Kingston, William Hearty, b. 1837, in London; received an appointment in the Public Record Office 1852; entered the Austrian consular service as vice-chancellor of the consulate-general in London 1856, and remained in the following year to Cardiff, where he of the Daily Telegraph, and in this capacity resided at Berlin, Vienna, and other Continental cities, and was present in the campaigns of the Austro-Prussian, Franco-German, and Russo-Turkish wars, being also intrusted with confidential political missions to Egypt, Turkey, Roumania, Russia, &c. Since 1879 he has been a member of the editorial staff of the Daily Telegraph, and he has also contributed to many periodicals, English and foreign. He is a member of many artistic and literary societies, including the Royal Academy of Music of Naples, and has received medals and decorations from several sovereigns, &c. 1. "As a resident war correspondent during a sojourn of above twenty years on the Continent he has been trained in that great school of journalism whose watchword is, 'Expand!' When the most liberal deductions have been made for the glaring faults which thickly still remain enormously superior at all points to the Wagner, in particular he drops his turgid and facetious style, and discourses intelligently and sympathetically about that much-abused composer."—Spectator, ix, 1867.

"Mr. Kingston sketches all he sees lightly and gracefully, and with no little humor."—Sat. Rev., lxx, 632.

Kingston, William Henry Giles, 1814-1880, b. in London; was for many years engaged in mercantile pursuits at Oporto, but about 1850 gave up business to devote himself to literature. He travelled in the United States and elsewhere, and was interested in the emigration schemes. He was an extraordinarily prolific writer of books for boys, chiefly stories of adventures, and it is doubtful whether the following list of his publications, long as it is, is complete. He also edited the Union Jack, the Colonial Magazine and East India Review. 1. The Cossack Chief: a Romance of Russia, London, 1843, 3 vols. p. 8vo. 2. Kipling, Rudyard, b. 1865, in India; son of John Madox Kipling, C.E.S., (till recently principal of the Muhammadan Industrial Art, and curator of the Museum, Lahore); educated in England; returned in 1880 to India, and contributed to local journals, and more recently to English periodicals, stories, sketches, and poems descriptive of Indian civil and military life. He now resides in London. 1. Departmental Ditties, and other Verses; 3d ed., Calcutta, 1888, 8vo.

"They possess the one quality which entitles vers de société to live. For they reflect with light gaiety the thoughts and feelings of actual men and women, and are true as egotism come notes of a pathetic illpancy and ignoble discontent with himself, which have something very like the ring of genius. . . . There are many stanzas to the heart of all who have suffered, or are now suffering, the loneliness of tropical exile. For besides the silly little world which disperses itself throughout most of the ditties, and a certain Anglo-Indian world, which, for high aims and interest in effort is well-nigh dead, has never had an equal in history. . . . Some day a writer will arise—perhaps this Anglo-Indian world known as—'really is. . . . Taken as a man, his book gives hope of a new literary star of no mean magnitude rising in the east. The hand which wrote 'The Last Department' in this little volume is surely reserved for higher work than breaking those poor pretty

"There are few passages in fiction more simple and truly hard beginnings of pioneer life in Illinois. . . . Those rude, independent, yet mutually helpful men, belong to a period now driven to the furthest frontier; their look and speech are caught here with clear certainty that can come only of personal knowledge. But personal knowledge alone does not suffice in such a case, and we are to be glad of an artist with clear eyes and an honest hand in the author of 'Zury,'—one incapable of printing life other than he has found it."—W. "The great merit of the book is an excellent judgment in the selection of materials. Mr. Kitchin knows well what to omit, what to abridge, what to describe at length, and he knows the proper proportions for a work like this of dissertation and narrative. . . His style has the merits as well as the defects which commonly belong to unstudied composition; but is, it is without attention, and has the fitness and vigour which may be expected from a mind given wholly to the matter, and not partly diverted to the manner."—Id., No. 2406.

"It does not appear that what we already knew about Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Southey is sensibly affected by the present publication. The biographies of the poets will not require to be rewritten in order to include new facts from these sources. Nevertheless the volumes are pleasant reading, and have a real interest, if not a distinct value. The most material part of them concerns Coleridge."—Acad., xxxii, 399.

"Dr. Knox's work differs from Mr. Henn's ["History of Belfast"] in being a careful account of the actual condition of the great country.—The Yorkshire of Ireland, as its natives sometimes call it,—rather than a history of past times. But it is very copious and minute: it is the result of very much painstaking labor by persons intimately connected with the Lincoln of the ante-presidential days; it is very truthful, conscientious, and critically impartial, while at the same time it is full of respect and affectionate admiration for Mr. Lincoln. . . . We commend it to every body as excellent reading as cultivating as a romance, and of deep interest to every citizen."—Nation, xiv, 406.

Edward Hawke Locker, F.R.S., (ante, vol. I.) and brother of Arthur Locker, (infra) was for some years employed as a précis-writer in the Admiralty Office in London. He married as his second wife the daughter of Sir Curtis Lampton, Bart., after whose death he added the name of Lampton to his own. He has contributed reviews to the London Times and poems to Punch, the Cornhill, and other periodicals. 1. London Lyrics, Lon., 1857, p. 8vo. 2. He writes with a middle-aged, experienced air that is quite refreshing. Sometimes he has almost a touch of the humors of an American, Oliver Wendell Holmes; whilst in the scenes clear in him to have avoided becoming more like Mr. Locker is light and humorous, but never illipant or heartless.—ibid., No. 1075.

"These volumes will not be unwelcome to readers fond of literary gossip. They abound in anecdotes concerning Haydon, Wilkie, and Lawrence; Wordsworth, Hazlitt, and Scott. William Bewick—not to be confounded with the celebrated engraver of that name—was born towards the close of the last century; he became the pupil of Haydon, and was subsequently employed by Sir Thomas Lawrence to make copies of the frescoes of Michael Angelo in the Sistine Chapel. . . . He appears in these pages in the character of Boswell. . . . But the materials are trite, and the style is far from commendable. . . . The facts and interspersed anecdotes have value, but the criticisms and reflections are all but worthless."—Sat. Rev., xxxii, 253.

He is a writer for the London Daily News, a frequent contributor to periodical literature, and editor of the "English Worthies" series. 1. Ballads and Lyrics of Old France: with other Poems, Lon., 1872, p. 8vo.

"A series of translations from the older French poets comes first, and later in the volume there are some finer specimens of poets in the nineteenth century. The rest of the space is filled with original lyrics, all written in the manner of a student of Ronsard or of the classical sources of Ronsard's lyrics, approached in his spirit and used after his method. . . . There are in the book, however, two series of short poems, the first called 'Ave' and the other 'Desireth,' parts of which strike us as possessing singular delicacy and beauty."—*Sat. Brunet-Debaines and his collaborators in the work of illustration leave little to be desired. . . . Mr. Lang's task has been more difficult. . . . He takes us to no regions which lovers of poetry would explore for special beauty. We breathe no mountain airs, and catch no glimpses of sea or of the far horizons. In the brief time of a garden plot, with a peacock on the lawn, set beds, and quantity of hedges, forms no had resting-place for the tourist."—Ath., No. 5748.

 "Mr. Lang is an anthropologist of the most uncompromising kind, and though he does not go far as the dusky philosopher of Lemnisk, who considered cannibalism to be the ideal form of political economy, inasmuch as it prevents waste, employs the baker and the expence of that of our ancestors were savages, and that stories which formerly were assumed to belong to the Aryan family are the staple of general savage myth.  "Leaves one in a maze of wonder at the versatility of his style and his profound knowledge of so wide a range of literature."—Sat. Rev., 14, 479.

"Mr. Lang's new book would have been written by nobody but Mr. Lang. It is his in its merits and defects alike, meet, its quaint and irrelevant humour, its condescension, its honesty of tone and intemperance and intemperate mistakes, its occasional impertinence, its touchiness of pronouncement in style and of impertinence in sentiment."—ibid., No. 3048.

 "Mr. Lang does not deal with myth, ritual, and religion under all their aspects; nor does he offer his work as a key to all the mythologies. His special purpose is to ment in myth and ritual, and, by connecting it with a definite mental and social stage in the life-history of mankind, to account for it."—ibid., No. 3127.

Lanier, Sidney, 1842-1881, b. at Macon, Ga.; educated at Oglethorpe College, Midway, Ga.; served as a private in the Confederate army during the civil war, and in 1863, while in charge of a blockade-runner, was captured and spent several months in prison. He was subsequently a clerk, a teacher, and a lawyer, but during the last ten years of his life devoted himself to literature, while struggling against the inroads of consumption. His poem entitled Corn, which was published in Lippincott's Magazine in 1875, attracted much attention, and he was engaged by Mr. Dudley Buck to write the words for a cantata by Mr. Dudley Buck performed at the opening of the Centennial Exhibition. In 1877 he settled in Baltimore, and in 1879 was appointed lecturer on English literature at Johns Hopkins University. 1. Tiger-Lilies: a Novel, N. York, 1867, 16mo. "The characteristic feature of Mr. Lanier's treatise is the application of the principles and notation of music to English verse. . . In a learned and interesting preface Mr. Lanier gives an historical sketch of the attempts to construct a theory of the new technique of English verse. He thinks this sketch justifies a new attempt. . . The whole work shows extensive reading and a refined taste both in poetry and in music."—Nation, xxxi. 316.

10. Poems, [edited by his Wife; with a Preface by Dr. William Hayes Ward,] N. York, 1884, 8vo. "It is a book of absorbing interest and will, if we mistake not, raise the dead poet to a much higher position than has yet been conceded to him. . . The man is prominent in earnest; his character is simple, and if his poems are not so, it is because of youth and ill health and an almost morbid conscientiousness in the direction of certain theories of sound and phrase. . . It grows clearer and clearer how much we lost in Sidney Lanier."—Nation, xxxix. 927.

"Lanier died so early that he did not really show us more than the bud of his genius; but if he had lived ten years longer he would, we believe, have ranked high poet of the past."—Spectator, December 6, 1880.

Moreover, to a large extent, the author breathes fresh ground."—Sat. Rev., lili, 243.

"It is a genuine record of a remarkable expedition, written by a traveller who has evidently eyes with which to see clearly, and a mind free from prejudice or bias, whether political or theological. "A most important and valuable contribution to our knowledge of the subject. . . Dr. Lansdell has done good service by visiting the Russian prisons and describing, we are sure, with fidelity, what he saw. But it is to be feared that he has gone too far in giving a definite and complete denial to the charges of cruelty and oppression brought against the agents of the Russian government by Prince Kropotkin, M. Larkin, Henry, at one time "collector or cashier of the Chelsea steamers," afterwards a partner in some prosperous metallurgy or engineering business; assisted Carlyle in the preparation of indexes, &c., 1855-58, and is thus spoken of by him:

"He did for me all manner of maps, indexes, summaries, copyings, sortings, miscellanea of every kind, in a way not to be surpassed for completeness, integrity, patience, exactitude, and labor; continual absence of fuss.—Letters and Memorials of Jane Welsh Carlyle, Amer. ed., li, 114.

Carlyle, and the Open Secret of his Life, Lon., 1886, 8vo.

"Though what Mr. Larkin says is well worth considering, he has not succeeded very well in making out his case for what he terms the 'open secret' of Carlyle's life. This 'open secret,' briefly stated, is that, so far from Carlyle being a man of letters by preference, the darling desire of his soul was to be a man of affairs—a social reformer of this age of shams in somewhat the same fashion as Cromwell was the social reformer of another age of shams. . . On this subject Mr. Larkin is an advocate rather than a critic. He holds a brief for this fantastic theory; but his case is inherently so weak that all his strenuous efforts, combined with undoubted integrity, entirely fail to maintain it. . . When Mr. Larkin leaves the realm of fancy and settles himself to sober criticism, his discourse becomes decidedly more instructive."—WALTER LEWIN: Aud., xxix, 407.

"Essentially a sporting novel, with a spiritual ending suggested by the taste of the age. . . . But in its way the book is thoroughly clever, lively, and altogether readable, and even, as a study of a certain kind of life and character, instructive. The writer is not a mere fox-hunter or a worshipper of fox-hunters, but a cultivated man, with a style decidedly more artistic than that of novelists in general, and full—the full—of point and literary and historical allusion."—*Sat. "His style is clear, nervous, and highly graphic, though somewhat spoiled by that affectation of swagger which looks as if he thought the pen of the writer must be held in the fist of the athlete. On his own ground, amid the struggles of the turf and the talk of the stable, he has no superior among the writers of the day. . . . And into his flashes of sporting wit, or his episodes of fast life generally, it is in his defective grasp of moral reality and his preposterous elevation of the physical and material over all other elements of character, that he debars himself from writing with only a single idea, and that anything but a profound and wholesome one."—*Sat. Lazarus, Miss Emma, 1849-1887, b. in New York City, of Jewish parents, and educated by private tutors. She showed very early a poetic gift; her first verses were inspired by the outbreak of the civil war, when she was eleven years old, and her earliest published volume was composed of poems and translations written between the ages of fourteen and seventeen. For some years her poems were published for the most part in Lippincott's Magazine. Her later lyrics and some critical and political articles were sent to the Century. In 1882, when a great immigration of Russian Jews to New York took place, she published articles in the American Hebrew suggesting a system of technical education as a means towards their employment, a plan which was put into execution. From that time she devoted her pen to Hebrew subjects, publishing an article in the Century on Russian Christianity versus Modern Judaism, which attracted much attention. 1. Admetus, and other Poems, N. York, 1866, er. 8vo. 2. "Among the pieces which we think are to be praised for positive merits of their own are those composing a series which the author names 'Epochs.' These are in a way sentimental poems; but there is in them a naturalness of certain artistic reserve of expression, a firm hold on the feeling, which altogether seem to us worthy of high praise.—Nation, xiv, 92.

Her chief poems are all good. She is able to produce vivid effect without display of force. Her stidty is however, something—and not much—wanting to complete her success and place her alongside of the masters. Each of the poems we have named has conspicuous merits. In the thought of our day, she fails to give us a translation as the version which would now be found. "Admetus," which gives title to the volume, is, we think, the best of the poems. Its abrupt opening, its progress, and its terminally splendidly descriptive passages."—Atk., No. 2294.

"It is the result of a vast amount of patient labor, of endless reading in almost the whole range of Church history. . . . This mass of material Mr. Lea has not only read and noted, but digested; so that what might easily have degenerated into an unresolvable jumble of scattered notes appears as a well-ordered whole, so carefully arranged in its divisions that one has little difficulty in holding the thread of the narrative."—Nation, xxxviii, 239.

4. Translations, and other Rhymes, Phila., 1882, 12mo. Privately printed. 5. A History of the Inquisition of the Middle Ages, N. York, 1887-88, 3 vols. 8vo.

"Mr. Lea takes his subject in its widest meaning. By the history of the Inquisition he means not merely an account of the institution itself, but an exhaustive examination of the social, intellectual, and political conditions which produced it. He means, further, an array of illustrations of its working and of its effects upon society, such as make any serious doubts as to the general accuracy of his presentation impossible. . . . It may be safely said that no presentation of the story of the Inquisition by previous writers can be at all compared with this for its clearness of vision, its comprehension of the problem, and its thoroughness of research."—Nation, xli, 49.

"He has chosen a subject of extreme interest and importance, and has treated it in a manner that leaves nothing to be desired with respect to erudition, while he has at the same time produced a thoroughly readable book, well arranged, full of incident, and vigorously written."—Sat. Rev., lxvi, 22.

"The book begins with a survey of all that led to the growth of heresy, and to the creation, in the thirteenth century, of exceptional tribunals for its suppression. There can be no doubt that this is the least satisfactory portion of the whole. It is followed by a singularly careful account of the steps, legislative and administrative, by which church and state combined to organize the Inquisition, and of the manner in which its methods were formed by practice. Nothing in European literature can compete with this, the centre and substance of Mr. Lea's great history. In the remaining volumes he summons his witnesses, calls on the nations to declare their experience, and tells how the new force acted upon society to the end of the middle ages. History of this undepicted and international cast, which summons the witness of visible unity and progression, and has seldom succeeded so well as in this rich but unequal and disjointed narrative. . . . As a philosophy of religious persecution the book is inadequate. The derivation of sects, though resting always upon good supports, stands out from an indistinct background of dogmatic history. The intruding maxims, darkened by shadows of earth, fail to insure all times the objective and delicate handling of mediæval theory. But the vital parts are protected by a panoply of mail. From the Albigensian crusade to the fall of the Templars and to that Franciscan movement wherein the key to Dante lies, the design and organization, the activity and decline of the Inquisition constitute a sound and solid structure that will survive the censure of all critics."—Lord Acton: English Historical Review, No. 12.

2. A Non. New ed., the Spirit of Rationalism in Europe, Lon., 1865, 2 vols. 8vo; 3d ed., 1872.

"He is the historian of the rise and progress of that resistance to the Christianity of clerical interpretation which has gone by the names of private judgment, rationalism, latitudinarianism, blasphemy, infidelity, or atheism, according to the speaker and his bias. . . . It is a heap of odd historical facts, with incidental remarks, all tending to one end,—namely, the exhibition of the slow progress from slavery to freedom."—Ath., No. 160.

3. History of European Morals from Augustus to Charlemagne, Lon., 1869, 2 vols. 8vo; 3d ed., 1877.

"Mr. Lecky's forte is his power of bringing a great number of scattered social phenomena to a focus, putting together meeting these generalized appearances one with another; broad facts to philosophizing. . . . he does not seem to us so strong. . . . But after all allowances made for imperfect execution, and for the great diversities of judgment which must inevitably arise on Mr. Lecky's subject, his book occupies a field which no one in England has yet attempted to think about."—Sat. Rev., xxvii, 588.

4. A History of England in the Eighteenth Century: vols. i, ii, Lon., 1878, 8vo; 3d ed., rev., 1882.

"We find in this 'History of the Eighteenth Century' the old unwearyed industry, especially in the by-paths of literature, his delicate subtlety of observation, and the same dexterity in the toady him of life, which are apt to be changes. The eighteenth century has been examined by many historians, but few of them have cast their plummet-deeps to take note, as he has done, of those undercurrents, often running counter to that flowing on the former hurrying on the life. A wealth of the ocean to the aspires to understand that alternately maligned and glorified. . . . And yet it does not show Mr. Lecky at his chain of observations on the morals and manners of the last age."—Spectator, ii, 247.

"Vol. iii., iv., 1882.

