 14th December, 1905.

TIGNISH POST OFFICE.

Mr. LEFURGEY asked:

1. Was a petition received from the people of Tignish, Prince Edward Island, and surrounding district, for the placing of a fireproof safe in the post office there for protection of mail matter?

2. Will the government state the heading of said petition and the number of persons signing same?

3. What report was made to the department by the post office inspector?

4. Is it the intention of the department to grant the request of the petition?

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Postmaster General):

1. Yes.

2. That in view of the large amount of postal business done through the Tignish post office the office in question should be supplied with a fire and burglar proof safe. There were 212 signatures to the petition.

3 and 4. The department having made full inquiry into all the facts came to the conclusion that there was no reason for deviating from its regulations requiring that postmasters in all but government buildings shall provide their own means of safe guarding the mail matter and other valuable matter passing through their hands.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior). I would call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that some time ago he moved a resolution covering a considerable part of the same matter. That return is now in course of preparation and in order to save duplication of work I would be very glad if he would add to this order:

Excluding therefrom any papers on the subject that may be included in the return ordered on the 13th instant.

Mr. FOSTER. I would be glad to accept the amendment to my motion.

Motion as amended agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF FISHERIES COMMITTEE.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough) moved :

That in the opinion of this House it is advisable to appoint a select standing committee on fisheries.

He said : The purpose of this resolution is to secure the approval of the House for the appointment of a select standing committee on fisheries. We have now in this House Committees on Agriculture and Colonization, Banking and Commerce, Railways and Canals, Public Accounts, and a variety of other subjects, all I presume doing useful work ; but we have no committee to-day to which we can refer questions that arise from time to time regarding our fisheries. In the House of Commons in England there is a committee on trade, which under the rules of that House, includes fisheries. In the province of Nova Scotia, for 50 years, prior to confederation, there was a select standing committee of the legislature on fisheries. I suppose that the same was true of the other maritime provinces. But when the jurisdiction in regard to this question was handed over to this parliament in 1867, those committees were dropped and it is rather an extraordinary circumstance that we should have allowed forty years of confederation to pass without the appointment of a standing committee to deal with this question.

If the House will bear with me for a few minutes, I would like to refer to the great importance of our fishing industry and to the work that such a committee might be expected to do. My reason for detaining the House is that I desire to awaken in the country and among the members of the House a greater interest in this important question. In my opinion the people of Canada do not realize what an asset they have in their fisheries. Without doubt the Canadian fisheries are to-day the greatest and most extensive fisheries in the world. To begin with, we have an enormous coast line. On the Atlantic stretching from the Bay of Fundy to the Straits of Belle Isle, we have a coast line of some 5,600 miles. We have also an important coast line on the Pacific, not quite so important as on the Atlantic but still of vast importance, and if we consider that our country is washed by three oceans and that the coast line is greatly indented, we will not be surprised to find that we have a coast line in all of 12,000 miles. We have bays and inlets of the sea covering an area of 15,000 square miles; whereas in that part of the great lakes, under Canadian jurisdiction there is contained about 72,000 square miles. In addition to this we have lakes and rivers in all parts of this vast country and all these waters are more or less prolific of good food fish.

If it were necessary to remind the House of the great importance of this industry, I might refer to the growing volume of the halibut and salmon fisheries on the Pacific coast. The output of this industry in British Columbia grew in value in one year from $5,219,107 to $9,850,216.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Where is the market for that fish, mainly ?

Mr. SINCLAIR. Boston is the great market for the halibut fishery. Enormous quantities of British Columbia fish go fresh to Boston and are distributed by the Fish Trust of the United States to the different cities of the United States. I question if there is any industry in Canada that shows such a growth as that in any one year.

I might also refer you to the great lobster industry of eastern Canada. We have on the eastern coast of Canada a practical monopoly of the lobster industry of the world. Lobsters, I understand, are confined almost exclusively to the Atlantic ocean. They were found a generation ago in considerable quantities on the coast of Norway, Scotland and other European countries, but I am told that they are scarcely to be found at all in those waters to-day. They were also found on the coast of the United States as far south as Cape Hatteras, but there are very few lobsters found on the coast of New York state at present, or in fact on the coast of any of the New England states, except Maine. A certain quantity are still caught on the coast of Maine, but outside of a limited number caught in that state we have on the eastern shore of Canada a practical monopoly of the whole lobster business of the world. To give you some idea of the importance of this one branch of the fishing industry, I may say that it realized for the people of Canada during the last fiscal year the sum of over $3,500,000. I might also point out that the growth of the Canadian fishing industry since confederation has kept pace with the advance of the country in other respects. The output of the fishing industry of Canada at the end of each ten year term, has been as follows :—

Year.	Output.
1880	14,499,979
1890	17,714,902
1900	21,557,639
1906	26,272,485

1906 is the last year for which we have the statistics. From 1870 up to the present it has increased from $6,000,000 to $26,000,000 in value.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Could the hon. gentleman say whether there is a corresponding increase in the weight of the fish caught ?

Mr. SINCLAIR. I do not think so.

Mr. W. F MACLEAN. It was rather a diminution.

Mr. SINCLAIR. I will not say a diminution excepting in the case of lobsters.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. That is a discouraging feature.

Mr. SINCLAIR. A much larger price is obtained for the output at present than was obtained a number of years ago. I have not got the quantities before me. The output for the past year is credited to the various provinces in the following proportions.

Nova Scotia	$ 7,799,160
British Columbia	7,003,347
New Brunswick	4,905,225
Quebec	2,175,035
Ontario	1,734,856
Prince Edward Island	1,168,939
Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, which are grouped together	1,492,933
	$26,279,485

It is clear that the people of Canada have faith in this industry for, without very much encouragement from the government or any other source, they have continued from year to year to invest an increasing portion of their capital in the prosecution of our fisheries. The capital invested by our people in fishing vessels, boats and gear has increased every ten years in the following proportion:

1880	$ 3,936,582
1900	10,990,125
1906	14,555,565

Showing that in twenty-five years the Canadian people have increased their investments in this important industry by over 350 per cent. This industry gives employment to a large population. It does not take much capital to start a fisherman. A boat and a supply of nets is about all that is required to begin with. It is the most democratic business in the world, as the ocean is free to all who are willing to get up early and work hard. In Nova Scotia alone this industry gives employment to over 25,000 men. Multiply that number of men by five, the average number of each family, and we have a population of 125,000 in that province alone depending on this industry. The total number employed in it in all the provinces for the year ending June 30, 1906, was 67,646 men, and including those employed in the lobster industry, largely on land, the total is 88,421.

It is also to be observed that the number of men employed shows a steady increase. While the farming population of the eastern provinces are steadily going west, the fishermen are much more apt to remain at home. In 1880 the total number of men employed in the Canadian fisheries was 60,657 while in 1906 the total number reached 76,100 ; and if we add those employed in the lobster industry, it amounts to 88,421.

In the prosecution of this industry in Canada we have a fleet employed, consisting of 1,439 fishing vessels, manned by 8,458 sailors. Our inshore fisheries, however, are prosecuted to a much greater extent than our deep sea fisheries. The former employ 39,634 boats manned by 67,646 men. The number of persons employed in the fisheries in the New England states, which is our chief rival, is about 23,000. They are equipped with 11,021 boats and 1,479 vessels, and the capital invested in these, including vessels, boats, nets and gear, is valued at 19,963,031. In the case of the United States, the capital invested per man is $868 as compared with $191 in Canada. According to the official reports, the average earnings of our fishing populations per man in our various provinces during the past year were as follows :—

Nova Scotia	$322
Prince Edward Island	327
Quebec	183
Ontario	594
Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta	379

The average earnings of Canadian fishermen, taking all the provinces together, is $388, and the average earnings of the fishermen in the New England states is $519.

I have not included in this comparison the province of British Columbia, as the fishing is done in such a different way in that province that a comparison would not be a fair one.

The fisherman purchases more goods per capita than the farmer, and in that way contributes more to the revenue of the country. Our Canadian fisherman is a virile type of man, adventurous and hardy. His very calling requires courage and endurance. Having to fight the storms of the north Atlantic, having to win livelihood from the rough seas, he has necessarily to be both active and courageous and vigorous. And if the time should come ever when the British race will again have to fight for the supremacy of the seas, as they have had to do so often in the past, and if Canada is to do her share in maintaining that supremacy, it is from this class that we must draw the men for our future Canadian navy. We often hear it stated that Canada has a great destiny, that it is to be our task, under the British flag and in partnership with the other great divisions of the empire, to build up on the northern half of this continent a great Canadian state. Well, if we are ever to achieve this destiny, we must not confine ourselves to settling our broad prairies, tilling our soil, building transcontinental railways and working mines and factories, but we must hold our grip on the sea as well as the land. A generation ago it was the proud boast of Nova Scotia that her people owned more shipping, in proportion to the population of that province, than any other country in the world. We cannot make that boast to-day. Our ships are fast disappearing from the sea. Let us then not neglect our fishing industry lest it also should disappear like our coasting trade. It will be asked, can the state judiciously assist in developing our fisheries ? My reply is that it has been done successfully in Great Britain. The Scotch fishery board, under the direction and control of the Secretary of State for Scotland, has done a great deal to develop the fisheries of that country. Separate these classes and number them, first by encouraging the application of modern methods; second by disseminating scientic information and carrying on an educational campaign. As much as £10,000 has been voted in one year to defray the expenses of technical instruction on the fisheries.

(3) By insisting on inspection and proper packing and branding.

(4) By dividing the coast up into districts and providing the appointment of Local Fishery Boards from among the men who have an intimate knowledge of the requirements of the business.

(5) By reporting on and investigating injuries done by steamers to fishermen's nets and gear, and by assessing damages in such cases and compelling payment by the guilty parties.

(6) By ascertaining and reporting on the requirements of foreign markets and doing the work usually done by commercial agents.

(7) By experiments to ascertain the best model of fishing boat and the best kind of twine or fibre to be used in the manufacture of nets.

(8) By placing a public barometer at each fishing station, so that the fishermen may have warning of an approaching storm.

(9) By capturing fish alive and marking or tagging them, showing date and place, and then setting them free, so that, when they are recaptured, the fishermen may ascertain the frequency of their visits and the regularity of their return to the same waters and other useful information.

(10) The Scotch Fishery Board has even gone so far as to lend money from the public funds to assist fishermen to equip themselves with boats and fishing gear.

These are among the things that have been done during recent years by the Scotch Fishery Board. It is well known that the work done by this board has been eminently successful. One of the results is that capital has flowed in for investment in this industry. By reference to the public reports, it will be found that 38,000 men employed in the prosecution of this industry in Scotland have an equipment of boats, nets and gear of a value of $20,000,000 ; while for 76,000 Canadian fishermen there is an equipment valued at only $14,555,565. In other words, the equipment of the Scotch fishermen per capita is $527 while that of the Canadian fishermen represents a capital expenditure per man of only $191.

It is also pointed out that, the strict attention to inspection and packing, insisted on by the Scotch Fishery Board, has shown good results in a steady increase in prices and growth in sales of Scotch herring in the foreign market. It is a fact well known to the dealers that a barrel of herring packed under the inspection of the Scotch Fishery Board and branded by their officers will sell in the market of St. Petersburg or New York at from $10 to $12, while a barrel of Canadian herring, which is as good in every way, but packed without inspection and branding, will only bring, in the same markets, $6 or $7. I would like to commend this fact to the consideration of our hon. friends opposite who are now trying to raise an agitation in the province of Ontario against the inspection of Canadian canned meat. It is also interesting to note the expansion of the Scotch fisheries under the direction of the fishery board. By reference to the public report it will be seen that the advance in production of the herring cured and branded has been as follows:—

	Barrels.
In 1811	9,034
1831	414,574
1867	804,090

This is exclusive of a large quantity used fresh and smoked. The improvement in this system of inspection and branding has been so marked that the Scotch cured herring for many years has held first place in the great fish markets of the world. This one result is worth millions to the people of Scotland every year. A similar work has been done, under the direction of fishery boards in Norway and Holland and other European countries. Our fellow countrymen in Cape Colony are doing the same kind of work through their local government. They are paying special attention to the business phases of the fishing industry. For example, they are showing to the fishermen by actual experiment, the places where the fish are likely to be at certain seasons of the year. They are making maps of the bottom of the different bays along the coast of South Africa, and giving useful information of this kind and many other kinds to assist the fishermen in conducting their business.

The question for us in Canada is—Can we profit by the experience of these countries ? I submit that the matter is worthy of our very best consideration. Fishery boards, after the model of the Scotch board, may not be practicable in Canada. In my opinion, we should not commit ourselves to this proposal hastily. Our coast, as I have said is very extensive and sparsely settled, and the difficulty of finding a class of men who would properly represent the fishing interests and would give their time without remuneration to this work, as they do in Scotland, would have to be encountered. These circumstances, however, make the appointment of the committee that I am proposing all the more necessary. In my view, the work done by the Scotch Fishery Board might be done, here to some extent, by the Department of Marine and Fisheries. I would also like to say that in any arrangement of this kind that is possible to be made in Canada, the ultimate control should be in the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, just as the control of the Scotch board is in the Secretary of State for Scotland. The present administration has done a great deal to develop this important industry, but much remains to be done. I believe that no branch of the public service offers a greater field for special effort at the present time than our fisheries. The importance of our fisheries is bound to grow with the increase of our population. When we have twenty millions of people in this country, as we should have before many years, we should have a splendid home market for our fish. If we can improve the transportation facilities and reduce the express and freight rates, we can put this wholesome food within the reach of every Canadian family. Give us branch lines of the Intercolonial Railway touching at the principal fishing ports along the Atlantic sea-board in Nova Scotia, fair freight and express rates, and an up-to-date system of cold storage, and, instead of an output valued at about $6,000,000 or $8,000,000, within twenty years we should have an output of $20,000,000. There is practically no limit to the possible expansion of this industry unless it is the market, and in a rapidly-growing country like ours, the market will always be improving. There is no call to be despondent in regard to the fishing industry, and I may say that our people are not despondent. On the contrary, the most hopeful feeling prevails among them. Permit me to read an extract from a recent article by Mr. C. H. Whitman, of Canso, Nova Scotia, in a Halifax paper, which is a good illustration of the way our people regard this industry. Mr. Whitman says :

> The fisheries of these provinces are not a failure, they are but in their infancy. Let the same intelligence and courage that have given to Nova Scotians a world-wide reputation on sea and land be applied to the solution of our fisheries and we need not fear for the result. We are ready to predict that the time is not far distant when the descendants of the men who carried the British flag on Nova Scotia ships into every port in the world will demonstrate their ability to make their conduct of our North Atlantic fisheries the envy of our neighbours and a source of pride and satisfaction to every patriotic Canadian—when Canadian ship-yards will be called upon to build and Canadian fishermen to man a fleet of fishing steamers and fishing schooners and fishing boats far and away in advance of anything we have now afloat, and the fishing fleet of Great Britain shall find itself reproduced and improved upon in the ports of Nova Scotia.

Among the expenditures of the present administration for the development of our fisheries that have brought, and are now bringing, good results, I might mention the following :

(1). The assistance given towards providing cold storage for bait. The results in this respect have been most important. Bait this season on certain parts of the coast was a complete failure, but the fishermen in many localities were in a position to continue their work by using last year's supply kept over in the cold storage warehouses assisted by the government.

(2). The propagation of lobsters which already is giving good results and in a few years will return to our people a hundred fold for every dollar expended.

(3). The improved transportation facilities, refrigerator cars and fast freight trains provided by the Intercolonial Railway, which has enormously stimulated the trade on the Atlantic sea-board wherever it is within reach of the railway, and enabled our dealers to compete with the Gloucester fish merchants in the Montreal market.

(4). The subsidies granted by the Department of Trade and Commerce to coasting steamers employed in collecting fresh fish and delivering them to the Intercolonial at Mulgrave and Halifax, thus making it possible to carry on a fresh fish business at the points reached by these boats, and at the same time furnishing profitable business for the Intercolonial Railway.

Permit me to give an illustration. Prior to 1896 the merchants and fishermen of Canso, Port Hood and Petit de Gras and some other points on that coast were unable to carry on successfully a fresh fish business at those places for lack of communication with the Intercolonial at Mulgrave. The matter was brought to the attention of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and a subsidy was brought to the attention of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and a subsidy was voted to establish a daily steamship service with Mulgrave. The business at once began to expand and has made steady growth ever since, until last year it reached the value of over $220,000, and paid to the Intercolonial Railway, on the one article of fresh fish alone, over $29,000 in freight. The following table shows the growth made in this business, at this one point alone, from 1896 up to the present time.

Year.	Tons of Fresh Fish Shipped from Mulgrave.	Value.	Freight and Express Rates Paid.
	Tons.	$ cts.	$ cts.
1896	900	73,000 00	6,460 00
1897	997	77,600 00	9,596 00
1898	1,415	99,050 00	11,312 83
1899	1,353	94,710 00	14,493 00
1900	1,450	100,000 00	16,500 00
1901	1,900	133,000 00	19,760 00
1902	1,800	126,000 00	18,720 00
1903	1,600	112,000 00	16,840 00
1904	1,700	127,500 00	17,680 00
1905	2,201	164,070 00	23,032 06
1906	3,154	220,780 00	29,063 01
1907	3,156	220,920 00	27,417 70

Showing a growth in quantity, owing to the facilities given, from 900 tons to 3,154 tons, and in value from $73,000 to $220,000. Now, Sir, what has been done at Canso, and Petit de Gras and Port Hood can be done at other points on the coast if the same facilities are afforded.

(5). The construction of wharfs and breakwaters along the coast where many thriving villages have been built up and business developed and our young men induced to remain at home instead of seeking employment as formerly in the fishing vessels of the New England states. If my hon. friend from North Toronto will do me the honour to visit my constituency I will show him the splendid results that have come from those breakwaters that he so vigorously condemned. If he could only see those prosperous villages for himself and note how the trade of these places has expanded and how much sounder these fishermen sleep knowing that their boats are safe behind the breakwater and that there is no danger of them being found in splinters on the shore in the morning. I am sure that his better nature would prevail and that this year he would make no more opposition to these improvements than he did last year to the large sum that we voted for improving the harbour of Toronto.

If I might be permitted to venture any criticism on the Department of Marine and Fisheries in so far as the fisheries are concerned, it would be that it has to some extent got into a rut. There is too much red tape—too much tendency to multiply regulations and not enough attention paid to the practical phases of the business. The Canadian fishery officer has developed into a kind of detective. It is not the fault of the officer, but of the system. He is not asked or expected to concern himself with any plans for assisting the fishing industry. I have pointed out some of the numerous ways in which the Scotch fishery officer is expected to direct his energies. It would seem that the principal duty imposed upon the Canadian fishery officer, apart from the routine of his office, is to watch the fisherman and fine him for infractions of the law. Detective work is useful in its place but there are other things.

I will venture to say that it is a very unusual thing for a fisherman on any part of the Canadian coast to consult a fishery officer or seek information from him about his business. The officer of the Agricultural Department who runs the travelling dairy or inspects the fruit, is always welcome when he makes his tour through the country. I recollect well when the Department of Agriculture had the benefit of the services of Prof. Robertson, and when the visit of that gentleman through my province was a source of inspiration and assistance to the farmers. The same relations should exist between the fishery officer and that class of our population that he is paid to serve.

I do not wish to be understood as reflecting in any way upon the present minister. I am sure that every man in this House on both sides has the most implicit confidence in him. During the short time that he has occupied the position he has done splendid work, especially in the marine branch of the service. The defects in the fisheries branch were handed down to him by his predecessors and are as old as the department itself. I have every confidence that the minister will find some way of lifting it out of the rut and placing it on a higher level.

The usefulness of the Department of Marine and Fisheries is to some extent handicapped by the fact that the seat of government is 1,000 miles distant from the fishing grounds on the eastern coast and 2,000 from the west. There is accordingly little opportunity for the officers of the department here to become acquainted with the views and needs of the men engaged in prosecuting the industry, and I submit that a standing committee of the House could do much to bring them closer together and create a better understanding. It is also clear that a committee composed of members of this House from the various provinces meeting here year after year would be a sort of centre for the collection and dissemination of useful information in regard to this important industry. This kind of work has been done for some years with considerable success by the Committee on Agriculture and there is no reason why the same kind of useful work could not be done for this other industry by a committee on fisheries. In my motion I have asked for a committee on fisheries alone. Permit me to suggest to the minister the advisability of including marine as well. We have now before this House a number of Bills—we have at least three that I recollect that might very well be referred to such a committee. There is the Bill now before the House of the hon. member for Lincoln and Niagara (Mr. Lancaster) relating to the nationality of master mariners, second, the Bill of the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Maclean) relating to coasting voyages, and third the Bill of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) relating to marine engineers. Such questions as these are arising in the House every year and in a maritime country like ours they will continue to arise and there is no more convenient way in which they can be dealt with than by referring them to a committee such as I am proposing. I therefore beg leave to move that this resolution be adopted.

Mr. W. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). Mr. Speaker, I understand that my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) has not any very serious objection to the passing of this motion and on that account I feel that I ought to preface my remarks by apologizing for taking up the time of this House. We all recognize the fact that too much of the valuable time of the House is spent in discussing academic questions and in treating of matters about which there should be no controversy or contention whatsoever, but the importance of this subject is my excuse for asking to be permitted to offer a few remarks this afternoon. The subject is of such importance that I consider no words of apology or excuse are necessary for the few moments I intend to take up the time of the House. I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without placing myself on record as being in hearty sympathy with that great, very important and very deserving class of our population, the fisherman of Canada. The time that will be taken in the consideration of anything that will tend to the conservation of our fisheries and the improvement and betterment of our fishermen, is time well spent by this government and by the House. As to the necessity of this committee, my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) has referred to the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization. Every one who has served on that committee knows the good work that is there done. It is the means of bringing together agricultural and other experts and of getting their views on the subjects that interest and concern the farmer, who is, after all, the backbone of the country and it is the means of causing a great deal of useful knowledge and information to be disseminated throughout the country. These men meet, exchange views, ascertain local conditions and are in a position to improve the conditions of farmers throughout the country generally. Their efforts are not limited to the betterment of local conditions. That committee in short is one that has done an immense amount of good for the vast farming interests of our country and has also very materially assisted in shaping and directing and even checking if you will, the policy of immigration. I need not enter into any argument to justify the establishment and continuance of that committee. Its work speaks for itself. What has been done by that committee for the farmers, I submit, can be done by a similar committee for the fishermen of the country. The fisheries are of the very greatest importance, as has been remarked by my hon. friend from Guysborough, and the fishermen are well deserving of anything that this government or any other government can do for them. They are an industrious, energetic, hard-working, honest class of people where brawn and muscle, intelligence and endurance are required in the exercise of their calling. The fishermen, as has been remarked by my hon. friend from Guysborough are large contributors to the revenues and the wealth of the country and they are deserving of any assistance and encouragement that the government can give them. I am pleased to observe that this government has not been unmindful of that class and that it has done considerable to help it. The matter of cold storage or bait freezers has been referred to by my hon. friend from Guysborough. The assistance given in that direction has been of incalculable benefit to the fishermen, who are enabled thereby to obtain bait at all seasons of the year to catch fish when fish are going and thus make profitable an industry that would otherwise be a very precarious one. Reference has also been made to the boat harbours, breakwaters and wharfs that have been constructed and maintained by the government for the purpose of enabling the fishermen to prosecute their industry with greater facility and convenience. I endorse the remarks of my hon. friend from Guysborough as to what should be the attitude of the opposition when they come to consider the votes and appropriations submitted for the improvement of the condition of the fishermen, for the building of breakwaters and wharfs along our coasts. Too many hon. gentlemen in this House think that this money is wasted, that this money is frittered away; but if they would reflect for a moment who are they that are benefited by these boat-harbours, wharfs and breakwaters, if they would consider how important an asset the fisheries of the country are to the people of Canada, and if they would only bear in mind the fact that it is impossible to prosecute the fishing industry on the shores of the Atlantic without these breakwaters and wharfs, they would be less caustic in their remarks in criticising these appropriations. Honourable gentlemen on the other side of the House would do well to consider and take to heart the arduous labours and hazardous occupation of the toilers of the sea who furnish food for the rich man and poor man alike; and if they do, we shall hear less of government effort to corrupt and debauch the electorate by useless expenditures of public moneys in building these public works.

I might also refer to the fact that the improvement of the system of transportation that we have in this country has been of incalculable benefit to the fishermen. It enables him to place his product on the markets of the world in a better condition and in a shorter time and, therefore, to obtain more remunerative prices for his fish. I might also refer to the fishing bounty that it is only comparatively trifling, but it is a matter that the fishermen appreciate and are thankful for. Further, I might say, Mr. Speaker, that last year the fishermen were well remembered when it came to the revision of the tariff. Twine and other articles entering into the business of the fisherman were placed on the free list, or the duty was materially reduced and in that way the fisherman was recognized and favoured.

But, I submit that a great deal more can be done for our fishermen than already has been done. I had occasion to remark a moment ago that the fishing industry in Canada is one of our leading industries. In 1905 the value of our fisheries was $26,250,000, including fishing products. In our Statistical Year-book for 1904 I find that the value of fisheries that year was $23,500,000. Nova Scotia led that year among the provinces in the value of the fisheries, the value being $7,250,000, or about one-third of the total fisheries of Canada. British Columbia in that year came next with $5,250,000. My hon. friend from Guysborough has grown very optimistic in view of the fact that to-day the value of our fisheries has increased, but I am afraid that the facts will not altogether bear out the bright picture he has painted. As I look over the statistics I find that while the value of the fisheries has increased the quantity has decreased, and it seems to me that there is a decrease going on that will ultimately, unless something is done by this government or otherwise to change the conditions that now exist, result in the depletion of our waters and the extinction of our fisheries. But, mark you, whilst the quantities have decreased, the value has increased, the prices that have been obtained in the last number of years by our fishermen have largely increased, and in that way the business is more profitable than ever it was. I have tabulated some figures from the Statistical Year-book of 1904 just for the purpose of comparison. The Year-book for 1905 was not at hand at the time I collated these figures. But as the figures are only for the purpose of comparison, the later figures are not of very material importance.

Dried cod..	571,000 cwt.	516,000 cwt.
Fresh haddock ..	7,750,000 lbs.	5,250,000 lbs.
Dried haddock ..	103,000 cwt.	80,000 cwt.
Fresh haddock ..	1,500,000 lbs.	1,000,000 lbs.
Fresh herring ..	9,750,000 lbs.	5,000,000 lbs.
Salted herring..	82,500 brls.	59,500 brls.
Fresh mackerel.	3,750,000 lbs.	2,500,000 lbs.
Salted mackerel.	58,500 brls.	21,500 brls.
Fresh salmon ..	750,000 lbs.	500,000 lbs.
Lobsters	202,000 cwt.	146,000 cwt.

Comparing the figures for 1900 with the figures for 1904, there would seem to have been a most lamentable falling off in the quantities of fish taken. I would warn the House, however, that these figures may be to some extent misleading ; they are a good deal like the figures that hon. gentlemen opposite sometimes present to this House when they undertake to show that the present administration has increased the taxation of the country that the people of this country pay more per capita to-day than they did during the Conservative régime. The figures are all right but the conclusions sought to be drawn from them are not justified. So it is with the statistics I have just given. The inference to be drawn from them at first blush is illogical and inaccurate. For instance, in 1901 the catch of fresh haddock was 4,700,000 pounds and in 1905, 10,250,000 pounds ; in 1901 there were 68,000 barrels of salted herring and in 1905, 78,000 barrels, while in 1903 there were 5,000,000 pounds of fresh mackerel as against 2,500,000 pounds in 1905. Therefore, from a glance at these figures and comparing 1900 with 1904, you cannot arrive at the certain conclusion that the quantity of fish is declining or that the decrease has been as great as the figures would suggest. However that may be these figures do disclose a condition that may well cause alarm to those whose livelihood depends on the fishing industry as well as to every Canadian no matter what his avocation may be who has the welfare of his country at heart. In the United States they have had to deal with the depletion and threatened extinction of the fisheries, particularly the lobster fisheries, and they adopted certain regulations which were regarded by the fishermen at the time as very drastic. In the state of Massachusetts the catch of lobsters fell from 1,612,000 in 1890 to 426,000 pounds in 1905, a decrease in the latter year of about one-quarter what it was in the former year. And mark you, this decrease occurred notwithstanding the use of improved apparatus for catching fish and the greater incentive to pursue the industry because of the increased demand and the enhanced price. What is true of the lobster fishery is true of other fisheries except, as to the extent of the decline. In looking over the Massachusetts public document for 1905, volume 12, document 25, I find the following with regard to the lobster fisheries :—

Reports, official and from the press, from the Straits of Belle Isle to the Delaware capes, the entire lobster producing coast, are well nigh unanimous, both that the number of lobsters is decreasing and that the average size of the lobster is gradually diminishing.

Then, again, Professor Prince, our Canadian commissioner of fisheries, who has given the lobster fishery a good deal of attention, wrote as follows in 1896 :—

In the Dominion of Canada there remains the last great lobster fishery of the world, and it is not too much to say that this fishery has reached a critical stage. . . . Ten years ago the average size of lobsters was 10 inches (2 pounds weight) while 30 years ago an old fisherman testified that 13 inches (3½ pounds weight) was the average.

If Professor Prince had an opportunity of knowing the size of the lobsters that have been taken in recent years, in violation of the law, I regret to say, I wonder what picture he would draw of the present condition of our lobster fishery. In 1903 the government of Massachusetts appointed a committee to investigate the question of the fisheries not only on the eastern coast of the United States, but on the entire Atlantic coast. On that committee were appointed men of eminent ability for the work, and among them were the most noted scientists connected with the United States fishery bureau. On page 181 the result of their investigation is summed up in the following conclusions :—

As a result of our investigations we are of the opinion that there has been a decided decrease (1) in the number of lobsters living today as compared with ten years or even one year ago; (2) in the average size; (3) in the number caught per pot; (4) in the number of lobsters of breeding age; (5) in the aggregate number of eggs laid upon which the future of the lobster depends, there is (6) marked evidence of the absence of lobsters from extensive areas where they were formerly numerous.

In a work entitled 'The Potential riches of British Columbia," Mr. J. B. Clearihue treats at length of the condition of the salmon fisheries in that province, and says :

About a year ago a commission was appointed by the Dominion government to report on the fisheries of British Columbia, and the evidence taken by them goes to show that the very important industry of salmon canning is decreasing, notwithstanding the greatly improved fishing methods of to-day; and that this decrease is due to the failure of the salmon to reach their spawning grounds in the upper rivers. This industry can yet be saved and even increased if radical changes are wrought in the Fisheries Act, limiting the number of fishing licenses, the size and use of nets, the fishing limits and by increasing the hatcheries and the close season by a few hours each week. Large quantities of fish enter the small streams on the west coast of Vancouver island and along the mainland, where little or no fishing takes place. If hatcheries were placed here the increase would be at once felt.

It would seem that not only the lobster fishery is threatened with extinction, but that our salmon fishery is also in jeopardy. It is generally admitted that the quantity of lobsters is decreasing, that the size of the lobster is diminishing, that the increase in price is constantly advancing, and this being universally admitted it might be asked why I should labour the question. Well, to those who are not so blessed by Providence as to live on the sea coast, to those who belong to the great inland provinces it may be that this alarming state of affairs has not impressed itself upon their attention with sufficient force to enable them to realize its consequences. I have therefore at the risk of wearying the House, drawn attention to the conditions of affairs as they exist. As Canadians, those who belong to the inland provinces are interested in the question because as I understand it the fisheries in the great lakes are in a very dangerous position, although perhaps not in so perilous a condition as the fisheries on the Atlantic coast. That being so the magnitude of the danger must be pointed out so that a remedy may be devised commensurate with the case. If we had this committee on fisheries such as is proposed, what would be the result? I submit, Sir, that it would be the means of disseminating a great deal of useful information in relation to our fisheries; it would be the means of starting a propaganda of education among the fishermen so that when regulations are passed these regulations would be observed, and not only observed by the fishermen but that the fisheries would be jealously guarded by the fishermen themselves. At present the regulations are not by any means properly observed; the fishermen do not see the necessity of these regulations, they do not realize that their enforcement is to their interest, to the interest of the country, to the interest of their children and to the interest of the people of Canada as a whole. It is sometimes said that our fishermen are improvident, that they are a class of men who will take the last fish out of the water to-day irrespective of what may happen to-morrow, that they go on the principle of 'let posterity look after itself, posterity never did anything for us.' I deny that. The fishermen of the maritime provinces, and I think of Canada as a whole, are as public-spirited, as patriotic, and have as due regard to the duty they owe themselves, to their children and to their country, as in any other class in the land.

I say that what is needed is mainly education. Let the fishermen understand the situation. Let it be pointed out to them that it is to their interest to have these regulations which are made from year to year by the government observed, and they will be only too glad to join hand in hand with any one desirous of enforcing the regulations.

If we had such a committee as is proposed by my hon. friend, we would derive greater benefit from the work of the expert officials of the departments. We have to-day these fishery experts in the fishery department, no doubt men who thoroughly understand the work to which they are assigned, men who have made a life study of the duties which they are called upon to perform, but it seems to me that we do not get the best out of them. They are looked upon by some people in this House and certainly by many outside of this House as a sort of fish autocracy. I read in a paper recently a reference to this fish autocracy, and the officials of the department who have to do especially with the fisheries of Canada were spoken of as martinets, &c., I do not believe that is right, I believe these officials are anxious to do their duty; they are desirous of helping out the fishermen in their precarious occupation, desirous of preserving the fish. They are honest, sincere and faithful in the discharge of their duty, as they see it. The great trouble is that with our system we cannot bring out the best that is in these officials. If we had this committee on fisheries, it would be the means of keeping these men up to the mark, it would enable them to better realize local conditions and to understand just the condition under which the fisherman is operating and the hardships to which he is exposed. With such a committee, composed among others of men representing constituencies where fishing is an important industry, these experts could be made more useful to the fishermen generally and the country at large. As I said, what is needed is education on the subject of fisheries. How many people outside of this House, who have not made a special study of the subject, know that a lobster grows rather slowly, and is at least four or five years old before reproduction begins, that the natural rate of reproduction is slow, one litter of eggs being produced under favourable conditions every two years instead of annually, that lobsters are not migratory as the mackerel are, the only migration being from deeper to shallow water during the period when eggs are hatching, in June and July. Give the fishermen the benefit of the knowledge of the character and habits of the different fish, educate him on the subject, satisfy him, convince him that this, that or the othe regulation which to him at first seems an injustice, is really for the welfare of the industry in which he is engaged, is in the interest of himself and his children, and he will cheerfully comply with any law or regulation that may be passed or imposed. At present we have laws and regulations regarding the fisheries which seem more honoured in the breach than in the observance. You must proceed in this matter as you would in the case of any sumptuary law—lay the foundation by first educating those to be affected by such law or regulation as to the necessity of it.

While this government has done a great deal for the fishermen, when we contrast the condition of the miners and farmers with that of the fishermen, we see that a great deal more could be done for them. In Nova Scotia, thanks to the work of the local government there, the condition of the miner is really enviable. Mining schools have been established, technical schools, wherein the miner can receive an education in the higher branches of his work ; regulations respecting the ventilation of the mines and the hours of work have been passed ; in fact the intellectual advancement and the physical comfort of the miner have been particularly looked after by the province of Nova Scotia and, as I said, the mining conditions down there are really among the best in the world.

Then look at the condition of the farmer. Too much cannot be done for the farmer ; no one can say that the farmer is not entitled to all the assistance that can be given. We have travelling dairy schools, a school of agriculture, where the farmers' sons can receive an education and learn to thoroughly understand that noble calling ; we have also model orchards and model farms established through the country. In addition to all this we have experimental farms and a generous encouragement to agricultural societies and farmers' associations throughout the land. Now, when you come to consider the position of the miner and farmer on the one hand and the fisherman on the other, you will see that, comparatively, very little has been done for the fisherman and I think that a great deal more could be done. Such a committee as has been suggested, will evolve the means of solving the difficulties that present themselves and will enable the best means to be devised to assist the fishermen. I do not believe in too much paternalism, but there are conditions where paternalism becomes almost a necessity. I venture to think that incalculable good would be done by the creation of such a committee as has been proposed by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) and I cheerfully support his motion, believing as I do that it will meet with the hearty approval of the fishermen throughout Canada and that it should receive the approval of every man in Canada.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (Kings, P. E. I.) I wish to say a few words in support of the resolution. I very strongly approve of a committee of this kind being appointed. Officials of the fisheries branch of the department will themselves admit that they have not all the information on this subject that might be obtained. The members from the fishing districts of the maritime provinces have occasion to frequently go to that department to present their views and requests, and I have been informed and I believe it to be true that these opinions and requests are found to contain a great variety of ideas. If we had a committee of this kind before which the members interested in this subject could go and discuss all these matters, have them threshed out so that they could go to the officials of the department of fisheries with concrete views, I believe that these views would then have very much greater importance and would in all probability receive a better hearing and would produce better results.

One thing would be of great importance to the fishing interests of this country if it could be brought about. It has been touched upon by the mover of this resolution and the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. William Chisholm). That is more education among the fishing population in regard to their own calling. The fishermen of the maritime provinces as a class I think look upon the overseers, the men who are appointed to enforce the regulations in regard to the fisheries, as unsympathetic, as their enemies in fact. It would be an important thing if that condition of affairs could be changed and I know of no better way of doing that than for the department to have the services of some man who had a scientific and practical knowledge of the business who would go among the fishermen, hold meetings and explain to them the reasons of the regulations which are made, explain that these regulations were not against the fishermen or their calling, but the very reserve ; that these regulations were made to preserve and perpetuate the industry and were more important to them than to any other class of the community. If the department could obtain the services of such a man as Prof. Robertson was to the Agricultural Department, to go among the fishermen, to get their sympathy, and to get what is more important still, their co-operation in the carrying out of the regulations made especially in their interests, great and lasting good would result.

Another thing that is very important to the fisherman, particularly to the fisherman of Prince Edward Island, is the improvement of transportation facilities. In that province, we simply cannot carry on our trade in the fresh fish business, unless this question is taken up and a great improvement made. Really, I think, the province of Prince Edward Island, according to its size, is perhaps the most important fishery province in the Dominion. It is right on the fishing ground, surrounded by water, but we are greatly handicapped, in consequence of our being an island, by lack of transportation facilities. I have personal knowledge in this matter. Last year I undertook to put up a quantity of fresh fish for shipment to Montreal and Toronto. We sent out a shipment of frozen cod fish some time in January, and I think it took between three and four weeks before it reached Toronto. I have not the exact dates but am writing for them because I intend to bring up this matter as soon as I have the opportunity in connection with a resolution which I propose to move. The consignee naturally refused to take delivery thinking that the consignment was injured if not destroyed. Fortunately, however, the weather happened to be cold all the time, we wired him to take delivery at all events, and the consignment happened to turn out all right. But the risk is too great, and we are not doing anything in the business this winter, very fortunately for ourselves because the weather has been changeable and mild. I have not been able to this day to find out exactly where the delay occurred. It may have occurred in the crossing from Prince Edward Island to the mainland or some of the delay may have occurred on the Intercolonial Railway and perhaps also on the Grand Trunk Railway because we sent the shipment by the Grand Trunk Railway from Montreal to Toronto. But I have not yet been able to locate exactly where the delay did occur. That is a condition of things which is not at all satisfactory and which will have to be met.

Again I wish to put in a word on behalf of improved harbour facilities for the fishermen, particularly in Prince Edward Island. That is the sine qua non of the fishing business. Fishermen cannot prosecute their calling unless they have safe harbourage for their fishing craft. During the last few years Nova Scotia fared pretty well in having breakwaters and wharfs built by the government in that province but Prince Edward Island has been partially neglected. I would ask the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) to remember the fishermen of Prince Edward Island this year and make some attempt to provide suitable harbourage in which they can shelter their fishing boats. The character of the fishing business has changed. A few years ago our fishermen could prosecute their calling in small flat-bottomed boats called dorys. The fish were caught in-shore, but now, for some reason or other, which I do not understand, the fish frequent the deeper waters, and our fishermen have to follow them in large boats or small schooners. So long as the business could be conducted with small boats, these boats could be hauled up on shore safe from the danger of storms, but that is impossible with the larger boats. On that account proper harbourage has become a primary necessity.

As regards the statistics given by my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), I must say that they are rather favourable to the province of Nova Scotia and unfavourable to the province of Prince Edward Island. That is not a matter of very much importance, but it is just as well to have these things accurate. They are unfavourable for this reason. Many of the vessels which fish around the waters of Prince Edward Island belong to Nova Scotia and their catch is consequently credited to the province in which the vessels are registered. That of course is only natural and there is no harm in it, but it shows that in making up the statistics the officials of the department have not credited Prince Edward Island with its fair proportion of the catch. In the eastern part of Prince Edward Island at all events, at least one-third of the vessels engaged in the fishing business belong to Nova Scotia, and I am informed that the best fishing ground which these vessels frequent are around Prince Edward Island and that it is there they make their largest catches. There is therefore this much to be said in favour of fishing harbours for that province, that they would be interprovincial because they would benefit not the fishermen of the island alone, but the fishermen of Nova Scotia as well. This whole matter is one of such importance and it is so essential that we should have better information regarding it, that I know of no better way of procuring this information than by the appointing of the committee asked for. In consequence I have much pleasure indeed in supporting the resolution before the House.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Carleton, Ont.). Before the debate closes, I would like to say one or two words on the subject. I agree entirely with what has been said by the gentlemen who have spoken with respect to the very great importance of the fishing industry, not only on the Atlantic but the Pacific as well, and also on the inland waters of Canada, becuse these must not be forgotten. So far as the fishery industry of the maritime provinces is concerned, it cannot be regarded as being in a very satisfactory condition at present. It is at any rate not in a satisfactory condition compared with that in which it might be if the same effort were made in this country as have been made in Scotland, Sweden, Iceland and other countries where a board, such as has been suggested by the mover of the resolution, has been formed, and where the results of the formation of that board have been not only to increase very greatly the catch, but greatly to improve the character of the fish after it has been put up. Around the shores of the province of Nova Scotia alone, with which I am most familiar, there are opportunities for the supply of all the fish that could be required in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. So far as Quebec is concerned, I understand that it could supply its own needs to a very considerable extent, but I imagine that it would still take a very considerable portion of fresh fish, at least from the maritime provinces. I remember well talking with a gentleman largely engaged in the fish industry in the maritime provinces some two years ago. At that time he was supplying one-third of the needs of a large dealer in Toronto, and he said the reason why he could not get a contract for a larger proportion was the uncertainty of his being able to send from day to day a sufficient quantity to meet a greater proportion than I have mentioned.

The fisheman, in the autumn or winter season, where the fishing is carried on in the winter, has to encounter very rough weather. In one particular locality it may be impossible to venture out on a particular day. Therefore, the dealer must supply himself from somewhere else. Thus, a man undertaking to supply a dealer in a western city like Montreal or Toronto, must be able to draw his supply from more than one source.

The methods of catching have been alluded to by my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair). I understand that something has been attempted in the way of improving these methods, but I have communications, even within the last two or three days, and have had communications every year, in which it is demonstrated that the lack of proper care of the fish, after they are caught, results in a very great yearly loss to the province of Nova Scotia, and I suppose that the same is true of the other maritime provinces. The Halifax Board of Trade has issued a memo. in which it declares that the lack of care in putting up fish in that province alone results in a yearly loss of $100,000, and points out the results that have been obtained in other countries where these methods have been improved, and improved under government supervision. The question of transportation has been referred to also by the hon. member for Guysborough. I do not doubt that, although some progress has been made in that regard, still further progress could be made, and that better transportation facilities would result in securing very much more of the Ontario and Montreal market than has been secured by the fishermen of the maritime provinces hitherto.

Some reference was made to the appointment of fishery officers. I do not think that the appointment of fishery officers, in Nova Scotia at least, is in a very satisfactory condition. I do not speak of the methods of the present government as against those of a former government. I do not know very much about what the methods of governments of the past have been in this matter. But I know that there continually come to me representations, especially from the south shore of Nova Scotia, in which reputable men declare, over their own signatures, that the authority of the fishery officers is largely used for political purposes—that men who are Conservatives are proceeded against very strictly, while men who are strong Liberal partisans are not dealt with harshly by some of these men, at least.

Mr. FIELDING. My information is the very reverse.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That being the hon. gentleman's information, it would be a very good thing indeed to have this fishery committee and to have some of these matters investigated. It is not right that these officers should be under a certain suspicion by a portion of the community at least, when it may be that they are entirely guiltless or that there are faults on both sides. One officer has been referred to in the communications sent to me, whose name has been mentioned in this House, Captain Bain, of Liverpool. I have had various complaints with regard to the conduct of that officer.

Mr. FIELDING. Lately ?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Yes, within the last two or three months. The way in which most of these officers are remunerated is not very businesslike. If my memory serves me well, they are appointed at very small salaries, but they are supposed to drive about the country using their own horses and rigs for which they make a charge. Thus men whose nominal salary is $250, may really draw from the public treasury, $1,200 to $1,600. That is an absurdity in itself. These men ought to be appointed so that they would have the confidence of the community in which they are to administer the law. They should be selected for the purpose of enforcing the law, and in enforcing it they should have the government behind them. The conditions should be such that these men will not have to fear the resentment of political supporters of either party.

Something has been said about the improvement of conditions. I have a memo. recently issued by the Halifax Board of Trade. It is not a political document. The Halifax Board of Trade is constituted of men of both political parties. I have not the slightest idea as to which political party has the greatest number of supporters on that board at this moment, but I know that representative members of both political parties are members of that board. One heading in this memo. recently sent to me is 'The Canadian Atlantic Fisheries.—Wanted a new policy.' On this branch of the subject the Halifax Board of Trade says :

> The administration of the Canadian fisheries is in the hands of the Marine and Fisheries Department and is carried out through inspectors and overseers appointed by the government. These inspectors and overseers, in addition to their duties, supply the figures which appear as the fisheries statistics in the annual fisheries blue book. They do not, in our opinion, give the accurate and desirable information which the importance of the fishing industry demands. At various times the government has appointed special commissions to investigate conditions in certain localities relating to various branches of the fishing industry. As far, however, as the maritime provinces are concerned, matters have been allowed to drift along without much attempt to improve the conditions or conserve the various branches of the industry for our fishermen and merchants, and it is felt, by every one interested in the welfare of the fisheries, that it is time something was done to remedy the present most unsatisfactory state of affairs.

Then, under the heading 'Seriousness of the situation,' the pamphlet proceeds :

The government's establishment of fish hatcheries, bait freezers, dog-fish reduction works, demonstration of the Scotch method of curing herring, &c., are certainly to be commended. They have, however, been more or less abortive owing to lack of system, the only partial carrying out of the various things attempted, and the seeming impossibility of eliminating politics.

I would call the special attention of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to that serious statement made by this important non-political body, representative of the commerce of the largest city of the province of Nova Scotia. The pamphlet continues :

Twenty-five years ago lobsters were so plentiful on our shores that fishermen were making good wages by catching them at fifty cents per hundred count. During the early part of the present season they were so scarce that the fishermen were unable to make living wages with the price at $40 per crate in Boston.

I direct the attention of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the sentence which follows :

This condition has been brought about by the illegal, wholesale destruction of the small-sized and seeded lobsters by the fishermen and packers, in consequence of the law not being enforced by the officers of the department.

That is the statement made by this non-political and representative body, and it is in exact accordance with the private communications which have come to me from all parts of the country interested, within the last four or five years. The pamphlet proceeds :

The conditions in regard to the oyster industry, are, if anything, worse than those under which the lobsters are being exterminated. Practically nothing is being done to prevent the depletion of the oyster beds, to say nothing of any effective steps to increase the supply of these valuable shell fish.

Just before the general election of 1900, short-date licenses were granted by the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries in respect of valuable oyster beds, which had been planted by the government, I think, at a certain locality on the coast of New Brunswick; and according to information which came to me, in about three weeks the whole of that bed was cleaned out and was rendered absolutely valueless. So there is small wonder that this representative institution should make some protest against the continuance of a condition that must inevitably result in the permanent loss of great wealth which otherwise would accrue to the fishermen and people of the maritime provinces. This pamphlet continues as follows :—

The clam beds in various parts of the maritime provinces are being depleted, in many cases to supply bait for foreign fishermen, whereas, under efficient laws properly carried out, a continuous supply could be maintained to the advantage of all concerned. Unless in the near future therefore some radical change is made, these valuable branches of the fishing industry will practically cease to exist. New and stricter regulations are required, as well as effective means of carrying them out.

The pamphlet is not very long, but it is too long to quote in full. Statistics are given which indicate the urgent need of some such step as that which has been advocated by the hon. gentleman who proposed this motion. I may, however, quote a few words from the concluding portion of the pamphlet in order to show that the Halifax Board of Trade supports the proposal of the establishment of a board upon some such lines as the Scotch Fisheries Board. 'The scheme for us' is the heading of this portion of the pamphlet.

It is now desired by concerted action on the part of those interested to bring the Dominion government to see that their present progressive policy for the encouragement of the fisheries could be worked out to better advantage to all concerned, by the appointment of a Canadian Atlantic Fisheries Board, on the same lines as the Scotch Fisheries Board, which has control of the Scotch fishing industry. Said board to work in conjunction with the Fisheries Department in all matters affecting the betterment of the conditions of the Atlantic fisheries. A fisheries board representing all interests would thoroughly investigate and advise the department in regard to such matters as the depletion of the lobster and oyster fisheries, the destruction of dog-fish, the proper distribution of the output of the fish hatcheries, the supply of bait, &c. The board must necessarily be a non-political body. It would be under the control of the Fisheries Department in the same way as the Scotch board is under the control of the Secretary for Scotland, in that it would have the appointment of the chairman, which chairman and the vice-chairman are in Scotland the only two paid officials. The Scotch board consists of nine members—the chairman, three members to represent the fishermen, three for the merchants, a scientist and a legal adviser.

Then it goes on to declare that at a meeting held in the board of trade rooms, Halifax, on the 5th of April, 1907, the fisheries committee of the Halifax Board of Trade initiated the movement outlined above by unanimously adopting the following resolution :

That a fisheries board should be appointed along the lines of the Fishery Board of Scotland, to act under the Department of Marine and Fisheries for the regulation and control of the Canadian Atlantic fisheries.

This resolution was unanimously adopted by the Halifax Board of Trade. At a similar meeting held on the 9th of April last they spoke of a proposed endorsement by the Maritime Boards of Trade. I have not at present information as to whether this resolution has been endorsed by the Maritime Boards of Trade, but I have no doubt it has been if an opportunity has been afforded to bring it to the consideration of that body.

Now, there is another subject about which a word might be said in connection with this question. I have alluded to the fisheries of the Pacific coast, which are also of the greatest possible importance to the people of this country. From them should come the supply of fish for the great future population which we expect to see in the two great provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. Besides that, we have the great inland fisheries, and I have observed with regret that the policy of this administration seems to be to farm out leases of large areas of the inland waters of Canada to gentlemen who, so far as I am aware, are not specially engaged in the fishing industry, and that at merely nominal rentals and for a long term of years. I would ask my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to declare to us this afternoon what the policy of the government is in that regard. I do not desire to minimize the effect of any answer which he may be able to give on that particular subject. But in the absence of any such answer I would regard it as absolutely prejudicial to the interests of this country to hand over, by means of franchises of that character, the control of a large part of our inland fisheries to men who, so far as I am aware, can only be regarded as speculators, in many cases at least. Why should this be done? Why should such a policy be embarked upon? Why should leases be granted at only a nominal rental and for so long a term of years? I venture to think this is a subject which should receive the most serious and earnest consideration, not only of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and the government, but of this House as well. These franchises ought not to be lightly granted by any country which has any regard for the conservation of its public domain.

Now there is one other observation I would like to make. My hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) has alluded to the importance of the fisheries. I have also expressed, and I desire again to express, my hearty concurrence in all he has said with regard to the importance of that great national industry. But there are other industries in this country which are not very well represented by any committee of this House, so far as such committee would afford an opportunity for inquiry and consideration in a more effective way than can be given on the floors of this House. We have great forests in this country. About two years ago we had a great forestry convention in the city of Ottawa, and my right hon. friend the Prime Minister was present. Many men were there who might be regarded as experts with respect to the value of the forest industry of this country, with regard to the great importance of conserving those forests, and the great importance of dealing with them so that they should not be destroyed, but that an annual crop, or a decennial crop, should be taken from them in order that the value of our forests might be retained for future generations. All of these men spoke at that great convention, and I think that in whatever respect there was any difference of opinion, there was absolute unanimity as to the extreme importance to the future of this country of preserving the forests. Examples were given of what has been done in European countries, in Saxony, for example, where a small area of rocky forest country has been made, by judicious methods of governmental conservation, to yield an enormous revenue to that state for the last hundred years. We in Canada are intensely interested in this great question, not only so far as the conservation of the forests is concerned, not only so far as the annual yield from those forests is concerned, but also for the very reason that if we do not preserve our forest we will not preserve those great water-powers which are of equally enormous importance to this country as the forests themselves. So I would suggest to the hon. member for Guysborough that it would be well to amend this motion in some such way as to give this committee jurisdiction to deal with the question of forests as well as with that of fisheries.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN. Would not that question more properly come within the jurisdiction of the provinces?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. No, I do not think so; because we have in the northwest of Canada at the present time large areas of timber lands; we have in the Rocky Mountains under the control of this government large areas of timber lands, and the preservation of those lands is of the greatest possible importance to this country. Further than that, a committee of this House, if constituted with jurisdiction to deal with this subject, could perhaps give better opportunities for entering into negotiations with the provincial governments along the same lines than would be possible without the services of such a committee. At least I would be prepared to make that suggestion. Then, the mining industry of this country, of course, is very largely under the jurisdiction of the provinces themselves, but so long as we can retain control of the public domain in the great provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, we will have important questions coming up in this country in regard to mines and minerals. Indeed we have the geological survey which investigates the extent of our mining resources all over Canada without regard to the fact that the ownership and administration of these resources had been confided under the constitution, to seven of the nine existing provinces of Canada. So, I would think that the mines might as well be brought under the jurisdiction of some such committee and I would suggest to my hon. friend, the proposer of this motion, and I would suggest to the right hon. Prime Minister and the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that we should either add to the words of the resolution the further words 'forests and mines' or that we should change the words somewhat and form a committee which should be charged with jurisdiction over trade and natural resources, or, if you like, over natural resources alone. I do not care so much about the form of the amendment so long as it is competent for the committee to deal not only with the great fishing industry but to keep an eye upon, to deal with and to have a certain jurisdiction over the great industries of the forests and the mines as well. Apart from this consideration I agree heartily with the proposal which has been made by my hon. friend from Guysborough, and I think the formation of such a committee would be a very important step for the purpose of improving the outlook of the industries to which I allude.

Mr. W. ROCHE (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, I wish to add my support and my approbation to the resolution which has been proposed and not to go over the subject at any length in regard to statistics or information, as I think a sufficient outline has been given by the mover and others who have addressed the House to give a definite idea of the benefits that can be derived from the adoption of this proposal. But, there was one observation relating to the details of the fishing industry that I thought was omitted by those who have spoken on this subject and I would like briefly to refer to it in this connection. Some of the hon. gentlemen who supported the resolution alluded to the necessity of wharfs and breakwaters which have been erected on various parts of the maritime coast for the protection and advantage of the fishermen. One of the purposes which these wharfs serve in that country is this: The method of collecting the fish from the fishing boats and schooners is very different from what it was formerly. Now, both the local and Dominion governments have supported and subsidized lines of steamers which ply to the various harbours on the coast and collect, by means of these wharfs, the fish which are brought in by the boats and small schooners, they transport them with rapidity and certainty to railway centres whence they are carried to their places of destination over the railway and thus obtain a great advantage in price, which fresh fish obtains over salt fish. That is the necessity for the wharfs at the various harbours along the maritime coast. Complaints have been made that money has been expended by the government for that purpose, and hints have been given that the money so expended on these harbours has been spent with a political object and that that the tendency should be rather to spend this money in large cities like Montreal. If these gentlemen were better acquainted with the conditions of trade and if they knew the hardships of the lives of the fishermen, as they have been pictured very clearly this afternoon, they would forego that kind of criticism altogether and they would believe that no amount of money spent to help the fishermen and to protect their industry in misspent. In regard to the subject of the utility and indispensability of these wharfs I will say no more at present. In regard to the observations of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) with reference to the depletion of the lobsters, the conditions which prevailed at one time do not prevail at the present time. The fish have naturally decreased in number and the means for taking them have been much improved and more fishermen have devoted their attention to the capture of lobsters than at any previous period. Their appliances are also improved and by means of steamers, gasolene smacks and small tug boats they are able to collect the fresh lobsters and to forward them to the United States cities in a condition to obtain a far higher price; as has been demonstrated by the statistics submitted to the House this afternoon. Therefore while the fish are pursued with as much ardour as they are at the present time, and while the appliances for taking them are improved they will not increase in numbers as they did during the old dispensation when the only effort to fish for lobsters was by means of spears or and old fashioned torch and pot. In connection with this, Mr Speaker, I think a question will arise before long in the Dominion of Canada as to whether American merchants and factory owners should be allowed to monopolize the business upon the coast of Canada. There is no return for this privilege given by the Americans. There is no privilege given the Canadians along their coast, we are not allowed to interfere in any way with their harbours, and yet they are the collectors of a large amount of our fishing property and derive a considerable emolument therefrom. Before long the question will become a very important one as to whether American factory owners and others should be allowed to pursue their vocation along the coast of Nova Scotia and the other provinces.

In regard also to the resolution of the Halifax Board of Trade, I might remark that they are not all experts. They are merchants and sometimes gentlemen interested in various processes, come before the board of trade, dilate upon their processes and give reasons why a particular process should be employed assuring the board that it will result in great benefit to the country. I am not so well satisfied that the Scotch method of curing the fish is superior to that in vogue provided facilities exist such as are now being introduced of promptly obtaining and employing the best native methods of curing fish so as to exploit them to the best advantage.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Do they not bring much higher prices in some lines ?

Mr. W. ROCHE. I believe they do, but that may be only due to the name or the brand. I have heard people who are experts in the quality of fish declare that the old Nova Scotian or native process of curing fish, if properly undertaken or if enough work were put upon them to prepare the fish in the best possible manner, was preferable to the Scotch process, but there is a repetition of the Scotch method amongst those who are of Scotch taste or Scotch extraction and they think that there is nothing in the world but what comes from Auld Scotia.

Now, Sir, with regard to the allegation that the fishery inspectors of Nova Scotia visit their wrath upon the Conservative and smile with approval upon those of the other political persuasion, I might mention that three of the inspectors on the coast of Nova Scotia are to my certain knowledge Tories of the old school, and I do not think they would indulge in any such heresy as that the Grits should go free and the Tories be punished. In fact, complaints have been made the other way to me. I do not know how my hon. friend obtained his information, but I have constant complaints that the fishery inspectors are most severe, arbitry and tyrannical on the unfortunate Grits, and that they let the Conservatives go scot-free. However that may be, there is a very marked difference of opinion between the factory people and the fishermen as to regulations, and there is also a difference of opinion among experts as to the size of the lobster that should be taken. Some contend that the large fish alone should be taken, while others contend that the better lobster is the smaller one. I believe that the establishment of the hatcheries and the other efforts that are being made to preserve the breeding lobsters will result in certainly retaining the supply we at present have and probably of increasing that supply. I can certainly testify to the very great advantage conferred upon the fishermen by the establishment at Halifax of a bait preserve which has enabled the fishermen to obtain their supplies in the spring so as to pursue their industry and catch large quantities of fish. The whole fishing industry of the maritime provinces commends the Fishery Department for having established that service, and the only drawback is that a sufficient number of them are not erected so that greater good might be disseminated by this very useful and very praiseworthy system of bait preserving. There has always been a difference of opinion among fishermen as to what are the most beneficent regulations, and I suppose that the experts themselves have great difficulty in coming to a satisfactory conclusion on the matter. However, I believe that the officers of the Marine and Fisheries Department are doing their utmost to harmonize all interests and to obtain the very best results, so that this very valuable industry may be retained at its full value, and so that the Dominion of Canada may reap a full measure of prosperity from the prosecution of our very wealthy fisheries on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. J. W. DANIEL (St. John City). I wish to make one or two remarks in support of the resolution proposed by the member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) with which I quite agree. Although the gentleman who have so far spoken on the question come from the maritime provinces, the question of the preservation of the fisheries of Canada is one which deeply concerns the people of the whole country. In fact, the largest fishing business in the whole Dominion is done by the province of British Columbia as I find from statistics, which show that in 1905 the value of the British Columbia fisheries was $9,850,216, while the next largest was the province of Nova Scotia with a total of $8,259,085. The hon. member (Mr. Chisholm) pointed out that although the value of the fisheries had increased, he wondered whether the total quantity of the fish taken had increased or decreased. It may be as the hon. member for Antigonish has said, that the total quantity may be somewhat less, but when we look at the returns we find that while some kind of fish have decreased others have increased. In 1905 the quantity of fresh cod taken was greater than ever before ; in 1901 the catch of fresh haddock was 5,420,056 pounds, while in 1905 it was 11,520,134 pounds. The catch of fresh halibut has also increased, but the catch of mackerel seems to have decreased very greatly. These results may be due to changes in the habits of the various kinds of fish, and the fact that we do not know as much as we ought to about this matter is one reason why some particular body specially constituted should be appointed to look after that interest. I attended the meeting of the Maritime Boards of Trade held at St. John in August last, and the matter was discussed of appointing a fisheries board—somewhat, I presume on the lines of the Scotch Fishery Board—under the control of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. The following resolution was passed at that meeting of the Maritime Provinces Boards of Trade :

That this meeting of the maritime provinces boards of trade endorses the movement for the appointment of a fishery board to act under the Department of Marine and Fisheries for the regulation and control of the Canadian Atlantic fisheries, and that steps be taken to have this important matter acted upon at the next session of the Dominion parliament.

I may say that the arguments advanced in support of that resolution seemed to me to be very cogent. The political side of the question was dealt with. I could not say that the members of that board of trade are politicians in any way, but judging by the expressions that were casually made I should judge that the majority of those present were rather the friends of the government. They undoubtedly complained that the control or superintendence of the fisheries was not free from political influence, and that in order to have a proper control over that great industry the political element would have to be entirely eliminated and that was one of the chief reasons why they advocated the appointment of this fishery board which would be free from political influence, but which would of course be under the control of the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. BRODEUR. Before my hon. friend takes up the subject of the appointment of a board, might I say that I have read a great deal with regard to this question of a fisheries board, but so far I have not been able to see what its duties would be. Would they have the framing of the regulations and the administration of the fisheries and what part would the department or the representatives of the country have in the administration of the fisheries ?

Mr. DANIEL. I should think that they would have the administering of everything in connection with those things what might be thought to increase the value of the fisheries and to give directions as to how they should be preserved. Take for instance matters of control of the enemies of the fish and of course there are enemies of the fish that sometimes travel on the water—the improvement of the numbers of the fish, reducing the number of the enemies of the fish, the curing of fish and everything of that kind would come under the control of this board. Of course they would be under government control and the Department of Marine would have the last say about everything placed in the hands of the board, but I think that if they had the carrying out of matters of that kind and also probably the overseeing and carrying out of the duties of fishery overseers, it would be an advantage. These appointments would be made through them and the duties of the overseers prescribed by them so that there would be no suspicion of any political influence in the matter at all. That is the view that I think would probably appeal to them as being a portion of the duties of that board. The checking of the enemies of the fish is certainly a very important matter. Summer before last I had an opportunity of personally witnessing the great destructive influence of the dogfish in the Bay of Fundy. I was on a yachting cruise for a week or two on the bay and we went over to the Nova Scotia coast and one afternoon we provided ourselves with fishing materials and went out on the fishing grounds. Some four or five of us were fishing at the same time. We put over our lines, we caught fish, but for every rock cod or eatable food fish that we caught we caught at least six or seven or eight dogfish. In the evening when we returned to shore at St. Mary's I happened to meet a young fisherman and entered into conversation with him. He told me he had been out that day on the fishing grounds trawling. I understand that these trawls have attached to them a great number of hooks, something over 2,000. He told me that when they hauled in their troll, they had 1,700 dogfish on and what was left of edible fish was for the most part nothing but heads and fragments of the whole fish. In other words they had caught 1,700 dogfish and the good fish that they had caught on their hooks had been destroyed by the schools of dogfish infesting the fishing grounds, before they could be taken off the lines. That gave me a better idea of what a pest the dogfish is to the fishing industry at least in that portion of the eastern waters than any amount of reading could do.

Then Sir, a committee such as proposed by the member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) would deal with the fishery matters in the same way as the agricultural committee deals with agricultural matters. There is no doubt that the method adopted by the agricultural committee does a great deal to spread information through this country among farmers and those interested in agricultural pursuits, and is of great advantage not only to the members of this House but, by the distribution of this evidence and of these lectures to the farming industry generally. A fisheries committee conducted in the same way would produce equally good results for that industry, and that I presume is one of the objects of the mover of the resolution in asking for the appointment of such a standing committee.

The other aspect of the case which has been brought up by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. William Roche) the right of foreigners given under treaty, is rather too large a question to discuss at this time. I certainly would have much pleasure in supporting the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) and as the minister has stated that he is satisfied to let it pass, I presume that the result of this motion will be that we shall have in the near future a standing committee on fisheries, perhaps with the addition of these subjects mentioned by the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden).

Mr. J. B. KENNEDY (New Westminster). Mr. Speaker, if I had known that this matter was coming up to-day I might have fortified myself with some facts and figures to show the importance of the fishing industry in my constituency. It may perhaps be a blessing to the House that I did not know, for statistics are not generally very acceptable unless they can be made interesting and that is sometimes a difficult matter. I am glad that this matter has been brought forward. I hope the committee will be granted by the House, for there certainly is a great deal in this industry which requires looking into and which would be in the interest of the country at large, were it better understood by the members of the House.

As we heard from the first speaker, there is considerable red tape in connection with the carrying on of the work of the department here, as there is in all the departments. I know I have found it very difficult to get some things looked after, which I considered were urgently needed in my district; and I think if we had a committee of this kind some of these matters could be brought before it and by it sent to the department in such a way that they would not be ignored.

The members of the House generally are not aware of the extent of the fishing industry in the province of British Columbia. In the year 1905 the value of the fisheries of British Columbia exceeded the value of those of any other province, exceeded those of Nova Scotia, which had been the banner province in that respect for a great many years. The last two years we dropped off as they have been what we call short years. Of course I am referring largely to the salmon industry when I speak of their being short years. This year and next year we hope to again pass Nova Scotia.

I would like to draw the attention of the House and particularly to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) to the account of revenue and expenditure as set down opposite each province on page 360 of the last report of the Marine Department. From that and similar reports given for some years past you may notice that British Columbia has returned more revenue from fisheries than all the rest of the provinces put together.

That may look a big statement but the figures are there to prove it, and the expenditure by the government in that province has been less than in either Nova Scotia or New Brunswick. I think therefore we are entitled to more consideration than we have been able to secure from the department in that respect. So far as my own district is concerned, we do not ask for very heavy expenditure. The heavy expenditure there for some years past has been in the way of hatcheries, and of course they should be revenue producing in a manner. But there is one thing I would like to impress on the House, and that is the necessity for some different arrangement in connection with the carrying on of the work of the Marine and Fisheries Department in that province, which is so far distant from the fountain head. There should be some expert placed over all of those departments out there who would have the control of his department, and who could buy a small steamer, if he required it, without having to refer to headquarters, and who would be at liberty to expend a certain amount and order certain work to be done without having first to report to the department at Ottawa. Here is where the delay occurs. No matter how small the expenditure, everything has to be referred to Ottawa for sanction and very often that leads to serious delay and loss. Some have recommended that the inspectors out there should be given larger powers. That might work also, but each inspector has his own district, and sometimes there might be some conflicting interest and the matter would have to be referred to Ottawa in the long run, even though it were not a very serious one. Therefore I think that an expert having authority over the whole sea-board there, would meet the case to a great extent. I do not wish to weary the House by saying very much on this question, but I hope that the House will grant this committee and that it will appoint the committee of men having the interest of the country at heart and who will attend the meetings of that committee and give it the benefit of their experience and knowledge.

Mr. A. A. LEFURGEY (Prince, P.E.I.). I was not aware that this subject was coming up to-day and shall consequently not take up much of the time of the House in going into details. Nor is it necessary that I should do so as the matter has been very well threshed out by the previous speakers. The statistics which were given by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) show beyond doubt that the fishing industry of Canada is second to none other in importance. With the immense coast line which we possess some 5,600 miles in the eastern waters, more than double that of England and Ireland, besides the Pacific coast and the immense area of our inland waters, amounting to some 1,500 square miles, it is clear that the development of these waters, the wealth that can be taken out of them is surely an immense asset to the people of this country. The men engaged in our fishing industry, as the hon. gentleman has pointed out, have increased in number from some 60,000 in 1880 to some 88,000 in the last year, and each year the number of men employed and the amount of capital invested are increasing. But a great deal of dissatisfaction exists in the maritime provinces at least regarding the administration of our fisheries and on account of the immense falling off in some lines which years ago produced a much larger output than at present. Therefore I think it is in the general interests of this Dominion that the motion of my hon. friend to appoint a select committee to deal with this fishery question should be granted. It certainly has my most cordial support. What we need in the fishery business particularly is more government aid and more government attention than has been given it in the past. Just as we have a select standing committee on agriculture, I think some such step forward should be taken for the advantage of this great fishing industry which is, in its way, as important as the agricultural industry. In my own province there is, for instance, the oyster fishery which, if properly cultivated and extended, would produce much larger returns in proportion to the capital invested than could be possibly obtained out of any agricultural pursuit. There are various methods by which our fishing industry might be benefited. It might be benefited by the dissemination of literature pointing out the best means of handling and caring for the fish, by the establishment of government fish hatcheries, and the sending out of competent men to inquire into the reasons why certain fish industries have been falling off as they have been during the past few years. In this country some 12 or 15 years ago a great impetus was given to the dairy industry. This was mainly affected by the government sending competent men to all parts of the country to educate the people into better methods of handling the products of the dairy, and to this action is due the immense strides and progress which that industry has made these last years. If the same interest and vigour were given to our fisheries, we would in all probability overcome some of the evils which are apparent now and obtain much better results. The capital invested in the fishing industry has rapidly increased. It has increased from some $4,000,000 in 1880 to $14,550,000 in 1906.

There is one question which I should like to allude to more particularly and that is the question of bounties. The government sets a certain amount aside each year from proceeds of fishing award or based on that award, for bounties to the fishermen, but I notice that Prince Edward Island, whose share in the fishery award amounts to a very large sum, gets very small encouragement indeed from the moneys reserved for the payment of fishing bounties. In that province I believe that last year only between $8,000 or $9,000 out of the whole bounties were paid to her fishermen, whereas, if we had our just share of the fishery award, we would be receiving some $50,000 or $60,000 at lowest possible calculation this last year instead of this $8,000 or $9,000. A few years ago I advocated that the bounty should be paid also to the lobster fisheries and encouragement of other fisheries. In Prince Edward Island the fishing industry is carried on not to so large an extent in larger boats and vessels as in Nova Scotia, but in small boats. Our waters, being land-locked, boats of a smaller size are necessarily employed and consequently are not so much engaged in deep-sea fishing. For that reason I should suppose that since we have a large claim on the moneys from which the bounties are paid, we should at least get some compensation for our fishermen by the government giving the smaller boats the benefit of the payments.

The lobster fishing industry is the second largest fishing industry on the island. Last year, lobsters were caught to the value of $575,402. I have been, for a number of years, endeavouring to secure the establishment in the western part of Prince Edward Island of a fish hatchery, and the late predecessor of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, when in office, practically told me he would have such an establishment provided in Prince county. I have brought the matter to the attention of the government since the accession to office of the present minister, and as this industry is such an important factor in the fishing business of Prince Edward Island, I would ask that hon. gentleman to give it his attention. As it has been stated by a number of the speakers here to-day that the establishment of lobster hatcheries has led to an increase in the catch, I would urge that a hatchery be established in western Prince Edward Island. Certainly, something must be done to protect and promote the lobster fishery. Within the last thirteen years, the catch of lobsters has decreased sixty-six per cent. While the total values in catch have been quite large in recent years, this is because the value of the product has gone up, and not because of an increase in the quantity caught.

Another industry to which I would ask the attention of the government is the oyster fishery. The oyster fishery of Prince Edward Island last year, 1906, yielded 14,988 barrels, of a total value of $89,928—that is, they are estimated at $6 a barrel. Last year, when the fishery inspector from Ottawa was down and the local fishery inspector was present in Summerside, I took occasion to go out with them to the oyster beds in Malpeque, the greatest natural oyster beds of Prince Edward Island and the Dominion of Canada. We inquired of the men there, some of whom had been in the business of shipping oysters for fifteen or thirty years, as to the results of the catch. They told us that the men were coming in with less than a quarter of a barrel a-piece for a day's catch. The price of oysters ranged from $8 to $11 a barrel on the shore. Turning up the books of the last ten or twenty years, we found that when from 80 cents to $1 a barrel was paid for oysters in this bay, the fishermen were catching five or six barrels a day. Manifestly, something is radically wrong with the fostering of this important industry—and it is an important industry not only to the people of Prince Edward Island but to the whole Dominion.

The oysters of Prince Edward Island are sought for almost from coast to coast, and in all the principal American cities there is always a great demand for them. But when the catch is down to less than fifteen thousand barrels as compared with what could be caught in the olden days, it is evidently time for the Department of Marine and Fisheries to secure the advice of the best experts with a view to taking action for the protection of this industry. With the falling off in the catch, as the report points out, there was a little shortening up of the season. But the report also shows that the catch is not likely to be one-half what it was in the previous year. One of the greatest bugbears of this industry in Prince Edward Island and in the maritime provinces is the dispute between the federal and local authorities as to the right to control these beds and the fisheries of other inland waters. I have brought this matter up in the House on several occasions. The sooner this dispute is settled the better it will be for the protection of the oyster industry. The local government have been trying to deal with the oyster industry. A year ago, they passed a Bill authorizing the leasing of these beds to private holders, and I believe that surveyors were sent out on certain of the beds. But I understand that there was a protest from the federal authorities and the matter has been allowed to drop, though there are cases where leases have been given by the local government to fishermen for the propagation and taking of oysters in certain localities. One authority or the other must have full control of these beds, and a reasonable amount of money must be spent for the protection of this fishery. In other countries the culture of oysters as a private business has proved most remunerative and productive. The quantity of oysters produced in Chesapeake bay, in New York and other places where this is carried on as a private business has been enormous. This form of industry has resulted not only in cheapening the oysters to the people, but in causing a production equal to the demand in the United States, while allowing of large shipments beyond their borders.