"In none of the three principal divisions of the narrative contained in these volumes [the king's struggle for personal government, the revolt of the American colonies, and Irish history] Mr. Lecky untruce to what we have formerly recognized as his most admirable qualities as an historical writer. Whatever showiness—if we may use the term—there may heretofore have been about his manner, he has now learnt to eschew; he neither seeks to dazzle by multitudinous facts nor to smother account by swift generalizations. . . . His fairness of mind never seems to abandon his good will."—Sat. Rev., iv, 85.

Vol. v., vi., 1887; vols. vii., viii., completing the work, 1890. (The last two vols. deal exclusively with the history of Ireland from 1793 to the passing of the act of Union.)

"His view of history and of the progress of civilization is essentially Whiggish. . . . That Mr. Lecky has accomplished his difficult task with impartiality and in a manner worthy of his reputation will, I think, be admitted by every one who has any independent acquaintance with all the original sources of his information. To admit this is not necessarily to imply absolute agreement with all his conclusions, but it is to acknowledge that he has never willfully suppressed any fact material to the arguments of those who differ from him."—R. DUNLOP: Acad., xxxviii, 441.

"Mr. Lecky's history—and we use the phrase in no injudicious sense, but rather honoris causa—is a work of golden mediocrity."—S. Rev., iv, 627.

Lee, William, superintending inspector of the General Board of Health. Daniel Defoe: his Life and Recently-Discovered Writings, extending from 1716 to 1729, Lon., 1869, 3 vols. 8vo. (Two of the volumes consist of essays, letters, and miscellaneous articles not previously known to have been written by Defoe, while the memoir embraces many new facts, corrects numerous errors in former biographies, and throws much new light on Defoe's character and career.)

"A recent discovery has been the means not only of adding a new chapter to the history of Defoe, but of bringing about little less than a revolution in the estimate in which his character has been popularly held. The thanks of the public are due to Mr. Lee for the pains with which he has followed the clue thus unexpectedly afforded. His own partiality or admiration makes him, indeed, scarcely sensible of the havoc which his revelation must inevitably play with the reputation of his idol. . . . Nevertheless, whatever critical value we may attach to his judgment in this respect, there can be no two opinions as to the importance of the materials which his industry and zeal have placed at our disposal."—*Sat. "The book is a good book and extremely readable, notwithstanding the drawbacks to which we have called attention. We are sure that the authors must be capital fellows, and the pleasantest companions in their private well. . . . Nothing in the book is more entertaining than the details of their camp life and devices."—Sat. Rev., lili, 512.

"So cleverly and cunningly written that it is almost impossible to discover exactly who the two out of the three are who have written it. It is one of the smartest specimens of what may be called literary thimble-rigging that we have ever met. Now the writers seem to speak from under the Skipper's thimble, now from Esau's, sometimes even from John's, but whoever or how many wrote it, the result is charming in its freshness and good humour."—*Edin. Peel and O'Connell: a Review of the Irish Policy of Parliament from the Act of Union to the Death of Sir Robert Peel, Lon., 1887, 8vo.

"The object of this book appears to be to show that in their dealing with Irish affairs Peel was almost invariably wrong and O'Connell was almost invariably right, and that therefore Home-Rule ought to be granted by the English people. To illustrate and enforce this position, the history of the Irish Question during the last fifty years of the Union is given, based chiefly on a study of the 'Annual Register,' the memoirs and biographies of the time, and the Parliamentary publications of the last few years."—Spectator, ix, 1625.

Leith, William Forbes, S.J. 1. The Scots Men-at-Arms and Lifeguards in France, 1418-1830: with Etched Plates by Major H. de Grandmison, Edin., 1882, 2 vols. 4to.

"The chief aim of his work is archaeological. He publishes the 'muster rolls' of the Scots men-at-arms in France, and with an introductory sketch sufficient to show the importance of the part played by his countrymen. . . . The book is printed on large paper and is enriched by a number of admirable etchings. . . . Only three hundred and twelve copies of this édition de luxe have been printed."—Ath., No. 289.

Leland, Charles Godfrey, [ante, vol. 1, add.], resided chiefly in London from 1869 to 1880, and studied the language, history, and customs of the Gypsy race. Returning to Philadelphia, he introduced a system of industrial art into the public schools. He has since returned to London. 1. Science in Thought; or, The Joys in Art and Literature, &c. N. Scheffel and others, Lon., 1872, sq. 16mo. 13. The Egyptian Sketch-Book, Lon., 1873, p. 8vo.

"Mr. Leland evidently considers himself entitled to indulge in the vagaries of a professed humorist. . . . A large, probably the largest, part of the book is deliberately intended to be simply amusing; and we are not a little desirous to grapple with the tremendous social and industrial problems which this wonderful country presents. . . . We may say unhesitatingly that, however funny he may be, he thinks himself funnier than he is. He makes a great many jokes which are simply failures, and others which we are afraid are simply vulgar. . . . Mixed with that he is a man of reading, of intelligence, and even of cultivated taste."—Sat. Rev., xxxvi. 45.

14. The English Gypsies and their Language, Lon., 1873, er. 8vo; 2d ed., 1874.

"For the simple traits it gives of gipsy life, and the many curious facts with which it teems respecting this little-known people and their language, his book deserves to be read with attention and thanks."—Sat. Rev., xxxvi. 703.

15. Fusing; or, The Discovery of America by Chinese Buddhist Priests in the Fifth Century, Lon., 1875, p. 8vo.

"This is not the first time that Hock-shim's name has been introduced to the European public. . . . Our only marvel is that any one should have been found who was willing to support the assertions of so untrustworthy a traveller."—Sat. Rev., xl. 286.

"Some day I look for the answer to our Egyptian question; I looked in this book for it and found it not. But the book itself is always delightful reading."—FRANCIS HINDES GROOME: Acad., xxii. 129.

21. The Algonquin Legends of New England; or, Myths and Folk-Lore of the Miami, Passamaquoddy, and Penobscot Tribes, Bost., 1884, 8vo.

"In making this collection Mr. Leland has entered upon a comparatively unexplored field of literary research, and as he has evidently given much patient labor to the preparation of the volume, his opinions are entitled to careful consideration, even though they do not always carry conviction."—Saton, xxxix. 531.

"Mr. Leland thinks that a good deal of Eddie lore has filtered through the Eskimo to the Algonquins. . . . We confess that after reading all Mr. Leland's tales—very fine tales, very well told—we are slightly inclined not to believe in Scandinavian influence on the Algonquin legends."—Ath., No. 2988.

Leonowens, Mrs. Anna Harriette, b. 1834, in Caernarvon, Wales; daughter of Thomas M. Crawford, a British officer, who was killed by the Sikhs at Lahore; married to Thomas Leonowens, of the British army. In 1863, being a widow, she was appointed governess to the family of the King of Siam, and also acted as secretary to the king in his foreign correspondence. In 1867 she removed to the United States and settled in New York City, where she established a school for the training of kindergarten-teachers. 1. The English governess at the Siamese Court: being Recollections of Six Years in the Royal Palace at Bangkok; with Illustrations from Photographs presented to the Author by the King of Siam, Boston and Lon., 1870, 8vo.

Whenever the author is occupied with the story of her intercourse with the royal family, she is very lively and every way admirable. . . . When the author comes outside of the palace gates, and away from the immediate care of her pupils, she grows uninteresting. . . . It is one of the most entertaining of recent books of travel. —Naton, xii, 161.

"She is obviously a keen and sensible observer, and made good use of the opportunities which her unique position opened to her. . . . Altogether her book is one of which the blemishes will be readily forgiven for the sake of the novel, strange, and instructive matter which she brings before the public." —Sat. Rev., xxxi, 57.

2. The Romance of the Harem. Illust. Boston, 1873, 12mo; Eng. ed., entitled "The Romance of Siamese Harem Life," Lon., 1874, 8vo.

"She has succeeded in collecting from the lips of the actors in them half a dozen or so of Oriental tales, concerning most of which it is not too much to say that they are interesting, and that one or two of them, in poetical and tragical interest, are hardly surpassed by the most admired love-stories in the literature of the world." —Afton, xvi, 337.

"Her style has manifestly improved since the publication of her former work. . . . A volume of much interest to the general reader, and some pictures of Oriental manners and character, marred, indeed, by high colouring and by the omission of many prominent features, but still unfamiliar to the inhabitants of the West, and more illustrative of Eastern habits and phases of thought than anything which we have fallen in with elsewhere." —Ath., No. 2961.

"Miss Mitford's letters show a mind and nature to which no literary success could do full justice. They show a life of extraordinary versatility, in harmony with its times, and keeping its powers and interests in books and men vigorous to the last. They illustrate for fifty years the art and literature of the day. . . We reverence in her the vivacity of a good and popular letter-writer,—a ready pen the better kind of gossip, a wish to amuse, the power of granting criticism,—hitting off an impression in a few apt phrases,—and the inspiring quality of taking a bright view of new things, whether a new book or a new picture or a new friend. . . One chief interest of her letters is the portraits, characters, and traits of distinguished people who came in her way. . . We seldom meet with a well-acteristic, and striking knowledge and appreciation."—Sat. Rev., xxviii, 737.

No competent judge will undervalue Lady Theresa's wise share in the merit of the volumes which she has published. Her exercise of patience, of research, of candour and judgment has organized an unwieldy mass of papers into an interesting biography. "This is a fine series of lectures, in which our readers will find some of the most candid, temperate, and thoughtful answers which have ever been given to the religious doubts of our day, and will find these answers arranged with all that lucid beauty of statement and profound depth of feeling which have long constituted the fascination of Dr. Liddon's sermons."—Spectator, xiv. 1205.

"Thoughtful as Dr. Liddon's sermons are in substance, refined and weighty in style, clear in exposition and arrangement, splendidly eloquent in certain passages, there is undoubtedly a tendency to fall into one or two limited trains of thought, which makes all his sermons slightly monotonous in tone."—Spectator, lix. 667.

"There are few sermons in the rich and varied literature of the pulpit which would compare with these sermons of Canon Liddon's for eloquence of expression, for depth of conviction, for delicacy of discrimination in distinguishing the most vivid elements of human experience, for power in describing the characteristic facts of human nature, and for that refinement of feeling which enables the preacher to use all his eloquence, all his earnestness, all his insight into imaginative beauty, and all his knowledge of human character, without for a moment jarring those chords of our nature on which the religious orator too often strikes so as to make us shrink from him."—Spectator, lxi. 342.

"Cultivate in his intellectual framework, he was eminently plastic in every other field of life,—in sympathy, in imagination, in affection, in sensibility, in logical tenacity, in mental alertness, in mode of expression, in turns of feeling. . . . Thus he had the double gift of the preacher. He impressed, he organized, he mastered, by the exercise of unshakable solidity which his mental characteristics assumed to him. . . . And yet at the service of this unimpaired creed was a brain, a heart alive with infinite motion about it, in rich variety, fertile, resourceful, quick, and expanding, vital."—CASON SCOTT HOLLAND: Contemporary Review, Oct. 1890.

2. Chapters in European History: with an Introductory Dialogue on the Philosophy of History, Lon., 1886, 2 vols. 8vo.

"Speaking roughly, we should say that the central view of the work was to illustrate the supreme importance of the Christian Revelation as forming the substratum of the whole fabric of European society and civilization, while the Renaissance marks a growing revolt against the entire Christian conception of life, and the Revolution of '89, &c. . . . Of the work as a whole we can speak in terms of high praise, for its copious learning and wealth of varied illustration, its graphic style, and its luminous handling of a great theme."—*Sat. "We may accept this admirable treatise as a sort of forecast of the larger and more comprehensive work on wood-engraving which is expected from the author. . . . It is what it purports (purposes?) to be—a manual of instruction; not a few hints more or less carefully arranged, but a thorough and business-like treatise on essential points. . . . As might be expected from Mr. Linton, the book is likewise somewhat controversial. He is not content with explaining the intelligence and art with which Bewick and Thomson chose their lines, but he must point out how absent these qualities are in much modern work which passes for fine wood-engraving."—Acad., xxxi, 32.

When the two authors deal with the same subject, as in their remarks on the flora and thorough-going workmanlike method tells, very much as pretty stroke. Happily, however, Mr. Shaw dwells very largely, as the title of his volume indicates, on the history of the relations between France and Madagascar, to which his brother-missionary makes but a slight and passing and social description very much to himself."—Spectator, lviii, 200.

Livingstone, Rev. David, D.D., [ante, vol. i, nll.] 1817-1873, b. at Blantyre, Lanarkshire, Scotland; began at ten years of age to work in a cotton-mill; was educated at Glasgow University, continuing his work in the mill during the vacations; studied medicine and theology; received the license of the Glasgow Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons in 1838; was ordained in 1840, and sent to Africa as an agent of the London Missionary Society. He married the daughter of the Rev. Robert Moffat in 1844, and she accompanied him on his journeys till her death in 1862. With the exception of his visits to England in 1856-58 and in 1864-65, Livingstone remained in Africa, making the explorations which have rendered his name pre-eminent among discoverers in the present century. He had severed his connection with the London Missionary Society, but never ceased to consider himself a missionary. A report of his death reached England in 1867, but was disproved by letters afterwards received from him. In February, 1871, the proprietor of the New York Herald sent Henry M. Stanley, infra, in search of Livingstone, who was found at Ujiji in November; but, though very ill, he refused to return to England, having determined to discover the true sources of the Nile. He struggled on until May 1, 1873, when he died at Ujiji. His body was carried to England and buried in Westminster Abbey. For biog., see BLAIR, W., supra, MARRAT, J., and MOSSMAN, S., loc. cit. 1. Expedition to the Zambesi and its Tributaries, Lon., 1865, 8vo. 2. The Last Journals of David Livingstone in Central Africa, from 1865 until his Death; continued by a Narrative of his Last Moments and Sufferings obtained from his Faithful Servants, Chuma and Susi. By Horace Waller, F.R.G.S., Rector of Tagwell, Northampton. With Portrait, Map, and Illustrations. Lon., 1874, 2 vols. 8vo.

"These Journals are the best work that I have ever had from Livingstone's pen, but it is impossible to condemn too severely the careless, vulgar, and ignorant way in which Mr. Waller has edited them. . . . It is in the exposition of Waller most conspicuously faulty. . . . He has virtually left out sign-post or tracks, more bewildering to the general reader than the wide and desolate wastes through which Livingstone himself passed. . . . The narrative of Livingstone's last sufferings and death, and of the transport of his body to Zanzibar, . . . has been admirably elaborated by Mr. Waller. . . . deserves great praise for the excellence of his editing. . . . No editing, however, can possibly do for us what Livingstone could have done himself. At best we must be content with receiving the raw materials of a book of travels instead of the complete book."—Nat. Rev., xxxviii, 501.

Lockyer, Joseph Norman, F.R.S., b. 1836, at Rugby, Eng.; was educated in private schools and on the Continent, and became a clerk in the War Office in 1857. In 1870 he was appointed secretary to the Royal Commission on Scientific Instruction and astronomical lecturer in the Normal School of Science in London, and in 1871 he was elected Rede lecturer to the University of Cambridge. He was chief of the English Government Eclipse expedition to Sicily in 1870 and to India in 1871, and was awarded the Rumford medal in 1874. 1. Elementary Lessons in Astronomy, Lon., 1868, 18mo; new ed., 1878. 2. The Spectroscope and its Applications. Whatever judgment may be formed as to the validity of his hypothesis, the indefatigable arduous work which he has attacked the great problem of the constitution of the sun, and the skill with which he has devised fresh methods of testing and re-testing the meaning of the phenomena observed and the soundness of the arguments based thereon, merit the warmest acknowledgment."—A. Both stopped short at the year 1801, while Mr. Gibbs took his 'Memoir of Alexander Hamilton,' which is also better known under the more ambitious title of 'History of the Republic,' stops with the death of its principal character to the extinction of Federalism in the peace of Ghent. There remains to be written only the life of Rufus King to place Federalism in our complete picture before the eyes of historians. . . . Mr. Lodge aims, like the others, at presenting his side of the picture, and, naturally, the view of which he speaks for himself. . . . Longfellow, Henry Wadsworth, [ante, vol. I, add.], 1807-1882. Longfellow's later years, though very overshadowed by the sudden death of his wife in 1861, were scarcely less productive than the earlier ones had been. Soon after that event he undertook a translation of Dante's Divine Comedy, and long before this task was completed he resumed the habit of original composition, a habit which had marked his style from the first, while his popularity steadily increased on both sides of the Atlantic, and has not been eclipsed by that of any of his contemporaries. "This translation is sufficiently exact to furnish a good test of what is not in Dante for those who might be misled by the license of rhymed versions or the blunders of more or less learned commentators; but it may take time and trouble to get a true feeling of what is in him from his dry, plain, . . . Sat. Rev., xxiv. 27.

"Here at last that much suffering reader will find Dante's greatness manifest, and his greatness only, but his grace, his simplicity, and his affection. Here he will find strength matched with wonderful sweetness, and dignity with quaintness. . . Dante of the thirteenth century to take from this lofty presence, depending the book, we stand may well marvel if he has not sung to us in his own Tuscan."—W. B. Howells, Nation, iv. 192.

5. The New England Tragedies, Boston, 1868, 16mo. "His theme is a well-worn one at the best, and perhaps, with all the powers of pleasing which our charming author has at his command, it would have been impossible for him to have made anything very interesting out of the Puritan persecution of the Quakers, or the sufferings of the Salem witches and wizards. . . but whatever success or want of it Mr. Longfellow, as a sentimental narrator of the old story, he could not—it was evident before-hand, and is now manifest—succeed either in the dramatic or the novel-writer's way of dealing with it. He has must have, and which the novelist also requires; his skill in reproducing more than the outside of distant times and people and places is of the slightest; he has never conducted a character."—Nation, vii. 331.

6. The Divine Tragedy, Boston, 1871, 12mo. "Mr. Longfellow has been successful in many fields. . . We cannot congratulate him on any sort of degree of success here; and yet if Passion Plays set to music, where angels fear to tread, we do not doubt that his 'Divine Tragedy' will stand in favourable and dignified comparison with most or all of them."—*Sat. "The 'Book of Sonnets,' which forms the last part of the volume, is, to our mind, the best of all. (Of the structural and the severe correctness of the Italian model, Mr. Longfellow is a perfect master; and the thought, whether pathetic or action, seems here to be cast a finer and stronger mould than before."—Sat. Rev., xl. 654.

"Of all the contents of the volume, the last part, the 'Book of Sonnets,' is that which shows Mr. Longfellow at his best. . . In these admirable poems, the poet, the artist, and the man find their fullest expression."—Nation, xxii. 14.