A matter of great importance to Prince Edward Island is that of transportation. We have had a great deal of difficulty in past winters in sending away our fish. In several cases, the government has had to pay damages for the poor handling of fish in the winter steamers, and the lack of proper facilities for the transport from the places on the mainland at which these steamers land. This is a matter which should be looked into. The question of harbours is another important matter with the fishing industry in Prince Edward Island. I believe it will be found that the condition of our harbours is one reason why larger and more numerous boats are not engaged in the fishing industry of my own province. In the county of Prince, I have heard complaints for a number of years. Take, for instance, the harbour of Tignish. This harbour is not able to accommodate half the fishing fleet that would wish to take shelter there, and when the Caraquet fleet comes over from New Brunswick and seeks shelter there the whole run is absolutely blocked up, and, whichever party is inside cannot get out until the other fleet moves out into the offing. I believe the department has received a request from the people of Tignish and surrounding territory and from the people of New Brunswick that some relief be given to them in this respect, and I trust the department will take up the subject this session. There are also requirements at Kildare where there are forty or fifty boats that are absolutely without protection when they are out fishing. The people of Kildare and along the coast, in order to carry on the fishing industry successfully, must have some protection in the shape of a harbour. I think the question of harbours and protection for our fishing fleets along the coast of the maritime provinces—I have only instanced some of the places I know about—should be taken up by the government and every facility afforded the fishermen for carrying on this important business. The question of mines and forests is a very important one and might well be taken up along with this. I have much pleasure in supporting the proposed resolution of the hon. member for Guysborough.

Mr. O. TURGEON (Gloucester). I desire to express my sincere thanks to the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), for the remarks he has made to the House this afternoon. Certainly the figures he has given and the arguments he has presented are sufficient to convince every member of this House of the necessity of carefully looking after the interests of the fisheries of Canada, more particularly those of the maritime provinces. No doubt the appointment of such a committee as he proposes might become the means of rendering great services to the fisheries of Canada. I desire also to express my concurrence in the remarks of the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. Chisholm), who gave important figures and statements relative to the fisheries of Canada. Much has been said of the importance of the construction of wharfs and breakwaters for fishermen carrying on the business of deep-sea fishing in the maritime provinces. No doubt a great deal has been done by this government within the last ten years in behalf of this industry. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Lefurgey) has spoken of the necessity of further improvement in the harbour of Tignish, which is frequented by fishermen of my constituency from Caraquet and Shippegan. The fishermen of my constituency who frequent that harbour recently presented a petition to the Minister of Public Works asking for better protection on the shores of Prince Edward Island, and I have no doubt the hon. minister will give heed to their request, because it is not only a necessity for the fishermen of Gloucester county, but also for the fishermen of Prince Edward Island. It has also been remarked by my hon. friend that the amount of the fishing bounty paid to the fishermen of Prince Edward island has been decreasing recently instead of increasing. I think that is due to the inactivity of the population of Prince Edward Island in reference to the deep-sea fishing. The fishing bounties can only be distributed to fishermen carrying on deep-sea fishing, not to those who are engaged in shore fisheries. I find to my sorrow that for a number of years past the population of Prince Edward Island have, to a certain extent, withdrawn from deep-sea fishing, and are giving themselves more particularly to fishing for lobsters along the shore. The lobster fishery is not supposed to receive fishing bounties, because that is a fishery which we have to protect, and which we have to limit to a certain extent, in order to preserve it for the future. Therefore we can hardly expect that the government should distribute any portion of the bounty to lobster fishermen.

MONEY-LENDERS OPERATING IN PUBLIC DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. DELISLE asked :

1. Has the government, or any member thereof, received complaints from members of the civil service or others, to the effect that money-lenders of the city of Ottawa pursue their business in the offices or corridors of the departmental buildings ?

2. If so, has the government reason to believe that these representations are correct ?

3. If such representations should be ascertained to be correct, is it the intention of the government to take any action in the matter ?

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). Complaints have been made in some departments that money-lenders are pursuing their business in the offices of the departments, and we have no reason to doubt that the complaints are correct. Instructions have been given that such persons, when known, should not be admitted to the offices while the officials there are engaged in public business.

LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR DUNSMUIR.

Mr. RALPH SMITH (Nanaimo). Before the orders of the day are called I wish to ask the right hon. the First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) a question regarding a special despatch from Victoria which reads as follows :

Up to Dominion.

Victoria, British Columbia, January 22.—Replying to the accusation of Mr. J. A. MacDonald, leader of the opposition, stating that the government was responsible for Lieutenant Governor Dunsmuir withholding his assent to the Natal Act, passed unanimously last session, Premier McBride said yesterday in the House that, in withholding his assent, His Honour acted as the official of the Dominion government, and that the case was not one in which the local government could be held responsible.

Had this government anything to do in any way with the lieutenant governor withholding his assent ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I was absent in England at the time, but I know that no advice was given to Lieutenant Governor Dunsmuir on that question. I shall inquire what correspondence there is in the office and bring it down to-morrow.

Mr. FOSTER. Then the first part of the answer does not hold ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes, because I know there has been no advice given Lieutenant Governor Dunsmuir.

MR. M. J. HANEY.

Mr. J. D. REID. I would like to draw the attention of the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals to an item published in the press which reads as follows :

Mr. Collingwood Schreiber has been appointed sole arbitrator in the claim for extras of Mr. M. J. Haney, of Toronto, who was the contractor for the bridge across the Hillsborough river, P.E.I., and which cost the government $1,500,000. Mr. Haney is claiming $300,000 as still due him. The investigation will last all this week.

Is it true that $300,000 are still due and that a claim for that amount has been made, and that Mr. Schreiber has been appointed arbitrator.

Mr. GRAHAM. The item may be correct. I am not sure as to the details. It is true that Mr. Schreiber has been appointed arbitrator to settle a claim made by Mr. Haney against the Department of Railways and Canals.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would like to ask the right hon. the First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) if the documents referred to in the resolution moved by my hon. friend from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames), respecting which there was a discussion in the House some time ago, will be produced so that we may have an opportunity of examining them.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The hon. member for St. Antoine moved his motion and the House pronounced upon it. If he will move for the papers he requires and give sufficient reasons, certainly they will be brought down.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What would the right hon. gentleman regard as sufficient reasons ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I shall judge them when brought down.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I should like to ask further when the report respecting the Quebec Bridge inquiry will be distributed.

Mr. GRAHAM. It is somewhat difficult to answer that question definitely. We are urging it as rapidly as possible and are assured that no time will be lost and that the report will be handed in as soon as possible.

Mr. CLEMENTS. There are two returns which I moved for on December 11 and four on the 13th. I would be obliged if they would be brought down as soon as possible.

GEORGIAN BAY CANAL.

Mr. HAGGART. When will the surveys with reference to the Georgian bay canal be brought down ? They were promised last session.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER

Mr. PUGSLEY. I may say that the engineers have completed the field work and are now engaged in completing the plans and the date necessary in order to determine with accuracy what the cost of the work will be. The survey and plans of the portion known as the French river section are practically completed. The remainder will be ready in the course of from four to six weeks, the engineer in charge of the work tells me.

Mr. HAGGART. Would the hon. minister bring down the portion with reference to the French river section, as we shall have a debate on the subject on Monday next ?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I shall be very glad to do so.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) any further information as to the time when the Civil Service report will be brought down ?

Mr. FIELDING. When the question was last before the House, I made inquiry of the chairman and was told it was being expedited. I shall make further inquiry.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Mr. FOSTER. I would also inquire with reference to some returns called for on December 11 regarding the cold storage business in St. Johns, N.B. I think the hon. minister said they were nearly completed some days ago.

Mr. FISHER. I shall inquire about it.

Mr. FOSTER. When may we expect the report of the expert accountants who were appointed to start a new system of bookkeeping in the department of Marine and Fisheries ?

Mr. BRODEUR. There are several reports, and there are three persons who are looking after them. The work is quite arduous.

Mr. FOSTER. I would ask also when we may have a return of the advertising done in certain papers in St. John and Halifax I do now know who fathered the motion but I do not want it to fall to the ground still-born.

Mr. BERGERON. I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals to an order given the other day, for a copy of the lease of the Beauharnois canal to some private company. Has my hon. friend given an order to have that brought down as soon as possible ?

Mr. GRAHAM. It will be brought down in a very few hours.

SEED WHEAT.

Mr. SPROULE. I understand that two members of the Northwest government are here regarding seed wheat for the people of that country in the coming spring. Has the government any information to give regarding what has been done or what is to be done in that connection ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have nothing to communicate to the House to-day.

GOVERNMENT GROUNDS.

Mr. TALBOT. I would like to draw the attention of the government to the disgraceful condition in what is called the government highway is kept.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman desires to ask a question, he is in order, but it is not proper for him to discuss any matter not on the Order Paper unless it be of very urgent importance.

Mr. TALBOT. This is a matter of public importance.

Mr. SPEAKER. The only way for the hon. gentleman to bring it before the House is to prepare a notice of motion.

MANITOBA BOUNDARIES.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would like to ask the government when they propose to bring down the Bill respecting the extension of the boundaries of Manitoba ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I cannot tell my hon. friend to-day.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. May we expect some information to-morrow ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I cannot say now. I would not like to bind myself as to the date.

INSURANCE ACT—AMENDMENT.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 42) respecting insurance. He said: In making this motion I desire to act upon the suggestion which I offered to the House at the introduction of the Bill. I then ventured to suggest that, having regard to the very technical character of the greater part of this measure, the House might find it convenient to pass the Bill to a second reading without anybody committing himself to it, and reserve judgment until after the measure could have been examined by the Committee on Banking and Commerce, before which body, of course, representations could be made by any persons who desired to be heard. I am aware that representations will be made, both for and against the provisions of the Bill. I desire to adhere to that suggestion now in moving the second reading. I only wish to add a few words upon a special feature of the Bill. The Bill proposes to deal with the question of insurance generally, and a number of clauses in it have reference to what is commonly known as assessment or fraternal insurance. With regard to that, very urgent representations have been made to the government by a large and influential deputation representing the greatest of our fraternal orders, that of the Independent Order of Foresters, and although that body only was represented on the deputation, I have no doubt that the views they expressed would be endorsed by the fraternal organizations generally. I may say that the leaders of that very influential deputation frankly acknowledged that their system probably would need some further consideration. While they have unquestionably ample resources for all their present obligations, and for the early future, they felt that the time was at hand when some further steps should be taken by these organizations themselves with a view to strengthening themselves and making them permanent. They have represented to the government that

> The Supreme Court of the Order has been convened to meet in June next (one year earlier than usual) to consider and adopt such measures as may be deemed necessary to strengthen and perpetuate its fraternal system of insurance; and that the representative bodies of other Canadian fraternal institutions will likewise meet during the year, that the managing officers of the societies should have the opportunity of consulting and advising with their membership; and that such a delay will probably enable the societies to co-operate with the government in preparing an adequate measure which will be acceptable to all.

Those representations seemed to us to be fair and reasonable, and we have pleasure in acceding to them. Therefore, when the Bill goes before the Committee on Banking and Commerce, if the House will pass the second reading now, I will propose to strike out from the measure all the clauses which deal with assessment and fraternal insurance. These will become the subject of a separate measure, if necessary, at another session of parliament. Therefore, in asking the House now to assent to the second reading of the Bill I do so with the understanding that when the measure comes before the Committee on Banking and Commerce the particular provisions to which I refer will not be pressed, but we shall then ask to omit them.

Mr. FOSTER. So far as I am concerned I think the course the Fininace Minister proposes is the most businesslike course to get at the Bill, and in the end to get at the best results from an examination of it, it being expressly understood of course that the second reading is simply pro forma and that it does not bind any person to the principle of the Bill.

Mr. FIELDING. I entirely concur in that.

Mr. HAGGART. There are two Bills brought down; is there any difference between them?

Mr. FIELDING. Not this session. I think there is a private Bill relating to one of the orders; there is but one government measure.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not wish to dissent from the course proposed by the Minister of Finance and supported by my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster), but it did seem to me that the more appropriate course would be to discuss the salient features of the Bill, as we usually do on the second reading of principles of the Bill.

Mr. FIELDING. We did that on the first reading.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not think it was gone into very extensively on the first reading. A discussion now would go through the press and we might get a reflection of public opinion, especially from the insurance side, with regard to it before it reaches the committee stage. The committee stage of course is one of inquiry, and the great bulk of the members of this House do not take part in its consideration at that stage. I think it would give a great deal more enlightenment to the country if a debate took place now on the principle of the Bill, and especially if the intentions of the government with regard to its prominent features were now disclosed.

Mr. FIELDING. I may remind my hon. friend that on the introduction of the Bill I did give a somewhat lengthy explanation calling attention to what were regarded as the chief features. With regard to the companies feature in it I think I am correct in stating that every insurance company doing business, and affected by this Bill, has received a copy of it, and is well aware of its contents.

Mr. SPROULE. The epitome which I saw in the press gave very little information of what took place in the House. I know that the companies differ very much in their opinion with regard to the merits of the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the said Bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Before the motion passes I think we should understand, that the report of this committee should not necessarily have the binding character which has sometimes been attributed to a report of that committee on a private or a public Bill. It is very desirable, indeed, that the Bill should be sent to the Committee on Banking and Commerce in order that any person interested may have an opportunity of placing his views before that committee. I presume that is the principal object. But that object could be served nevertheless if it were understood that when the Bill comes back and is considered in the Committee of the Whole House, it should not be taken as a matter that has been determined by the Committee on Banking and Commerce, so as to bind this House, but it should be regarded as having been sent to that committee simply to afford an opportunity to private individuals to make their views heard, and that the discussion in the Committee of the Whole should be as unrestricted and have the same effect as if the Bill were now before it.

Mr. FIELDING. I entirely agree with what the hon. gentleman has said; I take no objection whatever.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—BRITISH COLUMBIA LEGISLATION RESTRICTING ASIATIC IMMIGRATION.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS (Yale-Cariboo). Mr. Speaker, in view of the answer given by the right hon. leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to my hon. friend from Nanaimo (Mr. Smith) in reference to the lieutenant governor of the province of British Columbia having refused his assent to the Act popularly known as the Natal Act passed by that legislature during the last session, in view of the fact that a similar Act has been introduced by the Hon. Mr. Bowser, Attorney General for the province of British Columbia in the legislature a few days ago, and in view of the fact that if this Act becomes law it may seriously complicate the diplomatic relations and interfere with the diplomatic understanding which has been successfully entered into as a result of the mission of the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) with the government of Japan, I think the time opportune to lay before the House and the people of this country certain facts in connection with all the British Columbia legislation of this character. For a number of years our Conservative friends in the province of British Columbia have endeavoured to make political capital out of this question—a question which tends to arouse the passions and the prejudices of the people, and, up to the present time, I do not think that the members representing the province of British Columbia have said very much in this House to explain their position and to explain the record of the Liberal party in connection with this question. I want to deal briefly, Sir, with the Natal Act which was introduced by Mr. Bowser, then a private member of the British Columbia legislature representing the city of Vancouver. Before I do so I want to relate some incidents and give the House some facts a few of which were brought out by Mr. Mackenzie King, the commissioner appointed by this government to investigate certain matters in connection with Chinese and Japanese immigration into the province of British Columbia. In his very excellent report he points out that the origin of the Japanese difficulty dated from the advent of Mr. Saori Gotoh into the province of British Columbia. This gentleman had a large experience in connection with furnishing Japanese labour to American railways, notably the Oregon Short Line, the Union Pacific, the Southern Pacific and the Northern Pacific. In 1901 he came from Tacoma to Vancouver and established a connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Mr. Mackenzie King proceeds to say :

He succeeded in effecting an agreement with that company similar to the agreements between the railway companies and Japanese contractors across the line. He opened an employment agency in Vancouver, and in addition to his railway contract, obtained contracts to supply other industries with men, in particular some of the sawmills and logging camps in British Columbia.

Now Sir, this agreement, entered into between Mr. Gotoh and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, was drawn up by Mr. W. J. Bowser, member for the city of Vancouver and now Attorney General in the McBride government in the province of British Columbia. Mr. W. J. Bowser was solicitor for Mr. Gotoh and every agreement entered into afterwards between Mr. Gotoh and the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Wellington Collieries Company was based on the original agreement prepared by Mr. W. J. Bowser as solicitor for Mr. Gotoh. I have here a copy of this agreement and as it has an important bearing upon the Natal Act introduced by Mr. Bowser into the provincial legislature, I intend to place it on 'Hansard.' It is as follows :

This agreement made this first day of 1907, between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, hereinafter called 'the company,' of the first part, and Saori Gotoh, of the city of Vancouver, in the province of British Columbia, hereinafter called 'the contractor,' of the second part, witnesseth that in consideration of the covenants and agreements on the part of the company hereinafter contained, and the payment by the company to the contractor as hereinafter provided, the contractor hereby covenants and agrees to and with the company to furnish promptly upon demand to the company at such points on the company's line of railway in the province of British Columbia (and, in this agreement, wherever the words 'lines of railway' are mentioned, the same shall be held and construed to be all lines of railway owned or operated or under construction by the company or any other railway company with which the company has a working agreement) as may be designated by the company by its general superintendent for the Pacific division, or other duly authorized officers or agents, as many competent Japanese labourers and workmen as may be demanded by the company, from time to time, such men to be able to perform such work and labour as may be required by the company upon and about its line of railway tracks, roadbed, right of way, depots, and other property, either upon construction or maintenance, the said men and work and labour performed by them to be satisfactory to the company, upon the following terms and conditions:

1. The contractor shall not be liable to the company for any loss or damage sustained by the company through failure on the part of the contractor to furnish as many labourers as may be required by the company, when conditions render it impossible, by the exercise of all due diligence by the contractor, to furnish all such labourers.

2. The company agrees to pay to the contractor for all labourers furnished by the contractor and who are employed by the company in the province of British Columbia as follows: at the rate of one dollar and fifty cents per day of ten hours for each man while working on an extra gang, and one dollar and twenty-five cents to one dollar and forty-five cents on section gangs, the men on section gangs to be graded and the rates of wages between one dollar and twenty-five cents and one dollar and forty-five cents to be paid in respect of them to be fixed by the roadmaster and section foreman of the company under whom they work.

3. The contractor further agrees to keep proper books of account and complete pay-rolls; and, from time to time and at such times as may be demanded by the company, to exhibit said pay-rolls to the company; and, if requested, leave the same with an acknowledgement endorsed thereon by each person whose name appears thereon, of the receipt of the wages shown by such pay-roll to be due him; and should the contractor at any time when so demanded by the company be unable to produce such pay-rolls with acknowledgement endorsed thereon as aforesaid, he shall then furnish a statement showing what wages are not receipted for, and giving reasons why no receipts have been obtained, or otherwise satisfactorily accounting for the disposal of the moneys not receipted for. In the event of the failure of the contractor to carry out this term of the agreement the company may withhold payment of any sums due the contractor until satisfactory evidence is produced showing that all labourers furnished hereunder have, up to that time, been paid their wages in full by the contractor; and, in addition the company may terminate this agreement forthwith, without being in any way responsible to the contractor for any damages he may sustain by reason of such termination.

4. The company agrees to furnish to the contractor free transportation over its lines of railway, of the Pacific division only, for the manager and three other men engaged in looking after such labourers, and will also provide free trip transportation for the purpose of moving any of the men furnished by the contractor under this agreement from points on the line of railway of the company to points elsewhere where their services may be required by the company, and the company agrees that its freight rates on supplies for Japanese as with any other labourers on the company's railway.

5. It is understood and agreed between the parties hereto that the company by its officers shall have full direction and control of the men so furnished while engaged upon work upon its line of railway, and the contractor will at any and all times remove any of such men that the company may think incompetent or unfit for the purposes of the work or for any other good cause.

6. The contractor shall take care of all the men, so furnished under this agreement, who shall become sick or injured, and the company shall in no way be responsible for their care or be liable for any charges therefor; and if the company reasonably incurs any pecuniary liability therefor, by placing any of the men injured in a hospital, employing necessary medical attendance or otherwise, the contractor shall re-imburse the company therefor, and the company may retain any sum for which it may so become liable out of moneys which become due the contractor hereunder.

7. The company will furnish, free of cost for all men furnished by the contractor while working on the lines of railway of the company under this agreement, water and fuel for all domestic uses, but the carrying of the said water and fuel must be done by the men so furnished.

8. The contractor convenants and agrees, once in each month, to pay all the men so furnished their wages in full, and to indemnify and save harmless the company from the payment of the same and from any costs and expenses they may be put to in connection with any action brought against the company for payment.

9. This agreement shall be in force and effect from the first day of April, 1907, until the first day of April, 1912; but should the company consider that the labourers or workmen supplied by the contractor are unsatisfactory then the company shall be at liberty to terminate this agreement upon giving the contractor thirty days notice in writing to that effect. And should the contractor be unable to supply labourers or workmen to the company according to the terms of this agreement, then, in like manner, the contractor shall be at liberty to terminate this agreement upon giving the company thirty days notice in writing to that effect.

10. The contractor covenants and agrees with the company to furnish on or before the execution of this agreement a bond in the sum of five thousand dollars ($5,000) with a surety approved by the company for the faithful performance of section eight of this agreement.

11. It is understood and agreed that this agreement shall not be held or construed as being a contract by the company with the men so furnished, but it is distinctly understood that the men so furnished shall be employees of the contractor and not of the company.

12. It is further understood and agreed between the parties hereto that none of the men furnished under this agreement shall be imported from any place in contravention of chapter 11 of the Statutes of Canada 1897, and any amendment or amendments thereof, commonly known as the Alien Labour Act.

13. And it is further agreed between the parties hereto that the contractor will in case of accident or injury of any kind whatsoever happening to any employees or workmen furnished by the contractor, unless such accident or injury shall be due solely to negligence of the company indemnify and save harmless the company against any claim whatsoever which may be brought against the company on account thereof.

As witness the hand and seal of the general superintendant for the Pacific division of the railway company and the hand and seal of the contractor.

Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of:—

Now, Mr. Speaker, that agreement was prepared by Mr. W. J. Bowser, the Attorney General of the province of British Columbia, acting as sollicitor for Mr. Gotoh. It was prepared first in the year 1902. Keeping in mind that Mr. Bowser prepared this agreement, keeping in mind that he was solicitor for Mr. Gotoh, the contractor, under whom all the Japanese who created the difficulty in British Columbia came into British Columbia, it gives us a cue to what afterwards developed in that province. And in order to show what happened in connection with these Gotoh contracts, I call the attention of the House to a very interesting table prepared by Mr. Mackenzie King in reference to this Japanese immigration, which appears on page 11 of his report. This table shows that during the ten months ending October, 1907, 8,501 Japanese arrived in the province of British Columbia. It also shows that if we deduct the number of Japanese who came in under the Gotoh contracts prepared by Mr. W. J. Bowser, we find that the number of Japanese immigrants was limited to 299, a less number than was allowed under the arrangement between this government and the government of Japan. Or, in other words, if the Gotoh contracts had not been put into force we would never have had any Japanese difficulty in the province of British Columbia.

Now, Sir, we will go a little further—the general elections for the province were held in British Columbia on the second day of February, 1907; on the evening of the first day of February, 1907, Mr. Bowser who was one of the Conservative members for the city of Vancouver and who was running for re-election, delivered a speech in the city of Vancouver which is reported in the Victoria Daily 'Colonist' on the morning of February the 2nd, the morning of the election, as follows:

Labour on Grand Trunk Pacific.

Then, as regards the Grand Trunk Pacific. The railway was a creature of and created by the government at Ottawa. Infinite trouble had arisen from the employment of oriental labour on the Canadian Pacific Railway and yet, blind to the interests of this province, the authorities at Ottawa had refused to put any clause in the contract with the railway forbidding the employment of Japanese or Chinese labourers. What was more, the province was actually booked for a repetition of the old trouble. Mr. Bowser stated upon absolutely authoritative grounds, that a company, the United Construction and Supply Company, had already been organized and had let a contract to a Japanese labour agent, Gotoh, of Vancouver, for the bringing of 50,000 Japanese labourers to the country, to work on the Grand Trunk Pacific. Already the contract had been let and Gotoh was even now in Japan, arranging for the shipment of the 50,000 coolies.

As to the membership of this company, Mr. Bowser read the names, James Carruthers of Montreal, E. G. Russell, local manager of the Grand Trunk Pacific, Robert Kelly of Vancouver, whose name was greeted with scornful laughter and hisses of execration from the audience: F. Bennett and D. Hays.

This is the 'Colonist's' report of Mr. Bowser's speech. On the evening of February the 1st, the evening before the elections, an editorial appeared in the Vancouver 'Province,' a newspaper which is the organ of the Canadian Pacific Railway and supports the McBride government, and in this editorial Mr. W. J. Bowser who is now Attorney General in the McBride government, was commended for his work in drawing the attention of the public to the efforts of the McBride government to prevent the influx of cheap Japanese labour into this country; he was also commended for forewarning the public regarding the contract entered into by the Grand Trunk Pacific for the supply of Japanese labour. And the 'Province' newspaper intimated that this contract would be made effective if the McBride government were defeated and the Liberal government returned to power. The editorial of the 'Province' concludes:

> Mr. Bowser's warning, therefore, to the people of British Columbia who do not want the province swamped with cheap labour from Japan, is worthy of the most serious attention.

But how did they report Mr. Bowser's speech? They did not report it at all, but instead of reporting the speech, on the front page of the Vancouver 'Province' on the evening before the election was a long article with flaming headliness, giving with a wealth of detail the contract entered into between the United Construction and Supply Company, and Gotoh for the supply of 50,000 Japanese labourers for the Grand Trunk Railway. I say they gave this contract with a wealth of detail the evening before the elections. I want to put this article on record. With its flaming headliness it reads as follows:

> 50,000 Japanese for British Columbia.
> Grand Trunk Pacific and the machine Liberals want to flood this country with the little brown men.
> Hard and fast bargain is made.
> No chance for white men on new railroad.
> Japanese contractor now arranging to bring over horde of coolies.

The article reads:

> Arrangements have been virtually completed for the bringing into British Columbia of 50,000 Japanese to build the western end of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Confirmation of this astonishing piece of news was had in Vancouver to-day.

'To-day' mind you; the day before the election.

> All the details of the scheme have been obtained.

Mark that, all the details of the scheme have been obtained.

> And the biggest sensation of the campaign is public property this afternoon.

The afternoon before the election:

> Announcement of the details of the project for an oriental invasion of British Columbia explains the alliance of the Grand Trunk Pacific with the McInnes-Liberal party, and the hostility of the railway company and its friends to the Conservatives led by Hon. Richard McBride.
> With money pouring into Vancouver and all British Columbia in fact, from the coffers of the Grand Trunk Pacific, with a lavishness and recklessness never heretofore known in any provincial election in British Columbia, those who concern themselves with the motives that lie behind the actions of great corporations, have been forced to the conclusion that more than the mere desire to get hold of the Indian reserves and other public lands in the province, and escape the incidence of taxation, lay behind the railway company's unparalleled generosity. They feel this, and they were right, as the facts now available show.
> It is a matter of history—notorious, but true—that the Grand Trunk Pacific, for some unexplained reason, has delayed fulfilling its promise of commencing construction on the Pacific coast. Every one is also aware that year after year, session after session, the McBride government has introduced and passed legislation virtually prohibiting the entry into this country of oriental labour. This legislation has been as often disallowed by the Liberal administration at Ottawa. Consequently it was perfectly obvious to any intending large employer of oriental labour that as long as McBride was in power he would be a thorn in the flesh.
> McBride must be deposed. The Grand Trunk Pacific had decided not to employ one more white man than it could possibly help, in fact to perform the whole work with oriental labour. But McBride, with his anti-Mongolian legislation, stood in its way, and they consequently decided to delay construction until he was rendered harmless.
> When the elections were brought on pressure was at once brought to bear upon the Liberal party here by the company's foster parents in Ottawa—the Laurier administration—to come to an understanding with the Grand Trunk Pacific on this subject, with the result that a hard and fast agreement signed, sealed and delivered has been entered into by which the parties of the first part (the British Columbia Liberals) covenant and agree not to pass any anti-Mongolian legislation, if victorious, while the parties of the second part (the company) bound themselves to furnish all necessary campaign funds, and to buy the 'Guardian' newspaper from Joe Martin and turn it into a Liberal organ, which was done on the first of the year at the price of fifteen thousand dollars. So cock-sure is the company of the so-called Liberals winning that arrangements are now being perfected to flood this country with Japanese coolie labour, in the spring, to an extent undreamed of. And this is how it is being done:

There is a company carrying on business here and in Victoria, called the United Supply and Contracting Company, Limited. This concern is in reality the Grand Trunk Pacific under another name. Its manager is Mr. E. G. Russell, who is, also, the confidential agent for the Grand Trunk Pacific on the coast, and its stockholders are said to be members of the local Liberal machine. This supply company has, it is understood, entered into an arrangement with a Vancouver Japanee employment man named Gotoh, to furnish through one of the largest labour firms in Tokio, Japan (a firm with £45,000 capital), at least fifty thousand coolie Japs during this year, and more later. M. E. G. Russell, accompanied by Gotoh, was up at Prince Rupert a short time ago, to enable Gotoh to look over the ground and examine into conditions, so that he could report favourably to the Japanese government, which exercises a paternal care over all emigrants. Gotoh is now in Japan making all necessary arrangements with the government and the Tokio firm, for the furnishing and transportation of this army of coolies to British Columbia. Every difficulty has been anticipated, in fact, Mr. E. G. Russell recently stated that it has cost the company up to date, over fifteen thousand dollars in expenses, perfecting the scheme.

It may be asked how can the Alien Act be circumvented. The plan is this: The Grand Trunk Pacific will nominally have nothing to do with the bringing of the labour here. The United Supply Company (its creature) can land the coolies at Prince Rupert, under a secret agreement, with the Tokio firm, as to wages, &c., and arrange to erect huge barracks for their accommodation. The Grand Trunk Pacific emissaries can then appear on the scene and innocently hire them just as they would engage any other residents there.

But the worst feature of this plot is the statement made on the authority of Mr. Russell that these coolie Japs are not to be sent back to Japan after the railway is completed, but are to be settled by the railway company all along the line, so that they can be utilized to do the rough operating work of the system. As a consequence the workingmen of Canada, who are helping with their money to build this railroad, will derive no benefit from its construction, nor even in its operation after it is built.

These are the facts. This conspiracy or plot, or whatever you like to call it, is to be made possible by the expectation that the workingmen of British Columbia will vote for and place in power one of the parties to it, the so-called Liberal-Grand Trunk combination.

The presence of all these Japanese will open up other large questions. Who knows but what it is the intention of the railway company and its political followers to eventually enfranchise this Japanese horde? What a fine plan to run British Columbia could be carried out with fifty or sixty thousand machine votes?

Now, Sir, as I have said, that article appeared in the Vancouver 'Province' on the evening preceding the last provincial election. Details of the same article appeared in the report I quoted from the Victoria 'Colonist,' as having been given to the public in a speech delivered by Mr. W. J. Bowser, the now attorney general in the McBride government. Where did he get this information? The evidence brought out by Mr. Mackenzie King goes to show that there was never any such arrangement entered into between the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company (or any one representing that company) and Mr. Gotoh (or any one representing Mr. Gotoh). The 'Province,' the organ of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, got this information from Mr. W. J. Bowser, the solicitor for Mr. Gotoh, and the wealth of details appearing in that article they were able to secure because Mr. Bowser drew up the agreement that was entered into between Gotoh and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and not between Gotoh and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. LENNOX. Will my hon. friend (Mr. Ross) allow me to ask him a question. Does the hon. member mean to say that Mr. Bowser personally drew up that agreement, or merely that it was drawn up in his office; does he know that it was personally drawn up by Mr. Bowser or that Mr. Bowser had any actual knowledge of it?

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. In reply to that question of the hon. member (Mr. Lennox) I will say this: I am stating it as a fact on my responsibility as a member of this House, that Mr. W. J. Bowser was the solicitor for Mr. Gotoh and Mr. W. J. Bowser drew up the agreement for Mr. Gotoh.

Mr. LENNOX. Personally?

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. I am not a clerk in his office. I do not know. I make the statement that the information contained in the article in the Vancouver 'Province,' published the evening before the last provincial election, was furnished by Mr. Bowser, because he knew it as solicitor for Gotoh and had drawn up the agreement that had been entered into between Gotoh and the Canadian Pacific Railway. Subsequent events demonstrated that the people of Vancouver felt very strongly on this Japanese question. In the face of that article in the Vancouver 'Province,' with its wealth of detail in reference to a contract entered into between Gotoh and the Grand Trunk Pacific to bring 50,000 Japanese into the province of British Columbia, you could not have elected the Angel Gabriel in the city of Vancouver. More than that there was absolutely no time between the appearance of the article in the paper on the afternoon of February 1 and the election on February 2 to secure any evidence that could contradict it. This is what Mr. Bowser did. He was solicitor for Mr. Gotoh; he furnished the Vancouver 'Province,' the organ of the Canadian Pacific Railway with the details of the contract which he had himself drawn up, and he attached that contract to a purely mercantile concern and made the people of British Columbia and Vancouver believe that this contract was in the interest of the Grand Trunk Pacific, that Gotoh was in Japan getting Japanese for the Grand Trunk Pacific when, as a matter of fact, he was in Japan getting Japanese for Mr. Bowser's strong political ally, the Canadian Pacific under a contract drawn up by Mr. W. J. Bowser. The question of professional ethics involved I leave to the lawyers in the House, and ask them if it is in accordance with the best traditions of the profession that any lawyer should use information obtained from his client in the way I have related. But let us go a little further. Up to the evening of February 2 the Liberals were confident of carrying five seats in the city of Vancouver. Strong Conservatives admitted, up to the evening of February 1, that at least three of the Liberal candidates would be elected; but, as I said before, with that article staring us in the face, we could not have elected the Angel Gabriel—and that is why we lost the five seats in the city of Vancouver.

But, let us go a little further. Mr. Bowser was profuse in his promises to the people that if he were returned to power he would introduce legislation in the provincial legislature that would prohibit the importation of oriental labour into this country. He was commended in his attitude by the 'Province' and other Conservative organs and he did introduce a Bill into the local legislature. This Bill goes down to history as the Bowser Bill. The enacting section of this Bill reads as follows:

> The immigration into British Columbia of any person who, when asked to do so by the officer appointed under this Act, shall fail himself to write out and sign, in the English language, or any language of Europe, an application to the provincial secretary of the province of British Columbia to the effect in the form set out in Schedule B to this Act annexed, as well as read in English, or any language of Europe, any test submitted to him by the officer appointed under this Act, shall be lawful.

That sounds all right, does it not? But I shall take out the verbiage that surrounds the crux of this clause and give the effect of it: it is simply that the immigration of any person who shall fail to read and write in the English or a European language shall be lawful. This Act would have permitted the admission of any one who could not read or write in an English or European language into the province of British Columbia. This clause is so cleverly drawn that the defect in it escaped the detection of Mr. J. A. Macdonald, the leader of the opposition in the province of British Columbia, than whom there is no brighter or abler lawyer in that province, and it also escaped the attention of the members of the provincial legislature. You have to read it three or four times before you see that the clause expresses a meaning directly contrary to its apparent intent and that as a means of prohibiting the importation of oriental labour it could not be effective. When it was discovered, people were charitable enough to say, not knowing the incidents to which I have referred, that it was a mere lapsus linguae, and there was no intent on the part of Mr. Bowser to draft the Act in this way. But let us see the situation. Mr. Bowser was solicitor for Gotoh. He knew there was a contract in full force and effect between Gotoh and his friend the Canadian Pacific Railway. Let him introduce a Natal Act properly drawn, let him get the assent of the lieutenant-governor to that Act and the Gotoh contract would have been of no value because the Japanese could not have been brought in with this Act in force. He was very careful. He tried to get a little kudos; he tried to carry out his pre-election promise, but he so drew the Act that it would not in any way interfere with the contract of his client Gotoh. He was so successful in drafting it that not a single member of the provincial legislature noticed the defect in that Act. What happened? Mr. Bowser as a good Conservative had something else in view. The first thing to do was to protect the Gotoh contracts; the second thing to do was to compromise the Liberal party in British Columbia. Mr. Dunsmuir, the lieutenant-governor of the province of British Columbia withheld his assent to this Act. Then Mr. Bowser said: I told you, here is a man appointed by the Liberal government at Ottawa as lieutenant-governor of this province and he refuses to give his assent to my Act which was intended to prohibit oriental immigration into this country; if the lieutenant-governor had given his assent to this Act and if it had been vetoed by the government at Ottawa as similar Acts have been vetoed Bowser could always have said: I told you that the Liberals are opposed to legislation restricting oriental immigration. But he could always have been absolutely sure that the Act which he drew up, if it did receive the assent of the lieutenant-governor and the approval of the government here, absolutely would not prohibit the importation of a single Japanese into British Columbia but would rather encourage it, because it said in its enacting clause that the immigration of any person who could not read in the English or a European language would be lawful.

Mr. SPROULE. If that Act, even if it had received consent of the Lieutenant Governor, would not keep out the Japanese or the other foreigners it was intended to keep out, why would the Lieutenant Governor refuse his assent to it ?

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. I have already pointed out that this clause was so cleverly drawn that Mr. J. A. Macdonald, one of the ablest and shrewdest lawyers in British Columbia, the leader of the opposition, let the clause go through and did not see its defect. And I will undertake to read it half a dozen times to the hon. gentleman, and he will not see the defect, so cleverly was it drawn. How then can he expect the Lieutenant Governor to see the effect, but I am coming to that point a little later.

Mr. McBride, the First Minister of British Columbia, has been making political capital out of this question. Newspaper reports during recent days circulated the statement that when this matter was discussed in the local legislature, Mr. McBride took the extraordinary position that Lieutenant Governor Dunsmuir was only an agent for the Dominion government and was not in any way responsible for any of his acts. I am not going to discuss the position Mr. McBride takes with reference to that matter, but I want to point out that, according to the official record, Mr. McBride did know something about Mr. Bowser's Bill and about what the Lieutenant Governor intended to do regarding it. Mr. Bowser introduced his Bill on April 2, 1907. It was read the second time on April 18, 1907, and considered in Committee of the Whole House on April 20, 1907. The House was prorogued on April 25, 1907, and it is stated in the records of the House that :

His Honour the Lieutenant Governor refuses his assent to this Bill and reserves the same until the pleasure of His Excellency the Governor General of Canada has been signified in respect thereto.

Where was Mr. McBride at this time ? I hold in my hand the report of his mission to London where, as he stated himself, he went to place this grievance of the people of British Columbia at the foot of the Throne. In this report Mr. McBride says :

Pursuant to my commission, as special delegate on behalf of your government, I left Victoria on the 11th day of April, 1907, arriving at Ottawa on April 16th. The same day I called upon the Honourable R. W. Scott, Secretary of State, and requested that I be given the credentials necessary to place me in official communication with the Secretary of State for the Colonies. These I received on the day following, and leaving Ottawa on the same afternoon, I sailed from St. John, New Brunswick, on April 19, arriving in London on Saturday, the 27th day of April.

While getting his credentials from the Secretary of State, the latter said to Mr. McBride : What about the Bill introduced by Mr. Bowser ? Will it become law ? Mr. McBride replied : No, it will not, because Governor Dunsmuir will refuse his assent. I am not quoting the exact words but that is the purport of his answers. As I have said, this Bowser Bill did not receive its second reading until April 18, 1907. Mr. McBride was here on April 16, 1907, two days before this Bill got its second reading. And then he told the Secretary of State, the official medium of communication, what the Lieutenant Governor was going to do seven days later. How then can Mr. McBride tell the people of British Columbia to-day that he did not know what action the Lieutenant Governor was going to take ? Or that he was not consulted about it ? How can he say this when he knew, seven days in advance, even before the Bill got its second reading, that the Lieutenant Governor was going to withhold his assent ? This statement of Mr. McBride appeared so extraordinary to the Secretary of State at Ottawa that he wired Mr. Dunsmuir, asking him if what Mr. McBride said was true, and Mr. Dunsmuir replied that it was.

Mr. LENNOX. Where did the hon. gentleman get those papers ?

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. I think the First Minister announced to-day that they would be laid on the table of the House.

Mr. LENNOX. But the hon. gentleman has them in advance.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I beg my hon. friend's pardon. He did not get them from me or any member of this government. They were published, I understand, in British Columbia but not by this government.

Mr. LENNOX. That was not the explanation the hon. gentleman gave.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. If the hon. gentleman will allow me to make my speech in my own way, I will tell him that this information was fully published and discussed in the British Columbia newspapers as early as August last. I did not get any papers from any member of this government, I did not ask any member of this government for the papers, but am giving these facts on my responsibility as a member of the House, and I am bound to say that it is none of the hon. gentleman's business where I got my information.

Mr. McBride was here on April 16, 1907, as he states in his own report. He interviewed the Secretary of State at Ottawa on that day. He told the Secretary of State what the Lieutenant Governor of British Columbia was going to do, and now Mr. McBride tells us that he did not know what his honour, Mr. Dunsmuir, intended doing. Mr. McBride says that our Lieutenant Governor withheld his assent on instructions from Ottawa, but we have had the First Minister stating to-day to the House that no such instructions were given. Mr. McBride cannot escape responsibility for the act of the Lieutenant Governor, in view of the facts I have related. If Mr. McBride knew nothing about the intention of the Lieutenant Governor, how could he inform the hon. the Secretary of State what the Lieutenant Governor intended to do, seven days before the Lieutenant Governor took action, and one day before the Bill even received its second reading in the House ? So that while the Liberal party are receiving a great deal of blame from the Conservatives of the province of British Columbia for their action in connection with this matter, the leaders of the Conservative party were guilty of mendacity and trickery in connection with the legislation which they themselves introduced. So much for that Mr. Bowser's Bill.

I am not here to defend the action of the Lieutenant Governor of British Columbia, but I am bound to say that there is a marked difference between this course and that of his two most important advisers. Mr. Dunsmuir is honest, almost as absolutely honest as he is absolutely stupid in matters political. His Honour the Lieutenant Governor was left with an enormous fortune. He is of a retiring disposition. For a great many years he did not mix up with people as an ordinary business man would. He is passionately fond of his family and has devoted his time between his office and his home. He knew nothing of public life until suddenly he found himself at the head of 29 members of the local legislature, in a House of 38, by one of those peculiar political turnovers that we sometimes have in the province of British Columbia. He was made Premier, and, because he was honest, because he had never had any experience in dealing with politicians, because he knew nothing of public life, he made a woeful failure of the position of Premier. But, as I said before, he is generous, he is hospitable, he has a charming family, he has great wealth. And, when he was appointed lieutenant governor, it was thought that, with the large number of distinguished visitors who passed through the city of Victoria, he would make an ideal occupant of that high office. And I am bound to say that if he had had honest advisers, instead of two tricky politicians, he would not have got in to the difficulty he did get into. If he is to be censured for refusing his assent to the Natal Act, he is not nearly so much to blame as Mr. W. J. Bowser, the Attorney General of his government, who brought the Act in under the circumstances which I have related, and in a form in which it could not be made effective, even if it had received the assent of the Lieutenant Governor. I am bound to say this, however, that when His Honour the Lieutenant Governor in his capacity of president of the Wellington Collieries Company signed one of these Gotoh agreements, prepared by Mr. W. J. Bowser, he showed his unfitness for the position which he occupies, because these agreements are against public policy and the laws of this country. I am also bound to say, from what I know of His Honour the Lieutenant Governor that he never signed that contract without somebody advising him. And I think that about the time he put his name to that contract there was some brilliant modern Machiavelli near at hand. Because, you see, it was absolutely necessary to commit and compromise His Honour the Lieutenant Governor in some way before Mr. W. J. Bowser could carry out the trick which he began with the publication of the agreement which he himself had drawn up, as an agreement entered into by the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, when it had been entered into by his friend the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. He began his trickery then and carried it on when he introduced his abortive Natal Act. And once he got His Hon. the Lieutenant Governor into this compromising position, it was much easier for him to make this grand-stand play and carry on the career of trickery which began with the Gotoh agreement. Now, what do we next consider? The report of Mr. Mackenzie King shows that all the trouble which arose in the province of British Columbia was occasioned by these Gotoh agreements. The report of the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) shows that, under the arrangements entered into with Japan, no more contract labour will be permitted to leave Japan, except with the consent of this government. The order in council passed by this government, within the past few weeks, will prohibit the importation of Japanese from the Hawaiian Islands. So it is absolutely impossible to bring in more Japanese under these Gotoh agreements. Mr. W. J. Bowser, Attorney General in the province of British Columbia, has no more interest in the Gotoh agreements because they are ineffective under the action taken by this government. What does he do now? The other day he brings in a good Natal Act. Why should not he, now that the Gotoh agreements are of no more avail? thanks to the action of this government. The Act he has just brought in provides that it should be unlawful for any person to enter British Columbia who cannot read or write some European language. It does not say that it shall be 'lawful' for such persons to enter. I am bound to say, speaking as a representative of the province of British Columbia, that I honestly believe that the settlement entered into by the hon.

Postmaster General with the government of Japan, and approved by this government, will be a satisfactory settlement of our difficulty in the province of British Columbia. I believe I represent—and I hope honestly represent—public opinion in British Columbia, and we are anxious to have this question settled. I believe that the settlement effected will be satisfactory and that it will place this Dominion of Canada in a far better position than it has ever held before, because it has demonstrated that, by negotiations, we can settle our difficulties with large and powerful nations. And I believe also that now that no Japanese can be brought in under the contract of Mr. Bowser's friend, Mr. Gotoh, Mr. Bowser is deliberately bringing in in the legislature of the province of British Columbia a good Natal Act for the purpose of endeavouring to create more turmoil in the province of British Columbia and disturbing the satisfactory arrangements made by the Postmaster General, the object being, if possible, to keep this alive as a political question in the province of British Columbia. In view of the facts I have given this House, I hope that the good sense of the members of the provincial legislature of British Columbia will enable them to see through the trickery of Mr. W. J. Bowser, and that he will not be allowed to pass any measure which has no honest object, but which is intended to disturb the friendly and satisfactory relations entered into between the Dominion of Canada and Japan.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). I do not wish to take any part in this discussion, because it seems to me to come very strangely before this House. A motion is made to go into Committee of Supply. Of course it is the right of any hon. member on that motion to bring forward any grievance that can be remedied by this parliament, but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Duncan Ross) brings up a question for which he is not attempting to hold this House responsible or to hold the Minister of Justice responsible for giving any advice with regard to it, but is endeavouring to hold the legislature of British Columbia responsible for his troubles. Now, we have nothing to do with the action of the Lieutenant Governor. If the hon. gentleman had followed up his argument by an impeachment of the Lieutenant Governor, then I could see the force of his observations. But he has not done that; he has made some very uncomplimentary remarks concerning him. When he says that the lieutenant governor was so absolutely stupid that he did not know what he was doing, I think he is not speaking respectfully of the Crown.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. I do not want the hon. gentleman to misquote me. I said he was absolutely stupid in political matters, and I reiterate my statement.

Mr. D. ROSS.

Mr. SPROULE. It is political matters we are dealing with, and if that action was not within the line of his duty, what is his duty ? He represents the Crown as part of the political machinery of the province, therefore in my judgment the hon. gentleman has spoken disrespectfully of the Crown. The next question is, why did the lieutenant governor withhold his assent to that Bill ? The hon. gentleman says that if the Bill had passed it would not have been effective in keeping out the foreigners, and therefore the lieutenant governor might have given his assent to the Bill. But why did he refrain from doing it ? It was because, if you can believe the explanation given by the hon. gentleman, the lieutenant governor believed it would stop the influx of foreigners, therefore he disallowed the Bill. But why did he withhold his assent ? To ascertain the views of the Crown, and where would he ascertain the views of the Crown if not from the federal government through His Excellency the Governor General? Yet the right hon. First Minister told us only a short time ago that there was no correspondence whatever between the federal government and the lieutenant governor regarding this Bill. Then the lieutenant governor had not ascertained the views of the Crown. There must either have been some correspondence, or he must have acted on his own responsibility, a right that he enjoys as representative of the Crown. Now surely we can hardly suppose that he would have withheld its assent without consultation with the federal government here, or its representative, the Minister of Justice. It seems to me, therefore, that there must be something following. But according to the information disclosed to this House, there has been no correspondence, and no information given one way or the other. Therefore I cannot understand that the hon. gentleman's address to this House has any point whatever, because it does not deal with any grievance which this House can redress ; it is a grievance against the local government, and one with which this House has nothing to do.

Mr. R. G. MACPHERSON (Vancouver City). I cannot agree at all with the remarks of my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) when he says that the speech of my hon. friend from Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Duncan Ross) was on a subject with which this House had nothing to do.

Mr. SPROULE. I did not say the speech, I said that from the observations the hon. gentleman presented to this House, his grievance was not against this government but against the government of British Columbia.

Mr. MACPHERSON. I see the fine distinction the hon. gentleman draws, but I cannot allow him to get away from his words. The purport of his statement was that it was not necessary for the member for Yale-Cariboo to bring this question up in the House to-day, and even if it was, he had not made any point. But I think the member for Yale-Cariboo has made a point and driven it well home. The hon. Postmaster General has just returned from a diplomatic mission to Japan, the result of which is fraught with immense possibilities to my province. Had his mission proved a failure, I can assure the hon. member for East Grey that the people of the province of British Columbia would have been very much alarmed at the present time, because they would have felt that the last prop was gone, the last obstacle to save them from an influx of Japanese and other orientals. So in view of the fact that the Postmaster General has just arrived back from Japan, in view of the fact that he has placed before this House and country his interpretation of the arrangements entered into between Japan and Canada, and in view of the fact that it is wise to give these arrangements free rein for some months—because it is only by the actual operation of these arrangements that we can tell whether they are going to be successful, and we are bound to assume they will be successful until the reverse is proven—I say in view of that fact, the legislature of British Columbia are at this moment, or will be in an hour from now, having regard to difference in time, in the throes of a controversy as to whether or not the province of British Columbia shall enact what is known as the Natal Act, having for its object the exclusion of orientals from that country. Now we cannot get away from this one point, that the province of British Columbia, the right thinking men and the right thinking women, are as desirous of seeing a proper solution of this question as they can be of life itself. I can imagine no such excitement, no subject, outside of actual warfare itself, that has so deeply stirred the people of British Columbia as this oriental immigration. In my view the action of the provincial legislature, if it passes this Natal Act, is simply an attempt to make a political football out of a situation which, if they were truly patriotic men, they would be very averse even to mention. I say this subject is fraught with greater possibilities and greater dangers to the people of British Columbia than anybody in this House, outside the members from that province, can at all realize. And I am sorry to say that we have men in our province who are so recreant to their trust, so forgetful of the duties devolving upon every citizen who is desirous of keeping his country peaceful and happy, that they would sacrifice even its peace and happiness in order that they might gain some political advantage. I say that is a matter upon which this House has every reason to spend some time in considering. It is a pity that the members of the British Columbia legislature cannot rise to the occasion and say; we will for the present wait and see how the arrangement works out that was made between the government of Canada and the government of Japan, we will wait a few months and see what will be the result; and if experience shows that this arrangement will tend to keep British Columbia a white man's country, if we find that it will effect a happy solution of this question, then we will be very happy and well satisfied. But our men out there, apparently, are not big enough, are not broad enough, to take such a view, and their action, as shown by my hon. friend from Yale-Cariboo, proves their insincerity. Why, Sir, is it not the veriest kind of buncombe for the Hon. Richard McBride, the leader of the British Columbia government, to take this action, after he allowed an Act passed by the unanimous vote of the legislature, to be vetoed by the lieutenant governor? If he were in earnest, why did he not protest? But when the lieutenant governor told him, I will not sign the Act, he meekly walked away like a whipped cur.

Is it not the veriest kind of buncombe to suggest that the men who are responsible to the Lieutenant Governor and who are responsible for the failure to put the Natal Act into operation have been pursuing an honourable course? Mr. McBride and his government are the constitutional advisers of His Honour the Lieutenant Governor. The people of the province of British Columbia do not believe that the Natal Act, passed by the legislature, is an Act which can be enforced. The government of the province of British Columbia do not accept the belief that the Act can be enforced, because, time and time again, for political purposes only and to pander to a certain class of people, they have enacted the Natal Act. When it was vetoed by this government, as it has been vetoed since 1882 up to the present time, has there been one solitary attempt by any attorney general or any premier of the province of British Columbia to carry it to a higher court to ascertain whether or not they had within their province the power to pass such legislation? That of itself, Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, proves conclusively and it proves to every right thinking man in the province of British Columbia, the insincerity of every government which has ever passed that Act. Nay, more, there has been an attempt made on this question by every political party in the province of British Columbia to make capital out of it, Liberal and Conservative, workingman, anti-Asiatic, Socialist and every possible conceivable party. In a country were we have all kinds of possible conceivable parties there has been an attempt made by every party to make political capital out of this question and this present move in the legislature yesterday and to-day proves still more conclusively that they are agitators and not legislators, that they are men who are false to their country and not patriots.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, how far is it possible for a member of this House to attack a provincial government and its leader by calling them false to their trust and traitors ? It seems to me that it is going rather far and I should like to have your cool opinion upon this subject.

Mr. SPEAKER. The rule applicable to the question is rule 19 which says that :

No member shall speak disrespectfully of His Majesty, nor of any of the Royal Family, nor of the governor, nor of the person administrating the government of Canada.

That, of course, applies to the Governor General. Any reference to any person beyond that is a question of taste rather than of procedure, and I am not in the position of being able to enforce any rule as to that.

Mr. MACPHERSON. If I have indulged in language that is not parliamentary, I will say that I have no desire to say other than the truth ; I have no desire to say other than that which I feel to be right in my heart of hearts. Sometimes I do not find the confines of this chamber broad enough for me to express myself as I would like and on this question, above all others, I find myself crimped, cabined and confined. As to my good friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster), no pent up Utica will keep him down when he wants to get up and declare himself in strong language and he will have to bear with me if I feel strongly on this question because I feel that I am speaking from my most positive convictions. I never felt called upon to speak on any subject since I have been a member of this House that called for stronger language or for calmer reason than this question.

Mr. SPROULE. The strong language you have, but when it comes to the reason that is the trouble.

Mr. MACPHERSON. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) is the last man to judge any body as to calm reason. I have sat for six years in this House and I have listened to what we may regard as calm reason but I doubt if there is any man, by the widest and most charitable stretch of his imagination, who could suggest that any of his utterances have been characterized by calm reason. But, to go back to my friend the Premier of British Columbia—and he is a personal friend of my own and has been for many years—when he allowed—and he says he allowed the governor to deal with the Act that was passed unanimously by the legislature there—when he allowed the governor to do that without one solitary remonstrance on his part it is prima facie evidence that the leader of the government of the province of British Columbia was desirous of seeing the governor not give his assent to that Bill. If he, as premier of the province, had been in earnest, when this Bill was brought to the governor, he would have said : You refuse to give your sanction to that Bill, you will give me a dissolution the moment you refuse to do that because I have no longer your confidence and the only constitutional procedure I can follow is to ask to be relieved from the powers of office. It would have been a simple matter for Mr. McBride to have done that and if he had done that and he had been in earnest in doing that he would have swept British Columbia from the west coast of Vancouver to the foothills of the Rocky Mountains. There would not have been one man left to go against him upon that subject in British Columbia and he would have come back to the House with a full following enabling and forcing the governor to give his assent to the Bill. But, is it any wonder that the people of the rest of Canada do not believe that we have been in earnest in British Columbia in our attitude towards oriental immigration ? Is it any wonder that the people of Japan have never accepted the statement that we are in earnest when we have the premier of the province advising the governor to sign the Bill and then as he has been charged and charged by members from the province of British Columbia, going down to the office of the Secretary of State and giving the assurance that the governor would not sign the Bill. The word of the Hon. R. W. Scott, whose life has extended over four score years and who for fifty years has taken part in public life, is possibly as good as that of any man in Canada, and the Hon. R. W. Scott, that veteran in the public life of Canada declares that Hon. Richard McBride gratuitously told him, one week before the Bill would have received its second reading, that he need have no fear of the passage of the Natal Act because the Governor would not give his assent. Then we have the Hon. Mr. McBride hieing himself away to the foot of the Throne to present an imaginary grievance when he himself was playing ducks and drakes with a question which was much more important than the question that he carried to the foot of the Throne. I know Mr. McBride and I know him well.

Mr. Scott, the Secretary of State, has always been of the opinion, for reasons I have never asked him, that the province of British Columbia was altogether too anti-Asiatic. When Mr. McBride went to the Secretary of State to ask for his credentials, Mr. Scott said to him : No doubt your province will once more resurrect that hardy annual, known as the Natal Act ? Yes, said Mr. McBride, but it will not receive the governor's assent. If Mr. Scott, who is an old and an honest man, had been as acute as Mr. McBride, he would have put the question differently. Still he was fairly acute and he did not accept unhesitatingly Mr. McBride's statement. He sent a telegram, worded in a different fashion from what my hon. friend from Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Ross), would have worded it. He worded it in such a way so that he put the onus upon the lieutenant governor. The two telegrams were published in the Vancouver and Victoria papers and the eastern papers last September. Mr. Scott's telegram read : Your premier tells me that you will not give your assent to the Natal Act. The lieutenant governor, who would not do a wrong thing if he knew it, replied : Your information is correct ; the Bill will not receive my assent. I have no doubt that this reply pleased Mr. McBride and Mr. Bowser, the father of this Natal Act, and no doubt it created the opinion in eastern Canada and Japan that the British Columbia government was not in earnest and that, in passing this Natal Act, which they knew would not receive the assent of the lieutenant governor, they were merely pandering to the agitation of people who did not take the time to read or think. Then when we consider further that at present, Mr. Bowser, the attorney of the province of British Columbia, is the paid solicitor of Mr. Gotoh, the president of the Canadian Nippon Supply Company as well as senior member for the city of Victoria in the local house, and when we consider further that his name was then prominently mentioned as the next Attorney General and probably the next premier, it is evident that Mr. Gotoh knew where to go. Being no doubt well versed in the trickery of politics, he went to the man who probably had the greatest influence. I am not saying Mr. Bowser is a political trickster, but he certainly comes very close to the border line. When Mr. Gotoh went to Mr. Bowser, Mr. Bowser said: I will draw you up a hard and fast agreement, which will take the place of the Alien Labour Act of the Dominion, and under which you can bring in labourers under contract. This agreement, drawn up by Mr. Bowser, was in existence some time, and when the elections came on, that was the time to bring out this contract, put the onus of it upon the Liberal party, and make them the scapegoats. How well he succeeded we all know, but chickens will come home to roost, and they are coming home to roost to Mr. Bowser. Mr. Gotoh went to Japan and said to the people there : It is all right, the attorney general has drawn up this agreement ; he tells me he has drawn up the Natal Act in such a way that you need not fear anything ; the politicians of British Columbia are not sincere in the matter. Is it any wonder that the people of Japan had a false idea of the attitude of our politicians ? Is it any wonder that we from British Columbia have great difficulty in this parliament and in eastern Canada in convincing this House and the people of the east of our sincerity in this matter ? Any man who will look through the record cannot fail to be convinced that there has been a great deal of trickery going on among Conservative politicians over this whole business. So much for Mr. Bowser and Mr. McBride. Lieutenant Governor Dunsmuir, in my opinion, is the only man who has come out of the deal with clean hands, because he has never been called upon by the government to make a statement explaining why he withheld his sanction.

It would not be the part of wisdom of our government in British Columbia to pass another Natal Act ; and if the Liberal party in our local legislature were to allow such a Bill to go through, in the face of the arrangement which has been arrived at between this government and the government of Japan, they would not be acting the part of wise men and patriots. They can point to that arrangement which we have reason to believe will be entirely satisfactory. They can show the province of British Columbia that if the local legislature did pass that Natal Act, it would not keep a solitary Jap or Hindoo or other oriental from coming into our province over the border line of Alberta. Any man in Canada can travel from one part of our country to any other part, and the laws of this country will protect him in doing so. We can with perfect sincerity then declare that we are ready to give this compact a fair trial. This ought not to be a question of politics. The question before the people of British Columbia is whether or no we shall for all time prevent the influx of Asiatics. If our Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) has made such an arrangement as will for ever stop these people from coming to our country, even if the seven men supporting the government from our province should be defeated, they will have left a heritage which will for all time secure to our beautiful province the great advantage of being a country belonging to white people and settled by white people.

PRODUCTION OF ORIGINAL DOCUMENTS.

Hon. GEO. E. FOSTER (North Toronto). Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair, I would point out that the question which was raised by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) just before the orders of the day were called and which elicited an answer from the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) seems to leave some matters in doubt and it is not clear that the result has been different from that of the discussion which we had the other day with reference to the production of papers. The hon. gentleman from St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames) made a motion for the originals of certain papers. In the few observations he made asking for those papers, he gave reasons why he wanted the originals rather than copies, and he was met by the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) with a flat refusal to bring down the original documents, that refusal being based on a report of the deputy Minister of the Interior which was absolute and which recommended that in all those cases the word 'original' should be erased from the resolution calling for papers. He recommended also that in no case should any but copies be allowed to go out from the department. The minister declared his policy to be based on that report of his deputy and therefore argued, and in the end came to a conclusion satisfactory to himself, that the originals should not be brought down. I followed the Minister of the Interior and expressed my surprise that he had taken that ground, which I thought was arbitrary, uncalled for and unconstitutional and I expressed the belief that the premier would not be found to support such an announcement of policy or such a constitutional doctrine. The Prime Minister who followed me in his opening sentences affirmed his entire agreement with the Minister of the Interior in the doctrine he had laid down and expressed the greatest surprise that I should have argued to the contrary. After making more or less extended remarks, he took the position that in this case the original documents should not be brought down. The result was that the motion of my hon. friend (Mr. Ames) was negatived and so the matter stood for some days. The day before yesterday the leader of the opposition introduced a resolution in the House affirming in short that it was the undoubted right of parliament and the members of the House of Commons to see and examine the documents upon which the business of the country proceeded, provided there were no grave reasons of inconvenience and no state reasons which precluded their being brought down, and declaring also that the refusal of such information to the House would quite justify the denial of supplies to the Crown. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) read that resolution and signified his assent to it, and although it was stoutly argued against by the Minister of the Interior who flatly declared that he would not bring down these or other original documents unless he were so instructed by the House, the motion carried without a vote. I, in common with others on this side of the House, supposed that the question was definitely settled and there would be no difficulty about the documents asked for and which had not been brought down apparently under a misunderstanding of the principle at issue. When my hon. friend asked if that would be the case he was met by the unexpected reply that the papers would have to be called for in the proper way and that a proper reason would have to be given. That leaves the matter exactly where it was, which I may say was not a satisfactory position. My hon. friend in the argument he addressed to the House the last day on which this was debated,—and I will have to refer to that debate in order to make the matter clear—declared that no reason was given, and that my hon. friend from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) was arguing for and asserting the absolute right of any member of this House to call for original documents, and that if he so called the government had no right to refuse him. I think he made that argument on a misapprehension, and that after the speech of my hon. friend from St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames) had been referred to and parts of it read, my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) agreed that there were reasons given; whether sufficient or not, I do not know. There are two interpretations to that. The first interpreter, the Minister of the Interior, holds that no reason would be sufficient unless the member would say upon his honour as a member of the House that the copies brought down were different from the original documents, that there was forgery or something of that kind. I suppose the minister means that a member shall say that a document he has never seen is a forgery. If we are to accept that as the government's interpretation of what is to be a sufficient reason, it will be perfectly impossible ever to have original documents come to the members of this House. No member of this House should be put in the position of having to make that statement with reference to papers that he has not before him and if the only sufficient reason, according to the Minister of the Interior who is a member of the government and is presumably speaking for it, is that the member must state that these copies are not true to the originals, then we are debarred, as I said, from ever having papers brought down. My right hon. friend who leads the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) did not give his interpretation of the matter in quite the same categorical way, but it left it really in about the same position. He said that the reason must be a sufficient reason. what in his opinion would be a sufficient reason he did not state. He did not state whether the opinion of the government or of the minister from whose department the information was asked would govern, and we are again left entirely at sea. He did not state what he thought would be sufficient reason even although he was asked for it again and again. I endeavoured and so did other members of the House to show to my right hon. friend and to the Minister of the Interior that no further reasons or stronger reasons could be given than those that were alleged in this House by the hon. member for St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames) and in order to reinforce that I must beg the attention of the House for a short time to a review of the reasons which were given by my hon. friend from St. Antoine division

(Mr. Ames). That speech consists of two parts, one the observations he addressed to the House in asking for the papers, and the other observations that he addressed to the House at the close of the debate after the opinions of the members had been expressed.

It seems to me that the position taken by the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) the other night is one that cannot be maintained—that the reasons must be given in the first part of a member's speech and not in the latter part. It seems to me that, if anywhere in the course of a plea that a member makes for papers, he gives a sufficient reason, it is purely arbitrary, and, one may say finical, to make the assertion that they were not given at the right part of the speech. A man's plea is his plea, and you must take the whole plea together. And, taking the whole plea of the hon. member for St. Antoine together, I contend that sufficient, fair and reasonable reasons are given, and none further can be given, simply because the hon. member (Mr. Ames) cannot allege what the Minister of the Interior decides to be a reason which alone can prevail, and he does not seem to be able to find out from the First Minister what he would consider to be a sufficient reason. I find here in 'Hansard' the remarks of the hon. member for St. Antoine as follows :—

I am suprised that any objection whatever should be raised to the passage of this resolution, the subject of which has been referred to on frequent occasions in this House. The principle involved is a very simple one. It is simply that we contend that there are certain occasions when we are entitled to access to original documents.

Now, that is not an arbitrary position to take. He does not say : We contend that whenever, from caprice, with good reason or with no reason, we ask for original documents they must be produced. He says simply that we contend that there are certain occasions when we are entitled to access to original documents. He goes on :

I think it is an accepted principle of parliamentary practice that members are entitled to the fullest information upon matters which are of public concern.

No exception can be taken to that.

We who wish to investigate matters are dependent upon the government for this information. A typewritten copy——

And here is the first specific reason that my hon. friend gives :

A typewritten copy of a document does not always carry the information that is desired.

That appeals to every man's common sense—there is no use in beating that old argument over again. The statement is a truism.

There are occasions, such as have occurred several times in bringing down documents to this House, where the documents do not contain all the information which we are entitled to have.

So having stated the general fact, which nobody will quarrel with, he proceeds to supply certain instances which prove his contention :

Now, I think that the government can hardly take the ground that they are entitled to withhold the freest access to certain documents without assuming that there is some state interest which can be evoked as a justification for denying us the privilege of access to these documents

That is eminently fair. If the Minister of the Interior or the First Minister could have risen in this House and stated that there were state reasons why these documents could not be brought down, that would have ended the contention in a moment, as it did the other day in two instances, where the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) said that certain papers asked for could not be brought down because the correspondence with the British government was not completed. No one raised any objection. That contention prevailed, and was assented to without a single murmur—as it should be.

Well, there was no allegation that inconvenience would result to the department if these original documents were brought down. That was not the allegation, except as covered by the general report of the deputy Minister of the Interior. The minister himself did not say that great inconvenience would be caused to his department, or injury to the public, by bringing down these papers. Mr. Ames proceeds:

In this case it therefore seems to me that if the government wish to refuse to members of the opposition the opportunity of examining these documents that I mention they must allege that there are grave interests at stake which make it inadvisable that these documents should be seen by members of the opposition. Last year, when a debate was about to take place in this House——

And here he gives another reason :

——a return was laid on the table of the House and several members of the opposition had an opportunity of examining it. There were certain features about that return that led them to think that it would be advisable to see the original. I, for one, called at the Department of the Interior and was shown, without the slightest hesitation by the deputy minister, the originals of the returns which had been copied.

Exactly the same took place then as took place this year. My hon. friend (Mr. Ames) had called for returns and copies were brought down. When he examined these papers, he found that they did not, in some particulars, give him the information that he was after—there were certain marks, signatures, dates, and so on, which, if he could see them in the original, would give him that information. The case to-day is exactly parallel. Copies have been brought down; in reference to nine pages of these copies the hon. member for St. Antoine says that the typewritten signatures convey no information to him, that he wants to see the actual signatures of the documents. Last year, the copies presented to the House did not give the needed information. But, at that time, no question was raised as to the hon. gentleman seeing the originals. He went to the Minister of the Interior and stated his difficulty, and the Minister of the Interior, or some one in that department, said: There are the files; look at the original documents themselves. But now we shall see what took place as detailed by the member for St. Antoine.

I, for one, called at the Department of the Interior and was shown, without the slightest hesitation by the deputy minister, the originals of the returns which had been copied. By having access to these originals I obtained certain information which was of great value in discussing the question in the House.

Every hon. member knows that it was. It was developed in that case what could not have been developed by the typewritten copies—that though the House would have supposed, from the copies, that a man named Brown, said to be living in Montana, had made application for grazing leases, it was absolutely impossible for Brown to have made that application, because that letter would have had to come from Montana to the department here in less than twenty-four hours. And, as a result of this discovery, what did we find? That Brown was simply a go-between, or, worse still, that 'Brown' was simply an assumed name. For four years the department had been hunting for Brown; never could find Brown; and only by the fact that we had access to the original papers was it possible to learn that Brown was simply a cover for McGregor, and, as it turned out afterwards, McGregor was simply a cover for Adamson, and so the whole plot, the whole bad business was exposed. I think that is a reason cogent, actual, and transpiring before the members of this House in the light of day, which goes as near as possible to a case exactly similar where my hon. friend wants to see what will be shown by actual signatures. It is a perfect parallel, and a reason which I think ought to be accepted without any further comment by the government, and as a sufficient reason for founding the demand for these original copies. The member for St. Antoine says:

Therefore, the only method open to us is to ask that these original documents——

The ones he is asking for, the ones he has copies of.

—be laid on the table of the House in order that we may see them in that way. The members of the opposition have introduced some four or five resolutions asking for information regarding certain leases of timber areas in the Canadian northwest. We could not secure the passing of these orders until all reference to original documents was struck out of them. We contend——

Now what is that contention, based on that reasoning, based on those circumstances? I am trying to give everything that the member for St. Antoine said in that speech. You must take every statement he makes in connection with the context and what he is arguing for. He says:

We contend that we have a perfect right to ask for the originals, and the government must allege very good reasons to justify them in refusing us access to such papers. This motion has been drafted purely and simply to test that one question, because we consider that we have sufficient reasons for desiring to see the original applications and tenders in respect to timber berths Nos. 1107, 1108 and 1171.

There is not from the first to the last line of that plea a single assertion of that doctrine which I myself am not ready to assert, that a member may stand up without reason, from mere caprice, no matter what the government may urge against it, and demand that originals be brought down. My hon. friend made no such demand. He was arguing a case before this House, a special case, and these are the reasons that he gave for it and these are the arguments which I think ought to have prevailed. Now I go further, to the close of the debate. I am not going to read the whole of his remarks for I do not think it is necessary. But I will read this essential part of it, specially because the Prime Minister said, or I understand him to have intimated, that if the reasons which were given in the closing part of the remarks of the member for St. Antoine had been given in the earlier stages, no objection would have been raised. I have already dealt with that. It does not seem to be essential that the reasons should be given at any particular stage, if they are given at the time the member is requesting the information he is desirous of getting.

I want to see something about the applications and tenders in connection with certain timber limits; I am not going to allege what I believe with reference to these timber limits at this particular time. It is my right in the House to ask this information to be placed where I can see it, and in due time I will give all the information I have with reference to these limits, in a form that will quite satisfy the Minister of the Interior. Here is the return we have been speaking about; it contains 453 pages. I have read that return from cover to cover. Now, there are nine pages of that return which can be illumined if I may see the originals.

There is his reason.

As to all the other pages, the copies are all I want.

He is not after something to make work for or to worry the government. Out of the 455 pages he wants the originals of only nine pages.

As to all the other pages the copies are all I want. But there are nine pages there with respect to which the copy does not tell me all I want to know, or which I have the right to know, if I understand my rights in this House of Commons.

Well, I think I may read what intervenes, because it shows again that the Minister of the Interior is still holding to his first position.

Mr. OLIVER. Does my hon. friend say that these nine pages differ from the originals?

That is still in the minister's head; that is the one sufficient reason in his mind; the member for St. Antoine must absolutely say that these nine pages are different in the copy from what they are in the original or else he won't get the papers.

Mr. OLIVER. Does my hon. friend say that these nine pages differ from the originals?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. How could he tell unless he sees the original?

Mr. AMES. I say that these nine pages will in all probability clear up certain doubts which I have regarding peculiar features in connection with some of these transactions; I say that the handwriting of some of these nine pages may have a very important bearing on the case. The hon. gentleman for Yale-Cariboo made an argument in this House to the effect that a man's title to his timber limits might be involved because these papers may be lost. In the first place the minister can take any precaution he likes to see that these papers when they are laid before this House are properly safeguarded; ten minutes will suffice me to look them through; he can have them back in ten minutes in his department if he wants them. What I am asking for is not the original lease which has been passed between the various owners of these timber limits and the government; that is the official document in which the rights of the lessees have been set forth. What I am asking for are three applications made for timber limits and six tenders in connection with timber limits, in all nine documents, nine pages. Is that a very enormous amount of work for the department to produce these nine pages? Is it running an enormous risk to leave these nine pages here for half an hour, so that I and possibly one or two other members may see them? Is there any great hardship entailed upon the department or any one else to gratify my right to see these papers as a member of this House? The argument which the minister has made falls to the ground in this respect. Adopt any method you like, move any amendment you want, but establish the principle that when we on this side of the House have what we consider good and sufficient reason we may have the right to see an original document, or else, be prepared to take the odium throughout the country that you do not wish an original document to come to light. That is all I have to say. I simply wish that the question be brought to a vote in order to ascertain whether the government shall take upon themselves to declare, that when a member of this House has what he considers to be a good and sufficient reason, there is no way open for him to see an original document such as this.

Now, I think that shows the matter as plainly and as reasonably as it possibly can be shown. Where then are we on this subject? Has the government acceded to a resolution which the Prime Minister says is reasonable? That resolution is pretty inclusive. It is not an unguarded resolution. It is not just a bald assertion of right to these things without any reason being given, it is not that at all, but it is:

> Subject to such considerations of public policy as can be validly urged in any case it is the undoubted right of the peoples' representatives in parliament assembled to be informed of everything necessary to explain the policy and proceedings of the government, and for that purpose to have an opportunity of seeing and examining all documents connected with the transaction of public business; and the denial of such right by the government justifies the refusal by this House of further supplies to the Crown.

Has this House assented to it? Has the First Minister marked it with his approval? Does it mean any thing? Then what have we in the resolution? Is it words in the mouth with no substance, is it simply a holding up of the screen that the public may see the words written upon it while behind the screen the same refusal continues and the same indisposition to show original documents when reasons are given? What does it say? If you can show considerations of public policy, if you can urge any that can be validly urged the case drops to the ground, but if you cannot you cannot refuse to give us these documents. The Prime Minister has declared this resolution to be proper. He has instructed his followers to vote for it. They were denied the right to vote against it. He and we stand on exactly the same ground. Now, if we cannot have these nine pages what are the considerations of the public policy that can be validly urged in this case? We have not heard any. That resolution is the only guard that the government has. When a member gets up and wants original papers under that resolution and gives his reason therefor as either that they are necessary in order to illumine what he has in his hand, or to explain what he has in typewritten copy, then the onus is upon the government to state the considerations of public policy that can be validly urged in that case, and if none can be urged and none are urged the resolution says, the Prime Minister says, both sides of this House say that the undoubted right of the people's representatives in parliament assembled is to get this information. The Prime Minister says, this House agrees and we all say that if it is not given supply may be denied to the Crown. That is just where we are on this question and I invite the Prime Minister to take into consideration the words which I have placed calmly before the House and in as cool and collected a manner as I could. Without adding another word or a single plea to it I have just tried to put a plain statement of this case before the House and I submit it now to the Prime Minister as to whether or not the case is not clear and these nine pages might not better be put down on the table of the House.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). This, Mr. Speaker, is a very plain matter and I am surprised really at the efforts—I will not say efforts because I do not want to be offensive ; I want to speak of this matter in the same spirit as my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) has done—but I am surprised at the mountains which my hon. friend has made out of mole hills with reference to this question. It seems to me to be a very simple one. I stated the other day and I repeat again that the House is entitled to the fullest information upon any thing which any hon. member thinks, in the discharging of his duty, he must obtain. As to the broad principle that is not new ; it has been in existence ever since there has been parliamentary government in this country and in the motherland, but my hon. friend knows, and he knows as well as I do, that there is a proper way for a member to enforce his rights. I call the attention of the House first of all to the motion which was moved the other day by the hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine (Mr. Ames). He moved :

For a return laying upon the table of this House the original applications and tenders in respect of timber berths 1107, 1108, and 1171.

That was the bare motion which was made before the House without a word of explanation. I do not mean to say that the explanation should have been in the motion, but I call the attention of the House now to the question as to what we are to understand to be the purport and intention of the hon. member when he put such a bare motion before the House. I again call the attention of the House to the words which I read a moment ago.

Mr. FOSTER. Does my right hon. friend argue that a motion for papers must state the reasons therefor ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No, I do not say that.

Mr. AMES. May I ask, does the right hon. gentleman recollect that I stated that I had followed exactly the course that the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) suggested I should follow in a written communication to me ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not know that I recollect everything that was said by my hon. friend but I recollect very well the closing remarks of my hon. friend and they were to this effect :

We contend that we have a perfect right to ask for the originals and the government must allege very good reasons to justify them in refusing us access to such papers. This motion has been drafted purely and simply to test that one question.

What are we to understand from that language ? We have the bare motion before us. We ask for the originals, we contend that we have the right to ask for the originals and we have drafted this motion in order to test that one right. Well, Sir, there was only one conclusion to draw from this and that was that it was open to any member of the House to ask for any originals without giving any reasons at all. The hon. gentleman gave reasons in his speech but if I understood him aright he did not rely upon the reasons which he did give but he simply said that we have the right to ask for originals as well as for copies. This was a statement to which we could not agree. We thought that if the originals were to be presented some substantial reasons should be presented for that course, but the hon. gentleman rested his case upon the proposition that we had to have the originals put before the House whether there were reasons given for it or no reasons given for it.

Mr. FOSTER. Does my right hon. friend found that upon any thing he can quote?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes, I found this upon the very words which I have just read and I will read them again :

We contend that we have a perfect right to ask for the originals and the government must allege very good reasons to justify them in refusing us access to such papers. This motion has been drafted purely and simply to test that one question.

Mr. FOSTER. That is in the concluding part of the hon. member's first speech ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. That was an observation made by my hon. friend (Mr. Ames) after he had made his whole argument for the production of original papers on this one case and given his reasons why he needed them in this one case.

Mr. LENNOX. And the hon. gentleman said :

This motion has been drafted purely and simply to test that one question.

And he stops there but the sentence does not stop there :

This motion has been drafted purely and simply to test that one question, because we consider that we have sufficient reasons for desiring to see the original applications and tenders in respect to the timber berths Nos. 1107, 1108 and 1171.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. What he contended was: We have sufficient reasons, but we do not rely upon these sufficient reasons; we rely upon the naked right that we can ask for originals instead of copies and this motion has been simply drafted to test that question. That is the way he put it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Suppose he did put it upon the naked right in the first instance, then the right hon. gentleman required reasons, and then in his concluding speech my hon. friend (Mr. Ames) did give reasons and the motion should have been adopted.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. And what would have been the consequence? Had this motion passed then it would have been competent for any member hereafter to say: Oh, there is a precedent. He would say no reasons were given on this occasion why the originals should be brought down and no reasons need be given in future. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Ames) said: we want to test our right that we have the power to compel the House to order originals to be produced whether there are reasons given or not. That is why we could not comply with the motion.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Would it not have been competent for a member of the government, my right hon. friend himself for instance, assuming he is right in his contention, to have risen and said: There were not sufficient reasons given in the first instance and therefore we deny the motion, but there are now sufficient reasons given and we will allow the motion to pass.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. When the government has taken the position that a motion as made should not pass, it is not right or fair for hon. gentlemen to change their grounds afterwards and substitute other grounds.

M. R. L. BORDEN. Why should we discuss these things at all then?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. In order to get light which unfortunately we do not always receive from gentlemen on the other side. The other day the leader of the opposition brought forward a motion which was a pure truism and we agreed at once to this motion, but that was not discussing the one point which had been discussed before, namely: is it allowable under the rules of the House for any member without giving any reason whatever to compel the production of the records of any department on the table of the House? That is a thing which we cannot allow, and we have defined our position in that respect. But I have simply to say that if the hon. member, or any other member brings his motion—we have for instance a motion from the hon. member from Qu'Appelle—the moment reasons are given, the moment the hon. member says for example: I want the originals because I cannot do justice to the case without it, I have not the information in the copy which the original would give me; that would be sufficient reason.

Mr. FOSTER. And that reason has been given.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. We want hon. gentlemen to understand that if they want to establish the precedent that they will compel the government to bring down originals, simply upon their ipsi dixit, without satisfying the House that there is reason for it, that cannot be done. The moment they will make a demand which is legitimate, fair and reasonable the rules of the House will be applied as they have always been.

Mr. AMES. May I make that demand now with reference to these nine documents?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Certainly; my hon. friend can move for the papers whenever he wants to.

Mr. AMES. I cannot do justice to the case, I have not the information in the copies. I can say that. May I have the nine documents?

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). When my hon. friend from St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames) moved some days ago for the original papers in connection with applications for leases of certain timber berths in the Northwest Territories the right hon. the First Minister objected to the motion on the ground that no reasons were assigned why these originals should be brought down. Well, Mr. Speaker, let me give my experience in this House for over thirty years. During all that time I never before heard of a reason being required before a motion calling for the production of either original papers or copies was acceded to. One of the first motions that I made in the House was for the bringing down of some papers concerning the postmastership in the town of Lanark. I prefaced my motion by some remarks and was brought to task by the then Postmaster General, a colleague of the right hon. gentleman, for discussing the matter before the papers came down. The right hon. gentleman claims that those who move for papers should give reasons why they require them. That, Sir, has not been the custom in this House either when calling for originals or copies, and we have today the admission of the government that a copy is in the same position as an original. If a member moves for the original papers, there is nothing to prevent any minister from asking why he requires them, nor is there anything to prevent a minister from pointing out that there was some reason in the public interest why the demand should not be granted. The responsibility of giving reasons does not rest upon the party making the motion, but it rests upon those who refuse to produce the papers to give sufficient reasons to justify their refusal. They can assign their reasons at the time the motion is made, or even after the motion has been carried, the minister responsible may declare that for reasons of state or some other valid reasons, in the interests of good government, it is not proper that the papers should be brought down. And I have never yet heard when a good reason has been given for the non-production of papers any objection expressed by the opposition to that refusal. We have had some extraordinary doctrines laid down by the other side regarding this particular matter. I am not at liberty to refer to a past debate, but let me put an analogous and hypothetical case. Suppose that when a motion was made for the production of papers in the British House of Commons, a minister of the Crown should rise and declare that he stood in that House as the protector of the interests of the people and on that ground refused to accede to the motion. Just fancy a minister of the Crown in England declaring that he and not the British parliament was the guardian of the people's interests. Such a contention would be ridiculed in any other free assembly than the present one. And then just fancy a British minister justifying his course by reading to the House the opinion of one of the officers of his department, stating that in the interests of the department and of the country parliament had no right to the papers called for and ought not to be given them. Let these officials know, or if they do not, let me tell them that if they will not be punished at present, there is a time coming when they shall answer for any such conduct, for such conduct is a breach of the rights and privileges of parliament. An official in any of the government departments is an officer of this House for the production of these papers. He is obliged to bring down every paper ordered by the House. He can neither add to nor subtract from them, and he is bound to see that they are delivered to this House. He may deliver them through his minister, but that is not at all obligatory. When an order of the House is issued, he is obliged to obey it, and it is a gross breach of the privileges of this House for any official to dare adivse his minister either to limit the right of parliament or refuse an order of parliament. What has the parliament of Great Britain and of every other free country been fighting for the last hundred or couple of hundred years? It is the right to review every expenditure, the right to see every particular connected with it, independent of the refusal of the minister or any one else. That right is one which has been acquired by the people of this country, and it is one we intend to maintain. Here is my hon. friend from St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames) moving for the production of certain papers. His motion was rejected by this House. But afterwards, when the motion was made to go into supply, the principle which my hon. friend propounded was unanimously adopted as the correct one. How is he to get the papers other than by moving for them? He moved that they be brought down. That motion was rejected. Then, on motion to go into supply, he asked in the most modest manner that they be produced. What other way could we adopt? He could not make another motion for these same papers, because you, Mr. Speaker, would rule it out of order on the ground that a similar motion had been rejected already. The only possible way, therefore, in which he could obtain these papers was by the unanimous consent of the House to his request for them on his motion to go into supply. That request is refused by the First Minister. What then is my hon. friend to do? The ridiculous contention was made by some of these hon. gentlemen opposite the other day that we could make a charge, have that charge referred to a special committee, and that committee could have the papers produced before it. But we heard no more about the ridiculous contention that original papers cannot be brought down on a motion. I was prepared to show that in hundreds of cases originals have been produced on motions for returns. Again and again have motions been made in this House for the production of papers and these papers have been brought down and afterwards referred to special committees. There is no other way of getting the original papers unless by the ordinary motion made at the beginning of each session that everything relating to public accounts and the Auditor General's Report should be placed at the disposal of the Public Accounts Committee. Outside of that order, we have no means, except through the ordinary course of a motion of calling for the production of papers. And if the papers are of sufficient importance, they are referred to one of the standing committees for the purpose of inquiry. I am glad to see that parliament has, by a unanimous vote, vindicated its incontestable right to the control of all public documents except those which it may not be advisable to produce in the interests of the country, such, for instance, as the reports by special officers with reference to particular subjects or negotiations with reference to treaties. It is advisable in the interest of the country that they should be produced and they are always produced. It is amusing to hear democrats of the type of the right hon. gentleman attacking the rights of this parliament. I was in this House when the right hon. gentleman and his then leader insisted on the production for the use of the Public Accounts Committee of certain papers that were refused by Sir John A. Macdonald for the reason that their production might cause the death of parties interested. We all remember that when a certain amount was voted for the purpose of secret service and was expended to secure the most secret information into the affairs of this country, the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues at that time insisted on the production of these papers, and when my leader at that time suggested that the then leader of the opposition and a couple of other gentlemen should be appointed to examine the papers, they said that any expenditure on behalf of the people of this country should be open to examination through the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. SPROULE. They demanded the right in connection with the secret service.

Mr. HAGGART. Yes, but now their opinions are entirely changed. They rule the country, they stand for the people. As the minister said : I stand here for the purpose of protecting the people of this country and looking after their interests and I will defend them against even a request of the parliament of Canada. What an extraordinary position for a minister to take ! I would like the right hon. gentleman to explain to me why it is taken. Mr. Ames thinks that it is in the interest of the people that certain original applications or tenders for timber limits should be produced ; these papers are refused, the right hon. gentleman, instead of at once consenting, as he ought to, refuses to produce them, on the ground that sufficient reason was not given for their production. That is no reason whatever. The right hon. gentleman should be prepared to give a reason for not producing the papers. The motion for the production of papers has been a matter of form and I never heard of a minister asking the reason why papers should be produced. I have again and again heard reasons why particular parts of papers should be refused in the interest of the country, but never before have I heard a refusal of a request for copies of papers or originals unless a reason was assigned for it. One of the first motions I heard in this House was by an old friend of mine who wanted papers in reference to a dispute between Ontario and Quebec as to boundaries. The answer was that the papers were not in the possession of the government. That was not a sufficient reason ; if papers are necessary and ought to be in the possession of the government it is the duty of the government to see that they have copies of them or that they are in their possession. The motion was finally withdrawn on the ground that it was for the purpose of furnishing evidence in a private suit and the answer was that the litigants in that suit could obtain possession of them through orders of the court. The principle cannot be admitted that only such original papers as the minister chooses shall be produced to this House ; this House has a right to order the production of the papers moved for by Mr. Ames. Is a minister of the Crown by the simple statement that it is an original paper, to be permitted to refuse its production ? It is a right which the people of Great Britain obtained from the Crown and which every self-colony in the empire has inherited and such a right is not to be trampled upon because a minister thinks that the papers should not be produced. The right hon. gentleman and the government had better make up their minds that these papers must be produced in order that the gentleman may examine them.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Mr. Speaker, I wish to give my understanding of the duties and rights of members of parliament, apart from the duties of the government. Members of the government have certain duties individually but parliament has also duties no less important than those of the government. Parliament has rights no less important than the rights of Ministers of the Crown. We are sent here for a special purpose by the people. We are sent here to legislate upon lines that will give good government to the country, to see that the money of the country is properly raised and properly expended and that a full return is secured to the country for every dollar of expenditure. It is therefore our duty to inquire whether the affairs of the country are conducted on right lines, whether the money voted by parliament has been expended according to the appropriations made that it has been properly expended, that it has gone through the right channels and that we have received a proper return for it. It is also our duty to inquire into other lines of administration. This imposes on us the necessity of obtaining information from different sources. We obtain information in the first place by questions asked of ministers of the Crown, which they are in duty bound to answer as far as possible, and in the second place, by moving for papers, correspondence, &c.

It also becomes necessary for us to go into the departments to carry on our search. It is the absolute right of a member to go to a department and examine documents, unless the government can give reasons of state—as, for instance, the incompleteness of negotiations—why those documents should not be shown. It is the undoubted right of every member of parliament, a right which inheres in a member by reason of his election by his constituency to represent the people of Canada in this House. This is a right we enjoy by usage, and practice, copied from the practice followed by the mother of parliaments, upon which this parliament is modelled. Now, we are told that we must give a reason before we can be allowed to examine original documents. We are put in about the same position as when one must swear out an information to have a person arrested. I have never understood that that was our position; and I believe that in my understanding of the matter I am supported by the ablest parliamentarians in the world. We are not called upon to give reasons; we have the right, upon suspicion or whatever other grounds we think sufficient, to examine documents, unless there are reasons of state to the contrary. This right, which belongs to every member of parliament, should be maintained by parliament and by every individual member of it. It is a right that is doubly valuable to the opposition, because upon them is laid the special duty of criticism. It is not a right which hon. members on the other side seem to value very highly; they seem to think that their highest privilege is to vote according to the wish of the government—to defeat motions made by the opposition and to carry those made by the government. But we recognize a higher duty devolving upon us, and to discharge that duty, and to fulfil our functions as members of this House, we must claim the privileges which belong to us.

One of the most important duties of the House of Commons is to see to it that the money voted for the public service of Canada is expended for the purpose for which it is voted. In carrying out this duty, as I have said, we need access to the documents in the departments. Another means of making that inquiry is through the Public Accounts Committee. Everything between the lids of the Auditor General's Report for the year previous is referred to that committee. It is the right of members there to move that accounts, letters papers, correspondence and vouchers be laid before the committee—not copies, but the documents themselves; and we have a right to examine these to our heart's content. And, if we are not satisfied, we have the right to ask the committee to subpœna those who can give us information concerning the matters in question. These may be private citizens; they may be officials in the departments; they may be contractors or even ministers of the Crown. And when these parties come before us, we have the right to question and cross-question them, like witnesses before a court, and to have the original documents in our hands to guide us in that examination. So, we have the right to make inquiry along these lines: First, by moving for documents; second, by examining original documents in the departments of government; third, by asking to have documents submitted to the Committee on Public Accounts; and, fourth, by asking to have parties brought before that committee for examination. Whether the parties so summoned belong to parliament or not, they may be required to attend that committee. We have summoned managers of banks to bring bank cheques for our scrutiny. It was by taking this course that we found out certain facts with regard to the North Atlantic Trading Company, facts which would not have been made known if copies of these cheques had been submitted. We found that the $60,000 of public money paid to the Arundel Printing Company was divided into three parts, evidently intended for three different parties. Cheques were endorsed by the individuals who got the money. The banks in which these cheques were cashed had to bring down the cheques. Take another case—not timber lands, with which we are now dealing, but coal lands. Thousands and thousands of acres of coal lands belonging to the public were alienated. Had we examined only copies of the documents, we should have learned nothing except that certain parties had applied for different portions of this coal area, but an examination of the originals showed that these applications were put in by one individual, names being put in by him merely of his own motion—absolute and undoubted forgeries. These applications were put in by the same individual at the same time, and, undoubtedly fraudulently put in. In view of such cases, I say that parliament would be doing less than its duty if it gave up this right of examination. This right belongs to parliament; it is not the gift of the government; it is not within the power of any minister to exclude members of parliament from his department. I have been in this House for thirty years, and, until within the last few years, I have never been refused access to public documents. I have gone over thousands of letters and other documents in the files of the different departments, all handed to me without a word of dissent. The first time I ever was refused was after this government came into power. I went into the Department of the Interior to look at certain documents. The deputy minister told me, in a very courteous manner, that he was forbidden to allow these documents to be seen. I said: 'I do not blame you, but I do blame the one who was ignorant enough, or malicious enough, to give you such instructions.' For such instructions were given in clear defiance of the right which belongs to a member of this parliament. In another case, I was refused access to documents in the Post Office Department. In this case, it was a mere question of some paltry mail contract—a matter of $50 or so for carrying the mail on a certain route, under a contract that had been going on for some time. And yet the member representing that riding was denied the right of looking into that to see who was carrying the mail, who were the tenderers, and whether the contract was given to the lowest tenderer. Is not that tyrannical on the part of a minister of the Crown ? It is, and should not be allowed by this House, and the opposition would be doing less than their duty if they allowed one dollar of the estimates to pass this House until they are given in the fullest manner the right they are entitled to exercise under their prerogative as members of parliament. I say the government cannot stand on the flimsy excuse that you must give a reason—as if you were swearing out an information against a supposed criminal. We have no right to give such a reason ; it is the government's duty, if circumstances warrant, that, for certain state or other justifiable reasons, they cannot grant our request now. It is not the duty of a member of parliament to give reasons why he demands to see documents, but it is for the government to give reasons why they refuse it, because under all ordinary circumstances they are obliged to concede the request, and when they refuse it is for them to justify their refusal. I have been in this House for many years, and I never, until the last few years, saw such a right denied to members of parliament. I consider it high-handed, tyrannical and arbitrary ; it is not consonant with the principles of constitutional government as it has been carried on in Canada from confederaiton to the present time. Parliament would be making a retrograde step if we allowed ourselves to be deprived of that right, a right that belongs to the representatives of the people, and we could not justify our conduct when we went back to the people who elected us, if we by our laches, abandoned it. What do we find this session, and last session ? Why, Sir, that every avenue of information is closed to us. They say this is a fishing expedition. Well, of necessity it is a fishing expedition. They say, when you go to the Public Accounts Committee you undertake an inquisitorial expedition. I say of necessity it is so, it must be so. We are denied the right of having original documents brought down, and we are shut out of that channel. We are denied the right to go into the departments and examine the files, therefore we are shut out of that channel likewise. When we go to the Public Accounts Committee and summon parties before us, and have them sworn to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and when we put a question to him which would reveal the information we desire to get, and have a right to get, some member of the government says : Don't answer that question. Then we appeal to the chairman of the committee to know if the witness is not obliged to answer the question, and he says : No, he need not answer it if he does not wish. Then we appeal to the committee over the head of the chairman, and by a partisan majority the committee votes, almost every time, to sustain the ruling of the chair. Now what other avenue of information have we got ? We are denied the right to examine the witness, we are denied the right to examine the files, we are denied the right to have the original documents brought down for parliament to examine. How then can parliament get the information ? Why, Sir, parliament is shorn of its most valuable right, the functions of parliament are paralysed. It is time the electorate of this country should know that we are turning parliament into a farce, and that the members cannot do their duty by reason of the high-handed tyranny of the government, who are exercising a control that no government in any constitutional country in the world should be allowed to exercise. I am sure the people will sustain us in the stand we are taking, even if we held this parliament for six months until we obtain the concession of that right.

Mr. H. LENNOX (South Simcoe). For once I can agree pretty well with the attitude of the leader of the government, but not with his attitude of to-day. I can entirely agree with his position of two days ago. I read the resolution proposed by the leader of the opposition, and I couple it with the language of the right hon. gentleman who leads the House. Now we have to bear these two points in mind, namely, that the leader of the opposition thought it necessary to fortify that resolution by argument; but the leader of the government went further, and he said, 'That is a truism, you can take that without qualification or suggestion of doubt.' Let us for a moment examine the language of that resolution. I do not ask the leader of the government to go one iota beyond the language of that resolution, but I do say that to-day he should not right-about-face. Forty-eight hours after we passed that resolution, after he had adopted it without reservation, after he had stated that it was a truism manifest beyond all question, we find him going back upon what he said, and turning about, and saying that he will not produce the documents. Sir, it is the most extraordinary change I ever saw, even for this government. We have had marvellous instances of rapid changes of policy on the part of this government. The policy of 1893 has been abandoned, the promises the hon. gentlemen made before they came into power have all been abandoned, but it took some time. But now, two days after the right hon. gentleman, in the presence of his own followers, stated that he subscribed to every sentence of this resolution, he stands up in the House and says that he will not follow the resolution which he himself counted a truism. Now what does this resolution say? I leave out the exception for a moment, because I wish to draw attention to it in another way. It says:

Subject to such considerations of public policy as can be validly urged in any case.

I leave that out. The main proposition, and what the leader of the government subscribed to is:

It is the undoubted right of the people's representatives, in parliament assembled, to be informed of everything necessary to explain the policy and proceedings of the government, and for that purpose to have an opportunity of seeing and examining all documents connected with the transaction of public business.

That is what we demanded on the 13th day of this month; that is what the hon. member for St. Antoine Division (Mr. Ames) demanded, and that is what was refused until the 21st day of this month, and that is what the right hon. gentleman, the leader of this government then asserted was a truism. It was subject to this qualification:

Subject to such considerations of public policy as can be validly urged in any case.

Has the right hon. gentleman to-day urged any consideration of public policy as an objection to producing these papers? He says to the hon. gentleman who moved the motion: Move it again. If he did so he would be met by the rule that this matter cannot be brought up a second time in the same session and by the new rule of to-day, that you cannot shift your ground and if you cannot shift your ground during the argument; and if the government has ascertained that there was good cause for refusing surely it would not be any better if he moved it to-morrow, or next day or at any other time. The right hon. gentleman has admitted the absolute right to the examination of papers subject to the considerations of public policy that can be validly urged and what further dose he say:

And the denial——

I hope the right hon. gentleman will consider this well.

——of such right by the government justifies the refusal of this House of further supplies to the Crown.

Has the right hon. gentleman changed his mind? He said on the 21st of this month that we had the right to the papers subject to the considerataion of public policy which could be urged by the government as a sufficient justification for the refusal and if they were refused it was the duty of the opposition to refuse the supplies to be granted to the Crown. What is the right hon. gentleman up against? Does he want the supplies? Has he concluded that if we pass the estimates the government has been managed in such a way that hon. gentleman could not borrow money now? What is the reason the right hon. gentleman takes the position that he does to-day? What was the right hon. gentleman's attitude on the 13th? That was an unlucky day for them. They had to back down on the 21st and why do they take a different position to-day? The meaning of the right hon. gentleman was plain on the 21st—because the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) kicked against it right then. He would not show the documents and so it comes to this suggestion: Is the right hon. gentleman unable to control his own cabinet? Is the Minister of the Interior still kicking? Does he refuse to abide by the promise made and the policy enunciated by the right hon. gentleman on the 21st of this month? It looks very much as if he did. Is the Minister of the Interior sulking? He was in a few moments ago; he has gone out; I think he is afraid probably that the right hon. gentleman is about to yield to some of the reasons suggested why the documents should be produced. I do not know. What did the right hon. gentleman say on the 13th? He said:

In this House members have always been given the latitude to move for papers without being asked for their reasons——

Mark that.

——it being presumed that since members move for papers they have good reasons for doing so, and the information is always brought down.

That is true, we say, to-day. Why has the right hon. gentleman changed his position on that? As he went on with his argument he saw that probably he should make a qualification and so he said, before he closed: Let the hon. gentleman give his reasons and there will be no difficulty; the papers will be brought down. Well, the hon. gentleman gave his reasons. I submit that he had given them before that in the debate, but at all events, in the closing of his argument the hon. gentleman who moved the motion certainly did give reasons. What does the right hon. gentleman say to-day? He changes his attitude again. He says: He did not give them at the right time, it is too late if he gives them subsequently. He cannot shift his ground—says the right hon. gentleman—the reasons subsequently given will not do; but then, in the same breath, he says: Put another notice of motion on the paper, argue the matter again, give us your reasons and then the papers will be brought down. Then, of course, as is suggested to me and as I said a few moments ago, he will be ruled out. Now I have other complaints to make against the right hon. gentleman who leads the House. Not only has he shifted his ground but he has not been fair in his quotations and in what he tried to fasten upon the hon. gentleman who moved this motion. If there is any one in the House who, more than another, should be careful when he quotes, to quote exactly, surely it should be, the leader of the House. What did the right hon. gentleman do? And this is not the first time that he quoted too little in this very debate as I shall show. He reads this:

> We contend that we have a perfect right to ask for the originals, and the government must allege very good reasons to justify them in refusing us access to such papers. This motion has been drafted purely and simply to test that one question——

And the right hon. gentleman stopped there. The right hon. gentleman was stating that this was not a bona fide motion for a specific purpose but that it was an abstract question to test a principle and he stopped at the very point that would have proved the fallacy of his argument and he stopped in the middle of a sentence. It is bad enough to leave out a portion of the context but it is ten times worse to leave off a portion of a sentence and that is what the right hon. gentleman did upon this occasion. The sentence reads this way and if it is read in full it shows that the hon. gentleman who moved for the papers was not moving in support of any abstract proposition but that he was moving to get specific papers for a specific purpose. The argument going before shows abundantly his reasons for making the motion. He points out the steps he has taken that he has applied to the department, that he has been refused, that he has written to the minister that the minister writes back saying to him to take a specific course, to make his motion in the House and then the House will have the responsibility of ordering the production of these papers. The hon. gentleman does that and he points out that upon a previous occasion upon investigation in the department he had got such information as led to valuable discoveries that could not be ascertained from the mere printed copies. He points out that in this case the production of the printed copies will not enable him to accomplish the object he has in view in testing this matter, and he concludes by saying that he considers he has a right to these papers and that:

> This motion has been drafted purely and simply to test that one question, because we consider that we have sufficient reasons for desiring to see the original applications and tenders in respect to timber berths Nos. 1107, 1108 and 1171.

So, if the right hon. gentleman had given the whole quotation, instead of proving his proposition it would have proved, as it does prove, exactly the reverse—that this was not a fishing expedition but a specific motion in reference to one transaction and for the specific purpose of getting nine documents that the hon. gentleman desired to see. The hon. gentleman who moved the motion afterwards in his reply stated more particularly the reasons why he required the production of these documents. Will the right hon. gentleman who leads this House, will any of his followers say, on fair consideration of this matter, that it matters one iota whether the reasons are given in the first speech, or the second speech or the fifth speech or the last speech made in support of the motion?

An honest government—I won't say an honest premier because he is controlled by the kicking gentleman from the west, a government desirous of adapting itself to the necessities of the case as they arise would make no bones as to whether the argument came in at the first or the last; they would be only too glad to say: 'at the beginning of the debate the hon. gentleman did not advance reasons why this should be done, but now reasons have been advanced by him and others and we will bring down the papers. The government would have been clothing themselves with honour in doing that; they have not clothed themselves with anything approaching honour in refusing the papers. The beginning of this difficulty lies in the arbitrary position taken by the Minister of the Interior. He decides, and so instructs his deputy minister and his subordinates, that we are not to be allowed to go into the department and examine the documents upon file there, and he says that unless we take the responsibility of charging a fraud or a forgery—unless we in effect institute a criminal charge —we are not to have permission to examine the documents. I take the position definitely, (and I am fortified by authority) that the members of the opposition in this House are not in the position of public prosecutors but in the position of investigators; that we are auditors on behalf of the people, that these are the peoples' documents, that the people would have the right to come here and examine them, and that they delegate to us the duty of examining them on their behalf. Not only is it an absolutely unqualified right in us, but if we think the interests of the country will be advanced thereby it is the imperative duty of every member of this House, whether upon the one side or the other, to examine from time to time the public records; all of which should be constantly open to the people's representatives. I notice that when the Prime Minister the other day refused this motion, he read quotations from Todd, and I am sorry that the right hon. gentleman in reading the quotations stopped short of giving their full purport to the House. The right hon. gentleman read from page 453 of Todd:

> It is the rule of parliament that no papers shall be laid on the table of either House unless some sufficient reasons have been stated for their production.

There the right hon. gentleman stopped the quotation, but the quotation continues :

It is irregular to move for the production of papers merely to further the interests or views of private persons, or except for the purpose of founding or facilitating parliamentary proceedings.

We admit all that, when the whole sentence is read. We admit it would be improper for hon. gentlemen to move for private ends and for private purposes or merely to gratify a whim, but that does not meet such a case as this where an hon. member goes to the department in the discharge of his parliamentary duty, asks to be allowed to examine the records, is refused and is told by the minister to apply in another way, and in good faith acts upon the suggestion of the minister, and comes into this House and makes his motion and informs the government that out of the 450 pages of the document he only requires nine pages in order to satisfy himself as to the bona fides of the transaction. The law is this, as contained in Todd, page 439:

It is imperative that parliament shall be duly informed of everything that may be necessary to explain the policy and proceedings of government in any part of the empire, and the fullest information is communicated by government to both Houses from time to time upon all matters of public concern.

That is a broad proposition and without any qualification I demand it on behalf of the people whom I represent. I demand it on behalf of the people of Canada, I demand it on behalf of the representative institutions of this country, and I say definitely and distinctly that the refusal of that right is an outrage upon the people of Canada. On the next page of Todd we find the exceptions, including the exception that is engrafted upon the motion of the leader of the opposition which is :

Considerations of public policy, and a due regard to the interests of the state occasionally demand, however, that information sought for by members of the legislature should be withheld at the discretion and upon the general responsibility of ministers.

I quite admit that. Nobody on this side of the House will insistently demand the papers if the government will say there is any question of public policy which renders it inexpedient that these papers shall be produced. Following that we have this proposition in Todd:

But it must always be remembered that all public transactions of state are necessarily official; and that no public officer would be justified in withholding from official record and access——

Mark you the word 'access.'

Mr. LENNOX.

From official record and access any document emanating from himself in his official capacity, in relation to public affairs.

It was said the other day, and I was amazed at the statement, that the endorsement on a record of the date of its receipt was not part of the record. A more absolutely false position cannot be imagined. A position which would be surrounded with greater danger could not be advanced than that when these gentlemen bring down copies of documents they can suppress the date of the receipt endorsed on them. Their contention is that the date of the receipt is not on it at the time the man wrote it, that it was written by the minister or the official of the government, and in one case when after searching through records and ultimately getting the originals by hook or crook—because we could not get them in the ordinary way from the government —it was pointed out that the endorsation was missing, the answer was : It is not part of the record. One more quotation from Todd, and here again the right hon. gentleman in quoting the other day failed to give the whole story. He quoted as follows:

When copies of correspondence, &c., are moved for by private members it is customary to add 'or extracts,' leaving to ministers a discretion as to despatches which it may be advisable to lay before parliament, and as to those which it may be expedient, in whole or in part, to withhold.

Has that anything to do with the proposition before the House to-day? It is not a question of whether they are to be copies or originals. When, in 1869, in the British parliament, a motion was passed to bring down the record regarding the Fenian Raid, and when, after examining the papers, it was found inexpedient in the public interest that all those papers should be brought down, it was then decided that portions would have to be withheld. But there was no question of original documents or copies. The question was simply whether the whole or only a part of the record should be brought down. Thus the whole case is taken out of its context and made to do service for an entirely different purpose. I regret exceedingly that the right hon. gentleman has seen fit to make this complete right about face on this occasion. I venture to say that when this matter is analysed, the general feeling of the country will be that no more specific, absolute change of face has ever been executed by any public man than has been by the right hon. gentleman who, after subscribing without qualification to the motion of the leader of the opposition—in fact, subscribing to it with gusto, because he said it embodies a truism—now reverses that position, for what reason I know not. Whether the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) be the cause of that reversal or not, the right hon. gentleman certainly stands in a position to-day that cannot fail to throw great discredit upon him in the country.

Mr. S. BARKER (East Hamilton). I understand that the right hon. the First Minister rests the position he takes entirely on practice and procedure. He has treated this case as if, in the recognized practice of parliament, there has been some distinction made between production of copies and originals. But I have not heard one word cited by the right hon. gentleman in support of that contention. He certainly cannot find any support in the practice of our own House. Let me refer to the Order Papers of to-day and yesterday as examples of what I have known to be the practice ever since I have had a seat in this chamber. Yesterday there were sixteen notices on the Order Paper calling for papers. Of those sixteen, fifteen were for copies and one for originals. To-day we have seventeen notices on the Order Paper, of which sixteen call for copies and one for the original. I am speaking now, although the right hon. gentleman shakes his head, from an examination of the Order Papers made a few minutes ago.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. For copies or returns ?

Mr. BARKER. On the Orders of yesterday one notice calls for originals and fifteen for copies. On to-day's Orders, sixteen notices call for copies and one for originals.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Not for originals, for returns.

Mr. BARKER. I am making my statement from what I see in the Order Paper. Since I have been in this House it has been the general practice for members to ask for copies, and of course it is an exception when they ask for the originals. But whenever hon. members have wanted the originals they have asked for them, and this is the first time I ever heard questioned the right of a member to have the original papers brought down. I have looked at the practice as stated in the books, and I fail to see there the least distinction drawn between originals and copies. Whether the originals or copies be called for depends on the motion made. If an hon. member asks for copies he invariably gets them, unless some reason be given why it is inexpedient that copies should be furnished. When he moves for originals, I presume the same rule prevails, and a distinction between the two was never drawn until it was made within the last few days by hon. gentlemen opposite. Let me quote from Mr. Flint's 'Bourinot,' chapter 12, page 359. There Mr. Flint gives the forms of motions:

Returns and papers are moved for in the form either of an address to the Governor General or of an order of the House. A motion for an address should always commence with the prescribed words:

Mr. moves that a humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before this House, &c.

There is no distinction as to whether the hon. gentleman is to move for copies or originals. Then:

In the case of an order of the House, it is simply necessary to make this motion:

Mr. moves that an order of the House do issue for, &c.

There is no distinction, in these forms, between copies and originals, and I do not think the right hon. gentleman can point, in all his long experience, to any distinction of that kind being drawn.

As regards the explanations of motives for moving for the papers, what is the practice ? Take the orders of the day. You, Mr. Speaker, call upon every hon. gentleman who has a notice of motion upon the Order Paper, whether it be for originals or for copies, to make his motion. What then does the hon. gentleman do? He says: Mr. Speaker, I beg to move No. , giving the number of his notice of motion on the Order Paper. That is all of his speech. He gives no reasons, he states no object that he has in moving for the papers. But, according to the right hon. gentleman, if any of us, in years past, who had followed the regular practice of this House and said those magic words, 'I move No. 16,' or whatever number it may be, and then sat down, the right hon. gentleman could have risen and said: You cannot have the papers, because you did not state why you wanted them. The hon. gentleman cannot take the position he does with regard to originals unless he also takes it with regard to copies. And if his contention be accepted, every one of us who has for years past been following the recognized practice of this House, has been subject to the right hon. gentleman's contention that having made his motion without giving any reason, he has no right to have that motion granted. But Mr. Flint shows clearly that such is not the rule, and never was the rule, and never was intended to be the rule. Here is what is said in chapter 16 of Mr. Flint's work regarding motions for papers refused:

Occasions may arise when the government will feel constrained to refuse papers on the ground that their production would be inconvenient or injurious to the public interest.

But who raises that point? Is it the gentleman who gives formal notice of motion or the government which objects to the motion? Surely the common sense decision would be, and that is the ordinary practice, that if any member of the government objects, on the ground of public convenience or inconvenience, to the production of the papers asked for, it is for him to state his objection. Not that the mover must in every case state his reasons. Consider for one moment what would be the result. Our Order Paper, heaven knows, takes long enough to go through with all these notices of motion; but if on every occasion members, at the peril of losing their motions, had to explain their reasons for making them, the whole time of the House would be occupied with that portion of the paper. If on a very few occasions there is an objection, it is so easy for the Prime Minister, or any minister, to state the objection. Is that not, on the face of it, as stated in Dr. Flint's edition of 'Bourinot,' a common sense and reasonable procedure? I have never heard of any other practice than the simple one of the member moving the motion standing in his name, and I do not know that I ever heard of a gentleman explaining why he made the motion. Had we taken that course and occupied the time of the House and added the expense to the country, the right hon. gentleman would have felt it his duty to correct us, and tell us we need not make explanations.

The Prime Minister stated yesterday, following one of the earlier editions of Bourinot, that reasons had to be given. I looked up the only Canadian authority cited, which was a debate reported in 'Hansard' on a motion by Mr. Fiset, a former member of this House, then a Liberal sitting in opposition. He had moved for the papers with regard to the dismissal of an employee of the government saying that he believed that he had been dismissed without cause. That is the only explanation he offered. Mr. Hibbert Tupper, then the minister, said that he had no objection to the production of the papers, but he added that the gentleman referred to in the motion would not thank the mover for bringing his name before the House or asking the cause of the dismissal. Some debate arose on that. Mr. Mackenzie said that the member moving was entitled to the papers. Mr. Tupper said : I am not refusing to produce the papers ; I am simply pointing out to the hon. gentleman who makes the motion that in asking for these papers he is doing no kindness to the gentleman who is dismissed. That is cited by the right hon. gentleman as an authority to show that you must give your reasons. That is the only Canadian authority cited. You can get authorities for almost anything if you do not look into them ; and I am sure if the Prime Minister had looked this question up he would not have cited it to support his contention. Without quoting any authority he tries to make a difference between the production of copies and of original papers. Every reasonable man will admit that we ought not to seek for original papers when copies will suffice.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. BARKER. Nobody does that, but I say that when an hon. gentleman places upon the order paper a notice of motion that he wants the originals, surely there cannot be any question that the hon. gentleman acts intentionally, that he is giving notice to the House that he does not want copies, and that for reasons sufficient for him, he asks for the originals. That alone is sufficient and that, according to Dr. Flint's book, would call for a reply from the government stating why it would be inconvenient to produce the original papers or any other reason for their non-production. The absolute abstract right of a member of this House is to call for the papers. Surely his primary right is to see the papers themselves. We all recognize that it is a convenience to take copies, but our primary right is to see the originals, not the copies, and we are not obliged to take copies. The importance of this is seen in such a case as occurred in this department where the minister produced an emasculated copy, a copy omitting an important portion of the document, the memorandum on the back as to when it was received which was part of the very question at issue. That shows that we ought not to be put off with copies when we think we ought to have the originals. What could have been more important in that particular case than the fact disclosed by the production of the original documents that a paper which purported to have been written in Montana was written in this city. That was kept back from the House, it was a thing which the minister, in performing his duty to the government, to the Crown and to the people should have been the first to make clear. We wanted to see that paper, when a copy was produced it was not a full copy, and we would never have obtained that information if we had not obtained the original document. Surely it cannot be questioned, that we are entitled to see the original papers. Supposing that a minister or his deputy has endorsed his decision on a document, a letter for instance, but has changed his decision and writen another one, are we not entitled to see the endorsements, even although they are not part of the original documents ? I have seen in the public offices many documents with endorsements by ministers and deputies, and it is of the utmost importance in inquiring into a case that we see the endorsements. And yet, according to the statement of the Minister of the Interior, he would be justified in telling his clerks not to give us copies of those endorsements because they were not in the original document. Could any thing more clearly show the necessity for the production of an original document wherever a member, acting as he does in the interest of the people, thinks that its production is necessary, leaving it to the government in exceptional cases, where such production might be mischievous, to say so. I am sure that every hon. member would be reasonable in such exceptional cases, and that the production of the original paper would not be insisted on ; but his prima facie right is to get the originals and he accepts copies only as a convenience.

Mr. EDMUND BRISTOL (Centre Toronto). Mr. Speaker, I regret exceedingly that the First Minister this evening, after stating that the only reason that he had a few days ago for refusing to the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) an examination of the original documents in question, was because the hon. member stated his reasons at the end of his speech and not at the beginning. I regret exceedingly that when the hon. member for St. Antoine rose and made his request in the very words which the right hon. Prime Minister desired him to use, the right hon. gentleman did not feel it was due to himself, to the dignity of the House and to the importance of the business the House has to transact, to say: Now that you have made the request in the form in which I think you should make it, I waive technicalities, and you may have these original documents. I am astonished that a man who is so highly thought of in this country, a man for whom so many people have the highest personal regard and respect, should so far forget the dignity of his great position as not to gracefully and at once yield to the courteous request of the hon. member for St. Antoine. What does it all lead to? We are told that the hon. member for St. Antoine, having made a formal motion which has been denied on technical grounds, that motion cannot be repeated in this House. Then, if the hon. member for St. Antoine made a mistake—and we will assume, for the sake of argument, that he made a mistake—and, because he did not know the rules of parliamentary practice, was defeated on technical grounds, what is the position of the First Minister? He says in effect: Having defeated you on technical grounds, I decline, on further technical grounds to allow you to renew your motion, and to get the information which you, as a member of parliament desire to have in order to do your duty as a representative of the people of this country. I submit that there has never been such a spectacle in any democratic assembly of which we have any record, and I trust there never may be again. The right hon. Prime Minister has, on two or three occasions, quoted 'Todd on Parliamentary Practice,' this sentence:

It is 'the rule of parliament that no papers shall be laid on the table of either House unless some sufficient reason have been stated for their production.'

That, as I understand, is the ground of objection taken by the right hon. Prime Minister against the motion of the hon. member for St. Antoine. He says the hon. member for St. Antoine has not an absolute right to see these documents, but has that right only upon stating some sufficient reason for their production. Now, let me show you what the Prime Minister has done. He has added to Todd this dictum: That the member who makes a motion for such papers must state his reasons in his chief speech, and not at some later time before the motion is put. But that is not found in any parliamentary authority in the world. Where does the right hon. gentleman find that stated as authority for refusing a motion of this kind? Why, this carries the technicality to the regions of the merely ridiculous. Suppose that a case were being argued in court: counsel on one side made his case as well as he could and opposing counsel answered him; then, in reply, at the conclusion of his argument, the first counsel thought of some ground on which the court could validly give judgment in his favour. Does any one think that any court of justice would refuse to accept the latter ground because it was stated in the end and not in the opening argument of counsel? I submit the right hon. gentleman has not only gone beyond the regions of logic but entirely beyond the regions of plain, every-day sense. I submit that the people of this country will not be able to follow the reasoning of my right hon. friend in defeating a motion, presented in the public interest, by a technical objection that a reason is stated in the end and not in the beginning of a speech. Let this kind of reasoning prevail and only a skilled constitutional lawyer will be able to present a motion in this House with any degree of success. I do not wish to emphasize this point. I should think that it would be plain to the right hon gentleman and that he would concede it at once and allow the business of the country to go on. If the hon. member for St. Antoine were a lawyer, and the right hon. Prime Minister wanted to show how clever he was in legal technicalities, I could understand him taking this position. But, under the circumstances, it is almost incredible. But that is not all. If you examine the speech made by the hon. member for St. Antoine, January 13, you will find that almost in his opening sentence, he said:

A typewritten copy of a document does not always carry the information that is desired. There are occasions, such as have occurred several times in bringing down documents to this House, where the documents do not contain all the information which we are entitled to have.

Now, I submit that, if the hon. member for St. Antoine, had stopped there, the right hon. Prime Minister should have conceded that he had given good and sufficient reason why he should see these originals. But he goes further and gives an illustration:

I, for one, called at the Department of the Interior and was shown, without the slightest hesitation by the deputy minister, the originals of the returns which had been copied. By having access to these originals I obtained certain information which was of great value in discussing the question in the House. Since that time I understand that strict orders have been given that no member of this House shall be permitted by the Deputy Minister of the Interior to see any original documents.

I submit that, even if the hon. member for St. Antoine had said nothing further, he should have had his order in this case without argument. But the true reason of the matter, if we examine the discussion, was that the Minister of the Interior, apparently had been advised that public documents should not be examined unless he said so, and that was the proposition the government started to support by a vote without fully considering the matter. But, having had the matter further under consideration, they came to the conclusion that their ground was untenable. They saw that the public press of this country was commenting unfavourably upon their action, and assailing them on the ground that they were refusing to make full disclosures to members of this House, taking advantage of their position, and that they had voted in favour of a resolution against giving the House that to which it was entitled. But as a matter of fact, the hon. member for St. Antoine has not seen these documents, and, so far as the right hon. Prime Minister is concerned, it is apparent that he is prepared to sit here for another six months before he will allow the hon. gentleman to see them. He has defeated the hon. member on a technicality; and it does not matter that the hon. member says: I ask your indulgence and the waiving of these technicalities. The right hon. Prime Minister says in effect: You have made a mistake and must suffer for it; and none but motions that are technically correct shall succeed in this House unless we want them to. There is only one inference that the public will draw from the conduct of my right hon friend, and that is that there is something that the government desires to conceal. Knowing the right hon. gentleman as well as they do, the people will not believe that one so liberal as he is by profession, reputation, character and tradition, would allow a motion to be defeated on a technicality where the member who moved it had merely made a mistake of form and was entitled to the documents he asked for. I am satisfied he would not, under ordinary circumstances, refuse a motion of this kind merely because a mistake had been made—and in saying that the refusal is based on the contention that a mistake has been made, I am taking the best position for the right hon. gentleman. The people will conclude there is something the government wishes to conceal, and that there is special reason why this matter has been engineered in this way through the House, and why the right hon. gentleman refuses to allow a member to do his duty to the people and to his constituents by examining public documents.

Why, Mr. Speaker, this objection is not merely technical, as I have pointed out, it is absolutely unusual, it is absolutely tyrannical. There has been, as pointed out by my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Barker) no occasion in this House before where such an objection has been taken in connection with an order for the production of documents. But my right hon. friend, in his straits, was obliged to turn up parliamentary procedure of fifty or a hundred years ago in order to defeat a motion which could only have as a result the promotion of the public interest. I say the people of Canada will have an opportunity now of seeing whether the right hon. gentleman desires the members of the opposition to have that full right and privilege which they should have of examining public documents and which, for good public reasons, they are entitled to examine. I am sorry the right hon. the First Minister should present this spectacle to the people of Canada, because he, above all others, should set an example, not of technicalities, but of fair treatment.

Mr. E. B. OSLER (West Toronto). While listening to this debate I have wondered how an outsider in the gallery would, as they say, size it up. Two days ago the Prime Minister accepted the principle of the production of original documents, and we thought then that the documents asked for would at once be produced. In the interval between the Prime Minister's acceptance of that motion and to-day, I wonder if he has had a consultation with his Minister of the Interior and found out that it would be prudent to back out of the acceptance that he made two days ago, and taking the position of refusing to-day. I cannot for the life of me understand why two or three days time of this session should be taken up by the government turning and twisting in every possible way that a lot of clever men can employ, in order to get out of the necessity of showing to this House nine original documents. We have had on more than one occasion knowledge of the fact that the production of original documents showed that true copies of those documents, that is to say, copies that meant anything, were not submitted to the House when they were asked for. Now, I cannot understand for a moment why, if there is nothing to hush up, these documents should not at once be submitted to the House. Either these particular documents may have some marks on them, some indication that is not shown on the copies submitted, or there are other documents that the government fear may be asked for and they wish to have a precedent for refusing them by rejecting the demand for these particular documents. The only inference I see that can be drawn from the action of the government is that either in this case or in some other case they have in view, they are willing to stand the brunt through the country of refusing to produce the documents rather than stand the odium that will come to them through their production. That is the only conclusion that I can draw.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Carleton, Ont.). We have asked for the documents referred to in two ways. In the first place, they have been asked for by the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) proposing to attend in the Department of the Interior, where the inspection of these nine papers would, I suppose, have taken fifteen minutes. That request was made, and that request was refused. The member for St. Antoine was told to come to this House and move for the papers. He came to the House in accordance with the suggestion of the Minister of the Interior, and moved for the papers. He stated his reasons which, in my opinion, were amply sufficient to justify the House in granting this motion. The Prime Minister thought that those reasons were not sufficient, and by his speech on that occasion, he invited the member for St. Antoine to state further reasons. The member for St. Antoine had no further opportunity of speaking until the debate closed, under the rules of the House he had to be the last speaker in that debate. But when he came to close that debate he stated the reasons, the sufficiency of which the Prime Minister has not challenged up to the present time, and which he cannot challenge, which no man in this House can challenge. I would ask the right hon. gentleman now whether he is prepared to affirm that the reasons which the member for St. Antoine offered when he closed that debate were not sufficient reasons for the production of those papers.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The motion of the hon. gentleman was made in such a way as to establish a precedent to the effect that without giving a reason at all any member could ask for the originals and could compel the government on every occasion to bring down the records of the government on the table of this House, and we could not agree to that. That is the position I took.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The right hon. gentleman does not seem to appreciate the position. I am pointing out that the member for St. Antoine, after that objection had been raised by the Prime Minister, went on to comply with the Prime Minister's suggestion, he adopted the position the Prime Minister said he must adopt and gave reasons. Surely the youngest member of this House, any man who has the most rudimentary ideas of parliamentary practice, knows that everything that takes place in debate until the vote is taken must be considered as enabling the House to come to a conclusion. Does my right hon. friend deny that?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If the motion had been granted we would have been told that we were climbing down, as was said the other day, and if we had agreed to a motion of this kind, it would have been quoted against us as a precedent later on.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The right hon. gentleman's position now is exactly the opposite of that. The member for St. Antoine stated certain reasons, the Prime Minister did not think those reasons were sufficient, and said if proper reasons were given the papers would be brought down. Then the member for St. Antoine, in closing the debate, adopted the position of the Prime Minister, acceded to all he demanded and gave the reasons which the Prime Minister said should have been stated in the first instance. The Prime Minister perhaps did not observe the strength of the reasons. They are undoubtedly sufficient, he has admitted just now they are sufficient and the only ground upon which the government can base their position in this matter is the ground that these reasons were not stated in the first instance. Why, the government will next take the position that the reasons must be stated in the first part of the speech instead of in the last part of the speech, or some other ridiculous proposition of that kind.

See how easy, Mr. Speaker, it will be to defeat any motion made in this House by the reasoning which the right hon. Prime Minister presents. The universal practice in this House, as every hon. member knows is this : The member stands up makes his motion and gives no reasons. It will be enough to defeat any motion in the future simply for the Prime Minister to say : The motion cannot be allowed because you have given no reasons. Then the member in reply will rise and give his reasons and the Prime Minister will tell him that it is too late. I never heard of such a proposition. If the hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine, did not give reasons in the first instance—and I for my part, think that his reasons were ample and sufficient in the first instance—but if he did not give reasons in the first instance he did give them before the debate was closed and before the vote was taken, and the Prime Minister should at once have arisen in his place and should have said : Although the reasons, in the first place, were not, to my mind, sufficient reasons, those which have now been given by the hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine, in accordance with my suggestion, are ample and sufficient and I ask the House to adopt the motion. But the Prime Minister says it would have created a precedent. How would that have created any precedent ? It would have created no precedent in favour of my hon.

friend from St. Antoine: it would have created a precedent in favour of the right hon. Prime Minister because the government would have established the position that if suficient reasons are not given in the first instance the motion will not be adopted but that it will be adopted only if sufficient reasons are given later on in the debate. So far as the creation of a precedent is concerned which seems to trouble the Prime Minister more than certain questions of policy, the Prime Minister's position is not well taken.

I do not think that I have taken an unreasonable position in regard to this matter. When the motion was denied I did not know for what reasons it had been denied. It seemed to me that there was a departure from what had been the practice of parliament in Great Britain as well as in this country. So, I sent a note to the Prime Minister on Tuesday, telling him that on the first occasion on which the House would be moved into Committee of Supply I would propose a resolution setting forth what I conceived to be the true parliamentary practice in this regard. I moved my motion. The Prime Minister accepted it and I thought the matter was at an end. He accepted it and to-day he has told us that it was merely a truism. Let us see what that truism is. My motion is in the following words:

> Subject to such considerations of public policy as can be validly urged in any case, it is the undoubted right of the people's representatives, in parliament assembled, to be informed of everything necessary to explain the policy and proceedings of the government and for that purpose to have an opportunity of seeing and examining all documents connected with the transaction of public business; and the denial of such right by the government justifies the refusal by this House of further supplies to the Crown.

There was no question of copies in that resolution. It affirmed the right to see and examine all public documents, and there was no suggestion of reason in the resolution. It declared the undoubted right of parliament so that there ought to have been no further question after that resolution had once passed the House. It went far beyond the position which the Prime Minister admitted that my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, had taken in making his motion. So, I thought the matter was at an end. I thought that, the Prime Minister, having recognized the position, above all having come to an understanding with my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, who, before the conclusion of the debate, gave reasons sufficient in the mind of the Prime Minister himself for the production of these papers, I thought that when I mentioned the matter to the House this afternoon, the Prime Minister would at once get up, save any further time in discussion and offer to my hon. friend either an opportunity to examine these documents at the office of the minister himself, or that they should be brought for a short time into this House in order that the necessary examination might be had to which my hon. friend is entitled under the resolution adopted unanimously by this House and which the Prime Minister declares to be so absolutely true that it is to be regarded only as a truism. But, instead of that we have the statement of the Prime Minister in reply to myself: No, not until reasons are assigned. Every conceivable reason had been assigned; every sufficient reason had been assigned. When I courteously asked the right hon. gentleman to state what further reasons he demanded to be assigned before these documents were brought down, the answer—the somewhat pert answer which I got was this: Oh, bring your reasons along and then we will give them consideration. The Prime Minister knows perfectly well, as every member of this House knows, that under the strict rules of the House if a motion has once been debated and decided the House cannot deal with it again during the same session and it would not be permissible for us to bring the matter up again by resolution unless we were assured beforehand that the motion would be complied with and that the papers would be brought down. Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, it does seem to me that the time of this House is being wasted—unnecessarily wasted—by the government upon a pure technicality. The Prime Minister has not denied that if my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine had stated in his opening speech what he did state in his closing speech this motion would have been granted; yet, these papers have been denied and are being denied to-day because the statement upon which that right was well founded was made in the concluding speech of the hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine, instead of in his opening speech. The government are obstructing the business of the House to-day by relying upon an absurdity of that kind, because, with all deference and not desiring to say any thing offensive, I affirm without the slightest doubt that a proposition such as that has only one name and that is the most outrageous absurdity that was ever heard in this parliament. What is the object of discussion? Is not the object of discussion that the House, upon hearing every thing that can be affirmed for or against a particular motion, shall make up its mind whether or not that motion shall be accepted or shall be denied? If my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, after the objection raised by the Prime Minister, did state to this House reasons sufficient, even in the judgment of the Prime Minister, for the production of these documents, there should have been no further question about it and the motion should have been passed upon the reasons so assigned. I regret that the time of the House is being wasted—unnecessarily taken up—in the discussion of this matter, but it is a matter of principle. If the rule laid down by the right hon. Prime Minister be a correct rule, then the government can adopt with respect to every motion proposed in this House for the production of papers, the procedure to which I have just now adverted. A member will get up as usual and say: Mr. Speaker, I beg to move the proposed motion standing in my name. The Prime Minister arises and says: No reason has been assigned for the making of this motion, and then the member will say: Well, I have such and such reasons for making this motion and then some member of the government will reply: No, you cannot have them now because you did not state the reasons in the first instance. The absurdity simply comes down to that. It seems to me that I need only suggest it to the Prime Minister to convince him that the position he is taking in this regard is an absolutely absurd and untenable one.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). Mr. Speaker, I regret that my hon. friends opposite are in a very unhappy frame of mind to-day. Perhaps we should make some allowance for them and not be too severe in our criticism of their proceedings. I agree with the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) that we have been wasting a great deal of time—no, I withdraw that; we have not been, on this side of the House, wasting any time but we have been paying hon. gentlemen opposite the respect of listening to them. If there has been any wasting of time they have been doing the wasting, for, with the exception of a very few minutes occupied by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), we have taken no part in this debate. I do agree that we have been wasting time in discussing what is only an academic question. We have not been permitted to discuss the practical side of this question. I take it we are not discussing now merely the small question—to use the words of my hon. friend (Mr. Ames)—merely the small question of producing the particular paper to which the hon. gentleman referred. He has deliberately and of purpose resolved that we shall not be permitted to discuss that small question of itself. He has stated that he declines to have that small question discussed of itself. He desires to test a great principle for which he stands. He insists upon his right to do certain things. Now, if my hon. friend were to step into my office and ask me to show him some public documents, my impression is that he would give me some good reason and I hope I would be able to produce the documents before him.

Mr. AMES. Is the hon. minister quoting from my remarks in saying that I claimed it as a right without giving sufficient reasons?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes, I think I may say that is the position the hon. gentleman has taken in the House.

Mr. AMES. Will he kindly quote from 'Hansard'?

Mr. FIELDING. I shall try to show so as I proceed. I was saying that if my hon. friend would step into my office and say he desired for public reasons to see some document on file there, I think he would probably give me good reasons, and I think it probable I would produce the document, and that would be an interchange of that courtesy which as far as possible should prevail between members of parliament irrespective of the sides upon which they sit.

Mr. AMES. I may say that that has been the practice which the Department of Finance on one occasion extended to me and which I appreciated, and it has also been the practice of the Department of the Interior always, until the present time, extended to me and which I also appreciated. But that privilege which the Minister of Finance now speaks of has been denied members of the House in reference to the Department of the Interior, and the Minister of the Interior has referred members on this side of the House, to the House as the only means by which that access could be obtained. What the Minister of Finance says as to my calling at his department and securing access to these documents would satisfy me perfectly if the same courtesy were extended in other departments.

Mr. FIELDING. But, I was going to add, that if my hon. friend should come in a different spirit—and that is the spirit in which he comes to this House—if he should come to my office and say, not as a matter of courtesy but by his right as a member of parliament he demanded any document, that would be an entirely different matter; and without any desire to be discourteous to my hon. friend I think under such circumstances I would refuse the document. And we have refused up to this moment to present the document, because the hon. gentleman has approached the question in this House in precisely that way.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR. Read the resolution moved by the leader of the opposition and which you accepted.

Mr. FIELDING. I will read that in due time, and I will show my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) that he hardly understands the resolution for which he voted. I find that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ames) in his first speech —I am quoting from page 1178 of 'Hansard' and if at any point I do not quote enough and my hon. friend will remind me I shall be glad to keep on quoting—I find my hon. friend in his first speech said :

We contend that we have a perfect right to ask for the originals and the government must allege very good reasons to justify them in refusing access to such papers. That motion has been drafted purely and simply to test that one question because we consider that we have sufficient reasons for desiring to see the original applications and tenders in respect to timber berths Nos. 1107, 1108 and 1171.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FIELDING. Observe the position the hon. gentleman takes. The hon. gentleman says : We contend that we have a perfect right to ask for the originals and the government must allege very good reasons to the contrary. That is reversing the law and procedure of parliament which is, that the hon. gentleman, according to all the authorities that have been quoted, must give his reasons. I was amazed to find the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker) treating with contempt the clearly written words of Bourinot who says (page 371) :

It is quite obvious, however, that no member should move for papers except on sufficient grounds. It is clearly laid down by the most eminent of English parliamentarians that it is incumbent upon——

Incumbent upon the government ? No ; incumbent upon the mover of the resolution.

—it is incumbent upon the mover to state the reasons upon which his motion is founded that the House may judge of the necessity——

Not that the hon. member himself may judge of the necessity, but that the House may judge.

—that the House may judge of the necessity, importance and expediency for calling for the papers which are the subject of that motion.

My hon. friend (Mr. Barker) read that and brushed it aside as if it amounted to nothing. We look upon Bourinot as the exponent of our parliamentary practice and when he lays down that as the undoubted rule, I think we may fairly accept it. But if my hon. friend wants a further rule, I will cite May's parliamentary practice, page 539 of edition 1906 :—

But, however ample the power of each House to enforce the production of papers a sufficient cause must be shown for the exercise of that power——

Shown by whom ? By the government ? No. Hon. members have been talking all the afternoon as if it was the duty of the government to show cause, whereas it is the duty of the mover of the resolution to show cause. This citation from May continues :

—and if considerations of public policy can be urged against the motion for papers, it is either withdrawn or otherwise dealt with according to the judgment of the House.

Mr. BRISTOL. May I ask the hon. gentleman a question ?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOL. Where does he find in that quotation that the cause must be stated in the beginning of the speech and not in the end ?

Mr. FIELDING. I will come to that.

Mr. LAKE. Does the hon. gentleman deny that good cause was shown ?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes, I do. More than that, I say that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ames) refused to show cause. The hon. gentleman declared he was not bound to show cause ; the hon. gentleman said he was bringing this as a test case and that he was insisting on his individual right. Hon. gentlemen opposite sometimes confuse two or three things which are not at all the same. We are accustomed to the hon. gentlemen opposite saying : The House demands this ; the House has a right to this, parliament has the right to that ; and all the time they mean that the member for St. Antoine has the right to all these things. Now, there is a wide difference.

Mr. SPROULE. The Minister of Finance speaks of this as being a rule ; has not the usual practice been of late years to make a motion without giving any cause whatever?

Mr. FIELDING. I will come to that also. In the meantime I again insist that the hon. member for St. Antoine not only gave no reasons but he made it a matter of pride that he would not give any reason. He stood on his rights ; it was not this small question of some petty, paltry document he was urging ; he was standing for a great principle. He said :

What method is open to any member who wishes to see original documents? Have I the right to see original documents? If I have that right what is the constitutional method by which I can see them?

Well, my judgment is that if it cannot be brought about by mere interchange of courtesy, then the only way would be for the hon. gentleman to make a motion. Now there is no distinction in the rule between original documents and copies so far as I can see. I think a statement of that kind is correct. I do not remember any such distinction, and every time a motion is made for a return the government would have a perfect right to ask the hon. gentleman who makes the motion to give his reasons, and the rule of parliament would sustain such a request. But we do not exercise that right, and why ? Because where copies of documents are sought there is no public reason against them unless it be stated they are confidential—and we are not now dealing with that branch of the question—there is no public reason that can be urged except the matter of convenience and the time involved in their preparation. That is not a sufficient reason and so it goes without saying. But when an hon. gentleman demands that an original be brought down, then the situation is different. If the hon. member for St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames) has the right—not the right of the House but the right of the hon. gentleman himself, for that is what the hon. gentleman wants to assert—to come down and by his mere word demand that that particular document shall be laid on the table, that same right extends to every other member. And if it applies to that particular document, it applies to every other public document in the archives of the country. And so, by the mere will of an individual member—and I ask the House to observe the distinction between an individual member and the House—you might have all the public documents brought down here and flung upon the table. That is so utterly preposterous that I cannot imagine any hon. gentleman opposite, who knows anything about parliamentary procedure, seriously arguing that such a thing should be done. The preservation of original documents is the best possible reason for treating them differently from copies. When a copy is lost no harm is done, but when an original is lost, it cannot be replaced. Therefore it is the part of wisdom to place some restriction on the production of originals that would not be placed upon the production of copies. That is what justifies us when we say to an hon. gentleman : if you made a motion for copies, no question would be asked; but when you ask for the original documents, it is a proper ground for a minister to take that you should give some reason why you ask for such papers.

Mr. ALCORN Would the hon. minister go so far as to say that when a motion is put on the Order Paper for copies or originals, the hon. member must state specifically, in his notice of motion the reason why he asks for them ?

Mr. FIELDING. No, I would not say that, but when it is stated that if the hon. member for St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames) did not give his reasons in the beginning of his remarks, he gave them in the end, I think I can show that he did not. True the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) ingeniously, if not ingenuously, tried to read into the argument of the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) language not to be found there.

Mr. FOSTER. The right hon. gentleman who leads you admitted it.

Mr. FIELDING. I think not. What the hon. member for St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames) did was to give some explanations of reasons why he had moved for some original documents on a previous occasion, but he did not give the reasons why we should produce these documents. Persistently, throughout his speech, he stood on his rights. There is no question of the rights of the House, because there is no limitation to the rights of the House. The rights of the House are practically unlimited. It can make or unmake governments. But it is a great mistake to confuse the rights of the House with the rights to be found under the hon. gentleman's own hat. The two things are not the same at all.

Mr. SPROULE. Is it not the practice in the Public Accounts Committee for an hon. member of that committtee to do just what the hon. member for St. Antoine is doing here, and is it not the undoubted right of an individual member of that committee to ask for the original documents, and are not these documents invariably brought down ?

Mr. FIELDING. We have fallen into a practice in that committee somewhat open to criticism, but that is the practice of the committee, and I am not objecting to it. I want to quote again from the hon. member for St. Antoine division. In each case he has been particular to stand upon his rights in this matter. Let me quote from page 1242 in 'Hansard' :

> It is because of the principle involved that this resolution has been placed upon the orders of the day and that this discussion has taken the form that it has. The simple question is this: Is a member of parliament entitled, if he so desires, to see an original document?

Hon. gentlemen talk of the rights of parliament. This, however, is not a question of the rights of parliament but a question of the rights, the imaginary rights, of the hon. member for St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames) :

> Is a member of parliament entitled, if he so desires, to see an original document when no reason of state can be alleged why it should not be displayed?

Mr. FOSTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. FIELDING. Again he stands on his rights. He is not going to get away from that. But we are told that the hon. gentleman, if he did not give the reason at the beginning, was careful to give it at the end. Well, I shall quote the last passage from his remarks. In his second speech, just before we took the vote, my hon. friend summed up the situation, and his summing up will be found on page 1247. He said :

> Adopt any method you like, move any amendment you want, but establish the principle that when we, on this side of the House, have what we consider good and sufficient reason, we may have the right to see an original document, or else be prepared to take the odium throughout the country that you do not wish an original document to come to light. That is all I have to say.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Read page 1246.

Mr. FIELDING. On page 1246 I find this:

Now there are nine pages of that return which can be illumined if I may see the original.

He has not given any reason.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Read on.

Mr. FIELDING. How much more am I to read ?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Just about four or five sentences.

Mr. FIELDING. (reading) :

But there are nine pages there, with respect to which the copy does not tell me all I want to know, or which I have the right to know, if I understand my rights in this House of Commons.

Then there are some interruptions :

Mr. OLIVER. Does my hon. friend say that these nine pages differ from the original?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. How could he tell unless he sees the original?

Mr. AMES. I say that these nine pages will, in all probability, clear up certain doubts which I have regarding peculiar features in connection with some of these transactions.

Mr. FOSTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. FIELDING. (reading) :

I say that the handwriting of some of these nine pages may have a very important bearing on the case.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Read page 1245 too.

Mr ALCORN. The hon. minister admitted a moment ago that it was not necessary to state in each motion the specific reasons. In what he has just read, is not the reason for the motion fairly stated ?

Mr. FIELDING. On the contrary all throughout this speech, my hon. friend from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) insists on his right to have this information because he wants it and for no other reason.

Mr. ALCORN. But he has given the reason.

Mr. FIELDING. In his concluding remarks he says :

Adopt any method you like, move any amendment you want, but establish the principle, that when we, on this side of the House, have what we consider——

Not what the House considers——good and sufficient reason, we may have the right to see an original document.

That is what the hon. gentleman, by his last words in this House, asked us to vote for. He asked us to vote for the affirmation of the principle that simply because he wanted these originals, he should get them. Later on he says :

If we on this side think we want a document——

Never mind the reason, it is enough to say we desire the document, and if we desire it, notwithstanding all the rules of parliament, we are entitled to get it. We are entitled to get it simply and solely because we want it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The language used by my hon. friend from St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames) was not at all as the hon. gentleman interprets it.

Mr. FIELDING. His words speak for themselves.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Let him look at them again.

Mr. FIELDING. I have read them twice.

Mr. FOSTER. Read them again.

Mr. FIELDING. I think they are good reading, and I shall read them again :

Adopt any method you like, move any amendment you want, but establish the principle that when we, on this side of the House, have what we consider good and sufficient reason, we may have the right to see an original document, and so forth.

In other words while all the parliamentary writers say it is for the House to say whether or not the reasons are sufficient the hon. gentleman says if he and his associates think it is sufficient, nobody on this side has the slightest right to interfere. That is what the hon. gentleman asked us to vote for and we on this side very properly refused to vote for it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. He did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. FIELDING. I read the concluding remarks of the hon. gentleman's speech.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. You read it and you misquoted it.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not think that I need read it again.

Mr. FOSTER. He did not attend to the punctuation.

Mr. FIELDING. I think I tried to lend to the rhyme of the poet the music of my voice. We have heard something about the resolution which my hon. friend the leader of the opposition moved, and which has been very happily described as a truism. I want to read it now and I hope I shall read it fairly and properly.

Subject to such considerations of public policy as can be validly urged in any case——

Who is to be the judge of the validity of the reason ?

Mr. LANCASTER. Who is to urge them ?

Mr. FIELDING. Who is to judge them is more important.

Subject to such considerations of public policy as can be validly urged in any case, it is the undoubted right——

Mr. LANCASTER. Who is to urge them?

Mr. FIELDING. Suppose that any one on this side of the House urges them, who is to judge ? The judgment must be the judgment of the House and not the judgment of the hon. member for St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames) or of the hon. gentlemen opposite in their collective capacity.

Subject to such considerations of public policy as can be validly urged in any case, it is the undoubted right of the people's representatives, in parliament assembled——

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Hear, hear.

Mr. FIELDING. Not the right of the hon. member for St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames) the right of parliament, in its collective capacity, the members of parliament assembled together and constituting parliament and not the right of the individual member.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Then the minister says that if the minority want information and the majority do not wish them to have it the minority will never get it ?

Mr. FIELDING. All the books tell us the judgment of the House must prevail. I will take the case my hon. friend supposes, if we can imagine such a case, where the opposition want information and the majority are so insensible as to say that it shall not be given, then the decision of the majority must prevail. Is that not parliamentary government ?

Mr. FOSTER. Then read the second part of the resolution ?

Mr. FIELDING. I will read it all.

Subject to such considerations of public policy as can be validly urged in any case, it is the undoubted right of the people's representatives, in parliament assembled, to be informed of everything necessary to explain the policy and proceedings of the government, and for that purpose——

That is the members of parliament assembled in parliament, not individually.

—to have an opportunity of seeing and examining all documents connected with the transaction of public business ; and the denial of such right by the government justifies the refusal by this House of further supplies to the Crown.

It is about as sensible a resolution as to say : Resolved that two and two make four. We could not go against it, we could not say they make five. We might not think there was any particular occasion for engaging in these arithmetical exercises, but if we were brought face to face with the resolution and we had to vote on it, we would all vote that two and two make four. My hon. friend's resolution states properly the sound parliamentary law on this subject ; but surely in saying that, he does not want to set aside all the rules which govern the procedure as respects the production of documents. There is no getting away from the rule laid down by Bourinot and confirmed by Erskine May that if an hon. member wants information he is bound to give the reason on which he frames his motion. I would not be very critical as to what would be the reason, and I have no doubt if my hon. friend (Mr. Ames) had not stood so much on his right, had not said so much about making this a test case, had confined himself to the simple possession of this paper, he would have seen it in some way. I would like him to see it because——

Mr. AMES. Judging by the hon. minister's remarks the minority have no way in which they could secure access to the paper without the wish of the majority ; therefore it rests with the majority to suggest a means of obtaining access.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend has chosen his method of dealing with this question and has chosen to present it as a matter of right ; instead of making an ordinary request he has insisted on making himself a martyr. He is not concerned about the little trumpery paper, but there is a great principle at stake and he wants to assert that. He, the hon. member for St. Antoine division, says he has the undoubted right to get possession of any public document in the possession of the government, and inasmuch as he insisted on that as a matter of right, inasmuch as the adoption of that rule would have established a precedent which would be contrary to all parliamentary practice and all sound government, we on this side affirmed that we would not vote for his resolution.