"Longfellow, like all poets who had not any great originality of initiative, was singularly dependent on his subjects for his success; but when his subject suited him, he presents it with the simplicity of a really great classic, with all its points in classic, and with nothing of the self-conscious or artificial tone, and with nothing of the self-torture to the admirable insight with which he has grasped the situation. He can be very conventional when his subject is conventional. When it is not, but is intrinsically poetical, no one gives us its poetry more free from the impurities of subjective ecstasies than he. He was not a plebeian, and, whenever his subject suited him, a singularly classical poet, who knew how to pruned away every exuberance of irrelevant emotion."—Spectator, lv.

"Longfellow in his voluminous works seems to me not only to be eminent in the style and forms of expression (of verbal melody), but to bring what is, almost a sickness, must be so in the general human heart and taste, and probably sort of bard and entertainer most needed for our materialistic, self-assertive, money-worshipping, Anglo-Saxon rares, and especially for the present age in America,—an age tyrannically regulated with reference to the manufacturer, the merchant, the diplomat, the politician, and the day workman; for whom and among whom he comes as the poet of melody, courtesy, deference,—poet of the mellow twilight of the past in Italy, Germany, Spain, and in Northern Europe, poet of all sympathetic gentleness, and universal poet of women and young people.”—WALT WHITMAN: “Death of Longfellow,” in Essays from the Critic, 32.

Longfellow, Rev. Samuel, [ante, vol. 1, add.] b. 1819, in Portland, Me.; graduated at Harvard in 1839, and at the Divinity School in 1846; was pastor of a Unitarian congregation in Brooklyn, N.Y., 1853-60; spent some time in Europe, and on his return resided in Cambridge, Mass.; was minister of a church in Germantown, Pa., from 1878 till 1882, when he returned to Cambridge. 1. (Ed.) Life of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow; with Extracts from his Journals and Correspondence, Boston, 1866, 2 vols. 8vo.

“The work is essentially Longfellow’s diary, expanded and illustrated in parts by letters. . . . The social feature in Longfellow’s life is, perhaps, the leading trait of this work, and its most immortal part; its charm is to be felt, as the editor justly says, only by the perusal of a multitude of details as they follow day by day in the record of the poet’s own hand. Scarcely second to this, however, is his friendship and association with books. . . . We have . . . a full and delightful history of the external aspects of a lettered life in a refined society, as it was led by a man who fulfilled his duties in the varied relations of his sphere in a way that made his days beautiful and his memory a humanizing influence upon all who have any perception of the sources of its charm. . . . Nevertheless these volumes are neither a complete account nor a thorough study of Longfellow’s life.”—Nation, xlii. 391.

“The editor of these volumes has done his work well. The extracts he gives from the journals are many, but not superabundant; and the story he tells, if here and there hardly full enough, leaving too much for the reader to trace out for himself, is graphic. The book as a whole gives just that insight into the poet’s habits and character which is wanted, and is a good example of what narrative biography should be. . . . Critical biography must not be looked for from a man’s brother.”—WALTER LEWIS: Acad., xlii. 391.

2. Final Memorials of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, Boston, 1887, 8vo.

“The third volume was a needful complement to the other two, which left many little personal traits unnoticed. . . . A more simple and faithful record of Mr. Longfellow’s life and writings could not be desired than that furnished by his brother.”—Sat. Rev., lxxv. 493.

Lowell, Edward Jackson, b. 1845, in Boston; graduated at Harvard 1867. The Hessians and the other German Auxiliaries of Great Britain in the Revolutionary War. Maps. N. York, 1884, 12mo.

"Mr. Lowell is always just and fair in his judgment, and combines sound historical training with an excellent style. . . . In the way of new information Mr. Lowell has interwoven into his narrative twelve manuscripts, consisting of journals, letters, and reports written by Hessians or Waldeck officers, and kept in the library of the Cassel estates."—Nation, xxxviii, 325.

Lowell, James Russell, D.C.L., LL.D., [ante, vol. i, add.] editor of the Atlantic Monthly 1857-62, and joint editor of the North American Review 1862-72; U.S. minister to Spain 1877-80, and to England 1880-85; lord rector of the University of Glasgow 1883-84. During his residence in England he delivered many public addresses, including one on occasion of the unveiling of a bust of Coleridge in Westminster Abbey. Since his return to America he has delivered a course of lectures on the English dramatists at the Lowell Institute, 1887, and read papers before public audiences at Chicago and elsewhere. He is one of the few American writers whose reputation stands equally high on both sides of the Atlantic. 1. Poetical Works, Bost., 1858, 2 vols. 16mo. 2. 5. Under the Willows, and other Poems, Bost., 1868, 16mo.

"Auf Wiedersehen" appears to be . . . free from faults,—a gem without flaw and a gem of pure ray. This is what cannot be said of very many of Mr. Lowell's poems, which too often bear evident marks of haste. . . . Yet, after making whatever abatements it has occurred to us to make in the course of a long acquaintance with Mr. Lowell's poetry, it remains as a duty not to take leave of it on any occasion when it has been spoken of at any length without saying, as a last word, that taken altogether, we have nothing so good; unless, possibly, we except a little of Emerson,—and to make that exception we are not wholly willing."—Nation, vii, 554.

"The secret of Mr. Lowell's art is an exact fidelity to his impressions. He does not work them up with self-conscious elaboration, nor draw on an artificial imagination, but reproduces with careful simplicity the actual vision and sensation, as they were to him. . . . In two pieces included in the volume before Mr. Lowell rises to inspired lyric height. The "Ode to Happiness" is full of suppressed force. . . . But by far the finest piece in the volume is the really noble "Commemoration Ode."—Sat. Rev., xxvii, 23.

7. Among my Books, Bost., 1870, 12mo.

"Containing the deliberate words of perhaps the best of living English critics,—his final judgments on many of the great names of literature; judgments which are the result of long and wide study and reading, of marvellous acuteness of sight and delicacy of sympathy; combining a poet's opinion of other poets, a wit's opinion of other wits; in short, the careful opinions of a man of cultivated genius concerning other men of genius who are near and dear to all of us, but to all of us partly unbelieved without an interpreter,—this book of Mr. Lowell's is one of the last gifts that for many years has come to the world of English literature; and to say this still is to say one of the best gifts that has for many years come to the world of literature."—Nation, x, 238.

"Added to the impression of keenness and first-hand work . . . there is the vitality, the vim which so often forms a charm in the writings of a really cultivated American."—Sat. Rev., xxxix, 74.

"This is a thoroughly charming book. Its freshness and grace, its quiet fun and its subtle wit, its insight and sound judgment, as well in literature as in politics, put it easily above any similar collection of essays that the English-speaking world has seen for some time."—Ath., No. 2269.

9. Among my Books. Second Series. 1876, 12mo.

"It was worth while to collect these studies of Mr. Lowell; they stand well also as the average of critical articles in the Reviews; but none of them possesses a monumental perfection or enduringness."—Edward Dowden's Acad., lx, 252.

"Few living writers have at once so much knowledge of political literature and so much critical power as Mr. Lowell, and certainly none of those who in knowledge and power are his equals would be guilty of the sad fault of taste which he seems to take a positive pleasure in committing."—Sat. Rev., xli, 624.

"The great distinction to be made between the present volume and the ones that have preceded it is the absence of the light, humorous tone and casual discussion which used to render Mr. Lowell such pleasant reading for a vacant hour."—Spectator, xliii, 925.

10. Poetical Works: with a Critical Preface by William Michael Rossetti, Lon., 1880, 12mo.

"The judgment delivered by Mr. W. M. Rossetti in his lucid prefatory notice, that Mr. Lowell's chief claim to admiration must rest on his 'Biglow Papers,' cannot be successfully challenged. This fact, however, still permits the conviction that there is present in Mr. Lowell's poetry of thought and sentiment a purity of tone, a tenderness of feeling, a general grace, and at times an absolute beauty of expression, which our world would be the poorer for losing."—Ath., No. 2733.

11. Democracy, and other Addresses, Bost., 1886, 16mo.

Less a reasoned criticism of books or life or institutions than the overflow of an opulent mind, it would be impossible to submit such work to criticism as it would be unfruitful; and it is unnecessary to notice anew the traits of style, the felicities of phrase, the charm, eloquence, and humor which are familiar to two generations of our people."—Nation, xliii, 625.

13. Political Essays, Bost., 1888, 16mo. (Most of these essays were first published during or soon after the civil war, and relate to the events of that period.)

"It is the political and social moralist sitting in judgment on offences against primal laws; not the politician decrying the men and measures of a rival or hostile party. . . . It is not simply this quality that keeps them fresh to-day; it is, quite as much, that literary charm which pervades all of Mr. Lowell's writings."—Critic, x, 111.

GENERAL CRITICISM:

"Mr. Lowell's poetry has simply gone on perfecting itself in form and diction, until now he is as complete a specimen of a 'literary man's poet,' of the consummate artist in expression,—when the lover of the art of expression is hard put to it to judge impartially from sheer delight in his workmanship,—as it would be easy to find in a sumptuous edition of belles-lettres he has scarcely any living equal; and marks for sanity than any other quality of criticism, of perception, and of discriminative faculty, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit in a piece of most commendable freedom from erotechet and affectation, and a consistent sobriety of judgment."—H. Lubbock, Sir John, Bart., F.R.S., LL.D., D.C.L., b. 1834, in London; son of Sir John William Lubbock, (ante, vol. i.) became a partner in his father's banking establishment in 1856, and is president of the Institute of Bankers; M.P. for Maidstone 1870-80, and since then for London University. He has taken an active part in financial and educational measures, but is chiefly known as a scientific writer. He is president of the Linnean Society, vice-president of the Royal Society and the British Association, a trustee of the British Museum, and chairman of the London County Council. He has contributed to the Transactions of learned societies and to the leading reviews. 1. Prehistoric Times as illustrated by Ancient Remains and the Manners and Customs of Modern Savages, Lon., 1865, 8vo; 4th ed., 1878. 2. The Origin of Civilization, and the Primitive Condition of Man, Lon., 1870, 8vo; 3d ed., 1874. (Treats chiefly of family relationship and religion.)

"This interesting and valuable volume illustrates to some extent the way in which the modern scientific spirit manages to extract a considerable treasure from the chaff and refuse neglected or thrown aside by former inquirers. The evidence of savage customs, on which Sir John Lubbock has constructed what is at least a plausible theory of the very earliest condition of human society, has been very generally regarded as too worthless for any conclusions to be founded on it. . . . It was because for the most part collected by persons who had no idea of its importance, and who recorded their stories of savage usages simply to amuse or astonish their readers. . . . But the special importance of Sir J. Lubbock's work arises from the fact that the evidence with which he deals can be multiplied and improved to any extent. . . . The historical order of the ideas which have prevailed among men on the subject of Family Relations is thus stated by Sir J. Lubbock: "First, a child is related to his tribe generally; secondly, to his mother, and not to his father; thirdly, to his father, and not to his mother; lastly, and lastly only, he is related to both. . . . It would seem, therefore, that Sir J. Lubbock's interpretation of the facts which he considers established is precisely the reverse of Mr. Maclean's. . . . The fault of an otherwise admirable book is the somewhat hasty assumption of an historical relation between classes of ideas not shown by any evidence to have grown out of one another."—*Sat. The chapters in which these matters are discussed or alluded to, indeed, are, for general readers, the most interesting in the book."—Ath., No. 394.

- "Had he travelled 'West by East,' coming to California from Japan, instead of taking the opposite direction, he would have been in a better condition to appreciate what there is worthy of notice in a ride across the United States. The only chapters of the ten devoted to this country worth noting are those on Salt Lake City and his interview with President Taylor, and on the labor question on the Pacific coast as affected by the legislation of the Chinese. . . . The account of the home-returning Chinamen on board steamer is interesting, as is also everything which Mr. Lucy writes about Japan."—Nation, xl. 267.

- "This book will be found useful as an aide-memoire, and will probably be frequently consulted for the dates of the great measures which have passed, and for the 'exciting' and 'secure' that have enlivened the debates in two Parliaments most of their predecessors. Mr. Lucy's diary is generally accurate. . . . If his personal sketches are not always in the severest good taste."—Sat. Rev., lxx. 802.
- "A book which most readers will be more inclined to laugh over than to seek instruction from, though those who read it will find it a little less so. There is an abundance of shrewdness and not a little of it in Mr. Lucy's criticism, which, though parties and nearly all politicians alike."—Ath., No. 2966.

12. Kenelm Chillingly: his Adventures and Opinions. Lon., 1873, 3 vols. or 8vo. Poeth.
 "The story is an odd mixture of really shrewd and able writing and the flimsiest sentimental philosophy."—Sat. Rev., xxxv, 456.
 "It is, perhaps, the pleasantest of all Lord Lytton's books: it contains the tenderest of his pictures, perhaps the most truly poetical of his poems, many admirable specimens of his wit, and far less than almost any other of his works of his tinseley rhodomontade."—Spectator, xlv, 476.

13. The Parisians. Illust. Lon., 1873, 4 vols. or 8vo; new ed., 1874, 2 vols. 12mo.
 "Lord Lytton's last three novels . . . form a group by themselves. They are all intended to signalize the danger of certain political and social theories. The 'Coming Race' did this by means of purely fanciful symbols; 'Kenelm Chillingly' was a psychological romance, and 'The Parisians' is a didactic novel. . . . With much good portraiture and some clever writing upon political and social topics, it does not produce a satisfactory impression."—Sat. Rev., xxxvi, 815.

"The Parisians is his author's ripest work. . . . Graces of style, acquired by long labour, have grown into second nature. Egotism has disappeared in a species of gentle, genial ephuretism. We have the last novel of a novelist who, conscious of the lapse of time, is consciously writing for posterity. Many will read it often, none need regret to have carefully read it once."—Ath., No. 2409.

15. Pausanias, the Spartan: an Unfinished Historical Romance. By the Late Lord Lytton. Edited by his Son. Lon., 1876, or 8vo.

"The characters rant like Arabaces, and his love-scenes and political scenes are alike starchy and wearisome."—Ath., No. 2519.

Lytton, Edward Robert Lytton Bulwer, Earl of Lytton, G.C.B., O.C.S.I., C.I.E., b. 1831; son of Baron Lytton, supra; educated at Harrow, and at the University of Bonn; entered the diplomatic service as attaché at Washington 1849; secretary at Lisbon 1865, at Madrid and at Vienna 1868, and at Paris 1872-74; envoy to Portugal 1874-76; governor-general of India 1876-80; ambassador at Paris since 1887; created an earl 1886. His earlier works were published under the pseudonym of "Owen Meredith." "Some of the poems may match in beauty of language and grace of thought with such masterpieces of music as Herlick's, Carew's, Marvell's, Tennyson's, Moore's, or Edgar Poe's. They are, in fact, 'lilies without, roses within.' The fibres of the poet's life are seen through them as lucidly as the roots of a hyacinth are seen through glass."—Ath., No. 1832.

3. Lucile: a Poem, Lon., 1860, or 8vo; new ed., Illust., 1888.

"The tale will enchain those who take it up, if even they conceive that it might as well have been told in prose as in verse, and if even they object, so strongly as ourselves, to the lighter portions, on the same principle as we regret the colloquialisms of Mrs. Browning's novel."—Ath., No. 1696.

"It is based upon supernatural incidents, and is more or less garishly with something in the nature of metaphysical fables. . . . It is very natural that a man who writes such things should like to call himself Owen Meredith, and to put a sham German doctor between his pseudonym and his name."—Sat. Rev., xvi, 294.

"An attempt to popularize among English readers a dramatic poem, the 'Infernal Comedy,' written by Count Alchmann, Krasinski, the Anonymous Poet of Poland. . . . It is a relief to turn to the minor pieces in the volume, most of which are eminently readable."—Sat. Rev., xxvii, 287.

"To write the life of such a man is no easy task. The abundance of the material in some respects increases the difficulty. Where so much is known, it is not easy to make a selection, and the Earl of Lytton can only in two volumes arrive at his father's twenty-ninth year. . . . Readers of these volumes will perhaps be disappointed if they expect much new light to be thrown upon the late Lord Lytton's character and doings."—Sat. Rev., lvi, 806.

13. Glennavril; or, The Metamorphoses. Six Books, Lon., 1885, 2 vols. 12mo.

"To have written a poem in six books at once entertaining, witty, and capable of exalting the reader's interest, is a triumph of literary skill, even if the work in question should in truth be more of a novel in verse than a genuine poem. . . . The earnest student of poetry will, no doubt, feel the lack of sincerity in 'Glennavril,' which, in spite of its fertility of invention and brilliancy of dialogue, may strike some as monstrous in mere invention. He will miss the power of evolving typical forms more than that living man' from the shifting world around, and that incommunicable gift of turning each word that drops from the poet's mouth into the pearls and precious stones of speech. But apart from these rare and superlative qualities, 'Glennavril' may be said to possess most of the merits which a mere narrative poem can possess. It touches on a wonderful variety of topics, the burning questions and most picturesque characteristics of the day, which rarely losing sight of the central idea. . . . the inevitable law of heredity."—Ath., No. 3018.

"There is much in this book that recalls the author's striking and beautiful 'Fables in Song.' It does not, I think, on the whole, maintain so high a level: but it has the same special merit, the same mixture of romantic thought with piercing opercus from life and experience, reminding one of the finer work of the elder Lord Lytton,—the same defect, as I venture to think it, of mingling real poetry with a hard and gritty humour, a crackling of thorns under a pot."—E. Gonzalez Pedrosa, Dublin, 1867, 8vo. 3. Shelley's Early Life, from Original Sources; with Curious Incidents, Letters, and Writings, now first published or collected, Lon., 1872, p. 8vo.

"Mr. MacCarthy has industriously gone over the early part of Shelley's life; he has carefully investigated the statements which have hitherto passed current with bloggers; he has detected many errors; and he has discovered a few new facts which will have to take their place in future lives of Shelley. At the same time the book is interesting rather to Bryan than to the general reader."—Sat. Rev., xxxv. 120.

"Mr. MacCarthy's book is not very easy for consecutive reading. . . . It is, however, a laborious and a thoroughly genuine accession to the biographical materials regarding Shelley, and will probably be indispensable to all students of this period of his life."—W. M. Rowley's Rev., III. 412.