Mr. E. A. LANCASTER (Lincoln-Niagara) When hon. gentlemen on this side of the House an hour or so ago were trying to find out what the Prime Minister meant by his action in this matter, I quite agreed with some who said there was an entire want of logic in the position taken by him, but since I have heard the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) I think we have seen ridicule run mad. We have the hon. gentleman who sits next the Prime Minister, in all seriousness or pretended seriousness, telling this House it is not for one member to judge whether his reason for asking for papers is a good one, but it is for the whole House to so decide. I do not agree with him in that statement entirely, but taking him at his own word I want to know from him now what he as one of the majority has decided? Has he decided that the reasons given by the hon. member for St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames) are good and valid or not ?

Mr. FIELDING. I decided that the hon. gentleman declined to state reasons. He said that as a matter of right he insisted and as I could not admit the right——

Mr. LANCASTER. We have heard that three times already.

Mr. FIELDING. You will hear it three times more.

Mr. LANCASTER. But we have not heard one word from the minister as to his opinion of the merits of the question. I was not sent to this House to get into any comedies or any farces if I could help it. I represent people who vote against me as well as those who vote for me, and I say publicly to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) that in the county of Lincoln he would not get ten Liberals to subscribe to the principles he has stated upon the floor of this House to-night. He says the majority of this House are to determine the sufficiency of these reasons and will not say what is his opinion of the reasons given by an hon. gentleman for moving for original papers, and he will not say what he as one of the majority thinks of the sufficiency of these reasons, and will not say that in his opinion the reasons given are not good and amply sufficient. He is asking his majority to vote to sustain the position taken by his leader and himself without one word of opinion from him as to whether the documents should be brought down on the merits of the case, and he is practically disfranchising all the people represented in this House not only by the members on this side but by about 110 members on the opposite side who are not members of the government. Do the people of this country who are represented by either supporters or opponents of this government not want the information that the public documents of this country contain ? Is the Minister of Finance going to seriously carry out what he has indicated here, whether as a threat or as a mere notice of policy, that we are to go crawling to him upon our knees as representing the people of this country to see what we have a right to see of the public documents? As one member of this House although I am willing to be courteous and polite—and I have always been treated with courtesy and politeness by him—if he is now giving me notice that when I have occasion as representing my constituents to inquire into any matter, desiring to do so on behalf of both sides, because some decent Liberals want to know what the truth is about the affairs of the country, I want to tell the Minister of Finance who says that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ames) could have got his information if he had been more courteous or time-serving or humble or crawling to the hon. gentleman and had not demanded this as a matter of right, that I will demand information in such a case, not as a matter of courtesy or of grace or of favour from the governement, but as a matter of right.

It has been said: Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad. Sir, this government has been treated very leniently by the people of this country. Ever since 1896 they have been charitably; yes, more than charitably, treated by the electors of Canada. They have been allowed to break every pledge they ever made, to set at defiance every principle they ever announced, and now, on top of all of that, and even a short time before a general election, they have the madness—it can be hardly called anything else—to come before the people and say: We will not allow you to see the documents which you have paid for —and which you own unless some member of this House comes to us—crawls to us in servile fashion—and submits a humble request for our consideration. One must wax warm on this subject. It is a matter that goes to the root of our constitution, to Magna Charta itself. Does the right hon. Prime Minister want us to send a petition to the King's representative to ask for a new constitution? For we have understood that, when a government is chosen in this country, it is chosen as a body of trustees for the people. Why, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) does not own the documents which he wishes us to ask for so humbly. He may think he does, but at the first opportunity the people have they will tell him that he is wrong. And that wrong is not to be set right by quoting a sentence here and there from May or from Bourinot. These sentences are not to be understood if taken alone. They must be read reasonably in the light of the constitution which is the foundation of the parliament. I reiterate that the government is the trustee of these documents, and that, as trustee, they must allow the people's representatives to have access to them at all reasonable hours.

A member of parliament does not ask to see these documents for personal or private reasons. I do not know how many souls the hon. member for St. Antoine represents. I myself represent about 35,000. However many the hon. member for St. Antoine may speak for, the fact is that they have no other representative than that hon. gentleman. If he states in this House that he believes it is necessary, in the interest of the people he represents, that a certain document belonging to the people must be shown, that document must be shown unless the government can show good reason for refusing to produce it. You do not need to quote parliamentary authorities; you do not need to make these specious pleas; you do not need to have what the Minister of Finance has called these academic discussions upon the question. The ordinary citizen of Canada, I care not in what walk of life he may be, knows that what I say is correct and that what the Minister of Finance has said is not correct. That hon. gentleman says that the rights of a member of this House are distinguishable from the rights of parliament and that the majority has to decide whether documents should be brought down or not. But what have the majority decided upon the merits of this question? Have they decided that it is not proper that these documents should be seen? Why, the argument is simply this: The majority must decide it, and, as the majority have not decided it, the conclusion must be in the negative. Because the majority have not passed upon the question and do not dare to pass upon it fairly and squarely and on its merits, the answer must be that the member asking for these documents is not entitled to see them. If that is not absolute nonsense—not to be disrespectful—I never heard anything approaching nonsense. We are told that there must be some allegation of suspicion or some ground of complaint in regard to a document before the people by their representatives here may see that document. That point has been answered but I wish to add one word upon it. What limit is put upon that restriction? If a member wishes to see an original, so that he may know whether it has been correctly copied or not, must he lobby this House, write letters to the ministers, negotiate, stipulate for just what the people whom he represents are to have? Or have the people a right to elect a man who, in their opinion, will have sense and decency enough to ask only what is right and fair and to have that representative see the documents which it is necessary for him to see in their interest? I resent the suggestion that the hon. member for St. Antoine, or any other hon. member in this House, would be actuated by improper motives in asking to see public documents. We are honourable gentlemen—believed to be so by the people who elected us. I am not excluding the other side of the House; I include both sides. For it is only just to hon. members opposite who support the government, to say that not one has had the temerity, the hardihood to stand up in this debate and support the position of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance. In the former debate, two or three of these hon. gentlemen did make the effort to show reasons in support of the government's position, but not one of them has dared to rise to-night and say that the position of the hon. member for St. Antoine is not the correct one under the circumstances. Do these hon. gentlemen who sit behind the minister want us to inform their constituencies that they do not claim to be men who can be trusted when they ask for the sight of public documents? The suggestion of the Prime Minister and Minister of Finance is practically an insult to every private member on either side of this House—that the representatives of the people would be actuated by improper motives in calling for public documents. I am astonished that hon. gentlemen sitting behind the leader of this House and the Minister of Finance do not rise and correct these two members of the government who have in so many words asserted that all private members of this House would be likely to be moved by wrong and improper motives in asking that original documents be laid before this House. I will not sit down until I emphasize the resentment I feel at the insult thrown out to every private member of this House by the Prime Minister and by the Minister of Finance who has attempted to come to his relief though—without being offensive—in a very lame way indeed.

I am not going to trouble the House any longer except to say this, that when the right hon. gentleman subscribed to that resolution on the 21st of January, which is on the records of this House and can be put before every voter in this country, he either meant that resolution or he did not. He is up against one horn of the dilemma or the other. He was either trifling with this House and the country, or else he was intending at that time to carry out the resolution which he voted for. Now, forty-eight hours have elapsed, and we find that for some reason or another, whether he fears the resignation of the present Minister of the Interior or not I do not know, but for some reason that he does not choose to disclose, he refuses to apply that resolution to this particular case. The right hon. gentleman will hear about this from Halifax to Vancouver, and he will find that he is up against the people; because he is not merely taking millions of money out of their pockets, money that he ought not to take, not merely advocating improper, ridiculous and improvident measures at the cost of the people, but he now goes the length of undertaking to say to them: When you put me and men like me in power, you must understand that we are going to withhold from parliament all the information that we see fit, we are going to pass a resolution and put ourselves apparently in the right, but within forty-eight hours we are going right back on that resolution.

Mr. G. H. PERLEY (Argenteuil). The question before this House is whether the government are going to provide some way or other by which private members may see original public documents which it is necessary for them to see in the public interest. It matters but little to me whether those documents are shown to members in the department, or whether they are laid on the table of the House in answer to a resolution. I am naturally inclined to look at this matter from the ordinary business point of view and not the technical point of view. I know, as a matter of fact, that it has always been customary to allow members of parliament to see original documents, whether that has been done by right or by courtesy. But under the present condition of affairs, private members are unable to see those original documents in any way whatever. Now, I take it that it is the inherent right of every individual member of parliament to get full information. We all know that individual members do not possess the authority of the House of Commons; at the same time, I think that individual members have a right to reasonably full information. I am sure that the public will not feel satisfied if it is made impossible for private members to obtain this information. I understand it used to be the custom to bring down original documents. I do not see that May draws any distinction between originals and copies, and the Minister of Finance has so stated. Let me ask what would happen if the government were to take a position of this kind every time we asked for copies, or every time we put a resolution on the Order Paper asking for ordinary public documents? Ordinarily, copies are sufficient for all purposes, and it is naturally more convenient to bring down copies. At the same time, I fancy it will be admitted that there are times when it is absolutely necessary to see the originals. I am prepared to say that it is imperative that we should be allowed to see the originals, because if it became a custom that original documents could not be produced, how long would it be before we would have reason to doubt the accuracy of the copies? If the government decided that originals could not be seen, how long would it be before some subservient clerk making out these copies would begin to suppress certain things that were damaging to the government? If a government of that kind were in power in this country for ten or twenty years, I fancy that when they were defeated and the lid was taken off, we would have reason to doubt the accuracy of much of the information given during all those years. The ministers and their supporters have given very few arguments why members should not see original documents in the departments. It seems to me that under proper regulations, which would necessarily be made by the ministers at the head of the departments, a member of parliament ought to be allowed to inspect original documents in the department itself. The Minister of the Interior, in attempting to give some reason why members should not be allowed to see original documents in the department, says on page 1701 of 'Hansard,' referring to the transactions in question:

They are transactions between the government, as representing the whole people, and individual citizens; they are transactions which, if they are not completed, then those papers should not be put in jeopardy by being released from the responsibility of the department.

Now, they are transactions between the government as a whole and the people or individual citizens; we are here representing the people as a whole, and surely it is our duty to investigate these matters as thoroughly as we can. The minister goes on:

My hon. friend knows that transactions in regard to timber limits are never closed; that the license is renewed from year to year; and that at any time a question may be raised as to the right of any person who holds that license, and that the only evidence there is as to the right is the documents upon file in the Department of the Interior.

Surely that is puerile argument. The license is what shows the right of a person to a timber limit. These papers asked for by my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, are applications and tenders which were called for before the limit was placed under license. They have nothing to do with the title to the property. If they were lost it would make little difference to the person holding the license at the present time. The minister goes on:

It is not a matter of interest particularly to the government whether these files are here or there, but it is a matter of very definite interest to the people whose title to their property rests upon these files.

There is not a word there giving a reason why a member of this House should not see these documents in the department. Even supposing these files were lost what difference would it make or what harm would it do to the owner of these limits? It could not hurt the owner of these limits if my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, saw these files in the department. They could make any arrangement they liked to see that he did not destroy, or steal, or mutilate them. Then the minister goes on at page 1701:

There is nothing to hinder any individual who wants to acquaint himself of the business of another individual asking a member of parliament to go into the department and discover for him information that he wants, information in regard to the personal interests of that other individual, using the member as a medium for acquiring information.

The Minister of the Interior must hold in very poor estimation the members of this House when he can suggest that a member of parliament would go into his department and try to get information which he would not be entitled to get except for public purposes and then try to use this information to the hurt of some private individual. If there is such a member of parliament he certainly should not be here but I do not see why the regulations should be made to suit one or two such members of parliament to the detriment of all the rest of us and I doubt very much whether there is one single member of parliament who would take such an advantage. Further, I say that the argument of the minister is absolutely useless for this reason; he says that there is nothing to hinder a member of parliament getting information there which he could give to some individual to the hurt of another individual. I submit that my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, has copies of these papers in his possession. I ask the Minister of the Interior to tell me one single way in which the seeing of these original documents could by any possibility do any more harm to the owners of these timber limits than the sight of copies, if they are true copies. My hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, has the copies. If the information is going to hurt any individual he could now be hurt and I defy the Minister of the Interior to show me any way in which the perusal of the original documents by my hon friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, if the copies are true copies, can hurt any single individual. As the Minister of the Interior does not choose to give any reason I gather that he agrees with me on that point. Now, Sir, I wish to call attention to some further words of the Minister of the Interior given at the bottom of page 1702 and the top of page 1703. He says :

Well, will my hon. friends say what reason was given? Was it because the documents before the House were not copies of the originals? Did he say that he believed they were not? He did not say that? Did he say that the originals were forgeries? Did he give any reason except that of curiosity for the production of those documents?

I doubt very much if the Minister of the Interior would go before a public audience in this or any other city and use an argument of that kind in regard to this question. If my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, knew that these copies were not true copies he would not need to see the originals at all. He could get up in the House and say that to his knowledge he knew they were not true copies, that they were forgeries. I submit that the hon. minister is simply trying to make it impossible to see these papers at all. Then, he asks : Did he give any reason except that of curiosity ? Certainly my hon. friend from Montreal, St, Antoine, gave many good reasons and I can say that I doubt very much if that hon. gentleman ever wants to see any of these papers for mere curiosity. When an hon. gentleman of this House goes through files of papers for the purpose of trying to get information he certainly does not want to go through any more of them for mere curiosity. It is hard enough work to go through them for the purpose of trying to get at the way this government does its business without going through them for mere curiosity. I submit, further, that my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, gave good and sufficient reasons why he should see the originals. The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has stated that the hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine, claimed the papers as a matter of right. My hon. friend's speech must be taken as a whole. Nowhere did he state as a bald fact that he had a right to see these papers, no matter whether any person else thought he had that right or not, but he stated that he wished to know his position in regard to seeing them, that he had reasons for desiring to see these papers, that therefore he brought in his resolution just to ascertain whether, when he had good reasons for wishing to see them, there was any way in which he could see them or not. It is evident the course taken by the government is for the purpose of making it practically impossible for a member to see any papers that they do not wish him to see and it is evident that there is an intention on the part of the government to try and prevent my hon. friend from seeing these particular papers and for that purpose they have raised this purely technical objection and voted the motion down.

I wish to say two or three words in regard to a remark made by the hon. member for Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Ross), found in 'Hansard' at page 1717 :

I go to the Department of the Interior for a legitimate purpose; I do not go poking my nose into other people's business.

It seems to me that that is an unwarranted statement to make and the inference which the hon. member wishes us to draw is that my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, wishes to see these papers for the purpose of poking his nose into other people's business. At the same time the hon. member for Yale-Cariboo is able to see the papers that he wishes to see. I submit that my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, is doing his duty to his constituents when he wants to see these papers and I can say that if more of us would take the time and trouble to go into these matters and investigate these questions and these papers as my hon. friend does it would be all the better for our constituents. That is what we are sent here for and for any one to say that an hon. member of this House who wishes to see public documents is poking his nose into other people's business is to say something which is entirely wrong. The hon. gentleman wants to see these papers because he is endeavouring to discharge the duties imposed upon him by that portion of the people of Canada who sent him here. I know that the rules appertaining to joint stock companies do not apply in this House, but at the same time we may liken this parliament to a board of directors of a vast joint stock association holding a trust for all the people of Canada. We may compare the cabinet to an executive committee of that board of directors, and I would like to know what would be thought if an ordinary director of a company were to be refused information by the executive committee of the board of directors. Why, Sir, the mere refusal would be taken as an evidence of fraud in itself. I feel sure Sir, that from the very fact that these papers are refused, the people of this country will believe that there is something wrong about them. If it is not advisable to bring these original documents here and lay them on the table of the House, would it not be very easy to devise some rule under which the representatives of the people could see them in the departments. What difficulty is there about that? The fact is that all this turmoil has been caused by the new regulation made by the Minister of the Interior. Hitherto it always had been the custom to allow members of parliament, under proper restrictions and when they are asked for in a proper way, to see original documents. What is the reason that the Minister of the Interior has abolished that custom? The letter from the Minister of the Interior informing my hon. friend (Mr. Ames) of this new regulation is to be found on page 1202 of 'Hansard,' and I quote from it:

> In reply I beg to say that it is a rule of the department not to allow the examination of the files by others than officials of the department whose duty it is.

In this arbitrary rule as stated in that letter, the Minister of the Interior draws no distinction whatever between a member of parliament and any other citizen of this country. As members of parliament we do not claim that we have very many rights in this House; we on this side of the House have come to believe that we have few rights indeed under this government. But at the same time it seems to me manifest that the representatives of the people of Canada must have some rights in the Department of the Interior that an ordinary person coming in off the street does not possess. I do not say that a private member has the same right as the Minister of the Interior to inspect departmental documents. It would be absurd to contend that. But to say that a rule can be made by the minister that a member of parliament should have no rights whatever to see any paper in a department under any circumstances, is going altogether too far. We all know that the cabinet ministers of this country have taken all power to themselves. We all know that the individual members on the governuent side of the House even have very little to say in formulating the policy of this government or in discussing any public question in this House, outside of the minor questions which may affect their own particular localities. That is true, but at the same time there must be some limit to the power of cabinet ministers, and if the present regime continues the people of the country must soon ask what a member of parliament is elected for any way, and why do they send him here if he is to be treated as an irresponsible individual and denied any rights in the government of the country, and I would like to know how long the people of Canada will stand that kind of thing?

Why, Sir, they might as well not elect any members at all; they might as well permit the members of the cabinet to conduct the affairs of the country and let the rest of us stay at home to mind our own business. The letter of the Minister of the Interior to my hon. friend (Mr. Ames) makes no qualifications. He does not say that my honn. friend cannot see the papers unless he has good reason, but he lays down the absolute rule that he, as a representative of the people, shall not be allowed that privilege. I would like to ask by what right can the Minister of the Interior make such a rule as this without the consent of parliament? Who is this Minister of the Interior anyway? I know that he is not the Czar of all the Russias; I suppose he must be the Czar of all the Galicians. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) in his remarks this evening said that he wondered how any one in the gallery listening to the debate would size up the conduct of the government. Well, the first evening this matter was discussed there was a gentleman in the gallery who wanted to know what was the cause of all this discussion. He noticed the great excitement under which the Minister of the Interior laboured, and he saw the rather unusual and extraordinary perturbation exhibited by the Prime Minister. And this gentleman wondered what the hon. member for St. Antoine had done to cause such annoyance to the Prime Minister; he wondered if my hon. friend (Mr. Ames) had been making any large rake off out of the government or whether he had been getting some of the public domain for a song; but he quickly saw that could not be the reason for these gentlemen who seemed so annoyed were used to that. Was it because of some wasteful public expenditure that the hon. member (Mr. Ames) had caused? It was nothing of that sort; that would be an every day matter any way and not sufficient to cause annoyance on the other side. Then what was the trouble? The trouble simply was that a private member, sent here by some 60,000 people, had asked to see the original of some public documents, copies of which the government had already brought down. That is the only matter which troubles the right hon. the Prime Minister so much. Well, the man on the street will want to know why the Prime Minister should be so annoyed because the hon. member for St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames) asked such a simple thing. I may say that a good Liberal in this city told me yesterday that he could not understand what the government were thinking about when they took such a position, that the position was absolutely untenable and that the people would not stand it. To my mind there is every reason why the hon. member for St. Antoine should see the original documents. What can be the objection to his seeing them? They are of no practical use to anybody. They are no longer of any value to the owners of the timber limits. There are no state reasons given why they should not be shown to the hon. gentleman and the hon. gentleman has to my mind given good and sufficient reasons why he should be allowed to see them. I wish therefore on behalf of my constituency, and the people of this country, to join the many hon. members who have spoken on this side in insisting that this very reasonable request of the hon. member for St. Antoine division should be granted, and that he should be allowed to see the originals of these documents, copies of which have been produced.

Mr. A. BRODER (Dundas). I always thought that I had some rights in this House until to-night; but since hearing the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) I have come to the conclusion that I have none at all unless he chooses graciously to admit them. No matter what I may want, no matter how reasonable may be my request, no matter how necessary in the public interest I may consider that it should be granted, all that is necessary is for the Minister of Finance or his right hon. leader to raise his finger and my right disappears. No member of this House has a right to see the original of any document of public record if any of these ministers object. The individual member of parliament has no right of access to any public record, has no right inherent in his position as representative of the people, according to the doctrine preached to us to-night. Is that the boasted constitutional liberty of the representatives of the people in this country? Is that the doctrine preached at this late hour?

An hon. MEMBER. It is the Liberal doctrine.

Mr. BRODER. A great deal has been said about the public interest suffering. Will any member of the government say that because, for the last twenty-five or thirty years, it has been possible for a private member of this House to go into any one of the departments and examine the original documents, the public interest has suffered? Will any one of them dare say in his place that any serious inconvenience has been suffered by any public department from this practice? There must be some other reason at the back of this refusal. This unwillingness of the government to allow a member of this House to see the original of a public document leads to the suspicion that it is not the public interest but the party interests of hon. gentlemen opposite which will suffer, if the original public document is submitted to scrutiny. No man can come to any other conclusion, more especially when we have seen in this very department, the conduct of which is under discussion, copies of documents brought down with the names torn off. That is a matter of history. Further than that, we have seen reports sent in by the officials of that department mutilated and put in a false light on the records of the country. We have therefore a perfect right to suspect that all is not well with the right hon. gentlemen and with the hon. minister who is at the head of the department, and that they are afraid of the scrutiny of a private member, not in the public, but in the party interests. It is a question whether or not a private member, who is sent here by some 50,000 or 60,000 electors, has any rights. Is this the doctrine of Liberalism preached to-day by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding)? If it is, then it is time the people became apprehensive. It is time they became suspicious that there is something in these departments which will not bear the light of day and on which the government are afraid to let the sun shine. It is all very well to say that the government cannot tolerate the confusion and the inconvenience of private members coming into a department and examining public documents. But what are the officials in these departments for? Are they not there for the public convenience and the public welfare, or are they there for the purpose of dictating to the people's representatives? The latter is the position taken by the hon. gentleman at the head of the department in question (Mr. Oliver), and he is backed up by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance. What new light has dawned on the right hon. gentleman since yesterday? Has he learnt from his Minister of the Interior that it would not be well to let the documents be seen? There is no other conclusion we can reach judging by his conduct. Whenever we have been able to lift the lid, even in the slightest degree, they put themselves on the defensive in order to prevent the public from seeing any more, and therefore we are told to-night by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) that we have no rights at all except such as the government and its majority choose to give us. Is it possible that I, standing here as a representative of the people, have no rights save that which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) may see fit to grant me. I am not willing to accept any such dictum. No man who loves liberty will submit to such dictation. Men who wish to follow him in that servile manner may sit on that side of the House but they do not on this. And it is just as well to let the Finance Minister understand that though he may force his doctrine on his own supporters, the deacons on this side will not endorse it.

Mr. A. LAVERGNE (Montmagny). I was unable to be here when the original debate was on, and to-night I find hon. gentlemen on your left, Mr. Speaker, objecting to the House going into supply until some original documents are produced. And I find that we are discussing the point as to whether it is the right of an individual member or of the House to have original documents produced, unless there are good reasons assigned for their production. It seems to me that this debate is rather peculiar in this respect that there is no resolution before the chair. If I understand well what has taken place, copies of the documents, the originals of which are asked for, were last year laid on the table. These copies were in the hands of the hon. member for St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames), and after perusing them he found that only certain of them were required and he asked to see the originals of those which he needed. Therefore the question is now as to whether he has or has not the right to see the originals, the copies of which he had last session in his possession. The right of the hon. member for St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames) to see the originals has been questioned. The House has even voted that the resolution should not be carried and that he should not see the original documents.

An important point has been forgotten ; it is that copies of these documents were produced last year by the consent of the House. Bourinot and May have been quoted as to how documents should be produced, but I do not think any of the authors make any difference between copies and originals. The moment documents are voted to be brought down copies are brought down as a matter of convenience, but at the same time there is a distinct right for the member to see the original. Mr. Ames has seen the copies, and he has asked to see the originals. This has been refused him. We are faced by two resolutions, one adopted last year for the production of these very documents and one voted down this year for the production of the same documents, except that the originals are now asked for. I understand it is sometimes dangerous or inconvenient to bring down original documents. For instance last year some originals were brought down and for one reason and another have not been returned to the department. What I fail to understand is why, when Mr. Ames saw the documents last year, and had them in his possession, this year he is not allowed to go to the department and compare the copies he has with the originals in the department. Not only do I not see any inconvenience in that but it seems to me that Mr. Ames has a right, not perhaps as a member of this House, but because last year he had the documents in his possession, to see the originals and there is no parliamentary procedure to say that when he has seen copies of documents produced before the House, he has not a right to see the originals in the department. Bourinot at page 366 says :

> But if a minister cite any such document in the House, it becomes a public paper and should be produced.

The documents were brought down last year and became public papers, and not only has Mr. Ames the right to see them in the department but the right to bring them before the House, because the House last year voted that they should be brought down. Bourinot says further at page 370 :

> All the departments of the public service are kept most laboriously employed every session in furnishing information required by members of the two Houses. The expense entailed in this way is necessarily very large. The right of a member to obtain every information from the government within the limits previously described, is so undoubted that it seems almost beyond the power of a minister to keep the practice within narrower bounds and thereby save much public money. It is quite obvious, however, that no member shall move for papers except on sufficient grounds. It is clearly laid down by the most eminent of English parliamentarians that it is incumbent upon the mover to state the reasons upon which his motion is founded, that the House may judge of the necessity, importance and expediency of calling for the papers which are the subject of that motion.

We are not arguing whether the reasons given by Mr. Ames were sufficient. Those reasons were admitted as good by the leader of the House and if they were sufficient what is the matter now ? The House is blocked from going into supply because the originals of the documents of which copies were brought down last year, were refused this year because there was not sufficient reason advanced for their production. If the documents cannot be brought down, why does not the minister invite the hon. member to go to his department and see the original documents ? Bourinot and May claim it is not the right of a member to ask for documents without giving sufficient reasons, that it is not the right of a member but is for the House to decide. I may say en passant that generally—and this is necessary—the majority in parliament must rule, but the rules of May which are copied by Bourinot apply more particularly to the parliament of Great Britain and I might say—and I hope I shall not offend any members on either side by doing so—that in Great Britain the lines of party are not so narrow and the votes given by members of the British House are not cast in a mould beforehand; there a member may fail to follow the leader of a party without danger of being looked on as a black sheep. Bourinot says further:

Returns may be refused on account of their voluminous character and the length of time it would take to prepare them, but in order to obviate such an objection, members are frequently invited to communicate with the department direct.

The member in this case could surely communicate with the department direct. But there is no great inconvenience in bringing down this document, and no serious objection unless it would endanger the public policy of the country or where the documents are private and confidential. I am inclined to differ with Bourinot and other authors on parliamentary law, as to whether it is the right of the member or the House to ask for the production of documents. We may say that documents are in the departments in trust, that they are in the hands of the ministers who are the servants of this House, and whether a member represents 60,000 people or 300 people he is a representative of the people; when he claims the production of a document he claims the production of the property of the people whom he represents. You might go further and say that a member asking for the production of documents is only asking for information and that it is the right of any member, before voting subsidies to His Majesty, to have all the information he is entitled to and there is no better source of information than the production of public documents. It is not only his right but it seems to me his duty to ask for it. If I am contrary to the authors on parliamentary law, I still say it is his duty to ask for the information. The House may decide upon it or not, but as I have said, if there is one principle of the British constitution and British institutions, it is that the representatives of the people have a right to every information before voting subsidies to His Majesty. I shall not discuss the sufficiency of the reasons given by Mr. Ames but I would quote part of his speech quoted by Mr. Fielding, at page 1178 of 'Hansard,' where he says:

We contend that we have a perfect right to ask for the originals and the government must allege very good reasons to justify them in refusing us access to such papers. This motion has been drafted purely and simply to test that one question, because we consider that we have sufficient reasons for desiring to see the original applications and tenders in respect to timber berths Nos. 1107, 1108 and 1171.

There is nothing here to the effect that his only reason was as a member of this House; on the contrary he claims he has good reasons for asking for the production of this document. Not only that, but the leader of this House said that the reasons were good. He agreed that the documents should be produced, and now, we find, not only that the documents are not produced, but that the hon. member for St. Antoine had the door of the Department of the Interior closed in his face when he went there to see the originals. What, then is the position? Where does the House stand? The production of the originals has been permitted, or, at the very least, the leader of the House has said that there were good reasons for the production of the originals for the inspection of the hon. member for St. Antoine. Then, why is not the hon. member allowed to see them? Why are we here wasting the time of the House hour after hour and blocking the supplies which should be voted to His Majesty? Everybody seems to agree that the reasons for producing the documents are good, that the documents ought to be produced, and yet, they are not produced.

It seems to be held that the onus probandi rest upon the hon. member for St. Antoine, but that it is in his second speech and not in his first that he made his case good. But if he has made his case good, I think the only thing would be for some representative of the government to assure the hon. member for St. Antoine that he is to see the originals, as it is admitted that his reasons are good. If this were done, the supply would not be blocked any more, but we should be able to go on with the business of the House.

Mr. W. B. NORTHRUP (East Hastings). It seems to me a little significant that on this question, on which, when brought before the House and voted on, the government's majority dwindled to 35, and on which, on its second appearance the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who leads the House, accepted theoretically—academically, at all events—the views of the opposition, yet, to-night, when the question is being debated again, not a single supporter of the right hon. gentleman is found to say a word on behalf of the government. Can it be that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, who sit behind the dignitaries of the front benches, think that the day may come when their own rights will be in danger and the interests of their constituents injuriously affected by the principle laid down? Sir, I was amused at the emphasis with which the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) dwelt upon the power and rights of this House. This is the first time I have ever heard that hon. gentleman take such an extreme position on that subject. I wondered if his interest in that mythical house which he had in mind, was based to any extent upon the exhibition we saw here within these walls when this very question was up for discussion. A resolution had been moved by the leader of the opposition

(Mr. R. L. Borden). The discussion having gone on, the question was put to the House, and those on this side cried 'Yes.' Then there arose a burst of sound that almost swelled the rafters from the roof when 'No' was shouted by hon. gentlemen opposite. But the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) said 'Carried,' and, in an instant, the amendment was unanimously accepted. And it is to such a House as that that hon. members are supposed to entrust their rights and the rights of their constituents.

I suppose there are different ways of looking at this subject, and I believe it is only fair for a person who wishes to arrive at a reasonable conclusion on any question to try to put himself in the position of one who takes a different view from his own. So, I have tried to put myself in a position—if I can imagine such a thing—of one of the hon. gentlemen who support the views announced by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) and alternately advocated and controverted by the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). It seems to me that, whatever we may think of their position on the whole, there is something to be said in favour of it from their point of view. It is an old saying that self-preservation is nature's first law. Let us see how that would apply. The hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) asked for the production of original documents. Hon. gentlemen opposite have, before now, produced original documents. It is not unnatural that they should indulge in a retrospective view to see what was the result of their obedience to the law of the land in this matter. They know by experience—as they have been reminded—that if they had kept back original documents they would have saved much unpleasantness and disgrace in connection with certain affairs of the North Atlantic Trading Company; they would have avoided a very great scandal arising out of the transactions of one Charles Strubbe; they would have prevented very discreditable disclosures in connection with the Galway Horse and Cattle Company; they would have kept secret from the people some of the utterly iniquitous expenditures for articles said to have been for the use of sailors on the 'Montcalm.' So, when these hon. gentlemen look back and see the effect of the production of original documents, it is no wonder they dislike the idea of having any more of such documents produced. I remember when, a couple of years ago, the time of members of this House was occupied with, and the attention of the country was fixed upon, a steamer commissioned by this government to discover the North Pole. I remember that I thought it an outrage that we the members of the investigating committee could not get the production of originals. To us had been referred the duty of ascertaining whether the prices paid for goods supplied to this steamer were reasonable or not. Many of these goods were on the boat at Sorel, and we asked that we might be allowed to have samples to see whether the prices paid were fair and equitable or not. I had gone to Toronto and to Montreal, and had taken every means within my power to ascertain the facts, but always there was the same reply: How can any man tell whether the price of this or that was reasonable, unless he can see the article for which the price was paid? Then, when we took evidence, we began to see that the government was not so far astray—from their standpoint in refusing the production of originals. We found, for instance, that handsome figures were paid for fur-lined coats. Everybody will agree that, unless you see the article, it is impossible to say whether any price paid for a fur-lined coat is reasonable or unreasonable. But when we got the evidence that these coats were canvas on the outside and sheepskin on the inside we ceased to wonder that the government declined to have the samples produced in order that the committee might form an opinion on the matter. If I were allowed to refer to the proceedings of a committee of this House now sitting—and I suppose I am not—I could give another reason why hon. gentlemen opposite believe that the production of original documents, even when ordered by this House, may be found very inconvenient. So, perhaps, from the standpoint of these hon. gentlemen, there is something to be said for the view they take. But looking at it calmly, on what ground is this refused? I see that hon. gentlemen opposite place their confidence in Bourinot, as if there were something sacred in the wisdom found in his pages. One quotation that they make from Bournnot is this:

> It is quite obvious that no member should move for papers except on sufficient grounds.

I venture to say that nobody will question that. But it will be observed that this does not say 'except on stating sufficient grounds.' It is merely a principle laid down to govern the conduct of members in the House—that it would be quite out of keeping with the dignity of a member of this House to move for papers recklessly, or merely to gratify a personal curiosity. It is obvious that he should not move for papers except on sufficient grounds. The next sentence goes further, and I admit that it seems to justify the view expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite:

> It is clearly laid down by the most eminent English parliamentarians that it is incumbent upon the mover to state the reasons upon which his motion is founded, that the House may judge of the necessity, importance and expediency of calling for the papers which are the subject of that motion.

You will see, Sir, that there is not a word here giving us the late Sir John Bourinot's opinion. This was a principle laid down by the most eminent English parliamentarians, that it was incumbent on the mover to state his reasons.

I fancy and venture to say, even in the presence of the Minister of Justice, that there is no lawyer in this country who will say that the statement I have just read is justified by the authorities quoted at the foot of the page. The first of the authorities is Lord Melbourne, in the parliament of 1838. That is quite a time ago. You would hardly imagine that Liberals in the Dominion of Canada would seek to bolster up such a position as they have occupied the last two or three days by reference to an utterance made in 1838. But when we come to look at this case in 1838 we see that it does not touch the present case at all. Lord Brougham was speaking, he had quarrelled with his old colleague, Viscount Melbourne, there was a personal struggle on a public question. Lord Brougham was advised to move for the papers and he did, and Lord Melbourne pointed out that he would not grant the papers for state reasons. It was pointed that the rule was as hon. gentlemen now say, but that even in 1838 the practice had for many years been, not to require any reasons. That is one of the authorities. Then there is another authority. I suppose there can not be very many others, when the only other English one quoted by Bourinot goes as far back as 1771. Just imagine, gentlemen, in the parliament of Canada, on this side of the Atlantic, a parliament that we rather pride ourselves on as being more progressive than the parliament of Great Britain, in this year of grace 1908, we are to be fettered by an utterance made by a comparatively obscure individual in England in the year 1771, and this is the other authority. What do we find in this authority ? It is this :

Mr. Welbore Ellis. I shall state my opinion upon the doctrine of calling for papers of state in this House. It has generally been considered wise not to call for them unless they are indispensably necessary to the consideration of the subject then before the House, and the ground of such necessity is clearly stated.

Surely there is no connection between the calling for these papers of state and this particular case. The question then was the interference of France in the negotiations between England and Spain relative to the restitution of the Falkland islands, there were intricate and voluminous papers which he refers to as papers of state, and it is pointed out that it was not considered wise to call for them unless they were absolutely necessary. Surely we are not to be fettered and shackled in the year 1908 by such an opinion as that by a comparatively unknown person on a subject that in no way touches the present subject before the House. One other authority is that referred to by my hon. friend from Hamilton as having occurred in 1878 or 1879 where a motion was made for the papers that would involve an expenditure, and Sir Charles Tupper, then Mr. Tupper, said that he was perfectly willing to produce the papers, but that they involved expense and that he did not think that such a question as the dismissal of a postmaster was of sufficient importance to justify the expense. Therefore he would insist on some better reason than by his hon. friend just saying that he wanted to know why the man was dismissed. The ground given in his speech was that there would be an expense put upon the country. But strange to say, even in that comparative remote period, not remote compared with that of the authorities on which hon. gentlemen opposite are basing their position, even on that occasion a gentleman whose name is now unhappily as forgotten by hon. gentlemen opposite, as his political principles, one Alexander Mackenzie, expressed himself to the effect that it was quite sufficient for an hon. member to be entitled to the information he asked for in a matter of this kind without stating further reason than that he believed the officer had been unjustly dismissed, and that was all that was necessary to secure the papers. So I think I have shown that the quotation in Bourinot on which hon. gentlemen opposite have based their position is really not justified by what is given by Bourinot himself. There is perhaps one significant thing that I might mention. If we look back at the edition written by Bourinot, and without least desiring to discredit the last edition published by another hon. gentleman well known and respected in this House, I find on page 281 of the Bourinot edition these words:

But it must be remembered that under all circumstances it is for the House to consider whether the reasons given for refusing the information are sufficient. The right of parliament to obtain every possible information on public questions undoubted, and the circumstances must be exceptional and the reasons very cogent when it cannot be at once laid before the Houses.

That I do not find in the last edition, but I do find it on page 221 of the original Bourinot. Hon. gentlemen opposite have not seen fit to quote that. Now, coming to the position occupied by the right hon. the Prime Minister I propose to discuss it briefly. Without pretending to make any reflection upon him, I do feel justified in saying that any stranger to Canada not acquainted with the position, character and experience of the Prime Minister, would hardly believe he was sincere in the position he now occupies in view of his own utterances at different times in this debate. The other evening I pointed out to this House that whereas the Minister of the Interior refused to allow this motion on one ground, the right hon. the Prime Minister cut that ground from under his feet, saying that it had not the slightest weight whatever. It is true, however, that the right hon. gentleman smoothed the feelings of his perhaps outraged colleague by saying that he could agree with him fully. But if we look at page 1178 of the 'Hansard' we will find a certain statement made by the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) in moving this motion, and I would like to read, and ask hon. gentlemen opposite what is a fair interpretation of it. This is a quotation from the original speech that he made in moving his motion:

Last year when a debate was about to take place in this House, a return was laid on the table of the House, and several members of the opposition had an opportunity of examining it. There were certain features about the return that led them to think that it would be advisable to see the original. I, for one, called at the Department of the Interior and was shown, without the slightest hesitation by the deputy minister, the originals of the returns which had been copied. By having access to these originals, I obtained certain information which was of great value in discussing the question in the House. Since that time I understand that strict orders have been given that no member of this House shall be permitted by the Deputy Minister of the Interior to see any original documents. Therefore, the only method open to us is to ask that these original documents be laid on the table of the House in order that we may see them in that way.

Here the hon. member points out that he had previously visited the office and had seen the originals and got certain information; afterwards he went back for a similar purpose and was refused the opportunity of seeing them, consequently he had no other recourse than to move for the production of the originals in order to obtain information that he could not get from copies. That is as clear as the English language can make it, and that is in the first speech of the hon. member for St. Antoine. Now looking at page 1686 I find this language used by the Prime Minister:

But there may be other occasions where, perhaps, for reasons which are known to himself, and which I would not question, and which he can state to the House, a member may think that the copies woud not give him the information which the originals would. So far so good, and if he so states it seems to me that he is entitled to have the originals.

My hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, says: I saw the originals and I saw copies in another case, and the originals gave me information that I could not get from the copies. This year, when I got copies, I went to the office of the deputy minister, I was refused permission to see the originals and I cannot get the information from the copies. Then the right hon. gentleman says:

But there may be other occasions, where, perhaps, for reasons which are known to himself, and which I would not question, and which he can state to the House, a member may think that the copies would not give him the information which the originals would. So far so good, and if he so states, it seems to me that he is entitled to have the originals.

Mr. TAYLOR. Who made that statement?

Mr. NORTHRUP. The right hon. the premier. I have not heard a reason which would justify—I will not say any member of this House—but any one in this country in believing that it was necessary for the right hon. gentleman to refuse to place these documents on the table on the ground that no reason had been given when my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, gave a reason that he said himself was sufficient. I would like to ask, in view of what the right hon. gentleman thought the other night, when he spoke as reported at page 1686 of 'Hansard,' what has occurred between that time and this that he should now refuse to give what he then said should be given? It is not a question of a backdown on the part of a great government; it is not a question as to their rights; it is not a question of looking to the future to see that no injustice is done, but it is a question of the right hon. gentleman standing by what he promised. That is the question before the House, and it seems to me that the motion is of comparatively trifling importance compared with that. I would like to point out one of the possibilities that arises from the rule laid down by the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues. It has been pointed out again and again that the hon. gentleman, if he were to undertake to repeat his motion, would, under the rules of the House, be out of order. I think that every hon. member will agree that my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, has done everything he could possibly do within the rules of parliament to secure the production of these original documents. He has asked for them, he has appealed for them, he has neglected nothing he could possibly do, he has done everything in his power, and he does not move again simply because he would be out of order if he were to do so. Does it strike the right hon. gentleman that my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, is but one member of this House? If he moved that these papers be laid on the table of the House, myself and every other hon. gentleman in this House would be entitled to see them, and therefore we are all interested in that motion. The right hon. gentleman deliberately attempts to punish every other member, because he says that my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, did not move his motion just as the right hon. gentleman thinks he ought to have moved it. I would like to protest against my being punished because some one else in the House has not expressed his ideas as technically as the right hon. gentleman thinks he ought to have done. Is this the state to which we have been brought by a reform government? Is it a Liberal government that we have in this country? Does the right hon. gentleman come from a province where for so many years a Papineau fought for what he conceived to be the rights of the people, and does the hon. Minister of Customs come from a province where his predecessors fought against the family compact? I would like to know if any family compact in the height of its power ever dreamed of subjecting the representatives of the people to what has been attempted in this case?

Now, Sir, I think, under the circumstances, that I am justified in calling the attention of the House to the effect produced on other members by the rule applied to a motion such as this. I do not suppose that there is any member on this side of the House who thinks that the hon. Minister of the Interior has more than four or five transactions in his department each year that he anticipates that we will discover and that he wants to cover up. All that the hon. gentleman has to do is to put up four or five of his own supporters to move bona fide motions for these papers, but unfortunately to fail to express themselves in technical terms; then every member on this side of the House is hopelessly blocked from any attempt to look into the transactions which are thus covered over. That cannot be the object surely, and yet hon. gentlemen on this side of the House might be burdened for years by this handicap. In view of our experience in the past, in view of the turnings and twistings, denials and counter-denials that we have heard in this very debate, in view of the exhibition that I referred to the other night when we saw that at all times hon. gentlemen opposite are prepared to vote either way just as the exigencies of the case require, is it any wonder that we feel that much as we may expect to be prejudiced by this extraordinary conduct on the part of the right hon. Prime Minister, far more serious would be the things that, a session or two later, one would be obliged to call attention to, because as we in our innocence could not foresee such depths as have been attained by this government in this debate. So we can not foretell the contract carnivals that they would hold behind the shelter of this new rule.

A great deal has been said about the rights of members of parliament to see documents in the various departments. The hon. Minister of Finance very kindly said that he had no doubt that he would be willing to show documents to any members of parliament who went to his department and asked to see them. That would be very satisfactory in a way, but members of the opposition would like to know what their rights are. Nobody will dispute the legal theory of equal responsibility, but any investigation into the doings of the government, any inquiry into the expenditure of public money, must be by members of the opposition. It is practically certain—we can speak from past experience—that no gentleman sitting beside the right hon. Prime Minister will be in any way alive to or take any part in any such investigation as I have referred to. Now, does it strike hon. gentlemen opposite that it is a reasonable proposition in this twentieth century—I will not discuss what they did in the seventeenth century—that members who come here and investigate these matters and honestly endeavour to investigate these matters, can only do so by the courtesy of hon. gentlemen opposite? Could you impose a heavier handicap on a member of the opposition in trying to do his duty? I go to a ministerial office and say that there are certain papers that I would like to look at, that there is a transaction that strikes me, from my examination of the copies of the papers, as not being a right and proper transaction. You have no right to be there, I am told; you can only see these papers by the courtesy, leave and license of the minister. Am I to be at liberty to investigate these papers? If I desire to go in my right way as a member of parliament in the public interest, must I submit to discouragements and opposition? If the people are willing to allow me to be snubbed in that way, and if the minister does allow me to look into these papers, is it not a little hard for me to come back to the House and launch an attack against his administration, possibly on information obtained solely by the good will and courtesy of the minister? I venture to say that there is many a member of this House who, if he had discovered anything wrong, which he could only do as a matter of gracious kindness on the part of the minister, would be very apt not to bring it before the House, because he would not be inclined to fight the minister who had treated him as he thought a fellow-member should be treated. If any inquiry would be made, if any investigation would be successful, if any minister would be caught, it would be the good, genial soul who tried to do his duty to a fellow-member, and not the sharp old curmudgeon who shut the door and refused to allow you inside. I had always thought that one of the rules of life was that encouragement should be given to that which leads to the higher and better course of conduct, but the principle laid down by hon. gentlemen opposite would seem to place all the prizes of life in the other direction. The man who does right may be punished, the man who does wrong is perfectly safe; and so, without occupying the time of the House longer at this hour of the night, I feel justified in moving, in view of what has occurred lately and what has been said in this debate:

That all the words after the word 'that' in the proposed motion be omitted and that the following be subsituted therefor: 'Subject to such consideration of the public policy as can be validly urged in any case members of parliament have the right to have access to all the records of the government and to all the archives.'

Mr. R. S. LAKE (Qu'Appelle). After the very able speech which has been delivered by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Northrup) I do not think I need add very much in support of the amendment just placed before the House. I rise principally for the purpose of making my strongest protest against the astounding doctrines which were advanced by the Minister of Finance in regard to the rights of members of this House. Most of his speech was devoted to laying down the principle that the opposition members in this chamber have absolutely no rights except such as may be accorded to them by the majority; a majority which on more than one occasion has shown itself to be tyrannical. To my mind it behooves every man in this House to stand up to assert the dignity of the position he holds as a representative of the people of Canada, and to vindicate the rights which our ancestors have fought for and won during many centuries of struggle. I am astounded that a man who professes to be a leader of Liberals should lay down the doctrine that no private member has any right other than those accorded him by the will of the majority. That statement is in direct opposition to the statement made by his own leader only two days ago. The Prime Minister was in a very considerate frame of mind then, and he sought to make us believe that these documents were going to be laid before the House and that he acquiesced in the demand of the opposition. Here is what the Prime Minister then said ('Hansard, page 1685):

No one denies either that members of parliament, not merely parliament itself, but members of parliament have the right to have access to all the records of the government and to all the archives if they believe that in the public interest they should have such access. Nor do I conceive this privilege has been denied on the occasion to which my hon. friend has referred.

But to-night the Minister of Finance has denounced that doctrine, and he was applauded by members behind him who call themselves Liberals.

Mr. NORTHRUP

Mr. SPROULE. And who applauded the Prime Minister's statement just as vociferously.

Mr. LAKE. Exactly so. But it is not only on this particular subject that the Minister of Finance has gone absolutely against the views which were pronounced by his leader. Had the Minister of Finance been in the House this afternoon he would have known that the Prime Minister stated that the reasons which were adduced by my hon. friend (Mr. Ames) why these original papers should be produced were amply sufficient and in fact the Prime Minister laid down the formula which he considered was sufficient. He said that it was sufficient for an hon. member to declare:

I cannot do justice to the case without the originals.

And the originals would be laid on the table of the House. But we find the Minister of Finance taking a position absolutely antagonistic to that of his leader in this matter and denying that any good cause had been shown by my hon. friend (Mr. Ames) for the production of these papers. I protest in the strongest words against the deadlock to which we are subjected by the conduct of the government. The Minister of Finance talks about wasting the time of this House, when day after day most scandalous waste of time has been occasioned by the action of the government. This is the situation: the application for the original documents was made on January 18, and as the Prime Minister has admitted, more than sufficient reasons were given to justify the House in granting that application. But in spite of that fact the Prime Minister himself called on his supporters to vote down the resolution and to refuse the production of these original documents. To-day the Prime Minister, having in the meantime found that he could not justify before the people the position he had taken, and that he would have to recede from it, and having acquiesced in the motion of the leader of the opposition, he tells us to-day that the fullest reasons were given why these original documents should be produced and he leads us to suppose that this would be done. That must have been his intention in using the language he did. And yet he refuses to take action in accordance with the implied promise he gave to the House, although he left it to be understood that by some unknown means which he would not suggest these documents were likely to be laid upon the table. We know from past experience that the Minister of the Interior will not be bound by a resolution of this House. We know that two or three years ago a resolution was passed by a unanimous vote of this House condemning interference of officials in elections of representatives for the Dominion or provincial legislatures, and saying that these officials shall not engage in partisan work of any description.

That resolution was unanimously passed, but the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) cynically refuses to be bound by it. Although the House has endorsed the resolution moved a couple of days ago by the leader of the opposition, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) will not consider himself in any way bound by it. Yet that resolution was passed at the instance of the right hon. gentleman himself who spoke in favour of it. That resolution declares that members of this House have the right to be furnished with the originals of public documents, and we would be wanting in self respect and in our duty to the public if we were now to consent to that order of the House being ignored and treated with contempt by any minister. If the right hon. gentleman was sincere in what he said, he will implement his statement to the House by action and do it right now. It is now for him to show whether or not he acted and spoke in good faith when he called on this House to pass the motion made by the leader of the opposition. It is now for him to show that what he said this afternoon and a couple of days ago was not mere bluff, intended to hoodwink the people. He is the only one in this House who has the power to give effect to the motion which he called on the House to adopt the other day, and it is his bounden duty to see that such action is taken. It is due to the dignity of this House and to his own self respect, as leader of this House, that he should see that his promises are implemented by the action of his ministers and followers. Otherwise the principle is to be forced upon this free, deliberative assembly, that though we may order the production of original documents, their production is to depend on the mere will and pleasure and the tender mercies of the Minister of the Interior. That minister has issued an order to the officials of his department to refuse access to the original files of the department to those whom he is pleased to term outsiders. But we find, as a matter of fact, that that prohibition is not completely carried into effect because it is not applied to supporters of the government. Hon. members on the Liberal side are given free access to these documents but that access is denied to hon. members on this side. We had that clearly demonstrated by the hon. member for Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Ross) in a debate which took place a couple of days ago. That hon. gentleman told us that he had seen hundreds of files in the Department of the Interior and that he was allowed to see them because he was there doing business on behalf of his constituents and not simply prying into other people's affairs. Well, I cast the insinuation back in his teeth that members on this side, when they ask to see public documents in that department, are simply prying into the affairs of other people, and not doing their duty as representatives of the people. I myself have had experience in this matter only a short time ago. One of my constituents asked me to go to the land office at Regina and inquire into the condition in which his claim for certain public lands stood at the time. I went to the agent, I read to him the letter I had received, and as courteously as I could I told him that I would like to know the details of the case. He sent for the files and answered some of my questions but not all of them. I said to him that if he would allow me to look at the file a moment or two, I could satisfy myself and give my constituent the information he desired. But the agent refused. He said he had orders from the department not to show these files to any one ; and so I, a representative of the people, had to submit to being refused information by an official of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver). But it is my firm conviction that these instructions are not indiscriminately applied at that land office and that the original files of that office are not withheld from the inspection of everybody. It is my firm belief that certain supporters of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) have been allowed to inspect the files in the land office at Regina and in other land offices ; and we have been told in this House by one of the members who are supporting the present government. that he had been allowed to inspect hundreds of files. The Minister of the Interior told us the other day that the inspection of these files was refused to outsiders. No doubt what he means by an outsider is any man who is not a supporter of the present Liberal administration. All who do not support the government are outsiders and are not to be given the privilege of seeing how the affairs of this government are being carried on. A few days ago the hon. minister made a strong complaint that the business of the Department of the Interior was being hampered by the number of returns asked for and the size of these returns. The right hon. the First Minister himself called attention to that fact and spoke of some seventy-five or eighty returns having been already asked for. But does he not know that if the ordinary courtesy were extended to hon. members on this side of being allowed to inspect the files of the department, probably not one in five of these returns would be called for. In the case to which I refer, I was compelled, by the mere fact that I was not allowed to look at the record then in the hands of the official of the department, to move for all correspondence in this office and the office at Regina relating to that matter. No doubt that will be a most voluminous return, which it will take some time to prepare. I asked for it six weeks ago, and there is no sign yet as to when it will come down. But had I been allowed to glance through the file, I would not have been obliged to move for the production of these papers. Therefore if the business of the Department of the Interior is hampered by the bulk and the number of these returns, that is due to the action of the minister himself in throwing every obstacle in the way of members of the opposition ascertaining what is being done in his department regarding the various matters in which they are interested. When the discretion is left in his hands, are we to expect him to produce these original documents for which we are asking ? I submit that it is the duty of the First Minister to put an end to all this waste of time by having these papers we have called for brought down. He distinctly led us to believe this afternoon that they would be brought down and laid on the table.

Mr. GEORGE O. ALCORN (Prince Edward). I rise merely to call attention to a certain point which has presented itself to me. It is that this matter and the whole matter now under discussion is absolutely concluded by the records of the House, and it is therefore not necessary to cite authorities, to resort to technicalities, or to strain the construction of parliamentary practice. It appears to me that the government by the action of the Prime Minister who speaks for the whole government, has assented to and has made his own and has fastened upon his party the whole effect of the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition in this House on the 21st instant. That amendment includes the whole subject in controversy and is in these words :

Subject to such considerations of public policy as can be validly urged in any case.

To what do these words refer ? I submit they refer most pointedly and clearly to the authorities contained in the various works upon the subject, which hold that where it is in the public interest that certain documents should not be produced the government are to exercise their discretion upon that point, and if they are convinced the public interest would suffer they are not to produce these documents.

Subject to such considerations of public policy as can be validly urged in any case, it is the undoubted right of the people's representatives, in parliament assembled, to be informed of everything necessary to explain the policy and proceedings of the government, and for that purpose to have an opportunity of seeing and examining all documents connected with the transaction of public business.

Surely this expression 'documents' necessarily includes 'original documents'. Here is a declaration in as plain language as can possibly be penned, that except in the cases cited in the books as those in which a government may, on grounds of public policy and in the public interest, refuse the papers :

It is the undoubted right of the people's representatives—— ——to have sight of all documents, which necessarily include original documents. This amendment in these terms has been absolutely accepted by the leader of the government himself and hon. gentlemen have not only the records of the House to refer to but were present and heard the words and witnessed the action of the hon. gentleman on that occasion. That being the case, it seems to me that the government are absolutely precluded by the action of their own leader from taking the position they have taken to-night that certain original documents should not be produced.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou). Mr. Speaker, in view of the late hour I would move that the debate be adjourned.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Before the debate is adjourned I would like to point out, for the information of the Prime Minister, that the language of the motion is his own. At page 1685 of 'Hansard' we find these words :

No one denies either, that members of parliament have the right to have access to all the records of the government and to all the archives, if they believe that in the public interest they should have such access.

I think that sufficiently answers the statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) this evening who took the astonishing, the amazing ground that the minority have absolutely no rights in this House.

Mr. FIELDING. Except such as the majority may grant it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Except such as the majority may grant it. That is a new doctrine of consitutional government. I may tell the Minister of Finance, to use an expression used years ago, that I will stay here until I am no bigger than a pipe-stem, before I will submit to any such tyrannical doctrine as that.

Mr. FIELDING. The rule will remain.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The rule will remain perhaps if it is the right one, but we will remain as long as we can before we recognize it and the minister will find no one assenting to his views on that particular question among those who sit on the left of Mr. Speaker. The rights of the minority depend on the will of the majority ? All the rules of parliamentary government that have been laid down from time immemorial, in the parliaments of Great Britain are to go for naught and there is to be substituted therefor the tyrannical rule of a majority in this House. That is the doctrine which the Minister of Finance intends to force upon this House ? That rule will not be accepted in this free parliament of Canada without a very prolonged and earnest struggle. We have some rights that do not depend on the will of the majority. We have rights which depend on the immemorial usage of parliament, recognized throughout the British empire, in every one of the Dominions of the British Empire, since parliamentary institutions have been known, and to endeavour to substitute for these, as the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance have endeavoured to do, the tyrannical will of any majority in this parliament however great will not be accepted in this House, so long as I have breath to speak or any hon. gentlemen on this side has strength enough to remain in this House and fight the battles of the liberties of the parliament of Canada.

Let me call the attention of the Prime Minister to another matter. I understood him to say here to-night—I put the question to him as forcibly as I could—I said: If a man moves in this House as men do every day when parliament is in session, for certain papers to be brought down, without uttering one word of reason in support of that motion, and if the Prime Minister stands up on the other side and says: Give your reasons, then if the reasons are given, the Prime Minister, if he is right in the position he has taken, may answer: You should have given those reasons in the first instance. That is the position he took if I understood him; am I right or wrong?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Absolutely wrong.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Then I would like the right hon. gentleman to tell me why the reasons given by Mr. Ames in his closing speech were not all sufficient for the purpose of enabling that motion to be passed. Will my right hon. friend tell me that?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes, I have told it three or four times already; because the hon. gentleman claimed it as a right to have these papers produced without giving any reasons at all, he declared it as a right that he could claim the originals without giving reasons and said that he brought this as a test case.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am speaking of the closing remarks of my hon. friend.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The closing is simply an endorsement of the first part.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I beg pardon, I will read it again. It is to be found in the debate of the 13th of January; it has been read six or seven times already, but I shall read it again in order that there shall be no misunderstanding.

Here is the return we have been speaking about; it contains 453 pages. I have read that return from cover to cover. Now, there are nine pages of that return which can be illumined if I may see the originals. As to all the other pages the copies are all I want. But there are nine pages there with respect to which the copy does not tell me all I want to know or which I have the right to know if I understand my rights in this House of Commons.

Mr. OLIVER. Does my hon. friend say that these nine pages differ from the original.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. How could he tell unless he sees the original?

Mr. AMES. I say that these nine pages will in all probability clear up certain doubts which I have regarding peculiar features in connection with some of these transactions; I say that the handwriting of some of these nine pages may have a very important bearing on the case.

Now, if that is not good reason for the production of the originals, even within the principles laid down by the Prime Minister himself, I am absolutely at sea as to what could be a good reason; and I am absolutely at sea as to what the Prime Minister meant this afternoon, when he expressly stated, as I understood him, that it was a good and sufficient reason and would have been enough if it had been stated in the hon. gentleman's opening speech. Do I misquote the Prime Minister in saying that?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I was not listening closely——

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Did not the Prime Minister state in this House to-day that, if the reason given by the hon. member for St. Antoine in his concluding speech, had been given in his speech in the first instance, that motion would have been passed?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I did not say that to-day.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The Prime Minister did not say that?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not remember having said it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Then I misunderstood the right hon. gentleman, and I think a good many others misunderstood him also. At any rate, I can tell him what he said on the occasion of the debate two days ago. Does the right hon. gentleman say that the concluding speech of the hon. member for St. Antoine does not set forth a good reason for the production of these documents?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I did not say that. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ames) would come—if he had come at first—and asked, for reasons, this production, I would have given the most liberal interpretation. I would do so now; I would do so at any time; I would give it the most liberal interpretation possible. But, on the ground on which he made his motion, we could not agree.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The Prime Minister is not giving a fair answer. I say that not in an offensive way, but because I want to keep to the point. Let us not talk of general reasons, but of the reasons I have read. I ask the right hon. gentleman: If these reasons had been given in the opening speech of the hon. member, would not that be a justification ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I would go further. I say unhesitatingly that, when a member comes forward and says : I could not get the information from the copies and I want to have the originals, that seems a fair and good reason for that course. But that is not the position that was taken then. I go further than the hon. gentleman (Mr. R. L. Borden).

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Then I will answer the right hon gentleman out of his own mouth. I refer to page 1687 of 'Hansard' :

> As a rule, when a motion for papers is made we do not challenge the motive of the member making it, but if the motion is challenged, and we say there is no good reason for bringing down the papers, then it is for the member to give reasons which will satisfy the House.

That is exactly what the hon. member for St. Antoine did. Let us assume that he gave no reason in the first instance—I do not agree that he did not, but let it be assumed for the sake of the argument. His motion was challenged, and then to use the words of the Prime Minister, he gave his reasons in the concluding speech. He met every condition raised, from first to last, by the Prime Minister in regard to this case—every possible condition. And, further on, the Prime Minister says :

> For my part, the moment a member gives a good reason for the production of papers, the production of the papers should take place.

If my hon. friend (Mr. Ames) did not give good reason in the first instance, he did give good reason in his concluding speech, to which speech the Prime Minister has not taken, and cannot take, any exception. Then, why are we delaying ? Why are the government obstructing the business of the House by the non-production of these documents ? What does it all amount to ? Here are 9 pages out of 453. We have been debating the matter for three or four days. But in five minutes my hon. friend from St. Antoine could go to the Department of the Interior and examine these documents or, in fifteen minutes, the documents could be ordered from the department and laid on the table and my hon. friend could look at them and satisfy his mind with regard to them, and we could resume the business of the House. What is all this disturbance ? Why do the government deny this right, when, in the words of the Prime Minister, it should be granted to every member who declares that he desires to see these documents in the public interest. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Ames) has declared that—he has declared it over and over again. He declared it the other day twice, first in his opening speech and then, with more elaborate reasons and in greater detail, in his closing speech. He declared it to-day in the presence of the Prime Minister. Well, we have these admissions, by the Prime Minister on behalf of the government, of the principle, but we have exactly the opposite course of action in their dealing with the hon. member (Mr. Ames). I think that, under the circumstances, my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) should read over the debate and consider the principles he has laid down, and see whether, after all, he does not come to the conclusion that what has been claimed here is the right of an individual member of parliament, asserted before his fellow members, asserted according to constitutional principles and the law and usages of parliament, a right which has been denied but which cannot be denied with any sense of fairness or any pretense of adherence to those principles which have governed parliaments ever since parliaments first were known.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. In the course of a somewhat long parliamentary career, I can say that, in all my experience, I never saw such a tempest in a teapot as we have had here.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. A mere tempest in a teapot. Hon gentlemen have been merely playing upon words; hon. gentlemen have been losing the time of the House; hon. gentlemen have been drawing upon their imaginations in this discussion; hon. members have been trying to bulldoze the government; hon. gentlemen have been taking a position in the first instance which they could never have maintained. I have been the leader of the House for something like twelve years, and so far as I know, I have endeavoured to discharge my duty with fairness to all parties. So far as I know, I never took advantage of any member of this House, even a member of the smallest minority; and, so far as I know, I have always tried to secure for the minority the rights to which they were entitled. The hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) moved the other day a motion absolutely unprecedented in this House—absolutely unlike anything that had ever been presented in this House, so far as I know. He moved that certain original documents should be brought to this House. Usually, when an hon. member moves for papers, he moves for copies; and copies are brought down, and from these he gets the information to which he is entitled. But on this occasion the hon. gentleman wants to have the originals. If he had asked these originals simply upon the motion which he moved, saying : I have not the information I want; I cannot get that information from these papers—it would have been for us to consider whether it should be given; and I think it would have been given. But it has been stated in this House, and it must be stated again, that the hon. gentleman said he wanted to make a test case. A test case of what? A test case of having originals brought down, and that upon the mere fact that they were originals and without showing any reason. There are his words, as we find them in his opening speech. They have been quoted before, but I ask the indulgence of the House while I quote them again :

We contend that we have a perfect right to ask for the originals, and the government must allege very good reasons to justify them in refusing us access to such papers.

Now that is an extraordinary contention, that in a matter of this kind it is not for the member who made the motion to give reasons, but it was for the government to give reasons why the papers should not be produced. One would have thought that in a matter of this kind it was for the hon. gentleman who wanted the papers to give his reasons why they should be produced ; but the hon. member for St. Antoine says, No, I have no reasons to give, I ask for these papers as a right, and it is for the government to bring them down. Then he goes on to say :

This motion has been drafted purely and simply to test that one question,——

What question ? The question that they are entitled to have the originals as an absolute right without giving any reasons.

—because we consider that we have sufficient reasons for desiring to see the original applications and tenders in respect to timber berths.

Now let us come to his conclusion.

Mr. BERGERON. Will the right hon. gentleman allow me one word ? Did not the member for St. Antoine say that it was on the suggestion of the Minister of the Interior that he made that motion in the House ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The hon. member for St. Antoine said many things, and we have to read his speech in the light of the conclusion which he founds upon it. Now I have given the conclusion of his first speech. Let me now read again—because it has already been quoted—the concluding portion of his concluding speech :

Is there any great hardship entailed upon the department or any one else to gratify my right to see these papers as a member of this House? The argument which the minister has made falls to the ground in this respect. Adopt any method you like, move any amendment you want, but establish the principle that when we on this side of the House have what we consider good and sufficient reason, we may have the right to see an original document, or else be prepared to take the odium throughout the country that you do not wish an original document to see the light. That is all I have to say.

Is that not the conclusion of his speech, that when he thought he had a sufficient reason to ask for the originals he had simply to say so ? Does it not then follow that my hon. friend, or any one else, may make a motion for the originals and justify his motion by simply stating that he wants to see them? And if we are bound to give them in one case are we not bound to give them in every other case ?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Would the hon. gentleman gather his precedent from the whole record of the whole debate ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The whole debate includes the concluding portion of it. The hon. gentleman said that he made his motion in order to test the question. Under such circumstances what had we to do? We had simply to say that we could not grant the motion on those grounds. But there is a sinister impression on the other side of the House that we want to conceal these papers. For my part I never saw those papers, I do not even suspect what their contents are, but I resent the imputation that we do not want the papers to be brought down because we are afraid there is something wrong in them. They may be right or they may be wrong, for all I know. But so far as I am concerned, I altogether reject the imputation involved in the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite. I say here at once that if the hon. member for St. Antoine will come now, or at any time, and ask for those papers and give us his reasons therefor, he shall have the same measure of justice which I have always extended to every member of this House since I have been leader of it. I do not look at the consequences, I do not know what they are. The hon. gentleman says he has no other interest to serve but a public interest. Well he is a new member, and perhaps he was a little bold in his attempt. He thought perhaps that he could force us on this occasion, and on every other occasion, to comply with a similar request. We think that his attempt should be resisted. But if this hon. member will come as any other member may come and ask for the papers, giving his reasons—I have already stated that any member of the House is entitled to have the information. But does it follow that we must yield to every member's caprice ? Does it follow that because an hon. member has a right to information he is entitled to it simply to serve private interests ? Surely the House will not allow that privilege when it is desired to serve a caprice. It is supposed that he wishes to serve a public interest. My hon. friend alludes to the fact that when a motion is made in this House for papers we do not ask for reasons. If a member of this House makes a motion we do not suspect his motive, and we grant the papers at once. But they are brought down in the usual form, that is in the form of copies. But the hon. gentleman departs from the usual form and says he wants the originals. Have we not the right to ask why he wants the originals, what purpose he wants to serve, why he is not satisfied with the copies ? His reasons may be good or bad, and the House will judge of them. But it is not unfair to ask him to give his reasons, and think we may legitimately do so. If on the other hand the hon. gentleman will say that he has no reason to give, if he simply says that he wants the papers, do hon. gentlemen opposite say that under those circumstances we are bound to grant his request ? Do they think that it is treating parliament fairly to ask that such a motion be granted ? What would be the consequence ? I have pointed out the consequences to the leader of the opposition. Why we might have on the table of this House hundreds of documents from the various departments.

Sir, this is really a very small matter. It is a very small matter for hon. gentlemen opposite to lose the time of the House over. We have been spending the whole day upon it. I repeat as I have said in a previous debate, that any member of this House who gives reasons for making a motion asking for such papers, is entitled to them. Let the hon. member for St. Antoine move for the papers and give his reasons, such reasons as he may give, as he says he can give. If he says he wants the information to enable him to legislate, that is a fair reason which he might have given. But when the hon. gentleman comes to us with a club in his hand, we are certainly bound to resist, and resist it we will.

Hon. GEO. E. FOSTER (North Toronto). The right hon. gentleman in his concluding sentence made use of a phrase that he had no right to make use of, it carried an insinuation which he had no right to imply. The member for St. Antoine is a human being, he has his own feelings, he has his own manhood. He is just as good a man as the right hon. gentleman, he represents just as good a constituency.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Not a bit of it.

Mr. FOSTER. He has just as good men behind him, he has just as good a sense of dignity, and a better sense of true and fair dealing than my right hon. friend. And the proof of that is in the turnings and twistings and quibblings of my right hon. friend within the last five hours in this House patent to everybody on this side of the House. In the first place my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, never came with a club in his hands. I deny it. The right hon. gentleman cannot assert it and prove his assertion. His Minister of Finance sits besides him. Will he controvert what the Minister of Finance said that there is absolutely no difference made in the books as between copies and originals ? The right hon. gentleman agrees with that. Does he know that the motion was made by the hon. member for St. Antoine a year ago for these very papers, that the House ordered them and that they had been down before the House for twelve months or so ? No difference between copies and the originals! said the Finance Minister. This House heard the reasons if there were any given and made the orders and had the papers brought down for these reasons and they remained down in accordance with this order. To-day what is it ? Simply that my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, instead of coming with a club in his hand, came as a gentleman, as a member of the House, not crawling as the hon. Minister of Finance wants him to do, not being particularly careful to understand what the exact spirit in which he should approach this high and mighty dignitary, this Minister of Finance, not being careful enough to read the books of etiquette to find out just how many genuflexions to make, just what tone of voice to speak in, just what crook of his back he should use when he bowed down humbly before the Minister of Finance and said : Oh, most mighty one, I beseech you to do me this favour. He did not do that. He came as the representative of the people and he simply asked this House to pass an order which would be exactly on the lines of last year's order which the House passed. The Minister of Finance says that there is no difference between copies and originals, that fact is adhered to by my right hon. friend about an hour ago and my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, asked that these self-same papers ordered in the copy a year ago, should be placed on the table of the House. The question was decided last year. The House gave its decision, the House gave its order, and on that decision copies of all the papers were brought down. But, copies were not sufficient. My hon. friend said that they were not sufficient, stated it in his first speech, stated it in the latter part of his address and the right hon. gentleman knows that he stated it in both the first and last speech. What more could my hon. friend do and keep his dignity ? Contrast that with the operations of the hon. Minister of the Interior and the right hon. gentleman himself. The right hon. gentleman is in a difficulty. We all know that, he knows it himself and he knows it better than we do. All these twistings, quibblings and turnings of black into white and white into black are made in an endeavour to bring himself out of the position in which he has allowed himself to be placed. Then, what is the position of the Minister of the Interior ? My hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, was accustomed to receive the courtesy of the Minister of Finance or the Minister of the Interior and, in pursuance of the courtesies and kindnesses in an official way which were extended to him and have been extended by departmental officers and ministers ever since confederation, went over to the Minister of the Interior and said : I want to see the originals of some strange documents but the originals of documents that the House voted last year I ought to get and which they order to be brought down. The Minister of the Interior said to him; No, Sir, the door is shut ; you cannot see that file and the only resourse you have is to go to the House and ask the House to pass an order for you to get that file. That is a piece of work that a gentleman could do. Nobody could call into question the Minister of the Interior if he thought his rule was right and then said : I cannot break through that rule unless the House orders it; therefore I advise you to go before the House and move for an order. That was the work of a gentleman, that was fair work and the Minister of the Interior might have done that and kept his reputation for fairness, but when, in pursuance of his advice my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, came to this House and made his motion it was not fair and gentlemanly in the public point of view, then refuse him the very thing that he advised him to carry out; tell him to come inside the door and then when he comes bang it in his face and refuse because forsooth he did not kow-tow to the Minister of Finance, move in the right spirit and make the proper number of bows before he approached his high mightiness. The hon. Minister of Finance is not in Nova Scotia now. He is not leading the party of secession as he led it in those good old days and he was just as insincere then as he is here to-day—just as insincere. He did not believe in secession then any more than he does now in this new Liberal doctrine.

Mr. FIELDING. That was in a moment of weakness.

Mr. FOSTER. That was not a moment of weakness; that was a whole year and a half of weakness. Now, the right hon. First Minister says that he has always enjoyed the reputation of being a fair man, but was it fair for his government through the Minister of the Interior, to advise my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, to walk in through the only door that he said was open to him and then, when he came, to bang the door in his face? That was not fair or proper. Why did the right hon. gentleman talk about caprice or about private interest and about asking for reasons and the like of that? Does he mean to insinuate that my hon. friend asked for these papers simply from caprice?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No.

Mr. FOSTER. I am quite sure that he does not. We will rule that out. Does he mean to say that my hon. friend from St. Antoine has some unworthy private interest to serve? No, the right hon. gentleman does not mean that. He talked about that like many other things that he talks about, but he did not mean it. We will throw that aside. Throwing aside caprice and private interests were these valid state reasons for refusal? No, the right hon. gentleman has mentioned none. He asked for the reasons on the first day of the debate, and my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, gave him the reasons. There is no doubt about that. Yet he quibbles, and yet he refuses, but it is worse than that. The night before last this motion of my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) was brought in, and this motion traverses the whole position and declares that it is the undoubted right of parliament, and of the members assembled in this House of Commons, unless there are grave reasons which can be validly urged against it, to have access to all information, to see and to examine. Does not the resolution say that? It throws the onus on the government of urging the validity of reasons. Have they been urged? There are none to urge. The right hon. First Minister has admitted now that there are none to urge. 'Bourinot' must be read in its several parts. 'Bourinot' says :

> Some times the government may be obliged to withhold all information at the time, or they may be able to put the House in possession of only a part of the correspondence.

That is reasonable and we have seen its reasonableness demonstrated time after time in this parliament.

> But it must be remembered that under all circumstances it is for the House to consider whether the reasons given for refusing the information are sufficient. The right of parliament to obtain every possible information on public questions is undoubted and the circumstances must be exceptional and the reasons very cogent when it cannot at once be laid upon the table of the House.

That throws the onus upon the government. I believe honestly that the trend of all the authorities is in that direction. A member of parliament rises in his place and he says : I want such papers, and the whole practice of this parliament has been for him to name his motion even by the number it bears upon the order paper, without giving a reason, and without any cavil, and without any question the motion is passed and the government never thinks of contravening it unless it has a valid reason. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries has recently got up in this House and said : I am sorry but there is a valid reason why you cannot have these papers for the correspondence is not yet through with Great Britain. That is a state reason and it is a good reason. But the onus is upon the government to show there are valid reasons why papers cannot be brought down, and a member in his place representing his people with all the dignity of a representative, acts upon the assumption which we have all got to acknowledge, one with the other if we are gentlemen, that he has a reason for asking or he would not ask. No member of the House is supposed to ask for the production of papers unless he has a good reason, and no man does ask without a good reason. I have been in parliament 25 years and I have never once known of an instance of a member of parliament asking for papers improperly. It has never been bandied from one side of this House to the other even in the most heated times, that any member has risen in his place to ask for information for unworthy purposes. Men have often asked for papers and been refused because of the waste of time which would take place in copying a great many unimportant things in order to get at a few important things ; and how many times have we not heard the minister of the department say : That will take a great deal of time as the papers are very voluminous, but if you come over to my department you can look at the files and select what you want and we will bring you down these. Time and again that has been done. It has also occurred that a member rising in his place, and giving no reason, asks for the production of papers and the House passes the order, and a day or two afterwards the minister of the department says in the House : I find in looking over these papers that there are some parts of them which cannot be brought down, but we will bring down everything we properly can. Therefore the onus of proof is with the government. I say it is the right of a member to ask for the information and it is a duty laid upon the government to refuse only if they have proper reasons therefor. Never once have I heard good reasons given by a minister or by the government, that a member of this House has risen in opposition and tried to contravene these reasons. Why has the First Minister, as a proof of his fairness, hurled the denunciation against this side of the House that we were wasting the time of the House. Did I hear the Solicitor General say we were wasting the time of the House ?

An hon. MEMBER. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Well the Solicitor General had better not talk too much about time that is not taken up usefully. It comes with very poor grace from the First Minister or the sub-minister to say that all this time has been wasted because of the obstreperous doings of gentlemen on this side. Has the Solicitor General yet had sink into his mind just exactly what his leader and his saviour has stated to this House. Said the right hon. gentleman :

For my part the moment a member gives a good reason for the production of papers the production of papers shall take place.

Mr. FOSTER.

Has there sunk into his mind the declaration of the First Minister in so many words, that the reasons given by the member for St. Antoine were perfectly good reasons and more than were necessary.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. FOSTER. Does my right hon. friend deny that ? I will warrant you the first minister will not deny it. The first minister has said it over and over again, and the first minister has, after saying it, tried to get off with the quibble—in order to save his face or the face of the Minister of the Interior, I do not know which—that although a sufficient reason was given by my hon. friend (Mr. Ames) it was coupled with a demand of right and therefore he would not give the papers. But the first minister has declared that it is the right of a member to have the papers the moment sufficient reason is given. That is the dictum of the Prime Minister and that condition has been absolutely fulfilled. Why did not the papers come ? Who has wasted the time of the House ? Days ago my hon. friend (Mr. Ames) asked for this information and the government could have given it and there would have been none of this scene in the House. The business of the House has not gone on with because my right hon. friend refuses to give the papers, even although more than sufficient reasons, according to his own dictum, were given by the member for St. Antoine. This will not go down in this House nor will it go down in the country. The people outside, the man on the street knows just what is involved. They see the rights of the minority in this House are denied them, but the people know that there is an unalienable right in the members of this House to ask for information and to get it, provided there are no urgent state or public reasons why the information should not be brought down. My right hon. friend says there is an air of suspicion on this side of the House. I don't think he can wonder at that. I can tell him that this side of the House is not going to be gold-bricked another time. We have been gold-bricked several times. The right hon. gentleman himself stood up in this House in the early times of his first parliament and declared (an eminently fair and just thing) that no man should be turned out of his office unless he had thorough examination and a chance to present his case. He allowed it to go in the form of a resolution and it was placed upon the records of this House, yet hundreds of civil servants and employees of this country were turned out of places without any hearing or any chance of examination. Does my right hon. friend deny it ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, my right hon. friend will deny any thing. He will deny his own existence. Does he not know that after he made that high flowing declaration, after he bound himself and this parliament by the resolution which affirmed it, hundreds of men were turned out of employment and never got a chance to present their case.

Mr. TALBOT. How many more should have been turned out ?

Mr. FOSTER. It is on the records of 'Hansard' and the papers brought down prove it, and I will show it to my right hon. friend if he denies it. I looked over the returns not more than ten days ago, yet the right hon. gentleman say no, no. What more ? A second gold brick. My right hon. friend thought he would gain some glory in the country by coming out strong on high ground regarding the purity of the ballot. He made a wonderful declaration, and all his followers vaunted this great declaration of their leader, and his papers printed it in headliness to show what lofty and noble ground this right hon. gentleman takes. When an investigation went on in the Privileges and Election Committee, it got rather warm in the committee for the government, and the investigation was not concluded when the House rose. The next year when the House met again, my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) moved for a continuation of the investigation before the Privileges and Election Committee, but then my right hon. friend climbed down from his high perch and declared that, for some reason or other, as novel as it was silly, this investigation should not be proceeded with. Did he want to have the electorate purified ? If he did, he threw himself straight athwart the road towards its purification, and that is an odd way of giving the people the coin he promised them.

Worse than that. When the fact came out that civil servants, paid by the peoples' money, supposed to have their own work to do, were devoting their time to partisan purposes my right hon. friend stood up again on a popular pedestal and gave out another high flown statement and declared that civil servants should not be allowed to engage in partisan work. But his Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver), before the words were well out of the hon. gentleman's mouth, went upon the public platform and repudiated the doctrine of his leader. And up to this day my right hon. friend knows that there are scores and scores of civil employees who are simply the factotums of the Minister of the Interior and the party which upholds that minister. Another gold brick.

Now he comes and supports the resolution which was moved the other night by my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) and gets the plaudits of the papers—his own and some independent papers—as being high minded and standing on broad ground. But after subscribing to that resolution and forcing it down some of his recalcitrant followers who did not want to take the medicine, and having it adopted by both sides without a vote, the very moment reasons are given why certain information should be brought down, he refuses to bring it down. Against the doctrine of the Minister of Finance, I protest, as did the hon. member for Qu'Appelle and the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. R. L. Borden) the doctrine of by-gone days, a doctrine as far removed from true liberalism as day is from night. It is not a doctrine which any sane man can carry out and contend for successfully in this country. Minorities have rights but if this doctrine were to obtain in this parliament and country, then the minority on any side of the House would have no right except what the majority chose to give them. All we would have would be a caucus and a brute majority and the right hon. gentleman could do with the minority what he pleased. But, thank God, there are principles which have been fought for and gained, and which are embodied in parliamentary practice and the constitution of the country, and which, better than all, are embodied in the hearts of a freedom loving people. And all lovers of freedom will cry out against the monstrous assertion of the Finance Minister that a minority has no rights. I am willing to join issue with these gentlemen on the platforms of the country and trust to Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER. I am, and I will not carry on my campaign with the material with which this pleasant looking minister (Mr. Fisher) carried on his campaign down in Stanstead. I certainly will not. He blushes, and well he may. But if his followers behind him were cognizant of all the facts, the blush that is on his face now would be, compared to the one that knowledge would create, like a mild pink contrasted with the burning red of a fiery furnace. I wish now to enter my protest against this conduct of the government, and my protest is not strong because it comes from myself but because it is embodied in the constitution and the hearts of a freedom loving people in Canada.

Mr. AMES moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What is the business to-morrow ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The same thing, Supply.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 1.15 a.m., Friday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, January 24, 1908.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 84) to incorporate the Dominion Transportation and Storage Company.—Mr. German.

LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR DUNSMUIR.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). I said yesterday to my hon. friend from Nanaimo (Mr. Smith) that I would bring down to-day what correspondence there was between this government and the Lieutenant Governor of British Columbia regarding the withholding by the latter of his assent to certain legislation. The only correspondence we have is as follows :—

Telegram.

Ottawa, April 23, 1907.

Lieutenant Governor of British Columbia, Victoria, British Columbia.

Your premier, Mr. McBride, assured me that the Bill entitled an Act to regulate immigration into British Columbia would not receive assent, but would be reserved for consideration of government. Can I rely on this assurance?

R. W. SCOTT.

Telegram.

Victoria, British Columbia, April 24, 1907.

Hon. R. W. Scott, Ottawa.

Your telegram received. Bill referred to will not receive my assent.

JAMES DUNSMUIR,
Lieutenant Governor.

At Government House, Victoria, British Columbia,

April 29, 1907.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that I prorogued the Legislative Assembly of this province on the 25th instant, at which time I assented to a number of Bills, duplicate copies of which I am forwarding to-day by registered mail.

I have thought it advisable to reserve for the pleasure of His Excellency the Governor General in Council, Bill (No. 30), an Act to regulate immigration into British Columbia.

My reasons for doing so are, that this Bill appears to be but a modified form of other Acts dealing with the same subject, which have already been disallowed by His Excellency, and should it become law, might seriously interfere with our international relations and federal interests.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) JAMES DUNSMUIR,
Lieutenant Governor.

The Honourable
The Secretary of State, Ottawa.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—MONTREAL 'STAR.'

Mr. FOSTER. I want to call the attention of the House to a misrepresentation made with reference to myself in the Montreal 'Star.' I do not say that it was intentional, but I think it worth while to correct it :

To attack Insurance Bill—Mr. Foster intimates that he has something to say.

Special to the Montreal 'Star.'

Ottawa, January 23.—When the House arose on Wednesday it was announced that the business for to-day would be the second reading of the Insurance Bill. Hon. W. S. Fielding, when the Bill was introduced, said that he was desirous that there should be no discussion of the details before the measure was sent to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. Hon. Geo. E. Foster afterwards intimated that he did not propose to be silent on the second reading, and he will probably be heard on the general aspects of the Bill and the work accomplished by and the cost of the commission.

What I indicated, as my hon. friend knows, was exactly the opposite.

WEST INDIA TRADE RELATIONS.

Mr. ALEXANDER MARTIN (Queens, P.E.I.). Before the orders of the day are called, I would like to ask the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) if he is negotiating reciprocity or the lowering of duties with the West Indies ?

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). Information reached us some time ago that a conference of delegates, representing the various West India Islands, was about to be held at Barbados, and the suggestion was offered that the time was opportune for a representative of the government of Canada to meet these gentlemen and that perhaps, out of the discussion, something in the way of closer and better trade relations might be brought about. Responding to that suggestion, without any definite plan, which was offered by Sir Daniel Morris, the Imperial Commissioner of Agriculture for the West Indies, the government appointed Mr. W. G. Parmelee, Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce, and Mr. A. E. Jones, a well known West India merchant of Halifax, to attend the conference. They proceeded to Barados and are now attending the conference. Possibly at this moment the conference may be over, but we have not yet been advised as to its results.

DISTRICT JUDGE FORBES.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would like to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth), or the right hon. the First Minister, when I may expect a reply to a motion for a return which was adopted on January 8, namely:

Mr. Taylor moved for:

A copy of all correspondence between the Department of Justice, or any department of the government, and Mr. Frederick Fraser Forbes, now a district judge in the province of Saskatchewan, or any other person or persons, in reference to the personal or professional status or character of Mr. Forbes, or his appointment as a judge as above-mentioned, and of all writings and documents of any kind in reference to the foregoing matter.

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice). I have no objection to this motion, but I may tell the hon. gentleman that there is no correspondence whatever on this subject, so far as the Department of Justice is concerned.

Mr. FOSTER. There may be in the other departments.

Motion agreed to.

I would ask that the return be brought down from the other departments, and if there is no correspondence in the Justice Department that the return state that.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Before the orders of the day are called, I wish to ask about a return brought down of correspondence between this government and the Lieutenant Governor of British Columbia during 1905-6. The return contains no record of any advice tendered by this government or the Secretary of State to Sir Henri Joly, the then Governor of British Columbia, with reference to his granting a dissolution to the government of that province, then in power. I would like to ask the Prime Minister—he may not be able to answer me today—whether or not communications passed from the Secretary of State of this government with respect to that particular matter.

SUPPLY—PRODUCTION OF ORIGINAL DOCUMENTS.

House resumed consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding that the House go into Committee of Supply, and the proposed amendment of Mr. Northrup thereto.

Mr. O. S. CROCKET (York, N.B.). Mr. Speaker, in my judgment the question raised by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) is one of the most important that has arisen during the history of this parliament. The government's attitude upon the question involved is one of the most tyrannical denials of the constitutional rights of the people which the history of this parliament affords. That a government which presumes to apply to itself the name of Liberal should take such a position upon this question is but another evidence of the absolute infidelity of the gentlemen who now occupy the treasury benches to the principles which they espoused when in opposition. I cannot say that I am surprised, in the light of the record of this government since they have had control of the treasury benches—I would not be surprised at anything. Their whole history since 1896 has been the history of the subversion and betrayal of the principles which have given the Liberal party its name and its identity. One of their first administrative acts violated two of the most prominent planks of the platform of 1893, and at the same time one of the most fundamental principles of representative government, I refer to the Yukon Railway contract whereby the government proposed to hand over to two men 4,000,000 acres of land which they described as the best and richest gold bearing land in the world for the construction of a line of railway 175 miles long. This contract was negotiated on the eve of a session of parliament in violation of one of the fundamental principles of democratic government that no public expenditure can be made, and no part of the public domain alienated without the consent of the people's representatives in parliament assembled. In the platform of 1893 it was set out that all contracts should be put up to public tender and competition, and that the public lands of this country should be for the settler and not for the speculator. Both of these principles were violated in this instance.

Another instance of the government's departure from their principles as expressed while in opposition was their course with reference to railway subsides. We all remember how in opposition they denounced the Conservative government for what they claimed was the iniquitous practice of voting railway subsides. A practice which they said was unsound in principle and tended to corruption. Yet, in the session of 1899, this government put through this House a railway subsidy Bill subsidizing no less than 50 lines of railway with a total mileage of over 1,400 miles, many of these lines paralleling then existing railways That would have been bad enough, but they introduced a principle in that measure whereby the Governor in Council could double these subsidies at their own will and pleasure. By the Act the subsides were at the rate of $3,200 a mile, but this government, which had such a regard for the rights of the people when in opposition, took from this parliament the authority to a member of the government to double the railway subsidies and convert a subsidy of $3,200 a mile into a subsidy of $6,400 at his sweet will. The Bill covered subsidies of over $4,500,000 and the provision I allude to would permit the conversion of these by the Governor in Council, upon the recommendation of the Minister of Railways and Canals into a subsidy of $9,000,000.

The government have also been false to their principles in connection with bribery and corruption and other forms of electoral fraud which they denounced throughout this country. I do not propose to enumerate the long series of electoral frauds that have taken place in the interest and under the auspices and protection of this government since they attained power. They are known by the people of this country from one end to the other, and it is only necessary to mention this matter to make the point.

Then, we remember the position they took with respect to the important doctrine of the independence of parliament. Their leaders held forth in all parts of the country in burning denunciation and condemnation of the Conservative government of that time, because, during eighteen years of office, it had appointed seventeen members of parliament to positions in the public service. Yet a return brought down this session shows that these gentlemen, who thus denounced their predecessors, have appointed at least four times as many members of parliament to office during eleven years of administration.

Another principle which this government has violated most seriously is that of opposition to government by order in council. I believe that the history of this parliament cannot show any such glaring instances of the extension of this doctrine of government by order in council as have been shown under this government. I have already given an example of this in their railway subsidies legislation. Hardly an important Bill passes this House that does not contain a provision taking from parliament the power of legislation in important matters and transferring it to the government to be exercised in the secrecy of their own council chamber. Last session I felt it my duty to enter a protest against a very marked instance of this conduct on the part of the government, the case being that of their tariff legislation. I need hardly remind hon. members that the tariff was arranged in three columns, the general, the intermediate and the preferential. It is admitted—it is beyond question—that, in this case for the first time in the history of the Canadian Confederation the government took from parliament the control of taxation in important respects. This Tariff Act gave them authority not only to decrease taxation, but to increase it—a clear violation of the first principles of representative government.

Another matter which was made of great prominence in the Liberal platform was the duty of the government to give to parliament the fullest information in regard to public affairs. That is the question now under discussion raised by this motion. Only last session we had a flat refusal on the part of the Prime Minister to give to the people's representatives in parliament assembled, any information in regard to the constitution of that fictitious, fake company known as the North Atlantic Trading Company which has received, I believe, over $300,000 of the people's money. Notwithstanding that, the people were called upon to pay this immense sum, the Prime Minister took the tyrannical position of refusing to disclose to parliament to whom this money was paid. If every other act of this government were commendable, this one defiance of the rights of parliament is enough to warrant their condemnation by the people of Canada. And here to-day, we are confronted with an even more tyrannical refusal by the First Minister and the members of his government to bring down documents which unquestionably the people's representatives have a right to see. After the debate we have had, I think there cannot be in the mind of any impartial or unprejudiced member of this House, the slightest doubt that that right exists. Sir, I have heard of 'hedging,' and have seen some of it both outside and inside of this House; but I am bound to say that I have never seen quite the equal of such hedging as that of the Prime Minister and the members of his government on this question. But as I have said, though I am not surprised at any conduct on the part of this government, however tyrannical, however unjust, however contradictory of their former professions, I must say that I have been astonished at the various contradictory and ridiculous positions taken by the several members of this government who have addressed the House on this question. Taking the history of this matter as it has developed, I find that the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) wrote to the minister on December 3, expressing, in his usual courteous manner, a desire to examine certain original documents which were subsequently set out in the motion he has made. The hon. gentleman was informed by a letter in reply bearing the signature of the Minister of the Interior, that a rule had been made in the department 'not to allow the examination of the files by others than officials of the department whose duty it is.' The hon. member, however, was informed that he could get the papers by a motion in this House. I quote the concluding paragraph of the letter that the language may speak for itself.

> By an order of the House for the production of papers the responsibility is taken off the shoulders of the department and is assumed by the House, I would suggest this means of obtaining what you want.

This is the advice given to the hon. member for St. Antoine, by the Minister of the Interior. In pursuance of that advice the hon. member for St. Antoine presented his motion to the House on the 13th instant. He did so in a speech, which to my mind, furnished abundant reason why he should receive these papers. But even though the hon. gentleman had not uttered a word in introducing that resolution, I submit that, in view of what had taken place, in view of the correspondence with the Minister of the Interior, in the custody of whose department these papers were, the hon. gentleman was entitled to have that motion passed without objection. Now, the hon. Minister of the Interior, who had asked my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, to take this means of obtaining the papers, was the first gentleman to arise in this House to make objection to the motion which he himself had advised. The ground that the Minister of the Interior took in opposing the motion was that it would, forsooth, be inconvenient to the department. That, Mr. Speaker, was the only ground substantially which the Minister of the Interior then advanced. I will quote a passage from his remarks upon that occasion. In the course of his speech the Minister of the Interior said :

But to transfer the original documents from the department whose business they form an essential part of, to this House where they will only constitute a record, as has been set out very fully in this memorandum, is an infringement upon business methods which it is impossible for the department to consent to.

That is the reason and the only reason which was advanced by the Minister of the Interior for the refusal of the motion of my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine. The Minister of the Interior was followed by my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) who combatted the contention which had been advanced by the minister with an argument, which, to my mind, was incontrovertible and which the subsequent course of this debate has shown was incontrovertible. In summing up, this is what my hon. friend said :

It has always been recognized in this House that unless there are reasons of state that intervene the information is brought down on the call and the wish of any member of parliament who has a reasonable claim and makes it known to this House.

Further on my hon. friend stated :

All proper care should be taken to see that the original documents brought down should be returned; you might even go so far as to demand that when original documents are brought to the House and laid on the table they should be inspected on the table or under the supervision of the clerk.

Now, when the right hon. First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) rose to reply to my hon. friend from North Toronto he opened by fully endorsing the position which the Minister of the Interior had taken and by stating that he was very much scandalized by the argument that he had just heard put forward by my hon. friend from North Toronto. Notwithstanding, however, Mr. Speaker, that the right hon. leader of the House fully endorsed the position which the Minister of the Interior had taken, which position was based entirely upon the convenience or inconvenience of the department, before the Prime Minister concluded his remarks, he made this statement :

My hon. friend says that the inconvenience or convenience of any officers of the departments of the government should not stand in the way of information being given. I agree to that entirely.

Notwithstanding his endorsation in his opening remarks of the position taken by the Minister of the Interior, he, in these words that I have quoted, cut completely the ground from under the feet of the Minister of the Interior. Then, the Prime Minister was constrained necessarily to take some other position and what was the refuge that he then sought ?—that good reasons must be given for the production of original documents. He then argued that there was a distinction in the rule in respect to original documents and copies of documents. That position the Prime Minister has since had to abandon and he was controverted with respect to it by his Minister of Finance in his speech of last evening. There is, I think, no question that under parliamentary practice and the rules of this House there is no distinction between copies and original documents, there is nothing in the rules which requires a statement of the reasons for the production of papers which applies to an original document any more than to the copy of a document, a proposition, which, I think, has already been thoroughly established. We all know in this House what has been the practice in reference to motions for copies. I have been in this House for four sessions and I have never yet known a member of this House to be called upon to state any reason for any motion which he desired to make for papers. I have made several motions myself and I have never once been called upon to state any reason why I desired these papers. I suppose the presumption is that when an hon. member of this House arises to move for papers he deems that he has good and sufficient reasons for doing so. While the Prime Minister quotes Todd, May and Bourinot, he quotes, Mr. Speaker, a rule which is unquestionably obsolete in this parliament and upon which, therefore, no reliance can be placed and a rule which, I may say, has never, in fact existed in this parliament. It remains with this so-called Liberal government to invoke this antiquated rule in justification of their conduct in this matter. That was the position that the matter stood in on the 13th excepting the all-important fact that when the Prime Minister had indicated his disposition to refuse this request of one of the people's representatives his followers in this House accepted his direction without hesitation or demur. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I was surprised as a member of this House that such a thoroughly indefensible position should have received the sanction of so many members of this body. Then, we had the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) attempting to take a hand. When he saw that the Prime Minister, who had repudiated the position which the Minister of the Interior had taken, was himself constrained to present an indefensible argument in justification of the government's position, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries rose to present another ground which might justify the government's refusal of these papers. What was the position that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries took? His argument was that if these particular papers were brought into this House and laid on the table they would become a matter of record and that therefore they would be lost to the department, ignoring entirely the very self-evident fact that if this House had power to order these papers upon the table from any of the departments it had power also to order the return of the papers back to the departments to whose custody the papers belonged.

But, after the speeches from which I have quoted had been delivered, as well as some other unimportant speeches made by gentlemen on the other side of the House, the hon. gentleman from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) rose to close the debate and in doing so he used language which completely met all objections and fulfilled the requirements laid down by the Prime Minister. So that it may be understood by all that the hon. member for St. Antoine had shown ample grounds for his motion, I quote from his remarks:

It is my right in this House to ask this information to be placed where I can see it, and in due time I will give all the information I have with reference to these limits in a form that will quite satisfy the Minister of the Interior. Here is the return we have been speaking about; it contains 453 pages. I have read that return from cover to cover. Now, there are nine pages of that return which can be illumined if I may see the originals. As to all the other pages the copies are all I want. But there are nine pages there with respect to which the copy does not tell me all I want to know or which I have the right to know if I understand my rights in this House of Commons.

Mr. OLIVER. Does my hon. friend say that these nine pages differ from the original.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. How could he tell unless he sees the original?

Mr. AMES. I say that these nine pages will in all probability clear up certain doubts which I have regarding peculiar features in connection with some of these transactions; I say that the handwriting of some of these nine pages may have a very important bearing on the case.

What stronger or more specific reasons could be advanced or imagined than those given by the hon. member (Mr. Ames). In what clearer language could these reasons be expressed? His statement completely fulfilled the requirements laid down by the Prime Minister, yet notwithstanding the Prime Minister took the responsibility of calling on his followers to vote down the motion. And that motion having been voted down without any justification or excuse, when next the House was moved into Committee of Supply, the hon. leader of the opposition moved the following amendment:

That all the words after the word 'that' be omitted and the following substituted therefor:

Subject to such considerations of public policy as can be validly urged in any case, it is the undoubted right of the people's representatives in parliament assembled to be informed of everything necessary to explain the policy and proceedings of the government and for that purpose to have an opportunity of seeing and examining all documents connected with the transaction of public business; and the denial of such right by the government justifies the refusal by this House of further supplies to the Crown.

Well, that amendment was accepted at once by the Prime Minister, although greatly to my surprise, and I presume to the surprise of many other hon. gentlemen, in his very words signifying his willingness to accept the amendment he reaffirmed the position he took on the original motion of the hon. member for St. Antoine, and insisted that the papers should be refused because no reason had been advanced for their production. I quote from the remarks of the Prime Minister on that occasion:

But there may be other occasions where for reasons which are known to himself, and which I will not question, and which he can state to the House, the member may think the copies would not give him the information the originals would. So far so good, and if he so states, it seems to me he is entitled to have the originals.

I would ask the hon. gentlemen in this House to mark well these words of the Prime Minister. If a member thinks the copies would not give him the information the originals would, the member is entitled to the papers. I ask this House if it will not declare in all fairness that the hon. member (Mr. Ames) took precisely that position and made precisely that statement. I have read the words used by the hon. member (Mr. Ames) in his closing remarks, and they not only go to the extent that the Prime Minister admits entitled him to the papers, but they went beyond it and gave much more specific reasons than the Prime Minister indicated were necessary. At page 1689 'Hansard' will be found these words of the Prime Minister in that debate:

My hon. friend from St. Antoine division may have had good reasons for his request.

That I am not denying, and if he had said: We ask for those papers because we have good reasons for looking at the originals his demand would have been complied with at once.

Again I ask hon. gentlemen to remember these words of the Prime Minister. Let me revert to the speech of the hon. member for St. Antoine in introducing his resolution, a speech delivered before the Prime Minister addressed the House; I quote the very last sentence uttered by my hon. friend (Mr. Ames):

> This motion has been drafted purely and simply to test that one question, because we consider that we have sufficient reasons for desiring to see the original applications and tenders in respect to timber berths Nos. 1107, 1108 and 1171.

Here we have the hon. member (Mr. Ames) using the very words which the Prime Minister said, if he had used them, would have entitled him to the production of the papers. After these quotations who would have thought that we would have had the Prime Minister, two days afterwards, taking the position which he did yesterday? What was his position on that occasion? Notwithstanding that sufficient reasons in his judgment had been given, yet because, forsooth, the hon. member for St. Antoine seemed in the very last sentence which he used not to rely on the reasons which he had given, therefore the motion was refused. Is not that a most ridiculous position for a gentleman who occupies the position of Prime Minister of this country to take—in the first place, that it was necessary to state reasons in presenting the original motion, and denying that any reason had been stated, and subsequently admitting that reasons had been stated, but because the hon. gentleman, by the use of a certain phrase, did not seem to rely upon them, the motion should be refused. And how did the right hon. gentleman endeavour to establish this last position? By quoting one half the sentence. He buttressed his position by quoting these words: 'This motion has been drafted purely and simply to test that one question,' and stopped there, omitting the three following lines which completely contradicted the position he was taking. These are the lines: 'Because we consider that we have sufficient reasons for desiring to see the original application. Could any one conceivably, Mr. Speaker, have done more turning and twisting and hedging, than the right hon. gentleman in the course of these several debates.

That would have been enough, I think, to have convinced any reasonable member of this House that there was no valid justification or excuse for the refusal to bring down the papers which were asked for. But last night we had an exhibition which to my mind was still more ridiculous than that taken by the Prime Minister; and I must express my astonishment that a gentleman with the reputation which the Finance Minter has throughout this country should have seen fit to have advanced the view which he did. Contradicting the position which his leader had taken with respect to copies and also with respect to the giving of reasons, the Finance Minister based the conduct of the government on this question upon the ground that the hon. member for St. Antoine had not approached the government in the proper spirit. Imagine a member of His Majesty's government in this country taking such a ridiculous position as that. If the hon. member for St. Antoine was entitled to these papers by the statement of reasons, surely the fact that he was not in a particular humour at the time he made the motion was not sufficient in this democratic country to deprive him of what was his undoubted right—as if his right to papers depended entirely upon his humour, or possibly upon his digestion.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I feel it to be my duty as one of the representatives of the people to enter my strongest protest against this further infringement by this government upon the undoubted rights of the people of this country. I do not think the people will be disposed to take much stock in antiquated quotations from May or Todd or Bourinot. There will be no question in the minds of the great mass of thinking people in this country that the members of this House as their representatives have a right to inspect and examine all public documents. Who is the Minister of the Interior that he refuses to the representatives of the people information to which they are entitled? Are the members of this government the master of the people or are they the servants of the people? I have always been taught to believe that under our system of government the administration of the day are the servants of the people, the trustees and agents of the people, and not their masters. I listened with interest the other day to the speech of the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Miller) in reference to the reform of the Senate. That gentleman on that occasion told us that the government of this country were the executive committee of the board of directors of a joint stock company, of which the people of Canada are the shareholders. That, I thought, very aptly described the relation of this government to the people of Canada, and I would like to apply it to the position of the government in reference to the present question. Imagine, as the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Perley) said last night, a member of the executive committee of a joint stock company refusing to disclose to a brother director of that company any information in regard to the affairs of the company. Would any business concern in this country stand for such a defiance of rights as that? Whose documents are these? Are they the private documents of the hon. Minister of the Interior, or are they the documents of the people of Canada? It is simply a question of principal and agent. The principal in this case are the people of Canada, and the agent is the Minister of the Interior, or the government if you choose. How long would any agent hold his position if he refused the rights of and disobeyed and defied the principal for whom he was acting? He would not hold his position twenty-four hours; and I believe that at the first opportunity the principals in this matter have of getting at these false agents, they will dispense with their services. I cannot conceive of any stronger reason for the dismissal of this government than the miserable position which they have taken in respect to this matter.

Mr. RICHARD BLAIN (Peel). Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to detain the House very long, but I feel it to be my duty as a representative of the people to enter my protest against the new doctrine of the Liberal party which was laid down by the Finance Minister last night in discussing this question. I am sure it will be a surprise to the people of Canada, and especially to the province of Ontario, to learn that the Finance Minister of this country laid down in the House last night the following doctrine. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) quoted a statement of the First Minister to be found on page 1685 of 'Hansard':

> No one denies either that members of parliament have the right to have access of the records of the government and to all the archives, if they believe that in the public interest they should have such access.

Then my hon. friend proceeds to comment on that statement:

> I think that sufficiently answers the statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) this evening, who took the astonishing, the amazing ground, that the minority has absolutely no rights in this House.

Mr. Fielding then interjected the interruption:

> Except such as the majority may grant it.

I am sure that when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) reads that amazing doctrine in cold print, he will realize that it is a new doctrine to the people of Canada and the members of this House. According to that doctrine, while the people have the right to elect representatives to carry on the affairs of the country in parliament, yet when these representatives happen to be seated on the left of the Speaker, there is to be applied to them the doctrine that they have no rights in this House except such as may be granted them by the government. I should like to have the Liberal party enunciate that doctrine as a plank in their new platform at the next general elections. But whether they do this or no, the people of this country will understand that it is really a plank in the platform of that party, and a plank laid down, not by some humble representative, but by no less a person than the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding). We have the right, therefore, to take this declaration of the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) as the policy of the Liberal party, and that policy is that the Liberal government will allow no rights to the minority representatives in this House, sitting on your left, Sir, except such as, in their good will and pleasure and in their own party interests, they may see fit to grant them. I listened very closely to the remarks of the right hon. the First Minister last evening. The right hon. gentleman said:

> The hon. member for St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames) moved the other day a motion absolutely unprecedented in this House, absolutely unlike anything that had ever been presented in this House, so far as I know. He moved that certain original documents should be brought down to this House.

I am afraid the First Minister did not put his memory to any kind of a sufficient test or did not make any very extended research into the records of parliament. I have before me a resolution moved by my hon. friend from Lennox (Mr. Uriah Wilson) in 1885—a resolution which was granted without dissent—calling for the following return:

> All the original lists and papers, including all declarations, notices of appeal, objections to preliminary lists and relating to all other proceedings now in the possession of the revising barrister or the clerk of the Crown in Chancery, in any way affecting the voters' lists for the electoral division of the county of Lennox, as settled by the revision of 1891, together with a certified copy of the revised voters' list of 1891 furnished by the revising barrister to the returning officer.

That is a resolution calling for original documents. I do not wish to load up 'Hansard' with other resolutions calling for originals, but I may say that a careful search would show many resolutions passed calling for the original documents. In this return, the only copy called for is that of the revised voters' list of 1891. I have here another return ordered, giving the quantity, value and kind of fish, &c. I take it that as that return does not mention copies, that the hon. gentleman who moved for it would expect to receive the original documents, if there is any distinction between a resolution calling for copies and a resolution calling for the originals. And I think I am correct in saying that, in answer to similar motions, the practice of this parliament has been to place at the disposal of the House any number of original documents. Why are we having all this discussion? My hon. friend from St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames) considered it his duty as a member of the House to find out how this government has been disposing of timber limits in Western Canada. Surely in doing so he was exercising his right as a representative of the people, and surely in that respect his course should meet with the commendation of the people. Following out his duty as a representative of the people, he moved for a return, and the order was granted unanimously, and he received copies of the papers mentioned in the return. He was not desirous of prying into the private affairs of any individual, but simply wished to find out how this government was administering the timber limits of western Canada. What happened? The order was granted and the copies were brought down. On looking over the copies —and they covered a large number of pages, 453 in all—he came to the conclusion that there were nine pages, the originals of which he considered it necessary he should examine as a representative of the people. What course did he then take? He took the course usually followed. He went over to the department and asked to see these originals, but there he was confronted with a new doctrine of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver). And if there is any man in the House who, we would expect, would give us liberal doctrine, it is surely the hon. gentleman, because, before he became a minister, he always stood out as an independent member on the government side. Whenever the government took a course which he did not approve, we found him standing up in his place as an independent advocate of the people's rights. But what a change has come over the hon. gentleman since then No sooner did he take his seat in the cabinet than he forgot all his past record and history, and when he is asked to discharge his duty as a minister of the Crown, when he is asked by a representative of the people to allow him access to the original documents in his department, he meets that representative with the declaration: You cannot enter here, you cannot see the original documents in connection with this land deal. Why not? Because the minister has established a brand new doctrine and has closed the door that was formerly open to every member of this House. Did my hon. friend from St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames) make any very strong protest No, he simply moved a resolution calling upon the government to produce, not the 453 pages of original documents, but only 9 pages of the original documents. That motion was defeated by a vote of the government majority. That defeat accentuated the difference between the opposition and the government, and I am sure it will be a surprise to the followers of the government throughout the country when they realize that these hon. gentlemen opposite, who had denounced the Liberal-Conservative party in earlier days, who had charged the late Conservative government with governing the country behind closed doors, now coming forward refusing to a representative of the people access to original documents which are the property of the people

Why should not the people of Canada be a little suspicious of this government and this department ? During the last few years we have heard hon. gentlemen on this side of the House say to the government : Something has gone wrong in western Canada in connection with the timber limits, because we find that large limits are now owned by members of the Liberal party who are in this House. Would that not be sufficient to arouse any man's suspicion ? The newspapers gave a wide circulation to this policy of the government, a policy of 'get rich quick, if you are a supporter of the government, if you are a representative of the people.' When we looked into the records, when Mr. Ames came to the conclusion that there was something wrong here, and having exposed some conduct of this government in the past was refused the original documents, documents which heretofore he had had the right to examine, was it not his duty to appeal to parliament and if he does not get his right here, the people of this country will give him his rights when they have an opportunity to pronounce upon the conduct of the government. I am sure that the people of this country will realize that something must be done. Statements that the opposition are wasting the time of parliament and spending money unnecessarily will not be believed by the people of Canada. We have heard members of the government stating that having looked into all systems of government, after all the party system we have in this country is the best for Canada. If it is to be said that we have no rights, if we are to have a new doctrine of this kind, what is the use of the people of Canada voting for two political parties ? The government will next say to the people of this country that it is no use voting for opposition members for whatever rights they have in the House of Commons are given to them only by the votes of the majority the supporters of the government. Few men in Canada would subscribe to such a doctrine, and I am sure that electors supporting opposition members will not be driven by it into the ranks of the government supporters but will arise in their might and say : We will go out into other constituencies and will fight for our rights and will see whether the system of party government in this country is to cease, on account of a brand new doctrine introduced by this government in the session of 1908.

I do not wish to cover the ground that has already been gone over. Any municipal council or any school board in Canada would blush with shame to adopt a doctrine of this kind, and yet we have the government that is supposed to lead us upwards and onward, laying down this principle, a policy that would not be supported by any class of people in any civilized country. We want to enter a protest on behalf of Canada. I want to enter a protest not only for the Conservatives of Peel but for the Reformers who I am sure will vote against a government who will venture to place upon the records a policy which says to opposition members: You shall have rights but these rights shall be prescribed by the will or whim of the government of the day.

Mr. J. D. REID (Grenville). I have been here a good many years and this is the first time I have seen a Prime Minister adopt such a policy as has been adopted in this House. I have always been under the impression that when an order was granted by this House, even for copies of papers to be brought down, it was an order that everything in connection with those papers could be seen, that we were entitled to see the originals; I took it for granted that the copies were brought down solely as a convenience instead of removing the original papers to the House. However, I always felt that if it were absolutely necessary the originals would be brought down to the House when that order was granted by the House. If the statement of the Prime Minister is correct I have been entirely mistaken. With him I do not agree.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. J. D. REID. I do not agree that the policy he has laid down within the last 48 hours is right. I believe we are entitled to see the original documents in every case, and from what we have found in the cases where original papers have been produced, I think it is time for the Prime Minister to allow the original documents to be brought down. Take for instance the Department of the Interior. There is not, I believe, a department in which there is more wrongdoing going on than the department over which the Minister of the Interior presides. Before the present minister attained office, he was one of those who claimed that his predecessor was practically alienating the lands of the Northwest. He was going to do right but what have we seen since he came into power ? I shall cite a few cases that have occurred before and since his coming into power and I will ask the Prime Minister if these few cases are not sufficient to justify members of parliament in seeing the original papers. I shall take first the case of Mr. Caldwell, a particular friend of the Minister of the Interior, one of his bosom friends, before he became Minister of the Interior. This gentleman comes down here to Ottawa and although the laws allow only one application to be made by each individual, this gentleman sits down in the Russell House and writes out 217 applications for coal lands in the Northwest, all in his own handwriting. Each of these applications entitles the applicant to 320 acres of coal lands. He got every bell-boy, every little boy he could get around Ottawa, every man, woman and child in order to make up the 217 applications and paid them $1 each to sign the applications, and then took a power of attorney from them transferring the grants to Mr. Caldwell; the Minister of the Interior puts this through his department as a right and fair and just application for coal lands in the Northwest. I asked for a return of these documents, but the minister brought down a return consisting of copies of these applications. In each case the copies showed a different person applying for the 320 acres, but this man incidentally disclosed the method of his application to a friend and it was published in a newspaper that he was applying for the 217 applications and the Minister of the Interior had to publicly disclose it in the House. Does this not show that he as minister is willing to allow wrong-doing to occur in his department without interfering ? Here is a simple case in which it was absolutely necessary for the opposition to have access to the original papers, or otherwise they could not have shown that the Minister of the Interior in allowing this rascality to go on in his department, is not fit for the position he holds.

Then, we had the Robbins Irrigation deal. In this case $850,000 was made by friends of the Minister of the Interior, and the original documents, when examined, showed that it was practically a fraud. We have another case, the Galway Land deal made by this man known as Brown. When we got to the original papers, we found that the two men in this whole deal were the hon. member for Humbolt (Mr. Adamson) and the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff). Everybody knows that, five or ten years ago, every dollar these men owned was the suit of clothes on their backs ; and to-day they are travelling around worth a million. One of them was an officer in the Department of the Interior, and is now going around the country to explain one of the greatest scandals ever perpetrated by any Canadian government. And yet the Prime Minister is not willing that we should see original papers because of what those original papers may disclose.

Then, we had the North Atlantic Trading Company deal. In this case, the Minister of the Interior brought down the papers, actually, with the signatures torn off. But had we been restricted wholly to copies of documents, we probably could not have shown that there was anything wrong at all. But the Department of the Interior is not the only one ; there are others almost as bad. There are three specially in which, the Prime Minister knows, there is the greatest rascality going on—Railways and Canals, Marine and Fisheries, and Interior.

Mr. FOSTER. Don't forget Public Works.

Mr. J. D. REID. Yes, and Public Works is nearly as bad. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) told us the other day that he was compelled to put the brakes on the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) though he had been in office only two or three months, and would not grant him the amount he asked. In the Marine and Fisheries Department, when we got the original invoices in the Merwin case, we found that the name F. L. Brookes and Company was scratched out and George T. Merwin's name written in. It was shown that Brookes and Merwin were the same identical person. Had we not had the original papers, how could we have found this out? Then, as to the Railways and Canals Department, when we asked for the original papers in the Grand Trunk Pacific case, the government voted us down and absolutely refused to let us have them. Had these original papers been brought down, it would have been shown that before certain legislation agreed to by the Prime Minister was put through this House it cost about $165,000. Lawyers in the city were paid $10,000—for what? As I understand the matter, the Bill was drafted in the Justice Department, and there should not have been any trouble about it; yet $165,000 was paid before the Bill was got through this House. Then we have the Halifax Land deal. In that case we got the original papers, and found that, instead of all the money going to the party from whom the land was supposed to be bought, part of it went to B. F. Pearson, one of the Liberal organizers or heelers there. Then we had the Moncton land deal and others. Where we have had original papers, we have been able to show that things are in a much different shape from what they have appeared had we had only the copies.

We were told by the Minister of Finance last evening that we, as an opposition, have no rights in this House except such as the majority of this House give us. I do not believe that the people of this country will uphold such a doctrine as that, and certainly the members on this side will not agree to submit to it. Personally, I feel very sorry that the Prime Minister has taken the position he has taken. He has not taken such a position in any previous session. We can only suppose that the reason why he refuses us these original documents is because, by means of original documents, we have been able to show so many cases in which the people of this country have been robbed, and he knows that, if the opposition are allowed to go on, they will make such exposures as will sweep him from power. I may be wrong, but I believe that further rascality will be shown if the papers asked for are delivered to the hon. member for St. Antoine. If the Prime Minister is prepared to prevent access being had to these original documents, he must assume the responsibility, and we must allow the people to decide. And then, if he does not allow those who are fighting for him to use too much of the material that was used in Stanstead and South Huron, the result will be very different from what it was in those ridings. There is not a man on the other side who dares to rise and declare himself in favour of the position the Prime Minister has taken. I hope the right hon. gentleman will see that he is wrong, and will agree to lay these papers on the table and allow us to proceed with the business of the House.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton). I wish to offer a few words of protest against the way in which we have been treated in connection with these papers. I cannot help feeling that when the people of this Dominion realize the position the government is taking, they will resent that action. When I came to this House, a few years ago, it had never occurred to me that the government would take such a position as it has taken within the last few days. I assumed that a representative of the people in this House had a perfect right to examine the public documents wherever he found them, and especially documents relating to important transactions in regard to the public domain. These are dead documents as has already been said. They cannot be of any great interest to the people who own the land or the timber limits, and it is important we should have them in carrying out the investigation which we have undertaken. The people of this country do not attach any great importance to the statements which have been made in regard to the position that Todd or Bourinot takes on this question. The position of the people, I think, upon this question, will be this: Is it right or is it wrong that our representatives in parliament should have access to the public documents and be given every opportunity to make a thorough investigation of them? Within the past few hours I have sent in a notice of motion asking for reports, plans and specifications in regard to docks and piers up in the western part of Ontario. I have not been able to give sufficient reasons possibly for asking for these reports, but I believe that when the time comes it will be necessary for me to make an investigation of some of the original documents in regard to some of the public works on Lake Huron. Take, the town of Bayfield, a town in which I have taken considerable interest in the past few years and in which a public meeting was recently held.

Mr. PATERSON. Hear, hear.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. 'Hear, hear,' says the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson).

Yes, that hon. gentleman was up in that riding, it is true. It is true that he was talking about the grand old Liberal party and the grand old Liberal platform and telling the people that they should stand by them, but did he tell them of the nefarious transactions of this government, did he tell them of the corrupt measures that have been carried under his very eyes and which he has been defending from year to year, did he tell them of the reckless and extravagant expenditure of this government? No, Sir, but he was trying to tell them of the wonderful development that this country has witnessed during the past few years in which this government has been in control of its affairs. He was telling them of that development but he cannot point to one important piece of legislation that has been placed on the statute-book of this country whereby the prosperity which he boasted of has been brought about. Time and again have we thrown that statement across the floor of this House, and yet this government has never been able to explain it away. Now, let us come back to the town of Bayfield. On the platform at a public meeting in that town was one of the prominent citizens of Bayfield, and what did he say in regard to the public expenditure at Bayfield? He said that it was most reckless and extravagant and that the careless manner in which they built the dock and pier in that town was something which should not be countenanced by any fair-minded citizen. He told us that the contract called for cribwork to be sunk 16 feet in the sand, whereas they only dredged to a depth of 12 feet for that crib and then started to build the crib. The council of the town of Bayfield telegraphed down to the Public Works Department telling this government that the contractors were not doing the fair thing in the building of the pier. Did the government send back any man to investigate that question? No, did they even reply to the telegram that the council sent. This gentleman said that they did not even reply to the telegram and the outcome was that instead of the crib being sunk 16 feet it was only sunk 12 feet. The contract called for the filling of the crib with stone and what did this gentleman say on that public platform? He made the statement that instead of the crib being filled with stone it was filled with stumps, brush, sand and gravel that could be shovelled from a nearby place. Yet you will find these gentlemen going about and telling of the splendid works that have been built and the splendid expenditures they are making for the benefit of the country. Let them go on to St. Joseph, just a few miles along the same shore and what will they find? They will find that on this work there has been spent $18,000 or $20,000 of public money, that it has not been wisely or judiciously expended and that at the place where this wharf is there is no likelihood of a boat ever stopping or of there ever being any business or commercial reason for the construction of a work of this kind. Look at it for a moment. This government went to work and built a wharf at St. Joseph, there being only one little fisherman in the district and only some $18 of post office revenue. If you go up and investigate this work you will find that it was built in such a careless and reckless manner that parts of this same work are drifting along the shores of Lake Huron. Go up to St. Joseph, look at this pier, as I have done within the last few months, and investigate the repairs which are going on in connection with it. What did I find? I found that instead of a good pile driver that would drive piles which would make a pier that would be worthy of the construction of this government, a pile driver that had been used by the farmers in driving posts in different parts of the district was employed. You would find that the piles, instead of being of reasonable length and of some practical use when they were driven in the ground, were similar to the posts that a farmer would use on his farm, 6 to 8 feet long. You could go a few miles further down to Grand Bend. If the hon. Minister of Customs had gone to Grand Bend what would he have found? He would have found a public wharf built at the expense of the country, and I must say it was needed as far as Grand Bend was concerned. But, a public wharf was built, and how was it built? It was built practically on top of the sand. Then the waves came along, dislodged and undermined it and year after year contractors have been going back there, repairing that work and spending thousands and thousands of dollars in trying to keep it in reasonable repair. The same story is being told about the wharf at Grand Bend, as I have told in regard to the wharf at Bayfield. Instead of it being dredged out, put in the proper place and the cribwork filled with stone, it has been most carelessly and recklessly handled.

In what position do we find ourselves today? We find my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine, moves for papers and he gives good and sufficient reasons for moving for these papers. He tells the government that it is necessary for him to have these papers so that he may make a thorough investigation in regard to some of the large timber sales in the Northwest. But the Minister of the Interior refuses to bring them down. His reasons are not fair, they are not reasonable, they are not reasons which could be given by any man who was willing to open up his department to a thorough investigation, and we cannot help but feel that there is something wrong in that department, because otherwise they would be more ready to open up to the members of this parliament the papers that are necessary to be investigated. The right hon.

Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) agrees with his minister in this regard and defends him day after day. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) introduced a resolution asking that the rights of members on this side of the House be recognized. After the question has been evaded for some time the minister accepts that resolution and then a few days afterwards he goes back on practically every word that is contained in the resolution. And in the face of all that, instead of the hon. member (Mr. Ames) being able to get these papers now, an attempt is made to force him into the humiliating position that he must declare that these papers are a forgery or that there is something radically wrong about them, before he will be allowed to look at them even for a few moments. Sir, we are fighting not only to obtain these papers but we are fighting for a principle. I state here that unless we can have access to the original papers in connection with the transactions of this government we cannot depend upon the copies that are furnished us from time to time. This government is intoxicated with power, and the people seem to be lulled into a political dreamland by a venal press such as we have in Canada to-day. When you look at the tens of thousands of dollars that go to the Liberal papers every year, you can see to what extent that press will defend this government and its nefarious transactions. It is all right enough for us to sing :

Canada, dear Canada, men of the North are we,
For thee we live; for thee we die
That evermore thou shalt be free.

We may sing the words with our lips, but we have no real freedom under this government. The Minister of the Interior closes the door of his department against the members of the opposition and refuses them access. I believe, Sir, that when the people of the country come to understand this question they will demand with no uncertain voice that it is the right of the representatives of the people in this House not only to have access to these public documents, but to make a thorough examination of them. Spain fell because of corrupt politics ; her officials were robbing and looting her treasury ; her ministers and her leading statesmen were taking advantage of their position to enrich themselves. That was the cause of Spain's downfall. And is it any wonder that she fell ? Canadians are more intelligent and more far seeing than the Spaniards, and surely in this progressive country of ours the people will not uphold the government in such a course as they have now decided on. It is all very well for us to say that our soldiers and sailors are braver and our statesmen wiser than those of any other land. But, when we see the government of this country taking such a position on this public question, and refusing information on public affairs to the representatives of the people, how humiliating is the spectacle. Am I to go back to my constituents and tell them : I am of no use to you at Ottawa because the government in power have refused time and again to give the opposition members information in the Public Accounts Committee, and now they have refused to give us access to the public documents of the country. I may do that, but I can tell the people that if Canada is to have progressive legislation such as is promised by the leader of the Conservative party, the people must turn the present government out of power. Within the last few years we have cleaned some of the barnacles off the ship of state, and we are continuing the good work in that direction, but we want the government to open up that ship, we want to get inside of her, we want to improve her machinery, we want to get rid of the microbes that infest her and steer her towards the progressive legislation which the Conservative party can give. I rose to enter my protest against the conduct of the government in this case. I am glad to see the stand many of the members on this side of the House have taken in regard to the question. It is our duty to stand by our rights in this parliament. It is our duty to vindicate the rights of the representatives of the people to see these public documents. It is our duty to make the walls of this old building ring as they never rang before in advocacy of our rights and in denunciation of the denial of these rights. I believe yet that the government will see that it is in their own interests as well as in the interests of the country that they should recede from their position and allow us access to these public documents.

House divided on amendment (Mr. Northrup).

Amendment (Mr. Northrup) negatived.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I beg to say, in reference to the matter which has just been before the House, that on Monday next, when the temper of hon. gentlemen on both sides has had time to cool down, I shall have a statement to make in regard to the same.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Supply.

Mr. FIELDING. At the time when it was expected that the estimates would be taken up yesterday, it was announced that the Minister of Public Works would bring his estimates forward. He is, however, obliged to be absent to-day, and we will proceed with the estimates of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. FOSTER. That is probably unavoidable, but it would have been very much more convenient for us on this side of the House if a little foresight had been used and we had been told of this change. We have to arrange our business on this side of the House just as well as the government have to arrange theirs; we have certain committees to take charge of certain things, and we had prepared, and had received no notice otherwise, to take up the Public Works estimates to-day. I know that these changes must take place, but there is no excuse for not giving fair notice to the opposition when the changes are known. Surely the Minister of Finance must have known yesterday or early to-day that the Minister of Public Works would not be here, and it would have helped us very much if he had given us that information. However, he has not thought of it, and I am not going to say more than that the Minister of Marine must not complain if his estimates are delayed.

Mr. FIELDING. There is a good deal of force in what my hon. friend says. I must be candid with him. The suggestion was thrown out last night that we would not get into Supply to-day.

Mr. FOSTER. There is every difference between getting into Supply and getting supplies.

Mr. FIELDING. We quite realize the difference, and my hon. friend has had occasion sometimes to know the difference too.

Mr. TAYLOR. Perhaps it would be as well for the Minister of Finance to call it six o'clock, and by the time we get back at eight o'clock he will be cooled down, and perhaps the right hon. leader of the government will then be prepared to make a statement. Our committee can get together by eight o'clock and be prepared to go on with the work.

Mr. FIELDING. Does my hon. friend think he can be cooled off by eight o'clock ?

Mr. TAYLOR. We are perfectly cool now, but until we hear from the premier, I think the statement made last night by the leader of the opposition should be carried out. Therefore it is only a waste of time to go on from now till six o'clock. If the premier is prepared to make his statement now, we will listen to him, or we will wait until eight o'clock and hear what he has to say then.

Further amount required for the construction of an ice-breaking steamer for Northumberland straits, $150,000.

Mr. FOSTER. I would ask the minister to give us a full and comprehensive statement of what has been done by the ice-breakers in the employ of the government—how many there are, what work each of them has done, and the general results of the policy.

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). I do not know whether the hon.. gentleman was here the other night, but I will repeat what I said in reference to the service of the ice-breakers. The ice-breakers we have are the 'Minto,' the 'Stanley,' the 'Champlain' and the 'Montcalm.' The 'Minto' and the 'Stanley,' as every member of this House is aware, are engaged in the winter service between Nova Scotia or New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. The 'Stanley' was bought nineteen years ago, and has been on that service since that time. The 'Minto' has been in the service eight years. In the summer the service between the island and the mainland is made by boats belonging to independent companies. In winter, in order to carry out the terms of the entry of Prince Edward Island into confederation, the 'Minto' and the 'Stanley' ply between the Island and the mainland. Does my hon. friend wish to have the number of employees ?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. BRODEUR. On the 'Minto' there are one master, two mates, four engineers and a crew of thirty-nine. On the 'Stanley' there are one master, one mate, one chief engineer, two other engineers and a crew of thirty-four. The estimated expenditure for the 'Minto' for next year will be $70,000 and for the 'Stanley,' $45,000. The 'Champlain' is carrying on the service between Rivière Ouelle and Murray Bay in conection with the Intercolonial Railway. She calls on the north side of the St. Lawrence at three ports during the summer—Murray bay, Cap à l'Aigle and Ste. Helene.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the cost of the 'Champlain' ?

Mr. BRODEUR. The estimate for next year is $22,000. The employees are one master, one chief officer, one second officer, two engineers and a crew of seventeen. The fourth ice breaker is the 'Montcalm.' The work of the 'Montcalm' is divided as follows: In the spring she goes down to the Gulf of the St. Lawrence and the Straits of Cabot, and being provided with wireless telegraphy she keeps in communication with vessels going into the straits and informs them regarding the best way to avoid the ice. During the summer she is used for provisioning our lighthouses in the Gulf and River St. Lawrence. In the winter she is employed at Quebec breaking the ice at Cap Rouge. She has been three years in that service. The first year, she kept the channel open a certain time, but owing to an accident had to stop.

Mr. FOSTER. How many days work did she do that first year in breaking the ice ?

Mr. BRODEUR. About a month.

Mr. FOSTER. How many hours per day ?

Mr. BRODEUR. She works day and night. When it is found that there is danger of the formation of an ice bridge, she goes up to Cap Rouge and breaks the ice.

Mr. FOSTER. The first year she did about a month's work.

Mr. BRODEUR. My deputy thinks about fifty or sixty days.

Mr. FOSTER. Is your deputy sure that she worked more than 208 hours the first year ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes. Last year she was employed in the same business, but outside of that she made two trips down the river in order to find out whether winter navigation was feasible, and the result was entirely satisfactory.

Mr. FOSTER. During what months ?

Mr. BRODEUR. In December and in January or the beginning of February.

Mr. FOSTER. What did she find in December ?

Mr. BRODEUR. She went as far as Seven islands. The trip was made without difficulty. She found, however, that the ice was rather thick in the bay but she steamed through it and reached the harbour.

Mr. FOSTER. What time in December ?

Mr. BRODEUR. About the middle of December.

Mr. FOSTER. Was there much ice there?

Mr. BRODEUR. There was a lot in the harbour, and the weather was very cold. There was floating ice in the river but none to prevent her getting down.

Mr. FOSTER. She practically met with no ice until she got to Seven islands ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. What boats frequent the Seven islands in winter time ? Do ocean steamers go there ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Not at present, but they may be expected later.

Mr. FOSTER. What does go in the winter ?

Mr. BRODEUR. There are very extensive works being established there, costing several millions of dollars.

Mr. FOSTER. What navigation is there in the winter ?

Mr. BRODEUR. There is none now.

Mr. FOSTER. What particular service is accomplished by this boat going down to Seven islands in winter, when there is no navigation there ?

Mr. BRODEUR. She carried some hay, passengers and provisions. Last year several accidents happened during the fall, and some schooners, which were carrying provisions to the lower St. Lawrence, were wrecked and there was a shortage of provisions. The 'Montcalm' carried some of the provisions for the provisioning of the people and especially some shanties.

Mr. FOSTER. Is this service for the public ?

Mr. BRODEUR. It was public service then.

Mr. FOSTER. The 'Montcalm' is a very expensive ice-breaker. She goes out in December when there is no ice to break and steams down to Seven islands where there is no navigation at all in the winter and sails about the harbour smashing up ice just to see what she can do. In the fall she brings down provisions for settlements. Are those settlements maintained by the government ?

Mr. BRODEUR. No.

Mr. FOSTER. Then she was not doing government work ?

Mr. BRODEUR. We wanted to find out whether winter navigation could be effected, or not, and we sent the 'Montcalm' as an experiment.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend was trying to find out whether the 'Montcalm' could go down in December to Seven islands or not.

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, in order to see whether navigation could be carried on in winter.

Mr. FOSTER. Where from and where to ?

Mr. BRODEUR. From Quebec to the lower St. Lawrence. It has been often stated that we should have winter navigation on the St. Lawrence, and we sent the 'Montcalm' for the purpose of finding out whether it was possible.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. gentleman mean ocean navigation ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. When the boat got to Seven islands, was it all clear from that out to the ocean ?

Mr. BRODEUR. The report says that it is generally clear on the north shore.

Mr. FOSTER. Do ocean steamers take that passage after the 1st December ?

Mr. BRODEUR. No.

Mr. FOSTER. Of what particular use is the 'Montcalm' going to be if you do not expect ocean steamers to take that passage ?. You have had this expensive steamer during three years, have any ocean vessels taken that winter trip during any of these years ? Are they doing it this winter ?

Mr. BRODEUR. No.

Mr. FOSTER. The minister tells us that some time in December the Montcalm took provisions for traders or private parties in certain settlements not owned by the government or not supported by the government, then she went to Seven Islands and proved that she could break some ice. But neither that nor the next year nor this year has a single ocean vessel travelled in winter on that route. What does he propose to do with the 'Montcalm' on that route ? She has been three years at it now and is in her prime. If she can do anything, she ought to do it the first three years. What have you done except provide settlers and traders with some provisions for the winter season ? What have you done with the 'Montcalm' with reference to the only object for which she was purchased, keeping open navigation for ocean steamers in the winter if possible. It is up to my hon. friend, without floating around with this $75,000 a year and all this remarkable jewelleryand fixings on the 'Montcalm' to show what she has done in the line of her intended purpose, which was not that of a supply boat but of an ice-breaker to make a commercial path for ocean steamers.

Mr. BRODEUR. The 'Montcalm' was purchased for the purpose first of breaking the ice in the St. Lawrence river, especially at the ice bridge which tends to form at Cap Rouge, some 6 or 7 miles above Quebec, near the site of the Quebec bridge which collapsed. Owing to the strength of this ice bridge the water in the St. Lawrence is backed up in the spring with the result that the upper parts of the St. Lawrence and also of its tributaries are flooded. If we can succeed in preventing the ice bridge from forming, we will prolong the season of navigation by enabling it to be carried on earlier in the spring. This will probably make a difference of one or two weeks in the season of navigation so that this service will be a great help to ocean navigation and at the same time will be an immense advantage to the farming district bordering on the St. Lawrence.

Mr. FOSTER. The minister has had three years' experience and I would ask him to detail what he has accomplished each year with reference to this particular boat.

Mr. BRODEUR. The first year the boat was at the ice bridge for one or two months and prevented the formation of the ice for a certain time.

Mr. FOSTER. When did she commence butting the ice, how long did she keep at it and what were the effects ? If we are to pay the money we must know what she is doing.

Mr. BRODEUR. All this information is contained in the reports of the department for previous years. I have not the report of the first year but I have sent for them and in the meantime shall read the report for the year, 1906-7 :

From December 11, 1906, the 'Montcalm' made almost daily trips to Cap Rouge to prevent the formation of the ice bridge there, and succeeded until January 24, 1907, when the accumulation of ice became so great and the weather so severe that the ice bridge stuck. The ship was kept cutting the jam until February 6, and during this time a track of 800 feet was made from a little below the site of the Quebec bridge to a little above Pointe-à-Basile lower range light.

On February 14, the steamer left for Seven Island and called at several points on the north shore to land mails and freight, she returned to Quebec on the 20th of the same month. Owing to the immense fields of heavy ice met in the river and gulf and the severity of the weather, the trip to Seven Islands was the hardest ever experienced by the 'Montcalm.'

Mr. FOSTER. Why did she go to Seven Islands ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Just to study the situation of the winter navigation in that part of the country, carry the mails and carry supplies.

Mr. FOSTER. Supplies for whom ?

Mr. BRODEUR. For the people of the settlements on that shore. I have explained that, during the previous fall, there had been serious wrecks of schooners, and actual famine was feared in some places. Representations that there was this danger were made to the department, and we were urged very strongly to carry supplies to these districts.

Mr. FOSTER. For humanitarian purposes ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes. Having the ice-breaker, we thought it well to use her for this service. Before she left, we had every reason to believe that the ice bridge should not form during her absence—

Mr. FOSTER. How did you do that ?

Mr. BRODEUR. By the study of the tide and the moon.

Mr. FOSTER. What ? You sent the steamer, and then prevented the ice bridge from forming by studying the tide and the moon? Wat amount of subsidy was paid for the work that the tide and the moon did ?

Mr. BRODEUR. It may be very pleasant for my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) to laugh at my expressions, but I think he must know that the moon has an effect—

Mr. FOSTER. However, while the steamer was gone, I suppose we were not paying much money for what the moon and the tide did ?

Mr. BRODEUR. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) knows, of course, that the tide is much less at some times than at others.

Mr. FOSTER. What I want to make sure is that the government do not take credit for what the tide and the moon did. But what I asked my hon. friend (Mr. Brodeur) was : During the few days the 'Montcalm' was away on this service, how did he prevent the ice bridge from forming. And he said he did it by studying the moon and tide. But suppose the moon and tide had not come up to time, what means had he for tiding over the absence of the 'Montcalm,' and keeping that ice bridge from forming ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Of course, I suppose I need hardly give such information to my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) ; but the tide is not always the same—

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, I have read that.

Mr. BRODEUR. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) takes advantage of the fact that I am not very familiar with his language—

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, don't put it on that ground.

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, I put it on that ground—he takes advantage of the fact that I do not speak English perfectly—

Mr. FOSTER. Next thing the hon. gentleman (Mr. Brodeur) will say is that I am attacking the French language.

Mr. BRODEUR. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) takes advantage of the fact that my expressions are not perfect. But I am trying to explain the case to him. I suppose he will admit that the tide is not always the same. At a certain time, it might be of one character, and a few days after of a different character. Perhaps, I do not express myself very nicely, but I think my hon. friend knows what I am trying to say—that the strength of the sun or the strength of the moon has its effect upon the tide.

Mr. FOSTER. So, my hon. friend (Mr. Brodeur) took good care to send the 'Montcalm' down to Seven Islands at the particular time when the moon and tide would keep the way open while she was away. Well, now, the stuff he took down was provided by the government, I understand. Did the traders for whom it was taken there pay freight to the government for having the stuff carried down ? The minister was performing a commercial service ?

Mr. BRODEUR. I cannot say that it was exactly a commercial service. It was rather a humanitarian service.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, it was for poor people who could not otherwise have been supplied ?

Mr. BRODEUR. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) is aware that there is no communication with that part of the country in the winter. The territory beyond the Saguenay is cut off by that river, and during a certain period of the year there is no communication. Of course, there is no railway communication at any time. We feared a famine ; there was danger that these people would be exposed to death. So, when the reports came to us, I thought it was right to send provisions for these people.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not find fault with the hon. minister for that. But what I was asking is whether these provisions were sent for trading, or were they contributions for the poor people ?

Mr. BRODEUR. They were for people who were interested in these settlements and who were in trade.

Mr. FOSTER. And the traders would supply the people ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Did the minister charge a fair commercial freight rate for taking these things down ?

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. BRODEUR. No.

Mr. FOSTER. But, of course, the traders would charge on the goods sold as though freight had been paid, and the poor people would have to pay.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. The consumer pays everything.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, and therefore I am asking whether the minister took precautions to provide that the traders should pay the freight that they would charge to their customers.

Mr. BRODEUR. No, I did not go as far as that.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, the minister was performing a service to the traders—that is he was performing a service the profit of which was reaped by the traders.

Mr. BRODEUR. I could not admit that. I thought it was the duty of the government, on humanitarian grounds, to see that these people were not exposed to famine. And, as the 'Montcalm' could make the trip and still be ready for the ice breaking service, we thought it well to send her down.

Mr. FOSTER. As I told my hon. friend, no one would quarrel with him for that. But, suppose that these provisions had been contributed for the benefit of these people, the government would have carried out its duty if it had provided the steamer to carry the things down to Seven Islands. That would be all right. But if the government simply provided a means for getting the traders' supplies down to the settlements, they were not doing a charitable work and the traders should have paid a fair freight rate on the goods taken down. Charity and the protection of people against famine is one thing ; but I think the government steamers are not there for the purpose of taking down supplies out of which traders may make a profit. That is all I want to say in reference to that. Do not let my hon. friend try to make any point of the fact that we are criticising him because he went down with the supposition that there was to be a famine and gave a chance to these people to get something to eat during the winter. We find no fault with that. How long after she was down there were you butting the ice ?

Mr. BRODEUR. She left on the 14th and came back on the 20th.

Mr. FOSTER. Then what did she do ?

Mr. BRODEUR. (reading)——

On her return to Quebec the steamer commenced the work of breaking ice below Quebec and continued at this work until March 1. Work was resumed at the Cap Rouge ice bridge an April 2, and the steamer made her way through very heavy ice from Sillery Point to Pointe au Baril upper range light, cutting a channel 1,000 feet in width.

Mr. FOSTER. What length was that channel ?

Mr. BRODEUR. It is about three miles, I understand.

Mr. FOSTER. Did she keep the ice-bridge from forming that year ?

Mr. BRODEUR. No, but the ice-bridge left earlier on account of the work which had been carried on there.

Mr. FOSTER. She did not prevent it from forming ?

Mr. BRODEUR. She did not prevent it from forming.

Mr. FOSTER. Why not ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Because she was not successful.

Mr. FOSTER. The ice was too strong for her ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. But your conclusion is that as a result of her work the ice-bridge moved out earlier than it otherwise would ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. How much earlier ?

Mr. BRODEUR. A couple of weeks.

Mr. FOSTER. So that the gain was two weeks in that year ?

Mr. BRODEUR. And it prevented a flood too.

Mr. FOSTER. It might have prevented the duration of the flood but would it prevent the flood at all ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, because the flood generally took place in former years after the ice was moving, or after the ice began to move from the upper part of the St. Lawrence. This channel was opened by the action of the 'Montcalm' which prevented the flood and at the same time gave navigation an earlier opening.

Mr. FOSTER. Then the result of last year's work was that you probably facilitated the breaking up of the bridge by ten days or a fortnight and you prevented a bad flood ?

Mr. BRODEUR. That was the result.

Mr. FOSTER. Can my hon. friend tell the committee what particular good all those expensive furnishings of the 'Montcalm' did during that arduous winter's work ? What particular use were all those thousands and thousands of dollars worth of plate, silver, tea sets and all that sort of thing ?

Mr. BRODEUR. They were not used during that winter, I am told.

Mr. FOSTER. Then my hon. friend admits that these were not bought for the workmen ?

Mr. BRODEUR. I will not be positive ; it may be that the officers were using them.

Mr. FOSTER. Did the common men who do the work use them ?

Mr. BRODEUR. They have their own service.

Mr. FOSTER. So that the ad captandum argument of the minister the other day that everything had to be good for the sailors does not apply because this was not used for the sailors at all.

Mr. BRODEUR. I was simply answering the hon. gentleman when he suggested that these things were too good for the sailors.

Mr. TAYLOR. The minister has given us what the ice-breaker did from 1906 until some time in 1907. What did she do from the 30th June, 1906 to the 31st March, 1907—during the nine months of the fiscal year ?

Mr. BRODEUR. In the early part of July, 1906, the 'Montcalm' went to the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the Labrador coast, about 500 miles north of Belle Isle, and then she was engaged in provisioning lighthouses in the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

Mr. TAYLOR. I see by the Auditor General's Report, page P—23 the following item :

Joseph Raymond, Quebec, pilotage of vessels from Quebec to Sorel and return, $74.75.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Six o'clock.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the minister give us the detail of her first year's work when we get back again ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY.

House in Committee of Supply.

Mr. FOSTER. When the House rose at six o'clock we were reviewing the expenses of the steamer 'Montcalm.' Can the minister give the House the quantity of freight that he took down on that trip and the parties to whom it was consigned ?

Mr. BRODEUR. I will get the information later and supply the hon. gentleman with it.

Mr. FOSTER. I think that is necessary. How far is Seven Islands below Quebec ?

Mr. BRODEUR. About 180 miles on the north shore of the St. Lawrence.

Mr. FOSTER. And that is as far down as the vessel went on that trip ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Is Seven Islands a farming country ?

Mr. BRODEUR. It is a fishing place, there is a pulp wood industry, mills, and a whaling industry.

Mr. FOSTER. Is there a pulp wood company down there ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Not precisely at Seven Islands, but some miles from it.

Mr. FOSTER. What are the settlements there called ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Seven Islands.

Mr. FOSTER. Is this pulp-wood concern on the bay at Seven Islands ?

Mr. BRODEUR. It is on the river, twelve miles from the bay.

Mr. AMES. I may explain, as I am quite familiar with the locality, that it is a large bay, and Clarke city on the southwest side of the bay, within the sheltered portion of the bay.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the port to which the vessel goes ?

Mr. BRODEUR. She anchors in the bay at Seven Islands, near the lighthouse, and discharges her cargo of supplies.

Mr. BRODEUR.

Mr. FOSTER. There is a wharf at Seven Islands, is there ?

Mr. BRODEUR. I understand that there is.

Mr. FOSTER. Who are the business people at the place ?

Mr. BRODEUR. The whaling industry, which is carried on, I think, mostly by people from Montreal and Gaspé. The other people are fishermen. Then there is Clark city, which is outside the bay itself. I think it is on the river, some distance from the bay.

Mr. FOSTER. Who owns the wharf at that place ?

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. HENDERSON. The minister has told us that the ice-breaker was sent down for the purpose of conveying provisions, hay and other things for the settlers. How was that done in former years ? Why was there a change, and why had the government steamer to be made use of for the purpose of conveying what no doubt had previously been conveyed by ordinary trading vessels ? It seems to me rather remarkable that a vessel so elaborately fitted up as the 'Montcalm' should be put into a service of this kind. It must have supplanted some of the ordinary vessels that were trading on the St. Lawrence, unless it happened that on this particular occasion sufficient supplies had not been taken there during the season of open navigation. There is something about it that I can scarcely comprehend, for I do not for a moment suppose that the government is entering into competition with the ordinary trading vessels in carrying supplies to the settlers of that district. Though it is a whaling station, I do not suppose that there are any whales caught at Seven Islands. Consequently those engaged in that industry have, no doubt, vessels of their own which go down to the Gaspé coast or the coast of Labrador to capture whales, and their catch would be brought to Seven Islands for the purpose of having the oil, &c., extracted. The owners of the whaling industry would doubtless have vessels to take in all the supplies they wanted for the winter season, and these vessels must have been supplanted when the government in its generosity provided the means of sending down from Montreal or Quebec the necessary provisions for the sustenance of settlers. Perhaps the minister can give us an explanation of this extraordinary policy.

Mr. BRODEUR. We have not entered into competition with any existing lines. The service we are performing is performed at a time of the year when there are no vessels at all engaged in the transportation business. As I have explained, there had been several schooners sent from Quebec to provision the settlements on the banks of the St. Lawrence, and some of these schooners were wrecked. According to statements made to the department, there was fear of a famine amongst the settlers on that coast, a result of the wrecks of schooners taking supplies in the fall. The settlements on the north shore of the St. Lawrence are not very numerous, and they have no communication at all during the winter. So we were not engaged in a business which could compete with any transportation industry—quite the reverse.

Mr. AMES. Did the government charge freight on the provisions carried at regular rates ?

Mr. BRODEUR. No, we did not charge any freight, because the quantity was not very large. It was done simply for the relief of those people.

Mr. AMES. Did you carry stores for the pulp company at Clarke city free of charge?

Mr. BRODEUR. No.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. How is the trading of the pulp mill transacted ? Has the pulp company no steamers of its own ?

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not know.

Mr. TAYLOR. Before recess I inquired what the 'Montcalm' was doing during the months of July, August, September and October, 1906. All the report gives us is what she was doing from December up to the 31st March.