MacCarthy, Justin. b. 1830, at Cork, Ireland, and educated at a private school in that city; was connected with the Cork Examiner and the Liverpool Northern Times, and in 1860 became Parliamentary reporter on the London Morning Star, of which he was editor in 1864-68. During the next three years he travelled in the United States. In 1879 he was elected M.P. for Longford, Ireland. He was re-elected in 1880 and chosen vice-president of the Home Rule party in Parliament, and in 1885, after being defeated at Derry, was again elected at Longford. "His book is a mere hush-up, for the most part, of guide-books and official materials, and his opinions are those of an advocate pleading for his client, rather than the impartial deliverances of a judge."—Spectator, l. 1100.

"The work of Mr. De Leon ('The Khelive's Egypt') is the more readable, entertaining, and easy to remember while that of Mr. MacCoun is the more exhaustive."—Sat. Rev., xlv. 239.

"Encyclopaedic in its range of information, admirably held in style, and a model of method as to arrangement, it contains in something less than four hundred pages an almost complete summary of the financial, economic, and political condition of Egypt. . . . It is, in truth, the only book which faithfully describes the actual material condition of the country. In achieving this result Mr. MacCoun owes little or nothing to previous writers."—AMELIA B. "The chief interest in Mr. MacColl's book is, for us, its able and often eloquent discussion of the principles of Sacerdotalism and Ritualism, and of the sanction which, as he affirms, is given by the teaching of Christ to these principles."—Spectator, xlviii. 756.

10. The Eastern Question: its Facts and Fallacies, Lon., 1877, 8vo.

"The main thesis of Mr. MacColl is that Turks must be bad, not so much because they are Turks, as because they are Mahomedans. . . . Mr. MacColl goes over the ground with a passionate earnestness and an amplitude of illustration which cannot fail to confirm Englishmen in their decision to do nothing to uphold the present government of Turkey."—*Sat. "Although a layman, he was often invited to preach, and indeed he belonged to a sect which is nervously hostile to the recognition of any clerical caste. His discourses were for the most part penned hastily and in hours snatched from far different work, yet they display such vigour, richness, and depth of thought as we find in the sermons of few professional preachers."—Spectator, xlv. 291.

"A fatter, knidlier book was never written. . . The fault, indeed, of Mr. MacCulloch's book, from a critical point of view, is the astounding kindness and delicacy which govern his hand whenever he touches his contemporaries, living or dead. . . Yet it must not be supposed that Mr. MacCulloch's courtesy and kindness have made his sketches of men valueless. On the contrary, the man of banks and business frequently discloses character with the hand of a master."—Nation, xviii, 207.

For some years past he has resided chiefly at Boringharn. In 1877 he received a civil list pension in acknowledgment of his services to literature. He has contributed to Good Words and other periodicals, and published, in addition to the two works mentioned ante, vol. ii., 1. Poems and Essays; or, A Book for the Times. By J. "This is a singular book, and evinces talent, in spite of the strange mystical notions which seem to pervade the mind of the author on the subject of Mesmerism and Electro-Biology. . . . This outline of a very absurd story does no justice to the many beautiful passages and descriptions contained in the book. The characters are extremely well drawn."—Ath., No. 1868.

"It is something to rejoice the heart that even in these days a novel can be written full of strong human interest without any aid from melodramatic scenes, painting, social mysteries, and the physical force of incidents. . . . The mid-spring of the interest lies in the development of the inner life and spiritual history of all the characters."—Ath., No. 1864.

"No lover of poetry, we think, will be insensible to the high and generous feeling, the true love of Nature, and the fancy, fresh and delicate, which Mr. Macdonald here, as elsewhere, displays. . . . The longest poems in this collection are not those to which it owes its charm."—Ath., No. 2110.

13. Robert Falconer, Lon., 1868, 3 vols. p. 8vo; new ed., 1869, 1 vol.

"Robert Falconer is the matured utterance of all the thoughts and aspirations which Dr. Macdonald tried to set on song in his early poems, and the completed picture of what he set forth in more or less fragmentary form in his previous novels. He has fulfilled all his promise, and this is saying no little. . . . Although 'Robert Falconer' is not a book to be taken up for amusement. . . . It is nevertheless a work brim-full of life and humour, and of the deepest human interest to all who care to read of 'Life and death, and the deep heart of man.'"—Ath., No. 2128.

"A really beautiful book, which will delight Mr. Macdonald's great circle of admirers—we had almost said disciples—and by which those who profess a sterner and more definite religious philosophy may come to understand the secret of his acceptance as a popular teacher."—Spectator, xiv. 280.

"No educated reader can fail to be touched by such landscapes and characters as abound in the book."—Ath., No. 2430.

"The faults to be found with 'Malcolm' are by no means equal to its beauties. . . . Since the days of Miss Ferris there has been no better picture of Scotch character in 'many varieties.'"—Sat. Rev., xxxix. 573.

"It is impossible not to study with interest the play of human action and passion as he delineates them. Whether we watch the mind laid hid, with Malcolm, we feel for him a strong and painful sympathy; . . . or trace the growing development of character . . . in the tantalizing Lady Florinda, or the by-play of complicated motive and interest, as it moves the various characters which are crowded on the stage. . . . It is plain at least that in this united history Mr. Macdonald has given us a story which, notwithstanding the fact that we conceive its main plot unworthy of his pen, will yet be extensively read and its sequel eagerly looked for."—Spectator, xviii. 341.

"It is not a realistic story; the incidents are improbable, and the final salvation of all the contending parties impossible, as the world goes; but the book adds nothing to many chapters of the high teaching which may be utilized even by such as object to its form and disagree with much of its matter."—Ath., No. 2591.

"Although Mr. Macdonald has made us wait two whole years for the second part of his novel, we find ourselves taking it up with rather an increase than an abatement of interest. . . . The cause of the life of Mr. Macdonald's characters are real people. There is life in their every gesture, in their every tone of expression, and he has also a wonderful way of depicting, as it were, the hidden nature of man or woman, and revealing to us things of which we were perhaps, hitherto vaguely conscious, but which have never before taken distinct shape; and the occasional introduction of metaphysical discussion into the thread of the story, which is an unfilling characteristic of this writer, is in the present instance an additional charm."—Spectator, i. 1243.

30. Paul Faber, Surgeon, Lon., 1878, 3 vols. cr. 8vo. "The book is not without dramatic interest, but this is small in quantity, though powerful and telling; and the main force of Dr. Macdonald's genius is spent on dialogue, reflection, and sermon."—Spectator, iii. 118.

31. Sir Gibbie, Lon., 1878, 1 vol. p. 8vo. "With the exception of 'Within and Without,' and the first volume of 'David Elchbrod,' we are of opinion that 'Sir Gibbie,' take it for all in all, is the finest production of his pen. . . . Written, as it has been, for a great and serious purpose—it is, in fact, a special study of psychological evolution,—much thought and labour must have gone to the construction of it. But, all the same, the story has the freshness and charm of an improvisation, from beginning to end, but an improvisation shaped, coloured, and directed to the ideal end."—Spectator, iii. 1415.

"Every one remembers the story of how, when Coleridge asked Charles Lamb whether he had ever heard him preach, Lamb replied that he had never heard Coleridge do anything else. Draw from this saying its little sting of sarcasm, and allow for his humorous exaggeration, and it fits Mr. Macdonald quite as well as it fits the great man who called it forth. . . . The first series of 'Unspoken Sermons' has not, we think, been estimated at its true value, save by a comparatively small number of readers. It was a really remarkable book. . . . We cannot say that we think the present volume quite equal to its predecessor."—Spectator, lviii. 822.

MacGee, Thomas D'Arcy, [ante, vol. ii., n.d.,] 1825-1869 b. at Carlingford, Ireland; was identified with the Young Ireland party and a contributor to its organ, the Nation. He visited the United States in 1842, and for a time edited the Boston Pilot. In 1848 he was obliged to leave Ireland, and established himself in New York, where he set up a paper called the American Celt and afterwards the Nation, advocating Irish independence. During the Know-Nothing excitement of 1854-56 his views were radically changed and he became an ardent royalist. He went to Canada, where he was elected to Parliament and edited the New Era. "The distinguished writer of the Preface to this book gives it as his opinion that, as regards the true condition of certain subject races of the Ottoman Empire, 'no diplomatist, no consul, no traveller, among our countrymen, has made such a valuable contribution to our means of knowledge. . . as was made by Miss Mackenzie and Miss Ixby when they published, in 1867, their travels in some of the Slavonic Provinces of European Turkey.' . . . For universal acceptance, the fact must be limited to the acquisition of data, the portrayal of outer life and landscape, and it may be, literary power. Political views and conclusions form a separate consideration, and will be judged according to the political bias of the reader."—J. GOLDSMID: Acad., xii. 55.

MacLellan, John Ferguson, M.A., LL.D., 1827-1881; was educated at King's College, Aberdeen, and at Trinity College, Cambridge. He was admitted to the Scottish bar, but lost half his practice through the publication of the work which gained him distinction as an anthropologist, and thenceforth devoted himself to London and its antiquarian studies. In 1871 he went to London and was appointed Parliamentary draughtsman, a post which he resigned a few years later on a change of government. His researches opened up a new line of study in regard to primitive manners and customs. 1. Primitive Marriage: an Inquiry into the Origin of the Form of Capture in Marriage Ceremonies, Lon. and Edin., 1865, p. 8vo.

"The object of this work on 'Primitive Marriage' is not simply to exhibit the almost universal prevalence of the form of capture, as proved by its actual existence in bar-barons tribes, and its symbolical existence in civilized customs, but also to exhibit the new relations it reveals of the early constitution of society. . . . The author has diligently and skillfully collected the evidence which still exists, in order by it to interpret the history of what has been. . . . Our author is led to many interesting speculations as to show that the most ancient system in which the idea of blood-relationship was embodied admitted kinship path in historical research. Those who follow may have to modify his conclusions on some points, but all intelligent students will gratefully acknowledge his services as a pioneer."—Sat. Rev., xix, 252.

"Drummond is principally known to the outer world by his invention of the 'Drummond Light,' and his anticriticism.—'Property has its duties as well as its rights.' . . . On the whole, an interesting and useful work."—Sat. Rev., xxiv, 88, 193.

3. Studies in Ancient History: comprising a Report of "Primitive Marriage," &c., Lon., 1876, p. 8vo.

"The object of the essay 'Kinship in Ancient Greece' is to test in the case of the Greeks the validity of the history of kinship and the family set forth in 'Primitive Marriage.' Mr. McLennan is of opinion that he has at least made out a case calling for an answer from people like Sir Henry Maine, who stand upon the old lines; and, without going into criticism, perhaps this much may be in his essay on the classificatory system of Relationships. But a whole article would be needed for an account and ourselves to saying that he seems to have utterly demolished the theories of Mr. Morgan,—by whom the facts relating to the classificatory system were collected,—and at all, but systems do not denote systems of relationship course among people, with many of whom it would be name."—Spectator, i, 476.

"Since the first edition of Mr. McLennan's book appeared, the subject has employed many pens, and it would not have been difficult to find much corroborative evidence to show the survival of a symbol of capture in the marriage ceremonies of several European lands inhabited by Aryan peoples. The Slavonic side of the question, for instance, has been most carefully examined by several scholars, being in favour of Sir John Lubbock's hypothesis of a primeval universal community of women, and not at all supporting Mr. McLennan's supposed system of polyandry, though it is bore witness to marriage by capture only."—W. R. S. RAISTON: Acad., xi, 479.

4. The Patriarchal Theory: based on the Papers of the Late J. F. MacLennan. Edited and completed by Donald MacLennan. Lon., 1884, 8vo.

"The Patriarchal Theory has been constructed partly out of chapters which Mr. McLennan himself helped to draw up, partly out of his scattered notes, partly by aid of the original researches and conclusions of his brother. . . . It can be neglected by no one who pretends to speak with authority in questions of the development of society."—Sat. Rev., lxx, 88.

"While every one must admit that the brothers McLennan have advanced their subject by discussion and criticalness, their arguments are often withdrawn into a controversial minuteness hardly suited to reasoning on social systems for the most part imperfectly understood. . . . It criticism and others standing hypotheses, some upset by hope to have the whole the cry of primitive society some day worked out. At present the part of it which is a converging research seems to establish is the doctrine of an early general prevalence of the system of kinship on the female side."—*E. B. Maeredy, William Charles, 1798-1873, son of William Maeredy, (ante, vol. ii.) b. in London; educated at Harrow; made his first appearance on the stage at Birmingham 1810, and in London 1816; became, after the death of Keen, the first tragedian of his day, and both as actor and manager distinguished himself by his efforts to elevate the character of the theatre; retired from the stage in 1851. Reminiscences and Selections from his Diaries and Letters. Edited by Sir [William] Frederick Pollock, Bart., one of his Executors, Lon., 1875, 2 vols. p. 8vo; new ed., 1876, 1 vol.

"The record of Maeredy's struggles, as recorded by him in these 'Reminiscences,' is full of interest, both as regards the man and the great art to which he dedicated his life. . . . As a careful and for the most part a just estimate of the stage during a very brilliant period, the attraction of these volumes can scarcely be surpassed. Readers also who have no special interest in theatrical matters, but who enjoy miscellaneous gossip, will be allured from page to page, attracted by familiar names and by observations upon popular actors and authors."—Spectator, xlvii, 522.

"This book has not merely a dramatic but a general interest; it not only vividly relates old experiences, it enforces much valuable teaching. . . . There is nothing omitted that a reader has a right to look for in such a record, as regards the history of the stage and the humilitude of the actor."—Atk., No. 2474.

"Few more interesting or instructive autobiographies have been published."—Sat. Rev., xxxix, 478.

"It is in giving us a great actor's character, as well as the story of a career,—and giving that character firmly, definitely, fully,—that the main interest of the book will be found to consist."—F. Westminster Acad., vi, 354.

"This volume will mark an era in the history of jurisprudence. When it makes its way among the jurists of the Continent, they will find in it some ideas with which they are familiar, others for the reception of which they are prepared, many substantially or absolutely new to them, and they will find them all exhibited in a shape which is a greater novelty abroad than any of the contents can be. Mr. Maine's book is evidently the result of much thought on very difficult learning, and a file and subtle to flow on in a of separate notes that seems written as this taken to show on which any jurisprudence.

"The conclusion. . . to which the reader is inevitably conducted is that the language used by Morgan and McLellan does 'lead to a good deal of confusion of thought.' Their views are displaced rather than confuted, and Sir Henry Maine's readers are convinced not only of the soundness of his own theories, but also of the intellectual calmness which marks his judgment."—Nation, xxxvii, 165.

6. Popular Government: Four Essays, Lon., 1885, 8vo; 2d ed. same year. (Consists of articles published originally in the Quarterly Review.)

"The purpose of these four essays is to warn the English people of the risks they run in yielding to the democratic craze which has been growing for nearly a hundred years, and to urge them, if they must yield, to do so as discreetly as possible. . . He urges for much with his subjects in three desultory and disjointed articles on 'The Prospects of Popular Government,' 'The Nature of Democracy,' and 'The Age of Progress.' These articles but say, is set forth in the essay on 'The Constitution of the United States,' a notable and very suggestive paragraph of the American Republicanism, as a grand advance in state-manship on anything that English Radicals have as yet proposed."—Id., No. 3027.

"Some at least of these essays were, on their anonymous appearance, attributed to Lord Salisbury, but what was then high praise seems now like the bitterest satire. . . More ingenious than profound, more epigrammatic than original, more dazzling than persuasive, this work would be worthier of the present Prime Minister than of the author of 'Ancient Law.' . . The history of government and civilization; with the result that the whole subject is thrown into uncertainty and confusion."—Alfred W. Benn: Acad., xxviii, 300.

"Its drift is that democracy is a mere form of government and a form which, like other schemes of polity, may pass away. While it exists, our true wisdom is, our teacher of political mechanism. The lesson may be sound or insular, but whatever be its intrinsic merits, it singularly it is addressed."—Nation, xlii, 261.

7. International Law: being the Whewell Lectures delivered before the University of Cambridge in 1887, Lon., 1888, 8vo. Pests.

"The book is not to be regarded as one more in the long list of text-books doating exhaustively with the subject; it may be suspected that there would have been modifications, as well as additions, if the author had lived to publish a complete work on International Law. But, such as it is, this collection of lectures is a valuable contribution to the literature of the subject, the more so because Sir Henry Maine's peculiar power of adding a charm to subjects unattractive at first sight, and of least of all to the general list of the student, has in 'International Law' a peculiarly suitable field for its application."—Spectator, lxi, 1775.

GENERAL CRITICISMS.
"One of the greatest charms of Sir Henry Maine's writings is the extraordinary way in which he sets his readers thinking for themselves: he opens up a problem in a masterly manner, lays hold of the salient points, and states these in the clearest language, and then he leaves the reader to work out for himself the most interesting speculations which have been in the first place suggested for him."—Id., No. 2892.

"For the present we say at least say, looking to our own science of law, that the 'impulse' given by Maine to its intelligent study in England and America can hardly be treated merely as a dogmatic and technical system. His- were manifestly necessary, was regarded as facts which ornament, and all singularities and anomalies had to be taken as they stood, either without any reason or (perhaps oftener) with a bad one. . . A certain amount of awaken- Maine taught us to call it. . . But the scientific study of legal phenomena such as we really find them had no place among us. . . Maine not only showed that this was a and fruitful than any in the whole range of the moral- ing bond between law, history, and anthropology. Juris- prudence itself has become a study of the living growth of human society through all its stages, and it is no longer imposed on societies as it were by accident, nor for the resemblance and differences of the laws of different societies to be regarded as casual."—SIR FREDERICK POLLOCK: Oxford Lectures and Other Discourses, p. 158.

Maitland, Edward, b. 1824, at Ipswich, Eng.; brother of Rev. Brownlow Maitland, supra, and of Dr. Charles Maitland, (ante, vol. ii.); graduated at Caius College, Cambridge, 1847. He had intended to take holy orders, but, becoming engaged in a train of intellectual speculation, he went abroad, and after ten years, spent chiefly in California and Australia, returned to England and devoted himself to literature, "with the dominant aim of so developing the intellectual faculty as to find the solution of all problems having their basis in man's spiritual nature, with a view to the formulation of a perfect system of thought and rule of life." His efforts towards the attainment of this end were greatly facilitated by the renunciation of flesh food and all stimulating articles of diet, "the result of the change (which was made at the suggestion of Mrs. Anna Kingsford) being so to sensitize the mental surfaces as to vastly enhance the faculty of intuition and convert thought into perception." 1. The Pilgrim and the Shrine; or, Passages from the Life and Correspondence of Herbert Ainslie, B.A. Cantab., Lon., 1867, 3 vols. p. 8vo. Anon.