Mr. BRODEUR. During the summer she is engaged provisioning the lighthouses. Last spring she was sent to Cabot strait to meet the vessels going into that strait.

Mr. TAYLOR. That was in 1907, but I am asking with reference to the summer 1906.

Mr. BRODEUR. In the month of July 1906, she made a very successful trip to Rigolet on the Labrador coast.

Mr. FOSTER. Where was she from March until July ? We left her in March butting at the ice at Cap Rouge.

Mr. BRODEUR. I said that in July she made a trip to Rigolet.

Mr. TAYLOR. What did she do in August ?

Mr. BRODEUR. My deputy informs me that in August and September she was attending to the supplying of the lighthouses in the Straits of Belle Isle and the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

Mr. TAYLOR. Was she carrying these gas buoys or coal oil or what kind of supplies ?

Mr. BRODEUR. The supplies for lighthouses generally during July, August and September.

Mr. TAYLOR. What was she doing in October and November ?

Mr. BRODEUR. She must have been attending to that same work.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then she was engaged the whole summer from the 1st of July to December carrying supplies to the lighthouses.

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR. The salaries of the officers for the nine months from 30th June until the 31st March amounted to $5,380. The wages paid the crew amounted to $10,360, and $5,113 for their board. So that she was engaged all the time from the 30th June until the 31st March—steadily running all the time.

Mr. BRODEUR. I could not say that she was running all the time. But generally speaking she was employed provisioning the lighthouses. That is the work she attends to during the summer. If the hon. gentleman wants the exact dates, he may get them from the log book.

Mr. TAYLOR. According to the Auditor General's Report, page 323, she made a trip to Sorel and return. Was she up to Sorel carrying supplies and in what month was that? Did she take that trip up there to see what the tides and the man in the moon were doing ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Some repairs were made to the vessel in our own yards at Sorel.

Mr. TAYLOR. She had to go there for repairs ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR. Not ice-breaking or carrying supplies. The next item is for pilotage of the vessel, Quebec to Montreal and return, $92.50. What was the occasion and date of that trip ?

Mr. BRODEUR. The deputy and commander cannot now give me that information.

Mr. TAYLOR. At page P—22 the minister will find the following account :

Drolet, F. X., Quebec : installation of steering gear as agreed, $325 ; labour, 6 days at $4.50, 214 days at $4, 242 days at $3.50, 661 days at $3, 80 days at $2.50, 173 days at $2. 199½ hours at 45 cents, 3,340½ hours at 40 cents, 5,003½ hours at 35 cents, 5,430½ hours at 30 cents, 144 hours at 20 cents, (2 men) 22 days at $5, 229½ hours at 60 cents, 1,117 hours at 50 cents; engineer and firemen running engine at night, 56 hours at $5; machine screws, 58 at 30 cents.

A total of $15,257.62.

Judging from the number of days' work that boat must have been laid up for two months while the minister says that during the whole six months she was running.

Were the crew paid while she was being repaired ?

Mr. BRODEUR. I have not the account before me. This account might have been incurred in 1906-07 or in the previous year, I am not sure about that. My impression is it was incurred the year before and paid this year. As to the number of days' work in the account, my hon. friend understands that when a vessel is to be repaired it is important that a large number of men should be put on her so as to rush the work through and save the dockage charges, which are very heavy.

Mr. TAYLOR. But there is a large number of days as well as a large number of hours.

Mr. AMES. Did the 'Montcalm' meet with an accident this fall and have to go into dry dock ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, while near the Straits of Belle Isle provisioning lighthouses she struck on a rock. I ordered an investigation and it was shown that this rock was not on the chart which was in the hands of the captain, who was found to be not to blame.

Mr. FOSTER. Night or day ?

Mr. BRODEUR. At 6.26 in the morning.

Mr. AMES. How seriously was she damaged and how long has she been in Davis' dry dock ?

Mr. BRODEUR. She is still in the dry dock.

Mr. AMES. Five or six weeks ?

Mr. BRODEUR. More than that, she was rather seriously damaged.

Mr. LEFURGEY. Are the repairs yet completed ?

Mr. BRODEUR. No.

Mr. LEFURGEY. Is the extent of the damage known ?

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not know exactly the damage done and the cost of the repairs.

Mr. LEFURGEY. Will she be ready in the Spring to take up the work at Cap Rouge ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Mr. PRINGLE. Were the supplies for this vessel purchased by tender for instance this $12,000 for coal ?

Mr. BRODEUR. The coal was purchased by tender and as to the supplies, prices are asked from a certain number of people, competitive prices, and they are given to the lowest tenderer.

Mr. PRINGLE. Take the account of G. T. Davie & Sons for $3,627.34 at page J—22.

Mr. TAYLOR. Many of these items could not be by tender as they are for work, but were the supplies purchased by tender ?

Mr. BRODEUR. The work cannot be done by tender because when an accident happens to a vessel it is impossible to state what the extent of the repairs will be.

Mr. PRINGLE. The account of J. B. Côté is almost entirely for supplies, $1,864. This includes such items as burners for steam launch, galvanized sheet iron, &c., a large number of articles which could be very easily purchased by tender.

Mr. BRODEUR. In some cases it is absolutely impossible to ask for tenders because something may be needed for the boat and has to be purchased by the agent. I do not know whether the articles charged for in this account were bought on the same day. Probably not. This is made up of a number of items grouped together by the Auditor General. Besides, the hon. gentleman will see that there are articles there which could not very well be bought by tender, because we do not know the quantity that will be needed.

Mr. PRINGLE. Take, for instance, the account of F. X. Drolet, of Quebec. Here are charges for such things as brass, copper and muntz metal, 2,326 pounds at forty cents. Were tenders called for this ? There are many items here for which, I should think, tenders might be asked.

Mr. BRODEUR. But we do not know what amount will be required during the year. Take the case referred to, that of Mr. Drolet. Mr. Drolet is a boilermaker and machinist, the best in Quebec ; a man of experience in these things. When a vessel goes into dock, he is called upon to make the repairs, and makes those repairs under the direction of the ship's husband. If he supplies materials for repairs, these cannot very well be bought by tender.

Mr. PRINGLE. Well, you have here items for clothing amounting to thousands of dollars. Of course, for use on an ice-breaker warm clothing is required. I see that overcoats are charged at $30, big prices for suits of clothes, rubber boots, and so on. Surely, these could be bought by contract ?

Mr. BRODEUR. My hon. friend (Mr. Pringle) must admit that we must look after the clothing of these men, and, as the conditions are severe, they must be supplied with good articles.

Mr. PRINGLE. They should be warmly clad, and, of course, the tailors should get a fair profit. But one man should not have a monopoly of making the clothing for the men on these vessels.

Mr. BRODEUR. This question of clothing was raised on a former occasion by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor). I may inform him and also my hon. friend from Stormont (Mr. Pringle)that, though the price of clothing has gone up within the last few years we are paying the same price for uniforms as in 1896.

Mr. TAYLOR. They ought to be cheaper.

Mr. PRINGLE. I am surprised to hear the hon. gentleman (Mr. Brodeur) say that the price of clothing had increased. I thought that, under the preferential tariff, the price of tweeds had decreased slightly. I quite admit that these prices are good, substantial prices.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. The price of labour on clothing has increased from twenty-five to forty per cent and the prices of woollen goods have increased quite considerably.

Mr. PRINGLE. Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Zimmerman) tell us if that increase is owing to the fact that our woollen mills have been put out of business ? In my town, Cornwall, we had a very prosperous woollen mill, which made a fine class of tweeds, but, owing to the preferential tariff, it had to go out of business. Is the increase in price of tweeds due to the fact that the competition of the Canadian manufacturers has been removed ?

Mr. TALBOT. Is the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pringle) aware that in parts of Canada other than Cornwall—a very thriving town —the woollen manufacturers have increased their output and the number of their hands ?

Mr. PRINGLE. My hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Zimmerman) was discussing the question of clothing. On that subject he speaks with great authority. Can he tell me if the tailors have increased their prices ?

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. The minister states that he has paid the same price for these uniforms as was paid in 1896. I say, if he is doing that, he is getting cheap clothing, because the prices have unquestionably gone up from twenty-five to forty per cent.

Mr. PRINGLE. No doubt the hon. member has looked over these items, and is prepared to say that the charges for clothing are reasonable charges.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. I am not prepared to say anything of the kind. What I say is that clothing to-day is more expensive than it was a few years ago and I say also that a good article ought to be supplied.

Mr. BLAIN. I am surprised that the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Talbot) should venture to remind us of the old story we have heard so often about the great prosperity of our manufacturers in Canada.

Mr. TALBOT. I said in other places outside of Cornwall the woollen manufacturers have increased their outputs and the number of their hands.

Mr. BLAIN. Perhaps the hon. member would give us a list of these prosperous factories.

Mr. TALBOT. St. Hyacinthe, for one.

Mr. BLAIN. The hon. gentleman must remember that it is an every day story with manufacturers——

Mr. TALBOT. It must be a good story.

Mr. BLAIN. My hon. friend (Mr. Talbot) is not bound to endorse the story until he has heard it. It is an old story for us to be reminded of the prosperity of our manufacturers. But, to-day, our manufacturing establishments are shutting down and discharging their hands. I do not think there is a manufacturing town in the province of Ontario in which a number of hands have not been discharged during the last three months. In some of the most prosperous sections of Ontario we have the exhibition of municipalities supplying three meals a day for unemployed citizens.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Where ?

Mr. BLAIN. In Mr. Zimmerman's own city, there are many unemployed hands.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. I can assure my hon. friend that there is no city on this continent that is proportionately busier than the city of Hamilton to-day. We have fewer men walking the streets in Hamilton to-day than any city in this country and the great majority of the factories are quite busy. I am engaged in a maufacturing business myself and we can hardly get enough help to do our work. We have heard the factory of the International Harvester Company mentioned as having been closed down. They have to-day 1,400 men working, just 400 less than they had in the busy season and 300 more than they had this time last year. That is so in regard to many other manufacturers. It is not a matter of being idle for the want of business ; it is a matter of being idle for the want of capital. The banks, as we all know, have curtailed the credit of the manufacturers and business men to such an extent that they have been compelled to lessen their expenses in some way; consequently a few men here and a few men there were let go but it is not a case of not having the business. They have all the business they can attend to. I was speaking to a manufacturer on Saturday last. He said that he had at least five months works ahead of him and yet they are closed down for two weeks. I presume that is one of the factories that my hon. friend refers to. They are closed down for two weeks for repairs and he is begrudging the time that they are closed down now.

Mr. BLAIN. My hon. friend will not make that statement that there is not a large number of unemployed mechanics in his own city, will he ?

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. I will say that in so far as the regular factory hands are concerned they are more than fairly well employed.

Mr. BLAIN. That is not an answer to the question.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. There are quite a number of men engaged in the building industry who are idle, as they are always at this time of the year, but they have made enough money in the busy season to carry them through the winter season.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I am afraid we are wandering away from the subject. We should get back to ice-breakers.

Mr. BLAIN. I do not wish to enter into a controversy with the hon. gentleman from Hamilton (Mr. Zimmerman); I merely wish to take a moment or two to answer what my hon. friend has said.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. That is irrelevant is it not ?

Mr. BLAIN. Well, I will not trespass on the rights of the committee and we will take another opportunity of answering my hon. friend. Since the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries is so anxious to get back to his ice-breakers I want to ask him a question or two. I see that this unfortunate vessel, the 'Montcalm,' was six days in dry dock being repaired and that it cost the people of the country $500 a day or, $3,627 to repair that vessel. I am informed now that the same vessel has been in dry dock for about two months. Am I correct in that ?

Mr. BRODEUR. No, about six weeks.

Mr. BLAIN. Now, there is a puzzler for my hon. friend. If it cost the people last year to repair this vessel $500 a day for six days how much will it cost for repairs going on for six weeks ? Perhaps my hon. friend will tell us what estimate his department has made as to what the repairs on this vessel will cost ?

Mr. BRODEUR. We cannot estimate before she goes into the dock the cost of repairs which are to be made because we do not know exactly what the nature of the repairs will be. The boat is now in the dock and the work is being carried on under the supervision of the ship's husband.

Mr. FOSTER. Who is the ship's husband ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Mr. Macdonald.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN

Mr. FOSTER. Who is he ?

Mr. BRODEUR. He used to be employed in the Imperial dockyard at Halifax.

Mr. BLAIN. Then my hon. friend is not able to give the committee an estimate of what it will cost to complete the repairs of this vessel ?

Mr. BRODEUR. No, we cannot do it because when you commence the repairs you do not know exactly the extent of them. It is only as you proceed that you can ascertain the nature of the work that is to be done.

Mr. FOSTER. That bill will evidently be a large one.

Mr. BRODEUR. Probably.

Mr. FOSTER. Probably ? It cannot be any other way.

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. It must be a very large bill. Besides that you are losing the use of the vessel entirely for this season. How is the ice bridge progressing down there at the present time ?

Mr. BRODEUR. There is pretty mild weather just now and Providence is still with us.

Mr. FOSTER. There has been some pretty sharp weather, has there not ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Not so far.

Mr. FOSTER. And there is no formation of an ice bridge yet ?

Mr. BRODEUR. No formation of an ice bridge yet.

Mr. FOSTER. The moon and tides are getting in their work.

Mr. BRODEUR. The moon and tides and everything else. Providence is with us.

Mr. LEFURGEY. You do not always give credit to Providence.

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. As far as this year is concerned the country has got on just as well without the ice-breaker as if you had her; in fact the country has got on a great deal better except that while the critter is up in the straps she is costing the country a large amount of money. Who is conducting the investigation into that accident, which perhaps ought not to have occurred, and which is responsible for all this cost and all this loss ?

Mr. BRODEUR. The wreck commissioner.

Mr. FOSTER. Who is the wreck commissioner ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Commander Spain.

Mr. FOSTER. Has any written report been presented to parliament in reference to it ?

Mr. BRODEUR. No report has been presented to parliament but a report has been presented to the department.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish the minister would bring the report down.

Mr. BRODEUR. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. FOSTER. We have had this net result from the 'Montcalm'—she was first put into service at what date ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Three or four years ago; I do not exactly remember the date.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to have the time. I want to know what she has done since you have had her.

Mr. BRODEUR. I am very willing to give that information but as the boat went into commission four or five years ago I think the hon. gentleman is asking a good deal of a minister. But, I am willing to give it. I will try to get it for my hon. friend although I do not think it is information I should be called upon to give. We are now discussing the estimates for the coming fiscal year, and I do not know that it is exactly fair to ask that I should give information about expenditures that occurred three or four years ago and give the exact date at which each vessel went into commission. It is going very far to ask me that. However, now that the question has been asked I shall try to get the explanation.

Mr. FOSTER. Let me explain to the minister why I asked this. I would have asked the same question if we had had no little trouble during the last three or four days. I do not want him to run away with the idea that this comes because there has been a little brush between the two sides of the House. What I am after is this : This government has started in on the policy of ice breakers, it commenced with one, it now has four. Now, after the 'Montcalm' your first great ice breaker, has been at work for four years it is quite time we should review the situation so as to determine whether or not the policy of getting ice breaking vessels as it has been developed by the government, has proved successful or not. I suppose the minister will agree with me that an ice breaker like the 'Montcalm' is a very expensive vessel to employ from the 1st of May until December in the lighthouse supply service. She is a costly vessel, she was never built for that service, and is a most expensive vessel to maintain. Three fourths of the time of the 'Montcalm' is taken up in general work of supplying lighthouses which is a lighter vessel with less power and far less expensive to run could very well do. In the interval for about three months she is doing more or less ice breaking. If after four years you find she performs no very great service in ice-breaking and that three-fourths of her time is taken up in supply business it becomes a question for a thoughtful and economical minister to find out whether or not his policy in this regard is right. So far as two years are concerned we have got pretty well the history of this vessel—one year she succeeded in making about a fortnight's advance in the going out of the ice bridge; that is presumably she did, but no one knows what the moon and the tide were doing all this time and what the peculiarities of the season were doing towards making the ice bridge move. All that is claimed for her is that in that three months she was instrumental in pushing out the ice bridge by two weeks and in preventing may be some floods. The other part of her winter work was to run down to Seven Islands carrying a lot of freight for traders and supply people without charging them anything for it ; cavorting around a little in the harbour and then coming back to take up her work at the ice, presumably on the ground that the moon and the tide by that time had got pretty tired out and wanted a little rest. This year her record is infinitely worse. For some reason or other, or for no reason, while she was engaged in work she never was built for or intended for, (and which could only be excused if she had performed very important and successful work in the winter time ice breaking) she runs upon a rock, is disabled from doing any work, this winter, has been in dock for six weeks and the minister does not know how long she will remain there. Fifteen thousand dollars was put on her and charged to the people of the country in the last fiscal year of nine months.

Mr. TAYLOR. Thirty thousand.

Mr. FOSTER. In the one single case of Drolet, that was the Bill. She then went to Sorel.

Mr. TAYLOR. $10,000 at Sorel.

Mr. FOSTER. Now she is in dry dock and she will cost an immense amount of money. I want to know the whole history of her work for the four or five years we have had her and then we can know whether it is a wise policy to go on buying other ice breakers.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Before the minister proceeds to give the history of that boat for the past forty or fifty years I want to make a few suggestions to him.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman. I am trying to get some information from the minister and the minister is ready to give it and we will take the suggestions from my hon. friend (Mr. Johnston) later, if it is just as convenient to him. I know I deprive myself of an immense amount of benefit but I am willing to run the risk of that for the sake of getting enlightenment which will come from the minister himself.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I want to assure my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) that I am not going to make any suggestions to him. In his wildest moments I hope he would not accuse me of that.

Mr. FOSTER. I have the right to have my question answered by the minister.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I have the floor. Representing as I do probably the second largest shipping port in the Dominion, I have to say that last spring the 'Montcalm' rendered splendid service to the shipping interests of the port of Sydney. She was in the Gulf during the months of April, May and June, and she then rendered great service not only to the shipping entering Sydney harbour but to the shipping navigating the Gulf.

Mr. BERGERON. Did my hon. friend see the 'Montcalm' down there then?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes.

Mr. BERGERON. The hon. gentleman was in Ottawa at that time.

Mr. JOHNSTON. No. After the results of the elections of the last day or two, it is not surprising that my hon. friend for Beauharnois should be astray. He thinks the House was in session last year in June and July.

Mr. BERGERON. I did not speak of June and July. The hon. gentleman spoke of April and May.

Mr. JOHNSTON. After the House adjourns, I will take my hon. friend out and tell him the time the House rose last year. However, this is only in keeping with his conduct of the last few days, when he was talking about things of which he knew nothing. To come back to the ice-breaker, I want to suggest to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that every possible effort be made to get this steamship repaired, so that she may be ready next spring to resume the work which she was doing last spring, and which was of immense benefit to shipping. The purchase and equipment of this ice-breaker has been and is to-day approved of by everybody who has any interest in shipping in this country.

Mr. LEFURGEY. Will the hon. gentleman tell what she has done?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I could tell my hon. friend very well, but I want to address the few words I have to say to the minister.

Mr. DANIEL. Might I ask my hon. friend what service the 'Montcalm' was rendering?

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The 'Montcalm' was rendering splendid service in the gulf and River St. Lawrence.

Mr. DANIEL. I thought my hon. friend was speaking of the eastern coast of Nova Scotia.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I am speaking of Cabot Strait, in which last year there was more than the usual quantity of drift ice, causing considerable delay to navigation. Take, for instance, the port of Sydney, where there is an important coal trade, important not only to Sydney but to the whole of Canada. That trade was seriously interrupted last year by the unusual quantity of drift ice in Cabot Strait, and shipping was facilitated by the operations of the 'Montcalm.' The ice was moving from time to time, sometimes to the Newfoundland coast and sometimes to the eastern coast of Nova Scotia. The 'Montcalm' communicated by wireless with Sydney, and reports were sent all over the country as to the flow of ice, so that steamers could take the southern route or the northern route according to the direction of the flow.

Mr. PRINGLE. Might I ask my hon. friend if the 'Montcalm' got the ice out of the harbour of Sydney?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I am addressing my observations to gentlemen who have some conception of the nature of shipping.

Mr. PRINGLE. I have some conception of the fact that the 'Montcalm' cost this country $100,000. The hon. gentleman was talking about the harbour of Sydney, and I want to know what service she rendered in that harbour.

Mr. JOHNSTON. If my hon. friend asks any member of the Shipping Federation in Montreal, I care not whether he is a Liberal or a Conservative, he will tell him unhesitatingly that the 'Montcalm', not only last year, but every year that she has been in commission has rendered splendid service to the shipping of this country. I was pointing out that the 'Montcalm' from time to time, during April, May and June, directed ships as to the course they should pursue in the St. Lawrence.

Mr. STANSFIELD. Might I ask the hon. gentleman a question? He stated that during the months of April, May and June Marconi messages were sent to Sydney. I call his attention to page P—23 of the Auditor General's Report, where a charge is made for an operator employed for three months to September 30. There is no charge for April or May.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I suppose my hon. friend would be surprised if I told him that we have had Marconi operators employed at Sydney for the last four years, and ships have been communicating every day with Glace Bay. Surely my hon. friend knows that. I speak of the service rendered by the 'Montcalm', because it has been of supreme importance not only to my constituency, but to shipping interests generally; and I hope that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will see to it that every possible effort is made to have her placed in the same position as she was in last spring, in order that she may continue to do the work which is of so much importance to the people of this country.

Mr. J. D. REID (Grenville). Where was she going when the hon. gentleman took that trip on her ?

Mr. BRODEUR. In view of the observations made by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) it may be necessary for me to explain why the government purchased the 'Montcalm' and some other ice-breakers. The hon. gentleman stated that this policy of ice-breakers has been started by this government. I suppose he forgot that the first ice-breaker bought for this country was the 'Stanley,' which was purchased in 1885 or thereabouts.

Mr. FOSTER. The 'Stanley' was not engaged for this ice-breaking policy.

Mr. BRODEUR. My hon. friend has referred to the four ice-breakers that we have.

Mr. FOSTER. If you count her as an ice-breaker ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Certainly, the 'Stanley' and the 'Minto' are ice-breakers.

Mr. FOSTER. They were built for commercial work entirely.

Mr. BRODEUR. And at the same time for breaking ice.

Mr. LEFURGEY. I would like to tell the hon. member that if he would put a tunnel between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, he could do without an ice-breaker.

Mr. BRODEUR. We will discuss the tunnel at another time. I am glad the question, whether we should have ice-breakers or not, has been brought up. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) criticises the government because we have purchased an ice-breaker for the river St. Lawrence. I take issue with him. The shipping interest, which has certainly done the most in building up navigation, have been for years asking that ice-breakers should be put on the St. Lawrence route. My hon. friend wants to know what the steamer 'Montcalm' has done. I suppose it is hardly necessary for me to argue that the work was useful. I would simply say that all those connected with the navigation of the St. Lawrence approve of our having an ice-breaker like the 'Montcalm,' and it was in response to their repeated representations that we purchased that vessel. My hon. friend seems to think that the 'Montcalm' has not been doing anything to help navigation. Let me tell him that if he will go to Montreal and consult the people interested there in shipping, he will find that there is not one dissenting voice among them regarding the advisability of our having such a vessel as the 'Montcalm.' But possibly my hon. friend does not care much about the shipping interests Possibly he may say that the shipping interests are simply looking out for themselves.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not say so.

Mr. BRODEUR. But my hon. friend might say so.

Mr. FOSTER. I might not say so.

Mr. BRODEUR. Then why does my hon. friend criticise the policy of this government in purchasing ice-breakers ? He says he is not sure that the policy is a good one. He might argue that the shipping interests are simply looking after their own particular advantage and not the interests of the country generally. Well, the whole country is interesed in every possible advantage being given to facilitate navigation ; and if by breaking up the ice, we succeed in lengthening our season of navigation, if we thereby enable the exporters of this country to ship their products ten, fifteen or twenty days or a month longer than they are now doing, it seems to me that we are doing what everybody interested in trade cannot but approve. Let me give, not only the opinion of the shipping interest but also the opinion of the men engaged in the work of the 'Montcalm.' Take the report of Captain Kœnig, an experienced sailor, who has been in the service of this country some thirty years. This is what he reports of the work done by the 'Montcalm' in the year 1904-5, her first year of service :

> I believe that the 'Montcalm' has rendered valuable services in assisting to open navigation at an earlier date than usual, when it was left to follow the natural course as in past years. Another result of ice-breaking in the jam is the prevention of the river floods which occurred yearly between Quebec and Montreal, when the channel was blocked by the ice in the jam at Cap Rouge.

Will the hon. gentleman say that we were derelict in our duty when we took the proper steps to prevent the flooding of the immense quantity of land on the banks of the St. Lawrence between Quebec and Montreal ?

Mr. DANIEL. What report is the minister reading from ?

Mr. BRODEUR. I am reading from the annual report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries for the year 1905. My excuse for quoting from that report is the request of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) to be informed of all the work done by 'Montcalm' since she was purchased. That vessel gave us earlier navigation and also prevented floods. Will my hon. friend dispute the utility of such a work ?

Mr. HENDERSON. Does the minister contend that it is a great advantage to prevent the flooding of lands along the river St. Lawrence in the spring ? I have understood that the overflow of the St. Lawrence on those hay lands made them very much more fruitful and enabled the farmers to raise twenty years in succession large quantities of hay upon them. Possibly, therefore, the advantage may not be what the minister pretends. However, I am not an expert. Possibly the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Talbot) knows more than I do and possibly more than does the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. BERGERON. He knows more about straw.

Mr. TALBOT. As the hon. gentleman admits that I know more about the district than he does——

Mr. HENDERSON. I would much rather have the information from the minister responsible.

Mr. J. D. REID. The hon. member for Bellechasse knows more about straw than anything else.

Mr. HENDERSON. I want the information from the minister, because it will come from him with an authority which it would not have coming from the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Talbot). If we had it from that hon. gentleman, we could not go to the country and say we have it on the authority of a minister of the Crown. On this side we have to be very modest as all we can get is what the government chooses to give us. But what we want is the very best of what little we can get. I do not want anything second hand when I know I can get it first hand. Consequently the hon. member for Bellechasse will excuse me for setting him aside at this moment and getting an expert opinion from the Minister of Marine. No doubt the minister is an authority on hay because he is an authority on most things in the province of Quebec and therefore will be able to give an opinion on the question I put to him.

Mr. BRODEUR. I have always thought —I may be mistaken—because my hon. friend has very much more experience than I, and is a little older and has been in the House many more years, that on a question such as this, as to whether swamp lands are better than drained lands, he could express a better opinion than I can. While I think my hon. friend, with his knowledge, could answer the question much better than I can, still I am willing to give my opinion although it is not an expert opinion.

Mr. HENDERSON. Oh then, we do not want it.

Mr. BRODEUR. I thought it was an advantage to have the water off the land when seeding began.

Mr. HENDERSON. But this is hay land.

Mr. BRODEUR. But there is some seeding. We are not a very large province, but we do some seeding.

Mr. BERGERON. I would suggest that instead of reading the report the minister should give us the dates of the opening of navigation for eight or nine years before the 'Montcalm' was put in service and since her acquisition.

Mr. BRODEUR. I am reading from the report of a man who has experience, Captain Kœnig. He says :

> The very fact of a broad channel, four miles long, cut through a wall of deep ice, must have let out an immense amount of water, which would have, otherwise, accumulated above and caused the usual floods.

I suppose my hon. friend from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) does not object to our taking means to prevent the floods?

Mr. BERGERON. My hon. friend will not take my suggestion which would shorten the discussion and give us the dates; we can judge better than Captain Koenig.

Mr. BRODEUR. That is what I was coming at. Captain Koenig says :

> Then again the fact of the ice giving way during the ebb tide for the first time to the knowledge of any man is another important evidence of the work of the 'Montcalm.' This is backed by the fact that the ice, when it did come down, was firm, deep and very heavy; so much as to block up the passage behind the 'Montcalm.' Another evidence of the extraordinary thickness of the ice cut by the ice-breaker is that, when it moved down the river, it blocked the channel by actually grounding far out on each side of the river.
> After the 'Montcalm' got her work well under way it was observed here in the port of Quebec by the masters of ferry boats, that the currents were stronger than ever before, when an ice bridge existed from Chaudière up; therefore, this is another convincing proof that there was a greater flow of water than there would have been had the channel been blocked as it formerly was when the ice bridge existed its full length and breadth.

Nothing could be clearer than that; it shows conclusively that we have opened navigation earlier and prevented the floods.

That is not all. I have said that the 'Montcalm' assisted in navigaion, and had prevented serious accidents in Cabot Straits. I find in this report:

Left from Quebec on April 25, and went down the river to the gulf, in the vicinity of Cape Ray. On the 28th we met the ss. 'Manchester,' and gave her assistance through the ice on the way to Sydney, Cape Breton.

Mr. JOHNSTON. And that is only one year.

Mr. BRODEUR. This is only one year. The work done in 1906 is to be found in the report of 1906, and from it we see that the Montcalm worked steadily in December, January and February breaking ice at Cap Rouge.

Mr. BERGERON. Give the dates.

Mr. BRODEUR. I may say as a general statement that the work of the icebreaker has resulted in the opening of navigation from ten to fifteen days earlier than formerly, and steamers with fruit arrived from the Mediterranean two years ago at Montreal, two weeks earlier in the spring than formerly.

Mr. MORIN. At what date?

Mr. BRODEUR. I have not the exact dates, but I may get them.

Mr. FOSTER. When did the 'Montcalm' first go into commission?

Mr. BRODEUR. She was built in 1904.

Mr. FOSTER. When did she go into commission?

Mr. BRODEUR. As soon as she came out.

Mr. BERGERON. Was money voted for her before she was bought?

Mr. BRODEUR. I suppose so.

Mr. MORIN. How many tons of coal does that boat consume per day?

Mr. BRODEUR. About 40 tons.

Mr. MORIN. Where is the coal bought?

Mr. BRODEUR. In Nova Scotia—Canadian coal.

Mr. MORIN. How much is paid per ton?

Mr. BRODEUR. We pay, I think, $3.50 per ton at the mine—$4.10 at Quebec.

Mr. MORIN. Does not the hon. minister think he pays too much for his coal?

Mr. BRODEUR. That is the lowest price we can get it. We called for tenders and gave the contract to the lowest tenderer. And this year, the company will not renew the contract at the same price, and we have had to call for new tenders.

Mr. MORIN. Could not coal be got from Baltimore or Pennsylvania a good deal cheaper?

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not think so. Pennsylvania coal is hard coal. What we require is steam coal.

Mr. MORIN. Pennsylvania has both hard and soft coal.

Mr. BRODEUR. We must try to encourage Canadian coal.

Mr. MORIN. Coal could be got loaded on cars in Pennsylvania for about $1.05 to $1.10 per ton. The haul to Niagara Falls is about 250 miles. Your coal would cost you about $4 a ton, but then you would have an extra coal, for Pennsylvania coal is better than coal from Sydney.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MORIN. Hold on gentlemen—

Mr. BRODEUR. That is a very serious charge against our country.

Mr. MORIN. No charge at all. I want to show these gentlemen that they are laughing too soon—they are trying to walk before they can creep. Take the vessels of the sixteen steamship companies that come to New York. Years ago, they used to coal in England for the round trip. Afterwards they bought part of their coal in Cape Breton—some as they passed eastbound, and some as they passed westbound. The Pennsylvania coal was discovered in 1865. People from Nova Scotia have brought cargoes of coal to Philadelphia, New York and Baltimore, but they cannot sell that coal to these great steamship companies at all—they would not have it as a gift. The coal is bought for some of the small vessels, but these sixteen companies that carry the mails between Europe and America will not have anything but Pennsylvania coal. The coal from Sydney is impregnated with sulphur. So, gentlemen, I know what I am talking about. You can laugh, if you please, now.

Mr. BRODEUR. I am surprised that the hon. gentleman for Dorchester (Mr. Morin) should try to induce this House to believe that our Canadian coal is inferior to Pennsylvania coal. My department has been using Canadian coal for some years past, and we are perfectly satisfied with it. When the hon. gentleman says that we can get coal cheaper in the United States than here, he is mistaken. The American coal dealers could tender, but where they have done so, we found that the prices, with duty added, would be higher than those we pay for Canadian coal. The hon. gentleman says that coal can be bought in Pennsylvania at $1.05. I do not understand that, for, at that price, I should think it could be brought to Sorel—because that is where we purchase it—at a lower figure. But I know that, with the duty added, the price is higher than that of Canadian coal. I think we should not be justified in discarding Canadian coal under the circumstances. I suppose that, in view of these explanations, my hon. friend (Mr. Morin) will say that the department is justified in its action.

Mr. J. D. REID. When and where did the department advertise giving the Americans an opportunity to tender ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Public advertisements were put in the newspapers.

Mr. J. D. REID. What newspapers ?

Mr. BRODEUR. Newspapers in Montreal and Toronto.

Mr. J. D. REID. When were the tenders called for ?

Mr. BRODEUR. I should be glad to ascertain the dates. We have advertised in the newspapers a number of times calling for tenders.

Mr. J. D. REID. Has the hon. minister copies of the tenders here ?

Mr. BRODEUR. I have not.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, I want to get back to the information I asked for. Is the hon. minister now ready to tell me at what time in 1904 the 'Montcalm' was put in commission ?

Mr. BRODEUR. I have not the date.

Mr. FOSTER. Was it in the summer of 1904 ?

Mr. BRODEUR. I am advised that she arrived in December, 1904, and was put in commission.

Mr. FOSTER. What work was done in December 1904, and January and February, 1905 ?

Mr. BRODEUR. I see that she left Quebec on December 23, at nine a.m. and proceeded up towards Cap Rouge. On the way up she met some accumulated ice. On December 29, she found some ice jammed between the Quebec bridge and piers and broke her way through. On the 5th and 6th January, about the same thing. During January and February she was working on these lines. That is the report I read a few moments ago.

Mr. FOSTER. What was her success ?

Mr. BRODEUR. The result, as shown by the report of Captain Koenig, he says:

I believe that the 'Montcalm' has rendered valuable services in assisting to open navigation at an earlier date than usual, when it was left to follow the natural course as in past years. Another result of ice-breaking in the jam is the prevention of the river floods which occurred yearly between Quebec and Montreal, when the channel was blocked by the ice in the jam at Cap Rouge.

Then the report goes on to show that when April came, the 'Montcalm' went down to Cape Ray and met the 'Manchester' and gave her assistance through the ice on the way to Sydney.

Mr. MORIN. The hon. minister (Mr. Brodeur) seems to doubt the accuracy of my statement that the coal costs $1.05 to $1.10 at the coal bank in Pennsylvania. I know very well the price of coal there. I saw coal sold and I sold it myself for seventy cents a ton loaded on the car. I know that prices have gone up since then, but I know it sells for $1.05 and $1.10 yet because I am selling some to-day.

Mr. BRODEUR. Oh.

Mr. MORIN. Yes, there is a difference between the man who speaks from what he knows and the one who speaks from hearsay. The minister says I want to discredit Canadian coal. I say nothing of the kind. There is coal at Springhill, George's Creek, Maryland, and Mahoning Creek, Pennsylvania. It makes no difference what you say, the coal is there and you cannot make it any better or any worse. You have to get your anthracite coal from Pennsylvania because you cannot get it anywhere else. It is the same with 'E' vein coal. It is ahead of English, Scotch, Sydney or Springhill coal. I do not want to discredit anybody's coal. I am here to speak from what I know and from my experience.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the minister give us a statement of the work of the 'Montcalm' in 1905? During the summer, I suppose, she was engaged as usual.

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. And in December she was at her work again?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, on the 3rd December, 1905. The first work that she did was to break the ice ahead of the 'Lake Michigan.' She accompanied the 'Lake Michigan' to Manicouagan, Martin river, and she cut the ice ahead of that steamship.

Mr. FOSTER. Coming up or going down?

Mr. BRODEUR. Going down. They received orders on the morning of the 3rd December to get ready to proceed down to Manicougan, Martin river, and cut the ice ahead of the steamship 'Lake Michigan.' At 3 p.m. they were at Quebec, alongside of the 'Lake Michigan' in order to be ready at daylight. At 6.30 p.m. they left for Louise Basin to joint the steamship 'Lake Michigan.' That was in the month of December.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the 3rd December?

Mr. BRODEUR. The 3rd, 4th, 5th and 6th. She had been working the whole time. I am simply giving what she had been doing during these days.

Mr. FOSTER. Well? She took out the 'Lake Michigan'?

Mr. J. D. REID. That is 20 hours that she was at work in that year.

Mr. BRODEUR. My hon. friend is not serious.

Mr. J. D. REID. Yes.

Mr BRODEUR I read that on the 3rd December she received orders from the Department of Marine and Fisheries to get ready to proceed down to Manicouagan, Martin river, and cut the ice ahead of the steamship 'Lake Michigan.'

December 4, 3 p.m., left King's wharf and proceeded to Louise basin, and went alongside the 'Lake Michigan,' in order to be ready at daylight.

December 5, at 6.30 a.m., left Louise basin with ss. 'Lake Michigan.' Weather cold and fine, strong west southwest wind, river covered with ice from five to eight inches thick. Proceeded ahead of her to cut the ice.

You see the importance of the work she carried on that year.

Mr. BERGERON. Is she a bigger boat than the 'Lake Michigan'?

Mr. BRODEUR. In so far as her tonnage is concerned I do not think she is but she may be more powerful.

Mr. BERGERON. How could she break the ice any more than the 'Lake Michigan' could?

Mr. BRODEUR. Because she is more powerful and she is an ice-breaker. On December 7 and 8 she was working with the 'Lake Michigan.'

Mr. BERGERON. That is the second year?

Mr. BRODEUR. The second year.

Mr. BERGERON. In the first year how many days did she work? My hon. friend says 208 hours. That must be a mistake.

Mr. BRODEUR. It must be a mistake. On December 23, 1904, she began work and she worked on December 29, continuing in January and in February. The days are all given in January and February, and she continued on.

Mr. BERGERON. She did not work every day?

Mr. BRODEUR. She was at the wharf and sometimes she would go up the river. If the weather was mild and there was no necessity of her to go up the river she would not go.

Mr. BERGERON. She was under steam all the time?

Mr. BRODEUR. She was under steam all the time. Now, coming again to 1905—

Mr. FOSTER. You have got to the 8th and she is cutting ice ahead of the 'Lake Michigan.'

Mr. BRODEUR. On the 8th she was in Quebec.

Mr. FOSTER. On the 8th she came back then?

Mr. BRODEUR. She arrived at Quebec at 3.15 p.m. on the 7th. On the 8th at Quebec; on the 9th at Quebec; on the 10th at Quebec; on the 11th at Levis; and on the 12th at Lévis.

Mr. FOSTER. Was she at work on these days?

Mr. BRODEUR. She was waiting for the high tide. You there see the importance of the high tide.

Mr. FOSTER. She was waiting from the 7th to the 9th?

Mr. BRODEUR. No, she was waiting until the 12th.

Mr. FOSTER. What was she doing on the 7th, 8th and 9th?

Mr. BRODEUR. Waiting at Quebec for high tide.

Mr. FOSTER. She was not at work; she was simply waiting.

Mr. BRODEUR. I suppose the weather was mild and there was no necessity for her to go up the river. On the 14th she was in dock.

Mr. FOSTER. What was the matter?

Mr. BRODEUR. The blades had to be changed.

December 15—Finished putting blades on at noon.

At 8 p.m., at highwater, she left Mr. Davie's dock. On the 16th she went up to St. Nicholas to pick up a buoy reported adrift in the ice. On the 18th she went to St. Nicholas. On the 19th, 'the ice in the river running down freely'; she was in Quebec. On the 21st, 22nd, 24th and 25th she was there ready for her work. During all the remaining days of December and during the days of January she was going up the river when it was necessary, or at Levis on the other side, and that continued until the 31st March.

Mr. FOSTER. Did the ice bridge form that year?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes. She successfully broke up the ice bridge and the ferry boats protested against the ice floating down and making the crossing difficult for them.

Mr. BERGERON. When she is not breaking ice what does she do?

Mr. BRODEUR. She is on the lighthouse supply service.

Mr. BLAIN. At page 13 of the Report of the Marine and Fisheries Department I find this statement:

In the early part of July, 1906, the 'Montcalm' made a very successful trip to Rigolet, on the Labrador coast, about 500 miles north of Belle Isle, to bring back a party of surveyors sent there by the local government of the province of Quebec.

It cost $250 a day to run that vessel; did the Quebec government pay for this work?

Mr. BRODEUR. This was in connection with a survey in which both the Dominion of Canada and the province of Quebec are interested. The Newfoundland government claim a larger strip of the Labrador coast, not only in the territory of Quebec but in the territory of Ungava which belongs to the Dominion, and this survey party was sent there in that service.

Mr. BLAIN. How did it come that the surveyors were employed exclusively by the Quebec government.

Mr. BRODEUR. They were making a survey to delimit the line. The Newfoundland government is claiming a much larger strip than is shown on our maps and a survey party was sent there in connection with the case which is now before the courts.

Mr. BLAIN. How did the province of Quebec come to appoint the survey party if the Dominion government is interested?

Mr. BRODEUR. We did the transportation and they did the survey.

Mr. BLAIN. Is that according to agreement between the two governments?

Mr. BRODEUR. I understand so; it took place some years ago. The provincial government asked that we should send a boat to carry out that party of surveyors who were engaged in this work.

Mr. BLAIN. Will the minister bring down the correspondence between this government and the provincial government relative to the survey.

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Mr. DANIEL. This House has a right to complain of the meagreness of the information given in the Report of the Marine Department in regard to these vessels. The minister has been asked a great many questions to-night which there would be no need for asking if the information that ought to be given in this report were given in it. All the information that is in the books with regard to the departmental steamers is contained in 67 pages of pretty large print which is pretty widely spaced. That information is very meagre. For instance all that is said about the 'Lady Grey' the last steamer that we purchased is this:

The 'Lady Grey' is a twin screw steamer which was built for the department last year by Vickers, Sons & Maxim, of England. She has performed excellent work in regard to the St. Lawrence ship channel and is under the control of Mr. Cowie, the superintending engineer.

There is not a word as to her length, as to her width, as to her depth, as to her indicated horse-power; there is nothing in that report to give one the slightest idea as to whether the steamer is 2,000 tons or 100 tons capacity. We have good reason to complain of that lack of information. We can form no idea of the value of the vessel or what she is capable of performing. This ice breaking business is largely experimental in Canada, although it is not experimental to the same extent in the gulf of Finland and other parts of Europe, and we should have full particulars with regard to it. I looked through this report expecting to find statements from the navigating officers of these ships telling us what they have done and what they are capable of doing in the matter of ice-breaking. We know there are ice-breaking steamers at present in use in other countries that are capable of cutting through ice 25 feet thick, but there is no information in this report with regard to the capacity of the 'Montcalm,' the 'Stanley,' or the 'Minto'.

Mr. LEFURGEY. The 'Minto' wont cut much ice if you look at what she has been doing this winter.

Mr. DANIEL. The report of the captain of this steamer would give us the thickness of the ice met with in the straits of Northumberland.

Mr. LEFURGEY. The captain's report would not be worth anything.

Mr. DANIEL. I do not know how otherwise we can get the information. The opposition in this House is charged with seeking information in the interests of the public. The information which we cannot get in regard to our own steamers is very fully given in regard to steamers of other nationalities and in other places. Looking this evening through a copy of the Scientific American, I came across a very interesting article about ice breakers. This report gives the indicated horse-power of the 'Montcalm' as 3,000, the tonnage as 1,432 tons and the displacement as 2,130 tons. This article describes a similar ice breaking steamer, with an indicated horse-power of 2,250; so that she is not so powerful a vessel as the 'Montcalm.' She is called the 'Sampo' and was built in the River Tyne. She has a propellor at each end, the bow engine being 1,200 indicated horse-power and the stern engine 1,350. She is 202 feet long, with 2,000 tons displacement. The 'Montcalm' is 252 feet long. The 'Sampo' has a draft of eighteen feet, with all her coal and stores on board and her sides are angled considerably. She was put to work at the commencement of the winter of 1898, and has been most successful during her career. As to the thickness of ice she has been able to go up against and break through, this article says :

The actual performance of the 'Sampo' in the Gulf of Finland shows that she has a very efficient form for ice-breaking; she passes through field ice of twelve inches to sixteen inches in thickness at eight knots an hour. The thickness of the drift ice she has generally been at work in is some eight to ten feet, through which she can pass at from two to three knots an hour. She also breaks down larger packs without much trouble. It is found in practice with this vessel that charging in drift ice is more effective than cutting it down with the bow propellor, as is advocated in America.

It would seem that this ship is really not as powerful as the 'Montcalm.' So far as I know, we have no information as to the capabilities of the 'Montcalm' in these respects, and that is where I think this report is faulty in the extreme. I do not know the thickness of the ice in the Northumberland straits, but I do not think it is more than twenty-five feet, which the 'Ermack' is capable of going through. I suppose there is a good deal of floating ice and spongy ice, which is easily broken through ; and it may be that with strong winds there is a thick ice pack, which is a different proposition. But it would seem as if there ought not to be any difficulty in obtaining an ice breaking steamer which would be capable of keeping the Straits of Northumberland open in the winter time. This book does not give the horse-power of the 'Stanley,' though it gives her length, her beam, her depth of hull and her gross tonnage. In the case of the 'Minto' it gives her length, her depth, her width, her tonnage and also her indicated horse-power, which is 2,900. The latter vessel ought to be able to do as well as the steamer I have just referred to. I would like the minister therefore to tell the House if he has the information, what the capabilities of the 'Minto' are in regard to going through ice. That would give us some idea as to whether we are getting full value for the money we have been paying for these ice breaking steamers, which have been expensive both in their initial cost and in their upkeep. One member spoke of our paying $500 a day for dry docking the 'Montcalm.' I would like to know whether that took place at the government dock at Quebec or at some other dry dock. As the government built the Quebec dock and is keeping it up, it certainly ought not to be obliged to pay when it puts government steamers there.

Mr. BRODEUR. My hon. friend probably had not the opportunity of reading over the whole report. On page 65, the 'Lady Grey' is described as a twin screw steamer, which was built for the department last year by Vickers Sons & Maxim of England. She has performed excellent work in regard to the St. Lawrence ship channel and is under the control of Mr. Cowie, the superintending engineer. If he had read page 85, he would have found there a description of the boat. On page 9 he will find what the 'Lady Grey' has been doing :

The steamer 'Lady Grey,' a powerful and well-equipped ice-breaking, surveying and sweeping tug, was built in Great Britain and arrived in Canada late in the season of 1906. This vessel, immediately on her arrival, was able to render assistance to the 'Athenia,' a Donaldson liner. The 'Athenia' was relieved from a very dangerous position at Cap à La Roche and prevented from being wrecked or very seriously damaged, by the timely aid of the 'Lady Grey.' The vessel, with its large cargo, was estimated to have a value of $1,000,000, and was floated by the aid of the 'Lady Grey,' before any serious damage had been done to the ship's bottom, and she proceeded on her voyage to Glasgow without more delay than a few hours.

Mr. DANIEL. I find that the description of the 'Lady Grey' is given in the list of tugs. I never thought the 'Lady Grey' was a tug and imagined she was worthy of a better name. So I did not look in the index under the word 'tugs' for a description of the 'Lady Grey.' I did not think we had to send to England to have a tugboat built.

Mr. BRODEUR. If my hon. friend had read carefully page 85, he would have found the report of Mr. Cowie on the work done in the St. Lawrence ship channel. The dredging plant employed in that channel is described on pages 83 to 88 and he would have found there a description of the 'Lady Grey.'

Mr. BERGERON. What did she cost ?

Mr. BRODEUR. I have the figures somewhere, but the 'Lady Grey' does not come under this item.

Mr. BERGERON. What is the price of the 'Montcalm' ? Was she built by order of the government on the authority of parliament, and when was that authority given ?

Mr. BRODEUR. She cost $265,233 and was ordered by the government. She must have been ordered on the authority of parliament because we could not pay the money without such an order.

Mr. BERGERON. Some moneys are paid without the order of parliament.

Mr. FOSTER. How about those buffaloes?

Mr. FIELDING. They were bought on the authority of parliament.

Mr. FOSTER. No, on Governor General's warrant.

Mr. FIELDING. Parliament authorized the Governor General's warrant.

Mr. BERGERON. Was the money voted after the boat was purchased instead of having the authority of parliament before the purchase, and having the advisability of the purchase discussed ? The department buys steamers and then comes to parliament for the money

Mr. FIELDING. In exceptional circumstances, the minister might make a bargain of that nature, but it would have no effect if parliament did not vote the money. The minister would make the bargain subject to parliament voting the money.

Mr. NORTHRUP. In discussing the work done by the 'Montcalm,' I said it had worked 210 hours in the year ending June, 1905. I made the statement in good faith, but now I find, on looking over the official report, page 212, that she only worked 208½ hours in that year, and I therefore withdraw my previous statement and apologize to the House for having made it. I think we may be thankful that she did not work any more days, and I think the country ought to be grateful too. I see that she used over $17,000 worth of coal, so it is fortunate that she only worked 20 days of ten hours a day. The poor old boat was built for the government very rapidly according to the report of Captain Koening and arrived in Quebec in such a condition that a large amount of money had to be spent on her to put her in proper condition to work in the ice. A boat laden with such valuable glassware, with teacups at $4 apiece was perhaps safer moored to the dock, but it is possible that instead of loading the boat with such perishable freight and tying her up at dock it might have been better to send her out to break the ice.

Mr. BRODEUR. I think the statements made by my hon. friend are not absolutely correct although he has apparently intended to be frank. He claimed that the work of an ice-breaker is simply when she was working at the ice, but in this he is mistaken. When it was necessary she went up the river to break the ice, but when the ice was flowing down the river it was not necessary to go up although steam had to be kept on. My hon. friend will remember that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) took the government to task some years ago because of the floods on the St. Lawrence, saying that we had not done our duty because we had not ice-breakers ; but now when we have the ice-breakers my hon. friend criticises us because we do not have them working when there is no ice.

Mr. BERGERON. Is my hon. friend serious in saying that the boat has prevented floods ? We are threatened with floods between Montreal and Lake St. Louis, but the work of the 'Montcalm' has nothing to do with preventing floods there.

Mr. TALBOT. The ice bridge at Cap Rouge, the narrowest part of the St. Lawrence between Quebec and Montreal, is a key, and when the ice from Montreal and the upper St. Lawrence strikes the ice bridge there, the water backs up until every parish in Berthier and Maskinongé is flooded. The work of the 'Montcalm' has been to try to break the jam, and not being able to do it in the winter her work was to do it in the spring, in order to allow the ice to flow down. That has been the 'Montcalm's' work and it has been done satisfactorily. My hon. friend asks whether it was done on the 15th or 16th of April ; that does not cut any ice as far as the ice breaking is concerned. But the question in which the country is interested is this : Has the 'Montcalm' opened navigation earlier in the spring ? Has she done satisfactorily the work for which she was intended in the interest of shipping and of Canada ?

Mr. BERGERON. But everybody knows that, regardless of the work of the 'Montcalm,' sometimes there are floods on the St. Lawrence in spring and sometimes there are not. And the opening of navigation is sometimes earlier and sometimes later. To be able to judge of the work of this steamer, we should have a statement of the opening of navigation for a number of years.

Mr. BRODEUR. Is not the breaking of the ice at Cap Rouge a good service ?

Mr. BERGERON. I do not know. I think that the Quebec people are not altogether satisfied.

Mr. TALBOT. There is a Quebec and Levis ferry company, operating a ferry every quarter or every half hour. When the ice-bridge is formed above Quebec, they have clear water for their boats. But the work of the 'Montcalm,' they say, makes navigation harder for these ferries. These are the people who are not satisfied—the representatives of interested capital. But there is a greater interest than this, the interest of Montreal which, I know, is close to the heart of the hon. member for Beauharnois and to the interest of all the people of Canada, of which Montreal is supposed to be the national port. As Quebecers, we should be willing to see Montreal jammed, but as Canadians we are glad to have the 'Montcalm' carry on her work, even though it be against the interests of Quebec. The 'Montcalm' has done good work and nobody criticises it.

Mr. BERGERON. When I speak of the Quebec people, I do not refer to the Ferry company. But I was told that, before the work of the 'Montcalm,' there was an ice-bridge formed at Quebec. With an ice-bridge, of course, the business of the ferries would be reduced because the people would cross on the ice.

Mr. TALBOT. I know that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) is honest in this matter. But the fact that the ice-bridge of which he speaks is not formed at Quebec but five or six miles above Quebec. And when it is formed there is clear water for the ferries. The moment the 'Montcalm' ceased to be of use in this work, she was sent down the St. Lawrence river to help the steamers coming up early in the spring. Also she was sent with provisions to a part of the province of Quebec which is shut off from communication in the winter, except when a steamer is able to make the trip, and where the people might be in danger of starving if the 'Montcalm' did not carry provisions to them.

Mr. BERGERON. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Talbot) is training to be under secretary of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. TALBOT. I refuse it.

Mr. BERGERON. I would ask him : Did the 'Montcalm' break the ice last year at Cap Rouge and render service to navigation ?

Mr. TALBOT. The department will answer that.

Mr. BERGERON. Then, I will ask the minister.

Mr. BRODEUR. She rendered great service to navigation last year, as shown by the report published by the department. Not only by breaking the ice at Cap Rouge, but also by cutting a channel and helping the flow of water in the spring.

Mr. BERGERON. Is it true that, last spring, some boats from Liverpool for Montreal had to wait at Quebec for eight or ten days because the ice was not broken ?

Mr. BRODEUR. I explained that, but my hon. friend was not here. The ice-bridge was formed, but in the spring flooding was prevented by breaking the ice earlier than in former years and permitting the flow of the water.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the thickness of the ice ?

Mr. BRODEUR. The report says it was heavy ice, but does not give the thickness. The ice there is sometimes fifteen or twenty feet thick.

Mr. TALBOT. The hon. member for Beauharnois has now asked another question whether it is not true that last spring steamers were delayed at Quebec for ten days. It so happens that the key may be broken, that this ice bridge may be removed either by Providence or the 'Montcalm,' but lake St. Peter is there and it generally freezes over. Lake St. Peter still holds the key and until the ice from lake St. Peter has floated down the St. Lawrence there is not a steamer that will take the chance of going up to Montreal. Everybody knows that back of lake St. Peter you have all the ice that floats down the Ottawa river, all the ice from the upper St. Lawrence, from the Lake of Two Mountains and Lake St. Louis. The key may be broken but as long as lake St. Peter is frozen over you cannot help it.

Mr. BERGERON. That is what I am saying. What is the use of the 'Montcalm' then ?

Mr. TALBOT. The hon. member for North Toronto twitted the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries a few minutes ago about the moon and the tide but there are lots of people who live in different parts of Canada who do not know anything about the tide. The tide at Quebec means a difference of from thirteen to nineteen feet. Of course, in the Bay of Fundy it is much greater and I have no doubt my hon. friend knows something about that.

Mr. FOSTER. Seventy feet and it rises so rapidly that cattle and horses feeding on the shores are oftentimes overtaken and drowned.

Mr. TALBOT. There is something very funny about the moon and the tide. The two things coincide and scientific men cannot say whether it is the moon that influences the tide or the tide that influences the moon. The hon. member for North Toronto cannot settle that question, I cannot do it either, but it is a very extraordinary coincidence that these two things go together.

Mr. FOSTER. I will bet on the moon.

Mr. TALBOT. You will bet on the moon? There are people who would not take that chance because then they are under the influence of the moon and when the moon has something to do with them they are called what I would not like to call my hon. friend.

Mr. FIELDING. I think that in any case the problem is too serious to be solved at this time of the night and I move that the committee rise.

Mr. BRODEUR. Carried.

Mr. LEFURGEY. No, the item is not carried. I want to discuss the Prince Edward Island steamers.

Mr. BRODEUR. The item was passed the other day.

Mr. FOSTER. The item was not passed.

Mr. BRODEUR. But it was passed the other day.

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all.

Mr. FIELDING. Whether it was passed or not we are going to adjourn.

Mr. BRODEUR. This item was passed the other day.

Mr. FIELDING. Whether it was passed or not I think we will pass.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr Fielding, House adjourned at eleven p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, January 27, 1908.

PRODUCTION OF ORIGINAL DOCUMENTS.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). I stated the other day that I would make to-day a statement to the House with regard to the question which has occupied its attention for some time last week. I have not to go back upon the position which has been taken by the government with regard to members of the House obtaining original documents. The motion of the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) having been disposed of, it has been observed that the hon. member could not renew his motion except by the unanimous consent of the House. Perhaps the point of order would not have been taken, but I think it is better always to adhere to the rules of the House, and under the circumstances I have asked my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) to place upon the table of the House the originals sought for. It has been represented to me that it would be inconvenient to break up the file, therefore I now lay it upon the table of the House for inspection by the hon. member, or other hon. members interested, to be returned by the clerk to the Department of the Interior as soon as it is disposed of.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—MR. TURIFF, M.P.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (East Assiniboia.) Before the orders of the day are called, on the 24th inst., the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. J. D. Reid) made some remarks with reference to myself of a very offensive nature, and I judge they were intended to be offensive. I find them in the 'Hansard' on page 1943 :

> We have another case, the Galway land deal, made by this man known as Brown. When we got to the original papers, we found that the two men in this whole deal were the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Adamson) and the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff). Everybody knows that, five or ten years ago, every dollar these men owned was the suit of clothes on their backs; and to-day they are travelling around worth a million. One of them was an officer in the Department of the Interior, and is now going around the country to explain one of the greatest scandals ever perpetrated by any Canadian government. And yet the Prime Minister is not willing that we should see original papers because of what those original papers may disclose.

I just want to say that this statement, so far as it refers to myself, is not only offensive but it is absolutely untrue. The statement that I was a pauper five or ten years ago is false, and the statement that I am either a millionaire or parading as a millionaire, is equally false. I just wish to add that if the hon. member for Grenville, or any other member of this House, has any charge to bring forward against me, either as a member of the House or as an official of the government, the rules of the House provide a mode by which that can be done, and if the hon. member chooses to take the responsibility of making a charge, I am quite ready to meet him.

THE JAPANESE TREATY.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Before the orders of the day are called, I would like to direct the attention of the Prime Minister to the very incomplete way in which returns are brought down. I mentioned to him on Friday last that the return of the documents relating to the Japanese treaty was incomplete, and since then he has been good enough to send to me the document, the absence of which I called his attention to. Now that document refers to another document, which has not been brought down, and it is therefore in a certain sense unintelligible, because the document to which it refers is not before the House. I would like to have this document as soon as possible, because the debate is coming on to-morrow, and one is hampered a good deal by the absence of material information. I may be permitted to repeat what I have said before, that sufficient care does not seem to be taken in all cases to make these returns complete ; and further, that when the returns do come down in a complete state, the documents are not arranged in chronological order, at least that is very often my own experience, but there are other cases in regard to which I make no complaint in that respect. But over and over again I have found documents arranged in a very confused manner, which entails unnecessary labour in going over them. It seems to me desirable that greater care should be taken in preparing documents before they are brought down. I suppose they have to be arranged in order for printing in the sessional papers, and it would be better to arrange them properly in the first instance.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). With regard to the return in the Japanese matter, it was prepared in my own department, and I think with sufficient accuracy. It is true that there was an order in council of August, 1895, which had been included in it, and which I brought down on Friday, when my hon. friend called my attention to its absence. That order in council refers to a despatch from the Colonial Office which was not brought down. The clerk of the Privy Council Mr. Boudreau did not include it in the return because it is a secret despatch, and he called my attention to this fact. My hon. friend knows that we could not bring down this despatch except with the consent of the imperial authorities. Moreover, I can say to my hon. friend that there is nothing in it that would enlighten the case. I have no objection to giving him private communication of it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The order in council which I received on Saturday morning refers to a memorandum of a Mr. Wilkinson. The return does not set forth any information whatever as to who Mr. Wilkinson is, in what capacity he made suggestions, or on whose behalf. That renders it a little difficult to understand the real purport and intention of the order in council. I cannot tell who Mr. Wilkinson is, whether he is an official of the Foreign Office, or an official of the Colonial Office. I would suppose that he must occupy one or other of these positions. I have even gone to the trouble of trying to hunt him up in the Foreign Office Year-book, the Colonial Office Year-book, and other sources of information, but really I think one should not be put to that trouble in order to understand an order in council.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not know if the despatch to which the order in council is an answer would cover that point or not, but the whole order is covered by this despatch, which is a secret one and, therefore, according to the rule, it could not be brought down, but if my hon. friend thinks he should have any information about it I have no objection whatever to giving it to him privately.

PRIVATE BILLS.

SOUTH ONTARIO PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. CALVERT moved the third reading of Bill (No. 16) respecting the South Ontario Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. J. D. REID. This Bill extends the time for building this railway. The charter was first granted in 1887, 20 years ago, and this will be the sixth time of renewing the charter, but during the whole of that time nothing has been done towards building the railway. In the Railway Committee the other day I asked that a clause be inserted in this Bill making it imperative on this company to build at least ten miles per annum until the railway was completed. In the Railway Committee Bills are renewed every session extending charters that were granted years ago; the result is that many of these railroads have not been completed and people in the districts affected are suffering. For that reason, I feel that it is time for the House to take some action and establish rules by which charters will not be renewed more than once or twice without the insertion of some clause providing for the lapsing of the charter unless some work is performed within a certain time. The party promoting this Bill would not undertake that any work would be done, not only this coming year or within two years for which the time is extended, and for this reason I feel that this Bill should not be allowed to go through unless there is inserted some clause ensuring commencement of the work within the coming year.

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals). In the Railway Committee this question was raised by the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. J. D. Reid) and pretty thoroughly discussed, particularly by those interested and by the people interested in that section of country. There is, of course, something in the hon. member's contention that by repeated renewals of these charters there is a possibility of tying up the country to a particular line of railway not to build the railway, but for the prevention of the construction of other lines.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Has this charter crowded out any other railway?

Mr. GRAHAM. As far as I could find out it has not crowded out any other line. The members for the locality were there and the committee discussed it pretty thoroughly and decided that just at present was not a good time to discourage railways even from hanging on to charters, because the procuring of capital was not very easy, and it was considered by the committee that unless there was some very grave reason they would renew charters in order to give a chance, even if a remote chance, for the affording of railway accommodation to the district affected.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (East Assiniboia). I think that this Bill emphasizes some remarks I made two or three weeks ago in introducing a Bill of mine to amend the Railway Act. What I propose in that Bill is a requirement that within two years of the granting of a charter at least 10 per cent of the road must be built and put in operation. I expect that when the Bill comes before the Railway Committee the different railways will be massed against it and I will have difficulty in getting it through unless I have the assistance of members of the House in that committee. What has taken place to-day shows the necessity for it, and I hope when the Bill comes before the committee it will receive the hearty support of the House.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the third time and passed.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (for Minister of Agriculture). The Cold Storage Act, under which these grants are made, did not come into force until March 22, 1907. FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR REMOVAL OF CROPS.

Mr. LAKE : asked :

1. In view of the resolution passed by the Manitoba Grain Growers' Association at Brandon on the 17th of January, as follows: 'That we consider the action of the banks in refusing to advance money this season to farmers on bills of lading is causing considerable loss and hardship among the farmers of this country, inasmuch as they are compelled to sell on street to the elevator companies at prices which, in case of low grade stuff, are equal only to 40 to 60 per cent of the actual value of the same grade on the track, which makes a straight loss to the producer of 30 per cent, in some cases of his whole aggregate receipts from the sale of wheat, and that a copy of this resolution be sent to the Minister of Finance at Ottawa.' What steps does the government propose to take to remedy the conditions complained of in view of their statement that they had made arrangements with such banks as wished to assist in moving the grain?
2. In view of the fact that on the 4th December last the government promised to give full information at an early day what these arrangements were, will the government now make a statement to the House?

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). As the banks became liable for the moneys advanced by the government, they had to be the judges of the persons to whom loans should be made.

The transactions between the government and the banks in this matter are still open and unfinished, and therefore it has not been deemed expedient to make them public. A measure dealing with the subject will shortly be submitted to the House and information will then be furnished.

STATUS OF CANADA IN NEGOTIATIONS OF IMPERIAL TREATIES.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). In this matter, as in many others under the British constitution, changes have taken place from time to time to meet new conditions, as new conditions arise. The rule which has been followed of late years has been that in all treaties with foreign countries with reference to subjects not purely Canadian, but which directly or indirectly affect Canada, the Imperial government has caused a provision to be inserted that the treaty shall not apply to Canada unless and until ratified by the Canadian parliament.

Mr. FIELDING.

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice) :

1. Yes.
2. The question is one for consideration, primarily, by the provincial authorities who are responsible for the administration of justice in the province, including the constitution and maintainance of provincial courts.

WINDSOR FERRY.

Mr. CLEMENTS asked :

1. Is it a fact that the franchise now held by the Detroit, Belle Isle and Windsor Ferry Company expires in October next?
2. If not, when does said franchise expire?
3. When the said franchise expires, is it the intention of the government in the near future to advertise for new tender ?
4. If not, has any arrangement been made with the present company to continue their present franchise?

Hon. WM. TEMPLEMAN (Minister of Inland Revenue) :

1. Expires on the 3rd October, 1908.
2. Answered by the above.
3. If a satisfactory arrangement for a renewal of license cannot soon be made with the present licensees, tenders will be called for.
4. Answered by the above.

PELICAN LAKE CHANNEL.

Mr. SCHAFFNER asked :

1. Did the government promise in 1904 to give the opening up of a channel at the southeast end of Pelican lake their attention?
2. What attention has the government given to date to the opening up of a channel at the southeast end of Pelican lake, in Manitoba?

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works) :

1. No.
2. A survey and report were made by the resident engineer of the district with reference to the opening up of a channel, in order to lower the present water level of the lake ; estimated cost of such improvement is $1,973.55. No further action has been taken.

QUAHAUG AND CLAM FISHING.

Mr. LEFURGEY asked :

1. Are any changes contemplated different from the regulations in force as to quahaug fishing last season, (a) as to season for fishing, (b) as to areas open for fishing, (c) any other changes?
2. State any changes as above as to regulations for the fishing of little-neck clams ?

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) :

1. No changes in the existing quahaug fishery regulations are at present contemplated.

2. No changes are at present contemplated in the existing soft shell or little neck clam fishery regulations.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

Mr. LAKE—by Mr. Uriah Wilson—asked:

1. When and to whom have homestead entries been granted for the N.E. ¼ section 28-15-27 W. 2nd M. ?
2. Were both cultivation and residence duties duly performed by the persons holding the entries ?
3. If permission was given to either of the parties not to fulfil residence duties, at what dates, for what periods, and on what grounds were such permissions given?

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior) :

1. On the 24th November, 1902, to D. Smyth. Cancelled. On the 28th of November, 1905, to J. D. Simpson.
2. Smyth's entry was cancelled in default of the performance of the required homestead duties. Simpson, the present homesteader, claims to have a house, worth $100 ; 15 acres under cultivation ; 40 horses, 12 head of cattle. On the 14th of June, 1907, he notified the department that he was in residence on the south half of section 18-15-27, land owned by himself.
3. No permission was given to either homesteader not to fulfil residence duties.

GEORGIAN BAY CANAL.

Mr. C. A. McCOOL moved for :

A copy of all the plans and reports in the possession of the government in connection with the building of the Georgian Bay canal.

He said : Before moving the motion which stands in my name I desire to make a few remarks on the project referred to. The subject is such an important one, I approach it with some misgivings lest I may not do it justice, but even at the risk of partial failure in that respect, I feel that in view of its paramount importance to the whole Dominion I can rely upon the indulgence of both sides of the House in an attempt to give a few reasons why the government should proceed at once with the work of development of the Ottawa and French river waterways, more commonly known as the Georgian Bay ship canal.

Before taking up the question, however, I desire to give a brief historical sketch of what has been done thus far.

In 1614 the illustrious French explorer, Samuel de Champlain ascended the Ottawa river to Mattawa and thence the Mattawa river to Trout lake, across the height of land and down the Lake Nipissing and French river to Georgian bay, this route being followed for nearly two centuries by the Hudson Bay and Northwest trading companies for the transportation of their supplies to the Great Northwest, and in marketing their collections of furs, buffalo skins, &c., from that section.

Work on the Grenville canal was started in 1819 and completed some fifteen years later.

In 1837 the parliament of Upper Canada ordered a survey to determine the practicability of navigation between Ottawa and Lake Huron. In 1840 a masonry lock was built at Ste. Anne to replace a wooden lock constructed some years previously by private enterprise. In 1852 due to the energy of the late John Egan, work was begun upon a canal and locks at the Chats Falls to connect Lake Deschesnes and Chats, but the work was abandoned after the death of Mr. Egan. In 1856 the late Walter Shanly, civil engineer, was commissioned by the united provinces of Upper and lower Canada to make a survey of the proposed route to Georgian bay, but the appropriation for the work becoming exhausted, the survey was stopped before completion, Mr. Shanley's report, however, printed by order of parliament in 1858 being most interesting and favourable to the project based upon a waterway of 10 feet in depth. In 1859 Mr. T. C. Clarke, civil engineer, was employed by the united provinces to complete the survey started by Mr. Shanly, and to ascertain if it were not possible to construct a waterway for vessels of larger size. In his report of this examination published the following year, he gives the distance from Montreal to Lake Huron as 431 miles, 352 miles of which being naturally fit for vessels of 12 feet draught, 79 miles requiring improvements, and of this only 29 miles of actual canal, the total descent from summit level to Montreal being 646 feet. Nearly forty years later Mr. Clarke again reported on the project for the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company, recommending provision for vessels 300 feet long by 45 feet beam, and draught of 14 feet. In 1872 work was begun on the Culbute locks and completed in 1877, there being two wooden locks, but were never used to any extent because of the completion meantime of the extension of the Canada Central Railway to Pembroke, Ontario. In 1879 Mr. E. P. Bender, civil engineer, made an examination of the French river and Lake Nipissing for the Canadian Pacific Railway with the view of its adaptation to 14 feet draught navigation, his report being favourable. In 1899 Mr. A. F. Macleod, civil engineer, made an examination and an exhaustive survey of the summit level for the Department of Railways and Canals, his estimate of the cost of this summit section (21 miles) being $5,950,000.

In 1899 Mr. C. R. Coutlee, C.E., acting for the Canadian Pacific Railway made an examination of the French river and Lake Nipissing, having in view navigation for vessels of twenty-foot draught, his report being also favourable.

In 1900 a very complete survey of the French river and Lake Nipissing section was made by the late Mr. J. W. Fraser, C.E., for the Department of Public Works, providing for twenty-foot navigation; his estimate of the cost being $4,200,000.

In 1902 the late Geo. Y. Wisner, C.E., consulting engineer for the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company, and an eminent authority in both England and the United States, after going over the ground and making a careful study of all maps and surveys previously made, gave his estimate of the cost of a twenty-foot waterway throughout as $80,000,000; and having made a careful study of the commercial possibilities, he was most enthusiastic in its favour, as many present will remember, he having delivered an address to the members of this House at that time in the Railway Committee room.

In 1904 the present survey being made under direction of the Department of Public Works was authorized by parliament; and while we have not yet got the full final report of same, which is promised for February or March of this year, the report of survey and estimates of cost of the French river section laid on the table a couple of days ago is a sufficient guarantee that the work is being done in a most efficient manner, and when the full report is made public it cannot but be relied upon as being the result of most exhaustive surveys and a comprehensive study of all the requirements, as well as a careful estimate of the cost.

In addition to the favourable reports of the eminent engineers mentioned in the short history I have just given you of this great project, it may not be out of place to add that many eminent men of affairs have expressed their appreciation of the importance of this great work, among whom I may mention Sir Wm. Van Horne, Sir Thos. Shaughnessy and Mr. J. J. Hill, all of whom on many occasions have expressed their unbounded confidence in the work.

Mr. KEMP. Where are these expressions of opinion to be found?

Mr. McCOOL. In dozens of newspaper clippings. They are well known to all who have followed the agitation for the construction of this work.

Then we have our premier, Hon. Mr. Haggart, Hon. Mr. Belcourt, Mr. W. J. Poupore, an ex-member of this House, and scores of others who have earnestly laboured for years past in the furtherance of this project. The hon. the leader of the opposition is also on record in this connection, having in a speech at Pembroke in 1906, declared that the government should undertake the work at the earliest possible date. The latest recruit to the ranks, and none the less welcome, because it has not always been with us, is the Toronto 'Globe' which in its editorial columns of November 28th last, in a criticism of the speech from the Throne, points out in no uncertain language the importance of this national highway. I will read the extract:

The proposed Georgian bay and Ottawa canal will no doubt be considered as a part of Canada's transportation development. The Ottawa river is a gift of nature, whose value can scarcely be over-estimated. It seems destined to be as great a national highway as the Mississippi, and its value as a source of electric power will also be an important national asset. Some day this natural highway, if carefully kept free from obstructive control, will be one of the most important free and competitive regulators of railway rates on the continent. Parliament cannot be too fully seized of its coming importance.

I also hold in my hand a recent editorial from the Toronto 'News,' from which I will read a couple of extracts, which confirm the opinions already given, and include the opinion of President Roosevelt on the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi, which applies with equal force to the Ottawa and French river waterways:

President Roosevelt, in his recent tour down the Mississippi, promised an unqualified support to the project for a deep waterway from the great lakes to the Gulf of Mexico. In his speech at Cairo he said: 'I have always felt that the nation must undertake the improvement of the great highway of the Mississippi; but my observations on this trip have had the effect of making me much more ardent than I was.' He had before this appointed a commission which will report to congress at its coming session. His interest is a recognition of the activity which the inhabitants of the Mississippi valley had already shown in this project.

The article concludes as follows:—

The people of the western states are well acquainted with what Canada is doing in improving its waterways; and they hold that if they are to retain possession of their traffic they must have an improved route of their own. There was a time when the great state of Illinois looked to the St. Lawrence route as an outlet. Now the centre of their interest is changing. It is true that the lakes to gulf proposition is still in the project stage. But it is probable that some action will be taken at the coming session of congress. It is important for us, not only from the standpoint of American traffic, participation in which has always been before us in developing our waterways, but also from the standpoint of retaining our own traffic from the northwest, to determine as soon as possible whether we shall deepen the Welland canal and the St. Lawrence canals or construct the Georgian Bay canal. To dissipate our limited financial resources in attempting both works is futile. As it stands to-day, and as it will be in increasing degree when the Mississippi route is opened, the increasing size and draught of lake carriers doom the Welland canal and the St. Lawrence canals in their present condition to a decreasing proportion of the traffic moving to the seaboard. If we are to stay in the competition a definite policy must soon be adopted.