"The anonymous editor—the Master of the Ceremonies, as he calls himself in the short preface, who simply introduces 'parties whom he deems worthy of each other's acquaintance,' and then retires—tells us that the book is 'the simple record of an actual course of our day.' We see no reason to disbelieve him. The simplicity of the story, its very want of concentration, the earnestness and evident sincerity with which the field of speculation is delved and dug, give a sweet air of reality to the whole performance. . . . We recognize in the author of 'The Pilgrim and the Shrine' an artist who approaches very near to the ideal that his brilliant pages disclose."—Sat. Rev., xxv, 181.

"It is not often that a biographer has been so fortunate in his selection of Prince Henry. In the first place, it is one never before handled by an English writer; next, it is one hand; and, finally, the hero himself is one well worthy of the labour bestowed in chronicling his actions and delining his character. . . . On the whole, Mr. Major's delineation of Prince Henry is a piece of good work, and of high mark in European letters."—Ida, N. 2306.

"Any one who looked for the first time at the ruins of a town overthrown by a violent shock, or an earthquake would pick-up rubbish, any substantial information as to the precise subterranean centre of disturbance, or the character of the earthquake oscillations. . . Yet this was the task undertaken to perform. . . The result of the expedition is given in two large volumes, magnificently illustrated with photographs. . . If we are to take his estimate of the success of his investigations, we must admit that he has ascertained with precision the exact position, depth, and even form, of the great internal fissure. . . He gives us, in addition, measures of the amplitude and velocity of the seismic perturbation, which he evidently relies on with the most absolute confidence. . . There is no doubt that he has proved that a seismology is capable of being built up. . . to an extent which would scarcely have been anticipated."—Sat. Rev., xv, 215.

The Limits of Religious Thought, (Bampton Lectures,) Lon., 1858, 8vo; 5th ed., 1867, p. 8vo.

"Whatever Mr. Mansel undertakes bears the marks of his great ability and industry, and these lectures rise to a grave eloquence of which his other writings, from their subjects, would hardly admit. The language is well chosen and fits close to the thought, and a subject is fairly pursued without digression or needless ornament. . . . But the net result of this work, in the way of influence on religious opinion, will hardly be all that the author would desire, either in kind or in amount. The key to all religious difficulties Mr. Mansel places in a distinction between speculative and regulative truths. We may have a knowledge of a religious principle sufficient for practical guidance, which, however, does not amount to a real insight into the subject-matter; may, more, if we attempt to find the grounds on which our practical principle rests, we shall be entangled not merely in difficulties but in positive contradictions. . . . Mr. Mansel, borrowing from Kant even the very terms of his distinction between speculative and regulative truth, breaks down the one fulcrum (the authority of the moral ideas and convictions which Kant kept for his lever. His theory of the unattainableness of truth is thorough-going. Its originality consists in his application of such a principle to the defence of Anglican belief."—Sat. Rev., vi, 494.

"To Oxford men, who know how close were the relations between the late Dean Mansel and his favourite pupil and successor in the Waynflete chair of metaphysics, Mr. Chandler, of Pembroke, the present volume will have a peculiar and especial interest. It contains, we gather from the Preface, "the minor philosophical works of the late Dean Mansel, nearly all his reviews, together with two articles hitherto unpublished,—viz., the lecture on Utility as the Ground of Moral Obligation, and the fragment on Berkeley's Philosophy, the completion of which was prevented by the decease of the author."—ibid., No. 2371.

9. The Gnostic Hieresies of the First and Second Centuries. Edited by J. B. Lightfoot. Lon., 1875, 8vo. (Contains a prefatory notice of the author by Lord Carnarvon.)

"It is the peculiar interest of Gnosticism that it commemorates the speculations of those questioning spirits who confronted a world of evil and misery, and a God descended by His redemption, under the light both of a fading mythology and a dawning philosophy. The worshipper of Mitra and the believer in Evolution both find their kindred here. A web of thought that thus gathers up into one unity the future and the past repays earnest and unregretted study. And if we cannot say of the volume before us that it conveys as fully as we should desire the results of such study, yet in its wide range of learning and lucid power of representation it forms, at least, a valuable introduction to this memorial of a phase of spiritual life that no one can learn to know without becoming better qualified to understand the early ages of Christianity, and hence, we believe, understanding better the meaning of Christianity for all time."—Spectator, xlix, 180.

Marshall, Alfred, b. 1842; educated at Merchant Taylors' School, London, and St. John's College, Cambridge, where he graduated as second wrangler in 1865 and was elected a Fellow; lecturer on moral science at Cambridge from 1868 till 1877, when he became principal of University College, Bristol. In 1883 he was appointed lecturer on political economy at Balliol College, Oxford, and in 1884 he succeeded Professor Fawcett as professor of political economy at Cambridge University. The Present Position of Economics: an Inaugural Lecture, Lon., 1885, p. 8vo. With MARSHALL, MARY PALEY, The Economics of Industry, Lon., 1879, 12mo.

"Mr. Marshall has been known for several years... as one of the most accomplished and learned economists in England, and Mrs. Marshall bore a high reputation as lecturer at Newham Hall, Cambridge."
—Acad., xvi. 329.

"As a systematic treatise on that part of political economy with which it deals, it is no exaggeration to say that English books. It summarizes in a compact form, the results of all the latest economic inquiry and speculation on the subjects of Production, Distribution, and Value, and presents the whole with much originality of argument and freshness of illustration."

The statistics and facts upon the inundation of its inexhaustible statistics and details could not easily be exaggerated. . . . "Darkness around him, darkness below and above, is the element within which this poet moves. He would fain find a meaning in the reiterated rigours of Fate, but he knows not whether he may discern it, or not. . . . The book is an eminently sincere one, and as high-minded as it is sincere. . . . The feeling is not only deep, it is strenuous and high-strung; and the author evinces his poetic vocation by co-ordinating emotion with thought."—W. M. ROBERTS, ibid., vii. 311.

"On the whole, this Autobiography, though containing some passages which must excite regret, is one of the most remarkable books which we have seen for a long time. Its speculative features give it a peculiar value apart from the mere biography, but even as regards that, it may rank with the lives of Melnor or [sic] Macaulay."—Ath., No. 2377.

"They are the memorials of a woman of great strength, and of a life of redundant energy and high public spirit, though not at all deficient in harsh and repellent elements of character. One thing in connection with this book we heartily regret, and we mean the volume of memorials by Mrs. Chapman, from whom Miss Martineau translated her autobiography. This volume exaggerates painfully everything that is commendable in the autobiography itself."—Spectator, l, 311.

"The book before us, a volume of English poems by a young Frenchman, glows with this old familiar fire, (of the Renaissance.) Reading these strange and powerful verses, full of the healthy delight in life and sunshine that seems to have passed away with the Troubadours, we have to remind ourselves that their author lives amongst us, and did not walk the earth with his elder countrymen, the Albigenses and the Provençals. . . . He has produced a book that is unique of its kind and illuminated with undeniably genius."—Spectator, xlv, 1248.

Masston, David, LL.D., [ante, vol. ii., add.], became editor of Macmillan's Magazine in 1859, and in 1865 resigned the chair of English language and literature at University College, London, to become professor of rhetoric and English literature in the University of Edinburgh. Since 1879 he has acted as editor of the Registry of the Privy Council of Scotland. 1. The Life of John Milton: narrated in Connection with the Political, Ecclesiastical, and Literary History of his Time, Lond., 1858-79, 6 vols. 8vo.

"Although Mr. Masston may not be an able historian, he is what is of infinitely greater importance, a singularly accurate and therefore an altogether trustworthy one. This 'Life of Milton' is a book which, in its present generation, will hold down with pride to its authors."—Sat. Rev., xlix. 286.

"He has inseparably associated his name with that of Milton, and all students of the poet and of his age will be compelled to consult these volumes. It would be difficult to estimate the labour expended by the author. Not only has he mastered all the authorities which bear directly on his subject, but with infinite skill and perseverance he seems to have followed every track, however obscure, which could lead to any point of interest remotely associated with his great hero. Thoroughness and impartiality are the qualities of highest value, perhaps, in this 'Life of Milton.' Mr. Masston is eminently trustworthy. He takes nothing at second-hand; every step of his ground has been won by hard thinking, and perhaps there is no living writer who has a larger acquaintance with the politics and literature of the seventeenth century. The faults of this massive opus are as obvious as its merits. The author is a chronicler rather than an historian. In his anxiety to tell all he knows, and he appears to know everything, he does not always see the difference between what is of primary importance and what is of secondary value. . . . We know much more about Milton, thanks to Mr. Masston, but we do not see him more clearly, and the central figure is, as it were, hidden under the heap of stones which the biographer's reverence has led him to cast upon his earnt."—Spectator, liii. 910.

"To this biography . . . is imparted, by the author's intense devotion to his subject and to the responsibilities of literature, an elevation and strength, both in style and substance, which can suffer no abatement from an occasional failure in the proportions of the design or in the writer's judicial instinct. Mr. Masston's publication is a work of national importance."—Atlan., No. 2732.

"This volume, for its bulk and scope, forms as serviceable a manual as could be desired for the understanding of the progress made by philosophy, properly so called, in Great Britain during the last thirty years. . . . His account of the several authors and systems embraced in his work is clear and graphic, almost picturesque. But these charms of style are counterbalanced by the want of that degree of discrimination which is required for assenting to each of these, the proper weight in the scale, and for keeping essentially distinct ideas steadily asunder."—*Sat. "It is impossible to do anything like justice to his extensive knowledge, his unwearied patience, his carefulness in stating facts, the skill with which he applies, and in all cases fairly applies, the labours of earlier editors, and above all, to the hearty attention and enthusiasm which have sustained him through his long and diligent toil. . . . "He does not profess to inquire into the truth of the theory of Evolution. . . His question is, Suppose it true, what then? . . . We admire the subtle energy of his argument; we have an endless variety of illustrative statements set forth with great felicity of phrase; and we are often carried away with the strong rush of eloquence, until we are ready almost to accept his conclusions as inevitable. . . . We may frankly say that, in our judgment, Dr. Matheson has not made out his case."—Spectator, lix. 819.

"It is certainly odd to find at starting that in such a scheme such a writer as Alfred de Musset should be 'passed by' with but casual attention; but when this allowance has once been made,—and it must be admitted to be a considerable one,—the volume will be found to contain a good deal of information which will be useful to those who approach the subject as a new one, and a good deal of critical writing which perhaps may not lose in interest from the fact that one often finds oneself unable to accept the author's views."—Sat. Rev., iii. 581.

Maurice, Rev. John Frederick Denison, D.D. [ante, vol. ii.] MAURICE, FREDERICK DENISON, add., 1805-1872. He was presented in 1860 to the living of St. Peter's, Vere Street, London, which he held till 1869. He took an active part in founding the Working-Men's College in London in 1854, and also in establishing Queen's College for Women. In 1866 he was elected Knightsbridge professor of moral philosophy at Cambridge. The position of Mr. Maurice in the English Church was peculiar and in some respects unique. While his views in regard to the doctrine of eternal punishment and other questions drew upon him the condemnation of the general mass of the clergy, he was an object of almost unbounded reverence with a small body of followers, for whom the value of his intellectual and spiritual teachings was enhanced by the simplicity and sincerity of his life. His permanent influence is to be traced, if at all, in the growth of liberal sentiments in the church. For biog., see MAURICE, COL. J. F., supra.

19. The Friendship of Books, and other Lectures. Edited, with a Preface, by T. Hughes, M.P. Lon., 1873, p. 8vo.

"Nothing may be seen of what manner of man Mr. Maurice was in his daily intercourse in these lectures,—on Milton, Burke, on the Acquisition of Knowledge, and on Criticism,—which are taken as samples almost at hazard, from a vast number which he delivered in all parts of the country to a large class of audiences."—Spectator, xvi, 81.

"As we read Mr. Hughes's preface to the wise and kindly lectures which follow, we seem to be listening to a converted prize-fighter introducing a Christian mystic into the arena. There is . . . very little obscurity in these lectures, though there are some touches of the author's peculiar mysticism. They deal for the most part with popular subjects: with the uses of books and newspapers; with the right methods of studying history; with Milton, Spenser, and Burke, and with modern criticism. They are full of really profound and original ideas, and are animated throughout by a kindliness which always endeavours to look at the best side of men and things, and to recognize the soul of good in things evil."—*Sat. GENERAL CRITICISM.

"As an author he was always singularly suggestive, and beautiful passages, fruitful of further thought and deed, are abundant. But he is constantly obscure, and in his earnest endeavour to counteract erroneous views he has often destroyed the literary completeness of his work by As a matter of fact, his chief influence was strictly personal."—ibid., No. 291.

"Great as his genius and intellect were, and much of permanent fruit as they have borne, inestimable as have been his services in instructing and guiding and comforting erring and suffering men and women by his wise and sympathizing counsels, yet above all these good works we set this, that he was in very truth—and that those who saw and heard him knew that he was—a messenger sent from God, to bear witness of the relation of God to us."—Spectator, xxxv, 104.

She began to write at a very early age, contributing verses, political squibs, and parodies to provincial newspapers. She is also the author of several plays, which have been acted, among them the Loves of Aradin, a comœdietta, in 1860, and Married Beneath Him, in 1882; but her chief success has been won by her novels, which have had a very large circulation, some of the early ones especially having passed through many editions. "Let us accept the fact that her novels are immensely popular. . . Let us admit, what no one would care to writing, 'cleverness' is the exact word. Why is it that those which could be better spent? Why is it that we feel, after dawdling through one of her many romances, a little Miss Braddon's first and great fault is not atoned for by all that cleverness and facile ability of which she has so much. It is that there is in her no real thought, no analysis that is worth the name, no insight into human nature."—Ath., No. 2224.

(The folio ed. was published in June at twenty-five guineas, the r. 8vo ed. in December at two guineas.)

"It would be in the highest degree unjust to regard the wealth of historical and artistic detail offered by these volumes as their chief title to commendation, or even to praise them as détailé. . . Only an historian of a high order Maxwell has dealt with it, competently and in many respects exhaustively."—Sat. Rev., viii. 617.

"The value of this biography of Don John of Austria lies in the side-lights which it throws on many subjects. It is full of the results of the curiosity of a cultivated mind working leisurely at a subject of its own choice. The mere prints, medals, and books relating to the period of Don John's life, gives his pages vividness. . . The erudition of the book does not hang clumsily round the writer. He has thoroughly caught the spirit of the times, and presents a finished picture of many of its aspects."—M. Critic, Acad., xxiv. 307.

Shortly before his death he was raised to the peerage. He contributed to reviews and law journals. 1. The Constitutional History of England since the Accession of George III., 1760-1860, Lon., 1861-62, 2 vols. 8vo; new ed., with supplementary chapter, 1879.

2. Democracy in Europe: a History, Lon., 1877, 2 vols. 8vo.

"He has worked carefully and conscientiously; but there is none of that life that comes from genuine independent research, no sign of that mastery of the subject which can be got by living in it. There is no hearty entering into the spirit of distant times and countries. . . . Yet many parts of the book may form useful constitutional summaries for those who may not yet care to go very deep into matters."—Sat. Rev., xiv. 17, 57.

"He would have described the contents of his book much better had he called it 'Democracies in Europe: Studies in History.' It is not an account of the rise and development of democratic schemes and institutions in Europe. . . . After a preliminary disquisition on democracy, he reviews the histories of different countries during those periods when that form of government was in vogue. He interrupts his narratives occasionally to include in a parallel or a comparison between these facts he has just recorded and those which he has recorded a little before, but he scarcely attempts to give a succinct view of any one of the causes which at various times set forth waves of democracy over large parts of the surface of Europe. . . . If his book is not useful, it is always interesting. It is many a little fire in it, but there is, at all events, plenty of light."—Spectator, ii. 57, 87.

By Edward Garrett, Lon., 1868, 3 vols. p. 8vo.

"Under the barest possible disguise of a story it gives simply a collection of original thoughts, practical suggestions, and sterling common sense, which amuse because they are clever, and do not weary because, if they are not (as one is inclined to believe they must be) the epitome of a real old man's diary, they are the best imitation of reality we have ever come across."—Ath., No. 3129.

Mayo, William Starbuck, M.D., [ante, vol. II, add.] Never Again, Lon., 1873, p. 8vo.

"Puts its author, Dr. Mayo, at once into the very first rank of novelists. . . There is no passion in 'Never Again.' There is little plot, less than in 'Pickwick,' of which, though with no thought of imitation, it reminds us much. But there is nature, human nature, of the most human kind: there is sparkle, there is erudition, and satire, cutting, yet true and manly."—A., No. 2362.

Melville, George Wallace, b. 1811, in New York City; entered the U.S. navy in 1831 as assistant engineer, and became chief engineer, with the rank of lieutenant-commander, in 1851. He was engineer of the Jennette, which sailed on an Arctic expedition in July, 1879, under Lieutenant George W. De Long, supra. After the loss of the Jennette and the subsequent journey across the ice to Bennett's Island, Engineer Melville commanded one of the boats in which the party embarked for the Lena, and reached one of the mouths of the river September 17, 1881. He made an unsuccessful search for De Long and his party, which he renewed in the following spring, and about the end of March discovered their remains and brought them to the United States. In 1887 he was appointed chief of the bureau of steam-engineers, with the rank of commodore, and engineer-in-chief of the U.S. navy. In the Lena Delta: a Narrative of the Search for Lieut.-Commander De Long and his Companions, followed by an Account of the (Trebly Relief Expedition, and a Proposed Method of reaching the North Pole. Edited by Melville Phillips and Huest. Boston, 1885, 8vo.

"A prominent characteristic of the work is the straightforward earnestness of the narrative; devoid alike of literary style and of those pretensions to it which so often retard the reader in works of travel. The personality of the author is unconsciously revealed to us in his pages, and in a manner which commands our respect and admiration."—Nation, xl, 60.

Meredith, George, [ante, vol. II, add.] b. 1828, in Hampshire, Eng.; educated in Germany; studied law, but gave up that profession for literature. His works have been very slow in winning public appreciation. The circulation of his earlier books was very limited, and it was not until after the publication of Diana of the Crossways, in 1885, that a demand for them arose, leading to the publication of a collective edition. The following list includes three which are mentioned ante, vol. II. 1. Poems, Lon., 1853, 12mo. 2. The Shaving of Shagpat: an Arabian Entertainment, [a burlesque poem], Lon., 1855, or 8vo. 3. "This 'order' is about as painful a book as any reader ever felt himself inexorably compelled to read through in spite of his own protests to the contrary,—for read it, and read it through, he must, if he once begins it, for the sole purpose of knowing what coming will be. The book is very clever, with a fresh, vigorous vitality in the style; but it is not true to real life or human nature: only true to an abstract and entirely arbitrary idea."—Ath., No. 1654.

"There can be no mistake either as to his abilities, or as to his failure in obtaining a corresponding place in popular esteem. In 'Vittoria' . . . he has shown as much power of thought and style as would fit out a dozen writers of sensation novels. There is scarcely a page in which there is not evidence of originality, and what is much rarer, of conscientious labour, often skilfully applied. The conversations . . . are only too pointed and vigorous for the interlocutors. Almost every character is distinctly and forefully; some show great originality of conception. . . . Yet, with all these merits, and we might conscientiously speak of others, we fear that Mr. Meredith's novel has the unmistakable mark of being hard to read. It is often so clever as to be on the verge of genius, but somehow we don't get on with it. It is a succession of brilliancies which are never fused in a brilliant whole."—Sat. Rev., xxiii, 149.

11. The Adventures of Harry Richmond, Lon., 1871, 3 vols. p. 8vo.

"It is quite worth reading; but it is itself a sketch in three volumes, in spite of the extraordinary minuteness of description."—Ath., No. 2297.

12. Beauchamp's Career, Lon., 1875, 3 vols. p. 8vo. (First published as a serial in the Forthrightly Review.) "In 'Beauchamp's Career' Mr. Meredith has ventured upon a bold experiment. He has striven to combine the study of individual character with the expression and discussion of modern ideas, and, in place of the precise portraiture of contemporary manners which serves the ordinary novelist by way of background, he has here given us a complex net-work of social and political problems in which the chief figures of the story are caught and entangled. Indeed, all the characters, from the highest to the lowest, are made in their different degrees to feel the intellectual pressure of their time. . . . The peculiar characteristics of Mr. Meredith's style perfectly accord with the conditions of the elaborate scheme of action. Like the invention of a Japanese artist, his mode of workmanship reflects the singularity as well as the beauty of actual nature."—Sat. Rev., xli, 626.

13. The Egolot: a Comedy in Narrative, Lon., 1879, 3 vols. p. 8vo.

"Perhaps the most solid work, even to the verge of toughness, which Mr. Meredith has ever produced. . . . It is purely a study of character; incidents count for very little in it. . . . Those who persevere to the end will find their reward in it."—Sat. Rev., xlvii, 607.

"After closing the book, we feel in the retrospect that the style is the most memorable thing about it. It is like a wayward wind blowing against the current of the story, and raising little luminous waves and eddies which both look pretty and prevent our getting a clear view of what lies underneath."—Spectator, lii, 1383.

14. The Tragic Comedians: a Study on a Well-Known Story, Lon., 1880, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"The well-known story is that of the tragic fate of Ferdinand Lassalle, the Messiah, as he is called, of Social Democracy. . . . Mr. Meredith's study of the well-known subject does not appear to have been particularly profound, and he has been content to follow, step by step, the story of Lassalle's death as told by the lady who caused it. . . .

If we had not have placed a brilliant and enriched English ignoramus of the adaptation, wretched in arm, world.—Ath., p. 150.

16. Diana of the Crossways (The heroine Norton).

"It is a stud emotion; it is touched with a comedy, and a selection of it sorrowful, whole as life itself."—Ath., No. 2964.

Meredith, Mrs. [ante, vol. II, add.]

If we had not read Frau Racowitz's book we might have placed "The Tragic Comedians" very high among the brilliant productions with which Mr. Meredith has enriched English literature. And certainly readers who are ignorant of the original will do well to read Mr. Meredith's translation, which is as stimulating in style, and at least as good in arrangement, as anything else he has given to the world."—Ibid., No. 373.

15. Poems and Lyrics of the Joy of Earth, Lon., 1853, p. 8vo.

"If verse were simply quintessential prose, then assuredly Mr. Meredith would be one of the most effective without living. In the art of 'packing a line' he is almost vigour, combined with a remarkable plainness and intellectual the most noticeable qualities of his volume."—Ibid., No. 290.

16. Diana of the Crossways, Lon., 1855, 3 vols, p. 8vo. (The heroine is understood to represent Mrs. Caroline Norton.)

"It is a study of character, and it is also a study of emotion; it is a picture of fact and the world, and it is touched with generous romance; it is rich in kindly comedy, and it abounds in natural passion; it sets forth a selection of many human elements, and is joyful and sorrowful, wholesome with laughter and joyful and as life itself. In one word, it is a common novel, as 'Amelia' is and 'Fanny Hill.' It ends as happily as the only distinguished from the rank of its contemporaries in Ibid., No. 294.

"Whether Mr. Meredith's apologia for witty and beautiful ladies who love to skate upon thin ice is a successful one, may be doubted. But as a literary display the novel is unequalled. It is written with a cleverness that is almost painful; its ornate sentences, phrases stuffed to matrix of padding, a literary mosaic as perfect as the ordinary novel-reader as an Aristophanic chorus to offer some justice these difficulties may be overcome. But the reward is not small. The novel is decidedly the best Mr. Meredith has given to the world. The dinner-out with the social philosopher will be analyzed and delighted by the subject, and the literary expert will be no less charmed by the knowledge, fertility, and dexterity apparent in every page.—It might well be said, in every sentence."—Spectator, lviii. 417.

17. Ballads and Poems of Tragic Life, Lon., 1857, 12mo.

"It certainly cannot be said that, as the years go on, the streams of Mr. Meredith's song become more and more pellucid. . . . His last production—these 'Ballads and Poems of Tragic Life'—is certainly one of the most brilliant volumes of verse that it has ever been our fate to read."—Ibid., xxxi. 416.

18. A Reading of Earth, [verse], 1858, p. 8vo. (No copies sent out for review.)

GENERAL CRITICISM:

"To be concentrated in form, to be suggestive in material, to say nothing that is not of permanent value, and with significance,—this would seem to be the aim and end of Mr. Meredith's ambition. Of simplicity in his own must be still with allusion, or he deems it ill-spoken; there must be something of outline in his speech, or he cannot believe he is addressing the immortal."—Ibid., No. 311.

"His books are always interesting, and yet, paradoxical, the personages themselves nor in what happens to them. We read simply that we may know what Mr. Meredith has to say, and that we may enjoy his manner of saying it."—JAMES ASH ROSE NOBLE: Acad., xxvii. 147.

"It cannot be denied by those who have read Mr. Meredith's books that there is much in them to justify not a case is to read them or get them read. There is a difficulty in perhaps, who love his style, as we may learn to love the disagreeable features of an old friend's face; but they cannot expect to convert the public into liking it any more models. Apart from friends so gained, Mr. Meredith's readers or would-be readers may be divided into those who think him so deservingly ever that it is impossible to read him, and those who cannot help reading him any more than they can help regretting at every second page that he should write as he does."—Spectator, lix. 184.

Merritt, Henry, 1822-1877, b. at Oxford; served an apprenticeship of seven years to a firm of glaziers and carvers; subsequently went to London, where for a few years he lived in great poverty while struggling to become an artist, but finally made a profession of retreating old pictures, in which he displayed extraordinary talent and skill, and was employed by many public institutions and wealthy connoisseurs. He also wrote art criticisms, and a few works of fiction. Shortly before his death he married Miss Anna Lea, of Philadelphia, who has become distinguished as a portrait-painter. 1. Three Etchings by Anna Lea Merritt. [Edited, with a Preface, by Basil Champneys.] Lon., 1879, 2 vols., 8vo. (This includes "Dust and Pictures Separated," "Selections from Occasional Writings," "A Story of a Flower," (first published in Ruskin's "Fors Clavigera"), "Robert Dalby," and "The Oxford Professor and the Artist.")

"We have not often read so moving a record told with such human and quiet self-control. . . . The 'Art Criticism' . . . is most distinctly of a mediocre character. . . . The 'romances' of this book consists of two stories, 'Robert Dalby' and 'The Oxford Professor.' The former has long been out of print, the latter is published here for the first time. The first is by far the best of the two, though as a work of fiction neither can claim to rank high. . . . But if Merritt lacked imagination, his powers of observation were of a very high order indeed. In no work of modern fiction, not even in 'David Copperfield,' have the author's own experiences been turned to such good account. Both we have called his biography, and it must be admitted that his autobiography is better."—Spectator, lii, 1076.

"Mr. Michell has done good service to history by publishing the results of his careful researches. . . . It is . . . probable that many a Norwegian will receive with little favour some of the historical facts now brought to light by Mr. Michell, as they will to some extent diminish the glory and the romance that hitherto have surrounded the story of the Scottish expedition."—Ath., No. 3961.

He retired from his post at the Indian Office in 1858, on the transfer of the government from the Company to the crown,—a measure to which he was strongly opposed,—and declined a seat in the Council for India, which was subsequently twice offered to him. He was elected M.P. for Westminster in 1863, but defeated at the general election of 1868. In 1867 he was chosen rector of the University of St. Andrews. During the last four years of his life he resided at Avignon, in the society of Miss Helen Taylor, whose mother had become his wife in 1851, and aided him in the preparation of several of his works, and had died in 1858. 1. Thoughts on Parliamentary Reform, Lon., 1859, 8vo. 2. On Liberty, Lon., 1859, p. 8vo; new ed., 1865.

"Mr. Mill begins by tracing very shortly the growth of the conception of liberty. After showing how it meant, in early times, the possession of immunities on the part of subjects which their rulers were not to be allowed to infringe,—and how in this succeeded the theory of a delegation by the nation, to a certain number of agents, of powers to be exercised for the common good,—he shows how in our own day the process must be carried a step further, and the rights of individuals must be protected against the opposition of society at large. . . . We do not think it would have been possible to convey in the same space a greater quantity of matter which is not only valuable, but absolutely vital."—Spectator, vii. 186.

11. On the Irish Land Question, Lon., 1870, p. 8vo. 12. Autobiography, Lon., 1873, 8vo.

"The book is composed with the thoughtful care and finish of style which have made the writer's works popular notwithstanding the dryness and abstruseness of many of the subjects which he treated. Probably no scholar or philosopher has left an equally full and faithful history of his education and his intellectual life. The unobtrusive revelations of character which are often the most valuable part of an autobiography bear an unusually small proportion to the deliberate narrative, because Mr. Mill's purpose of writing a candid account of his life was made effective by his long practice of psychological observation."—Sid. Rev., xxxvi. 570.

"The book will be found, we think, even by Mr. Mill's most ardent disciples, a dreary one. It shows that, in spite of all Mr. Mill's genuine and generous compassion for human misery and his keen desire to alleviate it, his relation to concrete humanity was of a very confined and reserved kind. His nature was composed of a few very fine threads, but wanted a certain strength of basis, and the general effect, though one of high and even enthusiastic disinterestedness, is meagre and pallid."—Spectator, xlv. 137.

"I have never read a more uninteresting book, nor, I should say, a sillier, by a man of sense, integrity, and seriousness of mind. . . . It is wholly the life of a logic-chopping engine, little more of human life than if it had been done by this or that strength of basis, and a mournful, morbid curiosity, but in no other point of view, can it interest anybody."—T. "They are rather outlines than dissertations, outlines which require filling up to produce their full effect on the reader. . . . Consider, for instance, how exceedingly faint and imperfect is his exposition here of the most remarkable and characteristic idea of this work. That idea we take to be that the existence of pain and evil, and even of contrivance and design, in the universe, is in itself ample evidence that the Creator of it, if there be a Creator, is either greatly limited in power, or morally imperfect, or both. This is the idea running through all the essays."—Spectator, xviii. 1396.

Miller, Cincinnati Miller, (known as "Joachim Miller"), b. 1811, in Wabash District, Ind.; removed with his parents to Oregon in 1851; became a miner in California, and afterwards studied law. In 1861 he was an express agent in the gold-mining districts of Idaho; in 1863 he edited the Democratic Register, a weekly newspaper in Eugene, Oregon, which was suppressed for disloyalty. He then opened a law office in Canyon City, Oregon. In 1866-70 he was judge of Grant County, Oregon. Having published a paper in defence of Joaquin Murietta, the Mexican brigand, he took the first name of his hero as a signature to a volume of poems. In 1870 he went to England and also travelled in Southern Europe. After his return to the United States he became a journalist in Washington, D.C., and in 1887 he returned to California. He has written several successful plays, including The Danites. 1. Songs of the Sierras, Bost., 1871, 16mo.

"A new poet has come to us from a new country. . . . Whatever the faults of style which disfigure Mr. Miller's poems,—and they are many and flagrant,—there can be no doubt that he possesses the genuine poetic faculty. . . . The fact that his lines glow with tropical passion, and that his descriptions transport us in imagination to the scenes among which they were composed, compels us to forgive him the lawlessness with which he tramples on the conventional limitations of art."—Sat. Rev., xxi, 808.

"The best poem in Mr. Miller's small volume is the first one, which bears the title of 'Arizonian.' . . . It is well conceived, and, also, some of the details are successful, and none, or next to none, of its merits, and its abundant faults of their own."—Nation, xiii, 196.

"Although we cannot give Mr. Miller a front place in the hierarchy of modern poets, we are glad to welcome him as a true and original singer."—Atl., No. 2275.

"This volume may be pronounced an improvement on the former one in the scope of being less raw and crude in sentiment; . . . though we should doubt if there were zaidan."—Nation, xxvii, 77.

"The One Fair Woman is not a satisfactory book. At the same time it is a very remarkable book, one which we do not hesitate to say that no one not a born poet could have written. There are passages in it of great beauty, but a novel is no plot, no action, and no character, and it is not a novel."—Atl., No. 2266.

"It is impossible to read 'Poverty and the State' without a kindly feeling towards its author. He sympathizes so deeply with the distress of the poor, and so completely believes in the remedy which he proposes, that criticism is to some extent disarmed. Moreover, Mr. Mill's suggestions have much that is attractive in them. He wishes to sweep away the present Poor Law, with its outdoor and indoor relief. All charities and almshouses are to be rendered superfluous, if not actually abolished. Workhouses, with their abuses and waste of money, are to be superseded, and, instead of those many and ineffectual ways of relieving distress, 'Co-operative Estates' are to be established throughout the country."—*Sat. "The book has all the freshness and vigour of the car works which won Dean Milman his fame. . . . What with which the Dean has grasped the exact subject he had chosen, and the artistic fidelity with which he has power men and events around it. . . . The book is such wonderful quiet art with which every element of mediæval society varied and picturesque life of the past is not only painted in antiquarian fashion, but swept into the general current of his history by the Dean's fine sense of historical continuity. . . . We could have wished that, though left unfinished by the death of its author, it were not disfigured, not merely by a host of misprints, but by some blunders which . . . The book, in fact, wants careful revision."—Sat. Rev., xxvii, 22.

 Gen. Mitchel's military career was a great disappointment to him and to those who were close to him. . . . The lesson of his previous career is full of encouragement for every generous-minded youth, and shows triumph after triumph in his progress from poverty without education towards

 Londonderry, Ireland, and educated at Trinity College, Dublin; practised for some time as a solicitor, and in 1845 became editor of the Nation, the organ of the Nationalist party in Ireland. In 1847 he separated himself from that party and started The United Irishman, and in 1848 was sentenced to fourteen years' penal servitude for treason-felony. In 1853 he escaped from Van Diemen's Land and settled in the United States, where he edited the Citizen in New York, and during the civil war the Richmond Enquirer. In 1875, shortly before his death, he was elected M.P. for Tipperary, but the election was contested on the ground that he was a felon who had not worked out his sentence. For biog., see DILLON, WIL-

"Though we may have to dispute Dr. Mitchell's conclusion that perhaps 'there never has been a time in human history when there did not occur among men states both of high and low civilization,' we must thank him heartily for the manner and the method of his book, for the curious and valuable facts which he has collected from personal observation, and for the admirable wood-cuts which adorn as well as illustrate his volume."—Sat. Rev., i, 177.

"The most interesting of the stories collected by Mr. Mitford are undoubtedly the 'Fairy Tales' for in them the links become clearly visible which unite the folk-lore of Japan with that of the Indo-European nations. . . . Great credit is due to Mr. Mitford for the care he has taken in the work of translation. He has successfully rendered the Japanese idioms with truth and exactness into pleasant and readable English, and has added much to the interest of his work by the illustrative commentary he has been able to supply on the manners and customs of the people gathered from his own experiences in the Land of the Rising Sun."—*Sat. Mivart, St. George, M.D., Ph.D., F.R.S., b. 1827; in London; was educated at Harrow School, and at King's College, London, and, having become a Roman Catholic in 1844, finished his studies at St. Mary's College, Ossett; called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn 1851; became lecturer at St. Mary's Hospital Medical School 1862, and professor of biology at University College, Kensington, 1874. He has been vice-president of the Zoological Society and secretary of the Linnaean Society, and has contributed largely to the publications of learned societies, to scientific and literary reviews, and to the Ninth Edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica. 1. On the Genesis of Species, Lon., 1871, p. 8vo; 2d ed. same year.

"In no work in the English language has this great controversy been treated at once with the same broad and vigorous grasp of facts and the same liberal and candid temper. . . . What Mr. Mivart insists upon is that the theory of 'Natural Selection, however supplemented and aided by that of Pangenesis, though true, is not the whole truth; that it can be shown to be quite insufficient to explain a number of important phenomena connected with the Origin of Species, and that it must, in consequence, be altered and supplemented by some higher law altogether and supplemented by some more reconciling agency."—Sat. Rev., xxxi. 173.

"Though by no means disposed originally to dissent from the theory of Natural Selection, if only its difficulties could be solved, he (the author) has found each successive year that deeper consideration and more careful examination have more and more brought home to him the inadequacy of Mr. Darwin's theory to account for the preservation and intensification of incipient, specific, and generic characters. That minute, fortuitous, and indefinite variations could have brought about such special forms and modifications as have been enumerated in this chapter seems to contradict, not imagination, but reason."—Edinrev. from the work.

"To estimate aright the validity of these objections would require a volume."—Ath., No. 2281.

2. Man and Apes: an Exposition of Structural Resemblances and Differences bearing upon Questions of Affinity and Origin, Lon., 1873, p. 8vo.

"A short, clear, and popular description of the various groups of apes, monkeys, and lemurs, with a somewhat detailed account of the various points, both of external and internal anatomy, in which they agree with, or differ from, the human organization. . . . The general reader cannot have a more trustworthy guide to the facts of this somewhat complex but very important subject."—ALFRED R. WALLACE; Acad., v. 66.