The following contains one of Mr. J. J. Hills' expressions of opinion on this subject:

Washington, D.C., Dec. 6.—James J. Hill, discussing before the National Rivers and Harbours convention the need of a large waterway from St. Paul to the Gulf of Mexico, said:—

Our neighbour in the north, young and comparatively weak in resources as she is, shames us. Canada has spent in proportion to her population and wealth dollars on her canal system, where we have spent dimes.

Because she has worked to an intelligent national plan she has more to show for a dime than we have for a dollar. Six years ago there was already a 14-foot canal within her own territiory. We still pile up our commerce at Buffalo, because we have no corresponding outlet for Lake Erie to the Atlantic.

I could continue almost indefinitely the list of the eminent public men, and our most successful business men who have placed their opinions on record regarding this great work, so it cannot be considered a new idea, but has merely been held in check up to the present because of the magnitude of the undertaking and not from any lack of confidence in the great benefit it would be to the whole Dominion.

Nature has been kind to Canada in many ways, one of which was the placing of a chain of rivers and lakes from Georgian bay to Montreal, which if improved, would give a direct, cheap, water route from the wheat fields of the west to the Atlantic. There is great need to-day of an outlet for the rapidly increasing lake traffic, and such an outlet can be secured most satisfactorily by the construction through the aforesaid rivers and lakes, of what is known as the Georgian Bay Ship Canal.

The Ottawa and French river route has long been called a canal, but this is a misnomer. It is a 'waterway' made up of 357 miles of open river, 55½ miles of channel requiring improvement, and but 27½ miles of actual canal. From the mouth of French river to Trout lake is a rise of ninety-nine feet and would be made in four locks. From Trout lake to Montreal is a descent of 559 feet, and would be made in twenty-four locks, ten to fifty feet to the lift.

Mr. BENNETT. Where is Trout lake?

Mr. McCOOL. On the head waters of the Mattawa river, within four miles of Lake Nipissing.

The route is as follows:—The French river is entered at Georgian bay and followed for sixty-three miles, arriving at Lake Nipissing; then across this lake to North Bay, a distance of 19¼ miles. From North Bay the shipway would ascend, cross over and descend the summit or height of land, through a chain of lakes, arriving at Parresseux Falls, a distance of 24½ miles. Thence down the Mattawa river 14⅜ miles to the town of Mattawa. At this juncture the Ottawa river is entered, passing Deux Rivières, Roche Capatain and Des Joachims rapids where is entered and followed for 35 miles a magnificent stretch of open and uninterrupted natural channel, known as 'Deep River,' then through the two Allumette Lakes to Paquette's rapids, making a clear run from Des Joachims of 56 miles.

(Or if the Culbute channel is followed a saving in distance is effected of some seven miles.) From Paquette through Lake Coulonge, down the Rocher Fendu to Portage du Fort; then through Chats and Deschesnes lakes, the former 19½ miles, and the latter 34 miles long. Passing through Brewery creek and Hull there is a clear run of 50 miles to Hawkesbury thence to Point Fortune, and on through Lake of Two Mountains, 24 miles, arriving at Ste. Anne, making a total distance on the Ottawa river of 293¾ miles. Leaving Ste. Anne, the St. Lawrence is entered and followed to Montreal, a distance of 24½ miles. Total length of route Georgian bay to Montreal 440 miles.

The total length of the waterway is 440 miles, and the distance from Fort William to Montreal, via the proposed route, will be in round figures 900 miles. However, while this distance to the sea-board seems quite short, and is in reality much shorter than all other routes, time must not be calculated in miles, but in hours, for the reason that speed would not be uniform. Mileage itself is not an absolute factor, but what time will be consumed in covering the distance, is the consideration.

A careful study of the time question, based on speeds of average lake boats, in free and in restricted channels, and at locks, applied to the Georgian Bay Shipway gives the following very gratifying results; Average time of vessels from Fort William to French river harbour on Georgian bay, 435 miles, is about two days, seven hours. From Georgian bay, up the French and down the Ottawa and St. Lawrence, should be made in about two days, fourteen hours; that is allowing ten hours for delay over ordinary schedule for detention at locks and restricted channels, thus giving total time from the head of the lakes to Canada's metropolis as 120 hours, or five days. Now, allow one day for unloading return cargo, and five days for run to Fort William. Whether running up or down river will make little, if any, difference on this route because there are no perceptible currents. Thus a vessel would make the return trip, Fort William to Montreal, allowing time for unloading and loading return cargo, in twelve days.

Of course unloading, loading and clearing at Montreal could not be made in two days under present conditions, however suitable those conditions may be for to-day's business. But with most modern and ample facilities, such as the construction of this shipway would certainly warrant the terminal port having, vessels and cargoes should be successfully handled in that time. The advantage of Georgian bay canal time over the St. Lawrence route is easily seen. On the latter route it takes twenty-one days for the round trip—seven days each way and seven days delay.

These calculations are based upon a 22-foot waterway with a minimum width of channel in improved sections of 250 feet, for canalled sections and 300 feet in open sections, and locks of sufficient capacity to accommodate the largest vessels now engaged in the lake trade, actual provision 650 length 60 foot beam, 21 foot draft. Looking over the list it is seen that the capacity of these vessels range from 4,000 to 8,000 and 10,000 tons, the largest being 500 to 600 feet long, and about 55 feet beam. For the safe navigation of such vessels, less than 22 feet in depth would be useless.

Mr. HAGGART. Where do you get the 22 feet ?

Mr. McCOOL. That is what the present survey calls for. At least, that is the information given.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The present survey is being made 22 feet.

Mr. HAGGART. The canalization has a depth of 22 feet. The depth on the mitre sills of the locks would fix that.

Mr. McCOOL. The intention is to make navigation safe for vessels of 21 feet draught. That is the basis of the present survey.

Mr. BENNETT. What is the length of the vessels ?

Mr. McCOOL. Six hundred and fifty feet.

In answer to the argument occasionally advanced, that a 14 foot waterway would be of sufficient depth to accommodate vessels which would satisfactorily handle the grain traffic, as well as other commodities offering, it may be stated on the highest possible authority that vessels of less draught than 17 to 18 feet cannot, with safety, navigate Lake Superior. Therefore if the waterway is provided, it should be so that vessels now plying between Fort William and Port Arthur to American ports, will instead use the all-Canadian route to Montreal.

The argument is also sometimes set forth by persons opposed to this scheme, that the large lake boats would not use this waterway, preferring the open lake route to the restricted river, and also that accidents would continually occur in the narrow channels, of which naturally there are a few. That such arguments are fallacious actual experience proves. The St. Mary's river up and down which 50,000,000 tons pass annually, is very narrow, with one specially bad turn in it, made all the more so by reason of a treacherous cross-current. This is the Stribbling Point Bend, near Sugar Island, where the largest vessels navigate up and down, dozens at a time, day and night during the whole season, and there has never yet been an accident at this point. The channel is well buoyed, and range lights throughout, thus enabling vessels to navigate at all hours in perfect safety, and so it would be on the restricted parts of the proposed route, with the additional advantage of being sheltered at all seasons. The channel is carefully buoyed, provided with range lights, and the same protection would have to be afforded on the channels of the Georgian bay route. Then there is the additional advantage that this route would be a waterway sheltered throughout, instead of being in an open lake. Another very important point is the fact that it is wholly within Canadian territory, and consequently there would be no danger of international disputes arising regarding national rights. As a matter of fact, its watershed is entirely in Canadian territory, and instead of drawing from international waters it adds to them.

The progress of settlement in Manitoba and the new provinces, as well as British Columbia, has been so rapid in the last decade, and is increasing so steadily, that it must strike every observer, and he must admit that a very serious problem of providing for the transportation of the products of that country will need to be settled before ten years have elapsed. It is true that we have three great transcontinental lines, the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Transcontinental operated by the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the Canadian Northern, and possibly we will soon have the Great Northern extended to Hudson bay from Winnipeg. But all these lines, as well as the system of waterways on the St. Lawrence and the great lakes, even though they were equipped to the fullest extent, would leave us still without adequate facilities for the transportation of the enormous production of that country, which has in many cases increased from 800 to 1,000 per cent in the last five years. How that is to be provided for is the great question that is before us. As showing the rapidity of the increase of production, I desire to read an extract from the address of the president of the Grain Produce Exchange of Winnipeg, delivered to the members of the exchange, on the 11th September last. I will only read those portions that relate to this subject :

Progress is the law of life in western Canada, and the year now closing is no exception to the rule. In every department of activity the past twelve months have witnessed giant forward strides. The country responds, not satisfactorily but triumphantly, to every test by which we can measure advancement. Wonderful as has been the progress of prairie Canada during the past ten years, bright as is its present prospect, every indication goes to prove that the past and present are but an earnest of what the future has in store. In the development of our vast agricultural and other natural resources those identified with the grain trade must take a keen business interest. Western Canada already ranks as one chief source of the world's wheat supply. As in near future it undoubtedly will become the time when this exchange shall become one of the world's great grain fields, and in the the producing of grain becomes a bigger industry in prairie Canada, the business of handling grain must become correspondingly important. I look forward with confidence to a time when this exchange should become one of the largest and most influential associations of traders in grain to be found either in the old or the new world. That we are approaching this time and with considerable rapidity is evidenced by the fact that last year the newcomers to the Dominion, practically all of whom came to western Canada, and the large proportion of whom are devoting their energies to the tilling of the soil, numbered over a quarter of a million.

The progress made in this direction is borne out by large increase in the areas under crop last season. In 1905 the total area under grain cultivation in western Canada was, as closely as can be estimated, 5,910,000 acres. In 1906 this had grown to the enormous total of 7,830,000, or an increase of about 33 per cent in a single season. The wheat acreage had increased from 4,019,000 acres to 5,013,544 acres. Oats were cultivated on 1,423,000 acres in 1905 as against 2,118,777 acres in 1906. The area devoted to barley had increased from 433,800 in 1905 to 603,485, in 1906, while flax, which in the former year was grown on 34,900 was in the latter cultivated on 93,795. Owing to a backward spring and other natural causes, the increase this season will not be so phenomenal, but viewed in the light of the unusual natural conditions prevailing this year, they are fully as satisfactory. The expectation at the time of the preparation of this address was that western Canada will this year have a total grain crop of about 190,000,000 bushels. The wheat acreage is about 5,010,000, and the anticipated yield, which may be increased or diminished according to weather conditions, is between 80,000,000 and 85,000,000. When this acreage is compared with that of only ten years ago, 1,764,250, and when the 85,000,000 bushels of wheat of this year is placed alongside of the less than 6,500,000 bushels inspected in 1897, the rate at which western Canada is advancing can be better measured and appreciated. The acreage in oats for the season now closing is estimated at 2,375,000, and the yield at 87,500,000 bushels. The barley acreage is estimated at 663,800, and the yield at about 18,500,000. The flax acreage is 105,000, and the estimated yield 1,300,000. In view of the high prices confidently expected to prevail, the financial returns from the present season's crop promise to be the very best with which the west has been favoured.

These substantial increases in acreage are reflected in the amount of grain inspected. The number of bushels inspected at the end of the crop year, August 31, in 1906, was 77,411,060, and for the same period in 1907, was 91,677,970.

It is not necessary to give them.

The conditions of growth and progress in the country as a whole are, as might be expected, reflected in the exchange. It is now two months short of twenty years since the exchange was organized. It started with a membership of 10; to-day, exclusive of associated members, it has 300. And at its organization its memberships were $15; last year, when the remaining 71 seats to fill up the membership were sold, they realized $2,500 each.

I read this as an authoritative statement of the conditions of that country from the viewpoint of a business man. If this be the present production, what will be the production five years hence? It does not require any great stretch of imagination to foresee that it will be doubled or even trebled, and under such circumstances where will we be at with regard to transportation facilities? It is true that we will have the transcontinental, with its easy grades and immense possibilities for cheap and rapid transit for traffic. But let us not forget that this line traverses the great clay belt of new Ontario, containing as it does 16,000,000 acres of just as good wheat land as there is in the Dominion, and this belt also extends into the province of Quebec. This country must be taken into consideration as affording traffic for this road. In addition to the agricultural products to be transported, we have to consider the forest and mineral wealth in which that country abounds. As an example of the possibilities of northern Ontario, I may mention that the portion of the district which I have the honour to represent, the Temiscaming district, when the last census was taken, had a population of 1,306 souls, all north of Widdifield, the township in which North Bay is situated. If a census was taken of that section of the district to-day it would be found that there are over 30,000 people in there; and that is not entirely due to the discovery of immense wealth in silver, cobalt and other minerals found in that district, but is applicable generally to that country, the country is being settled as rapidly as any one could expect. The same thing must apply along the line of the National Transcontinental Railway as soon as it is opened up.

The argument has been advanced in this House that the proposed waterway could not successfully compete with railways in the transportation of heavy freight. The reply of the president of one of the largest railway systems of the United States to an inquiry as to the possibility of reducing the rate on grain, coal, ore, &c., to about one mill per ton in the near future, was explicitly that there was no probability of a rate of one mill per ton in the near future. The reply of the New York Central to the same inquiry leaves no doubt that that road has no expectation of quoting any such rate. These lines are quoted for the reason that they are probably in a better position to handle freight economically than any other railway lines in America.

Further evidence of what our great railways think of their chances of profitable handling of the export grain trade, either by rail or lake and rail can be found in an examination of Mr. Bosworth, fourth vice-president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, in his examination before the Railway Commission last year, and which can be found in the reports of the commission, as follows :

Q. What do you say as to the profits of the business lake and rail?
A. None whatever.
Q. Then why do you do the business?
A. We do not do it.
Q. You do not do any lake and rail business?
A. Not to Montreal for export.
Q. When did you go out of that?
A. It must have been five or six years ago.
Q. What makes the rates from Chicago so low?
A. Competition lake and rail. We do not carry any ex-lake grain for export.

From this it is seen that none of the existing lines of rail can hope to relieve the situation as regards the export grain trade of the Northwest, for, if that were possible, the Canadian Pacific Railway is not without means to enable them to go after the business even though such course meant the building of an additional road for the purpose. Let me ask; if Sir William Van Horne and Sir Thomas Shaughnessy felt that they wanted this trade, why do they by their endorsement of the Ottawa and French river waterways encourage rival means of transportation, with which they cannot hope to compete ?

The Canada Atlantic Railway, now operated by the Grand Trunk Railway system owns several freight vessels on the lakes, at least three-quarters of which are registered as American bottoms, thus virtually admitting that they could not compete for export business from American points via the Canada Atlantic Railway to a Canadian port, as against the rate via Buffalo and New York, this being most significant. A more complete object lesson could not be given of the impossibility of successfully competing by lake and rail, via Montreal, as against Buffalo and New York, than this, for it must be admitted by all that the original owner of the Canada Atlantic Railway made a most determined effort to capture what he could of the grain carrying trade from the west, yet in order to ensure cargo for his vessels he had to register three-fourths of their number as American bottoms, thus disqualifying them for the trade he was so anxious to secure, and this in face of the fact of a very large percentage of our grain from the west being carried by American vessels to American ports.

The history of the lake trade from Chicago, Duluth, Fort William and Port Arthur to Buffalo and other points show a gradual tendency towards cheaper rates. The average per ton mile for 1901 was ·99 mill, in 1902 ·89 mill, in 1903 ·92 mill, in 1904 ·81 mill, in 1905 ·81 mill, in 1906 ·85 and ·84 in 1907. This is for all kinds of freight while the average on wheat during the same period was ·52 mills per ton mile. The freight rates on wheat show the greatest reduction being 1¼ cents per bushel between terminals in 1906 as against 2·3 cents in 1901. These rates between terminals include cost of loading and unloading at terminal points. The average distance for carriage of grain on the Great Lakes may be taken as 800 miles, the bulk being from Chicago and Duluth to Buffalo, 940 miles. This gives us a rate per ton mile for lake carriage of grain of ·46 mill, which may be taken as a liberal estimate of the cost of lake transportation. The lowest possible rail rate per ton mile under most favourable conditions, the lowest which according to high authority can be looked forward to, is 2½ mills per ton mile or over five times the present rate by water. This minimum estimated rail rate has never yet been reached, the nearest approach to it being in 1905, when grain was carried by the railroads of New York at a loss in an attempt to demonstrate that the improvement and development of water routes was unnecessary. With existing conditions in Canada it is doubtful if such low rates may be expected by Canadian roads between the lake ports and the sea-board. It must be remembered that cheap coal can be had all along the American lines from the lakes to the Atlantic, whereas on Canadian railroads the fuel for the engines has to be transported to points where needed from the eastern terminals.

As a further evidence of the economical use of waterways even under adverse circumstances, let us compare the rates on wheat between Chicago and New York : Via all water 6·059 cents per bushel ; lake and rail 7·128 ; all rail 12·76 cents per bushel. And surely it cannot be said that the railways between those points are less well equipped than are our railways here. But for the purposes of argument, let me take the lowest possible rate on wheat per bushel via lake and rail from Chicago to the sea-board which would be 4·7 cents. A liberal estimate of the cost via the Ottawa waterway would be 1½ cents per bushel. Now, assuming the total export grain, including flour from the northwestern United States and Canada, to be 200,000,000 bushels per annum, and that of this quantity 100,000,000 bushels were transported by way of the Ottawa and French river waterways, a saving would be effected in the way of freight of $3,200,000. I look upon this as a very reasonable estimate of the situation, and one that is almost sure to follow the opening up of this means of communication.

As to competition with the railways, when the United States government decided to take over and complete the Panama canal a commission was appointed to make a careful inquiry throughout the country with a view of ascertaining what effect water transportation would have on the rail carriers. The commission were particular to consult some of the highest traffic officials connected with the prominent railways, and the consensus of opinion was that water transportation tended in every instance to assist in the development of traffic which would necessarily have to be transported by rail.

Mr. J. T. Harahan, president of the Illinois Central railroad and the Yazoo and Mississippi Valley railroad, embracing upwards of 5,600 miles, extending from Omaha in the west with connections at St. Paul and Minneapolis on the north, touching the Great Lakes at Chicago and continuing down the Mississippi Valley to New Orleans, this system coming in direct competition with water transportation, in an address delivered before the Deep Waterway convention at Memphis, Tenn., on October 4 last, said :

We do not fear wholesome competition which the development of our waterways would offer, but on the contrary, we anticipate that the additional traffic created thereby would vastly increase our tonnage and therefore our revenues.

The utility of water transportation consists in the carrying of low classes of freight at slow speeds and at low rates, leaving to the rail lines the more important traffic, which of necessity requires greater and punctual dispatch and therefore better rate, and leaves the latter free to handle more promptly its share of the traffic.

This being the opinion of such an eminent railway man with regard to the navigation of the Mississippi, it therefore will be nothing short of criminal on our part if we continue the condition which shuts us out from the advantages which we have at our very door.

I have here in 'Industrial Canada,' of January, the report of an address delivered by Mr. John Pullen, Assistant Freight Traffic Manager of the Grand Trunk Railway, before the Railway Club a short time ago in which he expressed similar views. The article is too long to read but I will read the comments on it made by the manager of the transportation department of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, Mr. James E. Walsh, formerly with the Canada Atlantic Railway, and who is as well qualified to speak on transportation as any man in this Dominion. These are his comments on the speech of Mr. Pullen :

THE TRANSPORTATION PROBLEM.

It is with a feeling of satisfaction that every one interested in freight rates views the rapid development of competing lines of railways, for competition means lower rates. Mr. John Pullen, the assistant freight traffic manager of the Grand Trunk Railway, recently gave the Canadian Railway Club a very interesting talk on 'The Work of the Freight Traffic Department,' during which he mentioned what he said were a few of the factors entering into freight rate construction. Distance is one and, to the uninitiated, it would seem that the rate should increase with the distance. Such is not necessarily the case however. On the contrary distance has often to be eliminated as the result of competition, either of water or of a rival rail line. If, he pointed out, there be two or more railways between two given points, the railway having the longer route must, of necessity, carry its freight between these two points at as low rate as its rival which may be fortunate enough to have a much shorter line.

So much for the good effect of competition amongst railways, but the most important statement made by Mr. Pullen in his address had regard to the great advantages, from the shipper's standpoint, of water transportation. If, he said, a railway parallels navigable waterways then its rate must, of necessity, be kept down at the lowest possible figure, otherwise all the traffic would be attracted to the water route. This leaves no doubt, if there had been any before, of the desirability of developing to the fullest possible extent every mile of waterway that is or that can be made navigable. The money which has been spent on the St. Lawrence canals has been well invested. The people are getting a larger return from it than shows on the balance sheet, for it is not only freight that passes up and down by boat that benefits by it, but also every pound of freight carried on the railways between points which enjoy the alternate advantage of the water route.

Rival railways reduce rates merely to a common basis fixed by the shorter line, but a navigable waterway cuts them down to the lowest possible figure at which commodities can be moved from one point to another. That the great advantage of water transportation is well understood and fully appreciated by our shippers, is evidenced every season by the mad rush to catch the last boat with shipments. The farmers of the west, too, strain every point to get their grain to the lake ports before the season closes, in order that it may reach the seaboard at the smallest possible cost.

As commercial and industrial progress is, in a large measure, dependent upon cheap transportation, it is surely the part of wisdom to make the most of our opportunities in that direction. No other country in the world possesses such great natural advantages in this respect as Canada, but we are not making the most of our unequalled opportunities. No other country has equalled ours in its liberality to railway promoters; but we show a reluctance to aid in canal projects that is hard to understand. We point with reasonable pride to the St. Lawrence route, but we cannot afford to become so lost in admiration of what has already been done, as to forget that, after all, we have really only made a beginning.

That eminent railway magnate, James J. Hill, than whom there is no more competent authority on transportation problems, has stated that the secret of low freight rates lies in canal development. This emphasizes the statement of Mr. Pullen, whose official position with one of our great trunk lines entitles him to speak with authority, to the effect that railway freight rates are figured out under the menace of water charges, when there is an alternate water route, with the result that railway rates are, to use his words, kept down to the lowest possible figure. With this fact before us, can we longer question the wisdom of a liberal policy of canal development? For over half a century there has been a canal project before the people of Canada, which, if carried into effect, would shorten the distance between Chicago and Liverpool in the neighbourhood of one thousand miles. Some of the most eminent engineers have examined this project carefully and pronounced it undertaking the work. During this period thousands of miles of government aided railways have been constructed, all of which were needed, and possibly furnished a reasonable excuse for our neglect of other national transportation projects. The time has now arrived, however, when we can afford to call a halt in further railway development on the magnificent scale to which we have become accustomed and turn our attention to the development of water routes. The people of this country have been generous to the railways, and they owe us a lot in return for what we have done for them. They could have no grievance if we now let them shift for themselves, and turned our attention and our money to the development of water routes which will be the property of the nation and its best guarantee of fair and reasonable treatment in the matter of transportation charges.

That, I look upon as a very strong argument in favour of this project, and coming from such a source, I think it should be fully considered. Our railways have not made any great progress towards taking care of the increasing business of the country, and as a result of the lack of transportation facilities large quantities of Canadian breadstuffs are being forced to the markets by American channels. It may be here stated that shipments going by United States ports, say to Liverpool, are not always credited as Canadian products, especially is this the case after the close of navigation.

The total shipments of wheat from Fort William and Port Arthur during 1906 were 44,376,343 bushels, distributed as follows:—

	Bushels.
To Buffalo and other United States ports in United States vessels	12,398,002
To Buffalo and other United States ports in United States vessels	4,055,903
To Kingston, Montreal and Prescott	10,221,396
To Thorold and Port Stanley	855,878
To Georgian bay and Lake Huron ports	16,847,164
	44,376,343

It will be noted that the shipments to Buffalo equalled those to Georgian bay and Lake Huron ports. Of the 31,978,341 bushels carried in Canadian vessels to various points 10,221,396 bushels were consigned to Kingston, Prescott and Montreal; 16,451,907 bushels in all went direct to United States ports. Of the shipments to Georgian bay and Lake Huron ports a considerable portion was for local consumption in transit in Ontario.

Shipments of wheat from Port William and Port Arthur in 1905 were, in Canadian vessels, 29,762,910 bushels, and, in United States vessels, 11,218,882 bushels, 10,493,823 of the latter going to Buffalo. 7,826,781 bushels shipped in Canadian vessels went to Kingston and Montreal showing quite an increase in the shipments by the all-water route in 1906.

The receipts in 1906 at the port of Montreal of wheat were 16,790,651 bushels as against 15,316,821 in 1905, an increase of only 1,653,830 bushels, so that there was a decrease by rail. In former years the exports have been greater. For instance:

	Receipts.	Shipments.
1903	19,546,739	16,055,004
1902	20,177,624	17,394,886
1901	15,884,058	13,626,071

Flour, port of Montreal to all points, including Newfoundland:

	Barrels.
1906	1,727,826
1905	1,842,240

The receipts and shipments in 1906 were not greater than in 1902 and 1903, when there was apparently much better inland transportation facilities to keep the business in Canadian channels.

There is no doubt as to the inability of the railways to take care of the export grain trade, and with the increased demand for cars and facilities to take care of the industrial and manufacturing interests very little can be expected in the near future, unless some change is made which is not now apparent. It will be interesting to note what the actual shipments of Canadian breadstuffs via leading United States ports are. During 1906 there were shipped via these ports 24,159,240 bushels of grain of which 22,150,590 bushels were wheat, distributed as follows :—

	Bushels.
New York	4,877,367
Boston	9,216,086
Portland	6,289,461
Philadelphia	960,436
Baltimore	807,271

Flour, 536,899 barrels.

In 1905 the total shipments of grain via the same ports were 12,119,637 bushels, of which 10,795,346 were wheat flour shipments, 428,000 barrels.

It will be observed that the port of Montreal has not increased to any marked extent, in fact is doing less business than in 1903, notwithstanding the enormous increase in the vessel tonnage.

With the increased mileage of railways, population and agricultural areas in the west, how do we expect to take care of the agricultural products ? As an illustration, there were 14,154 land entries from January 1 to June 30 last year, which computed at 160 acres, the minimum quantity would comprise 2,264,640 acres. The railways are rapidly increasing their mileage with the view of serving these new areas, but in all cases the objective point or eastern terminus in so far as the transportation of grain is concerned is Fort William or Port Arthur.

What is being done to take the grain from these points ? It is only necessary to glance back over the last two years in order to realize the enormous waste of money there has been in getting the crop of the Northwest to the market owing to the lack of foresight on the part of those who of all others should be interested in the building up and welfare of the country.

What the railways have done to help the situation and take care of the enormous increase in traffic, which they must have foreseen, will be best shown by looking over the increase on mileage and equipment since 1903 :

Year.	Miles in Operation.	Locomotives of all kinds.	Freight cars including box, cattle, refrigerator, flat, coal and dump.
1903	18,988	2,587	80,252
1904	19,431	2,768	83,562
1905	20,487	2,906	86,296
1906	21,353	2,931	90,404

The equipment ordered by the principal railways for delivery in 1907 consisted of :

(a) Locomotives of all kinds including switchers and passenger, 356.

(b) Cars of all kinds which might be available for carriage of freight, 15,678. This includes flat, platform and ballast cars, which at certain seasons of the year are used by the railways for construction and ballasting purposes.

In submitting these figures it is fair to state that the traction power of the locomotive and the capacity of the cars have been greatly increased, and while it is satisfactory to note the improvements which are being made in the facilities to take care of the business offering, it is still quite obvious that the equipment is not being added to as rapidly as would seem to be required by the steadily increasing mileage under operation, which on June 30 last was 21,819 with 5,000 new miles under construction. Whilst it is stated that some 15,000 additional cars will be added to the equipment available for freight carriage, quite a large percentage of these are not available at all times, but are used for the companies' business almost exclusively. Furthermore there is an annual depreciation in the stock which would materially reduce the amount of equipment available. The question has been in the last few years not what rates can we get, but what accommodation. One thing is certain, that whatever reduction is made in the transporting of agricultural products must eventually find its way to the pocket of the farmer. The forces of competition may be relied upon to regulate this.

The building up of the American northwest contiguous to our own was largely the result of water transportation formerly almost exclusively via eastern Atlantic ports. Now owing to changes in the agricultural areas new routes have been opened via the Gulf of Mexico. The intercourse between the United States and Canada in the west is growing steadily, due in a great measure to transportation problems becoming common to both countries. United States lines are being built and projected into our Northwest. Charters are being granted with the object of connecting with United States lines and diverting to the United States trade which belongs to Canadian channels. Conditions are more or less sympathetic, and if the people of the Northwest are forced to look to the United States for assistance to enable them to market their crop, it is fair to assume they cannot object to these same lines reaching out for traffic west and north bound. We speak of Canada for Canadians, but in no way can this be more easily secured than by the development of the cheapest system of transportation, thus binding all parts of the Dominion together. It doubtless is true that there is no sentiment in business, but I firmly believe that if means can be provided whereby the output of the Northwest can be put on the world's market as cheaply by Canadian channels as by any other possible routes, Canadians will join in striving to build up that which the foundation was laid for, 40 years ago, when confederation became a fact, and the first step taken towards Canadian nationhood.

It is hardly necessary for me to call attention to the fact, which is already well known to almost every member of this House, of the immense water-powers that are at present lying dormant along the route, and which if this work were carried out, would necessarily be developed by reason of the improvements. I am satisfied that I am safely within the mark when I venture the statement that at least 800,000 horse-power can be developed in this way, which, when utilized, would without doubt pay the interest account resulting from the expenditure in connection with the whole project, and leave a handsome balance over. At the low valuation of $10 per horse-power per annum, this would add $8,000,000 per annum to the wealth of the country, which capitalized at 3 per cent, would mean $266,666,667, besides furnishing cheap power for the establishment of pulp, paper, flour and sawmills, ore production works and other industries all along the route.

Why continue allowing such a great gift of nature as the Ottawa river undoubtedly is, to remain unused except for floating of logs to the mills at Chaudière Falls, which could be much more profitably manufactured nearer the source of supply if the product were given cheap transportation to tidewater; and, instead of piling up fire traps around and within this city in the shape of lumber piles, establish flour mills and other manufactories, including ore reduction works, the latter being especially desirable since it has been demonstrated that the smelting of iron ore by electricity is a complete success. We have immense riches in iron ore, which up to the present time have not been possible of development because of sulphur and titanium being found in connection therewith, but which when treated by electrical process are not considered objectionable.

Mr. FOSTER. I think my hon. friend said that electrical smelting of iron ore had been demonstrated? Has the process gone so far that it is absolutely certain that it is commercially successful?

Mr. McCOOL. Perhaps I should qualify that. There are no large reduction works started, but a small plant is at present being built at Hull. The process has been tried at Jersey City, and I am assured by the very best authority that it is a complete success in every way. The experiment that was made at Sault Ste. Marie could hardly be so regarded, because too great a quantity of power was required to do the smelting. But a different process is now used, by which the iron ore can be treated at the mouth of the pit at far less cost than by any other known process. Though I am not sufficiently familiar with the matter to be able to give facts and figures, I think that electrical smelting of iron or any other ore may be accepted as an established fact.

Again take our Cobalt ores, and what do we find? Only a very small percentage of the product of that great mining camp is smelted and refined in Canada, and as a rule the American refiners only pay for the silver contents, while the nickel, cobalt, arsenic and other associated ore contents would justify the expense of mining for them alone. It is undoubtedly true that refineries, to do this kind of work, are at present in course of construction at three or four points in Canada, two of them being in the district which I have the honour to represent; but handicapped as they will be by expensive fuel supply it is doubtful if they will do very much better for the miners than they are now getting.

Mr. THOMPSON. Has the hon. gentleman investigated this new electrical smelting process?

Mr. McCOOL. To some extent.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is not referred to in Dr. Haanels' report?

Mr. McCOOL. No.

Mr. HAGGART. What is the new electrical process called?

Mr. McCOOL. It is a different system of setting the carbon.

Mr. HAGGART. Has it any name?

Mr. McCOOL. It has a name, but I cannot recall it at the moment.

Mr. HAGGART. Is it an improvement on that recommended by Dr. Haanel?

Mr. McCOOL. It is not at all the same. The great trouble with Dr. Haanel's process, as was stated to me by five or six experts, was that while it did the work satisfactorily, it took such an enormous quantity of electrical power that it was not a commercial possibility. To give an idea of the extent of the mining operations at Cobalt, I will read the following from the 'Haileyburian' of January 10, 1908:—

A Review of the Cobalt Shipments.

A review of the Cobalt shipments since the camp commenced to have any output of silver is most interesting. In the year 1904 the value of the ore shipped was $136,217, and the shipments turned the scale at 158 tons. In 1905 a big increase was shown, for 2,144 tons valued at $1,473,196 were sent out. In 1906. 5,129 tons were mined and marketed of a value of about $3,900,000, and in the year 1907, 14,040 tons, of a value in the neighbourhood of $9,500,000 were shipped. The output for 1907 is about three times that of 1906, six times that of 1905 and ninety times that of 1904. This shows an enormous increase, and what is more is that there is every probability that the present year will still show an increase for more mines are approaching the shipping stage, while those which are well established are constantly making fresh discoveries.

A great impetus would be given to our mining industries if we had such means of transportation as would justify us in developing cheap electrical power, for then we would be in a position to do all this work of smelting in our own country. At present very little of it is done in Canada. There is one smelter at Sudbury, which handles a small quantity of ore, but it could not begin to deal with the quantity of ore that can be turned out.

Our forests in Ontario and Quebec, even where the pine timber has been cut, contain an inexhaustible supply of spruce, hemlock, balsam and the various hardwoods, all of which would be made available and contribute to the building up of the commerce of the country. These products cannot be handled at present because the means of handling them are not available. We have to get cheap transportation in order to compete with other countries.

It is fair to assume, therefore, that whilst the development of the waterway would mean the doing away with the towing of logs on the Ottawa river it will prove of undoubted value to the limit owners and manufacturers of lumber generally.

Then again the development of our coal deposits in Nova Scotia would be immensely benefited by the opening of this waterway which would enable them to compete successfully with the American collieries at all points tributary to the great lakes and furnish return freights for vessels engaged in the grain trade. In this connection I cannot do better than read an extract taken from 'Industrial Canada' of last May, and contributed by Mr. Jas. E. Walsh, manager of the transportation branch of the Manufacturers' Association, than whom I know of no person better qualified to give an opinion on any matter connected with transportation :

In an article on Canada's Transportation Problem, which appeared in the April issue of 'Industrial Canada,' the vital influence of cheap transportation on the material welfare of the country was shown. Efforts are now being made to divert trade from Western Canada over United States roads. The true solution, it was pointed out, lay in opening up new routes in this country, which would supply an adequate service at cheaper rates. From this arose the discussion of the advantages of water routes, and particularly the possibilities of the proposed canal via French river and the Ottawa.

The United States Deep Waterways Commission of 1896, speaking of the different routes to the Atlantic sea-board and the Georgian bay route says the Ottawa route is a short independent line which may have great value for future development, but its consideration is not now justified. It is the shortest through route between terminals, and is unquestionably adapted to navigation of considerable capacity.

The 'Engineering News,' March 5, 1902, said editorially : 'From an engineering point of view, disregarding for the moment political boundaries, there can be no doubt that the Ottawa route is by far the best for a deep waterway from the upper lakes to the sea. We respectfully submit to the New York Barge Canal promoters the question how their barge canal could hope to compete with such a route. Indeed we may make the question a broader one, and ask how any route to the sea-board which requires transhipment could possibly compete with a route which takes freight on board a lake steamer at upper lake ports and delivers it at tide water without breaking bulk ?

The Route Direct.

As previously stated, a glance at the map will show the geographical position of the waterway, and the attractions it offers to the United States Northwest; among others the fact that the northern route is cooler, and therefore, there is less danger of heating in transit, which difficulty prevails via the southern routes. In the latter case a guarantee is required of the quality of the grain after the first of April. It will not only afford facilities for the grain traffic, but also for the carriage of meats in refrigerator ships to any port in the world. The following table shows the mileage advantage of the route.

To	Galveston.	New O.	Duluth	N.Y.
Kansas City.. ..	804:5	932	612	1,335
Omaha..	895:5	1,070	521	1,402
Sioux City..		1,258	422	1,422
St. Paul..		1,269	160	1,332
Minneapolis..		1,279	150	1,322

Distances Duluth to Montreal, via French river (Georgian bay route) 997 miles ; Montreal to Liverpool, via Belle Isle, 2,470 miles through; Kansas City to Liverpool, 4,379 miles, as against Kansas City to Galveston, 804·5 ; Galveston to Liverpool, 4,874, through 5,678 miles, saving by the northern route of 1,299 miles, and a saving of 1,038 miles over the route via New Orleans. Kansas City and the other points above named are used for comparison as they are the centres of agricultural production in the American northwest at the present time. The Omaha Grain Exchange, in its annual report for 1905, referring to the publishing of through rates from Omaha to Liverpool, via the southern routes, says : 'The grain is thus permitted to go through without breaking bulk except at the seaport, and without shrinkage and the taking of tolls at intermediate ports. This means the bringing of foreign markets to our very doors, whereby we obtain the highest prices possible. The result of this condition is worth ten million dollars yearly to the grain producers of Nebraska.'

A comparison of distances from upper lake ports is given :

	Miles.
From Chicago to New York, lake and rail, via Buffalo..	1,389
From Chicago to Montreal, lake and rail, via Canadian routes..	906
From Chicago to Montreal, via Georgian bay route..	905
From Fort William to Montreal, via Georgian bay route..	882
From Fort William to Montreal, via St. Lawrence..	1,296
From Duluth to Montreal..	997

Advantage in favour of the proposed waterway, Fort William to Montreal, 414 miles to Liverpool, as against the Buffalo route, 1,198 miles.

The saving in distance from Chicago to Liverpool is 1,254 miles, and from Duluth 1,213 miles.

The distance from Winnipeg to Montreal, all rail, is 1,306 miles via Fort William, and the Georgian bay route 1,309 miles.

It will be seen that Montreal would be nearer Duluth than Buffalo is, and Chicago and Buffalo and Chicago and Montreal equidistant.

Saving in Cost.

Having thus given an idea of the advantage in regard to distances, we may now consider the question of traffic and the saving to be effected. The matter of tonnage is a foregone conclusion, and need not be here discussed. It is only necessary to refer to the returns of the Soo canals. On the matter of rates it is apparent that the short line mileage afforded by the route would enable it, not only to compete, but to control the rates from the territory above mentioned in the United States, and materially reduce the rates on grain from the Canadian Northwest.

Very little of the grain of the Northwest finds its way to the sea-board all rail. In no year has it exceeded two million bushels. At present the bulk of it is taken to Fort William, Port Arthur and Duluth, thence by water ports on the Georgian bay or Buffalo, and rail from there to the sea-board. A certain quantity has, especially during the past few years, owing partly to the congestion at lower lake ports, gone by all the water routes via the Welland and St. Lawrence canals to Montreal, which, however, necessitated a transfer en route either at Port Colborne or Kingston, more or less shrinkage and extra charge for elevation, all of which adds to the cost of transportation.

The saving in the cost of transport by the proposed waterway can be best illustrated by taking as a basis the rates that prevail via Buffalo, showing the same in detail; that is to say, the proportion earned by the lake steamers and that of the lines east of Buffalo. For the years, 1895 to 1904 inclusive, the average rate via Erie canal, Buffalo to New York, on wheat was 3.15 cents per bushel. The rail rate has varied from 3.4 in 1898 to 4 cents in 1904. These years are quoted from the fact that it may be taken that conditions were normal. The average lake rate on wheat for the five years, 1900 to 1904, was 1.56 a bushel, making the average through-rate for five years from the head of the lakes to the sea-board, lake and canal, 4·71 cents per bushel. The average cost for receiving, weighing and discharging, ocean vessel trimming and floating elevator at Buffalo and New York, is 2 cents per bushel, making a total cost of 6·71 per bushel to take a bushel of wheat from Fort William and put it on board ship in New York harbour.

What governs rates.

Existing routes to Montreal, all water or lake and rail, are practically governed by the rates that prevail via Buffalo. The rate from Duluth to New York via Buffalo is 6·71 cents per bushel. Allowing for the same rate per mile by the Georgian bay route, with the addition for delays, &c., the cost from Duluth to Montreal would be 2·62 cents per bushel. That is, the latter route provides for putting the grain on board vessel at the sea-board for 4·09 cents per bushel less than by Buffalo.

As to the grain trade of the Canadian Northwest the average rate on wheat has been from 6 to 7 cents per bushel, from the elevator at the head of the lake to vessel at the sea-board. The average since 1905 has, no doubt, been somewhat higher than this, as very little of any grain was carried from Fort William to Georgian bay or Lake Huron ports at less than 2½ cents per bushel. In fact, charters were made as high as 6 cents per bushel, with no accommodation east of the lakes to take care of the business. The published lake and rail route in 1905 and 1906, Fort William to Montreal, was 81 cents per bushel.

As to the possibility of the lake and rail lines via Georgian bay becoming a greater factor in the grain carrying trade of the Northwest, a division of a rate of 6 cents would mean that the earning for the rail haul round Georgian bay would not exceed 3 mills per ton per mile, which is not considered profitable, especially as the lines could not expect to handle any great amount of westbound traffic; in fact, some of the lines have declined to handle ex-lake grain for export at going rates. So that there is very little likelihood of any material reduction in rates even with improved facilities. Even if it were possible to carry grain at 2½ mills per ton per mile, when there are no return loads, inadequacy of terminals would block and delay the business. The time of a steamer in transit from Fort William to Montreal via the Ottawa route should not exceed five days, equal to average time on cargoes via the shortest lake and rail route.

The saving in transhipment and elevator charges by this route will go largely to pay the cost of transportation proper, and with control of terminals, including elevators at lake ports and the sea-board, the rate will, no doubt, be lower than quoted.

The tonnage of vessels and trade on the upper lakes is largely in the hands of United States steamship owners. This applies as well to Canadian lake ports, and will continue so long as steamers with a capacity of from 8,000 to 12,000 tons can be used, as compared with the much smaller vessel of Canadian build, which is necessary owing to our lack of facilities. The working expenses of the large steamer are very little more than a vessel of a quarter or half its size. Therefore, not only will benefit be derived from the cheapening of rates on the exports and imports of the west, but shipping ports at the seaboard commensurate with the trade of the country will be built up.

Source of electrical power.

The transportation of grain from the northwest is not by any means the only factor entering into this project. It will make possible the development of a region of immense mineral and forest wealth, which absolutely requires cheap transportation, and which is not now accessible. It is estimated that there is from 1,250,000 to 2,000,000 electric horse-power along the route awaiting development, which when utilized in manufacturing, milling, &c., will add millions of dollars to the national wealth. There are large deposits of iron ore, and vast areas of pulpwood contiguous to the line of waterway, which commodities are now entering largely into the commerce of the country, and for which there is a ready market. The chief item of importance in the west-bound tonnage would be lumber, cement and coal from Nova Scotia.

Distribution of Canadian coal.

Very little of the latter finds its way into Ontario. The cheapness of American coal at mines and the short haul has practically shut out Canadian coal. No change can be expected in this situation except through improved transportation facilities. The Nova Scotia shippers state that they would be able to compete provided there were facilities to allow a class of colliers in the Sydney-Montreal trade to proceed to the lake cities without breaking bulk. At the present time Ontario contributes between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000 annually to coal duties. It, therefore, might be well to consider the economy of appropriating a portion of this to approved facilities to secure coal from our own coal fields, and become practically independent of the United States for our supply. Coal can be delivered as advantageously to interior points in Ontario from the line of the Georgian bay route as from the St. Lawrence, Lake Erie, or Ontario. As an illustration: the average lake route on coal from Lake Erie ports to Lake Huron and Georgian bay ports is 35 cents per ton. The average rate to upper lake ports is 40 cents per ton. The average rail rate from the mines to say Cleveland is 78 cents per ton, making a through rate of $1.13 and $1.18, respectively. The average rail haul from the mines to the lake front is 140 miles, Cleveland to Fort William about 800 miles, total 940 miles. Sydney to Fort William is 1,697 miles. Taking the lake rate, Cleveland to Fort William as a basis the rate Sydney to Fort William would be about 85 cents per ton as against a rate of $1.18 from the United States mines. The rate to Sault Ste. Marie and intermediate ports would be proportionately lower. There is a difference of 33 cents per ton in the rate of freight to Fort William, to this add the duty of 53 cents per ton, making 85 cents per ton in favour of the home product.

As to the effect of the proposed waterway on Georgian bay ports. It will relieve the lines via Georgian bay of a class of traffic which it is claimed cannot be handled economically by rail east, and the elevators at bay ports will be available for the local and milling in transit interests throughout Ontario.

Harbour improvements at these ports will tend more to the advantage and building up of Ontario. Ontario is the manufacturing centre of Canada and should continue so, and should supply the wants of the Northwest. The development of her ports will give the benefit of water carriage. On the other hand the farmer in the Northwest who wants the output of the factory in the Northwest will be enabled to market his crop to the best possible advantage, and financially it will draw together the eastern and western ports of the Dominion and offer the chief factor in its prosperity, namely, 'cheap transportation.'

In conclusion it might be said that one of the objections offered to this route has been shortness of the season. This is hardly worthy of consideration, as it will be noted that Lake Nipissing, the most northerly portion of the route is 20 miles south of Sault Ste. Marie.

Now, if in addition to the increase of our own trade, we add the further shipments from the western states that would naturally be attracted to this route by reason of cheap transportation to the seaboard, it is practically impossible to arrive at the enormous volume of additional traffic which must be secured.

Since 1881 the traffic through the Sault canals has about doubled every six years, and last year as previously stated, reached the grand total of over 50,000,000 tons.

With a waterway from the upper lake cities to ocean navigation at Montreal, of only about the same distance as to Buffalo, and even completed to New York by way of Lake Champlain and the Hudson river, at least 100 miles shorter than any other proposed from the lakes to that city, there can be no question that with transportation rate of less than one per cent per ton per mile of the rate necessary on railroads the volume of traffic must exceed eight million tons annually.

I would like to read a report from the 'Globe' with regard to this line, being a despatch from Montreal of January 22.

Montreal, January 22.—Mr. C. E. W. Smith of New York, representative of a syndicate of American capitalists who have taken up the project of the construction of a ship canal from New York to Montreal by way of the Hudson river, Lake Champlain, and the Richelieu, with the necessary canal adjuncts to the St. Lawrence, states in an interview to-day that the project is now well on the way towards accomplishment. The whole of the capital required for the completion of the great waterway is forthcoming. There had been a little delay in the preparations owing to the tightness of money, but as financial conditions were now easier he anticipated no further difficulties in the way of the execution of the project. Work at the southern end of Lake Champlain, which would cost something like $30,000,000, was now in progress. That at the Canadian end would be much less costly—probably not more than $7,000,000—but there was in connection with it an electric project which would have far reaching effect, that would involve a few additional millions, but he was not prepared to discuss that, further than to say that it was proposed to construct a large dam near St. John's, fed from the Richelieu river at a point where they could get a fall of seventy-four feet.

While a number of Canadians with whom I have discussed the project, said Mr. Smith, have evidenced a very warm interest in it, as it will mean a great deal to Montreal's progress to have continuous navigation for large vessels extending all the way from New York to this port, and entering the St. Lawrence near Longueuil, the money required will come from the south.

That, I think, is an additional argument, if such were needed, in favour of the building of this waterway.

It may be said that the figures I have given for transportation rates by water cannot be borne out by actual experience. Let me point out to you that barges plying on the Mississippi between Pittsburg and New Orleans carry coal a distance of 1,970 miles for the extremely low rate of 71 cents per ton, notwithstanding the difficulties to be contended with because of navigation on the Mississippi being very shallow. When this is considered, I think it may well be taken for granted that wheat can be profitably carried from Fort William or Port Arthur to Montreal via the Ottawa and Georgian bay canal system for 1½ cents per bushel.

Mr. BENNETT. Does the hon. gentleman remember that he stated a moment ago that the prevailing rate from Fort William to Georgian bay ports was 2½ cents a bushel ?

Mr. McCOOL. I gave you the conditions as they are. It is not what is done but what can profitably be done and the ship owners in the trade must be making enormous profits—and I understand they are.

Mr. BENNETT. You have not seen the boats tied up this summer ?

Mr. McCOOL. The boats would not be tied up if the Georgian bay canal was constructed.

Mr. BENNETT. They have been coming down light from Fort William after taking coal up at 25 cents a ton.

Mr. McCOOL. Possibly because they were Canadian bottoms and could not handle the grain to Buffalo.

Mr. BENNETT. They could have taken it to Buffalo.

Mr. McCOOL. I am not prepared to answer that question. I am only giving the facts, taking the time and the cost of running the boat and the cost at which the work could be done at a reasonable profit. While I have stated 1½ cents, it is argued by men who have given this matter close study that it can be done for probably 1¼ cents.

Comparisons with the Erie canal system are hardly fair for the reason that it is well known that conditions there are entirely dissimilar. The Erie canal has been notoriously neglected and mismanaged for years until it was almost impossible to navigate it at all. Notwithstanding this it still supplies evidence in favour of water transportation in that the rate on wheat by water from Buffalo to New York is 4·24 as against 4.95 by rail, and amply justifies the people of the United States in having made an appropriation of $100,000,000 for its deepening to 14 feet and other improvements of the system, thus demonstrating their confidence in the future of transportation by water even under difficulties such as exist there. It must also be borne in mind that the American government have appropriated the necessary money required to build, and are at present building, a third lock or canal at Sault Ste. Marie at an estimated cost of $12,000,000, and this notwithstanding the fact that they already have two canals at that point.

Mr. HAGGART. Have you the dimensions of the new lock ? Is there to be greater depth of water on the mitre sill ?

Mr. McCOOL. I have not, but the minister says 25 feet.

Mr. HAGGART. I understand it is to be only one foot deeper, 23 feet.

An hon. MEMBER. Twenty-three feet six inches.

Mr. McCOOL. From what I can gather I do not think there is any intention of using vessels of any greater depth than 21 feet ; but sometimes they find that they have to drag through as it is. Of course there is always the inducement to load a little heavier than they should, and it is in order that there should be no possible detention that the depth has been increased. It is well to remember that during the year 1906, American vessels carried 95 per cent of the total freight passing through the Soo canal ; and it does seem necessary that some effort should be put forth by our government to at least get a reasonable share of this business.

I now make a final appeal to the government and the members of this House to lose no more time in starting this great work. As previously stated the final reports of surveys and estimates of the cost of the entire scheme will be ready before the close of the session—at least so we are assured by the departmental officers—and in good time to make provision in the supplementary estimates for the necessary funds. It has been suggested that another commission should be appointed to investigate the commercial possibilities of the scheme. Surely this is not necessary with conditions so plain to all and after having spent $500,000 on surveys. If a commission to investigate the commercial side of it were needed, in my opinion it should have been appointed in the first place and not after having spent so much money on the surveys and estimates in connection with it. If the present stringency in the money markets of the world does not justify the undertaking of the whole work at once, then by all means let us make a start on the French river end, which will give connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway at North Bay, from which point, with the exception of the first six miles, there should be down grade to Montreal. Six miles east of North Bay you strike the headwaters of the Mattawa which empties into the Ottawa, and of course if the Canadian Pacific Railway grades between that point and Montreal are not all that they should be, it is only a matter of betterment—and they are not without the means of doing it. Connection can also be made at Callender with the Grand Trunk Railway at Callender station on Lake Nipissing, where there is as fine a natural harbour as is to be found in the country.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Roughly speaking, what proportion of the cost would be required to build the canal to Callender?

Mr. McCOOL. $13,700,000.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. $13,000,000 would put navigation at Callender?

Mr. McCOOL. Yes, and provide terminal facilities. The distance from Callender via the Canada Atlantic from Scotia Junction is only a few miles further from Montreal than Depot Harbour, and cuts off the heavy grades between that point and Scotia Junction.

The easier grades from North Bay and Callender as compared with Georgian bay points would justify the development of the French river and Lake Nipissing section even if nothing further was done. I do not, however, want to be understood as suggesting the abandonment of the remaining section from North Bay to Montreal, but let us make a start on this section and the other will follow. The interim reportof Mr. A. St. Laurent, assistant chief engineer of the Department of Public Works, which was supplied the House a couple of days ago, leaves no room to doubt the urgency of starting at once the construction of this section, which, as pointed out in the report, will take five years to construct on account of the large quantities of rock excavation both dry and sub-marine. It cannot be contended that we have not sufficient data as to the cost of the proposed work, the surveys and estimates having been most carefully made by competent engineers, based upon labour conditions as they were last year; so, if any change should require to be made in the estimates it can only be in the way of reduction in cost, because of cheaper labour.

The estimated cost of this section is placed at $13,700,589, and includes an expenditure at North Bay of $1,493,361 for docks and other equipments at that place for taking care of the grain and other commodities to be transhipped to the railways.

While the amount named seems a large sum of money, it must be borne in mind that it is not an expenditure for any one section, but in reality is creating another Georgian port as well as a link in what must eventually prove to be the great freight rate regulator between the heads of the great lakes and the sea-board.

I desire to call special attention to that portion of the interim report previously mentioned, dealing with the water-powers which will be developed along the French river, and which, when utilized, should go a long way towards payment of the interest charges on the total expenditure on this section.

This has been a live subject for more than fifty years and any further postponement will be not only a great disappointment to those of us who have always looked foward to the completion of the Georgian bay ship canal, but will as well be a direct set back to our aspirations towards the control of the bulk of the traffic between the great lakes and the Atlantic which nature has placed within our grasp.

I trust, therefore, that immediate action will be taken by the government to start this important work, and I am positive that when completed the only criticism that can be offered will be the expression of surprise at this great undertaking not having been grappled with years ago.

Mr. G. V. WHITE (North Renfrew). Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of attention to the very excellent speech which the hon. member (Mr. McCool) has given to us. He has given to the House many interesting facts concerning the proposed Georgian bay canal. Last session when the question of general transportation was before the House, I presented a few reason why, in my opinion, this great work should be undertaken. To-day I propose to preface my remarks with a few statistics regarding some of the great canal systems of the world. First, Sir, let me read a short extract from a report of United States Consul General Bittinger to the State Department, dated March 21, 1901, regarding the waterways of Canada. He says :

Canada, in earlier days, was styled 'a wooden country,' because of her vast forest areas, but the same term might as truthfully have been applied to the United States a century ago. One feature of Canada that might be used in a national descriptive title is her waterways, which are unrivalled in length as also in service to commerce.

In view of these remarks and when we consider that the water area of the Dominion covers approximately 126,000 square miles, I think I am justified in saying, that we do not fully appreciate the great resources which we possess in our natural waterways.

The Dominion government has, since confederation, expended approximately $72,000,000 upon the construction and improvement of our waterways, which expenditure is made up as follows :

Cost of construction and enlargement of canals 1868-1906 and before Confederation.

Cost of construction, $39,728,801 ; cost of enlargement, $51,118,078; total cost, $90,846,879.

Expenditure—1868-1906 and before Confederation.

Capital, $90,846,879; income, $4,324,658; staff, $9,901,481; repairs, $7,864,260.

This makes a grand total of $112,937,278. Of this amount $20,692,244 was expended before confederation, $4,173,921 by the imperial government and $16,518,233 by the provincial government interested, leaving an amount of $71,552,880 for the expenditure of the Dominion government since confederation. The total revenue up to 1806 from the canals was $13,513,583. Now, Sir, I think this amount of $72,000,000 odd is comparatively small when we take into consideration some of the other canals to which I will refer later on. The canal system of Canada, taking into account the St. Lawrence and great lakes route, which is probably the principal route, has a depth of 14 feet and a mileage of 73§ miles. Let me give you a few figures concerning the Welland canal, as it may be taken as an example of our Canadian canal system. The total cost of construction to the 30th June, 1904, was $25,985,643. Of this amount $222,220 was contributed by the imperial government, $7,416,020 by the provincial government prior to confederation, leaving a balance of $18,347,403 as the amount expended since confederation. Of this last amount $795,735 represents renewals chargeable to income. This canal was opened in 1829 and was completed for 8-foot navigation in 1847. It was decided in 1871 to enlarge the canals of the St. Lawrence river system in order to afford a depth of 12 feet, but before this was completed it was decided to provide a minimum depth of 14 feet on the sills and all the locks were made 45 feet in width.

The locks of 270 feet in length are intended to pass lake steamers of 2,000 tons capacity. I will not cite to the House the figures which give the traffic through the Canadian canals for the years 1887 and 1903, these figures show an enormous increase in a period of sixteen years :

This table does not include several items such as salt, copper, silver ore, building stone and unclassified freights.

It will be noticed that in some of these items there has been a falling off in the traffic through the American canal, but in almost every case there has been an increase of traffic through the Canadian canal.

I wish now to give some statistics regarding some of the world's greatest ship canals, and I shall first take the Suez canal which is considered the most important example of a ship canal. The total length of this canal is 90 miles, about 60 miles of which is through shallow lakes. It is interesting to note that the number of vessels passing through the Suez canal annually does not equal the number passing through the canals connecting Lake Superior with the chain of great lakes at the south. The total excavation of the Suez canal amounted to 80,000,000 cubic yards under the original plan which gave a depth of 25 feet, but in 1895 the canal was enlarged to 31 feet depth bottom width, 108 feet, and surface width 420 feet, making the total excavation 100,000,000 cubic yards. The material excavated was principally sand, but in some cases strata of solid rock from 2 to 3 feet in thickness were met with. The total cost of the Suez canal was $100,000,000. The annual cost of maintenance and operation is somewhat high on account of the large amount of dredging which necessarily has to be done every year because of the drifting sand. The revenue of the canal, however, is apparently large in proportion to its cost. The report of the company for 1903 gives the net profit for the year at 65,579,347 francs, and the total amount distributed amongst the shareholders was 64,565,634 francs, or $12,461,167, or over 12 per cent on the estimated cost of $100,000,000.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Has my hon. friend the rate per ton on freight by the Suez canal?

Mr. WHITE. I am sorry to say that I have not. I take from the report of the Deep Waterways Commission, issued in January, 1897, the following comment on the Suez canal:

In 1869 occurred the opening of the Suez canal which brought the east into competition with western civilization by reducing a voyage of 6 to 8 months to 30 days, making it necessary to readjust ancient systems of distribution. A part of the effect of this rearrangement of the world's commerce upon the business of this country may be seen in the reductions of the freights upon grain about 75 per cent. The magnitude of commercial change or disturbance in reduction of value may be estimated from the fact that five years after the opening, the trade of India with foreign countries had so increased in volume as to employ an increase of 350,000 tons of steam shipping, an equivalent of 500,000 tons of sail.

Let us look for a moment at another canal —the Manchester ship canal. This canal has a total length of 35½ miles. Its dimensions are as follows: minimum width at the bottom, 120 feet; average width at water level, 175 feet, although in places the width is extended to 230 feet; minimum depth, 26 feet. The time required for navigating the canal is from 5 to 8 hours. The total excavation was 45,000,000 cubic yards, one-fourth of the material being sandstone. The total cost was $75,000,000.

I have some figures which I have taken from the report of the Department of Commerce and Labour of the United States, giving the annual average rates on wheat by lake and canal by lake and rail, and by all rail and the rates on flour by rail, from Chicago to New York; also the rates by steamship from New York to Liverpool. These figures cover the years from 1884 to 1904, but I will give only those for the years 1884, 1894 and 1904. The average rate in 1884 on wheat, by lake and canal, was 6·31 cents per bushel; by lake and rail, 9·95 cents; by all-rail 13·125 cents; from New York to Liverpool, 7 cents. On flour, the average rate per barrel, from Chicago to New York, all rail, was 45·53 cents. In 1894 the average rate on wheat by lake and canal was 4·44 cents; by lake and rail, 7 cents; by all-rail, 12·8 cents; from Chicago Liverpool, 2 cents. On flour, from Chicago to New York, the rate by all-rail was 42·93 cents. In 1904 the rate on wheat by lake and canal was 4·71 cents; by lake and rail, 5·02 cents; by all-rail, 11·11 cents from New York to Liverpool, 2·25 cents. This shows a remarkable decrease in the rates for canal and lake transportation.

Now, the Georgian bay canal is, in the estimation of many people one of the greatest national projects which has been proposed in Canada for a great many years. It is no new project, for we find that as far back as 1854 some work was done on the Culbute canal, which is on the route of the Georgian bay canal. My hon. friend from Nipissing (Mr. McCool) has pointed out a great many of the advantages which will accrue from the construction of this canal, and to a few of these I wish to refer. For example. Let us take two steamers leaving Chicago for the sea-board, one going by way of the Georgian bay canal, and the other by way of the great lakes and Buffalo. These steamers would run together as far as Sault Ste. Marie, and thence one goes by the Georgian bay canal, while the other continues down through the great lakes. Now, the distance from Chicago to Buffalo is approximately 900 miles, and the distance from Chicago to French river is 475 miles; so that when one ship is at the entrance of French river, the other is within 425 miles of its destination. Allowing for detention at the locks, we find that one vessel would be practically within fifty miles of Ottawa at the time the other had reached its destination at Buffalo. Now, assuming the rate from Chicago to Buffalo to be 1¼ cents a bushel, the cost to Ottawa or near Ottawa would be 1¼ cents a bushel. For the remaining 170 miles to Montreal, which it would take about 24 hours to cover, the rate would be approximately ¼ cent a bushel. Therefore grain could be delivered at Montreal, exclusive of course of canal tolls, for approximately 1½ cents a bushel. From Buffalo to the sea-board the cost is at least 3¼ cents a bushel. Therefore grain can be delivered at the sea-board at Montreal for 3 cents a bushel less than it can be taken to the Atlantic ports of the United States.

Now, Sir, I have looked very carefully into the report which was laid on the table of the House the other day. In that report the engineer has given some facts in very concise form regarding some of the advantages which this route affords. I am sorry to say that the report only gives us the approximate cost of the route as far as Lake Nipissing; but if the canal is to be built at all, I think it is the duty of the government to build the entire route. The approximate cost to North Bay, including the improvements there, for a depth of 22 feet is $13,700,589. The total number of locks on this route from Georgian bay to Montreal, according to the report, is twenty-seven, which is, I think, the number on the Welland canal.

As regards distances, I find that there is a very large saving by this route. From Fort William to Montreal, via the Georgian bay canal, the distance is 934 miles. From Fort William, via the Lake Erie and St. Lawrence canals, the distance is 1,216 miles, or a difference in favour of the proposed Georgian bay route over the other of 282 miles.

From Fort William to New York, via the Buffalo and Erie canal, the distance is 1,358 miles, showing a difference in favour of the Georgian bay canal of 424 miles.

From Fort William to Liverpool, via the Georgian bay canal route, the distance is 4,123 miles and via New York 4,929 miles, showing a difference of 806 miles in favour of the Georgian bay canal.

Another thing which has been pointed out is the fact that the time saved in making passages between the terminal points is a very important factor. We find in connection with this proposed route which will require only an artificial canalization of about 27·5 miles, that the time saved will be very great. In fact, the report claims for it advantages over all other existing routes in this respect.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. WHITE. When you left the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I was pointing out some of the advantages of this route as shown by the report which was laid on the table the other day. The hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. McCool) has pointed out that the total length of this waterway would be 440 miles; length of canal, including locks, 27·5 miles; length of improved channels, 55·5 miles; leaving a length of navigation of 357 miles. This means that about 81 per cent of the route is navigable, and will not require any artificial excavation whatever. It has also been shown that there is a considerable saving in time by this route. We find that there is a saving of two days as compared with the St. Lawrence route, which in my opinion would have some effect on transportation rates. Then it has also been shown that the geographical position gives another advantage. This route would be entirely within Canadian waters, and would be fed entirely by Canadian waters. It has also been shown that for transportation of perishable goods this route would be more favourable, on account of the latitude in which it will run. With regard to the water-powers, the report shows that between Georgian bay and Lake Nipissing there would be available about 25,000 horse-power. But this is an infinitesimal figure compared with the immense water-power which would be available between the height of land and the mouth of the Ottawa river, where it has been stated that there is anywhere between 500,000 and 1,000,000 horse-power available.

Now one of the objections which has been raised to this route is that the season of navigation would be considerably shorter than by the great lakes. But I find that the engineer has given some figures which go to show that there may possibly be a difference of two days in the date of the closing of this route compared with other routes. He points out, however, that by the use of a couple of steel-clad tugs it will be possible to keep Lake Nipissing open for several days after it would otherwise be closed by the ice. We find with regard to the Montreal harbour that the average date of opening, for the last ten years, has been April 27; the average date of closing for the same period, November 28; the length of the navigation season therefore would be 216 days. Local navigation generally closes about ten or fifteen days later. At Sault Ste. Marie we find the average date of opening is April 25; average date of closing. December 5; average length of navigation season, 224 days. In the French river harbour, the average date of opening is April 21; average date of closing, December 1; average length of navigation season, 224 days, exactly the same as at the Sault. At North Bay, the average date of opening is April 27; average date of closing varies from November 20 to December 1, leaving an average navigation season of from 208 to 219 days. The period of navigation for the rest of the route would be similar to that of North Bay. I know that our mills along the Ottawa, during the last two seasons, have been able to keep running up to the 1st of December.

This project has been before the country for a great many years. The present administration has been in power some twelve years, but we have not yet had any definite announcement as to the policy the present government intends to adopt regarding this important undertaking. I have here a letter which was written to the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier by the late Mr. Tarte. This letter is dated Ottawa, 22nd January, 1902, and was written a short time before Mr. Tarte resigned from the government. He explained his policy regarding transportation generally, having given considerable attention to the French river route. I will read what he says regarding this route:

I have often advocated before you the importance of the adoption of a policy by which the government would improve, without any delay, that splendid waterway, the French river, which flows from Lake Nipissing into the Georgian bay.

Then he gives a comparison of the distances:

	Miles.
Fort William to Buffalo	750
Fort William to North Bay	473
Difference in favour of North Bay.	277
Duluth to Buffalo	857
Duluth to North Bay	575
Difference in favour of North Bay.	283
Milwaukee to Buffalo	716
Milwaukee to North Bay	463
Difference in favour of North Bay.	253
Chicago to Buffalo	733
Chicago to North Bay	520
Difference in favour of North Bay.	213

That comparison would be sufficient, it sems to me, to impress upon the mind of any sound business man the immense advantages of that splendid route.

As you are aware, I made it a point to go over the waterway during the last summer in company with a party of engineers, and of Mr. C. A. McCool, M.P.

I am, to-day, in a position to lay on the council table a complete survey and plans of the work to be executed in the French river to make it a great thoroughfare, twenty feet deep all through.

The French river is essentially a navigable river. Its waters are deep. There are only, here and there, a few obstacles to overcome. There are no engineering difficulties in the way.

I make bold to say that, within two years, the Department of the Public Works could carry out the improvements necessary to make the French river a waterway navigable to the largest ships on the lakes. The cost of the improvements would be, I think, inside of five million dollars.

Lake Nipissing is to-day connected with Montreal, Three Rivers and Quebec by the Canadian Pacific Railway.

It is connected with Toronto by the Grand Trunk Railway.

The distance between North Bay and Montreal is 317 miles on a down grade, which makes it possible for the Canadian Pacific Railway to do what the New York Central does for Buffalo and New York, viz.: to carry immense freight trains behind their locomotives.

It goes without saying that as soon as the government has decided to improve the French river, the Canadian Pacific Railway would place themselves in a position to handle the additional quantity of traffic that will flow in that direction.

I have no doubt that the Grand Trunk would do the same thing in improving their line between Calender and Toronto.

Now, not only will our Canadian trade from the northwest be directed through that route, but it is beyond question that we will also receive a large traffic from Duluth, Chicago, Milwaukee and other American centres of trade.

Trade has no love. It follows the best and the cheapest ways.

It will be necessary, of course, to have on the lakes a greater number of Canadian bottoms. I have in my possession letters from navigation companies to the effect that they are prepared to supply an additional number of Canadian ships.

Our policy in declining to allow American ships to navigate into Canadian waters has greatly stimulated the ship-building industry.

Moreover, there is not the slightest doubt that the Canadian Pacific Railway would themselves build a new fleet of boats to grapple with the new state of affairs created by the improvement of the French river.

Lake Nipissing would become a great depot not only for grain but for merchandise of all kinds seking an outlet to European markets.

Toronto, Montreal, Three Rivers, Qubec, in the summer months, St. John, Halifax, in the winter months, would derive incalculable benefits from the improvement of the route I am now suggesting.

I do not know any better means of procuring cheap transportation than the carying out of that enterprise.

I know that there are people who say: let the Canadian Pacific Railway Company improve the French river. I do not think that a more unsound argument has ever been advanced.

It is the duty of the Canadian government to improve our Canadian waters, and, I will add, to remain in full possession and control of those.

It would be just as well to hand over to a private corporation our system of canals, or the St. Lawrence river, than to give control of the French river to private capitalists.

The Canadian people have a right to expect that the government will keep the waterways in their hands, so as to regulate the rates for all time, in the interest of the whole community.

A government can always build railways to compete against other railways.

A government cannot build rivers and waterways.

Speaking for myself, I say without hesitation, that I will never consent to encourage in any way a policy by which private individuals would get hold of such national waterways as the French river and the Ottawa river. I feel that we have made a mistake in granting a charter to private individuals, but, as without our financial co-operation, those people cannot do anything, there is no great harm done so far.

The improvements of the French river, between Georgian bay and Lake Nipissing, would be the first link of a great waterway between Georgian bay and the waters of the St. Lawrence, at Montreal.

Let us by all means have the courage of beginning that work without delay.

It is being contended that we should stand by our Canadian system of canals. There is trade for all the avenues that lead to the St. Lawrence—trade for canals, trade for the French river, trade for all the ports of the Georgian bay and on the lakes.

Nearly the whole of the trade goes to-day through American ports and through American railways.

Let us equip our harbours, our rivers, our railways, so as to not only keep our own trade, but to divert American trade from American centres which are tributaries of our own country, on account of our geographical position and natural advantages.

In conclusion Mr. Tarte said :

My advice, then, to you, my dear Mr. Premier, is that we should go ahead and not lose any more time in completing what I take the liberty to call our national organization as far as transportation is concerned.

I think that twenty million dollars, wisely spent, would achieve that great end.

Twenty million dollars represent, after all, but six hundred thousand dollars a year.

How many millions and millions would the improvement that I suggest bring to the Canadian people every year?

Why, the settlers in Manitoba and in the northwest alone would benefit much more than the interest on the money we should spend.

Any one who has the knowledge of the country fails to understand why we have not carried out, long ago, the policy that I am suggesting to-day.

From a party standpoint, I have no hesitation in saying that it would be the most popular policy that any government could have ever adopted.

From a national standpoint, such a policy seems to me an urgent necesity—viz., a duty that we are bound to perform.

Our American neighbours are making tremendous efforts to monopolize the control of the trade of this continent on land, on the lakes, and on the high seas.

If we do not act just now, we will fairly be open to the accusation of not having understood the situation, or of having neglected to defend the great interest that the electorate have entrusted to us.

Believe me,

Truly yours,

(Sgd.) J. ISRAEL TARTE.

Now, Sir, Mr. Tarte, according to this letter was entirely in favour of government ownership. I have here an extract from a speech made by the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) on the 15th April, 1903. The right hon. gentleman spoke to a motion introduced by Mr. Thomas Murray, late member for Pontiac, and similar to the motion of my hon. friend the member for Nipissing, now before the House. He said in part :

We are all aware that new methods of communication have been found, but nevertheless we know that undoubtedly one of the easiest and cheapest routes would probably be the canalizing of the Ottawa river. Whenever a company is prepared to approach the government asking for what I would call reasonable assistance, I think the government would be prepared to hear the application favourably and ask parliament for that reasonable assistance. But if my hon. friend Mr. Murray) expects that the government should assume such a gigantic work, I am not prepared to say that that subject has yet received such consideration as to enable me to answer in the affirmative. I do not think that at this moment the country is prepared to expect that the government should ask parliament to undertake this work out of its own resources. I rather think that the opinion is that it had better be left in the hands of private enterprise, &c., &c.

It is quite evident from this that the right hon. First Minister is in favour of building this great waterway by private enterprise. However, I hope that, before this debate is concluded, we will have an expression from him in regard to the policy which our government intends to adopt. Although the present administration has been in power for some twelve years, up to 1904, practically nothing was done in regard to this great work. On the eve of the general election, or about six weeks prior to the election, the government sent out a party of surveyors to line the Ottawa river from Mattawa to Pembroke and possibly between other points. These men were sent out to make a thorough survey of this route. They continued the work, I think, during the next season and then it was stopped. But we had a by-election in North Renfrew in 1906 and a few weeks before the by-election a number of men camped in front of the town and some one made inquiries as to what they were doing there.

They said they were surveying for the Georgian Bay ship canal, but a day or so after the election they disappeared and we have not seen or heard anything of them since. I would urge the government to take this matter up and to announce their policy upon it to the country. I have here an editorial from the Toronto 'Globe,' one of the government organs, which is worthy of attention. The 'Globe' on November 7, says editorially:—

The Georgian Bay Canal.

Information comes from Ottawa to the effect that the Georgian Bay Canal Company will apply at the coming session of parliament for legislation granting an extension of time for the commencement and completion of the canal system between the Georgian bay and Montreal. It may be proper enough to grant this extension if there is any reasonable prospect of the work being carried through by the company that now holds the franchise. If there is no such prospect, then it is better to refuse the extension and leave the course clear for some other arrangement to be made. If the canal is to be constructed at all, it can serve no useful purpose to keep it dangling as it has done for these many years.

The hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. McCool) referred to the fact that the deputy Minister of Railways and Canals has advocated the appointment of a commission to look into the feasibility of this route. I endorse what my hon. friend said, that if the government intend to appoint a commission they should have done that somewhat earlier, before undertaking the surveys and examinations that have been made.

The hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell) speaking at a Liberal convention in my constituency a few weeks ago referred in glowing terms to this Georgian bay route, and I hope that we will hear from him to-night.