"If any man will take counsel and learn how that the doctrine of evolution is a most orthodox opinion, and has been opportunely raised up in these latter days as a singular continuation of Papal infallibility, and for a witness to the never-failing discretion of the Church in dealing with matters of profane science; that the thing itself tends altogether to the advantage of the Church aforesaid, inasmuch that in some moderate space of time all heresies and all oppositions will, by mere force of natural selection, be exterminated, and the civilized world happily restored to the obedience of the see of Rome and the peripatetic philosophy; finally, that 'the culmination of the process of evolution' has been the great Vatican decree, the keystone of the great arch of civil and religious liberty,—all these things and more he shall find abundantly and masterfully demonstrated by Mr. Mivart in the compass of some two hundred and fifty pages, and a chapter on ecclesiastical architecture into the bargain. . . . His book is, after all, a perfect jewel of paradox."—Sat. Rev., xli. 811.

6. Lessons From Nature, as manifested in Mind and Matter, Lon., 1876, 8vo.

"Mr. Darwin is not in fairness to be held responsible for the extremes to which his conclusions may have been pushed by eager speculators in the domain of agnosticism or even of nihilism. Against negative or destructive theories such as these Mr. Mivart does battle with a vigour and an acuteness worthy of all praise. In special parts of Mr. Darwin's own armour he also finds vulnerable points. The theory of sexual selection, in particular, as developed in the 'Descent of Man,' meets with much genuine and powerful criticism, which forms indeed the most successful part of the present volume."—Rev., xlii. 271.

7. The Cat: an Introduction to the Study of Back-boned Animals, especially Mammals. Illust., Lon., 1881, 8vo.

"Of the fifteen chapters into which Dr. Mivart's book is divided, nine . . . seem to us to contain an admirably clear and concise account of the animal's structure and development. . . . High as our own standards in our estimation as a descriptive anatomist, he wholly fails, if not to appreciate the interest which surrounds the Cat, with its remarkably obscure history, at least to illustrate its insufficiency."—Spectator, liv. 1471.

"For a biography of Margaret in the literal sense of the word, no sufficient materials exist, and such as there are can in no way be confidently relied on. A worthless and very scurrilous pamphlet is the only professed contemporary record we know of, 'Memoirs of the Celebrated Mrs. Woffington.' . . . Mr. Molloy . . . has evidently seen it too, though he does not say so. All the early chapters of his first volume are merely an elaborate version of this pamphlet, without the scurrillity. "The four church-forms, or experiments in Church and State, which constitute the chief subject discussed by the author, are designated as First, the National Churches which have been established in England, where the lay and clerical elements are balanced; . . . Second, the Eastern Church in Russia, where that Church is a mere political tool of the State; Third, the Church of Rome, which overrules the State; and Fourth, Americanism, or the way of the Sectaries, under which the State is unconnected with a Church, which can hardly be said to exist where the clerical element is of little account, but under which system, as under the despotic form of Wesleyan religious administration in this country, the author discerns forms intimately allied with that of Rome. . . . The outline we have drawn is cleverly filled up."—Ath., No. 1893.

"Mr. Washington Moore has done such good service to the study of English, and the latter part of this little book is so well worth reading, that we can only express our unfeigned sorrow that he should have written the first half of it. This contains little else than a string of erroneous statements which would have been out of date a century ago. We cannot conscientiously recommend a volume which says that 'the English language is derived chiefly from the Aryan through the Sanskrit, and thence through the Celtic, Italic, and Teutonic,' which suppresses the Book of Job to be 'the most ancient document extant,' and which exhibits the most stolid ignorance about the derivation of the Phœnician from the Egyptian alphabet."—Acad., xix. 330.

"In virtue of its vividness of presentation and real literary skill, it may be regarded as in some degree a representative example of the work of a literary school that has of late years attracted to itself a good deal of the notoriety which is a very useful substitute for fame. . . . It consists of a series of studies of moral and physical disease, in which every symptom is described with a fullness and realizableness of detail that is, in the most literal sense of the word, simply marvellous."—Spectator, xvii., 89.

"Mr. George Moore has already proved his right to be considered one of the conspicuous novelists of the day. On account of his unsavoury taste his books have attracted, perhaps, more than their due share of attention, but they have deserved much in spite of it. . . . Mr. Moore can depict human beings in an original and consistent fashion; he can tell a story well, and he has an excellent eye for effect. . . . The novelty of his method lies, however, not so much in his topics as in the nature of his analysis. He is on the lookout to detect the baser impulses, and even in the outside view of things a nasty detail has for him an irresistible attraction."—Atk., No. 3065.

The American Beaver and his Works, Phila., 1868, 8vo.

"Mr. Morgan presents his subject in simple language, free from technicality, and in a manner which can hardly fail to attract all classes of readers. He writes cautiously, with an earnest desire to elicit truth and eliminate error, and has stated nothing which has not been verified by personal observation or the testimony of trustworthy witnesses."—Nation, vi., 176.

2. Systems of Consanguinity and Affinity of the Human Family. (Smithsonian Contributions to Knowledge.) Wash., 1869, 4to.

"Purely scientific in its methods and its singleness of purpose. . . . While other writers have speculated, he has, through years of patient toil, collected a vast mass of facts upon which others as well as he may base their conclusions as to the primitive condition of the human race."—Nation, xvii., 20.

3. Ancient Society; or, Researches in the Lines of Human Progress, from Savagery through Barbarism into Civilization. N. York, 1877, 8vo.

"His book is divided into four parts, headed respectively: 1. Growth of Intelligence through Inventions and Discoveries. II. Growth of the Idea of Government. III. Growth of the Idea of Family. IV. Growth of the Idea of Property. The first part is devoted mainly to the establishment of what Mr. Morgan calls 'ethical periods,' of which he recognizes three—savagery, barbarism, and civilization. . . . The second part . . . demands full attention. . . . He acknowledges the classes succeeding each other—viz., society based upon difference of sex; society based upon kin; political society, based upon territory and property. . . . By scanning the earth's surface, even to the remotest isles, our author has succeeded in preserving for us the most important features of life among races that are fast vanishing. These features he has judiciously connected with the oldest resorts—mythical, traditional, and historical—of humanity, and thus spun a thread which, at a given point, is sure to pass through any branch or tribe, which to one can neglect who intends to devote some attention to human antiquity, as well as to the study of such living peoples as are yet without the pale of modern civilization."—Nation, xxv., 92.

"What Mr. Morgan has added to our stock of facts will endure, but his theories are doomed to rapid natural decay."—Sat. Rev., xiv., 19.

"The author has built up a structure of theory wider and heavier than his foundations of facts will bear. His scheme will hardly be accepted as a whole, but parts of it may stand as permanent additions to the science of man."—Edward B. Tylor: Acad., xiv., 67.

Morison, James Augustus Cotter, M.A., 1831-1888, b. in London; educated at Cholmeley Grammar-School, Highgate, and at Lincoln College, Oxford, where he graduated 1850; was one of the founders and original proprietors of the Fortnightly Review, and contributed largely to that and to other leading English periodicals. Much of his work was intended as a preparation for a history of France, a project which he had long in view, but was unable to carry out. For some time previous to his death he suffered from a wasting illness, and his last book was written in a sick-room. 1. The Life and Times of St. Bernard, Abbot of Clairvaux, Lon., 1803, p. 8vo; new eds., 1868, 1877.

The qualification is his rare faculty of insight and sympathy, which . . . enables him to comprehend, not merely justly or even generously, but really and completely, his hero's position in relation to his times and to the progress of human history. . . . His disqualification is who have wished to do justice to great medieval names."

"We do not think that the accepted estimate of Voltaire is in any danger of being seriously disturbed by Mr. Morley's volume, or indeed by anything that is likely to be discovered or written about him in these days. Mr. Morley is disposed to rank Voltaire, with Luther and Calvin, among the spiritual regenerators of the world. . . . Upon the facts of Voltaire's life Mr. Morley does not pretend to throw any new light. . . . It is impossible to read his volume without being struck by its independence of thought, its sincerity and candour of expression, as well as by its ability and literary power. . . . Mr. Morley has made us a valuable and highly suggestive study of the great man of a very critical age, and we only wish he could have persuaded himself to have given us this and nothing more. . . . and refrained from those digressions upon questions of the day, which disturb the artistic unity and diminish the scientific value of the work."—*Sat. "Perhaps the best criticism yet published on the life and character of Burke is contained in Mr. Morley's compendious biography."—Sat. Rev., xlviii, 208.

"A singularly just, elevated, and sympathetic study of the character and career of that 'master of statesmen.'"—Spectator, li, 141.

The author defended himself against certain strictures on matters of fact in an article entitled "A Word with some Critics," Fortnightly Review, October, 1879. A rejoinder on some of those points will be found in the Academy, vol. xvi, pp. 285-87, where the critic, Mr. E. J. Payne, says, in conclusion, "Mr. Morley's account of nine-tenths of Burke's life is to me complete and truthful; . . . the total result is a masterpiece such as Mr. Morley alone could have produced, and such as he may well contemplate with satisfaction."

9. The Life of Richard Cobden. Lon., 1881, 2 vols. 8vo. "Mr. Morley's mastery work will perpetuate the memory of his (Cobden's) achievements, and it may perhaps involuntarily disguise his not infrequent failures. . . . He was, on the whole, enviable in his public career and in his private life; nor has any one of his contemporaries thus far been so fortunate in a biographer."—Sat. Rev., lii, 637.

"The vigour and truthfulness with which he has traced Cobden's career as a public man and his relations with all the public movements in which he took part are equalled by the tact and grace with which, having access to all the private letters and memoranda extant, he has set forth as much as need be told about his personal history and his relations with his friends and kindred."—Ibid., No. 2938.

Mr. Morris is one of the few living writers who have succeeded in greatly modifying certain views of English history which had been long accepted as the only tenable ones. . . . It may be doubted whether Mr. Morris would ever have obtained a hearing at all, or got people to read many pages of the later volumes, if it had not been for the happy chance of the far-seeing sagacity which induced him to print, as an introduction to the series which induced him to print, the remarkable biography which is now published as a separate work.—ADAM SMITH: Acad., vi. 22.

5. Gwen: a Drama in Monologue, in Six Acts. By the Author of "The Epic of Hades." Lon., 1879, 12mo. "The author of the 'Epic of Hades' has been singularly favoured. Few of the first he has been warmly welcomed by the public, and received generous, indeed almost lavish, praise from the critics. . . . The range of the author is a myth and what was peculiarly dead a new life and meaning; while one, he has gained inspiration from themes which inspired the classic poet; and has not feared to awaken memories of that and, whether written in rhyme or blank verse, has proved himself a master of his instrument. . . . It does not follow, however, that the poet, for such he is, has unquestionably his work, admirable though it be, must still, in a large measure, be regarded as tentative, and curiosity is mingled with the pleasure with which we take up a fresh volume which links together the six acts of 'Gwen,' and the form in which the tale is presented will be familiar to readers passages obviously suggested by earlier poets. . . . The theme of his song is a familiar and even commonplace what may be called common into the pure gold of poetry."—Spectator, iii. 952.

"The present work undoubtedly shows many familiar characteristics of Mr. Morris; there is the same tender mingling over classical legends, the same irresistible desire to point the moral as well as to 'adorn the tale'; the same pleasing yet rather monotonous blank verse. We do not find, however, any of those 'flashes of fervid youth' that illuminated here and there the 'Songs of Two Worlds,' nor any passage, perhaps, of such finished exultation as the close of 'Marsyas' in the 'Epic of Hades.' On the other hand, what may be called the pletorial faculty—the faculty of showing a scene, a landscape, a face, a visible thing, almost or quaintly—has been markedly developed."—Acad., xlv, 313.

GENERAL CRITICISM:
"If popularity be the test of worth, Mr. Morris's merit as a poet is unequivocal. . . . When we set ourselves to see what it is exactly in Mr. Morris's poetry that has had so strong an appeal for our generation of readers, there is no difficulty in perceiving that it is primarily the moral sympathy pervading it, the humanity, the feeling of brotherhood, added to what used to be called individualism and is now known as religiosity. It has been more than once remarked that Mr. Morris stands between Mr. Tennyson and the people, and owes his acceptance as a poet to the skill with which he interprets the Laureate to those who know nothing of, and care nothing for, the higher poetic art. This statement, as explanatory of the fact that the author of the 'Epic of Hades' is one of the poetic forces of the time, has one angle of truth, and one only. . . . Mr. Lewis Morris is a realist; he brings a quick eye for the world's outward manifestations, and a ready sympathy for its human foibles and failures."—Ath., No. 2925.

"A book whose value we think we do not exaggerate when we say that it makes an era in the study of the English tongue. We have at last an historical grammar of the English language which really recognizes what the English language is. . . . When we read his accurate and scientific account of the origin of the English tongue and of its relations to other tongues, the main thing that strikes us is, how clear, how simple, the whole thing is. . . . The only fault that we have to find is one that Dr. Morris himself hopes to remedy. His present book is not quite a book for beginners. He says, 'I have endeavoured to write a book that can be profitably used by students or by the upper forms in our public schools; a very elementary book formed no part of my plan.'"—*Sat. After studying architecture for a time, he started in 1863, with several partners, an establishment in London for the manufacture of artistic wall-paper, stained glass, and other materials of household decoration, in which he has since worked as a designer. The business, which is now carried on under his name alone, has been an important agent in the revolution of taste in England in matters of decorative art. Of late years Mr. Morris has become a leading spirit of the Socialist League, and much of his recent work has been done in the columns of its organ, The Commonweal. 1. The Defence of Guenivere, and other Poems, Lon., 1858, p. 8vo.

2. The Life and Death of Jason, Lon., 1867, p. 8vo; 7th ed., 1877.

In the execution of a plan embracing persons so dignified and an action so romantic, Mr. Morris has displayed poetic qualities rare in themselves, and especially rare in conformity to the public impatience of high Art. Throughout, Mr. Morris assumes the part of a chronicler who has a tale to tell of the changes which they afford in the events, and not in the interest of which is to be found for imaginative display. Many readers, consequently, will peruse page after page of 'Jason' without being startled into admiration; but the charm of the narrative will, we think, grow upon them by degrees, until they know at last a strong though even current. To leave metaphor, so the richness of epithet and of colouring, the picturesque detail and the appropriate phrase which give life and individuality to his pictures, are for the most part known only by their effects and only fully appreciated in the retrospect."—Ath., No. 2065.

With his morals and immortals live and breathe, eat and drink, love and hate, and he asks no questions, neither perplexes his readers, with any doubts, keeping well before his mind that his office is that of the Chaplain of old. We cannot say that objects we see thus are idealized; for to idealize is not to deny the reality, but to sever what is in nature and transfer it to the imagination. Here, however, we find the familiar medium of strange and unexpected; and it is in this splendour, glowing as well as soft, that the present poem is steeped."—Ath., No. 2062.

GENERAL CRITICISM:

"In 'The Earthly Paradise,' though he may claim to be more than the mere singer of an empty day, and to say, in truth the author lays no ghosts that haunt the hearts and brains of modern men. Nor is he in any but a superficial sense a disciple of Chaucer. The ride to Camelot on breezy April mornings to the sound of jingling Harry Bailly, and in company with a person who wrought with the hearty benevolence of a ploughman inspired the folled search of an earthly paradise by weary wanderers. An unheroic melancholy, a barren autumnal (and all the more because it comes from a spirit robust and the poetry of despair. But since 'The Earthly Paradise' was first imagined Mr. Morris has found a faith. His heart-former to remain dormant within him; his quarrel with the present time is acute; he still dreams indeed of a millennium. Though we get from Mr. Morris no original verse comparable with that of his earlier volumes, and though we may doubt of his millennium, we cannot but rejoice that he has quitted that strange dreamy waste land and stands a singer of hope in the streets of London. . . . Better, far better, 'Chorus for Socialists' with faith, however inadequate for the wants of the soul, and hope, and charity, than the 'Earthly Paradise' with all life a melancholy dream."—E. Dowling: Transcripts and Statutes, p. 229.

"Besides being one of the most delightful poets that ever lived (and also one of the greatest, if we properly consider what gifts went to the writing of 'Sigurd'), he is one of the healthiest, in the sense that an old Viking or an old Greek was healthy who loved life and detested, though he might not fear, death."—ibid., No. 2731.

From 1868 he resided in England, making occasional excursions to the Continent, and a visit to America in 1875. He was elected a corresponding member of the French Institute, Academy of Moral and Political Sciences, in 1860, and a foreign associate in 1876, and received honorary degrees from Oxford, Harvard, and other universities. 1. History of the United Netherlands, from the Death of William the Silent to the Twelve Years' Truce, 1609, Lon., and N. York, 1860-68, 4 vols., 8vo. "His capital quality is the sustained interest he takes in the men and the deeds he describes. . . . The reader who lays down one of his volumes, is sure that he has been with real men and in the heat of real action. . . . He conducts a siege or fights a battle as if he were there. . . . He transfers his readers from topic to topic, from region to region, and from land to sea, by natural and well-veiled transitions. . . . Mr. Motley's best style is singularly animated and energetic. . . . He is never at a loss for words, and his words are very often pitily and nervous. But he does not keep his style faithfully up to its best. . . . He can descend to fine, to smart, and to flat writing. . . . Nor is it lacked, at least in the realm of reflection, by powerful imagination."—Nation, vi, 170. "History could scarcely supply a more magnificent subject. It is therefore high praise to say that the historian has, on the whole, not fallen below his theme. Mr. Motley's is not, to our mind, a perfect style of writing. It is limited, as has been justly observed, with imitations of times strains after an effect which it can never fully attain. Its irony is rather superabundant, and not always in good taste. It speaks when it had better leave to speak. It is wanting in terseness. . . . It deals in figurative language of a rather uncutivated kind. . . . The whole is not the less a work of the highest merit and of the deepest interest, and a great and permanent addition to historical literature."—Sat. Rev., xi, 122.