It is to be regretted that such delay has occurred in the preparation of the final report upon this project. Last session on several occasions I asked the government when it would be presented. At first I was told it would not be brought down until the end of last January. Then on February 22, I was informed that the minister had not inquired lately regarding this report, but would let me know later on. On March 11 I received a letter from the acting minister to the effect that the report would probably be ready before the end of last session, but possibly not until May. On April 25, I again asked when the final report would be down and Mr. Fisher answered:

I hoped that they would be finished before the close of the session, but I am afraid now that they will not be finished before the end of June or July 1. There has been an enormous amount of work involved in working out the details.

I now find that the final report will not be down until the latter part of February or the first of March. When it is presented I am sure that it will contain facts which will convince the members of this House that this is a work which will have to be constructed within a very short time. From the statistics regarding this great waterway which I have been able to present to the House to-day it will be seen that this Georgian Bay ship canal when completed, will be one of the greatest waterways on the American continent. It is the duty of the government, in my opinion, to commence its construction at the earliest possible moment, no halfway measures should be adopted and if the government undertake to construct the canal they should construct it in its entirety.

I feel that I need not apologize to the House for detaining them with the details of such an important project. It is a matter of the utmost importance and it is my earnest hope that within a very short time this canal will be constructed from the mouth of the French river to Montreal.

Mr. R. J. WATSON (Parry Sound.) I was pleased indeed to hear the mover of this resolution (Mr. McCool) so elaborately describe this route. I am sure he must have devoted a great deal of study and thought to the preparation of the mass of facts and figures which he presented to the House this afternoon. I listened attentively to my hon. friend who last spoke (Mr. White) who also presented valuable information with reference to this great waterway. However, I take some exception to the last speaker's introduction of politics into the discussion of this project. While in one sense this is a political question, I do not think that politics should be considered in the discussion of this great waterway. I may say that we have had election after election in our country since and before this survey was commenced but I have not heard one word on the hustings or anywhere else about the Georgian bay canal as a political matter and it is strange to me if it has been brought into the political arena in his county.

The marvellous era of prosperity experienced by the Dominion during the last ten years has shown to the world that Canada is to be reckoned with seriously when comparing the progress of countries, and if the same wisdom and foresight is shown in the growing spirit, as has characterized the rule of the present administration, it would indeed be difficult to predict the bounds of our future development.

By a successful immigration policy the Liberal government has brought to our shores the proper class of labour with which to develop the vacant lands of the west; our immense timber areas are being drawn upon and are giving forth wealth; our great mineral resources are being aroused and utilized, and concurrently the opportunities of Canada as a manufacturing country are becoming known. This increased population and increased production—this phenomenal business activity—has very naturally necessitated increased transportation facilities, and it may truthfully be said that the question of transportation has assumed proportions of great magnitude.

Much has been done to date in the matter of furnishing adequate means wherewith to meet the demand, and at the present time in many parts of the country miles and miles of railway lines are being constructed —prominent among them the National Transcontinental—yet experience has surely demonstrated most conclusively that though worked, yes and overworked, railways cannot satisfactorily meet the requirements of a fast growing and ambitious young Dominion. Therefore, the solution of the transportation problem is not to be found in the railways alone, but in the railways and waterways together. Hence the reason of the present very timely discussion urging the development of the greatest natural waterway in the world, commonly called the Georgian Bay ship canal, which when completed would give to Canada a transportation route wholly within Canadian territory, to a Canadian port, from which would be marketed the products of our own west and also a portion of the products of the American west.

The mover of the resolution has traced the history of the different examinations, surveys and reports made intermittently of the Georgian bay and Ottawa river route; he has reminded the House that its construction has been a live question for half a century, and he also described in detail the location, route and distance of the project. Its feasibility from an engineering standpoint cannot be questioned. Some of the brightest minds in the engineering profession have long ago pronounced it entirely feasible, and from the interim reports to be found in the Public Works annual blue book, as well as the lengthy article foreshadowing the publication of the final report of the present survey, which appeared in an Ottawa paper, there can be no doubt that the matter now simply depends on the attitude of the government, and on their decision the realization or frustration of the hopes of those truly interested in securing for Canada the key to the transportation problem.

In the discussion of the merits of the Georgian bay ship canal, it must at the outset be distinctly understood that the question is not a local one, but one of national importance. The great benefit its construction will be to the Georgian bay and Parry Sound district, or the French river and Ottawa valley, or the lower St. Lawrence and Montreal, must not prejudice the opinion of those constituencies not so favourably situated, because criticisms offered on the grounds that benefits will accrue to only a certain portion of the country would be criticism not fairly considered. Nor must the waterway be thought of as a mere 'canal' to be compared with, for instance, the Welland. Instead the Georgian bay ship canal, as proposed, would be a national highway to accommodate large lake freighters, boats of from 4,000 to 10,000 tons, carrying the products of the Northwest to the Atlantic via the shortest and cheapest route. It would tend to increase interprovincial trade, make possible the development of our mineral and other resources by cheap carrying of coal from the eastern mines, create new manufacturing and distributing centres and add to the traffic seeking transportation of railways. With the advantages in distance, in time and in rates, pointed out by the hon. member for Nipissing, the proposed waterway would be assured of an enormous traffic, measured only by our shipping interests and those of our southern neighbours. It is sometimes said that the Georgian bay canal scheme has been before the public for many years and nothing has come of it, but the same can be said of many great enterprises which have finally. After many years of agitation, been taken up and carried to completion. The Panama canal is one example.

After years of talk, delay and some work, the United States government have earnestly grappled the problem and are carrying it to completion, as I earnestly hope this government will in the immediate future undertake and carry to a successful finish the construction of the Georgian bay canal. But in regard to the question having been before the public for a long time, it is well to remember that eminent men on both sides of politics, and in the commercial world, have either advocated or expressed their belief in the importance of the waterway. The late Alexander Mackenzie once said :

I am perfectly satisfied that the Ottawa valley presents the greatest facilities of any route upon the continent for the transportation of the products of the Northwest to the Atlantic ocean.

Sir John A. Macdonald expressed this opinion :

The Ottawa ship canal and the Pacific railway must be constructed, and no voice would be raised against the great natural work, which would open the western states and colonies to the seaboard.

In 1898 a special committee of the Senate made an important investigation during which Sir William Van Horne spoke most favourably, also Messrs. Shanley, Bell and Clarke, the three last engineers prominent in the profession; also Mr. S. A. Thompson, of Duluth, at that time one of the greatest authorities upon waterways in America; also Mr. Ormond Higman, chief Dominion electrician, who gave expert evidence on the power development. Mr. H. K. Wickstead, C.E., who had been over the work and studied it fully, spoke most eulogistically of the scheme. That this gentleman is still of the same opinion is seen by some recent utterances of his. Mr. Redford, another well known engineer, lately declared that the construction of this canal would mean a great saving to every western wheat grower. The late Hon. Mr. Tarte was always an earnest advocate of the waterway, having personally, when Minister of Public Works, made a trip in company with his engineers over the whole route. The present honoured leader of the government has always spoken of the Georgian bay ship canal as one of his fondest hopes and even at the recent colonial conference in England he said that Canada had to build this great work. Different members of the cabinet on several occasions, when expressing personal opinions, have roused enthusiastic cheers from their hearers by referring to the possibility of the early construction of the French river and Ottawa waterway. Many members of the opposition, among them the leader, have given utterance to favourable opinion toward the project. The newspapers of the country from end to end never cease urging the government to commence the work. Recognized leaders of transportation companies wonder why no move is made in this direction; Mr. James J. Hill, truly a master mind on transportation, said not very long ago that the greatest boon from a commercial standpoint that could be conferred upon the Dominion would be the consummation of the much-talked of Georgian bay canal. Mr. Hill said :

Nature did about all she could for you when she pierced the continent with the St. Lawrence, the Ottawa and the lakes, and to utilize this great boon you must do your share. If you did that you would soon have a continuous waterway, from Quebec or Montreal to the head of lake Superior. With that great enterprise consummated you would send all your wheat from the head of Superior to Quebec for 3 cents per bushel. With a six or seven cent rate from the prairies to the lakes the cost of transporting your grain to Liverpool and other British ports would be reduced to a minimum.

All the foregoing I submit without comment, for comment is surely unnecessary in the face of so many convincing facts to show the great mass of public opinion favourable to the construction of this project. The Georgian Bay ship canal about 440 miles in length itself would be the shortest possible route from the head of the lakes, that is both American and Canadian ports, to the Atlantic seaboard. Without entering a detailed statement of comparison of distances in round figures the proposed route would be some 280 miles shorter than via the St. Lawrence, besides eliminating the wearisome and expensive transport. Port Colborne, some 420 miles, is the distance in favour of the proposed route over the Buffalo and Erie canal, besides avoiding the transfer at Buffalo, also expensive and the cause of much delay. Via the proposed waterway a boat will make the journey from the head of navigation to Montreal without a single delay or transfer of cargo in 5 days and the return trip in 5 days. Allowing time at terminals for discharge, loading and clearing, the round trip should be made in 12 or 15 days, effecting a very great saving in time over existing routes. What is more, no other route can ever expect to equal this speed.

Thus we have two most important advantages in favour of the proposed waterway. Rates are the next consideration. Canada cannot compete with the United States under existing conditions, and so does not receive even a fair share of the freight business. In the matter of wheat 130,000,000 bushels went by Buffalo last year. Season after season the grain crop of the Canadian Northwest is growing, having doubled in the five years 1900-1905. It is generally believed that in the near future the yield will total 200,000,000 bushels in wheat. This, with the other grains, also increasing their yield with great rapidity, will mean an enormous crop to handle. To export it via an all-Canadian route through a Canadian port, and to capture a large portion of the American yield, is what the Georgian bay ship canal will accomplish by furnishing the lowest possible rates.

The rate for the past five years on wheat from upper lake ports via Buffalo to the Atlantic was about 6·71 cents per bushel, including all elevator and transfer charges. Bushel after bushel of Canadian wheat went from Fort William and Port Arthur at this rate through the American channel. We lost the profits of carriage and in many cases our products lost their distinctive national character, which after all is their chief claim to excellence.

What rate can the Georgian bay and Ottawa river route through the port of Montreal quote ? This waterway will carry grain for the low rate of 2·62 cents per bushel from upper lake points to Montreal ; this rate of course to include detention and elevating at sea-board. The rate for transportation alone would be the exceedingly low figure of 1·50 cents per bushel. Basing the charge at 2·60 cents gives a gratifying difference in favour of the proposed route over the American of 4·09 cents per bushel. When it is considered that American shippers say that if the Buffalo rate is beaten by ¼ of a cent per bushel, traffic would follow, the amount of business in store for the Canadian route, and incidentally the port of Montreal, is easily imagined.

The facts and figures of the money expended and the money earned in the annual movement of the wheat crop are too well known and surely appreciated by this House to require any elaborate explanations or quotations to impress upon our minds the magnitude of the proposition, and what great effect the securance of its transportation must mean. Trade will seek the shortest and cheapest route, a reduction of ¼ of a cent per bushel effecting large deviations. Therefore what counter argument can be offered, what protest can be raised, against the immediate development of a route which will give a reduction of 4·09 cents per bushel over existing lines? No argument can be advanced except a specious one, no protest can be raised except the empty opposition of persons bespeaking the imaginary advantages of some local scheme.

Then, taking as accepted the assurity of the wheat transportation, there is to be considered the local and return traffic the construction of this waterway through the French, Ottawa and St. Lawrence rivers must naturally create. While definite statistics cannot be stated it is certain the waterway would make possible the establishment of new and flourishing industries along its entire route, which industries would furnish large quantities of freight to be transported east and west. The many magnificent water-powers will create a cheap and abundant supply of power.

An important point here suggests itself, that is, the benefit the waterway will be to the railways which must carry to its harbours and docks products from inland. There is no doubt many staple commodities manufactured or sold by the merchants of the eastern and central parts of Canada would be shipped to the farmer in the west via the proposed route, and carrying these to the boats must furnish business to the railways. This also must mean the development of ports and the growth of important towns along the whole route.

A district rich in mineral wealth, but now lying idle, would be opened and settled, and by cheap transportation of coal from the mines of Nova Scotia the smelting of iron ore would be made possible. Canada on account of its illimitable resources is bound to become one of the greatest, if not the greatest metallurgical country in the world, and the construction of this waterway is one of the ways in which expansion of the iron industry will be made possible. Then, too, it would reduce the price of domestic coal throughout Ontario and Quebec, by allowing the cheap importation of Nova Scotia coal, and so rid a long-suffering people from the monopolistic influence of strong American corporations.

The Ottawa valley and French river districts have ever been renowned for their abundance of forest wealth ; so this phase of development, which the water-way would materially help, I need but mention. The pulp industry, now becoming so important, would find tributary to the proposed route the very finest and most suitable material. The quality of pulp now manufactured in Canada is of a very high order, but the quantity is small. In the proposed canal we have the means of expanding and making of importance in the markets of the world, a profitable Canadian product. I have travelled over this route about fifteen times, from the mouth of the French river to Lake Nipissing, during the fifteen years that I have been in that country. Pulpwood forests extend for miles back from that river, so that on a rough estimate I will venture to say that we have some 200,000,000 cords of spruce wood tributary to this water-way. This gives some idea of what a great advantage it would be in that respect alone.

Thus we see that the construction of the Georgian bay ship canal can be productive of nothing but enormous benefit to Canada. In a short time it is expected that the report of the thorough and comprehensive engineering survey under the direction of the Public Works Department will be presented to the government, and I suppose to this House. Occasionally, of late, the press has given the probable estimate of the cost, but this is mere guesswork. Until the report is completed and made public, authentic figures are not possible; therefore to discuss in detail an estimate of exact cost would be unsatisfactory. The cost will be in the millions of dollars.

Immediately upon the presentation of the report giving estimate of cost, so that contracts can be let, the government should undertake the work. With regard to another commission being appointed, the only commission I would ask this House to consider is one I will deal with a little later on.

However, if His Majesty's advisers do not feel that the whole proposition can just at present be undertaken, by all means, make a start on the upper end, and construct that portion giving direct water communication from upper lake ports via the Georgian bay and French river to Callender or North Bay, there making connection with the rail routes to Montreal. The water route would be an all-Canadian one, connecting with a Canadian railroad to a Canadian port of export. At Callender there is one of the finest natural harbours in the world. It is situated on the line of the Grand Trunk Railway, about seven miles south of North Bay; it is a promising little town, with large lumber mills and other industries. The harbour has a depth of about thirty feet all over and is about a mile wide. I am a little surprised that the harbour of Callender is not mentioned in the report which has been brought down. I have traversed this river fifteen or sixteen times from the mouth of Georgian bay to Lake Nipissing. I am quite familiar with it and I have gathered some information with regard to French river harbour from which this great waterway will start. This section of the proposed canal originates on French river harbour on the north shore of the Georgian bay. This harbour is formed by one of the several indications peculiar to the rocky formation of the Georgian bay. It has an average width of 500 feet with a depth of about 30 feet except at some points where islands or pinnacles of rock rise out which would require to be moved to allow of deep water navigation.

Mr. HAGGART. What did you say the depth was ?

Mr. WATSON. Thirty feet. I must say that without any exception this French river harbour is perhaps one of the best harbours on the Georgian bay except Parry Sound. It is sheltered from gales and high winds, is easy of access for craft entering the canal, and is perfectly safe for from five to six miles out in the bay. About three miles from the mouth of the French river are the Rustard islands which protect the harbour from heavy winds which otherwise would have full sweep across the lake. The channel from outside the Bustard islands is well protected by range lights.

Mr. BRODEUR. How many islands are there ?

Mr. WATSON. About fifteen or sixteen near Bustard island. During the season of navigation large vessels such as the 'City of Midland,' drawing from 12 to 15 feet call at the mouth of the French river, and their officers tell me it is one of the best stopping places along that route. The French river from its source at Lake Nipissing to its outlet on the Georgian bay passes through a rocky country and its course is a succession of wide and deep expansions, and narrow stretches, often dividing it into several branches. It reaches the waters of the Georgian bay by three main branches, the western, the eastern, and the middle outlets. Leaving French river harbour, at about one and a half miles from its mouth, the route selected follows the middle branch of the river as far as the eastern end of Ox lake, a distance of about seven miles. From there the canal line leaves the main French river to follow the Pickerel river for a distance of 17½ miles. I might say that there is a projected railway line which we hope will be built in the near future running from Burk's Falls to Cantiss island across the Pickerel river just at this particular place, and you can easily see what an advantage it would be to have the canal in connection with this railway. The distance from the Georgian bay to open water on Lake Nipissing by the route above described is 63 miles and the distance across Lake Nipissing is about 18 miles, the total distance from the Georgian bay to North Bay being therefore 81 miles. Should the government see its way clear to commence the upper end of this great waterway it could be shortened very materially by making the terminus at Callender instead of North Bay. I do not take any objection to the terminus being at North Bay, but when you have a natural harbour such as Callender within easy access of the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway, and when you would, according to the estimate, save $1,000,000 by making the terminus at Callender you can easily see what an advantage it would be. Callender and North Bay are only some seven miles apart; the Canadian Pacific Railway runs within four and a half miles of Callender and the Grand Trunk passes through the town. Leaving French river harbour the main breaks in the waterway occur at Les Dalles rapids, Horse Shoe falls, Five Mile rapids and Chaudière falls. Between these waters there are some wide and deep navigable stretches but narrows between high rocky walls with sharp turns occasionally occur necessitating heavy work of widening and rectification for large navigation. To render this section of the proposed waterway navigable for boats drawing 19 to 20 feet, it is proposed to create three reaches by means of locks and dams giving a channel 22 feet deep throughout and from 250 to 300 feet in width. Ascending from the Georgian bay the first lock will be below Les Dalles rapids about one mile from the mouth of the harbour, with a lift of 22 feet. The next lock will be 37 miles further up the river at the foot of the Five Mile rapids with a lift of 24 feet. The third lock will be located 13½ miles above the Chaudière falls, also with a lift of 24 feet, making a total amount of 70 feet from the Georgian bay. What I want to point out is that in building this section there are only three locks or three lifts to contend with in the whole 81 miles. I notice by looking at the report that to build a harbour with docks from the shore out into the lake at North Bay, would mean an expense of over a million dollars. The report says that on account of the shallowness of the water at the port of North Bay, you have to dredge and deepen out some two miles before ships can land there, and, by making the terminus at Callender, as I have already described, you would save one million dollars. I know there are a great many hon. gentlemen who want to speak on this question and I do not wish to take up much more of your time, but I would like to say a word in regard to the building of this water-way. It is a project of great national importance. I will not say that I am not locally interested in this project, because the French river runs through the district of Parry Sound which I have the honour to represent. But if the government are not inclined to undertake the whole route at once, I would urge them strongly to commence and build the upper part of it. Now, comparing the rates of this special proposition with Buffalo we have the following :—

Upper lake ports of Buffalo, the rate is 1¼ cents per bushel on wheat, and from Buffalo to the Atlantic, 3½ cents per bushel, making the total rate exclusive of elevating, of 4¾ cents per bushel. The rate from the lake ports to Calender would be 1¾ cents per bushel, and railway haulage thence to Montreal, 2½ cents per bushel : total 3¾ cents per bushel. This is also exclusive of elevating. So we have a reduction of 1 cent per bushel. In making this comparison the lowest rates for wheat known on the lakes are used. But taking, for instance, 1906, when the rate went as high as 2½ cents per bushel between Chicago and Buffalo, the advantage in favour of the Georgian bay and French river to Callender is more easily appreciated.

However I mention this as but a final appeal and not as the main proposition now under discussion, which can be considered only as one of national importance, and even of imperial value. I do not need to say very much about the lower end of this route, because I am not very familiar with it. But I think it can undoubtedly be shown that the lower end of the route can be more easily constructed than the upper end. I consider this waterway is one of national importance as a highway connecting the widely separated portions of the Dominion of Canada, and opening up profitable commercial and industrial operations. It is the link, the necessary link, in the shortest and cheapest possible highway between the abundant wheat fields of our glorious Canadian Northwest and the attractive markets of Great Britain.

Mr. H. J. LOGAN (Cumberland). I have been twelve years a member of this House of Commons, and every year this great project has been the subject of debate. It seems to me that we owe a good deal to the hon. gentlemen who have debated this question for the instruction which they have given us, and perhaps in some cases the conversions they have made. For fear this debate might be considered as one affecting the Ottawa valley alone, I would like, as a representative of the far east, to speak my mind upon the question, and I shall endeavour not to weary the House by speaking at length. I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that this question is not merely local, affecting this part of Canada alone, but it is one of the greatest national questions now before the country. The question of transportation is always important, and in Canada that question goes to the very root of our national life. We have spent hundreds of millions of dollars in this country, largely for one purpose, the carrying of Canadian goods through Canadian channels. For this purpose among others we built the Canadian Pacific Railway; in fact this has been one of the chief purposes of all the great transportation schemes of this country; it is one of the chief purposes in the construction of this proposed Georgian bay canal. I am not going to weary the House to-night by quoting at length opinions in reference to this matter, because I consider that the speech of the hon. member for Nipissing, this afternoon has given this House and this country so much information, and given it with so many details that it is unnecessary for me to go into this question very minutely. I would like however to quote the remarks of a few eminent men whose opinions will be considered of value by this House. Sir John A. Macdonald, before the Canadian Pacific Railway was built, used the following language :—

The Ottawa ship canal and the Canadian Pacific Railway must be constructed.

He put the Ottawa ship canal even before the Canadian Pacific Railway, and stated on his authority as Prime Minister of Canada that the Ottawa ship canal must be constructed. Then we find Mr. Alexander Mackenzie, belonging to the other side of politics, saying :

I am perfectly satisfied that the Ottawa valley presents the greatest facilities of any route on this continent for the transportation of the products of the northwest to the Atlantic ocean.

We have had President Roosevelt quoted here to-day in regard to the betterment of the canal systems in the United States, and his remarks must possess great interest to the people of Canada at the present time. Sir William Van Horne, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, in discussing this question of the Ottawa and Georgian bay canal before a committee of this House, used the following language :

I am of opinion that the construction of the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian bay canal will benefit the commerce of the Dominion generally. Anything done to lessen the cost of transportation between Manitoba and the northwest and the seaboard must have unquestionably a beneficial effect. The trade of this canal would chiefly be in grains, food products and mineral and other products; and the water-power it would afford would result in the establishment of important industries all along its course in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. This canal would greatly increase the trade of Montreal, Quebec and other Canadian seaports. It would also develop local resources by the utilization of the water-powers it would afford. And, by cheapening transportation, this canal would have a good effect on the Canadian Pacific Railway, as it would create more traffic than it could take.

Mr. Walter Stanley, a very distinguished engineer testifying before a committee of the House of Commons, endorsed the project and stated :

Six-sevenths of the trade of western Canada was passing out through United States channels, while we only retained one-seventh. This condition could be reversed.

Curtis Clark, ex-president of the American Society of Civil Engineers, in writing a letter to a gentleman of Ottawa whose name will always be connected with this great project, and whose perseverance and industry we all admire, I mean Mr. McLeod Stewart, after endorsing the project generally, spoke of the waterways, and went on to say :

I say as an engineer that there is no place in any other civilized country, even Niagara not excepted, where there is such an amount of water-power available for electrical purposes as here, and it can be used over and over again.

These are the opinions of men distinguished in Canadian public life in transportation companies and engineering works. The United States Deep Waterways Commission investigation in 1896, refer to this system of inland navigation as the shortest route between terminals.

The 'Engineering News,' one of the most distinguished engineering periodicals in the world, says :

From an engineering point of view, disregarding for the moment political boundaries, there can be no doubt that the Ottawa route is by far the best for a deep waterway from the upper lakes to the sea. We respectfully submit to the New York barge canal promoters the question how their barge canal could hope to compete. Indeed we may take the question as a broader one and ask how any route to the sea which requires transhipment could possibly compete with a route which takes freight on board a steamer at upper lake ports and delivers it at tide water without breaking bulk.

These are eminent opinions from eminent authorities.

There are a number of reasons why in my humble opinion this great work should be undertaken.

1. It will be the shortest water route to the sea.

2. It will need less canalling than any other route which is being considered to-day. According to the latest reports it will need only from 27 to 29 miles of canal work. The St. Lawrence waterway contains 71 miles of canal and in the Erie waterway there are 351 miles of canal.

3. It would be the quickest route. The Erie route takes 192 hours, the St. Lawrence 138 hours, as compared with 103 hours on the Ottawa and Georgian bay.

4. It would be the safest route; it would be landlocked all the way and would be an absolutely all-Canadian route.

5. It is the best route from a climatic standpoint. It has been urged against this route that it runs through a country with an exceedingly cold winter climate. The fact of the cold winter can be well offset by the climate in summer. If perishable goods were sent out by, say the Mississippi route, in summer they would be destroyed whereas they would go through this canal and reach the English markets in good condition.

6. It would carry Canadian trade through Canadian channels. I am sure some of us must have been surprised this afternoon when my hon. friend from Nipissing (Mr. McCool) gave us the figures of the amount of wheat produced in Canada which is shipped through United States ports. I was surprised when he said that last year over 24,000,000 bushels of Canadian grain was shipped out through American ports as against 15,000,000 or 16,000,000 through the port of Montreal ; that through Boston alone over 9,000,000 bushels of Canadian grain were shipped to the old country; that through Portland there was shipped 6,249,461 bushels and considerable quantities through New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore. While these great quantities of Canadian grain were passing through American ports many Canadian ports were for the time idle.

7. My seventh reason—and to me, living in Nova Scotia, this is a very important one—is the fact that it will open up the coal markets of Ontario and perhaps the west, and to this phase of the subject I propose to devote a little time. We have in Nova Scotia coal deposits, estimated away up into the hundreds of millions of tons, estimated as a billion tons of marketable coal, and yet up to the present time we have not got our output much above the 5,000,000 tons mark per year. This is a paltry amount compared with the output of Pennsylvania. Why does this condition of affairs exist? I am sure the answer will come to me by those who know the facts that our market is limited, that we are confined within a small circle. On one side we are up against the American tariff and on the other side we look out towards the broad Atlantic with prohibitive freight rates; while on this side at the city of Montreal, the door of navigation is locked to us and we cannot get into the province of Ontario, the great market for coal in the Dominion of Canada. So long as our market is thus limited, so long will the output of coal in Nova Scotia be maintained at a comparatively small figure, and so long must the present duty on American coal be maintained.

We have in that province only two hopes for an outside market; one is the United States market, which does not look as if it were going to be opened to us, and the other is the market of this great province of Ontario—and this is the more welcome market to the Canadians who are handling the coal trade. We can and do send coal into the city of Montreal by water from Cape Breton. We are not only able to compete with American coal in Montreal, but to control the market in that city, but there we are stopped because there our vessels stop, and anything that will open navigation so than our steamers can get up not only to the city of Montreal, but on to the west, would tend to increase the market for our coal and is bound to make the coal industry in the province of Nova Scotia much more important.

There is consumed in this province probably 4,000,000 or 5,000,000 tons per year, or equal to all that is raised in Nova Scotia, and yet of this amount we sell but a paltry few hundred tons. The province of Ontario to-day, patriotic as it is, is using only coal mined in United States collieries, raised by United States miners.

The claim I make is that if this canal were constructed to the depth proposed, Nova Scotia coal would be delivered as advantageously to interior points in Ontario by it as American coal can be taken to those points from Lake Erie and other United States ports and I propose to prove that. The average lake rate on coal from Lake Erie ports to Lake Huron and Georgian bay ports to-day is 35 cents per ton; the average rate to Lake Superior points is 40 cents per ton. The average rail rate from the mines in Pennsylvania to, say, Cleveland, 140 miles, is 78 cents per ton, making a through rate from the colliery to Lake Huron and Georgian bay ports and other markets further west of $1.13 and $1.18 per ton respectively. From Cleveland to Fort William by water is a distance of 800 miles and the freight rate for that distance is 40 cents per ton. From Sydney to Fort William by the Ottawa and Georgian bay canal route would be 1,697 miles. Apply the same rate per ton, according to the number of miles, from Sydney to Fort William as is given to-day from Cleveland to Fort William and you will find that coal can be placed in Fort William from Sydney at a rate of 85 cents per ton as against $1.18 from United States mines, or a difference, Mr. Speaker, in favour of Nova Scotia coal of 33 cents per ton. Now, some one may say that a rate of 85 cents is ridiculous. Perhaps it is, but if it is ridiculous then the rate between Cleveland and Fort William to-day is ridiculous. Then, if you consider that 85 cents is too small a rate make it a dollar a ton and still you can bring coal raised from the ground and dumped into the vessels, without any rail haul, from Sydney to Fort William for 18 cents a ton less than at the present time it is conveyed from the mines of Pennsylvania via the lake ports of Fort William. And, mark you, on top of this advantage of 18 cents a ton which we have on the dollar rate, there is a duty of 53 cents per ton which would give the Nova Scotia mines a preference in the markets of the western lakes of 18 cents plus 53 cents, making 71 cents in all over American coal. But the probabilities are that it could put coal into the western ports by this canal and thus enlarge our market the demand for the province of Ontario would be made in all probability to cut the duty on coal in half. If you cut the duty on coal in half you would save to the people of this province half the interest on the capital cost of the Georgian bay canal route in duty alone. The province of Ontario to-day is paying from $2,500,000 to $3,000,000 per year in duty on coal. If it could be made possible by the construction of this Ottawa and Georgian bay canal route to cut that amount in half you are saving from $1,250,000 to $1,500,000 per year to the province of Ontario, and that will more than half pay the interest upon the whole cost of this great work through the French river and down to the city of Montreal.

I know, of course, that there may be and would be undoubtedly some toll charges on the canal, but we must remember that we would carry that coal from Sydney to Fort William without breaking bulk, whereas coal brought from the United States mines has to be taken out of the cars at Cleveland, or at some other lake port, and put into the ship, that it has to be transhipped, whereas we would not have to break bulk during the whole voyage from Sydney.

If we had such a service between Sydney and Fort William, for instance, and intervening ports, it would mean return cargoes, which would be beneficial to us in the maritime provinces, particularly in Sydney. It would mean return cargoes of iron ore which is needed, which is useful, to the great steel works at Sydney and North Sydney. It would mean that in Nova Scotia we could have established large flour mills for the grinding of wheat into flour for the consumption of our people, because we could bring the wheat direct in return cargoes from Fort William to Sydney.

For these reasons I, for one, representing a constituency in the far east, am in favour of this project if it can be completed for a reasonable amount. I am in favour of it as a whole, and I do not think we should undertake the French river section only. I do not believe in doing a great national work by piecemeal. It is a project which is big and should be undertaken in the interest of the whole Dominion at large. It will be beneficial to all parts of the country, it will make trade easier between different parts of Canada, it will be one more link in the chain which binds this country together, it will mean an increased interchange of trade between Ontario and the maritime provinces. It will mean, to my mind a work which will be beneficial to all parts of Canada, and particularly so to the province of Ontario and the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. GERALD H. BRABAZON (Pontiac). Mr. Speaker, I have followed with close attention and with deep interest in the discussions which have taken place from time to time while I have had the honour of a seat in this House on the all important question of transportation, and in view of the splendid array of facts and figures which has been presented to the House this afternoon by my hon. friend from Nipissing (Mr. McCool) I am more firmly convinced than ever that the only practicable solution of the question of transportation is the opening up of this great waterway that has been provided in the interior of our country from the great lakes to Montreal. This scheme has been before the country for upwards of half a century and there has never been any great objection to it that I am aware of. Indeed, in the first place, it was very favourably looked upon as a possible means of diverting the trade of the great lakes from New York to Montreal, and no reason obtained for it then that does not with ten fold force, obtain now owing to the rapid increase of population and production in the great Canadian west, and if the millions of acres of fertile agricultural lands of that country which still remain to be ploughed fulfil the prophecy which has been made for them, then I think I might say without hesitation that even if the Grand Trunk Pacific were an accomplished fact and if we had another transcontinenal railway to assist the splendid system of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Canadian Northern and all the other channels of transportation, yet we would in all probability fall short of the required transportation facilities to adequately handle the enormous and ever increasing traffic between the two great sections of our country. But, with the magnificent natural facilities we possess we should be able to improve our transportation system to such an extent as to prevent any of our Northwest harvest which leaves Fort William and Port Arthur for the sea-board from being transhipped at Buffalo, or some other American port, to be sent over an American line to New York. What every patriotic Canadian hopes for is that Canadian products may be carried through Canadian channels to Canadian seaports and that whatever profit there is to be obtained from exporting them to foreign markets may be secured to this country.

Now, Sir, to accomplish this much to the desired end, we want the shortest and cheapest water route and this we have at our very door in the French and Ottawa river route with its chain of rivers and lakes forming a great natural waterway from the Georgian bay to Montreal which is admittedly the best and shortest route from the great lakes to the Atlantic and which is practically without the disadvantage inherent to an artificial canal. The immense advantage of this waterway over all others as a freight carrier from the great lakes to the Atlantic has been pointed out time and again. It is a well known fact that traffic will follow the lines of least resistance, and trade seeking the cheapest route would naturally flow through this channel, and none will deny that the reduction of freight rates which would undoubtedly follow the construction of this waterway would result in increasing the price of wheat to the farmers of the Northwest. The late Hon. Mr. Tarte, who was one of the most progressive ministers of the Liberal administration, had unbounded faith in this waterway, and he urged upon the Prime Minister and his colleagues in the strongest possible way the necessity of pushing the work to completion with the least possible delay. It is sometimes said that the day of canals is over and that waterways cannot any longer compete with railroads. But let me quote some striking evidence to controvert that proposition, which was brought forward at a meeting of the British Chambers of Commerce, and which shows the vast superiority of facilities afforded by canals for inland transportation in continental European countries :

No less than $90,000,000 of Prussia's public funds have been expended during twenty-three years in canalizing rivers and in cutting canals from the large rivers to the great cities. A further expenditure of $70,000,000 on the same object is projected. As it is, Germany possesses almost nine thousand miles of navigable inland waters. France, in the seven years following the war with Germany, devoted nearly $50,000,000, and has since allotted nearly $50,000,000 more, to the construction of canals free from tolls. Extensions contemplating an additional sum of $110,000,000 are contemplated. There are now in France three thousand miles of canals and upwards of seven thousand miles of navigable rivers, many of which have been canalized. The extent to which the Hollander profits from his innumerable canals is well known. Less familiar is the fact that Belgium also is applying many millions of dollars to the development of a system of inland water transportation. Austria is about to construct four canals, aggregating 1,040 miles in length, to link the Oder, Elbe, Dniester and Danube. Italy has under way in her northern provinces a network of canals which will have a collective length of 2,122 miles.

This should be sufficient proof that the day of canals is yet only in its infancy. I might also quote what was said by Mr. J. J. Hill, who is looked upon as one of the foremost transportation authorities in this country. In a speech delivered some time ago before the Merchant's Club of Chicago, Mr. Hill said :

Canada has already one transcontinental railway system. Others will soon be added. It has a system of waterways which is justly its pride. On this it has spent nearly $100,000,000. The St. Lawrence canal system furnishes 43 miles of artificial channel to re-inforce river and lake. The Welland canal completes the chain. The most ambitious project, and one in which every lake city has a stake, is the proposed canal from Lake Huron to the St. Lawrence river direct. Engineers have examined the scheme and pronounced it feasible. This ship canal would extend from Georgian bay by way of Lake Nipissing and the Mattawa and Ottawa rivers, reducing the distance from Georgian bay to Montreal to 430 miles. This is nearly 300 miles less than the present route by way of Lake Erie and the St. Lawrence river.

What would it mean to Chicago were such a canal constructed with a depth of 20 feet, as planned, so that vessels could load at your docks and sail direct for Montreal or Quebec, bringing ocean-going ships practically as near the upper lakes and the west as Buffalo is now.

Your packing-house products could be loaded in Chicago on specially constructed ships, and sent direct to any ocean port in the world. Your grain could be delivered at Montreal or Quebec for little more than it now costs to Buffalo. Can any practical mind fail to grasp the vast possibilities waiting upon harmonious action upon both sides of this boundary line which worries and taxes commerce now, but which will not for ever defeat or impede it?

To-day's Toronto 'Globe' has an interesting article on this question, which contains many truths and which I may be permitted to put on record :

The interim report of the Georgian bay canal survey emphasizes the great value of this entirely Canadian highway from the lakes to tidewater. Nature has been generous in the construction of this route, and its long stretches of navigable water are among the Dominion's most valuable assets. These stretches are a sufficient depth for the largest vessels on the upper lakes, and once they are connected by canal construction there will be a water route from Port Arthur and Fort William to Montreal no more circuitous than the average route by rail on this continent. the chief advantage of a water highway is that it must always remain open to free competition and thus effectually regulate railway rates. When the crowding of freight forces rates up the tramp vessels come from all parts of the world, not only relieving the congestion, but preventing any disorganization of trade by unexpected loss or delay. It is for this reason that canals should always be kept open as public highways. The public gain by them as by the ordinary roads.

A privately-owned canal would become a monopoly as certainly as did the first railways established as privately-owned highways. The members of a canal company could also organize a ship company and could make fees so high that the ships would be unprofitable. All their profits would be obtained through the canal, and there would be no competition from other ships. That is one of many devices by which a privately-owned canal could get rid of the valuable feature of perpetually competitive transportation. The Dominion has done well in promoting and perfecting inland water transportation, and it would not do to introduce politically deleterious influences by creating competitive private and public waterways. But the great value of these navigable water stretches prevents the possibility of their ever passing out of the hands of the Dominion. It is estimated that the French river section will cost about $13,700,000. That is, roughly estimated, about one year's federal surplus. The connecting links on the two sections would involve 27.5 miles of canals and 55.5 miles of river improvement. These with the existing 357 miles of navigable water would complete the shortest route to the ocean. Another feature of immense value is the water-power to be developed by canal construction. This will be conveniently distributed at various points, and may be used to work an auxiliary railway as well as for general industrial development. With this highway, as with many deposits of mineral wealth and areas of agricultural land, we are only awakening to an appreciation of the value of our heritage.

But there is something above and beyond all this to be said in favour of this route. The Ottawa valley possesses untold wealth in natural resources, inexhaustible forests, abundant mineral deposits, splendid agricultural lands, and mighty water-powers. The Ottawa is preeminently a river of water-powers, so that the enormous possibilities of traffic from local sources alone can scarcely be overestimated, and should go a long way towards justifying the necessary expenditure for the construction of this canal. To give us a slight idea of what we might expect from local traffic I might be permitted to say a word about the county of Pontiac which I have the honour to represent. Pontiac is one of the largest counties in the Dominion of Canada; it has a front extending along the Ottawa river for upwards of 300 miles from a short distance above the capital to the head of Lake Temiskaming and from there the Ottawa river lies entirely within the boundaries of the county to its source at the height of land, every foot of that territory being rich in natural resources.

Within four miles of the Chats falls we have the Bristol iron mines, estimated to contain upwards of 30,000,000 tons of Bessemer ore. John Birkenbine, an eminent mining engineer of the United States reported on this deposit some years ago and stated that it was ample to justify the erection of a smelter, and that in his opinion, Ottawa would be the best place at which to build one, as ores could be easily centred there.

A short distance further up the Ottawa we come to Portage du Fort, where there is serpentine, iron ore and magnificent building stone, a block of which forms the corner stone of this building. Then we come to the rich Galena mines on the Calumet island, within a few miles of the Grand Calumet falls, in the neighbourhood of which numerous mineral discoveries have been made.

And so it is all along the route until we come to the Timiskaming, where there are some of the finest agricultural lands in Canada; and here we have a large settlement of hardy, intelligent people, who with indomitable pluck went in there a few years ago and have built for themselves happy and prosperous homes and thriving villages, with buildings and other improvements that would compare favourably with any portion of the older provinces. In the Timiskaming country gold and silver has been discovered as in the Cobalt country, and there are also some of the richest and most extensive iron deposits in Canada.

I have no doubt that when this canal is built and in operation, Lake Timiskaming, through which runs the Ottawa river, will be utilized and improved and become a feeder to the main line of the canal.

Many mines have been discovered in the country, some of which have been worked and developed to a certain extent, beyond which it was impossible to go without better transportation facilities, so work had to be abandoned.

It has been said on good authority that the province of Quebec possessed one-fifth of the entire water-power of the whole North American continent. If this be so then I have no hesitation in saying that Pontiac county possesses one-fourth of the water-power of the province of Quebec.

All this, with the extensive lumbering operations which are carried on in the county will go to show what might be expected in the way of traffic from Pontiac alone were it given this open waterway.

Although Pontiac is rich in all that stands for greatness, I regret to say the county is poor in railway facilities, having only the Pontiac Pacific Junction branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway, running for a few miles through the eastern end to Waltham, for which the people of the county are paying an enormous railway tax, and a short branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway from the foot of Lake Timiskaming to Kippewa. Both these lines appear to be stuck fast and cannot move further. But I fervently hope the day is not far distant when the former will be pushed through to a western connection with the main line of the C.P.R., and that the latter may also be hastened to a junction with the G. T. Pacific. So you see, Mr. Speaker, the construction of the canal is a matter of the most vital importance to Pontiac.

Pulpwood alone should furnish an immense quantity of traffic. A British authority says all Canada wants is enterprise and capital to develop the greatest pulp producing country in the world. European countries import over half a million tons of pulp annually. American paper companies cut pulpwood in Canada, pay government dues and stumpage, and haul the wood to the railways, transport it by rail to their mills in the United States, and then sell the finished product in Great Britain, a condition of affairs which, I believe, in the best interests of Canada, should not exist. Canadian spruce constitutes the most important supply of raw material in the world, and there is no part of Canada better adapted to the production and manufacture of pulp and paper than the valley of the Ottawa if given this waterway. The opening of the canal will practically afford unlimited water-power and cheap transportation. A dozen mills of the largest size can be favourably located both as to water-power and shipping facilities on the upper Ottawa river, and will be able by their position to compete on favourable terms with the old country, and the United States as well as in the home market. From North Bay alone the shipments run up to about 10,000 cars annually, and cost from $2.75 to $3.25 a cord for transportation. Now, the saving resultant from shipping this by water should be not less than $2 per cord. Sturgeon Falls is a shipping point for from 4,000 to 5,000 square miles of territory on which the pulpwood will run 400 cords to the mile. Twenty thousand square miles is a low estimate of the spruce territory of the Ottawa valley and the north country tributary to this waterway. As from fifteen to twenty years suffice for the recuperation of the forest after cutting—over 1,000,000 tons a year could be shipped out of this territory perpetually.

It has already been pointed out that the opening of this waterway should give a great impetus to the transportation of Nova Scotia coal to the interior. Nova Scotia coal vessels could ascend this waterway to the main shipping points where they could load with lumber, pulp and other products as return cargo. Indeed the opening up of the canal should give, as a new field for Nova Scotia coal the entire Ottawa valley. Besides the consumption in cities and towns and for manufacturing purposes, an important item will be the supply of the railroads. The opening up of this great country to the northward of the Ottawa is certain to create new demand along this line; and already the mileage of railroads which can be supplied to advantage from points along the Ottawa river is extensive.

The laying down of cheap coal at Ottawa will also open a possibility of profitably operating local smelters to handle the iron ores of the district. With this navigation route once an established fact, the hum of industry will be heard on every hand; every village and hamlet along its shores will then become a manufacturing centre, a thriving town or city, and the valley of the Ottawa will in very truth be the worship of the Dominion. A considerable passenger traffic, both local and tourist, cannot fail to develop from the outset because, as a summer resort, the upper Ottawa offers attractions second to none on the American continent. The scenery is simply magnificent. Its lakes and rivers teem with fish and the whole country abounds in game of all sorts. The influx of visitors to the lake district has only begun and is increasing rapidly from year to year, and, no doubt in the near future, if the canal were in operation, this district would surpass any portion of the Dominion as a tourist and sportsman's paradise.

Much as this great question means to Canada, as a whole, it means more to the people of the great west, because, once in operation, it certainly would give cheaper freight rates, and the farmers of the Northwest would consequently make a greater profit on their wheat. I venture to say, Sir, that never since its inception, has this scheme excited so much interest in the public mind as it does at present. No doubt this is due to the fact that the government has for several years been expending large sums of money on a resurvey of the route for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the project is practicable and also for the purpose of procuring reliable data upon which to base estimates for such a work as would be approximately accurate. And now that the surveys have been completed, plans and profiles prepared, and that the government are in possession of all the information necessary to show that the route is feasible, certainly the country will expect the government to proceed with the work without any undue loss of time.

Another reason why the country is more exercised about this matter than at any other time is because the government have not yet made any pronouncement as to its policy with regard to this project. I hope to hear from the Minister of Public Works, or some other member of the government, a declaration as to what the government intend doing. At the same time, I hope that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) will give us some information to explain the difference in the cost, as estimated by the late Mr. Tarte, when Minister of Public Works—his estimate was $5,000,000—and the estimate now of $13,700,000 for the construction of that part of the scheme from Georgian bay to Nipissing.

Our greatest statesmen have always recognized the importance of this splendid waterway and looked upon its construction as a national project which ought to be undertaken in the best interests of the country. Many of our foremost transportation experts have expressed the opinion that our transportation system will never be complete until this waterway is developed and utilized. Some of the most eminent engineers of the day have declared their opinion that this waterway is by far the best and cheapest route from the great lakes to the Atlantic. Many senators and members of parliament have pinned their faith to this enterprise. Indeed, hon. gentlemen, irrespective of party, have, in the most eloquent speeches, both on the floor of this House and elsewhere, advocated the construction of this canal in the strongest possible manner. And I am proud to say that none did more to keep the project alive and permanently before the public than my friend, Mr. W. J. Poupore, ex-member for Pontiac, when in a famous speech he brought the question before the House in 1898—a speech which not only attracted the attention of the press of this country, but of the old country and the United States as well. On that occasion he was ably supported by the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart), who has ever been a strong advocate of the Georgian bay canal, and many other gentlemen among them the member for Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt) who has now gone to his reward above—not to heaven but to the Senate. And it goes without saying that the name of Macleod Stewart will go down on his country's scroll of fame as one of those who did perhaps more than anybody else to keep this great undertaking before the country.

With great national harbours at the head of Lake Superior and on the Georgian bay and at Montreal and Quebec, equipped with all modern appliances and machinery for handling cargo, and with the Georgian bay canal an established fact, we would then not only be in a position to control all the commerce of our own country, but would be certain to capture a great deal of trade from our neighbours to the south.

I wish to say in conclusion that I sincerely hope the government will undertake the work in its entirety as a great national enterprise and that they will not do it by piecemeal. Public opinion is ripe for its construction, the people of Canada look upon it now as the best possible means of solving the transportation question, and when we consider how it may enhance the brilliant future of this country, we must be convinced that no time should be lost in going on with it. I trust therefore that the government will start the work of construction at once and push it vigorously to completion, so that in the near future another page may be added to Canadian history, recording the opening up of this great national artery of transportation—a page no less bright than that on which is written the story of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. J. B. T. CARON (Ottawa). As I seconded the motion made this afternoon by my hon. friend from Nipissing (Mr. McCool) I wish to say a few words on the subject, and endeavour to impress on the House and the government the necessity of proceeding with this work without further delay. Allow me at the outset to make a brief reference to the importance of canals in general as a means of transportation. Before the construction of railways the importance of canals as freight and passenger carriers was recognized by all civilized nations. But between 1825 and 1870 there was a great infatuation for the construction of railways, which at that time were a new thing, and the canals saw their tonnage diminishing rapidly. The speed of railways being far greater than that obtained on water-ways, railway transportation obtained a monoply of public attention, and the railway companies, which were naturally alive to their own interest, got control of most of the canals and allowed them to deteriorate and in many instances go to ruin. Moreover, the canals did not seem to realize the position they were in, and by maintaining the former rate of tolls they allowed the railways to get absolute control of the traffic. About 1870 the general public, and shippers in particular, realized that the railways had failed to give them the lower rates which they had expected; that, in fact, instead of giving cheaper rates, the railways were charging higher than the waterways. This state of affairs forced the economists of all countries to look to the water routes for a solution of the problem and this led to a canal improving era, and contrary to the predictions of the pessimists the rates were not only reduced considerably but the supplementary traffic created by the opening of new routes so benefited the railway companies that the House ceased to oppose the construction of canals even on routes parallel to their lines. There is no better example of this than the New York Central which runs through its entire length along the Erie canal and has all the traffic that it could desire. The canal has built twelve cities or towns along its course, and the New York Central draws the traffic from those cities. It has been noticed that in the localities deprived of waterways the public has been practically held up by the railway companies. Whenever the canals have come into competition with railroads they have proved better controllers of rates than all the legislative bodies, and to quote a distinguished authority :

> If the Erie canal did not carry one ton of freight it would be well worth keeping it up simply as a regulator of railway rates.

Since the canals have started to develop in 1870 they have managed to reduce their rates 80 per cent, whilst the railroads have only reduced theirs 50 per cent. The best the railroads can do now is to transport freight at one-half or one-third of a cent per ton per mile; whilst the big carriers on water-ways can carry freight at less than one-tenth of a cent per ton per mile. We see, therefore, the great advantage of a water-way over a railway. The Georgian bay ship canal, which we are discussing now, is by no means a new route. It is a proposed water-way connecting the great lakes with Montreal by way of French river, Lake Nipissing, Trout lake, Talon lake, the Mattawa and the Ottawa rivers. My hon. friend from Nipissing (Mr. McCool) has given us this afternoon the history of the canal scheme, so it is not necessary for me to go into that part of the question. But since Samuel de Champlain paddled up the Ottawa river and down the French river to Lake Huron in 1614, this route has been known to all travellers and pioneers. It has been the only route by which the fur trade of the Northwest has been conducted, all the furs have come down that way to Montreal and Quebec, whence they were shipped to Europe. During the last century various projects have been set on foot for the construction of this canal. More especially since 1852, different engineers have been employed to report upon the feasibility of the canal at different times. Mr. Walter Shanly, T. C. Clarke, E. P. Bender, C. R. Coutlee, D. F McLeod and George Y. Wisner were commissioned, either by the government or by private companies, to examine and report on the feasibility of this project. Although these gentlemen have all reported that the project was feasible, nevertheless it has not been proceeded with because the general public were not convinced of its necessity. In the fall of 1904 the Minister of Public Works instructed

Mr. Arthur St. Laurent, an engineer in the employ of the government, to make a complete and extensive survey of the whole route. I understand the government have a report to the effect that the surveys are completed now, and there will shortly be laid before the House the plans and estimate of the cost of this canal, with all the data relating to its construction. It is estimated that the cost will be a little under one hundred million dollars, which it is thought will suffice to construct a 22-foot waterway from the Georgian bay to Montreal, including the cost of putting in appliances for operating the locks and for lighting.

Now many hon. members of this House have considered this as an enormous sum to be spent by Canada. But when we consider that the St. Lawrence channel, which is only a 14-foot channel, has cost the country in round figures $73,000,000 with the improvements, we can see at once that the greater importance of the Georgian bay canal would justify the government of Canada in spending the proposed sum on its construction. All the engineers charged to report on this project have declared that it is feasible. The present board of engineers who has charge of the project, of which Mr. St. Laurent is the chief engineer, have solved the great difficulty there was in regard to the supply of water at the summit level. The original proposition was to raise Lake Nipissing 25 feet to the level of Trout lake; this would have flooded a very large area of land which to-day, since the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, has become too valuable to acquire. The next proposition was to lower Trout lake to the level of Lake Nipissing, but this would have meant a cutting at the summit of five miles long with a maximum depth of 50 feet

The new solution consists in the raising of the Talon lake to the Trout lake level and diverting the Amable du Fond river (which at present time flows northward, draining into the Mattawa) and directing it by means of a flume and a tunnel into the summit level, thus giving a large surplus of water for the central supply. I believe the water will be sufficient to carry 10,000,000 tons of freight per annum through the canals.

The object of the Ottawa route is to pass large lake vessels from Fort William to Montreal, a distance of 932 miles at economic speed with safety. The largest vessels now on the lakes are between 500 and 600 feet long, and 56 feet beam. One has been built 60 feet beam, but this is the limit so far. There are nearly 600 vessels between 300 feet and 600 feet long. Cargoes of over 10,000 tons are carried and cargoes of 4,000 to 8,000 tons are common. It will be necessary to have a water-way deep enough to allow vessels of this type which are now plying on the great lakes, with their cargoes, to start from Fort William and pass through to Montreal, a seaport, without breaking bulk, thereby saving much time and expense and carrying a great deal more than could be done by the existing St. Lawrence barge canal.

In comparing the distance from Fort William to lower ports, a matter which was gone into somewhat fully by Mr. McCool, it is estimated that the round trip by the Ottawa and Georgian bay canal could be made in fifteen days, so that two trips per month could be made by each boat. A 10,000 ton vessel may be estimated as costing $400 per day for fuel, wages, repairs, delays, interest and profit; thus one round trip would cost $6,000. A boat carrying down 10,000 tons and returning with only a one-third cargo would have moved 13,300 tons for $6,000, or at the rate of less than 50 cents per ton (1½ cents per bushel).

My hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Logan) explained to the House a few minutes ago that these boats could carry back return cargoes of Nova Scotia coal, which I believe, despite the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Morin) is just as good as American coal. With Cape Breton coal as a return cargo, there would be a full 10,000 ton load on the return trip, and the vessel would have moved 20,000 tons for $6,000, or at the rate of 30 cents per ton. Even at this price the profit to the transportation company would be large. The economic benefits to be derived from cheap steam coal delivered along the route can hardly be over estimated.

Quotations have been made this afternoon from the American 'Engineering News' showing the superiority of this project. I have here a clipping from the American 'Engineering News' of March, 1902. I need not read it as it has been already placed before the House, but I find in the same journal of the 23rd January, 1908, only last week, a strong argument in favour of the Georgian bay route. It is contained in a report of the Hon. Frederick C. Stevens, Superintendent of Public Works, to the legislature, in which he laid bare the slow rate of progress on the New York 1,000 ton barge canal and declared that the enterprise would be obsolete before its completion. After dealing in extenso with the New York project, Mr. Stevens says:

At the inception of the barge canal the purpose was to restore to New York state the traffic which had been taken away as the result of a better system of Canadian canals. The barge canal may be suited to compete with the present type of Canadian canals, but the Dominion government has foreseen the need of a different type and has undertaken to supply it in the so-called Ottawa-Georgian bay route. Surveys have been completed, and plans and estimates of the cost for a 21-foot ship canal have been prepared, connecting Georgian bay with the St. Lawrence river by way of Ottawa and Mattawa rivers. The Dominion parliament is expected to make an appropriation for the construction of this canal during its present session.

I hope that this is true.

The Ottawa-Georgian bay canal is planned to provide the shortest outlet by water for the grain, forest and mining products of the great northwest, and it is potent to us whether with that route for shipment once open commerce can be changed so as to take the route through the lower lakes and across the state of New York, particularly such commerce as is bound for European ports. Commerce, history tells us, when once lost is difficult to restore.

Canada in the race for commerce, must be dealt with as a rival. The simplicity of the Ottawa-Georgian bay route, from the standpoint of construction, as viewed by engineers, taken in conjunction with the methods which that government applies to the solution of any project looking to enhancing the glory of the Dominion, threaten, if they do not fully in sure, the completion of this waterway before the barge canal, under the present system of construction, can be completed.

Commerce once lost under such conditions, if not for ever lost, would be hard to regain. Not only New York, but the whole nation, is interested in retaining supremacy in this regard.

This I think shows that at least some of our neighbours are quite alive to the question of transportation, and are averse to allowing the Canadian government to construct this canal before they have themselves constructed a 22-foot waterway to replace the Erie canal, which is at present only 9 feet in depth.

In his remarks endorsing this project the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) stated that it would be a great advantage to the people of Nova Scotia, that the coal from their collieries could be transported by this route to Ontario. I submit that this would be just as great an advantage to the people of Ontario from another point of view. The place occupied by iron and steel in the industrial world has not been over estimated. The fact that the present reserves, though undoubtedly large, are being exhausted has caused great uneasiness to the scientific world and has forced men of initiative to look for fresh sources of supply. According to Mr. E. C. Eckel, of the United States Geological Survey, the mines of the Lake Superior district are being drawn upon at a rate which will exhaust them in 1950. On the other hand Canada possesses large deposits of iron ore which have been allowed to remain untouched just for want of cheap transportation connecting our coal mines with our iron deposits, and as we cannot carry on any process of smelting or refining ore without the aid of coal we have been unable to develop this industry as we would like to have done. Dr. P. L. T. Heroult, technical director of the French Metallurgical Society, who has immense works at La Praz, said, in an interview some months ago, that in ten years Canada would become a great metallurgical country with a larger iron industry than any other country in the world, that it would be the same with iron as it has been with wheat, because we would be able to produce iron here more cheaply than in any other country. In the province of Quebec there are large and valuable deposits of magnetic ore contiguous to this water way. One of the most valuable deposits is near Hull, where an ore assaying from 64 per cent to 68 per cent is found.

With all this mineral wealth we cannot begin to supply the home demand for iron and steel. Take, for instance, the exports of goods manufactured from steel in Canada; in 1904 we find that we exported $1,991,821 and that we imported during the same period $41,152,789 of goods manufactured out of steel showing that notwithstanding our immense mineral resources we had to import into our country, for the want of such cheap transportation as would bring our iron ore deposits into touch with our coal deposits, this immense quantity of manufactured goods. There is no doubt that as soon as this new route is provided smelters and refineries will be built all along its course and they will start to treat all sorts of ore and ship the finished products direct to the European markets. The damming up of the Ottawa river at the foot of Long Rapids would concentrate the power at one given point and thus save the construction of very costly penstocks. The power which has been placed by the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Brabazon at 500,000 horse-power has been placed by engineers who are quite conversant with this subject at nearly 3,000,000 horse-power. The Americans, as I stated a few moments ago, have realized the danger in the inability of the railway companies to handle the present traffic as is shown by President Roosevelt's address to the newly appointed waterway commission in which he says :

> It is common knowledge that the railroads of the United States are no longer able to move crops and the manufactures rapidly enough to secure the prompt transaction of the business of the nation, and there is small prospect of immediate relief. Representative railroad men point out that the products of the northern interior states have doubled in ten years, while the railroad facilities have increased but one-eighth and there is no reason to doubt whether any development of the railroads possible in the near future will suffice to keep transportation abreast of production. There appears to be but one complete remedy, the development of the complementary system of transportation by water.

Not later than last December 2,000 delegates, representing 32 different states, attended the convention of the National River and Harbour Congress. The net result of this convention was the adoption of resolutions recommending an expenditure by the government of $50,000,000 a year for the improvement of waterways. But this congestion of traffic mentioned in President Roosevelt's address has also been felt in Canada; in fact, on the first of August, 1907, there were 6,000,000 bushels of the 1906 crop left in the elevators at Fort William which shows that the railways and the present facilities for transportation by water are quite inadequate to move the present crop of the Northwest. The crop of 1906 was about 90,000,000 bushels and conservative estimates place the probable 1910 crop at 200,000,000 bushels; therefore, with the Canadian Pacific double tracked to Fort William, with the Canadian Northern and Grand Trunk running to their full capacity, it will be impossible to move the crop even if the fleet of grain carriers be doubled, and the only solution would be in the saving of time by a new waterway to the sea-board.

New York state had decided to deepen the Erie canal to from 9 feet to 14 feet at a cost of $100,000,000, but American business men and shippers, being convinced that the Canadian government will build the Georgian bay canal, are moving heaven and earth to induce Congress to take up the enlargement of this canal as a national enterprise and to deepen it at once to 21 feet. In fact, it is now a question as to who shall give first an outlet to the traffic, for it is well known that when commerce is once settled in a certain channel it is hard to divert, except for some immediate, substantial and permanent benefit. A profitable part of the carrying trade of a territory whose material progress has been unprecedented, will be the reward of the country that will first give to commerce a lake to ocean waterway deep enough to meet the requirements of the traffic. Therefore, I would urge the government of Canada to take the matter into its very serious consideration as I would urge the members of the House to study the question, not looking at it, as some hon. members may be inclined to do, from the narrow provincial point of view, but to consider it from the patriotic standpoint and to make of it a national question.

Let us approach this project, not from the point of view of the advantage to the country contiguous to the canal, but let us approach it with the idea that it is a work for the general advantage of Canada, and a work which will confer material wealth not only on the Ottawa Valley and the Georgian bay districts, but on every district in every province of the Dominion. The nation that will achieve a great future must be prepared to anticipate the needs and demands which increasing trade and growing prosperity will require of it. The nation that merely provides for the necessities of the immediate present, is to a certain extent retrograde; it simply gambles on securing fortune. No sudden measure; no measure not well thought out in a broad and generous spirit can secure to a nation the full extent of the possibilities within its reach. A country like Canada with as vast natural resources must have adequate waterways, free harbours, and commodious terminals to accommodate increased trade if it desires to retain that trade. It is as true of a nation as of an individual that 'to him that hath shall be given.' If we want to make of Canada the great nation that we all hope it will be, it remains with our own effort to increase to the greatest possible extent our transportation facilities, and, Sir, I submit that no more important work towards this end is before the statesmen and the people of Canada to-day, than the building of the Georgian bay canal.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Wright). At this late hour I do not purpose detaining the House at any great length, but I do not feel that I should allow this occasion to pass without adding a word in favour of the motion proposed by the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. McCool). On different occasions I have had the advantage of urging upon the government the advisability of constructing what is now known as the Ottawa, Montreal and Georgian bay canal. To-day the House and the country have been treated to able speeches in advocacy of this project, and I venture to think that more has been done in the last few hours to urge upon the government the construction of this great canal than has been done since I have had the honour of a seat here. Last session the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) delivered a speech on the transportation question to which I listened with a great deal of pleasure, a speech which I afterwards read in 'Hansard,' and I may say that that speech contained a great deal of valuable information. Of course the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) was speaking more on behalf of the port of Midland than upon the general question of transportation, and this he might be pardoned for, but perhaps I may be permitted to say that his speech contained some inconsistencies. He commenced by saying: that while during the last ten years every private corporation had been reaching out for the increasing business of the country, the government had practically stood still and had done nothing to improve our transportation facilities. He continued to say, that it could not be said that the government had not had due notice from all quarters as to the necessity for action, because on all sides we had evidences of prosperity. In that statement I take issue with the hon. gentleman, because it is only the truth to say that a great deal has been done by the present government for the improvement of the transportation facilities of Canada. The government has spent great sums of money in improving the St. Lawrence channel to the ocean; the government has been improving year after year the Intercolonial Railway and in spite of the great expenses made on that road it has placed it on a paying basis; the government has undertaken the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific; it has improved our canal system; it has encouraged and aided in the construction of all the great railways of the country, and it is at present studying the question in a practical way of direct water communication from the Georgian bay to the Atlantic ocean. It is therefore, I think, unfair to say that the government has done nothing to improve our transportation facilities. I will not say that more cannot be done; more can be done and more will be done; and in the study of the question of the Georgian bay canal a great deal will be accomplished. I will not say that this government will at once be able to complete the means of transportation, but I do say that the government has done and will do more to provide increased transportation facilities in Canada. The hon. member for East Simcoe in another part of his speech ('Hansard' page 1170) said:

We should not consider the stretch of Ottawa river canal navigation because the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk are reaching out for a system by way of the Georgian bay, and private capital is being expended and will require assistance from this government to help these railways to develop that situation.

In that I think the hon. gentleman is inconsistent. He says in one part of his speech that the government is not coping with the transportation business of the country, and in another part of his speech he says the government should not undertake the construction of this great project because it might affect in some way the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway. In answer to that I would like to quote some words of Sir Wm. Van Horne, spoken before the special committee of the Senate of Canada appointed to study the feasibility and advantages which may arise from the construction of a canal joining the waters of Lake Huron to those of the St. Lawrence via the Ottawa river. I have the French version of Sir Wm. Van Horne's remarks here, and I quote:

(Translation.) As a result of the building of that canal, important industries would spring up along its course. I am of opinion that the building of the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian bay canal would have the effect of developing the trade of Canada. Whatever tends to diminish the cost of transportation must undoubtedly have a beneficial effect. Such a canal would build up traffic for Montreal, Quebec and other sea-ports. It would develop local rescources and even have a good effect on the Canadian Pacific Railway, seeing that it would create more traffic for that railway than it would divert from it.

The wood pulp and lumbering industries would be benefited by that canal, and that new waterway would also render available the mineral wealth of the Ottawa valley.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Ottawa, Montreal and Georgian bay canal will not only develop the resources of the Ottawa valley, but it will have the effect of benefiting the entire Dominion because it will facilitate and cheapen the transport of grain from the west to eastern Canada. The great question now before us is as to how best to transport the grain of the Northwest to the sea-board and then across the Atlantic to the markets of the world. One of the great difficulties in the way of cheap transportation of grain is the breaking of bulk, and by the construction of the Georgian bay canal we will have the advantage of being able to transport direct from Port Arthur and Fort William to the sea-board without transshipping cargo. That is a great argument in favour of this waterway. Let me read to you, Mr. Speaker, what the Deep Waterways Commission reported in January, 1897. Amongst other things it said:

At Buffalo bulk has to be broken, the grain elevated and transferred to cars or canal boats, and the same thing, with equal expenses, is repeated at New York. The lake freight from the farthest shore of Lake Superior and of Lake Michigan to Buffalo is from 1 to 1½ cents a bushel, the ocean freight from sea-board to Europe, 3 cents. The whole cost, however, from Chicago or Duluth to Europe is from 9 to 10 cents. Therefore, more than half the cost goes to railway or canal freights, commissions and elevator charges, to which must be added the item of waste. It costs twice as much to carry a barrel of flour from Duluth to New York as it does from New York to Europe, though the latter distance is twice as great as the former.

The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), in dealing with this question last session, failed to explain to the House the difference in cost of the carrying of grain from the lake ports direct to the sea-board, and thus forgot what was most important in the consideration of the transportation question.

The enormous advantage of such a canal is evident by a glance at the map. Supposing two steamers of the largest class to leave Chicago, they will run together till a little past Sault Ste. Marie or the Strait of Mackinaw. They then part company, one going to Buffalo and the other to Montreal via Georgian bay. The distance between Chicago and Buffalo is 900 miles; between Chicago and French river 475 miles, so that when the one ship arrives on the entrance to navigation the other has still 425 miles to its destination. Allowing for detention at 34 locks, we find that the vessel on its way to Montreal will have got to within 50 miles of Ottawa and 170 miles of Montreal when the other has arrived at Buffalo.

This means that for the same expenditure of time and cost required for one ship to reach Buffalo the other will nearly reach Ottawa. Assuming the rate to Buffalo to be 1¼ cents per bushel, the cost to near Ottawa will be 1¼ cents also. For the remaining 170 miles and 16 locks to reach Montreal, or 24 hours, ¼ of a cent will be ample addition.

The grain, therefore, can be delivered at Montreal, exclusive of course of any toll, for 1½ cents, and it is not possible to question such a conclusion.

I wish to say at once, Mr. Speaker, that I am strongly in favour of a free canal. I am also in favour of the canal being built at once from one end of the line to the other. I do not believe in the canal being built in sections; I think we ought to undertake at once the construction of the whole system. The expenditure would not be burdensome, in view of the great prosperity of Canada and its great public revenue at the present time. Our population is constantly increasing. The immigration into the northwestern part of the Dominion alone during the eleven months ending December 1, is as follows: to Manitoba, 44,114; to Saskatchewan, 31,304; to Alberta, 30,944; and to British Columbia, 29,139; making a total immigration into the northwestern provinces and British Columbia of 135,501. This means a greater development of the Northwest, and consequently a greater production of grain and a corresponding necessity for facilitating the transportation of that grain to the sea-board.

We have on all sides evidences of the immense advantages of this canal. We have evidences of confidence in the project. Last year a report of the Royal Commission on Transportation was laid on the table of this House, and in that report we find the commissioner making this statement:

> Your commission unhesitatingly affirm their belief in the desirability of a thorough waterway from the head of Lake Superior to ocean navigation, to aid in the carriage of the grain and the regulation of rates of a standard not less than that above set forth, so that the largest vessels navigating the great lakes can continue their voyage to ocean navigation or as near thereto as possible. But in view of the fact that the government has undertaken the survey of a proposed route by way of the French river to Lake Nipissing and thence by way of the Ottawa river to Montreal, and as the feasibility of this route from a commercial as well as an engineering point of view, and if feasible its cost, has not yet been ascertained, and further in view of the fact that the government has also undertaken the survey of the Welland canal and its vicinity, looking to its possible enlargement and diversion, your commission do not see their way clear to any recommendation as to route, but would recommend that, in case the Ottawa river scheme because of want of feasibility from a commercial or engineering point of view, or on account of its cost or for other reason be not adopted, then the Welland canal be enlarged and deepened to the standard of the Sault Ste. Marie canal, with a view of enabling vessels of the largest size to continue their voyage to Kingston or Prescott, thus bringing their cargo to within say 180 miles or less of Montreal before discharging same.

If the Ottawa and Georgian bay canal is feasible, and I think the report laid on the table a few days ago and all the other reports we have had on this subject show that it is feasible, then I do not think that any great expenditure should be made on our local canals, but the credit of Canada should rather be engaged for the construction of this great canal. Let me refer for a moment to the movement of grain and flour during the season of 1906:

	Bushels.
Passed through 'Soo' canals. . .	168,653,588
Received at Buffalo.	177,492,229
" at New York by all routes.	119,632,720
Received at New York by Canal.	12,000,000
Exports from Atlantic sea-board (including Montreal, to Europe, &c.).	245,000,000
Exports from Montreal.	25,927,492

Now, I think that this government, in building the Ottawa and Georgian bay canal, will ensure not only the carrying of all the grain of our Northwest from the lake ports, but also the carrying of grain to Buffalo from Duluth and Chicago. Transportation on the lakes shows a gradual tendency towards cheaper rates. The average rate per ton mile in 1901 was .89 mill, in 1902, .89 mill, in 1904 .81 mill, in 1905 .85 mill, and in 1906 .84 mill.

The total net freight passing through the 'Soo' canal during the year 1906—51,751,080 tons—shows an increase of over 7,500,000 tons over the previous year. The lake traffic is steadily increasing and tonnage as shown by reports doubling itself every six years, the traffic of 1906 being more than double that of 1900, as shown by the statement of commerce at the 'Soo' canals. In the year 1900 the traffic passing these canals amounted to only 25,643,073 tons. This great increase will undoubtedly continue, and it is therefore difficult to even rashly estimate the magnitude of the traffic six years hence.

The traffic passing the 'Soo' canals during the season of 1907 amounted to 58,217,214 tons, an increase of nearly 6,500,000 tons over that of 1906. Rates of carriage remained about the same.

The lake freights on grain show the greatest reduction, the rate being 1·6 cents per bushel between terminals in 1906, as against 1·9 cents in 1902 and 2·3 cents in 1901. These rates between terminals include cost of loading and unloading at terminal points. The average distance for carriage of grain on the great lakes may be taken as 800 miles, the bulk being from Chicago and Duluth to Buffalo, 891 and 990 miles respectively. This gives us a rate per ton mile for lake carriage of grain of .6 mill, which may be taken as a liberal estimate of the cost of lake transportation.

The lowest possible rail rate per ton under most favourable conditions, the lowest which according to high authority can be looked forward to, is 2½ mills per ton, or over four times the present rate by water. This minimum estimated rail rate has never yet been reached, the nearest approach to it being in 1901 when grain was carried by the railroads in New York state at a loss in an attempt to demonstrate that the improvement and development of water routes was unnecessary. With existing conditions in Canada it is doubtful whether such low rates may be expected on Canadian roads between lake ports and the seaboard. It must be remembered that cheap coal can be had all along the lines from the lakes to the Atlantic in the United States, whereas on the Canadian railroads the fuel for the engines has to be transported to points where needed from the eastern terminals as the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) has pointed out, that the construction of the Georgian bay canal would mean a great deal to the coal of Nova Scotia, it would be useless for me to dwell upon this point at present. But I would say that the building of this canal would mean a great deal for the lumber industry of Canada. The lumber industry of the Ottawa district represents in pine alone an annual freight of not less than 2,000,000 tons of sawn lumber. Under present conditions all, except what is carried through the Ottawa and Champlain canals, has to be hauled by rail, the rail charges on lumber from western Ontario to Montreal being heavy. The opening of this waterway would mean cheap transportation, and open to the lumber trade of the Ottawa valley the important market of the great lakes region. The importance of that market may be judged from the fact that nine lake ports alone received in 1896 over 2,270,000 tons of sawn lumber.

My hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Caron) very aptly pointed out that within easy reach of Ottawa city we have great possibilities in iron ore. In the county I have the honour to represent, there is a great deal of iron ore, but it does not pay to develop it on account of the heavy cost of rail carriage. If, however, we had this canal, which would pass directly in front of the city of Hull, we would be able to develop all this iron ore and the trade of Ottawa valley would be greatly increased. This canal would also furnish facilities for developing our water-powers, of which there are a great many along its route. It is impossible to overestimate the benefits that would accrue from this utilizing of electrical energy. At every fall of water great factories could be established, and instead of having to bring our minerals elsewhere to be smelted, we could supply electricity by means of these water-powers direct to the mines themselves. My hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Caron) well said that this was a great national question and that the construction of this canal would do a great deal towards building up Canada as a nation. I wish, therefore, to urge on the government as strongly as I can the immediate construction of this canal, and the making of it also a free canal.

Mr. WM. WRIGHT (Muskoka). As the hour is late and this is a most important question, and as there are a considerable number of speakers who desire to discuss it, I beg leave to move the adjournment of the debate on the understanding that it will be resumed at a later date.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. HAGGART. What business tomorrow?

Mr. FIELDING. Supply, with the understanding that opportunity will be afforded for a discussion on the Japanese question, in accordance with previous agreement.

Mr. SPROULE. Can the hon. gentleman make any statement regarding the arrangement for supplying seed grain?

Mr. FIELDING. I observed an announcement in the press which is entirely unauthorized and incorrect. The matter is engaging our attention, but has not reached the point when we can say anything definite. At an early day, however, I hope to be able to place the matter before the House. No conclusion has yet been reached as to the details, but the general question is now engaging our attention.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.05 p.m.