The Life and Death of John of Barneveld, Advocate of Holland; with a View of the Primary Causes and Movements of the Thirty Years' War, N. York and Lon., 1874, 2 vols., 8vo. "In the part of his work which relates to the religious struggle which ended with the execution of Barneveld, we have Mr. Motley at his best. . . . Unhappily, Mr. Motley's order to write the History of the Thirty Years' War. . . . It is with unfeigned regret that all who value Mr. Motley's work in his own sphere will see that he is despising the treasury he has so richly earned."—SAMUEL R. GARDNER, Acad., v, 133. "We are forced to the conclusion that Mr. Motley, having usefully spent a good deal of time in deciphering Dutch manuscripts, has been tempted to make out of them a much longer work than their importance justifies, and, further, to cke it out by the introduction, from tolerably familiar sources, of a good deal of irrelevant matter. . . . In spite of some brilliant passages in it, he will add nothing to his reputation by this so-called history of 'The Life and Death of John of Barneveld.'"—ibid., No. 2414.
- "Mr. Motley . . . would appear qualified beyond most men to write the life of the greatest of Dutch statesmen, and readers who take up his last work will naturally expect to find in it a thoroughly satisfactory life of John of Barneveld. This expectation will be disappointed. The book has great merits. Mr. Motley's industry has collected together a large amount of information, all of which is new to the mass of his readers, and a great deal of which he may be fairly said to have for the first time examined or discovered. There are, further, parts of the book which are admirable specimens of animated narrative; but, though the work is filled with materials from which it would be possible to construct a biography of Barneveld, it can hardly claim to be a life of the Advocate. Readers will not find in the two volumes with a sense of having read a confused chronicle of perplexed events without being able to form to themselves a clear conception of the course of the narrative, of the character and policy of the man with whom it deals, or of the real causes of his tragic end. The work reads like chapters torn from their places in a longer consecutive history. The chapters are not without interest, but they fail to compose a biography."—A. V. "Of eloquence in the ordinary sense of the word there is nothing here. It would be difficult to find a single ornamental sentence from one end of the volume to the other; there is scarcely a sermon. In it which does not possess eloquence, in a very true sense, of a high order. But it is the eloquence not so much of language as of thought. It is the eloquence of concentration, of vigorous grasp, of delicate irony, of deep but subdued pathos, of subtle delicacy of touch, of broad, strong sense."—Sat. Rev., xiii, 48.

GENERAL CURIOUS:

"We can hardly turn over a page of what Mozley has written without meeting with some striking thought, and we are everywhere conscious of the perfect good faith and sincerity which animated him. . . . But we cannot fail also to be reminded not infrequently of the fact that he generally presented himself as an advocate, though a perfectly sincere advocate, and not as a judge or a philosopher. Hence he not uncommonly states questionable propositions as if they admitted of no question; and in pushing on a vigorous front attack he is not always aware that he has uncovered his flank."—S. Mozley, Rev. Thomas, b. 1806, at Gainsborough, Eng.; brother of J. B. Mozley, D.D., supra; was educated at Charterhouse School, and at Oriel College, Oxford, where he graduated 1828, and was elected a Fellow in 1829. He was rector of Choberton, Wiltshire, 1836-44; resigned successively in London and in Finchampstead, Berkshire, till 1868, when he became rector of Plymtree, Devonshire. He was rural dean of Plymtree, then of Ottery St. Mary. In 1880 he resigned his living and settled at Cheltenham. He was for many years on the staff of the London Times. 1. Henry VII., Prince Arthur, and Cardinal Morton: from a Group representing the Adoration of the Three Kings on the Chancel Screen of Plymtree Church, in the County of Devon: with an Appendix containing a Notice of "Nicholas Monk, Rector of Plymtree," &c., Lon., 1878, 8vo; with a volume in elephant folio, containing chromo-lithographs and other illustrations. Privately printed. 2. Reminiscences, chiefly of Oriel College and the Oxford Movement, Lon., 1882, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"Though it is not the history of Tractarianism, it is the one book to which, next to and as corrective of the 'Apologia pro Vita Sua,' the future historian of Tractarianism must resort if he does not desire to stumble most woefully."—Sat. Rev., liv, 58, 120.

"Above everything else, there are reminiscences of Cardinal Newman, and they have the charm which everywhere associated with that mysterious and solitary figure inevitably possesses. In one respect Mr. Mozley is especially qualified to tell the story of the Oxford movement. . . . He regards the Oxford movement with the keenest possible interest, but it is with an interest which is historical and personal, not theological. . . . There is much besides these volumes that is interesting, and much that is amusing. There are good stories about the Wilberfores, about Archibald Denison, about Bonford, (? Dornford,) a now forgotten Oriel Fellow of that day, and about others who were associated with the Oxford movement, while for those who care to read them there are some curious chapters describing Mr. Mozley's own theological position."—Spectator, lv, 831.

"Many before now—Oakley, Froude, Kennard, not to mention Newman himself—have contributed to the story of the Tractarian movement. None of these, not even the famous 'Apologia,' will compare with the two volumes now before us in respect of minute fitness, close personal observation, and characteristic touches."—MARK PATTERSON: Acad., xxiii, 1.

3. Reminiscences, chiefly of Towns, Villages, and Schools, Lon., 1885, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"The earlier book appealed to general curiosity by the revelations which it offered of the inner lives of men whose names and fame belonged to the world. The latter publication invites our sympathetic interest by the lengthy and self-satisfying particularity with which it lingers over and plays with the characters and fortunes of obscure and stupid persons. This would promise a dull book in the hands of a matter-of-fact chronicler; but with Mr. Mozley the individual is always made the type of the class, and the class is used to represent the age."—Sat. Rev., lix, 622.

"We fear that, emboldened by the success of his former book, Mr. Mozley has raked together the contents of his diaries and of note-books and connected them by threads out of his own memory. Whatever the process has been, the result is a work of which Mrs. Nickleby, if she had had the vestige of a literary gift, might well claim the authorship."—Spectator, lviii, 301.

"No one will be disappointed who seeks in them a faithful and graphic picture of a part of which the traces are rapidly vanishing away."—Acad., xxvii, 107.

Mueller, Friedrich Max, Ph.D., M.A., (ante, vol. II, MULLER, MAX, add.) became a Fellow of All Souls College, Oxford, and assistant at the Bodleian Library in 1856, and sub-librarian in 1865. He retained his chair of modern languages till 1868, when a new professorship of comparative philology was specially created for him. In 1875 he practically resigned his chair, Prof. Sayce being appointed deputy professor, and devoted himself to editing the first series of Sacred Books of the East. In 1873 he delivered a lecture on missions in Westminster Abbey, at the request of Dean Stanley, and in 1878 he delivered the first course of the Hibbert Lectures. He is a foreign member of the French Institute, and has received the order of Merit from the King of Prussia. He has contributed largely to the leading English reviews. 1. A German Reading-Book, containing Extracts arranged Chronologically; with Biographical Notices, Translations, and Notes: Part I, Early; Fourth to Fifteenth Centuries; Part II, Modern; Sixteenth to Nineteenth Centuries, Lon., 1858, 2 vols. 8vo. 2. "We must not conclude without expressing our admiration for the work as a whole, the herculean massiveness of its learning,—comprehending not merely a profound knowledge of many languages, and a wonderful command of our own tongue for a foreigner, but a familiarity with several branches of science,—the bold originality and general soundness of its philosophy, and the transparency, animation, and occasional eloquence of its style, by which a subject so abstruse has been rendered not merely intelligible but attractive to a popular audience and the general reader."—Atk., No. 1919.

"In going through these volumes, we are set thinking about a vast number of subjects, but we are fully satisfied with more. We come to the end of each paper with a very distinct feeling of asking for more. . . . There is in his treatment a remarkable union of earnestness with delicacy. . . . Prof. Müller is really one of the best English writers of the day. He employs our language not only with ease and vigour, but with conspicuous purity and good taste."—Sat. Rev., xxv, 93, 116.

"The first of its six lectures begins by pleading in favour of 'a Science of Religion' . . . The second lecture gives a kind of sketch-map of the religions of the world. . . . The third lecture begins with the connection between language and religion, arguing that 'the classification of languages is applicable to the ancient religions of the world.' The fourth lecture is devoted to 'the right spirit in which ancient religions ought to be studied and interpreted.' . . . From first to last Prof. Max Müller's book is full of such instruction as educates in the highest sense of the word."—Atk., No. 2380.

"We must confess that Prof. Max Müller's arguments do not carry us with them,—that they raise more questions than they settle, and leave the 'Origin of Religion' still unexplained. Their value as a popular exposition of the views of one of the most learned, accomplished, and genial of modern scholars has been and will be widely, not to say universally, acknowledged."—Sat. Rev., lv, 188.

"He does not touch on the political lessons taught by a hundred years of empire, nor on those industrial, moral, and aesthetic lessons eloquently and ingeniously deduced by Sir George Birdwood from certain phases of Indian social life. The teaching Prof. Max Müller refers to is that which may be derived, on a broad view of the matter, from a study of the ancient language and literature of India."—Atk., No. 2886.

"All the essays are connected by the common tastes and aspirations of men who were either Orientals or Orientalists, or interested in the theory or practice of religion. . . . Like all Mr. Müller's writings, this volume of biographical sketches will be read with almost equal pleasure by his followers and by those who cannot follow him completely nor to all lengths."—Sat. Rev., lviii, 575.

21. The Science of Thought, Lon., 1887, 8vo. "The topics dealt with in this work may be roughly distributed under five headings. We have (1.) a disquisition on the connection between thought and language: (ii) a polemic against the Darwinian theory; (iii) an exposition and defence of Kant's theory of knowledge; (iv) an inquiry, filling more than half the volume, into the composition, origin, and growth of language; (v) an application of the results obtained to certain logical questions at issue between J. S. Mill and his opponents. To explain the origin of language, Prof. Max Müller adopts the theory of his friend—who seems also to be his critic and philosopher (his friend)—Prof. Ludwig Neider. The professor is at his best when he most thoroughly accepts the doctrine of evolution.—ALFRED W. BENN: Acad., xxxi. 317.

"The essays will be found to be uniformly marked by all the professor's well-known characteristics of thought and method. From small beginnings, or what seem to be such, the reader is led by very easy stages to monumental conclusions. His passage through the intricate mazes of philological growth and decay is smoothed by the ripe experience and cultivated, though only occasionally by the restrained and acedemical humour of his guide. . . . In the two concluding essays of the series Prof. Müller sums up, as it were, his case in the matter of the original home and earliest civilization of the Aryas. He reverts to the position which he took up and defended forty years ago. His foregone conclusion, he declares, is as valid as ever, for the Aryas came not from somewhere in Europe,—as Schrader and Penka have said in their heart,—but from 'somewhere in Asia.'—Ibid., No. 318.

GENERAL CRITICISM:

"Prof. Max Müller is always fascinating, always instructive; the dry bones of science clothe themselves with flesh and beauty under his touch, and we go to him not only to be taught the laws of human speech and mythology, but to learn also our own tongue, and to discover how the hand of the master can throw a charm over the labours of the student and a flood of light over his darkest problems."—A. Muhlberg, William Augustus, D.D., S.T.D., [ante, vol. II, add.] 1796-1877; became rector of the Church of the Holy Communion in 1846. He founded St. Luke's Hospital, opened in 1859, and was its pastor and superintendent till his death. In 1852 he organized the first Protestant Sisterhood in the United States. In 1866 he started St. Johnland, an industrial Christian settlement, on Long Island, about forty-five miles from New York. He also originated the Memorial movement in the Protestant Episcopal Church, and wrote much on evangelical union, of which he was an earnest advocate. It is an honest effort to find a basis for political science outside of the mere dry letter of the law; to establish the right of our government on some broader and firmer foundation than the well-worn text of the Constitution; to show the ethical and moral significance of the important political problem in course of being solved by the growth and prosperity of the United States, and of the great commonwealths within it."—Nation, xi, 10.

2. The Republic of God: an Institute of Theology, Bost., 1881, 8vo.

"The main feature of Dr. Mulford's theology, as presented in his 'Republic of God,' is the union of the utmost liberty of philosophic thought with Christian dogmas. He makes the personality of God as the central principle of the universe, but in a form so comprehensive and elevated as to seem no longer incompatible with that conception of Deity to which modern thought is approximating, of an infinite energy diffused throughout the universe, from whom all things proceed, and in whom they consist. . . . Revelation is the manifestation of the Divine personality in history, finding its highest and absolute expression in Christ. . . . The Bible witnesses to a revelation, but is not the revelation; sacraments witness to a divine process of purification and feeding, but are not themselves the process; the church bears witness to a life of the spirit in humanity, which goes beyond its boundaries as an organization."—A. Murfree, Miss Mary Nonille, ("Charles Egbert Craddock," pseud.), b. about 1850, at Granthams, near Murfreesborough, Tenn., a town named for her ancestor, Col. Hardy Murfree, an officer in the Revolutionary army. The family resided for some time in Nashville, but having lost property in the civil war they returned to Granthams, and afterwards settled in St. Louis, Mo. Miss Murfree became lame at an early age from a stroke of paralysis, and being debarred from active occupations sought companionship in books. She attracted attention by her stories of Tennessee mountain life contributed to the Atlantic Monthly under the above pseudonym before 1880. 1. In the Tennessee Mountains. By Charles Egbert Craddock. Bos., 1881, 12mo.

"He needed to tell but one story to prove his power as a simple narrator. . . . But the eight stories now grouped mere short stories. We have not only one mountain valley, and there, but the people of a whole district—not merely a day of winter or of summer, but all the year—not merely hot lies. Mr. Craddock is a master in the art of description. . . . It is hardly possible to add that the style is admirable, with marked characteristics of its own which exceed of rhythm, not of words, but of thought."—Nation, xxxviii. 419.

2. Where the Battle was Fought. Bos., 1884, 12mo. "Picture follows picture and incident hurries after incident without clearly separating the characters due to pass before him. It is only upon a review that he will realize how rich and varied a material can be found in a dull, deserted country neighborhood by an imagination keen in detecting the poetic value of inanimate things. It must sketches. . . . Taken part from a plot or narrative, the book presents a picture of the condition of the country such as we have never had before."—Nation, xxxix. 313.

3. Down the Ravine. Bos., 1883, 12mo. "The tale has all the quick and varied perception, the glow of imagination, which gave charm to the earlier sketches. It shows also a constructive power which, naturally, they gave no opportunity to display."—Nation, xl. 137.

4. The Prophet of the Great Smoky Mountain, Bos., 1885, 12mo.

"Like 'In the Tennessee Mountains' it is a picture of manners, using the word in that large sense which includes all the complicated relations of things, animate and inanimate, that make up the circumstance of life. It color. . . . If the Prophet were really her subject, she has done her own original conception scant justice. She has deserted it to give us instead separate pictures (all strong, we admit) of detached groups."—Nation, xli. 428.

5. In the Clouds. Bos., 1887, 16mo. 6. The Story of Keelson Bluffs. Bos., 1887, 16mo. 7. The Despot of Broadmead Cove, Bos., 1888, 12mo.

"Few modern novelists can tell a story of English country life better than Mr. D. Christie Murray. He has the minute observation of manners and speech, the patient accuracy of detail, the sustained attention to minor points without which no such story can be built to the satisfaction of the reader. With all that, he has the dramatic faculty which lifts his work out of dreary realism while

Synopsis of the Hours Pauline: containing a Condensation and Rearrangement of the Arguments whereby Paly evinced the Truth of the Scripture History of St. Paul; new ed., Lon., 1879, Svo. 5. Thirtieth Address of the President to the Philological Society, Lon., 1884, Svo. 6. (Ed.) A New English Dictionary on Historical Principles: founded mainly on the Materials collected by the Philological Society. Part I. Oxf., 1884, imp. 4to. (This work originated in a paper "On the Deficiencies in our English Dictionaries" read to the Philological Society by Archbishop Trench in November, 1857. The plan was fully arranged in August, 1858, but the premature death of his superintendent, Herbert Coleridge, caused it to languish until 1879, when it was taken up by the director of the society, Dr. Murray.)

"The main points in which this work is immensely superior to all English dictionaries, and better even than M. Littré's splendid dictionary of the French language, are these. The history of living words is traced up from their earliest appearance by means of delet quotations, and all obsolete words which have died out since 1525 are similarly treated. The orthographic and phonetic development of words is indicated and illustrated in the quotations by the retention of old spelling. The definitions of the meanings, as we are told in the 'General Explanations,' (p. xi.) 'have been framed anew upon a study of all the quotations for each word collected for this work, of which those printed form only a small part; so that in logical order of the different senses of words which have had or have still more than one meaning all previous efforts are far surpassed. . . . A large number of obsolete words belonging to the period which other dictionaries profess to embrace are here recorded for the first time. . . . Numbers of new forms also make their lexicographic debut.'—Ath., No. 2937.

"It is by this time abundantly clear that the 'New English Dictionary' is marking an enormous advance in the philological knowledge of the English language, of which advance by far the larger portion must be attributed directly to the contents of the said 'Dictionary.'—Ath., No. 3180.

"This Dictionary will itself be the greatest monument of English philological criticism ever constructed."—Sat. Rev., lxxiii, 775.

"The Philological Society has been especially fortunate in finding an editor with so judicial a turn of mind,—one who weighs the evidence, and goes by it, instead of importing into words something evolved out of his own consciousness. The breadth and accuracy of the results thus obtained are most satisfactory."—W. W. SKEAT: Acad., xxxi, 547.

"This poem, though written in stanzas, is in its essence dramatic. From first to last it is a pure soliloquy, in which St. Paul is made to express his sense of his own unworthiness, his deep repentance, and his attitude of devotion and faith towards his Master. . . . Into St. Paul's character, however, into his motives, and into his various mental transitions, Mr. Myers has not sought to enter. He simply presents us with a record of emotions. . . . These are sometimes expressed with no common power of music and of diction."—Ath., No. 2103.

"Many of the poems are enigmatical, not to say mystical, in utterance; they are cultivated and refined in style, and the most important are deeply charged with that burden of sadness which is a very marked characteristic of the age. The highest gifts of poetry they can scarcely claim. Nothing that can be called imaginative or creative, and little that is in any full sense dramatic, appears in Mr. Myers's pages. The poems have, however, marked fertility of thought and expression; the illustrations employed are appropriate; the style, though elaborate and ornate, is poetical; and the whole entitles its author to a place with those whose statues are in the portico of the House of Fame."—Ath., No. 2885.

"His [Napier's] letters have not been preserved, or at any rate have not been collected; but the familiar outpourings of the habitual writers in the 'Review,' with occasional letters from less frequent contributors, remained with Mr. Napier, and a selection from the correspondence has now been published by his son. . . . It must be owned that most readers will find that the chief amusement they derive from these miscellaneous letters consists in the very free criticism which some of the writers bestowed on the articles appearing in successive numbers of the 'Edinburgh.'"—Sat. Rev., xviii, 33.

"To the surviving few who recollect the earlier years of the 'Review' . . . it will require no recommendation beyond its title; to the present generation it will be interesting by affording a glimpse behind the curtain of scenes to which some have heard enthusiastic allusions in the talk of their seniors, and a better personal view of some of the giants of the early part of this century than is perhaps to be found even in the well-written biographies of many of them which have appeared."—Spectator, lii, 1162.
